Overview

[1] The applicant 2122157 Ontario Inc. ("212") brought an application for judicial review to set aside a decision of Tarion Warranty Corporation ("Tarion") on the grounds of procedural unfairness. After oral argument, the Court dismissed the application without hearing the merits of the application with reasons to follow. These are the reasons for that decision.

2016 ONSC 851 (CanLII)

Factual Background

[2] 212 built a townhouse and condominium complex in the west end of Toronto ("the Project"). 212 was initially registered as a builder and vendor with Tarion, a corporation appointed by the Ontario government to administer the Ontario New Homes Warranties Plan Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. O.31 ("the Act"). As a condition of registration, 212 agreed to provide $560,000 in security to Tarion. That security was provided by means of a Deposit Trust Agreement between Tarion, 212 and the respondent Owens Wright LLP as trustee.

[3] 212 lost its registration with Tarion in January 2012 because of its poor credit rating and its failure to execute and deliver the annual terms and conditions letter for the 2011-2012 renewal year. As 212 had not sold all the units at the Project, Tarion agreed to re-register 212 from August 2012 to August 2014 for the limited purpose of the sale of the units. Tarion cancelled 212's registration as a vendor again on August 22, 2014.

[4] The Act and Regulation 892 prescribe three time periods during which a vendor has an opportunity to repair defects that are warrantable under the Act or otherwise resolve a vendor's claims voluntarily:

1. after a homeowner submits a warranty claim to Tarion;

2. after a homeowner requests that Tarion conduct a conciliation inspection to determine whether a warrantable defect exists, but before the inspection occurs; and

3. after Tarion determines, as a result of the inspection, that claim items are warranted.

[5] Section 5.10 of Regulation 892 confers a discretion on Tarion to abridge the vendor repair periods if Tarion determines that the vendor is "unable or unwilling" to resolve the claim items covered by a warranty. When Tarion decides to abridge a vendor repair period, the vendor is not excluded from the warranty claim process and continues to receive written notice of warranty claims and conciliation inspections. However, Tarion can begin repairs or pay compensation sooner to homeowners.

[6] Tarion first found 212 to be unwilling or unable to resolve the warranty claims at the Project on September 4, 2013, following a process undertaken by its Unwilling/Unable Committee. The reasons for the decision included the number of warranty claims, the failure of 212 to carry out proper repairs of warrantable defects, and 212's lack of attendance at conciliation inspections. After submissions from 212, the Chair of the Committee decided to give 212 a second chance, and the decision was reversed on September 20, 2013.

[7] Tarion reinstated the unwilling/unable determination in March 2014 because it concluded that 212 had failed to address significant warranty claims involving major defects, such as water penetration and lack of adequate insulation. In a letter dated March 5, 2014, Tarion informed 212 that Tarion would proceed to resolve all claims directly with homeowners without giving 212 an opportunity to do so. Homeowners would not be required to wait for 212 to resolve a warranty claim and could request a conciliation immediately. Tarion has since been resolving the homeowners' claims directly and at considerable expense.

[8] On March 17, 2014, 212 sent Tarion an incomplete application package meant to commence Builders' Arbitration Forum ("BAF") proceedings. It followed up with an updated Request to Arbitrate and an arbitration agreement on April 9, 2014. Tarion refused the request to arbitrate, as 212 did not meet the eligibility requirements laid out in the BAF Procedural Rules. The main reason for the refusal was the fact that 212 was not a member in good standing under the warranty regime.

[9] In August 2014, 212 commenced a civil action against Tarion and the respondent Toronto Standard Condominium Corporation No. 2251 ("TSCC"). On May 22, 2015, 212 commenced this application for judicial review, claiming that it had been denied procedural fairness when Tarion made its decision finding 212 unwilling or unable to make warrantable repairs.

Should this Court exercise its discretion to grant judicial review?

[10] Tarion argued that the Court should exercise its discretion to dismiss the application for judicial review on a number of grounds: unreasonable delay, mootness, the availability of alternative remedies, and 212's lack of clean hands.

Analysis

[11] Judicial review is a discretionary remedy, and courts will refuse a remedy where the public interest does not require judicial intervention (Chippewas of Sarnia Band v. Canada (Attorney General) (2000), 51 O.R. (3d) 641 (C.A.) at para. 258; Donald J.M. Brown and John M. Evans, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada, Carswell, para. 3:1200 (September 2009)). Whether on an application for judicial review or in another type of proceeding, courts will generally refuse to decide a case where the remedy sought would serve no useful purpose, because there is no live controversy or dispute between the parties (Borowski v. Canada (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 342 at 357). Courts have also refused to deal with an application for judicial review where there has been unreasonable delay by the applicant in pursuing judicial review, or the applicant has an adequate alternative remedy (Harelkin v. University of Regina, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 561 at 587, Brown v. Waterloo (Region) Commissioners of Police (1985), 7 O.A.C. 51 (Div. Ct.) at paras. 10, 46-48).

[12] In the present case, the applicant does not challenge the merits of the determination that it was unwilling/unable to effect warranty repairs. Rather, it argues that the determination was made without procedural fairness. Were a court to find that there was a denial of procedural fairness, the remedy would be to set aside the determination. That would not prevent Tarion from proceeding to make the determination again, provided it acted fairly.

[13] In my view, there is no useful purpose in considering the application on the merits, given the time that has passed since the unwilling/unable determination was made in March 2014. That determination allowed Tarion to abridge the times for 212 to make warranty repairs. The vendor repair periods that 212 notionally seeks to revive have long since expired, and Tarion has either completed the repairs or the work is well underway. The evidence clearly establishes that 212 did not seek to repair the warrantable defects within those repair periods or after their expiry.

[14] 212 argues that this proceeding is not moot, as the effect of a decision setting aside the unwilling/unable determination would be to allow it to proceed to arbitration under the BAF process. This argument is based on a misunderstanding of the BAF process. The BAF process is an arbitration process that requires the consent of both the vendor/builder and Tarion. Consent from Tarion requires compliance with a number of conditions set out in Builder Bulletin 41R, including the requirement that the vendor be a registrant in good standing throughout the arbitration process. As set out in the Bulletin, the vendor must be in compliance with requirements under the statutory scheme other than with respect to the disputed warranty claim that is the subject of the BAF proceeding.

[15] As of August 2014, 212 is no longer registered with Tarion, so it is not eligible to participate in the BAF process. Moreover, around the time of the unwilling/unable determination, 212 was not compliant with the statutory scheme in a number of ways - in particular, it was regularly failing to attend conciliation inspections, it was regularly failing to repair warrantable defects, and it was not up to date in paying all invoices issued by Tarion for reimbursement for warranty breaches. As Tarion stated in a letter to 212's counsel dated April 21, 2014:

> Your client's continued lack of participation in the warranty process is a breach of the Act, Builder Bulletin 42 and as a result, a breach of the Vendor Agreement. As such, your client is not considered to be in Good Standing with Tarion as defined by BAF Rules (2013).

Accordingly, 212 had no right of access to the arbitration process in the spring of 2014, nor would it have such a right today. Thus, the outcome of this judicial proceeding would have no effect on its access to the arbitration process.

[16] While 212 might prefer the arbitration route, it has an alternative route in the civil proceedings, where it can seek damages against Tarion. The civil action also provides an alternative remedy to this application for judicial review and, indeed, a preferable route, as this court cannot order monetary compensation if Tarion has carried out repairs that are not warrantable.

[17] There has also been undue delay in commencing and advancing the application for judicial review, which is another reason for the court refusing to exercise its discretion to grant judicial review (P.P.G. Industries Canada Ltd. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 739). The unwilling/unable determination was made in March 2014, yet the application for judicial review was not launched until May 2015. The application was not argued until January 2016. No satisfactory explanation has been provided for the delay. 212 was objecting to the repairs done by Tarion from the outset, as demonstrated by the request to proceed to the BAF process and the commencement of a civil action claiming damages in August 2014.

[18] A court may refuse judicial review because of undue delay where there will be prejudice to a third party or the public interest if the decision under review is now reversed. As I have stated above, Tarion has undertaken repairs or has contracted for the repairs that 212 was obligated to carry out under the statutory scheme. I am satisfied that there will be prejudice to homeowners, TSCC and the public interest if the determination is now reversed, as there will likely be further delay in carrying out necessary repairs.

[19] Given the mootness of the issue before this Court, the unreasonable delay, and the availability of other remedies, the application for judicial review is dismissed.

Costs

[20] Costs to Tarion are fixed on a partial indemnity basis at $25,000.00, an amount that is fair and reasonable having regard to the size of the record, the need for cross-examinations, and the complexity of the issues.

[21] Neither TSCC nor Owens Wright should have been added as parties to this application for judicial review, as 212 sought private law relief against them in the nature of injunctive relief and interpretation of the trust agreement. Such relief is not properly raised in an application for judicial review. Costs to TSCC are fixed at $10,000 and to Owens Wright at $7,500.

THE LAW SOCIETY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

In the matter of the Legal Profession Act, SBC 1998, c. 9 and a hearing concerning

CHARLES LOUIS ALBAS

RESPONDENT

2016 LSBC 18 (CanLII)

DECISION OF THE HEARING PANEL ON FACTS AND DETERMINATION

Hearing date: February 17, 2016

Panel: Martin Finch, QC, Chair
Dan Goodleaf, Public representative
Bruce LeRose, QC, Lawyer

Discipline Counsel: Kieron G. Grady
No-one appearing on behalf of the Respondent

BACKGROUND

[1] This hearing concerns three aspects of alleged lawyer misconduct. The first relates to borrowing of monies from clients and the provision of legal services where the lawyer is alleged to have a direct or indirect financial interest in the subject matter of the legal services. The second relates to candour with the court and opposing counsel. The third relates to the duty to notify the Law Society of unsatisfied judgments.

[2] On February 17, 2016, the Panel heard from counsel for the Law Society, but Mr. Albas did not attend the hearing that day. As a result of his non-attendance, a preliminary issue fell to be determined on whether the citation had been served on Mr. Albas in accordance with Rule 4-19 or if service had been waived by him.

[3] The Panel addressed the issue of service and then considered whether the hearing should proceed in the absence of the Respondent.

[4] The Panel determined service had been lawfully effected and decided to proceed with the hearing in the absence of the Respondent. The Panel found that the Respondent knew of the hearing and had indicated he did not intend to attend the hearing.

[5] Following the aforementioned determinations, the Panel addressed the citation on the issue of facts and determination of professional misconduct.

[6] The Panel found that the Respondent was guilty of professional misconduct with respect to all eight allegations of the citation.

[7] The following are reasons for those decisions and findings.

SERVICE OF NOTICE OF HEARING AND POSITION OF THE RESPONDENT REGARDING ATTENDANCE AT THE HEARING

Service of citation

[8] Rule 4-41 of the Law Society Rules requires the Hearing Panel to determine whether the citation has been served in accordance with Rule 4-19 or if service has been waived by the Respondent.

[9] Rule 4-19 states that a citation must be served on the Respondent:

(a) in accordance with Rule 10-1; and

(b) not more than 45 days after the direction that it be issued, unless the Discipline Committee or the Chair of the Committee otherwise directs.

[10] Rule 10-1(1) reads as follows:

Service and notice

10-1(1) A lawyer, former lawyer, articled student or applicant may be served with a notice or other document personally, by leaving it at his or her place of business or by sending it by

(a) registered mail, ordinary mail or courier to his or her last known business or residential address,

(b) electronic facsimile to his or her last known electronic facsimile number,

(c) electronic mail to his or her last known electronic mail address, or

(d) any of the means referred to in paragraphs (a) to (c) to the place of business of his or her counsel or personal representative or to an address given to discipline counsel by a respondent for delivery of documents relating to a citation.

[11] Rule 10-1(5) states that a document sent by ordinary mail is deemed to be served seven days after it is sent.

[12] Rule 10-1(6) states that a document sent by registered mail or courier is deemed to be served on the next business day after it is left or delivered.

[13] Rule 10-1(7) states that a document sent by electronic facsimile or electronic mail is deemed to be served on the next business day after it is sent.

[14] Rule 10-1(8) states that any person may be notified of any matter by ordinary mail, electronic facsimile or electronic mail to the person's last known address.

[15] The Law Society filed as Exhibit 1 the affidavit of Chrysta Gejdos sworn on February 12, 2016. According to the affidavit, the citation, along with a covering letter dated June 24, 2015, was served on the Respondent's counsel, Mr. Ihas, by courier on June 25, 2015.

[16] The Respondent's counsel acknowledged receipt of the citation on June 25, 2015. By virtue of this acknowledgement, the Panel finds there is a preponderance of evidence to establish service of the citation on Mr. Albas.

Proceeding in the absence of the Respondent

[17] Section 42(2) of the Legal Profession Act permits a hearing panel to proceed in the absence of a respondent if the panel is satisfied that the respondent has been served with the notice of the hearing.

[18] In Law Society of BC v. Tak, 2014 LSBC 27, Law Society of BC v. Gellert, 2013 LSBC 22, Law Society of BC v. Power, 2009 LSBC 23, Law Society of BC v. Basi, 2005 LSBC 41, Law Society of BC v. McLean, 2015 LSBC 06 and Law Society of BC v. Jessacher, 2015 LSBC 43 (among others), hearing panels proceeded in the absence of the respondent.

[19] In applying section 42(2) of the Legal Profession Act, hearing panels have considered the following factors:

(a) whether the respondent has been provided with notice of the hearing date;

(b) whether the respondent has been cautioned that the hearing may proceed in his or her absence;

(c) whether the panel adjourned for 15 minutes in case the respondent was merely delayed;

(d) whether the respondent has provided any explanation for his or her non-attendance;

(e) whether the respondent is a former member of the Law Society; and

(f) whether the respondent has admitted the underlying misconduct.

It is submitted that (a), (b) and (d) should be given the most weight.

Whether the respondent has been provided with notice of the hearing date

[20] On September 3, 2015, Michelle Robertson, the Hearing Administrator, caused a letter, with enclosure, dated September 3, 2015 to be sent to the Respondent's counsel by courier. The enclosure was the Notice of Hearing dated September 3, 2015 (affidavit of Chrysta Gejdos – paragraphs 6).

[21] It was the position of the Law Society that the Respondent had been provided with notice of the time, place and date of the hearing and was deemed to have been served with the notice pursuant to, and in accordance with, Rule 10-1(1)(d).

[22] Mr. Ihas subsequently (on or about October 9, 2015) stopped acting as counsel for the Respondent in this matter (affidavit of Chrysta Gejdos – paragraph 8).

Whether the respondent has been cautioned that the hearing may proceed in his or her absence

[23] The Respondent had been cautioned that the hearing may proceed in his absence. The cautions were set out in:

(a) the citation issued June 24, 2015; and

(b) the Notice of Hearing dated September 3, 2015.

2016 LSBC 18 (CanLII)

Whether the panel adjourned for 15 minutes in case the respondent was merely delayed [24] The Panel adjourned briefly to consider delay and then proceeded.

Whether the respondent has provided any explanation for his or her non-attendance

[25] In an email to Mr. Grady dated February 3, 2016 (Exhibit 2), the Respondent provided an explanation for his non-attendance. He said he was in Florida and did not want to attend the hearing if at all possible (affidavit of Chrysta Gejdos – paragraph 10).

[26] In an email sent to the Respondent on February 12, 2016 (Exhibit 3), Mr. Grady advised him correctly that there was no rule that compelled a respondent to attend a disciplinary hearing. He was also advised, however, that the Panel could continue in his absence if satisfied that the Respondent was served with the Notice of Hearing. There is no evidence that the Respondent replied to Mr. Grady's email of February 12, 2016. On February 16, 2016, Mr. Grady again sent an email to the Respondent advising him of the location of the hearing scheduled for February 17, 2016.

[27] Both Exhibits 2 and 3 were sent to an email address from which the Respondent had previously replied.

Whether the respondent is a former member of the Law Society

[28] The Respondent is a former member of the Law Society as of January 1, 2016. In an email dated January 18, 2016 (which contained the hearing date in the "Re" line), he stated that he chose to not renew his licence because of the citation (affidavit of Chrysta Gejdos – paragraph 9).

Whether the respondent has admitted the underlying misconduct

[29] The Respondent has admitted in his email of February 3, 2016 to Mr. Grady that his conduct as alleged in the citation constitutes professional misconduct (affidavit of Chrysta Gejdos – paragraph 10). He has further admitted all facts set out in the Law Society's Notice to Admit.

Conclusion

[30] Having regard to all the circumstances, including evidence that the Respondent had been properly served with the citation and the Notice of Hearing, the Panel decided to proceed with the hearing of the citation, despite the Respondent's absence. The Panel relied on Section 42(2) of the Legal Profession Act and was satisfied that the Respondent had been served with the Notice of Hearing.

FINDINGS REGARDING ALLEGATIONS OF PROFESSIONAL MISCONDUCT

[31] The citation was authorized on June 11, 2015 and issued on June 24, 2015 (the "Citation").

[32] The Citation contains eight allegations that the Respondent:

(a) Borrowed money from clients (two allegations);

(b) Provided legal services to clients when he had a direct or indirect financial interest in the subject matter of the legal services (two allegations);

(c) Failed to disclose material facts in a notice of motion and supporting affidavit;

(d) Failed to disclose material facts and correct the record concerning an application in foreclosure proceedings;

(e) Misled opposing counsel; and

(f) Failed to notify the Law Society of three unsatisfied judgements.

Onus and standard of proof

[33] The onus of proof is well established. It is on the Law Society.

[34] The standard of proof has been articulated by the Supreme Court of Canada in FH v. McDougall, 2008 SCC 53, 297 DLR (4th) 193 and has been adopted by Law Society hearing panels in numerous cases, including Law Society of BC v. Schauble, 2009 LSBC 11 and Law Society of BC v. Seifert, 2009 LSBC 17 at paragraph 13.

[35] In Schauble at paragraph 43 the panel quoted directly from McDougall:

> The onus of proof is on the Law Society, and the standard of proof is a balance of probabilities: "… evidence must be scrutinized with care" and "must always be sufficiently clear, convincing and cogent to satisfy the balance of probabilities test. But ... there is no objective standard to measure sufficiency.

[36] The burden of proof was also articulated by the hearing panel in Seifert at paragraph 13:

> ... the burden of proof throughout these proceedings rests on the Law Society to prove, with evidence that is clear, convincing and cogent, the facts necessary to support a finding of professional misconduct or incompetence on a balance of probabilities. In considering its findings in this matter, the Panel has applied that test.

Review of evidence

[37] Entered into evidence as Exhibit 5 was a Notice to Admit tendered by the Law Society dated November 20, 2015. That Notice to Admit sought 51 admissions of fact and the authenticity of 19 documents.

[38] Entered into evidence as Exhibit 6 was the Response of Charles Louis Albas dated November 25, 2015 to the Notice to Admit. In that Response, Mr. Albas admits the authenticity of the documents at tabs numbered 2 to 19 of the Notice to Admit, and admits the truth of the facts set out in paragraphs 1 through 51 of the Notice to Admit.

[39] MT was employed for over 30 years by the BC Assessment Office in Penticton. For investment, he made private loans to individuals or companies, secured by a mortgage. He began doing so in the late 1960s. Over the years, he made one or more loans a year, usually on a one-year basis. The amounts loaned gradually increased.

[41] At all material times, the Respondent was the owner and directing mind of a numbered company.

[43] MT met the Respondent in about 1980, when they became neighbours.

[44] MT generally used the Respondent as his lawyer when making loans to borrowers, unless a borrower wanted to use a different lawyer. MT also retained the Respondent to act on his personal legal affairs, for the preparation of the mortgages to secure loans made, and on the occasional foreclosure.

[45] From time to time, the Respondent would call MT and ask if he had any money to lend. If MT said he was interested, once the terms were settled, the Respondent prepared and registered the mortgage.

[46] On October 6, 2005, the Respondent contacted MT and said he was going to do a subdivision on some property in Langley, BC and wanted to borrow $485,000 from T Ltd. through the Respondent's numbered company. MT discussed terms with the Respondent: interest at 7 per cent, a one-year term, and the monthly payment amount on interest only. MT believed that the Respondent had already bought the property through his numbered company. MT asked for a personal guarantee, to which the Respondent agreed. MT has no notes in relation to the transaction and says the conversation was between the two of them only. MT and the Respondent met on one occasion only in relation to this transaction.

[47] The Respondent showed MT an appraisal that showed that the property that he wished to develop was purchased in August 2005 for $485,000 and that its current value as of October 2005 was $635,000.

[48] MT agreed to make the loan of $485,000 to the numbered company. He had to borrow to do so.

[49] The documents were prepared and the funds were advanced. The Respondent used the funds to purchase the property. On October 14, 2005, the Respondent applied for registration of the property with his numbered company as registered owner in fee simple. The application for registration was entered on October 24, 2005.

[50] The Respondent reported to MT on the registration on November 9, 2005.

[51] The Respondent told MT that the loan was to fund the subdivision costs, and MT would not have loaned the full purchase price had he known the loan was for the purpose of buying the property.

[52] On October 24, 2005, the Respondent, through his numbered company, entered into a contract with E Investments and NA for the installation of the services required to complete the subdivision for a price of $200,000.

[53] In 2006, the Respondent needed further funds to complete the subdivision. He obtained a loan for his numbered company from AV and JV. The Respondent acted for AV and JV on a number of other occasions, both before and after this loan. The loan was for $300,000, secured by a mortgage upon which the Respondent was the covenanter. The Respondent's firm, Albas Wahl, drew the mortgage and registered it. The mortgage indicates the officer was "KM" who was a lawyer employed by Albas Wahl. The applicant was Albas Wahl. The mortgage was registered May 1, 2006.

[54] Payments were made by the Respondent to T Ltd. during the one year term of the mortgage. However, the subdivision did not complete. Payments by the Respondent to T Ltd. continued for a period of time, but then stopped.

[55] The Respondent made attempts to sell the property, but these were unsuccessful.

[56] In June 2008, T Ltd. filed a petition in foreclosure against the numbered company, the Respondent, AV and JV and two other respondents in the Penticton Registry of the BC Supreme Court. T Ltd.'s counsel was CS.

[57] On August 28, 2008, an order nisi of foreclosure was granted in the T Ltd. foreclosure, including an amount required to redeem and judgment in favour of T Ltd. against the numbered company and the Respondent for $506,373.93, with a six-month redemption period.

[58] On March 19, 2009, conduct of sale was granted to AV and JV as second mortgagee.

[59] On about August 7, 2009, through their counsel, JJ, AV and JV filed an application for an order approving a sale at a price of $495,000, returnable August 27, 2009.

[60] The Respondent said that, when he received AV and JV's application, he contacted NA and told him that, unless he brought forward a purchaser and at a better price, the property was likely to be sold at a loss. The Respondent says he called NA because NA had been involved in earlier attempts to sell the property.

[61] NA faxed an offer dated August 20, 2009 at a price of $950,000 from a RS. The Respondent noted that the offer was not in a form that could be approved by the court, so he made some notations and faxed it back to NA.

[62] On August 21, 2009, the Respondent filed a response opposing AV and JV's application for an order approving sale.

[63] Early in the morning of August 27, 2009, the date set for the hearing of AV and JV's application, the Respondent received an offer by fax for the sale of the property at $950,000 to "RS through his nominee corporation, a Division of M

Ltd." to complete November 4, 2009. The offer required a deposit of $20,000 to be paid to the Respondent in trust within 72 hours of acceptance.

[64] The Respondent prepared an application for an order approving the RS offer, and swore an affidavit in support. He described the offer submitted by AV and JV as prepared by a "vulture" and attached the offer from RS. On August 27, 2009, the Respondent took the application and affidavit to the courthouse, filed them, and gave copies to the parties attending. On August 27, 2009, the court approved the RS offer.

[65] The Respondent ordered a company search on M Ltd. at about 8:00 am on August 27th, 2009. The Respondent did so because he had been unable to reach RS and he wanted to make sure the offer was real. The Respondent at no time spoke with RS, and all information he received about RS came through NA. The search showed that the corporate purchaser, M Ltd., had been dissolved on April 9, 2007 for failure to make required filings. The Respondent reviewed the corporate search sometime on August 27, 2009.

[66] The Respondent did not disclose the result of the M Ltd. corporate search to any other parties in the T Ltd. foreclosure and took no steps to return the matter to court.

[67] The RS offer that had been approved by the court required a deposit of $20,000 within 72 hours of acceptance to be paid to the Respondent in trust. The deposit was not paid within that time frame and was never paid.

[68] By letter dated August 31, 2009, JJ sent a draft form of the order approving the offer to the Respondent, which the Respondent received on September 2, 2009. By that date, the Respondent knew that M Ltd. had been dissolved and that the deposit had not been received.

[69] The Respondent's file contains no record of any communication regarding the sale of the property between September 2, 2009 and November 4, 2009, the date the sale was supposed to complete.

[70] Under the terms of the order approving the sale to RS, JJ was to handle the closing. The other parties, and in particular, T Ltd. and AV and JV, assumed that the sale would indeed complete. The day before the scheduled closing date, T Ltd.'s lawyer sent a bill of costs to the Respondent.

[71] On November 3, 2009, JJ spoke with the Respondent, who gave him an explanation for RS's absence and indicated that the sale would complete. No mention was made of the deposit. On November 4, 2009, JJ contacted the Respondent and asked about the deposit, and the Respondent told him that he would have to check with his office. By the closing date of November 4, 2009, the Respondent was aware that he had not received the deposit. Telling JJ he had to check with his office regarding the deposit was misleading.

[72] On November 4, 2009, JJ wrote to the Respondent indicating he had not heard from the purchasers or been able to contact them and seeking confirmation that the deposit was in the Respondent's trust account.

[73] On November 9, 2009, JJ telephoned the Respondent who told him that he had not received the deposit. The Respondent told JJ he was advised that morning that the RS purchase was still supposed to be going ahead.

[74] In November, 2009, the Respondent gave JJ and CS the names of two different law firms said to be acting for the purchaser. When contacted, each lawyer denied any knowledge of the transaction. The Respondent states that the names of RS's purported lawyers were given to him by NA.

[75] On November 20, 2009, CS wrote to the Respondent and asked whether the transaction would close. In handwriting, the Respondent faxed back a note on CS's letter, copied to JJ, that stated: "I have been pushing the purchaser (enforcement proceeding) and they have advised me that they will complete the purchase." As the Respondent had never spoken with RS or any lawyer on his behalf or on behalf of M Ltd, the statement by the Respondent in his faxed handwritten notes to CS of November 20, 2009 was on its face untrue.

[76] On December 18, 2009, AV and JV initiated foreclosure proceedings against the numbered company and the Respondent in the Penticton Registry of the Supreme Court. On January 28, 2010, order nisi was pronounced, including judgment against the numbered company and the Respondent in the amount of $402,698.92 with a one-day redemption period.

[77] On January 6, 2010, the Respondent told JJ "he was still in touch with RS" and the sale would complete. On January 28, 2010, conduct of sale was granted to T Ltd. in the T Ltd. foreclosure.

[78] On September 2, 2010, the Respondent and AV and JV entered into a forbearance agreement whereby the Respondent was to pay $2,000 per month and, so long as he continued to do so, the amount owed in excess of $300,000 would be forgiven.

[79] On April 19, 2012, on the application of T Ltd., the sale of the property at a price of $585,000 was approved by the court. The sale completed. This left a shortfall of over $100,000 on the T Ltd. debt.

[80] On November 15, 2012, a certificate of costs was entered in the T Ltd. foreclosure against the Respondent and his numbered company for $16,739.15.

[81] T Ltd. has continued to pursue its judgment through garnishment and examination in aid of execution, without success.

[82] The Respondent failed to satisfy the judgment ordered against him in the amount of $506,373.93 pursuant to the order nisi of foreclosure dated August 28, 2008 and failed to notify the Executive Director of the Law Society in writing of the circumstances of the unsatisfied monetary judgment against him and his proposal for satisfying such judgment.

[83] The Respondent also failed to satisfy the judgment ordered against him in the amount of $402,698.92 pursuant to the order nisi of foreclosure dated January 28, 2010 and failed to notify the Executive Director of the Law Society in writing of the circumstances of the unsatisfied monetary judgment against him and his proposal for satisfying such judgment.

[84] The Respondent further failed to satisfy the Certificate of Costs in the amount of $16,739.15 and failed to notify the Executive Director of the Law Society in writing of the circumstances of the unsatisfied monetary judgment against him and his proposal for satisfying such judgment.

Applicable law

[85] The Legal Profession Act, the Code of Professional Conduct for British Columbia and the Law Society Rules do not offer a singular definition of professional misconduct. Rather, the ambits of professional misconduct have developed in the same fashion as the common law, through decisions of Law Society hearing panels following assessment of impugned conduct of lawyers as considered through the cases. In Law Society of BC v. Martin, 2005 LSBC16, the panel articulated a now much-followed test. It said at paragraph 170: "The test that this Panel finds is appropriate is whether the facts as made out disclose a marked departure from that conduct the Law Society expects of its members; if so, it is professional misconduct."

[86] In Martin the panel found concern in the degree of fault that a lawyer might display that could constitute gross culpable neglect. The panel said, "The real question to be determined is essentially whether the Respondent's behaviour displays culpability which is grounded in a fundamental degree of fault, that is whether it displays gross culpable neglect of his duties as a lawyer." This may be expanded by reference to the preface of the Canons of Legal Ethics stated in Chapter 2.1 of the Code of Professional Conduct for British Columbia: "A lawyer is a minister of justice, an officer of the courts, a client's advocate and a member of an ancient, honourable and learned profession." It is to these various roles and their implied standards that professional conduct must be measured. Ultimately, our concern is to determine if the conduct of the Respondent is a marked departure from these standards.

Allegations of borrowing from client (allegations 1 and 3)

[87] The preamble to Chapter 7 of the Professional Conduct Handbook, the forerunner of the Code of Professional Conduct, which was in effect at the time of the incidents in question, stated:

> The purpose of this Chapter is to state the general principles that should guide a lawyer's conduct when the lawyer is invited to act both as legal advisor and business associate.
> Generally speaking, a lawyer may act as legal advisor or as business associate, but not both.
> These principles are not intended to preclude a lawyer from performing legal services on his or her own behalf. Lawyers should be aware, however, that acting in certain circumstances may cause them to be uninsured as a result of Exclusion 6 in the B.C. Lawyer's Compulsory Professional Liability Insurance Policy and similar provisions in other insurance policies.

[88] Rule 4 of Chapter 7 stated:

> CLIENT LOAN, CREDIT OR GUARANTEE
> 4. Unless the transaction is of a routine nature to and in the ordinary course of business of the client, a lawyer must not borrow money or obtain credit from a client of the lawyer's firm, or obtain a benefit from any security or guarantee given by such a client.

[89] The evidence establishes and the Respondent has admitted that, on two occasions, he borrowed money from his clients. These admissions are made in paragraphs 6, 9, 11-14 (in relation to MT) and 18-19 (in relation to AV and JV) of the Notice to Admit. The amounts of money involved were not insignificant sums.

[90] These were extraordinary transactions for the benefit of the Respondent alone.

[91] Neither loan was of a routine nature, and neither client loaned money in the ordinary course of their business. Even in relation to MT, T Ltd.'s loans were a "side-venture" for MT and made in a limited way (paragraph 4 of the Notice to Admit).

[92] On the basis of the evidence and admissions, the Panel finds the allegations contained in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Citation have been proven and the conduct of Mr. Albas amounts to professional misconduct. It constitutes clear violation of the prohibited conduct described in Rule 4, Chapter 7 and is a marked departure from the conduct expected of lawyers.

Providing legal services when the lawyer has a direct or indirect financial interest in the subject of the legal services (allegations 2 and 4)

[93] Rule 1 of Chapter 7 stated:

> DIRECT OR INDIRECT FINANCIAL INTEREST
>
> 1. Except as otherwise permitted by the Handbook, a lawyer must not perform any legal services for a client if:
> (a) the lawyer has a direct or indirect financial interest in the subject matter of the legal services, or
> (b) anyone, including a relative, partner, employer, employee, business associate or friend of the lawyer, has a direct or indirect financial interest that would reasonably be expected to affect the lawyer's professional judgement.

[94] Again, the evidence is clear and the Respondent has admitted that, on two occasions, he provided legal services when he had a direct or indirect financial interest in the subject matter of the legal services. The legal services relate to the preparation and registration of the mortgages that accompanied the loans. These admissions are made in paragraphs 13-15 (in relation to MT) and 18 (in relation to AV and JV) of the Notice to Admit and are reflected in the documents at tabs 4, 5 and 7 of the Notice to Admit.

[95] Clients are entitled to expect undivided loyalty from their lawyers. When the lawyer has a financial interest in the subject of the legal work, an obvious potential conflict exists. A lawyer entering such an arrangement cannot necessarily fairly satisfy two masters.

[96] Past discipline cases support the proposition that borrowing from a client or acting for the client in placing security where the lawyer has a direct financial interest in the subject matter of the legal services amounts to professional misconduct.

[97] In Law Society of BC v. Dent, 2001 LSBC 36, the lawyer admitted that he had borrowed $50,000 from a friend of his wife, then acted for the friend in placing the security on the loan (a third mortgage). He admitted his conduct amounted to professional misconduct. His admission was accepted by the panel.

[98] In a more serious case, Law Society of BC v. Pomeroy, 1999 LSBC 37, the lawyer caused his client to loan money to a company in which he had an interest. There were, in addition, much more serious allegations, including misappropriation.

[99] In Siefert, the lawyer admitted that he committed professional misconduct when he performed legal services for a client in relation to the proposed acquisition of shares in a company in which the client had a financial interest by virtue of the lawyer holding shares in that company.

[100] More recently, in Law Society of BC v. Singh, 2013 LSBC 17, the lawyer faced eight allegations in a citation, three of which related to his conduct in borrowing $20,000 from a client, failing to advise a client that he was not representing the client's interests and improperly withdrawing the funds from the trust account rather than the general account to repay part of the loan. The lawyer admitted that he had committed the conduct and that the conduct constituted professional misconduct.

[101] In Law Society of BC v. O'Neill, 2013 LSBC 23, the lawyer admitted that he negotiated an amended and restated finder's agreement between his client and third parties when he had a direct financial interest in the agreement. The lawyer also admitted that that conduct was a conflict of interest that constituted professional misconduct. The hearing panel accepted the admission and concluded that the Respondent had been guilty of professional misconduct. We find, in light of the evidence and admissions, that the Respondent is has committed the professional misconduct alleged in paragraphs 2 and 4 of the Citation.

Failing to disclose materials facts to the court and failing to correct the record (allegations 5 and 6)

[102] Counsel for the Law Society submits that the evidence related to these allegations is contained in paragraphs 25-33 of the Notice to Admit (with the exception of the particularized allegation in paragraph 5(a)).

[103] A lawyer's duty of candour and integrity includes the obligation to disclose all material facts in an application before the court. The failure to do so has the potential to mislead the court and other interested parties.

[104] This duty is often discussed in the context of an ex parte application, where no opposing party can test the facts or submissions of counsel. In the present case, the Respondent's application was not ex parte but was brought without prior notice, and so, while the other parties were present, they had had minimal opportunity to evaluate or independently verify the Respondent's affidavit or submissions.

[105] In Law Society of BC v. Vlug, 2014 LSBC 09, the panel considered an allegation that the respondent misrepresented to the court the contents of a telephone call with another counsel. The disposition of Vlug was partly reversed on review, but the initial hearing panel's decision contains a convenient summary of the principles and authorities:

> [29] It is of fundamental importance that lawyers ensure that any representations that are made to a court or regulator are made so that the court or regulator need not have to make further inquiry. In Law Society of BC v. Galambos, 2007 LSBC 31, the hearing panel made a finding of professional misconduct in respect of a misrepresentation the respondent made to the court.
> [30] In Law Society of BC v. Samuels, [1999] LSBC 36, the hearing panel considered misleading statements a lawyer made to the court and found professional misconduct in respect of those statements. The panel commented at paragraph 12:
>
>> It is an essential cornerstone of our system of justice that counsel's submissions reflect the actuality. Any departure is an assault on the integrity of that system.
> [31] The law does not require us to find intentional misconduct. A determination of professional misconduct may be made even if the misrepresentation is not intentional. In Law Society of BC v.

2016 LSBC 18 (CanLII)

Botting, 2000 LSBC 30, the citation before the hearing panel alleged misrepresentations to the court and to the Law Society. The panel held at paragraph 60:

> While there is no specific prohibition in the Canons or the Handbook this Hearing Panel has no doubt that a lawyer has an obligation not to make misrepresentations to the court or the Law Society. Clearly, the justice system would fall into dispute and the ability to properly regulate the members of the profession would be seriously compromised if members did not have an unequivocal obligation to take care to be truthful in all written and oral representations to the Courts and the Law Society.

[32] With respect to the issue of filing affidavits with false or misleading statements, the hearing panel in Law Society of BC v. Foo, [1997] LSDD No. 197, commented on the importance for lawyers to ensure accuracy in documents that will be relied on by the courts or other litigants:

> This matter of members of the Law Society causing documents which would be relied upon by other litigants and Courts, to be filed, is a very serious matter where the member permits this to be done knowing that the documents filed either contain errors or contain falsehoods. Next to defalcation of trust funds by a lawyer, knowingly taking a false affidavit is about as serious a breach of professional conduct as can occur.

[106] In Galambos, the lawyer advised the court that an application had been served on the opposing party. On leaving the courtroom, the lawyer's junior advised that it had not been served. The lawyer did not return to the courtroom to correct the misapprehension he had created. In suspending the lawyer for one month, the panel wrote:

> The court must be able to accept statements of counsel without having to make inquiry. And indeed, when counsel, having discovered that he or she has made a misrepresentation (and there is no alternative) must inform the court of the incorrect statement that had been made. That seems to us to be an aggravating factor here.

[107] In Law Society of BC v. Nejat, 2014 LSBC 51, Mr. Nejat admitted professional misconduct for failing to disclose that he no longer held any funds in trust for his client when, during an application, the court ordered those funds frozen. Mr. Nejat did not, while in court, know the funds had been paid out. He also admitted professional misconduct for failing to correct the misapprehension he had created with the court and opposing counsel.

[108] The Respondent had an obligation to advise the court on August 27, 2009 that he had not been able to contact the buyer's representatives despite making attempts to reach them and, furthermore, he was concerned enough about the veracity of the offer to conduct a company search, the results of which he did not yet have. Had this information been disclosed to the court, the offer may not have been accepted over the other, lesser offer.

[109] This misconduct was compounded when the Respondent discovered, later the same day, that the corporate search of M Ltd. revealed that the company had been dissolved more than two years earlier and did not disclose this important information to the court or the other parties.

[110] Further, when the deposit was not paid within 72 hours as required by the offer, this important information was also not immediately disclosed to the court or any other parties.

[111] The Respondent's failure to advise the court that he had been unable to contact the buyer and had conducted a company search, the results of which he did not have, and his subsequent failure to advise the court and opposing counsel of the results of the company search and the non-receipt of the deposit are all breaches of his duty of candour and good faith to the court and opposing counsel and constitute professional misconduct. The information withheld had the potential for either the court to reach a different decision or for other counsel to change their positions. The Respondent deliberately left the court and other counsel with only part of the complete picture.

Misleading other counsel (allegation 7)

[112] The evidence in support of this allegation is contained in paragraphs 37-42 of the Notice to Admit.

[113] In Nejat at paragraph 37, the hearing panel makes it clear that the duty of candour and honesty extends to a lawyer's dealings with opposing counsel.

[114] Not only did the Respondent not advise other counsel in a timely manner that the deposit had not been received and that M Ltd. was not in good standing (and had not been for more than two years), he made statements that misled or were intended to mislead opposing counsel into believing that the sale approved by the order of the court would complete (paragraphs 38, 40, 41 and 42).

[115] The Respondent knew by the end of August 27, 2009 that M Ltd. was not in good standing, and he never advised opposing counsel of this information. The Respondent knew by August 31, 2009 that the deposit had not been received, but he did not advise opposing counsel of this information until November 9, 2009. Not only did he not disclose material information, he made statements that would have the effect of creating an impression (that the sale would complete) when he had to have known there was no basis for those statements.

[116] Counsel should be able to rely on assertions of other counsel without the need for suspicious reassessments. The duty of candour advances a common professional interest in fair and even dealings. Such conduct of the Respondent constitutes professional misconduct and is admitted as such by the Respondent. It reveals a deliberate failure to candidly inform the other counsel involved of matters of fact that could affect their decisions, deliberations and conduct.

Failing to report judgments (allegation 8)

[117] The evidence in support of this allegation is contained in paragraphs 47 and 49-51 and tabs 8, 17 and 19 of the Notice to Admit.

[118] Rule 3-44 at the time (now Rule 3-50) states:

> Failure to satisfy judgment
>
> 3-44(1) A lawyer against whom a monetary judgment is entered and who does not satisfy the judgment within 7 days after the date of entry must immediately notify the Executive Director in writing of
>
> (a) the circumstances of the judgment, including whether the judgment creditor is a client or former client of the lawyer, and
> (b) his or her proposal for satisfying the judgment.
>
> (2) Monetary judgments referred to in subrule (1) include
>
> (a) an order nisi of foreclosure,
>
> (b) any certificate, final order or other requirement under a statute that requires payment of money to any party,

2016 LSBC 18 (CanLII)

(c) a garnishment order under the Income Tax Act (Canada) if a lawyer is the tax debtor, and

(d) a judgment of any kind against an MDP in which the lawyer has an ownership interest.

(3) Subrule (1) applies whether or not any party has commenced an appeal from the judgment.

(4) If a lawyer fails to deliver a proposal under subrule (1)(b) that is adequate in the discretion of the Executive Director, the Executive Director may refer the matter to the Discipline Committee or the Chair of the Discipline Committee.

[119] The Respondent admits that he failed to comply with Rule 3-44. He has offered no explanation for his lack of compliance. He does not state that he was unaware of the rule.

[120] Failing to comply with Law Society Rules can result in an adverse determination of either professional misconduct or a breach of the Act or rules under section 38(4) of the Legal Profession Act. In this case, the Law Society submits that the appropriate adverse determination is professional misconduct.

[121] In Law Society of BC v. Lyons, 2008 LSBC 09, the panel considered the distinction between a breach of the rules that constituted a breach of the Act or rules under section 38(4)(b)(iii) of the Legal Profession Act and one that constituted professional misconduct under s. 38(4)(b)(i). The panel found at paragraphs 32 and 35:

> [32] A breach of the Rules does not, in itself, constitute professional misconduct. A breach of the Act or the Rules that constitutes a "Rules breach", rather than professional misconduct, is one where the conduct, while not resulting in any loss to a client or done with any dishonest intent, is not an insignificant breach of the Rules and arises from the respondent paying little attention to the administrative side of practice (Law Society of BC v. Smith, 2004 LSBC 29).
> [35] In determining whether a particular set of facts constitutes professional misconduct or, alternatively, a breach of the Act or the Rules, panels must give weight to a number of factors, including the gravity of the misconduct, its duration, the number of breaches, the presence or absence of mala fides, and the harm caused by the respondent's conduct.

[122] There are decisions where the lawyer has professed to be unaware of the rule in question, and in those circumstances, panels have sometimes in the past declined to make a finding of professional misconduct (Law Society of BC v. Lessing, 2012 LSBC 19) or have, alternatively, made a finding of a rules breach (Law Society of BC v. Boles, 2016 LSBC 02).

[123] However, in Law Society of BC v. Tungohan, 2015 LSBC 02, the panel found the lawyer had committed professional misconduct in relation to his failure to report a monetary judgment against him, stating at paragraph 141 that "Mr. Tungohan never provided an explanation to the Law Society or to the Panel during the course of the hearing as to why he failed to report the monetary judgment."

[124] In Law Society of BC v. Derksen, 2015 LSBC 24, the hearing panel accepted the lawyer's admission that he committed professional misconduct by not reporting judgments (along with other accounting breaches).

[125] In the absence of any explanation from the Respondent as to why he did not report the judgments as he was required to do, the Panel finds Mr. Albas' conduct constituted professional misconduct as alleged in allegation 8 of the Citation.

CONCLUSION

[126] The Panel finds the Respondent is guilty of professional misconduct with respect to allegations 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 of the Citation.

[127] A hearing respecting disciplinary action in this matter will take place at a date to be fixed.

Summary:

The appellant has filed three applications to vary or cancel four orders made by justices of this Court that either refused an extension of time or required the appellant to post security for costs. The respondent applied for an order prohibiting the appellant from bringing or continuing an appeal or application for leave to appeal without leave of the Court or a justice on the ground that she is a vexatious litigant.

Held: The appellant's applications to vary or cancel are dismissed. The appellant failed to establish any error in the orders under review. The respondent's application to find the appellant a vexatious litigant is also dismissed. The extraordinary remedy of a vexatious litigant order is not justified at this stage of the proceedings.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice Horsman:

Overview

[1] The appellant, Vicky Arvanitis, has initiated six appeal proceedings in this Court arising out of protracted litigation between her and the respondent Slater Vecchio LLP ("Slater Vecchio"). The present hearing concerns four applications:

(1) Court of Appeal File Nos. CA48269 and CA48270: Ms. Arvanitis applies to vary or cancel the June 30, 2022 order of Justice Griffin dismissing Ms. Arvanitis' application to extend the time to appeal two orders of the Supreme Court of British Columbia;

(2) Court of Appeal File No. CA47677: Ms. Arvanitis seeks an extension of time to apply to vary or cancel the November 3, 2021 order of Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten requiring Ms. Arvanitis to post security for costs, and the January 31, 2022 order of Justice Marchand dismissing her appeal as abandoned;

(3) Court of Appeal File Nos. CA46372, CA46373 and CA46375: Ms. Arvanitis applies to vary or cancel the August 12, 2022 order of Justice Grauer, dismissing her application for an extension of time to apply to vary the October 29, 2019 order of Justice Dickson; and

2022 BCCA 326 (CanLII)

(4) Slater Vecchio applies for orders pursuant to s. 22 of the Court of Appeal Act, S.B.C. 2021, c. 6 [Court of Appeal Act], dismissing Ms. Arvanitis' outstanding applications and prohibiting Ms. Arvanitis from bringing or continuing an appeal or application for leave to appeal in the court without leave of the court or a justice (the "Vexatious Litigant Application").

[2] The present hearing date was originally set to address only the first of these applications, Ms. Arvanitis' application to vary or cancel the June 30, 2022 order of Justice Griffin. In his judgment of August 12, 2022, Justice Grauer granted Slater Vecchio leave to amend and re-set its Vexatious Litigant Application—which was first filed in 2019—for hearing on September 6, 2022, at the same time as the application to vary or discharge Justice Griffin's order. Justice Grauer further ordered that it was for the division hearing those applications to determine whether Slater Vecchio's application to dismiss Ms. Arvanitis' application to vary or cancel the orders of Justices DeWitt-Van Oosten and Marchand should also be heard on September 6, 2022. That review application is otherwise scheduled to be heard on October 31, 2022. Ms. Arvanitis subsequently filed an application to vary or cancel the order of Justice Grauer. This application was also set for hearing on September 6, 2022.

[3] In its Vexatious Litigant Application, Slater Vecchio seeks a finding that Ms. Arvanitis is a vexatious litigant, as well as orders pursuant to s. 22(3) of the Court of Appeal Act dismissing Ms. Arvanitis' outstanding applications to vary or cancel the orders of Justices Griffin, DeWitt-Van Oosten, Marchand, and Grauer. Due to the interrelated nature of the issues, Slater Vecchio argues that all four applications should be addressed at the same time. Slater Vecchio says that Ms. Arvanitis has habitually, persistently and without reasonable cause commenced or continued vexatious proceedings in the courts of British Columbia. Slater Vecchio says there is no merit to any of the outstanding applications, and that Ms. Arvanitis' pattern of litigation conduct constitutes an abuse of the court process.

[4] At the outset of the hearing, Ms. Arvanitis stated her opposition to the four applications being heard at the same time. She expressed concern about her ability to meaningfully address all of the applications. She instead proposed that only her application to vary or cancel the order of Justice Griffin should be heard, with the remaining applications adjourned to a later date. After receiving submissions from both parties on this procedural point, the Court ruled that the parties should address all four applications at the hearing, but reserved to final judgment the decision on the adjournment application.

[5] The applications are interrelated, and it is in the interests of efficiency, consistency, and judicial economy that they be addressed at the same time. In my view, the appeal hearing provided Ms. Arvanitis a full opportunity to address each of the applications. I conclude that the evidentiary record and submissions before the Court permit the fair resolution of all four applications. For the reasons that follow, I would dismiss Ms. Arvanitis' applications to vary or cancel the orders of Justices Griffin, DeWitt-Van Oosten, Marchand, and Grauer. I would also dismiss Slater Vecchio's Vexatious Litigant Application.

Background

[6] The four applications before the Court arise out of a common litigation history. This history is reviewed in detail in the judgments of Justice Grauer (indexed at 2022 BCCA 290), Justice Griffin (indexed at 2022 BCCA 253), Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten (indexed at 2021 BCCA 415), and Justice Dickson (indexed at 2019 BCCA 481). For the purpose of the present applications, the following summary is sufficient.

[7] Slater Vecchio represented Ms. Arvanitis in a personal injury claim. Ms. Arvanitis is dissatisfied with Slater Vecchio's representation of her. This dissatisfaction has led to prolonged litigation between the parties. Ms. Arvanitis sued Slater Vecchio for negligence. This action was dismissed (reasons indexed at 2016 BCSC 1612). Slater Vecchio was awarded costs in the lump sum amount of $8,000 (reasons indexed at 2017 BCSC 155). Ms. Arvanitis did not appeal these judgments. Instead, she began to post negative comments about Slater Vecchio on various online review and social media platforms, including the personal accounts of Slater Vecchio employees and the accounts of children of a partner of the firm. In May 2019, Slater Vecchio filed a defamation action against Ms. Arvanitis. Ms. Arvanitis filed a response and counterclaim.

[8] The proceedings in this Court arise from orders made by the Supreme Court of British Columbia in the defamation action and in a proceeding brought by Slater Vecchio to enforce a costs settlement. The relevant chronology is as follows:

a) On June 20, 2019, Justice Duncan granted Slater Vecchio's application in the defamation action for an interim injunction prohibiting Ms. Arvanitis from posting online negative commentary about the firm pending trial;

b) On July 12, 2019, Justice Dillon issued a bench warrant for Ms. Arvanitis' arrest after she failed to attend a contempt hearing relating to her non-compliance with Justice Duncan's order;

c) On July 22, 2019, Justice Groves found Ms. Arvanitis guilty of contempt, and ordered her to make best efforts to remove previously-posted online content;

d) On August 15, 2019, Justice Sharma granted Slater Vecchio's application in the defamation action for an order that the interim injunction issued by Justice Duncan continue as a permanent injunction, as well as an order dismissing Ms. Arvanitis' counterclaim pursuant to Rule 9-5 of the Supreme Court Civil Rules, an order for summary judgment pursuant to Rule 9-6, and an order that Ms. Arvanitis be declared a vexatious litigant pursuant to s. 18 of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 443;

e) On November 21, 2019, Justice Sharma expanded the vexatious litigant order to prohibit Ms. Arvanitis from starting any proceedings against Slater Vecchio's counsel, Mr. Georgetti, or the partners or employees of his law firm, without leave of the court;

f) On September 17 and 18, 2019, Ms. Arvanitis filed notices of appeal in relation to the interim injunction order of Justice Duncan, the bench warrant issued by Justice Dillon and the August 15, 2019 order of Justice Sharma, and she applied for an extension of time to appeal these orders;

g) On October 29, 2019 (in reasons indexed at 2019 BCCA 481), Justice Dickson dismissed Ms. Arvanitis' application for an extension of time to appeal the three orders because, in her view, all three of the proposed appeals were bound to fail;

h) On February 22, 2021 (in reasons indexed at 2021 BCSC 428), Justice Giaschi found Ms. Arvanitis guilty of contempt of court for having continued to post negative online commentary about Slater Vecchio in contravention of the permanent injunction order issued by Justice Sharma;

i) On May 27, 2021, Ms. Arvanitis offered to pay Slater Vecchio $7,000 in full and final settlement of all costs awards made against her and an agreement consistent with this offer was subsequently drawn up and signed by both parties;

j) On July 14, 2021 (in reasons indexed at 2021 BCSC 1710), Justice Gomery granted Slater Vecchio's application for a declaration that the costs settlement was valid, binding, and subsisting between the parties;

k) On August 9, 2021, Ms. Arvanitis filed a notice of appeal of Justice Gomery's decision, and also applied for an order relieving her of the obligation to pay filing fees on the appeal (a "no fee" order);

l) On September 10, 2021, Slater Vecchio filed a cross-application seeking security for costs;

m) On November 3, 2021 (in reasons indexed at 2021 BCCA 415), Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten: (1) dismissed Ms. Arvanitis' application for a no fee order, and (2) ordered Ms. Arvanitis to pay security for costs in the amount of $12,000 within 30 days, failing which her appeal would be dismissed as abandoned;

n) On December 20, 2021, Slater Vecchio applied to have Ms. Arvanitis' appeal of Justice Gomery's order dismissed as abandoned, as she had not posted security for costs within 30 days of Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten's order;

o) On January 31, 2022, Justice Marchand dismissed Ms. Arvanitis' appeal of Justice Gomery's order as abandoned;

p) On April 27, 2022, Ms. Arvanitis filed an application for an extension of time to vary or cancel the orders of Justices DeWitt-Van Oosten and Marchand;

q) On May 4, 2022, Ms. Arvanitis filed an application for an extension of time to appeal the August 15, 2019 and November 21, 2019 orders of Justice Sharma, the former of which had already been the subject of the extension application heard by Justice Dickson in 2019;

r) On June 30, 2022 (in reasons indexed at 2022 BCCA 253), Justice Griffin: (1) quashed Ms. Arvanitis' second attempt to appeal Justice Sharma's August 15, 2019 order as a nullity, and (2) dismissed Ms. Arvanitis' application for an extension of time to appeal Justice Sharma's November 19, 2019 order;

s) On July 5, 2022, Ms. Arvanitis filed an application for an extension of time to vary or cancel Justice Griffin's order;

t) On July 8, 2022, Ms. Arvanitis filed an application for an extension of time to vary or cancel Justice Dickson's October 29, 2019 order, specifically in relation to Justice Dickson's refusal of an extension of time to appeal Justice Sharma's August 15, 2019 order;

u) On August 12, 2022 (in reasons indexed at 2022 BCCA 290), Justice Grauer dismissed this application;

v) On August 17, 2022, Ms. Arvanitis filed an application to vary or cancel Justice Grauer's order.

[9] In summary, Ms. Arvanitis has initiated six proceedings in this Court arising out of her dispute with Slater Vecchio. Justices of this Court have consistently either refused to grant Ms. Arvanitis extensions of time to appeal or have ordered her to pay security for costs. All of Ms. Arvanitis' appeals currently stand as dismissed.

[10] There have been further recent proceedings in the Supreme Court. Ms. Arvanitis did not pay Slater Vecchio the amounts required by the costs settlement, and the firm initiated enforcement proceedings. On March 25, 2022 Master Bilawach ordered Ms. Arvanitis to produce documents in advance of an examination in aid of execution. Ms. Arvanitis appealed the production order and, in the meantime, failed to comply with the order. She did not attend the scheduled examination in aid of execution. Ms. Arvanitis took the position that she need not comply with the enforcement process while her proposed appeal of Justice Gomery's order was outstanding. These events are reviewed in greater detail in the recent judgment of Justice Blok striking Ms. Arvanitis' appeal of Master Bilawach's order: Slater Vecchio LLP v. Arvanitis, 2022 BCSC 1139.

[11] In addition, in March 2022 Slater Vecchio filed a second contempt application against Ms. Arvanitis in relation to her continued online posts about the firm. On June 14, 2022 (in reasons indexed at 2022 BCSC 1197), Justice Brongers found that Ms. Arvanitis had breached the terms of the Court's injunction, but he exercised his discretion to decline to make a contempt finding.

Issues

[12] The applications before the Court raise the following issues:

2022 BCCA 326 (CanLII)

a) Did any of Justices DeWitt-Van Oosten, Marchand, Griffin or Grauer err in their orders?

b) Should an order be made pursuant to s. 22 of the Court of Appeal Act preventing Ms. Arvanitis from initiating further proceedings in this Court without leave of the Court or a justice?

Analysis

Issue a): Did any of the justices err?

[13] In her three applications, Ms. Arvanitis seeks to vary or cancel four orders of justices of this Court, sitting in chambers, pursuant to s. 29 of the Court of Appeal Act, formerly s. 9(6) of the Court of Appeal Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 77 [Former Court of Appeal Act]. Such an application must ordinarily be brought no more than seven days after the order sought to be reviewed was made: Court of Appeal Rules, B.C. Reg 120/2022, Rule 62(2) [formerly Rule 34 of the Court of Appeal Rules, B.C. Reg. 297/2001].

[14] The standard of review on an application for an order varying or cancelling an order of a justice is “highly deferential”. A review is not a re-hearing. For a review division to interfere with the order of a justice, the appellant must demonstrate that the chambers justice was wrong in law, wrong in principle, or misconceived the facts. If such errors are not demonstrated, the application must be dismissed: Seattle Environmental Consulting Ltd. v. Workers’ Compensation Board of British Columbia, 2017 BCCA 386 at paras. 5–7.

[15] I will address the alleged errors Ms. Arvanitis identifies in respect of each of the orders under review.

Order of Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten: 2021 BCCA 415

[16] Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten’s order dismissed Ms. Arvanitis’ application for a no fee order on the appeal from Justice Gomery, and granted Slater Vecchio’s application for an order for security for costs and judgment in the amount of $12,000, comprised of the $7,000 Ms. Arvanitis owed Slater Vecchio under the costs settlement and $5,000 for the costs of the appeal. She further ordered that Ms. Arvanitis had 30 days to post the security, failing which Slater Vecchio was free to apply to have the appeal dismissed as abandoned: at para. 42.

[17] Ms. Arvanitis says that Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten erred by overlooking the principle that a party should not be prevented from pursuing a meritorious appeal due to a lack of financial resources. In my view, Ms. Arvanitis' position overlooks the test for a no fee order, which was correctly set out by Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten.

[18] Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten reviewed the two steps to the test for a no fee order: (1) the applicant cannot afford to pay mandated fees without undue hardship, and (2) the proposed appeal is not bound to fail. Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten noted that even where financial hardship is established by the applicant, a no fee order may be refused if the appeal lacks merit, is scandalous, frivolous or vexatious, or otherwise constitutes an abuse of court process: at paras. 17–22.

[19] Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten accepted that Ms. Arvanitis met the first part of the test, but found there was no merit to the appeal. She stated:

> [27] However, the bulk of the matters raised by Ms. Arvanitis in support of her application have been litigated and resolved against her on the merits. The appeal before this Court is limited to Justice Gomery's order upholding the enforceability of the settlement agreement. Specific to that order, Ms. Arvanitis has not identified any legal error or palpable and overriding error of fact.
> [28] It is apparent from Justice Gomery's reasons that he was alive to the issues raised by Ms. Arvanitis in challenging the validity of the settlement agreement. He addressed each of them. There is nothing on the face of his reasons that suggests he misdirected himself on the governing legal principles or that he misapprehended the record in concluding that the agreement was neither inappropriate nor unfair.
> [29] I also note that Ms. Arvanitis was represented by a lawyer when the settlement agreement was entered into. Moreover, she was the one who made the offer that led to a settlement. The agreement was substantially consistent with the offer and it was signed by both parties.
> [30] In the circumstances, I see no realistic possibility of Ms. Arvanitis persuading a division of this Court that Justice Gomery was wrong to reject her submission on the invalidity of the agreement.

2022 BCCA 326 (CanLII)

[20] Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten identified the primary question on a security for costs application as whether such an order is in the interests of justice. She acknowledged that such an order could prevent Ms. Arvanitis from pursuing the appeal, but was persuaded that, in light of the history of the proceedings, the interests of justice weighed in favour of an order for security for appeal costs as well as security for judgment: at paras. 35–40.

[21] Accordingly, this is not a case in which a no fee order impedes a meritorious appeal, but rather a case in which a no fee order was refused on the basis that the appeal is lacking in merit. While Ms. Arvanitis disagrees with Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten's assessment of the merits of her appeal, she does not identify any error of law or principle or misconception of facts in her analysis.

[22] For these reasons, I would dismiss Ms. Arvanitis' application to vary or cancel the order of Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten.

Order of Justice Marchand

[23] Justice Marchand did not issue reasons for decision in relation to his January 31, 2022 order. Reasons were, in the circumstances, unnecessary. Ms. Arvanitis did not post security within 30 days of Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten's order, and therefore Slater Vecchio was free to apply to dismiss the appeal as abandoned. Justice Marchand granted the application.

[24] Ms. Arvanitis says that Justice Marchand erred in allowing Slater Vecchio's application to dismiss the appeal due to her failure to post security, rather than adjourning the application so that she could seek a review of Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten's order. However, Justice Marchand's order was simply a consequence of Ms. Arvanitis' failure to post security within the time required by the order of Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten. Ms. Arvanitis did not apply either for a stay of the order or for an extension of time to post the security. I cannot see how Justice Marchand could be said to have erred in failing to grant a remedy to Ms. Arvanitis that she did not seek.

[25] For these reasons, I would dismiss Ms. Arvanitis' application to vary or cancel the order of Justice Marchand.

Order of Justice Griffin: 2022 BCCA 253

[26] Justice Griffin's order quashed Ms. Arvanitis' application for an extension of time to appeal the August 15, 2019 order as a nullity. It was a nullity because Ms. Arvanitis had previously filed an appeal of that same order, which was dismissed on October 29, 2019 by Justice Dickson. Justice Griffin also dismissed Ms. Arvanitis' application for an extension of time to appeal the November 21, 2019 order of Justice Sharma. In declining to grant an extension of time, Justice Griffin applied the well-known criteria from this Court's decision in Davies v. C.I.B.C. (1987), 15 B.C.L.R. (2d) 256 (C.A.), which govern an application for an extension of time to bring an appeal.

[27] Ms. Arvanitis alleges that Justice Griffin made three errors.

[28] First, she says Justice Griffin erred in quashing Ms. Arvanitis' appeal of the August 15, 2019 vexatious litigant order of Justice Sharma because Justice Dickson, in turn, erred in interpreting Ms. Arvanitis' September 17, 2019 notice of appeal to include an appeal of the vexatious litigant order. Ms. Arvanitis says that her September 17, 2019 notice of appeal of the August 15, 2019 order only related to Justice Sharma's dismissal of her counterclaim, and that she intended to file a separate notice of appeal to address the vexatious litigant order. She says that Justice Dickson's judgment thus reflects an error.

[29] Ms. Arvanitis' submission implies that it is open to an appellant to file multiple separate (and late) appeals arising out of a single judgment. I need not address this proposition because the fact is that Ms. Arvanitis' September 17, 2019 notice of appeal was not, on its face, limited to Justice Sharma's dismissal of her counterclaim. In her September 17, 2019 notice of appeal, Ms. Arvanitis asserts that she is not a vexatious litigant and that she should not be barred from pursuing justice. She thereby directly raised the vexatious litigant order in her appeal. Justice

Dickson refused to grant Ms. Arvanitis an extension of time to appeal, and the appeal was dismissed.

[30] In my view, given these circumstances, Justice Griffin was correct to conclude that Ms. Arvanitis' second attempt to appeal the August 15, 2019 order is a nullity.

[31] Second, Ms. Arvanitis alleges that Justice Griffin erred in ignoring the merits of her appeal. Justice Griffin did not, in fact, ignore the merits of Ms. Arvanitis' appeal. Rather, she found it unnecessary to review the merits in light of the lengthy delay and resulting prejudice to Slater Vecchio. Ms. Arvanitis' application for an extension of time was brought over 30 months after the expiry of her deadline to appeal. Justice Griffin concluded that in light of the Davies criteria, and this lengthy unexplained delay, it was not in the interests of justice to grant the extension. In light of this conclusion, it was unnecessary for Justice Griffin to engage in any detailed review of the merits.

[32] Third, Ms. Arvanitis alleges that Justice Griffin failed to account for Ms. Arvanitis' health problems and self-represented status as justifications for the delay. However, Justice Griffin did not fail to account for these factors, she simply did not place the weight on them that Ms. Arvanitis believes they deserved. Justice Griffin stated:

> [29] Ms. Arvanitis submits that the reason for the delay is that she is disabled, self-represented and has suffered from extreme stress due to the underlying dispute she has with Slater Vecchio. While I of course have sympathy for anyone suffering stress and health problems, I note that many litigants face these problems and nevertheless meet the time periods. I also appreciate the significance of the order that she seeks to appeal. However, I am not persuaded that she has established good reason for the inordinate delay in this case.

[33] Ms. Arvanitis' arguments on this point invite this Court to engage in a re-hearing of Justice Griffin's order, which is not the role of the review division. Justice Griffin acknowledged Ms. Arvanitis' health issues and self-represented status, but was not persuaded that these issues established good reason for her 30-month delay in bringing her appeal of the November 21, 2019 order. I see no reviewable error in her analysis.

[34] In my view, Ms. Arvanitis has not demonstrated any error in Justice Griffin's judgment, and therefore the review application must be dismissed.

Order of Justice Grauer: 2022 BCCA 290

[35] Justice Grauer's order dismissed Ms. Arvanitis' application for an extension of time to apply to vary or cancel the October 29, 2019 order of Justice Dickson.

[36] Ms. Arvanitis alleges that Justice Grauer's order reflects an error in the form of an irregular application of the law. She argues that Justice Grauer applied the law irregularly by depriving Ms. Arvanitis of the chance to appeal Justice Sharma's vexatious litigant order at the same time as he permitted Slater Vecchio to set down its Vexatious Litigant Application in this Court. In my view, Justice Grauer did not err or apply the law irregularly in the manner alleged by Ms. Arvanitis.

[37] The application before Justice Grauer was to extend the time for Ms. Arvanitis to apply to vary or cancel the order of Justice Dickson. Justice Grauer cited and applied the criteria from Davies. He noted the lengthy nature of the delay, the application having been brought some 33 months after Justice Dickson's order. He explained that Ms. Arvanitis' application focussed on the alleged merits of her appeal, which she argued outweighed the length of the delay and any prejudice to Slater Vecchio. Justice Grauer disagreed with Ms. Arvanitis' assessment of the strength of her appeal. Justice Grauer concluded it was not in the interests of justice to grant the extension given the inordinate delay and resulting prejudice to Slater Vecchio. Ms. Arvanitis has not identified any error of law or principle in Justice Grauer's analysis, nor has she shown that he misconceived the facts.

[38] The procedural orders granted by Justice Grauer—including granting Slater Vecchio leave to set down its Vexatious Litigation Application for hearing on September 6—were within his jurisdiction to make under s. 30 of the Court of Appeal Act. The orders were a principled exercise of this jurisdiction given the history of the proceeding and the interrelated nature of the issues raised on the various applications. Ms. Arvanitis does not identify any reviewable error in Justice Grauer's procedural orders.

[39] For these reasons, I would also dismiss the application to vary or cancel the order of Justice Grauer.

Summary on Ms. Arvanitis' applications to vary or cancel orders

[40] For the forgoing reasons, I would dismiss Ms. Arvanitis' applications to vary or cancel the orders of Justices DeWitt-Van Oosten, Marchand, Griffin and Grauer. Ms. Arvanitis has not demonstrated any basis for interference with any of these orders by a review division.

Issue b): Should a vexatious litigant order be made?

Legal framework

[41] Slater Vecchio's Vexatious Litigant Application is brought pursuant to s. 22 of the Court of Appeal Act, which provides:

> Vexatious proceedings
> 22 (1) If the court or a justice is satisfied that a person has habitually, persistently and without reasonable cause commenced or continued vexatious proceedings in any of the courts of British Columbia, the court or justice may order that the person must not bring or continue an appeal or application for leave to appeal in the court without leave of the court or a justice.
> (2) The court or a justice may make an order under subsection (1)
> (a) on application by any person or on the court or justice's own initiative, and
> (b) only if the person referred to in subsection (1) has been given an opportunity to make written submissions or otherwise be heard.
> (3) In making an order under subsection (1), the court may dismiss an appeal or application for leave to appeal previously brought to the court by the person.
> (4) If a justice makes an order under subsection (1),
> (a) the justice may refer the matter to the court, and
>
> (b) the court may, without receiving further written submissions or holding a further hearing, dismiss an appeal or application for leave to appeal previously brought to the court by the person.
> (5) In dismissing an appeal or application for leave to appeal under subsection (3) or (4), the court may impose terms and conditions, including the payment of costs.

2022 BCCA 326 (CanLII)

[42] Section 29 of the Former Court of Appeal Act states the Court's power to make a vexatious litigant declaration in somewhat different terms:

> 29 If, on the application of any person, a justice is satisfied that a person has habitually, persistently and without reasonable cause commenced vexatious proceedings in the court, the justice may, after hearing that person or giving that person an opportunity to be heard, order that proceedings must not be brought or commenced in the court without leave of a justice.

[43] An order declaring that a person is a vexatious litigant is not to be made lightly. It is an extraordinary form of order that alters a person's right of access to the courts: Hokhold v. Gerbrandt, 2017 BCCA 216 at para. 21 (Newbury J.A. in Chambers). The purpose of such an order is to allow the Court to control its own process and prevent an abuse of that process by repetitive unmeritorious proceedings that needlessly expend judicial resources and cause unnecessary expense to other parties: Gonzales v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2018 BCCA 421 at para. 21 (Savage J.A. in Chambers).

[44] In Lindsay v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 BCCA 594 at para. 25, citing Lang Michener Lash Johnston v. Fabian (1987), 37 D.L.R. (4th) 685 (Ont. H.C.) (Ont. H.C.J., per Henry J. at para. 19), this Court set out a non-exhaustive list of factors to be considered on an application for a vexatious litigant declaration:

> (a) the bringing of one or more actions to determine an issue which has already been determined by a court of competent jurisdiction constitutes a vexatious proceeding;
> (b) where it is obvious that an action cannot succeed, or if the action would lead to no possible good, or if no reasonable person can reasonably expect to obtain relief, the action is vexatious;
>
> (c) vexatious actions include those brought for an improper purpose, including the harassment and oppression of other parties by multifarious proceedings brought for purposes other than the assertion of legitimate rights;
> (d) it is a general characteristic of vexatious proceedings that grounds and issues raised tend to be rolled forward into subsequent actions and repeated and supplemented, often with actions brought against the lawyers who have acted for or against the litigant in earlier proceedings;

2022 BCCA 326 (CanLII)

> (e) in determining whether proceedings are vexatious, the court must look at the whole history of the matter and not just whether there was originally a good cause of action;
>
> (f) the failure of the person instituting the proceedings to pay the costs of unsuccessful proceedings is one factor to be considered in determining whether proceedings are vexatious;
> (g) the respondent's conduct in persistently taking unsuccessful appeals form judicial decisions can be considered vexatious conduct of legal proceedings.

[45] In cases decided under s. 29 of the Former Court of Appeal Act this Court has held that evidence of a party's conduct in the lower courts may inform a vexatious litigant finding in the Court of Appeal, although it is not in itself sufficient to ground such an order. In general, the existence of multiple proceedings in the Court of Appeal was considered necessary to warrant an order under s. 29: Carten v. Carten, 2015 BCCA 201 at para. 31 (Bennett J.A. in Chambers); Extra Gift Exchange Inc. v. The Owners, Strata Plan LMS 3259, 2014 BCCA 228 at para. 34 (Garson J.A. in Chambers).

Discussion

[46] Ms. Arvanitis argues that she cannot conceivably be a vexatious litigant in the Court of Appeal given that she has, to date, been unsuccessful in initiating even a single appeal. She denies that her applications to extend time to appeal, or to vary orders denying her extensions of time, demonstrate a pattern of vexatious conduct, as they are not repetitive and they relate to different orders of the Supreme Court. Ms. Arvanitis says she has simply been attempting to exercise her rights of appeal as best she can, bearing in mind the difficulties she faces as a result of her health issues and lack of legal representation. She denies that her attempts to initiate appeals are motivated by any purpose other than to pursue a remedy for what she perceives as the serious injustice she has suffered as a result of the Supreme Court orders.

[47] Slater Vecchio argues that many of the factors cited in Lindsay are present here, including Ms. Arvanitis' two attempts to appeal the August 15, 2019 order of Justice Sharma, her pursuit of moot appeals, and her filing of non-compliant and duplicative material in this Court. Slater Vecchio also argues that the amendment to the vexatious litigant power in the Court of Appeal Act results in substantive change to the test for a vexatious litigant finding in this Court, creating a "new threshold" for considering vexatious conduct in lower courts. Whereas s. 29 of the Former Court of Appeal Act referenced vexatious proceedings "in the court", s. 22(1) of the Court of Appeal Act replaces this language with "in any of the courts of British Columbia" (emphasis added). Slater Vecchio argues that the amendment reflects a legislative intent to capture situations where an appellant "was inevitably going to transition from a vexatious litigant into a vexatious appellant". Slater Vecchio does not suggest that the statutory amendment undermines the prior jurisprudence of this Court to the extent that it states the general objectives of a vexatious litigant finding.

[48] In my view, the change in statutory language does not have the significance that Slater Vecchio seeks to place on it. The wording in s. 29 of the Former Court of Appeal Act did not prevent this Court from considering a pattern of vexatious conduct by a litigant in the courts below. Such a pattern of conduct could inform the Court's conclusion on a vexatious litigant application, although the focus remained on the litigant's conduct in the Court of Appeal. Rather than establishing a "new threshold", as Slater Vecchio contends, the language of s. 22(1) gives the Court broader and more explicit discretion to rely on vexatious conduct by a litigant in the courts below in determining whether an abuse of this Court's process has occurred. However, a vexatious litigant declaration in the Court of Appeal does not automatically follow on a declaration that a party is a vexatious litigant in another court. The objective of a vexatious litigant declaration under s. 22(1) of the Court of Appeal Act must still be to prevent an abuse of this Court's process. This requires an analysis of the litigant's actual conduct before the Court.

[49] In this case, Ms. Arvanitis' conduct does share some features with the type of conduct described in Lindsay. Ms. Arvanitis twice attempted to appeal Justice Sharma's August 15, 2019 order, although she justifies this by explaining her belief that the two appeals related to different aspects of the order. Ms. Arvanitis initially attempted to pursue moot appeals—that is, appeals from Justice Duncan's interim injunction order and Justice Dillon's arrest warrant—although she abandoned those aspects of her appeal in the hearing before Justice Grauer. Ms. Arvanitis has persistently been unsuccessful in her attempts to appeal various Supreme Court orders, and has pursued unmeritorious applications to vary. She has been found to be a vexatious litigant in the Supreme Court.

[50] However, I am not persuaded at this stage of the proceeding that the extraordinary remedy of a vexatious litigant order is necessary to prevent an abuse of this Court's process. With limited exception, Ms. Arvanitis' applications in this Court have not been duplicative or abusive. The appeal proceedings have not been brought for an improper purpose. I accept that Ms. Arvanitis was genuinely motivated to secure the appellate remedies to which she believes she is entitled. While Ms. Arvanitis has been unsuccessful in her attempts to appeal, that in itself is not a basis for a vexatious litigant finding. Furthermore, with Ms. Arvanitis' three applications to vary dismissed, there are no outstanding proceedings in this Court, and, given the status of the Supreme Court proceedings, no new appeals are imminent. I accept Ms. Arvanitis' submission that she shares Slater Vecchio's desire for closure.

[51] In these circumstances, it does not appear to me that a vexatious litigant order is necessary at this time to prevent the abuse of this Court's process. It is, of course, open to Slater Vecchio to renew their application if circumstances change.

Conclusion

[52] I would dismiss Ms. Arvanitis' three applications to vary or cancel the orders of Justices DeWitt-Van Oosten, Marchand, Griffin and Grauer. I would also dismiss Slater Vecchio's application for a vexatious litigant order.

[53] In the course of the hearing, counsel for Slater Vecchio raised a collateral concern as to the jurisdictional basis for paragraph 4(c) of Justice Sharma's August 15, 2019 order. He invited the Court to direct an amendment to the wording of this paragraph. I would not make any such direction, which appears to me to be beyond the scope of any issue properly before the Court in this hearing.

[54] Given the divided success on the applications, in my view it is appropriate to order that each party bear their own costs.

Introduction

[1] Dunn, J.: This is an application by parents of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School children and/or interested parties for an order in the nature of certiorari and prohibition pursuant to rule 54 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986 quashing and prohibiting the implementation of the respondent's decision of August 31, 1999 to close Jacques Fontaine All Grade School on the following grounds:

> (a) The respondent contravened s. 76(2) of the Schools Act, 1997 by failing to give parents of students affected by the closure of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School the required opportunity to make representations to the respondent.
> (b) The respondent violated its own School Closure Policy by, among other things, failing to distribute to some trustees and the public the document dated January 20, 1999 by staff program specialists, a copy of which is attached to the application as exhibit "D", and failing to give the community ample opportunity to provide input based on all relevant information. The respondent was obligated to follow the School Closure Policy that was adopted in 1998, a copy of which is attached to this application as exhibit "C". The so-called "new procedure for motions intended to be brought on August 31st", a copy of which is attached as exhibit "E", was nothing more than a strategy to circumvent the court judgment of August 13, 1999.

(c) The respondent breached its common law duty of procedural fairness to persons affected by the proposed closure of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School.

(d) By making the decision to close Jacques Fontaine All Grade School by a secret-ballot vote the respondent breached the Schools Act, 1997, which requires fully-elected, representative school boards.

(e) In the alternative, if the Schools Act, 1997 permits the respondent to make a decision to close a school by a secret-ballot vote, that part of the Act is in violation of the Constitution of Canada, in particular, s. 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Constitution Act, 1867.

1999 CanLII 19822 (NL SC)

Preliminary Matters

[2] On the first day of the hearing parents of children attending St. Bernard's All Grade School at St. Bernard's, Newfoundland, requested intervenor status on the basis that the applicants' success in their application would result in direct and substantial consequences to their children. After argument I granted intervenor status to these individuals pursuant to rule 7.05(1) (a) of the Rules of the Supreme Court, 1986.

[3] As well, the applicant requested leave to expand the application to include a determination as to whether or not three of the trustees had contravened s. 68 of the Schools Act, pursuant to s. 71(1) on the basis that new information had become available, the result of which the applicant was of the view a contravention of the relevant section had occurred. I ordered the application be amended to include this additional ground.

[4] The application does involve a Charter argument. The Attorneys

General of both Newfoundland and Canada have been served with notice of the application. The Attorney General for Canada did not respond. The Attorney General for Newfoundland confirmed the province did not wish to intervene in the matter.

Facts

[5] Jacques Fontaine School has been the subject matter of a number of similar applications, although on different facts, since 1997. In 1997 the applicants, or other representatives of Jacques Fontaine School, obtained an order to have a decision of the respondent to close Jacques Fontaine School quashed. This decision was upheld on appeal. In March of 1999 the respondent voted, by a majority of one, once again, to close Jacques Fontaine All Grade School. Concerned parties, most of whom were parents of children attending the School, applied to this court sitting in Grand Bank to quash this decision. The applicants' request was granted by Justice Dymond who filed written reasons in the matter on August 13, 1999.

[6] The facts leading to this application are briefly summarized hereafter. On February 17, 1998 school board elections were held throughout Newfoundland in accordance with s. 53 of the Schools Act, 1997. Members of this Board were elected at that time. Pursuant to s. 74(1) of the Act bylaws were adopted by the respondent. The Board incorporated the procedural guidelines set out in Robert's Rules of Order (Rev. Ed.) into its bylaws.

[7] In early 1998 the respondent formulated a school-closure policy. This policy recognized the need for adequate notice to allow opinions to be considered and constructive dialogue to ensue between the community and the Board where a school is proposed to be closed. As part of the procedure adopted, a sixty-day notice provision was included. The respondent believed that the notice period was intended to run from the time of an introduction of notice of motion by the School Board for closure to the meeting at which the motion would be made. The applicants said in earlier proceedings they were of the view the notice period was intended to run from the date a background report and information package was provided to parents to the final Board meeting considering the closure motion. They also believed the sixty-day period was intended to allow for input from the parents and community pertaining to the Board's decision.

[8] In 1998/1999 the respondent operated three schools in the Northern Zone. They are Christ the King, Rushoon (K - 12), 251 students; Jacques Fontaine All Grade School (K - 12), 177 students; and St. Bernard's All Grade School (K-12), 117 students. In 1998 the respondent hired Central Consulting Services Inc. (the "Consultants") to review the School Board's delivery system of education and to make recommendations. A Report was produced November 3, 1998 recommending, among other things, consolidation of St. Bernard's and Jacques Fontaine schools due to their close proximity. The Report stated:

> "Jacques Fontaine All Grade shows the greatest potential in terms of facility issues."

At page 70 the consultants recommended closure of St. Bernard's All Grade School at the end of the 1998/1999 school year. It also envisaged and recommended that Jacques Fontaine All Grade School be considered the instructional centre for the Northern Zone to ensure quality educational offerings on par with the district. It appears the Board did not view this latter recommendation as an objective it intended to follow. The Report was presented to the Board on November 3, 1998 at a public meeting. A further public meeting was held December 1st at Marystown and presentations and comments from people in attendance were received by the Board and/or its representatives.

[9] On January 25, 1999 the respondent's trustees prepared school-closure motions to be made at a meeting scheduled for March 30, 1999, including a motion to accept the consultant's recommendations, as well as motions to close Jacques Fontaine All Grade School and St. Bernard's All Grade School, it being anticipated only one motion would pass to close one of these two schools. On March 2, 1999 the respondent distributed to representatives of school councils in the Northern Zone a document entitled "Restructuring - Northern Zone - Draft". This document referenced the fact that program specialists staff were requested by the administration of the Board to assess the programs for the re-alignment of the two schools in the Jacques Fontaine - St. Bernard's region using the 1993 draft school planning guide. On February 25, 1999 the same specialists were asked to redo the assessment using the school planning manual, 1978. The document indicated the program team had great difficulty using twenty-one-year-old construction and program guidelines to determine the present and future curriculum needs of these schools. Further meetings ensued, and on March 30, 1999, at an open but limited number meeting, the respondent voted to close Jacques Fontaine All Grade School. The vote was carried six to five. It was done by secret ballot. Two trustees, Elliott and Allen, were disqualified from participating as they were parents of children in Jacques Fontaine All Grade School and it was believed they would be in a conflict of interest should they vote on the school-closure motions.

[10] The motion to close Jacques Fontaine School on March 30, 1999 became the subject matter of an application by representatives of children attending the school, which application was heard by Mr. Justice Dymond in July of 1999. On August 13th, Justice Dymond filed his judgment in the matter and accepted the applicants' position in three primary areas. Firstly, that Allen and Elliott had been improperly disqualified from voting. Secondly, that the Board had failed to provide a copy of the Program Specialists Report based on the 1993 Draft Guidelines to all of the trustees of the Board. Thirdly, that in providing the documentation to parents on March 2, 1999 the Board had breached procedural fairness and failed to adhere to its own Guidelines for a sixty-day notice period.

[11] After the court hearing concluded on July 23, 1999 the Board determined that in the event its earlier decision might be quashed it would proceed with a further notice of a special meeting to deal with the closure issues once again. As stated by Margaret Witherell, Chairperson of the respondent, in an affidavit filed with the within application at para. 10, the reasoning of the Board was as follows:

> "Because of the urgent need to bring certainty to the students and parents in the four zones that had been subject to school-closure decisions including Jacques Fontaine School, the respondent felt that a contingency plan should be put into effect leading to new votes on the four school closures. The respondent upon the advice of legal counsel realized that there was an opportunity to cure the alleged defects in the procedure followed by the Board and make a final determination on the status of these schools prior to school opening on September 7, 1999."

> "The respondent also realized that if Judge Dymond agreed with the applicants' submission that Messrs. Earl Elliott and Clifford Allen should have been allowed to vote on the school closure decision affecting Jacques Fontaine, these two trustees could then be permitted to vote at a new vote to be conducted at a public meeting to take place on August 31, 1999."

Ms. Witherell goes on to state that she gave notice on July 23, 1999 of a special meeting of the respondent to be held Thursday, July 29, 1999. This notice included a motion to adopt a new procedure for motions intended to be brought on August 31, 1999. In essence, the notice reduced any time frames from sixty to thirty days to allow for documentation to be provided to parents and then to receive input and comment from them pertaining to items under consideration by the Board in making its decision. The same notice included notices of motion to be brought at a Board meeting on August 31, 1999 including a motion to rescind the decision to close Jacques Fontaine All Grade School. It further added "in the event that the Supreme Court of Newfoundland quashes the decision of the Board to close Jacques Fontaine, the motion will instead be to close one of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School or St. Bernard's All Grade School. Finally, the said notice included a motion to rescind motion to preclude voting by secret ballot. On July 29, 1998 the respondent's trustees held the special meeting. The motion to adopt a new procedure for the August 31st meeting was made and a majority voted by open, show of hands to adopt the motion.

[12] On Friday, August 27, 1999 counsel for the applicants advised the respondent that as a result of Mr. Justice Dymond's decision on August 13th, they were of the view the Board ought not to proceed to its vote on the 31st as the decision would likely be challenged in yet another court application. It viewed the Board's ongoing failure to provide the Program Specialists Report of January 20th prepared in accordance with the Draft 1993 Guidelines to be a breach of procedural fairness and to be contrary to the spirit and intent of Mr. Justice Dymond's decision of August 13th. It pointed out that this document had yet to be provided to all of the trustees of the Board. An open meeting was held August 28, 1999 to receive input and comments from parents pertaining to the information package provided, as well as other submissions on the motions to be made at the August 31st meeting. After this open meeting concluded six trustees, who had not received the January

20th Program Specialists Report, were provided with same.

[13] Although this Report was not promptly provided to the trustees subsequent to the filing of Mr. Justice Dymond's decision, it had been the subject matter of discussion at a School Board meeting held April 20th and 22nd of 1999 during which one of the trustees brought to the attention of other trustees attending the meeting that the Report had been prepared but not provided to them. Discussion ensued pertaining to the role of the School Board administrators in this regard. The Report was included as part of the package provided to Mr. Justice Dymond in the application before him. The applicant, Christina Baker, is acknowledged in affidavits filed by Allen and Elliott to have been the leader of the parents' court challenge before Judge Dymond.

[14] The information package provided to parents in advance of the August 31, 1999 Board meeting did not contain Program Specialists Report referred to above. It was comprised of similar information as had been provided to the parents and interested parties by the Board for the March 30th meeting. However, Ms. Witherell, in her affidavit, states in respect of this document at para. 26, p. 10:

> "... At the same time, it is important to understand that at no time throughout the process was the respondent relying on this program specialists report as a document to make its decision. The CCSI consulting group report, the northern zone trustees report and the northern zone report contained favourable comments about superior space available at Jacques Fontaine School as opposed to St. Bernard's School."

[15] At the hearing before me, counsel addressed considerations of the trustees in preferring St. Bernard's All Grade School over that of Jacques Fontaine. These include that St. Bernard's All Grade School was a newer facility; with declining enrollments St. Bernard's All Grade School would be the more fiscally viable of the two schools and the additional space of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School redundant for future educational purposes; and an apparent rejection of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School as the instructional centre for the Northern Zone.

Zone. There are three representatives of the Northern Zone, two of whom have children in Jacques Fontaine All Grade School. The remaining trustees on the Board represent other Zones on the Burin Peninsula and do not have children attending either Jacques Fontaine All Grade School or St. Bernard's All Grade School.

[17] On August 31, 1999 the respondents held a meeting with limited public access and voted firstly to vote by secret ballot on the school-closure motions and secondly, moved, by secret ballot, to close Jacques Fontaine All Grade School by a count of seven to six. Northern Zone trustee Picco was not in attendance at this meeting.

Issues

[18] The three primary issues are:

1. Did the respondent breach its duty of procedural fairness in its handling of the matter, particularly:

(i) By contravening s. 76(2) of the Schools Act, 1997, in that it failed to provide parents of students affected by the closure of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School with the requisite opportunity to make representations to the respondent?

(ii) By violating its own school-closure policy in that it failed to distribute to some trustees and the public the Program Specialists Report dated January 20, 1999, based on the 1993 Draft School Board Guidelines?

(iii) By also violating its own school-closure policy in that it adopted a new procedure for closure motions at the July 28th meeting and implemented it in respect of the August 31, 1999 meeting?

2. Did the respondent breach the Schools Act, 1997, by allowing the vote for closure to proceed by secret ballot. In the alternative, if the Schools Act, 1997, permits the respondent to make such a decision by secret ballot, is secret-ballot voting a violation of the Constitution of Canada, in particular, s. 3, of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the Constitution Act, 1867?

3. Were three of the trustees in a conflict-of-interest position by virtue of the fact that they voted in favour of holding a secret ballot in respect of the school closure on the basis that they feared financial repercussions, in the case of two, in respect of the operation of their businesses; and in the case of one in respect of the operation of his spouse's business?

Analysis:

Issue 1 - Did the Respondent Breach its Duty of Procedural Fairness in its Handling of the Matter, Particularly:

(i) By contravening s. 76(2) of the Schools Act, 1997, in that it failed to provide parents of students affected by the closure of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School with the requisite opportunity to make representations to the respondent?

(ii) By violating its own school-closure policy in that it failed to distribute to some trustees and the public the Program Specialists Report dated January 20, 1999, based on the 1993 Draft School Board Guidelines?

(iii) By also violating its own school-closure policy in that it adopted a new procedure for closure motions at the July 23rd meeting and implemented it in respect of the August 31, 1999 meeting?

[19] The applicants submit procedural fairness has been breached by virtue of the Board's failure to comply with the Schools Act; its own policy and the common law.

[20] Section 76(2) of the Schools Act, 1997, S-12.2 states:

"76(2) Notwithstanding s. 75 or subsection (1) of this section, a board may close a school only after parents of students affected have been given an opportunity to make representations to the board."

[21] The school policy prior to the August 31, 1999 decision, being the subject matter of this hearing, is described in brief at p. 7 of the School

Closure Policy document of the Burin Peninsula School Board adopted by the Board January 9, 1998 and amended March 19, 1998. It states:

"PROCEDURE IN BRIEF

Identification of the school to be considered for closure.

STEP 2

Introduction of Notice of Motion by School Board to close a school.

STEP 3

Communication of the nature of the motion in writing to School Council and parents.

STEP 4

Preparation of Background Report.

Meeting with community to discuss the report. Solicit community response and discuss the procedure for the response.

STEP 5

Provision of a minimum of at least sixty (60) days to receive and discuss a community response.

STEP 6

The Board will debate the notice of motion and make a final decision.

STEP 7

Written communication of the final decision to parents. Notice of an implementation date should be at least thirty (30) days prior to the closing of the school in June of that school year."

1999 CanLII 19822 (NL SC)

[22] The Board says it was of the view that the 60 days referenced in Step 5 related to the amount of time required from Step 1, being the identification of the school to be considered for closure to the ultimate meeting wherein the decision was to be made as outlined in Step 6.

[23] The intent of the Board at the end of July, as stated in the Witherell affidavit at paras. 14 and 15, was to amend the respondent's School-Closure Policy to make it consistent with the court decision in Tracey et al. v. Board of Education of Avalon East, (1998), 164 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 181; 507 A.P.R. 181 (Nfld. T.D., Orsborn, J.), particularly as it related to the rights of the respondent to manage the school system throughout the entire year including summer months, and in setting its own procedures for school-closure decisions subject to the requirements of the Schools Act. Mr. Justice Green, writing for the Court of Appeal in Elliott et al. v. Board of Education of Burin Peninsula (1998), 166 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 73; 511 A.P.R. 73 (Nfld. C.A.), stated in respect of procedural fairness at paras. 43 and 47 as follows:

> "[43] ... I am satisfied, as was the applications judge, that the issue of school closure is sufficiently qualitatively important that the board must act in a way that takes account of the concerns and interests of affected children, and the parents who act on their behalf, by allowing them in a meaningful way, to have input into the decision-making process with a view to potentially influencing the ultimate decision that is made.
> "[47] ... The content of the duty must therefore be flexible to meet the exigencies of the case. Although, as noted in Knight, this must be a balance between fairness and efficiency, what must not be compromised in any case is the necessity that the notice, consultation and input elements, however structured, not be perfunctory and formalistic. They must be meaningful and realistic, designed to ensure that there is a real opportunity for persons affected to take reasonable steps to try to influence the decision. While that may not necessarily require full disclosure of all background material and every scrap of relevant paper (in the traditional natural justice sense of knowing the full case one has to meet), sufficient of such information and material would generally have to be made available, at least in summary form, so that the persons affected will have a context in which to make their input, so that their representations can be directed to the real issues under active consideration by the board. This might be especially the case where it would be important for those having input to know how, if at all, the particular proposed closure fits into any broader scheme that is contemplated for reorganization or rationalization of the system generally."

[24] Similarly, Mr. Justice Orsborn of this court made several comments in Tracey pertaining to compliance with s. 76(2) at para. 106:

"106. In the context of the 1997 Act, and considering the principles outlined in Jacques Fontaine and the tenor of the various proposals or policies of the governing bodies, my interpretation of s. 76(2) is that parental opportunity to make representations means that:

1. The opportunity given must allow time for meaningful representations on the issues that are under active consideration by the board, and must allow the parents to raise in good faith the issues for the consideration of the board.

2. Meaningful representations require time for preparation and presentation, and require information on the issues considered relevant by the board. The parents are entitled to be advised of the particular considerations that are persuading the board to consider closure. They are entitled to sufficient information supporting those considerations so that a reasonably informed person would be able to make submissions on the validity, reliability or relevance of that information and the considerations it supports. The board is not obliged to provide information it does not have, nor is it obliged to acquire information for the parents' use, but it is obliged to take reasonable steps, if requested, to assemble in meaningful form relevant information in its possession. The board may, but is not required to provide information that may be requested by parents but which is not related to the factors said by the board to be influencing the closure decision.

3. Once the parents have been provided with sufficient reliable information on the factors under consideration by the board, they must be given sufficient time to consider the information, take any necessary advice, acquire additional relevant information and prepare any representations. What time is sufficient will vary from case to case, depending on the circumstances. It is not appropriate for the court to set a fixed time limit - that should be done by each board either as a matter of policy or on a case by case determination. However, I would think it highly unlikely that in any circumstance less than 30 days would be sufficient.

4. Individual parents should have the opportunity to make oral representations to the board in a public forum. The Act prescribes that public meetings are to be the rule rather than the exception; school closure decisions are singled out as being worth of specific parental input - these factors, together with the nature of an elected board and its public accountability, and the references in the policy documents to representations in public, lead me to the conclusion that parents are entitled to make their arguments to the Board in a public forum.

5. Absent bad faith or other circumstances analogous to an attempt to obstruct the legitimate processes of the board, the board cannot require that individual parents make their representations on a group or representative basis. The fact that a large number of parents may wish to exercise their right is, in and of itself, no reason to limit or preclude the exercise of that right. The parents of children in a large school enjoy the same opportunity as do parents of children in a smaller school. The Board may limit presentations to a reasonable length of time.

6. It will be for the board to determine how information is communicated to parents. The opportunity to make individual representations does not, in my view, oblige the board to communicate individually with each parent and to provide each parent, without request, with whatever information may have been prepared by the board. The opportunity to make representations requires the board to take reasonable steps to ensure that the general body of parents is aware of the potential closure, of the rationale for such closure and of the availability of additional information. The steps to be taken are for the determination of the board but could, for example, include press releases and other media coverage, communication to school councils and parent-teacher associations and public meetings."

[25] At para. 107 Justice Orsborn notes:

> "Counsel invited me to set specific guidelines for the use of other boards faced with potential school closures. I do not think it is appropriate to go beyond the views I have expressed on the content of the s. 76(2) duty. It will be for each board to determine how it will meet the procedural requirements of the Act. The reasons of Green, J.A., in Jacques Fontaine support the view that complying with the statute may necessitate a different response in different circumstances. School boards must be free to exercise their governance role as they think best; beyond interpreting the essential parameters of s.76(2), it is not for the court to interfere in that governance."

[26] What can be extracted from the two foregoing decisions is both judges agree it will be for each Board to determine how it will meet the procedural requirements of the Act. Insofar as these comments relate to the facts before me, I particularly note Mr. Justice Orsborn at para. 2 indicates a board may, but is not required, to provide information requested by parents but which is not related to the factors said by the board to be influencing the closure decision. The January 20th Program Specialists Report falls into this category. The Consultant's Report, which formed part of the information package provided to parents, was based on the 1978 School Board Manual, presumably upon the basis that the Draft 1993 Guidelines had yet to be approved for usage. The latter document referenced the existence of the January Program Specialists Report and, in part, contained similar viewpoints as expressed in that Report, particularly the seeming preference for Jacques Fontaine All Grade School over St. Bernard's All Grade School as the facility that ought to continue in operation in the Northern Zone.

[27] The January 20th Report was in the public domain to some extent. Ms. Witherell, at para. 23 of her affidavit, states that she has determined the vice-chair, Mr. Lambert, had received a copy of it prior to the Board meeting on March 30, 1999. Marcus Evans, Harvey Tulk and Wayne Collins, also trustees, obtained copies of the Report in April, 1999. Prior to the August 28, 1999 Town Hall meeting, trustee, Brian Walsh, sought and obtained a copy of the Report from the Board office. Clifford Allen and Earle Elliott state they had copies of the Report since January, 1999. All of the trustees had this Report when they voted on August 31, 1999. In addition, applicant Baker had a copy of the Report and indicates she had distributed or shown it to a number of parents. It was subject to debate at the Board meeting April 20 and 22, 1999 and apparently, although not set forth in the affidavit evidence, was discussed on talk shows in the Burin Peninsula area, as well as being attached to the application documentation before Mr. Justice Dymond. It cannot be said that as of March 31, 1999, the trustees were unaware of the existence of the document. As to the extent of their review, remains in the realm of pure speculation, but as stated by counsel for the intervenor, it is not for the courts to extend the doctrine of procedural fairness to this degree.

[28] The issue of the January Program Specialists Report was argued before Mr. Justice Dymond. He concluded at para. 36 that as this document related to programs provided by the Board, it would have been an important document for trustees to review. I do not conclude that the Program Specialists Report of January 20, 1999 related to programs presently provided by the Board. The fact that it is in draft form suggests otherwise. When counsel for the respondent was asked this question by me, he confirmed the programs contained in the Draft Guidelines are not necessarily in place. The respondent took the position before Mr. Justice Dymond it was instructed by the Department of Education to use the 1978 Manual as the 1993 Guidelines had yet to be approved. It is apparent from the Consultants' Report the program specialists did not favour this approach.

[29] At para. 47 of his decision, Dymond, J., states:

> "The point to be made here is that the Program Specialist Report was never released. It may or may not have made a difference to the vote. However, it was a Report that was prepared for the January 21st Board meeting that actually took place on January 25th, 1999. If both the Program Specialists Report and the Northern Zone Restructure Draft had both been given to the trustees on March 2nd, 1999 instead of just the Northern Zone Restructuring Draft this may have had an impact on the way the vote went on March 30th."

[30] Justice Dymond recognizes at para. 49:

> "The Consultants Report recommended the Jacques Fontaine school over the St. Bernard's school on a number of other areas. This report > really complimented the Specialists Report which the trustees never did see."

[31] He then concludes at para. 50:

> "At the February 25th meeting two trustees had indicated an intention to bring a notice of motion to close Jacques Fontaine school. We do not know how these individuals voted in the final analysis or whether they would have been influenced by the Specialists Report because it was never made available to them as the vote was done by secret ballot."

[32] At this point in the decision Mr. Justice Dymond moves on to another issue. On p. 45 he summarizes his findings and as it relates to the Specialists Report at para. 3 says as follows:

> "3. The fact that the Specialist Report completed by January 18th, 1999 was never presented to the Board violated the School Board Closure Policy on Reports and also violates the principles of procedural fairness at common law."

I am satisfied that the decision requires the Report be distributed only to the School trustees. There is no mention of the public, nor is there any suggestion of a thirty or sixty-day or other notice requirement. A problem with regard to notice periods did arise in respect of the Northern Zone Restructuring Report as reflected in paras. 42, 43, and 44 of the decision where this document was provided twenty-eight days prior to the March 30th Board meeting at which the closure decision was made. A summary of his findings on these points can be found at paras. 1 and 2, p. 45:

> "1. The Board by voting on the Northern Restructure Draft in less than 60 days from the introduction of the Report on March 2nd, 1999 violated its own School-Closure Guidelines.
> "2. The Meeting on March 30th where the vote was taken only 28 days after being first tabled violated the Doctrine of Procedural Fairness."

I conclude the failure to provide the Program Specialists Report of January 20, 1998 to the trustees in advance, does not amount to a breach of procedural fairness, nor does it offend the decision of Dymond, J., rendered

August 13, 1999. Likewise, the failure of the Board to provide it readily to all the parents, although perhaps not the most sensitive of decisions, did not breach procedural fairness in that the document was not being relied upon by the Board in making its decision.

[33] On July 29, 1998 the trustees, at a special Board meeting, by motion adopted a new procedure for the August 31st meeting respecting school closures. In so doing they reduced the time frame for notice to, and receipt of parental submissions, from sixty to thirty days, basically, in conformity with the minimal guidelines set forth by Mr. Justice Orsborn in Tracey. The same package of information as provided for the earlier hearings was once again provided to parents. This contained the Consultants Report outlined earlier. It did not contain the Program Specialists Report. Open meetings were held August 28, 1999 to receive parent representations on the proposed motions. The parents took the position that the procedure adopted by the Board was incorrect and the majority opted to protest the Board's decision to hold this further meeting rather than make presentations to the trustees.

[34] In support of its position to make such a procedural change/the respondent tendered the case of Fisher Park Residents Association Inc. v. Board of Education of Ottawa (1986), 57 O.R.(2d) 468 (H.C.). In that case the Board adopted a change of its policy for purposes of the closures under consideration by replacing a community-study committee called for in the original policy with a series of public meetings. The court concluded the real issue was not whether the amendment operated to reduce the quantity or quality of the public input, but rather whether or not the amendment operated to treat the public unfairly in terms of their rights to make their views known to the Board. At p. 483, Eberle, J., states:

> "... I think we must not lose sight of the fundamental principles in this case. We are dealing here not with a body affecting anyone's legal rights but a body carrying out an administrative or management function. In my view the decision of such a body should not be quashed unless real and substantial prejudices have been shown by the way in which matters have been conducted or for some other substantial reason. I do not think those exist in this case."

School Division No. 3 (1982), 18 Man. R.(2d) 403 (C.A.), at p. 407:

> "... I quote in this regard the words of Professor S.A. de Smith in his text Judicial Review of Administrative Action, [2nd ed.] 1968, London, Stevens & Sons Limited, at p. 126:
> > 'Although nullification is the natural and usual consequence of disobedience, breach of procedural or formal rules is likely to be treated as a mere irregularity if the departure from the terms of the Act is of a trivial nature, or if no substantial prejudice has been suffered by those for whose benefit the requirements were introduced, or if serious public inconvenience would be caused by holding them to be mandatory, or if the Court is for any reason disinclined to interfere with the act or decision that is impugned.'"

> "... The Board's policies and procedures are surely matters for the Board - subject to compliance with the Act - and the Board would not be in error to adopt an overall process to deal with the problem facing it. I do not place much weight on the fact that the policies of the previous Boards were not formally rescinded; by formally adopting a process for the closure at hand the Board was, as the proper decision- making authority, deciding that the former policies would not be applied. This was not unreasonable given that the former policies presented two distinct approaches. Neither is there anything in the Board's decision-making on process to suggest bad faith. While concern was expressed that the previous Avalon Consolidated policy required a year's notice, the fact that the Board wished to shorten this length of notice is not equivalent to acting in bad faith, nor is it, of itself, indicative of a lack of procedural fairness."

[37] Having considered the Fisher Park, Elliott, Tracey, and Baker decisions, I am satisfied the Board was within its rights in amending its closure policy. The Board, in adopting the new time frame, complied with the minimal standard suggested by Mr. Justice Orsborn in Tracey. This matter had been ongoing since January of 1999 and all of the significant information utilized by the respondent in proposing its closure motions had been made available to the applicants. The integrity of the process was maintained in that the parents were afforded an opportunity on August 28, 1999 to bring forward whatever submissions they deemed appropriate.

[38] The dynamics of the situation were such that the Board wished to move on the closure issues as expeditiously as possible and before the opening of the school year, while the parents were adamant that the matter proceed in a procedurally fair manner. In some respects, perhaps to their own detriment, the applicants became so caught up in the procedure they failed to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded them to make presentations to the Board on August 28th. It cannot be said, however, that they were not given the opportunity to do so as required by s. 76(2) of the Schools Act.

[39] In summary, on the procedural fairness arguments, I find the respondent did not contravene s. 76(2) of the Schools Act as parents were permitted to make representations prior to the August 31, 1999 School Board meeting. The respondent did not violate its own School Closure Policy, but simply revised it to conform with the time frame reflected in Tracey and for use at the August 31, 1999 meeting. I would also add there is simply no evidence to suggest the respondent acted, at any time, without good faith and indeed, it appears the Board relied heavily on their counsel's advice in these matters. Finally, I conclude there was no breach of procedural fairness in respect of the Program Specialists Report dated January 20, 1999, although it would have been better had this Report been immediately distributed to all the trustees upon issuance of Dymond, J.'s, decision. In any event, it was assuredly in the hands of all trustees in advance of the August 31, 1999 meeting.

Issue 2 - Did the Respondent Breach the Schools Act by Allowing a Vote by Secret Ballot or. in the Alternative, Offend the Constitution of Canada, Particularly s. 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, in Adopting this Procedure?

[40] This issue was argued before Mr. Justice Dymond. In his decision of August 13th he ruled s. 3 of the Charter did not apply to secret-ballot voting. As to whether or not such a vote breached the Schools Act, 1997, Dymond,

J., noted there was nothing in the legislation to prohibit secret-ballot voting and found at p. 45, para. 4 of his decision:

> "The issue of the secret ballot violated the Guidelines of four days notice as set out in the Bylaws. The shortness of the notice of motion violated the common law principle of procedural fairness."

The applicants' argue no definitive decision was made in respect of whether or not the respondent actually breached the Schools Act, 1997 by allowing this type of vote. Certainly the tenor of his decision is that secret-ballot voting is permissible under the legislation but not desirable in the context of any democratic process.

[41] Section 3 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms states:

> "Democratic Rights
> "3. Every citizen of Canada has the right to vote in an election of members of the House of Commons or of a legislative assembly and to be qualified for membership therein."

[42] The Supreme Court of Canada in Reference Re Provincial Electoral Boundaries (Sask.), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 158; 127 N.R. 1; 94 Sask.R. 161; [1991] 5 W.W.R. 1; 81 D.L.R.(4th) 16; 5 C.R.R.(2d) 1, states s. 3 is to be determined in a broad and purposive way, having regard to historical and social context. In adopting this approach the Court must be guided by the ideal of the "free and democratic society, upon which the Charter is founded". However, the case focuses on the purpose of this section as being designed to ensure "effective representation" while at the same time recognizing that equality of voting may not always be achieved where factors such as geography, community history, community interests, and minority representation require consideration to ensure that legislative assemblies effectively represent their constituents. The case does not stand for the premise that effective representation must be accountable representation but rather must be representative of the constituent population.

[43] Applicants' counsel eloquently argued that even if s. 3 of the Charter cannot be so broadly interpreted so as to preclude secret-ballot voting, it nonetheless enshrines the Charter value ideal of a "free and democratic society" inherently recognizing the necessity for both open voting and ultimate accountability to the electorate.

[44] I agree with much of the analysis found in Mr. Justice Dymond's decisions, [Baker et al. v. Board of Education of District No. 7 - Burin (1999), 180 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 347; 548 A.P.R. 347 (Nfld. T.D.)] on this point, as well as comments made by other judges of this court in pre-Charter cases. Section 3 of the Charter, on the face of it, is restricted to legislative assemblies. This interpretation was favoured by the Ontario Courts in Jones (R.) v. Ontario (Attorney General) et al. (1992), 54 O.A.C. 211; 7 O.R.(3d) 22 (C.A.):

> "I agree with the Attorney General that prima facie s. 3 does not apply to the case at bar and that the delegation of powers does not make the delegatee into a delegator. The words legislative assembly are contained in other sections of the Charter where they could not be interpreted as including municipal councils. There is not constitutional impediment to a province abolishing municipal councils. If the applicant succeeded on its s. 3 argument, the results would be that a province could not abolish its municipalities. Municipalities are creatures of the province."

This case was appealed to both the Ontario Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada. Leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was refused and as noted by Mr. Justice Dymond at para. 74, that court, in refusing, made the following comment:

> "We also agree that s. 3 of the Charter, the right of a citizen inter alia to vote or to be qualified for membership in the House of Commons or in the legislative assembly, does not apply to municipal councils."

[45] If one extends the logic set forth in the foregoing case, particularly the first quote, it becomes apparent that school boards, as creatures of the province, in a like way as municipalities, cannot be clothed with the rights granted under s. 3 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Therefore, this argument by the applicants is rejected.

[46] The applicants further submit the secret-ballot vote violated the Schools Act, 1997. In both pre and post-Charter cases judges of this court have found consistently, although this type of voting is not necessarily desirable, particularly where sensitive issues such as school closures are being determined, it is not precluded by the Schools Act.

[47] In pre-Charter cases both Mr. Justice Roberts in Gillingham et al. v. Board of Education of District No. 3 - Corner Brook/Deer Lake/St. Barbe (1998), 169 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 1; 521 A.P.R. 1 (Nfld. T.D.) and Mr. Justice Woolridge in Wall et al. v. Board of Education of District No. 3 - Corner Brook/Deer Lake/St. Barbe (1998), 169 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 16; 521 A.P.R. 16 (Nfld. T.D.), adopted the reasoning of Mr. Justice Dixon in Houde v. Quebec Catholic School Commission, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 937; 17 N.R. 451, at p. 940 [S.C.R.].

> "First, public bodies, such as municipal councils and school commissions have broad discretion in the regulation of their procedures. It is not for the Courts to dictate the manner in which such bodies shall manage their internal affairs. If a council or a commission fails to observe the formalities which the Legislature has prescribed in plain language for the calling and conduct of meetings, then the Court may, in a proper case, intervene; if questions of natural justice, or fraudulent, inequitable, or oppressive use of power arise, the Courts may act; but in the absence of statutory obligation, or misconduct, the internal regulation of their affairs by municipal bodies is a matter for such bodies and for them alone ..."

> "Public meetings and secret balloting are not incompatible. No authority has been cited which holds that a public body, whose meetings and deliberations are in public, is precluded as a matter of broad policy from voting by secret ballot. Such a proposition runs directly counter to the broad discretion all public bodies have, absent statutory direction otherwise, to regulate their internal procedures."

[48] The Schools Act is silent on the manner of voting. The bylaws adopted by the respondent incorporate Robert's Rules of Order (Rev. Ed.) as a procedural reference. These rules allow for vote by secret ballot. This suggests an intent on the part of the respondent to permit such voting.

decision ought to be departed from on the basis it does not adhere to the Charter value which the applicants submit emanates from s. 3 requiring open voting on the part of the elected representatives at the School Board level. I do not believe it appropriate, or legally correct, to depart from Houde at this time and on that basis. I cannot conclude that one can extract from s. 3 a presumptive Charter value that the respondent must vote openly on all occasions. Although accountability directly on the issue of who voted for school closure is thereby foreclosed, certainly the electorate can hold the Board accountable for passing a motion to permit secret ballot where, as is the case here, the motion was passed by show of hands after a debate by the trustees.

[50] The applicants' submission, therefore, that there has been a breach of the Schools Act, 1997, by virtue of the respondent having allowed secret-ballot voting in respect of the closure of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School at the August 31, 1999 meeting, is rejected.

Issue 3 - Were three of the trustees in a conflict-of-interest position by virtue of the fact they voted in favour of holding a secret ballot in respect of school closure of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School on the basis they feared financial repercussions, in the case of two of them in respect of the operation of their own businesses and in the case of the third individual, in respect of the operation of his spouse's business ?

[51] The facts relied upon are contained in the minutes of a special Board meeting held Tuesday, August 31, 1999 and attached as exhibit "E" to the affidavit of Margaret Witherell filed herein. Shortly before the hearing, counsel for the applicant became aware of the contents of these minutes the result of which this issue was raised for my consideration.

[52] Motion No. 1, in the meeting in question, reads as follows:

> "It was moved by Wayne Collins and seconded by Thomas LeGrow that the motion made by the Board on May 18th, 1999, prohibiting the use of voting by secret ballot, be rescinded."

[53] Discussion on this motion ensued and is recorded. Relevant portions are:

"Mr. Collins indicated that maybe there is a lot of people around who don't like the idea; he heard through different reports and on radio. However, different people are not in positions like other people on this board. First, when he submitted his name to the board, it didn't seem like it would be like it is right now. He runs a public business and a public business certainly don't coincide with things. To him, this has drastically affected different parts of his personal life....

"Tom LeGrow said he would go the other direction and supported Wayne Collins. He is in a similar position. He works in every community on the peninsula and it has the potential to affect his employment. He depends on a good rapport in the community to help him get his work done. He knows Wayne and several other trustees in the same position; where this can seriously affect personal lives. As a volunteer activity, he thinks that trustees should have the option to decide how we want to vote. ...

"Harvey Tulk indicated he supports a secret vote by ballot. The reason he can understand anyone when they speak of personal business is because his wife has a business, too. It is not fair for a decision of his to negatively affect his wife's business. He has been through that. He dealt with that when he got into this and he is aware of controversial situations that he was sure could arise. They decided that for the children he would represent, he would go ahead and do that anyway. Not jeopardizing the whole business, necessarily, but he guesses jeopardizing to a certain extent. He believes that board members can vote with a clearer conscience when they vote in secret because (and he's not afraid to stand up to any decision he makes) if everybody can make a clear conscientious decision by not having to worry about negative ramifications - that's what we have to think about. The negative ramifications of our children; not what Joe Blow is going to say, but if we were negatively impacted by some 'baby blue eyes' that would try to sway how we vote. Harvey thinks we will vote with a clear conscience if we vote by secret ballot." (See exhibit "E" attached to affidavit of Margaret Witherell)

[54] The opposite viewpoint was expressed at the same meeting by Mr. Marcus Evans:

> "Marcus Evans said he didn't believe the Board should vote by way of secret ballot. He understands the sentiments behind someone wanting them. He has a large amount of sympathy for anyone who feels that the stand they take in volunteer capacity on education, they take it for reasons that are high-minded and it is sad if their business is impacted. He works for a living and the business he works for does business all over the Burin Peninsula. He probably stands to lose as much, by publicly saying how he voted, as anyone else does, but he still doesn't think it's right to vote by way of secret ballot. He said when he ran for the school board, he knew he might have to make controversial decisions. Even though, he had no idea of the scale of the controversy that was going to develop in the last year or so, he still knew that it wouldn't all be roses. He believes that this is all part and parcel of doing something when you're elected by the public. This is not the House of Commons, but at the same time, we have a duty to the people who voted for us to say why and how we think things should work. For these reasons, he disagrees with voting by way of secret ballot and doesn't think we should rescind the motion not to." (See exhibit "E" attached to affidavit of Margaret Witherell)

[55] The motion to rescind was carried and a further motion to proceed by way of secret ballot was also carried.

[56] The relevant sections of the Schools Act, 1997 relied upon by the applicants are:

> "68(1) A trustee has a conflict of interest and shall not vote or speak on a matter before the board or a committee of the board where
> (a) the trustee or a relative of the trustee has a direct or indirect monetary or other interest in the matter; or
> (b) the trustee is an officer, employee or agent of an incorporated or unincorporated company, or other association of persons, that has a direct or indirect monetary or other interest in that matter.

> "(3) For the purpose of subsection (1) a relative of a trustee means a father, mother, spouse, sister, brother, child, stepchild, ward, mother-in-law, father- in-law, sister-in-law or brother-in-law of the trustee.
> "(4) In order for an interest to be considered as one falling within the prohibition set out in subsection (1) it shall be an interest distinct from an interest held in common with the electors generally in the district of the board."

1999 CanLII 19822 (NL SC)

[57] The foregoing provision has generally been interpreted and, in my view, reasonably so, to mean that a person in public office should not personally benefit by virtue of his/her position of trust. See: Stewart v. Yorkton (City) (1982), 16 Sask.R. 258; 18 M.P.L.R. 57 (Q.B.) at p. 59 (Sask. Q.B.). Adams, J., of this court in Elliott et al. v. Board of Education of Burin Peninsula et al. (1997), 157 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 193; 486 A.P.R. 193 (Nfld. T.D.), commented at para. 21 as follows:

> "Therefore, 'other interest' as referred to in s. 68(1) (a) while it does not have to be pecuniary in nature, requires that the interest have some tangible or particular benefit for the trustee who is accused of the conflict or some member of his family as defined in the act."

[58] In Elliott the court distinguished other cases because they involved either a direct or indirect pecuniary interest in favour of the person alleged to be in a conflict of interest. At para. 24, in so distinguishing, Adams, J., reaffirmed those interpretations suggesting conflict may only arise in situations where a benefit has been bestowed upon the individual alleged to be in conflict as defined by subsection 3 of s. 68.

[59] Mr. Justice Orsborn considered an issue other than financial benefit or gain in Tracey et al. v. Board of Education of Avalon East (1998), 164 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 181; 507 A.P.R. 181 (Nfld. T.D.), in relation to a trustee voting on school closure where the trustee had a child or children attending another school which might have been affected by the outcome on the first vote. Orsborn, J., concluded a conflict of interest would arise if the outcome would have the effect of securing a personal advantage for the trustee's child, namely, the ability to continue attending her own school.

[60] This issue was reviewed in Moll v. Fisher et al. (1979), 96 D.L.R.(3d) 506 (Ont. Div. Ct.). In this case two members of a Board of Education were disqualified from participating in deliberations relating to collective agreements with secondary school teachers on the basis their spouses were elementary school teachers also employed by the same board and there existed historical and practical parallels between the contracts negotiated by both secondary and elementary teachers. The court found voting in respect of one contract would be to secure a financial advantage to the spouses by way of increased salary in respect of the second contract.

[61] The three trustees involved in the present fact situation are not from the Northern Zone, that is the Zone in which Jacques Fontaine and St. Bernard Schools are located. They are from the communities of Lawn, Fortune and Marystown. The businesses referenced are located in these areas.

[62] I am satisfied the legislation was principally designed to ensure trustees do not secure a personal advantage, be it monetary or otherwise, by virtue of holding a position on the School Board. The Act is silent on the issue of personal disadvantage or negative consequence that might arise as in the facts before me. If an individual becomes fettered in his or her ability to make an objective and fair decision by virtue of potential negative consequences, he or she ought to abstain from any part in the voting process.

[63] Section 68(1) (a) of the Act mandates that a trustee not vote or speak on a matter before the Board where the trustee or a relative has an interest in the matter. In my view to hold that the fact situation before me amounts to a conflict of interest as envisaged by this part of the section, would be to cast upon it an interpretation not borne out by the wording of the legislation. The conflict herein did not arise due to an interest in the matter but rather a fear of repercussions arising out of any decision made.

[64] The trustees believed vote by secret ballot would negate any reprisals to their business thereby enabling them to vote, as stated by Harvey Tulk "with a clear conscience". In this way it would appear they believed vote by secret ballot eliminated the concern of any negative impact to them personally.

[65] On this first point, I conclude fear of negative consequences to business interests held directly or indirectly by the trustees cannot be considered as a "interest in the matter". Accordingly, the applicants' submission on this basis fails. Even if successful, the test for finding conflict of interest does not end there.

[66] It must also be established as set forth in s. 68(4) an interest to be considered as one falling within the prohibition set out in subsection (1) must be an interest distinct from interests held in common with electors generally in the Board district. The respondent submits even in circumstances where tangible benefit ensues to a trustee, or his or her family, the trustee will not be disqualified if that benefit is enjoyed by the electors in the district generally. While acknowledging juris prudence holds conflict of interest provisions must be given a broad and liberal interpretation, the respondent argues it must, nevertheless, remain workable. It notes Mr. Justice Dymond's reasoning in Baker on this point wherein he concluded to deny Allen and Elliott to vote would be to frustrate the intention of the Legislature to encourage people to seek election on various boards. Had the conflict of interest provisions been held applicable, Dymond, J., concludes at p. 39, para. 92:

> "In the present case the legislation, if interpreted to allow for interest to include trustees with children attending school up for closing would also include all the other people listed in the definition in sub-section (3) of s. 68. In smaller communities this would pretty well exclude everybody who was interested in serving on the School Board."

He then adopts the approach utilized by Adams, J., in Elliott in looking at the intent of the legislation on "other interests" and equating it to something akin to pecuniary interests.

[67] More comparable to the present situation is Stewart v. Yorkton (City) (1982), 16 Sask.R. 258; 18 M.P.L.R. 57 (Q.B.), where a mayor (and manager of T. Eaton and Co.), and a councillor, and shareholder, and officer of a local shoe store, were not considered to be in a conflict of interest when they voted on a bylaw regulating the hours of opening of shops in the city. The court stated at pp. 60-61:

> "The interest which Mayor Wytrykush and Councillor Hodgson

possessed in the bylaw is one they had in common with all other managers and owners of businesses in Yorkton governed by the bylaw. It was the same kind of interest although it might have differed in degree.

"The question, therefore, arises: did an interest held in common of the same kind but different in degree, with a segment of the residents of a municipality as opposed to all residents of the municipality, entitle the mayor and the councillor to vote on the bylaw?

"The answer to the question is 'yes'. In Elliott v. St. Catherines (1908), 18 O.L.R. 57 (C.A.) Meredith, C.J., said at p. 61:

> 'The community of interest spoken of I understand to be a community in the kind, not in the degree, of the interest.
> . . . . .
> 'I see no reason for differing from the view taken in the McLean case. As I view it, the principle upon which the rule is founded is the same whether the bylaw is one affecting all the rate payers of the municipality or only those within a section of it.'"

[68] A trustee's interest may differ in degree but so long as the interest is the same in kind as other electors in the district, the trustee will not be in a conflict of interest. I conclude individuals owning businesses, doing business, or having a spouse doing business in the Board district, hold an interest in common, generally, with all similar business people in the area. Having so concluded I find the interest of these trustees not sufficiently distinct from the interest of like individuals in the district of the Board so as to permit it to fall within the prohibition found in subsection 1 of s. 68 of the Schools Act.

[69] I would note the applicant in mounting this argument did not ask that the individuals be removed from the Board pointing out there was no mala fide on their part.

[70] In summary, I find firstly, the interest of the three trustees in their family businesses does not represent "interest in the matter" as set forth in s.

68(1)(a). Secondly, the interest of the three trustees is sufficiently broad that it may be viewed as one held in common with electors generally and the test required by s. 68(4) has not been met.

Remedies

[71] At my request, counsel provided authority pertaining to the court's discretion in granting extraordinary remedies such as that requested here. Although I am satisfied the grounds have not been made out on the application, I feel it appropriate to address the issue of the remedy requested should I be in error in my decision.

[72] Counsel for the applicant pointed to three possible situations where judicial discretion may be refused in granting an order for certiorari. First, where an appeal would be a more appropriate and effective remedy. Second, where the conduct or motivation of the applicant provides a basis for the discretionary denial of relief. Third, where to quash the decision will serve no useful purpose, or where there has been a procedural technical defect which overall is not significant enough to have likely altered the outcome of the proceeding. Two other areas appear to enter into the discussion on the discretion permitted in respect of extraordinary remedies, one being whether or not a real and substantial prejudice has been shown by virtue of the manner in which the matter has been conducted, the other considerations of the general public interest.

[73] Counsel advise the School Board has appealed the August 13th decision of Mr. Justice Dymond and the parents have filed a cross-appeal in the matter. This appeal has yet to be heard. The applicant argues there is no certainty that the appeal will proceed to hearing. S.A. de Smith in Judicial Review of Administrative Action (3rd Ed. 1973), at pp. 375 and 376 discusses the effect of appeal on judicial discretion to quash a tribunal decision as follows:

> "An applicant for certiorari is not normally obliged to have exhausted his rights of appeal within the administrative hierarchy[90] or to have exercised any right of appeal to a court of law[91]; but it is not the practice of the court to exercise its discretion in favour of an applicant if he has already lodged an appeal to a court against the decision and the appeal is pending.[92] If an order is subject to appeal within a specified period, the court has a discretion to adjourn an application for certiorari to quash it until the appeal has been determined or the time for appealing has expired.[93]

"On the principles that ought to regulate the exercise of judicial discretion when alternative remedies are available there is not a great deal of English authority, but it is thought that the following propositions are acceptable:

(i) The court must be prepared to take into account all the circumstances of the case, including the purpose for which certiorari has been sought, the adequacy of the alternative remedy and the conduct of the applicant.

(ii) If an applicant claims to be aggrieved by a decision made without jurisdiction or in breach of the rules of natural justice, the fact that he has not taken advantage of a statutory right of appeal should normally be regarded as irrelevant.[94]

(iii) If an applicant claims to be aggrieved by a decision exhibiting an error of law (not going to jurisdiction) and has a statutory right of appeal to a court, recourse to appeal is the appropriate remedy and he may be refused certiorari for this reason.[95] However, the court retains jurisdiction to award certiorari to quash; and the refusal of certiorari is not the only way of encouraging resort to appeal.

[91] R. v. Wandsworth Jj., ex p. Read [1942] 1 K.B. 281. In R. v. Jones (Gwyn) [1969] 2 Q.B. 33 the Court of Appeal (Criminal Division) actually dismissed an appeal against sentence on the ground that the sentence was a nullity and that the only appropriate remedies were prohibition or certiorari. But an appeal against a void decision is not a contradiction in terms (see p. 133, ante). For cases where courts have treated an appeal as an application for certiorari, the latter being the more appropriate remedy, see p. 357, note 57, ante.

[94] See notes 90, 91, ante. In the Paddington case (one of alleged quasi-jurisdictional error), the Court of Appeal held that certiorari to quash a valuation list was more appropriate than the prescribed machinery for appeal (to a local valuation court and thence to the Lands Tribunal) because the applicants were attacking the basic validity of the whole valuation list whereas appeals were concerned only with the Tightness or validity of individual assessments).

(v) If the application for certiorari is made while an appeal is pending, an award of certiorari may still be justified if the questions to be raised on appeal go to the merits of the case and the application for certiorari is based on jurisdictional grounds or breach of natural justice not going to the merits.[98]

(vi) The court ought not to refuse certiorari because of alternative remedies other than appeal unless it is clearly satisfied that those other remedies are more appropriate.[99]

[74] The foregoing discussion anticipates an appeal in respect of the order for which certiorari is sought. In the present case the applicants seek a quashing of a decision of the School Board not under appeal. However, clearly, issues under appeal pertaining to Mr. Justice Dymond's decision must be decided before the respondent can proceed further in the closure process. The most notable of these issues is whether or not Elliot and Allen were in conflict-of-interest positions, the result of which they should have abstained from voting. There are now two lines of thinking in this court that as reflected in Mr. Justice Dymond's decision, and the contrary position referenced by Mr. Justice Orsborn in Tracey. Until this issue is resolved at the appeal level, no decisions can be made upon which reliance can be placed.

[75] The second area identified by the applicants allowing for exercise of some discretion in the awarding of the remedy requested herein is where the applicants' conduct has disentitled them to relief. In Administrative Law (3rd Ed. 1996), Mullan, at p. 528, Topic 683, states:

> "The conduct or the motivation of the applicant for judicial review provides a basis for the discretionary denial of relief if, for example, the applicant's only motivation is to frustrate or obstruct the administrative process, he or she has not dealt in good faith with the decision-maker or the other side[1] or the applicant's claim to judicial review is technically impeccable but is established only by acting in such a way as to circumvent the spirit and intention of the relevant legislation.[2] It is, however, questionable whether the applicant's flouting of a decision by operating a business[3] or erecting a building[4] after a wrongful denial of a licence or permit amounts to misconduct sufficient to justify a denial of relief.

[76] It cannot be said that the applicants herein intentionally tried to frustrate or obstruct the administrative process, or in any way acted in bad faith. They did, by choice, not make submissions at the August 28th public meeting, but I do not believe such actions would have allowed for a denial of the remedy requested by them. Rather, they go to the issue of whether the applicants have been treated with procedural fairness in the circumstances.

[77] The third area of consideration in denial of remedy is where a quashing of the School Board's decision will serve no useful purpose, or where there has been a procedural technical defect which over all is not significant enough to have likely altered the outcome of the proceeding. As stated by Jones and de Villars in Principles of Administrative Law (2nd Ed. 1994), p. 491, subparagraph (d):

> "... Minor procedural irregularities which in fact or which in all likelihood had no effect on the ultimate decision had been ignored by the courts.[114]

[78] There are two areas that one might find, although I have not, are of technical irregularity. They are:

> 1. First, the School Board changed its procedure by reducing the time frame for submission from sixty to thirty days; and
> 2. Second, the failure to provide the January Program Specialists Report to the parents amounted to a procedural irregularity and was, if not directly required, at least in spirit required by the decision of Dymond, J., and/or this document ought to have been provided to the trustees thirty days prior to any Board meeting on closure of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School.

As to the former, I am of the view that no evidence was provided whereby I could conclude that the shortened time frame prejudiced the parents in any real or substantial way. As to the latter, I am of the view that such technical defect would not have likely resulted in any change of the Board's decision. All of the trustees had this information available to them on or before the August 31st meeting. Armed with this information the Board arrived at its decision. Many, if not all, of the trustees were aware, at the time of the meeting, that this particular document was of concern to the parents and that it was felt that all trustees should have it on or before the vote.

parents was considered by Halley, J., in Benoit et al. v. School Board for District # 5 Baie Verte, Central, Connaigre (August 18, 1999), 1999 G.F. 72 - Unreported (Nfld. S.C.T.D.) at paras. 43 and 44:

> "Failure to act in a procedurally fair manner does not always result in an order in the nature of Certiorari. Such a remedy is discretionary. In P.P.G. Industries Canada Limited v. Attorney General of Canada (1975), [1976] 2 S.C.R. 739 the Supreme Court of Canada exercised its discretion to deny Certiorari to an applicant that was entitled in law to such an order.
> "One of the grounds upon which a judge may decline to exercise that discretion is where there is a 'lack of utility' in the grant of the remedy (see Administrative Law (3rd ed.) by Evans at page 1053). In this case the Consultant's report was favourable to the position of the applicants. I find that the applicants were not negatively affected by the Board's consideration of the report. In these circumstances I find that there would be a 'lack of utility' in the grant of an order in the nature of Certiorari."

[80] It must be remembered in the present case that the January Program Specialists Report is referred to in the later Consultant's Report and further, that the Consultant's Report, like the former Report, and considered by the Board in arriving at its final conclusion, preferred Jacques Fontaine All Grade School over St. Bernard's School. The issue was squarely on the table before the Board and highlighted through the decision of Dymond, J., on August 31, 1999.

[81] Finally, I note in Mullan, Administrative Law (Third Edition) at p. 529, Topic 685, entitled Balance of Convenience and Public Interest considerations that I consider to be very relevant to the facts before me:

> "Despite the applicant making a case for relief on the merits, the courts may deny a remedy due to considerations of the general public interest.[1] The limits of the courts' jurisdiction to refuse relief on this basis are both unclear and controversial. Significantly, the court may invoke a provision entitling it to refuse relief for a defect in form or a technical irregularity which does not cause a substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice.[2] Provisions of that type are found in several reformed remedial regimes[3] and probably reflect the common law rather than legislative innovation. The court generally evaluates the impact of the error on the applicant's rights and interests and the presence of any other discretionary considerations, such as the motivations of the applicant and the utility of granting relief.[4] Arguments directed simply to cost and administrative expediency do not govern, especially if the error impinges upon important individual rights and interests[5], though considerations of administrative chaos resulting from the grant of relief are relevant if duties owed to the public at large are in issue.[6]

[82] The respondent proceeded with a further meeting in anticipation of Mr. Justice Dymond's decision. Having obtained counsel's advice, it was of the view that it could proceed and was doing so in a procedurally fair manner. The Board had focused on the primary issues raised before Mr. Justice Dymond and presumably embarked on its course of action with a view to finalizing the matter as expeditiously as possible and with financial considerations designed to benefit all students in the region and the Northern

Zone in the future. There is, as I have said, no evidence of mala fide on the Board's part. The most that can be said is that it may have acted with some haste in the matter.

[83] I reject the applicants' argument that little inconvenience would be caused, at this stage, were I to quash the Board's decision. This decision does not simply affect the students of Jacques Fontaine All Grade School. As argued by counsel for the intervenors, it will have a serious affect on children and parents of St. Bernard's All Grade School, as well as children in the Rushoon area. The public interest served by decisions of the Board is not confined solely to the Northern Zone, but to all of the schools and children, and programming provided to them, under the authority of the respondent.

[84] I have concluded that if defects existed in the present case, they were merely technical in nature and not substantive enough to have likely caused a change in the decision of the Board as rendered August 31, 1999. I believe were I to quash the Board's decision, it would result in serious public inconvenience and impact negatively, most particularly on the children in the Northern Zone, but also indirectly on children in other areas.

[85] Having reflected on the evolution of this matter, and where it is at today's date, I do not believe it would have been appropriate to quash the Board's decision of August 31, 1999.

Mechanics' liens—Appointment of receiver to draw upon and borrow undrawn balance of proceeds under a mortgage—Whether judge exceeded jurisdiction in ordering that mortgagee, in respect of any moneys advanced by mortgagee to receiver, should have priority over any other registered or unregistered charges or encumbrances—The Mechanics' Liens Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. M80, s. 11(1)—The Queen's Bench Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. C280, s. 59.

The respondent housing co-operative and the respondent holding company (both non-profit corporations, without funds) entered into a contractual relationship with the appellants whereby, inter alia, the first appellant was to construct a student housing project. Title to the project was in the name of the holding company; the housing co-operative was to be the head tenant; the second appellant was to be property manager. In the late summer of 1972 construction was substantially completed, and the first tenants moved into the building. During the winter of 1972/73 a moisture problem developed in the building, which recurred during the winter of 1973/74, resulting in accumulation of ice, water and mould in some of the suites. The owner of the building sought advice of experts who recommended remedial measures, the estimated cost of which amounted to $135,000. The contractor refused to authorize that the work be done at its expense. Proceedings subsequently commenced between the parties but little progress was made.

The construction cost of the building, $2,209,790, was to have been provided from the proceeds of a Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation first mortgage in the principal amount of $1,988,831, all of which had been advanced except for a holdback of $228,897, and from a second mortage in the amount of $220,959, all of which had been advanced. On June 22, 1973, the contractor caused a mechanics' lien to be filed against the

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DU MANITOBA

Privilège de constructeur—Nomination d'un séquestre pour effectuer des retraits et emprunts sur le solde non versé d'une hypothèque—Le juge a-t-il outrepassé ses pouvoirs en ordonnant que, pour toutes les avances faites par le créancier hypothécaire au séquestre, le créancier hypothécaire ait priorité sur toutes les autres charges, enregistrée ou non—The Mechanic's Liens Act. R.S.M. 1970, c. M80, art. 11(1)—The Queen's Bench Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. C280, art. 59.

La coopérative intimée et la société de portefeuille intimée (toutes deux des sociétés sans but lucratif et sans actif) ont conclu un contrat par lequel, entre autres choses, la première appelante devait construire un immeuble destiné à loger des étudiants. La société de portefeuille en était propriétaire, la coopérative en était locataire principal et la seconde appelante devait en être le gérant. Vers la fin de l'été 1972, la construction étant presque achevée, les premiers locataires s'installent dans l'immeuble. Au cours de l'hiver 1972-73, des problèmes d'humidité surviennent; ils se reproduisent pendant l'hiver 1973-74 avec accumulation d'eau, de glace et de moisissure dans certains appartements. La propriétaire consulte des experts qui recommandent, pour remédier aux difficultés, des travaux dont le coût est évalué à $135,000. L'entrepreneur a refusé de consentir que les travaux soient effectués à ses frais. Des procédures ont par la suite été instituées entre les parties mais elles ne sont guère avancées.

Le coût de construction de l'immeuble, soit $2,209,-790, devait être payé avec une première hypothèque de $1,988,831 consentie par la Société centrale d'hypothèques et de logement (SCHL), dont $228,897 n'avaient pas encore été versés, et une seconde hypothèque de $220,959, dont le montant avait été versé en entier. Le 22 juin 1973, l'entrepreneur a fait enregistrer sur les property in the amount of $310,440, claimed to be due to it under the contract.

In the summer of 1974, the owner of the property applied to a Queen's Bench judge in chambers for an order appointing a receiver of the balance of the proceeds of the C.M.H.C. mortgage. The order was granted and contained a provision that any moneys paid by the mortgagee "shall upon payment from time to time to the receiver have priority over any and all other charges or encumbrances registered or unregistered affecting the said lands." An appeal was dismissed by the Court of Appeal, and the appellants, with leave, then appealed to this Court. The question to be decided was whether the judge exceeded his jurisdiction in making the said order.

Held: The appeal should be allowed and the application for the order dismissed.

The appointment of the receiver was wrong in law because the provision ordering that any moneys paid by C.M.H.C. to the receiver would have priority over any other registered or unregistered charges or encumbrances ran contrary to s. 11(1) of The Mechanics' Liens Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. M80. Section 11(1) goes a long way in ensuring that once a lien claimant has protected his rights by filing a lien in accordance with the provisions of the Act, the lien is a paramount legal charge not subject to being defeated or eroded in any manner. The inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench, under s. 59 of The Queen's Bench Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. C280, is not such as to empower a judge of that Court to make an order negating the unambiguous expression of the legislative will. The effect of this order was to alter the statutory priorities which a court simply cannot do.

biens-fonds un privilège de constructeur pour un montant de $310,440, dû, selon lui, en vertu du contrat.

A l'été 1974, la propriétaire a adressé une requête à un juge en chambre de la Cour du Banc de la Reine demandant que soit nommé un séquestre du solde du prêt hypothécaire consenti par la SCHL. Il a été fait droit à la requête. L'ordonnance contenait une disposition portant que tous les fonds avancés par le créancier hypothécaire [TRADUCTION] «dès leur versement au séquestre, auront priorité sur toutes les autres charges, enregistrées ou non, grevant lesdits biens-fonds.» Un appel interjeté devant la Cour d'appel a été rejeté par celle-ci, et les appelantes, autorisées à cet effet, ont ensuite interjeté un pourvoi devant cette Cour. Il s'agit de décider si le juge a outrepassé ses pouvoirs en rendant ladite ordonnance.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi doit être accueilli et la requête visant à faire nommer un séquestre rejetée.

Le juge a commis une erreur de droit en nommant un séquestre parce que la disposition portant que les sommes versées au séquestre par la SCHL auraient priorité sur toutes les autres charges, enregistrées ou non, va à l'encontre du par. (1) de l'art. 11 du Mechanics' Liens Act du Manitoba, R.S.M. 1970, c. M80. Le paragraphe (1) de l'art. 11 va très loin pour assurer qu'une fois que le créancier a protégé ses droits en enregistrant un privilège conformément aux dispositions de la Loi, celui-ci devienne une charge prioritaire qui ne saurait être supplantée ou entamée d'aucune façon. La compétence inhérente de la Cour du Banc de la Reine, en vertu de l'art. 59 du Queen's Bench Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. C280, n'autorise pas ses juges à rendre une ordonnance qui va à l'encontre de la volonté clairement exprimée du législateur. L'ordonnance rendue en l'espèce vise à modifier l'ordre des privilèges fixé par la Loi, ce qu'un tribunal ne peut simplement pas faire.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

DICKSON J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Manitoba affirming an order of Nitikman J. appointing a receiver to draw upon and borrow the undrawn balance of proceeds under a mortgage. The question to be decided is whether the judge exceeded his jurisdiction in ordering that the mortgagee, in respect of any moneys advanced by the mortgagee to the receiver, should have priority over other charges or encumbrances registered or unregistered affecting the lands.

The facts are unusual. In late 1971 College Housing Co-operative Limited (the Housing Co-operative) and College Housing Holdings Incorporated (the Holding Company) entered into contractual relationship whereby inter alia Baxter Student Housing Ltd. (Baxter Housing) was to construct on a "turnkey" basis a four-storey, 192-suite apartment building, known as "Dalhousie Drive Project", to provide housing for students at the University of Manitoba. Title to the project was in the name of the Holding Company; the Housing Co-operative, a students' co-operative, was to be the head tenant; R.C. Baxter Ltd. (R. C. Baxter) was to be property manager. In the late summer of 1972 construction was substantially completed, and the first tenants moved into the building. During the winter of 1972/1973 a moisture problem developed in the building, which recurred during the winter of 1973/1974, resulting in accumulation of ice, water and mould in some of the suites. The owner of the building, the Housing Co-operative, sought advice of experts who recommended certain remedial measures, the estimated cost of which amounted to $135,000. Baxter Housing refused to authorize that the work be done at its expense. Two questions therefore became crucial (i) who would pay for the remedial work and (ii) where would the money come from. On point (i) I should say that in September 1973 the Housing Co-operative and the Holding Com-

LE JUGE DICKSON—Le pourvoi est à l'encontre d'un arrêt de la Cour d'appel du Manitoba, qui confirme une ordonnance du juge Nitikman nommant un séquestre pour effectuer des retraits et emprunts sur le solde non versé d'une hypothèque. Il faut décider si le juge a outrepasssé ses pouvoirs en ordonnant que, pour toutes les avances faites au séquestre, le créancier hypothécaire ait priorité sur les autres charges, enregistrées ou non, qui grèvent les biens-fonds hypothéqués.

Les faits sortent de l'ordinaire. A la fin de 1971, College Housing Co-operative Limited (la coopérative) conclut avec College Holdings Incorporated (la société de portefeuille) un contrat par lequel, entre autres choses, Baxter Student Housing Ltd. (Baxter Housing) doit construire, et livrer prêt à habiter, un immeuble de quatre étages, désigné sous le nom de Dalhousie Drive Project. L'édifice comprend 192 appartements destinés à loger des étudiants de l'université du Manitoba. La société de portefeuille en est propriétaire, la coopérative formée d'étudiants est locataire principale et R.C. Baxter Ltd. (R.C. Baxter), gérant. Vers la fin de l'été 1972, la construction étant presque achevée, les premiers locataires s'installent dans l'immeuble. Au cours de l'hiver 1972-1973, des problèmes d'humidité surviennent; ils se reproduisent pendant l'hiver 1973-1974 avec accumulation d'eau, de glace et de moisissure dans certains appartements. La propriétaire et la coopérative consultent des experts qui recommandent pour remédier aux difficultés, des travaux dont le coût est évalué à $135,000. Baxter Housing refuse de consentir que les travaux soient effectués à ses frais. Deux questions cruciales se sont alors posées: 1) qui paiera le coût des travaux? 2) où prendra-t-on l'argent? Quant à la première question, je dois signaler qu'en septembre 1973 la coopérative et la société de portefeuille ont intenté une action contre Baxter Housing et R.C. Baxter: elles y réclament des pany issued a statement of claim against Baxter Housing and R. C. Baxter seeking damages and other relief to which the defendants responded with a counterclaim for $310,440 for balance of construction cost and the defence, in brief, that the project had been completed in accordance with the plans and specifications in a good and workmanlike manner. Those proceedings have not yet been litigated and little progress has been made. The facts material on point (ii) I take to be the following. The Housing Co-operative and the Holding Company are non-profit corporations, without funds. The construction cost of the building, $2,209,790, was to have been provided from the proceeds of a Central Housing and Mortgage Corporation (C.M.H.C.) first mortgage in the principal amount of $1,988,831, all of which has been advanced except for a holdback of $228,897, and from a second mortgage in the principal amount of $220,959, all of which has been advanced. On June 22, 1973, Baxter Housing caused a mechanics' lien to be filed against the property in the amount of $310,440 claimed to be due to it under the contract.

In the summer of 1974, almost a year ago, the plaintiff owner of the property moved before Nitikman J. for an order appointing W. E. Shields or some other fit and proper person as receiver of the balance of the proceeds of the C.M.H.C. mortgage. The notice of motion referred to (i) the dispute between the parties as to the adequacy of the design and construction of the student housing project, (ii) the recommendations of the experts, (iii) the likelihood that if the repairs were not carried out forthwith there was every probability they would not be able to be done before freeze-up, with the result the project would suffer another winter with the moisture problem in the suites with an anticipated loss of goodwill and an increased vacancy rate, (iv) the filing by the defendants of the mechanics' lien and (v) the refusal by C.M.H.C., by reason of the lien, to advance further moneys under the mortgage. Affidavits were filed in support of the motion and the affiants cross-examined, following which Nitikman J. made the order called into question in these proceedings. That order contained the following provision, inserted no doubt in the hope that C.M.H.C., dommages-intérêts et d'autres redressements. Les défenderesses ont répondu par une demande reconventionnelle de $310,440 pour le solde à payer sur le coût de la construction et invoqué comme moyen de défense, en résumé, que le projet avait été réalisé conformément aux plans et devis et selon les règles de l'article. Ces procédures n'ont pas encore été entendues par les tribunaux et elles ne sont guère avancées. A l'égard de la deuxième question les faits pertinents sont, à ce qu'il me semble, les suivants. La coopérative et la société de portefeuille sont des sociétés sans but lucratif et sans actif. Le coût de construction de l'immeuble, soit $2,209,790, devrait être payé avec une première hypothèque de $1,988,831 consentie par la Société centrale d'hypothèques et de logement (SCHL), dont $228,897 n'ont pas encore été versés, et une seconde hypothèque de $220,959 dont le montant a été versé en entier. Le 22 juin 1973, Baxter Housing a fait enregistrer sur les biens-fonds un privilège de constructeur pour un montant de $310,440 dû, selon elle, en vertu du contrat.

A l'été 1974, soit il y a environ un an, la propriétaire demanderesse adressa une requête au juge Nitikman demandant que W. E. Shields ou une autre personne habilitée soit nommé séquestre du solde du prêt hypothécaire consenti par la SCHL. L'avis de requête relate: 1) le litige entre les parties sur la suffisance des plans et de la construction de l'immeuble destiné aux étudiants; 2) les recommandations des experts; 3) le fait que si les réparations ne sont pas effectuées sur le champ, elles ne pourront pas l'être avant le gel et, en conséquence, les appartements subiront de nouveau à l'hiver la même humidité, ce qui entraînera une perte de clientèle et un taux d'inoccupation accru; 4) l'enregistrement du privilège de constructeur par les défenderesses; 5) le refus de la SCHL d'avancer d'autres fonds sur l'hypothèque à cause du privilège. Des déclarations sous serment furent présentées à l'appui de la requête et les déclarants furent contre-interrogés; après quoi, le juge Nitikman rendit l'ordonnance qui fait l'objet du présent litige. Cette ordonnance contient la disposition suivante, introduite sans aucun doute avec l'espoir que la SCHL, ainsi rassurée, versera le montant relying thereon, would advance the holdback moneys notwithstanding the mechanics' lien filed:

2. AND IT IS FURTHER ORDERED AND DECLARED that any monies paid by the said Central Mortgage & Housing Corporation shall upon payment from time to time to the receiver have priority over any and all other charges or encumbrances registered or unregistered affecting the said lands.

Did the learned chambers judge exceed his jurisdiction in making the order? However politic and expedient the appointment of a receiver may have appeared as a means of tapping the only available source of funds and preventing a stalemate, I am of opinion that the judge had no proper ground in law for making the appointment. The appointment was wrong in law because provision 2 above quoted runs contrary to s. 11(1) of The Mechanics' Liens Act of Manitoba, R.S.M. 1970, c. M80, reading:

11(1) The lien created by this Act has priority over all judgments, executions, assignments, attachments, garnishments, and receiving orders, recovered, issued or made after the lien arises, and over all payments or advances made on account of any conveyance or mortgage after notice in writing of the lien to the person making those payments or after registration of the lien as hereinafter provided.

Section 11(1) goes a long way in ensuring that once a lien claimant has protected his rights by filing a lien in accordance with the provisions of the Act, the lien is a paramount legal charge not subject to being defeated or eroded in any manner. See Boake v. Guild[2], and Rand J. in Earl F. Wakefield Co. v. Oil City Petroleums (Leduc) Ltd. et al.[3], at p. 364. Section 59 of The Queen's Bench Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. C280, it is to be observed, empowers the Court to appoint a receiver "in all cases in which it appears to the Court to be just and convenient so to do" and further provides that "any such order may be made either unconditionally or upon such terms and conditions as the Court thinks fit"; but this cannot afford comfort to the owner because s. 11 of The Mechanics' Liens retenu en garantie nonobstant l'enregistrement du privilège de constructeur:

[TRADUCTION] 2. ET IL EST DE PLUS STATUÉ que tous les fonds avancés par ladite Société centrale d'hypothèques et de logement, dès leur versement au séquestre, auront priorité sur toutes les autres charges, enregistrées ou non, grevant lesdits biens-fonds.

Le savant juge en chambre a-t-il outrepassé ses pouvoirs en rendant cette ordonnance? Pour opportune et souhaitable que soit la désignation d'un séquestre comme moyen de puiser à la seule source de financement disponible et d'éviter l'impasse, je suis d'avis que le juge n'avait pas en droit de bons motifs de faire cette nomination. Il a commis une erreur de droit, parce que la clause 2 précitée va à l'encontre du par. (1) de l'art. 11 du Mechanics' Liens Act du Manitoba, R.S.M. 1970, c. M80, qui prévoit:

Le paragraphe (1) de l'art. 11 va très loin pour assurer qu'une fois que le créancier a protégé ses droits en enregistrant un privilège conformément aux dispositions de la Loi, celui-ci devienne une charge prioritaire qui ne saurait être supplantée ou entamée d'aucune façon. Voir Boake v. Guild[2] et le juge Rand dans Earl F. Wakefield Co. c. Oil City Petroleums (Leduc) Ltd. et al.[3], à la p. 364. Il convient de noter que l'art. 59 du Queen's Bench Act, R.S.M. 1970, c. C280, donne à la Cour le pouvoir de nommer un séquestre [TRADUCTION] «dans tous les cas où la Cour estime juste et utile de le faire» et prévoit en outre que [TRADUCTION] «une telle ordonnance peut être rendue soit inconditionnellement soit selon les modalités que la Cour juge appropriées». Act, in terms, gives a lien created by the Act priority over all receiving orders made after the lien arises. The question whether the receiving order here in question is a receiving order of the kind contemplated in s. 11(1) need not detain us because even if this question be resolved in favour of the validity of the appointment, the closing words of the subsection, in clearest language, give a mechanics' lien priority over all payments or advances made on account of any mortgage. One may escape the first part of the subsection only to be impaled on the second part of the subsection and Mr. Houston, counsel for the owner, concedes as much.

In my opinion the inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench is not such as to empower a judge of that Court to make an order negating the unambiguous expression of the legislative will. The effect of the order made in this case was to alter the statutory priorities which a court simply cannot do.

In the Court of Appeal Matas J.A. per curiam said:

> In any event, I am of the opinion that sec. 11(1), supra, cannot be interpreted, under the circumstances before us, so as to frustrate the jurisdiction of Court of Queen's Bench to appoint a receiver with effective power to carry out his mandate. (Montreal Trust Company et al. v. Churchill Forest Industries (Manitoba) Limited, [1971] 4 W.W.R. 542 at p. 546 et seq.) In my view, the order appealed from is not in conflict with The Mechanics' Liens Act, supra, and is in accordance with its intent.

Montreal Trust Company et al. v. Churchill Forest Industries (Manitoba) Limited may well be cited as a paradigm of the exercise of judicial discretion but Chief Justice Freedman, speaking for all his colleagues, was careful to state, p. 547:

> Inherent jurisdiction cannot, of course, be exercised so as to conflict with a statute or Rule. Moreover, because it is a special and extraordinary power, it should be exercised only sparingly and in a clear case.

utile au propriétaire, parce que l'art. 11 du Mechanics' Liens Act, donne, explicitement, priorité à un privilège établi en vertu de la Loi sur toutes ordonnances de séquestre émises après sa création. La question de savoir si l'ordonnance de séquestre en l'espèce en est une de même nature que celle visée au par. (1) de l'art. 11 est sans intérêt parce que, même si la réponse favorisait la validité de la nomination, les derniers mots de l'alinéa donnent, sans équivoque, priorité au privilège de constructeur sur tous versements ou avances à valoir sur un montant payable en vertu d'une hypothèque. On ne peut se soustraite à la première partie de l'alinéa sans se faire enfourcher par la seconde, Me Houston, l'avocat de la propriétaire, en convient.

A mon avis, la compétence inhérente de la Cour du Banc de la Reine n'autorise pas ses juges à rendre une ordonnance qui va à l'encontre de la volonté clairement exprimée du législateur. L'ordonnance rendue en l'occurrence vise à modifier l'ordre des privilèges fixé par la loi, ce qu'un tribunal ne peut simplement pas faire.

Le juge Matas de la Cour d'appel a dit pour elle:

L'arrêt Montreal Trust Company et al v. Churchill Forest Industries (Manitoba) Limited peut fort bien être cité comme illustration du pouvoir discrétionnaire, mais le juge en chef Freedman, parlant au nom de tous ses collègues, y a pris la précaution de dire à la p. 547:

> [TRADUCTION] La compétence inhérente ne peut évidemment pas être exercée de façon à venir en conflit avec une loi ou un règlement. De plus, comme il s'agit d'un pouvoir spécial et extraordinaire, il ne doit s'exercer qu'avec circonspection et dans des cas bien clairs.

The case does not stand for the proposition that the Court has a discretion in the application of a statutory imperative, such as that residing in s. 11(1) of The Mechanics' Liens Act, in circumstances of the nature of those upon which Matas J.A. lays emphasis in the following extracts from his judgment:

> In the case at bar the receiver has been given control of the only money available as a means of breaking the stalemate which has been created by filing of the lien. The objective in having a receiver appointed was not to prevent dissipation of the fund, but to utilize the fund as a sensible and practical way of getting the necessary work done.
> There is ample evidence to support a finding that if plaintiffs are prevented from using the only available funds, and are thus prevented from doing the work, there will be an adverse effect on the building and the financial viability of the project will be in jeopardy. It would be fruitless to require plaintiffs to await the result of mechanics' lien or other court action, which would take place some time in the future while the property deteriorated and the financial viability of the project was being seriously affected.

These would be compelling reasons for the appointment of a receiver in the absence of s. 11(1) but, given that subsection, it would seem to me they are considerations which the Court is not entitled to bring into account. Parenthetically, events have proven, as so often appears to be the case, that peripheral skirmishing is wasteful of time and money and justice is better served by getting ahead with trial of substantial issue in the proceedings. Reference was made by Matas J.A. to the case of Winnipeg Supply & Fuel Co. Ltd. v. Genevieve Mortgage Corp. Ltd.[4] In that case the Court of Appeal for Manitoba held that, on an appeal from a judgment at trial in a mechanics' liens action, where a subcontractor's steel shoring supports for a building were essential to hold the building in place and to avoid serious damage, the cost of continuing supply of the supports and of removal would rank in priority to lien claimants. The priority given to the expenditure for an urgent and necessary purpose for the benefit of others was recognized in that case.

> Il ne manque pas de preuves pour démontrer que si les demanderesses ne peuvent utiliser les seuls fonds disponibles, et pour cette raison ne peuvent exécuter les travaux, cela aura des effets préjudiciables sur l'immeuble et la viabilité financière du projet sera menacée. Il serait vain d'exiger des demanderesses qu'elles attendent le résultat d'une action sur privilège ou d'une autre action, qui sera entendue plus tard, pendant que la propriété se détériore et que la viabilité financière du projet est sérieusement compromise.

Ces raisons commanderaient la nomination d'un séquestre si ce n'était du par. (1) de l'art. 11 dont l'existence empêche, à mon avis, le tribunal de tenir compte de ces facteurs. Entre parenthèses, les événements ont prouvé, comme il arrive souvent, que les débats sur des incidents sont une perte de temps et d'argent et la justice est mieux servie lorsque les tribunaux vont tout de suite au fond du litige. Le juge Matas cite Winnipeg Supply & Fuel Co. Ltd. v. Genevieve Mortgage Corp. Ltd.[4] Il s'agissait d'un privilège de constructeur. Les étais d'acier d'un sous-entrepreneur étaient indispensables pour soutenir le bâtiment et éviter de sérieux dommages. La Cour d'appel du Manitoba a statué, en appel que le coût de la fourniture ininterrompue des étais et de leur enlèvement aurait priorité sur les autres privilèges. La priorité accordée aux dépenses effectuées dans un but urgent et nécessaire, à l'avantage des autres créanciers a été admise.

It is commonplace to appoint a receiver at the instance of a creditor in order to preserve property pending litigation. We have here the novel situation of an owner of property applying for the appointment of a receiver. The res is not the property but a sum of money to which the owner wishes to have recourse for the purpose of effecting improvements to the property. Until the main litigation has been concluded, it will not be known whether the cost of such improvements will fall upon the owner or upon the contractor and in the meantime the effect of the order of Nitikman J. would be to subordinate the lien of the contractor to any advances under the mortgage made by C.M.H.C. to the receiver. The appointment would permit the receiver to borrow and expend moneys which, in the absence of the moisture difficulties and the litigation ensuing by reason thereof, would be payable to the contractor. None of the authorities to which we have been referred touches upon the appointment of a receiver in such circumstances and with such powers.

On nomme couramment un séquestre à la demande d'un créancier pour protéger un bien-fonds durant un litige. Nous sommes ici en face d'une situation différente où la chose visée par la demande de nomination de séquestre n'est pas le bien-fonds mais une somme d'argent dont le propriétaire veut se servir pour effectuer des améliorations au bien-fonds. Tant que le litige principal n'aura pas été réglé, on ne saura pas si le coût de ces améliorations doit être à la charge du propriétaire ou de l'entrepreneur et, dans l'intervalle, l'effet de l'ordonnance du juge Nitikman serait de subordonner le privilège de l'entrepreneur à toutes les avances faites par la SCHL au séquestre sur le montant de l'hypothèque. La nomination du séquestre permettrait d'emprunter et de dépenser des sommes qui, abstraction faite des problèmes d'humidité et du différend qui en découle, devraient être versées à l'entrepreneur. Rien dans la jurisprudence citée ne touche une nomination de séquestre dans de telles circonstances et avec de tels pouvoirs.

Mr. Houston advanced an argument based upon s. 4(1) of The Mechanics' Liens Act which reads in part:

> 4.(1) Unless he signs an express agreement to the contrary, any person who performs any work or service upon or in respect of, . . . a lien for the price of that work, service, . . . upon the . . . building, . . . and the lands occupied thereby or enjoyed therewith, or upon or in respect of which the work or service is performed, . . . limited, however, in amount to the sum justly due to the person entitled to the lien and to the sum justly owing (excepting as herein provided) by the owner; but no such lien exists under this Act for any claim for less than twenty dollars.

Me Houston avance un argument fondé sur le par. (1) de l'art. 4 du Mechanics' Liens Act qui se lit ainsi:

> [TRADUCTION] 4.(1) A moins de convention expresse à l'effet contraire, toute personne qui exécute des travaux ou rend des services sur ou à l'égard, . . . un privilège pour le prix de ces travaux, de ces services . . . sur . . . le bâtiment et les fonds de terre sur lesquels ils sont situés ou qui s'y rattachent, ou sur lesquels ou à l'égard desquels les travaux ont été exécutés et les services rendus, . . . jusqu'à concurrence, toutefois, de la somme véritablement due au détenteur du privilège et de la somme due (sauf disposition contraire) par le propriétaire; mais il n'existe pas, en vertu de la présente Loi, de privilège pour une réclamation inférieure à vingt dollars.

It was contended that the lien of the contractor cannot go beyond the fair value of the work done, and that although the Manitoba Courts have not made an ultimate finding they have implicitly found that no amount is justly due to the lien claimant. I do not think the record before us bears this out. Explicit in the order of Nitikman J. was a finding of a moisture problem affecting the student housing project but there was no finding,

On a soutenu que le privilège de l'entrepreneur ne peut aller au-delà de la juste valeur du travail effectué et que, même si les tribunaux manitobains ne se sont pas prononcés définitivement, ils ont conclu implicitement qu'aucune somme n'est due à celui qui revendique le privilège. Je ne pense pas que le dossier devant nous justifie cette conclusion. L'ordonnance du juge Nitikman conclut à l'existence d'un problème d'humidité dans la résidence express or implicit, in either of the lower Courts as to responsibility for the problem. An order directing payment to a receiver at this time of the holdback fund with C.M.H.C. would be tantamount to a finding in favour of the owner on the major issue not yet litigated. Mr. Houston contends that s. 4(1) limits the right to lien. In my opinion its only effect is to limit the amount which the lienholder can recover. Unless and until the main action has been tried, the amount, if any, justly due to the contractor will not be known. The interlocutory proceeding taken for the appointment of the receiver was not intended to have, and did not have, the effect of making any determination of this outstanding issue.

The appellant contractor submitted that the order of Nitikman J. was by its nature hypothetical and unenforceable in that C.M.H.C. did not appear in the proceedings and was known not to release funds except on assurance of priority and furthermore was not bound or directed by the order to advance funds to the receiver appointed. The effect which I would give to the express statutory provision, namely, s. 11(1) of The Mechanics' Liens Act makes it unnecessary to consider this additional ground of attack upon the validity of the order.

I would allow the appeal, reverse the decision of the Court of Appeal for Manitoba affirming the order of Nitikman J. and direct that the motion be dismissed with costs in this Court and in the Courts below.

Appeal allowed with costs.

d'étudiants, mais il n'y a pas de conclusion, explicite ou implicite, dans aucune des cours d'instance inférieure, sur la responsabilité de cet état de choses. Une ordonnance de paiement à un séquestre, en ce moment, des sommes retenues par la SCHL équivaut à une conclusion en faveur du propriétaire sur la question principale toujours en litige. Me Houston soutient que le par. (1) de l'art. 4 limite le droit au privilège. A mon avis, son seul effet est de limiter le montant que peut recouvrer le détenteur du privilège. Tant que l'action principale ne sera pas jugée, et jusqu'à ce qu'elle le soit, le montant véritablement dû, s'il en est, à l'entrepreneur ne sera pas connu. La procédure interlocutoire pour la nomination du séquestre n'avait pas pour but de trancher cette question en suspens, et elle n'a d'ailleurs pas eu cet effet.

L'entrepreneur appelant a fait valoir que l'ordonnance du juge Nitikman était, de par sa nature, hypothétique et non applicable, parce que la SCHL n'avait pas été mise en cause dans les procédures et qu'on savait qu'elle n'avance pas de fonds sans avoir l'assurance qu'elle a priorité; de plus elle n'est pas tenue ou obligée par l'ordonnance d'avancer des fonds au séquestre désigné. L'effet que j'accorde à la disposition législative expresse, le par. (1) de l'art. 11 du Mechanics' Liens Act, me dispense d'examiner cet argument additionnel avancé pour contester la validité de l'ordonnance.

Je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'infirmer l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel du Manitoba qui confirme l'ordonnance du juge Nitikman, et d'ordonner le rejet de la requête avec dépens dans cette Cour et dans les cours d'instance inférieure.

Pourvoi accueilli avec dépens.

Summary:

The applicant seeks intervenor status in an appeal from a judgment dismissing the appellants' Charter challenge to certain public health orders made by the Provincial Health Officer to combat the COVID-19 pandemic. The orders aimed to reduce the transmission of COVID-19 by prohibiting, among other things, in-person religious gatherings. Held: Application allowed in part and with conditions. The applicant has a broad representative base and the case legitimately engages its interests in the public law issues raised on appeal. Though the applicant shares a common theological conviction and mission with a number of the appellants, certain of its proposed arguments provide a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court without seeking to expand the scope of the appeal beyond the issues raised by the parties.

MARCHAND J.A.:

Introduction

[1] This is an application for intervenor status in an appeal from a judgment of Chief Justice Hinkson indexed at 2021 BCSC 512.

[2] The appellants are churches and their pastors. Two of the three churches identify as Reformed Churches. They appeal the dismissal of their Charter challenge to certain public health orders made by the Provincial Health Officer ("PHO") to combat the COVID-19 pandemic. The orders aimed to reduce the transmission of COVID-19 by prohibiting, among other things, in-person religious gatherings.

[3] The Chief Justice concluded that the appellants had not exhausted an available statutory reconsideration process and so were not entitled to pursue relief under the Judicial Review Procedure Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 241. The Chief Justice went on to find that the orders infringed s. 2 of the Charter but were justified under s. 1. In view of these findings and the fact that the appellants addressed their ss. 7 and 15 Charter issues in a summary way, the Chief Justice considered it was unnecessary to expand the jurisprudence relating to ss. 7 and 15. He therefore made no finding with respect to those sections.

[4] The applicant, the Association for Reformed Political Action (ARPA) Canada ("ARPA Canada"), seeks leave to intervene on public interest grounds. Although ARPA Canada and a number of the appellants belong to the same faith group, ARPA Canada says they bring a different and useful perspective to the issues raised on appeal that will be of assistance to the Court.

[5] The Chief Justice granted ARPA Canada leave to intervene on specified issues in the proceedings before him. Trial courts in Ontario and Manitoba have also granted ARPA Canada leave to intervene in similar proceedings in those jurisdictions.

[6] The respondents oppose ARPA Canada's application. They argue ARPA Canada's perspective is "entirely aligned with, and duplicative of, that of the appellants." They characterize ARPA Canada's proposed intervention as a prohibited form of "me too" intervention.

[7] The appellants take no position on ARPA Canada's application, but, if ARPA Canada is granted leave to intervene, the appellants seek an extension of time so that their reply factum can address the issues raised by ARPA Canada.

Legal Framework

[8] The legal principles on ARPA Canada's application are not in dispute.

[9] Rule 36 of the Court of Appeal Rules governs applications for intervenor status. It provides, in part, as follows:

> 36(1) Any person interested in an appeal may apply to a justice for leave to intervene on any terms and conditions that the justice may determine.
> (3) In any order granting leave to intervene, the justice
>
> (b) may make provisions as to additional disbursements incurred by the appellant or any respondent as a result of the intervention.
>
>
> (5) Unless a justice otherwise orders, an intervenor
> (a) must not file a factum that exceeds 20 pages,

2022 BCCA 66 (CanLII)

(b) must include in the factum only those submissions that pertain to the facts and issues included in the factums of the parties, and

(c) is not to present oral argument.

[10] There are two routes to intervenor status: (1) the applicant has a direct interest in the matter; or (2) the applicant has a public interest in the public law issue in question and brings a different and useful perspective to the issue that will be of assistance to the Court: R. v. Watson and Spratt, 2006 BCCA 234 at para. 3 (Chambers); Carter v. Canada, 2012 BCCA 502 at paras. 12–13 (Chambers). ARPA Canada seeks leave only on the public interest ground.

[11] In British Columbia Civil Liberties Association v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 BCCA 282 at para. 14 (Chambers), Justice Garson summarized the factors to consider when an applicant seeks intervenor status on the public interest ground:

a) Does the proposed intervenor have a broad representative base?

b) Does the case legitimately engage the proposed intervenor's interests in the public law issue raised on appeal?

c) Does the proposed intervenor have a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court in the resolution of the issues?

d) Does the proposed intervenor seek to expand the scope of the appeal by raising issues not raised by the parties?

[12] When hearing an application to intervene on the public interest ground, courts are not concerned with the fairness to or the interests of the intervenor, but rather with ensuring important points are not overlooked: A.B. v. C.D., 2019 BCCA 297 at para. 33 (Chambers); Equustek Solutions Inc. v. Google Inc., 2014 BCCA 448 at para. 8 (Chambers). Intervenors must therefore show that it is in the public interest (or the Court's interest) that they be heard: Equustek at para. 8.

[13] When Charter issues are raised for the first time, the courts are permitted to take a more generous approach in order to gain "the assistance of argument from all segments of the community": Canadian Labour Congress v. Bhindi and London

(1985), 61 B.C.L.R. 85 at 97, 1985 CanLII 384 (C.A.); Dickson v. Vuntut Gwitchin First Nation, 2021 YKCA 3 at para. 10 (Chambers).

[14] However, an intervenor in a Charter application is prohibited from raising entirely new issues, including making submissions on Charter grounds not raised by the parties: Federation of Law Societies of Canada v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 BCSC 1270 at para. 83, aff'd 2013 BCCA 147, rev'd in part on other grounds 2015 SCC 7.

[15] The role of intervenors is not to support the position of a party, but rather to make principled submissions on pertinent points of law. Although an intervenor's submissions may ultimately support one party's position, that is not their purpose: Friedmann v. MacGarvie, 2012 BCCA 109 at para. 28 (Chambers).

[16] An intervenor whose interests appear to align with one of the parties may still be granted intervenor status where the intervenor provides a unique perspective that might assist the court in resolving the appeal: Araya v. Nevsun Resources Ltd., 2017 BCCA 402 at para. 18 (Chambers). In such cases, the concern for partiality may be mitigated by a clear order limiting the scope of the intervenor's participation on appeal: Araya at para. 18.

[17] Typically, a court grants the right to intervene on discrete issues only: Janzen v. British Columbia (Attorney General) (1993), 38 B.C.A.C. 268 at 272, 1993 CanLII 1332 (Chambers), aff'd (1994), 45 B.C.A.C. 242, 1994 CanLII 2662, leave to appeal to SCC ref'd, 24213 (3 November 1994).

[18] Finally, an intervenor before the Supreme Court of British Columbia does not automatically gain intervenor status before this Court. Rather, the test must be met at each level: Ross River Dena Council v. Government of Yukon, 2012 YKCA 14 at paras. 11–12, leave to appeal to SCC ref'd, 35236 (19 September 2013); Cambie Surgeries Corporation v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2021 BCCA 138 at para. 4 (Chambers).

Who is ARPA Canada?

[19] ARPA Canada is a federally incorporated not-for-profit organization that advocates for Reformed Christians in legal and political spheres. It has been active in Canada since the 1970s. None of its members are appellants and none of the appellants has any power to direct ARPA Canada in this or any other legal proceeding.

[20] ARPA Canada says it has two missions: (a) educating, equipping, and assisting members of Canada's Reformed churches and the broader Christian community as they seek to winsomely participate in politics and public life; and (b) bringing a Reformed Christian perspective to civil authorities in Canada, including the courts.

[21] ARPA Canada is an experienced intervenor. They have been granted intervenor status in 18 previous cases, including cases involving constitutional issues relating to religious matters: see, for example, Trinity Western University v. The Law Society of British Columbia, 2016 BCCA 423; A.B. v. C.D., 2020 BCCA 11.

Proposed Submissions

[22] Broadly, ARPA Canada proposes to submit that:

1. Institutional pluralism is a foundational Charter principle that corresponds with the Reformed Christian concept of sphere sovereignty. Under both concepts, government authority is limited by other sources of authority in a citizen's life. State justification for limits on fundamental freedoms under s. 1 therefore requires consideration of the importance of, and deference to, non-state institutions.

2. Although the respondents have admitted infringements of s. 2 of the Charter, a full appraisal of the nature and severity of those infringements is necessary to ground the s. 1 analysis. The prohibitions of the public health orders strike at the core of the intersection of freedom of religion, freedom of expression and freedom of assembly. The s. 1 analysis must give due weight to the impact of each infringement as well as the intersectional impact of the infringements collectively.

3. Section 15 of the Charter protects religious equality. Under s. 15, the correct comparison is between particular activities performed for a religious purpose that were prohibited and activities of a similar functional nature performed for a non-religious purpose that were not. Contrary to s. 15, the prohibitions at issue discriminated against all religious believers as compared to non-believers on the basis of religion. If this Court finds the Chief Justice erred in failing to find the orders breached s. 15, ARPA Canada will restrict its submissions to the legal implications of the breach.

4. The orders cannot be saved under s. 1 of the Charter because they were neither minimally impairing nor proportionate. In particular, the orders prohibited constitutionally protected activities instead of restricting them as was done for non-constitutionally protected activities with a similar risk profile. Particularly in view of the broad principle of respect for institutional pluralism, the prohibition against constitutionally protected activities was overbroad and disproportionate to the risk of transmission.

Discussion

[23] The respondents accept, and I agree, that ARPA Canada has a broad representative base and the case legitimately engages ARPA Canada's interests in the public law issues raised on appeal. I must decide only whether ARPA Canada has a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court and whether they seek to expand the scope of the appeal beyond the issues raised by the parties.

[24] I have reviewed the appellants' factum. It is focused on the specifics of the orders, the record before the PHO, the impact of the orders on the appellants and the findings of the Chief Justice. In my respectful view, certain aspects of ARPA Canada's proposed submissions rise well above these specific details of the case at hand and consider broader and important constitutional issues not addressed by the appellants.

[25] Though ARPA Canada shares a common theological conviction and mission with certain of the appellants, there is no hint that ARPA Canada is strategizing with them to skirt page limits on factums and make arguments that the appellants should make for themselves.

[26] I am satisfied that certain of ARPA Canada's proposed arguments are in the "Goldilocks" zone of providing a distinct and helpful perspective on the issues raised by the parties without introducing entirely new issues or hijacking the proceedings to serve their own ends.

[27] So, which of ARPA Canada's arguments lie within the "Goldilocks" zone? In my view, the Court stands to benefit from ARPA Canada's arguments regarding institutional pluralism and the need to consider the intersectional impact of the s. 2 Charter breaches. Respectfully, the balance of ARPA Canada's arguments (on s. 15, minimal impairment and proportionality) are duplicative of the arguments in the appellants' factum or represent arguments the appellants are well-placed to make during oral submissions.

Disposition

[28] I grant ARPA Canada's application for leave to intervene. ARPA Canada may only make submissions regarding institutional pluralism and the need to consider the intersectional impact of the s. 2 Charter breaches as summarized at subparas. 23(a) and (b) of its written submission filed on December 22, 2021. Its factum must not exceed ten pages and must be filed and served on the parties on or before March 1, 2022.

[29] ARPA Canada may not duplicate arguments made by the appellants and may not adduce new evidence or otherwise supplement the appeal record.

[30] I grant the respondents leave to file a factum in response to ARPA Canada's factum. The respondents' response factum must not exceed ten pages and must be filed and served on the appellants and intervenor by March 11, 2022.

[31] Given the obvious alignment of interests, I do not grant the appellants' request for an extension of time to file their reply factum. To be clear, the appellants' reply factum is due in accordance with the usual timelines and must be confined to matters raised in the respondents' factum.

[32] I leave the question of whether ARPA Canada may make oral submissions to the division hearing the appeal.

Appellant attacked the validity of s. 251(4), (5) and (6) of the Criminal Code relating to abortion on the ground that they contravened the life and security and the equality rights of the foetus, as a person, protected by ss. 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Appellant's standing had been found on the basis that he was seeking a declaration that legislation is invalid, that there was a serious issue as to its invalidity, that he had a genuine interest as a citizen in the validity of the legislation and that there was no other reasonable and effective manner in which the issue could be brought before the Court.

The Court of Queen's Bench found s. 251(4), (5) and (6) did not violate the Charter as a foetus was not protected by either s. 7 or s. 15 of the Charter and also held that s. 1 of the Canadian Bill of Rights did not give the courts the right to assess the substantive content or wisdom of legislation. The Court of Appeal concluded that neither s. 7 nor s. 15 of the Charter applied to a foetus. The constitutional questions stated in this Court queried: (1) if a foetus had the right to life as guaranteed by s. 7 of the Charter; (2) if so, whether s. 251(4), (5) and (6) of the Code violated the principles of fundamental justice contrary to s. 7 of the Charter; (3) whether a foetus had the right to equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination because of age or mental or physical disability as guaranteed by s. 15 of the Charter; (4) if so, whether s. 251(4), (5) and (6) of the Code violated s. 15; and (5) if questions (2) and (4) were answered affirmatively, whether s. 251(4), (5) and (6) of the Code were justified by s. 1 of the Charter. All of s. 251, however, was struck down subsequent to the Court of Appeal's decision but before the appeal reached this Court as a result of this Court's decision in R. v. Morgentaler (No. 2).

A serious issue existed at the commencement of the appeal as to whether the appeal was moot. Questions also existed as to whether the appellant had lost his standing and, indeed, whether the matter was justiciable. These issues were addressed as a preliminary matter and decision on them was reserved. The Court then heard argument on the merits of the appeal so that the whole appeal could be decided without recalling the parties for argument should it decide that the appeal should proceed notwithstanding the preliminary issues.

tes — La qualité pour agir reconnue initialement subsiste-t-elle? — L'article 24(1) de la Charte et l'art. 52(1) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 peuvent-ils fonder la qualité pour agir?

L'appelant conteste la validité des par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code criminel relatives à l'avortement pour le motif qu'ils enfreignent les droits à la vie, à la sécurité et à l'égalité garantis au fœtus, en tant que personne, par les art. 7 et 15 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. La qualité pour agir avait été reconnue à l'appelant parce qu'il demandait un jugement déclarant une loi invalide, parce que la question de la validité de la loi se posait sérieusement, parce qu'il avait, à titre de citoyen, un intérêt véritable quant à la validité de la loi et parce qu'il n'y avait pas d'autre manière raisonnable et efficace de soumettre la question à la Cour.

La Cour du Banc de la Reine a conclu que les par. 251(4), (5) et (6) ne violent pas la Charte puisque le fœtus n'est protégé ni par son art. 7 ni par son art. 15 et, en outre, que l'article premier de la Déclaration canadienne des droits ne permet pas aux tribunaux de juger de la teneur ou de la sagesse des lois. La Cour d'appel a conclu que ni l'art. 7, ni l'art. 15 de la Charte ne s'appliquent au fœtus. Les questions constitutionnelles en cette Cour visent à déterminer: (1) si le fœtus a le droit à la vie que garantit l'art. 7 de la Charte; (2) dans l'affirmative, si les par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code violent les principes de justice fondamentale contrairement à l'art. 7 de la Charte; (3) si le fœtus a le droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi, indépendamment de toute discrimination en raison de l'âge ou de déficiences mentales ou physiques, selon l'art. 15 de la Charte; (4) dans l'affirmative, si les par. 251(4), (5), (6) du Code violent l'art. 15; et (5) dans le cas d'une réponse affirmative aux questions (2) et (4), si les par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code sont justifiés par l'article premier de la Charte. Toutefois, après l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel mais avant l'audition du pourvoi en cette Cour, l'ensemble de l'art. 251 a été déclaré inopérant par l'arrêt R. c. Morgentaler (n° 2).

Dès le début du pourvoi, la question du caractère théorique du pourvoi se posait sérieusement. En outre, il paraissait douteux que le demandeur ait encore qualité pour agir et même que la question puisse être réglée par voie de justice. Ces points ont été débattus à titre de questions préliminaires et ont été mis en délibéré. La Cour a alors entendu le pourvoi au fond, de manière à être en mesure de statuer sur la totalité du pourvoi sans devoir rappeler les parties pour plaider si, malgré les questions préliminaires, elle décidait que le pourvoi devait suivre son cours.

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

The appeal is moot and the Court should not exercise its discretion to hear it. Moreover, appellant no longer has standing to pursue the appeal as the circumstances upon which his standing was originally premised have disappeared.

The doctrine of mootness is part of a general policy that a court may decline to decide a case which raises merely a hypothetical or abstract question. An appeal is moot when a decision will not have the effect of resolving some controversy affecting or potentially affecting the rights of the parties. Such a live controversy must be present not only when the action or proceeding is commenced but also when the court is called upon to reach a decision. The general policy is enforced in moot cases unless the court exercises its discretion to depart from it.

The approach with respect to mootness involves a two-step analysis. It is first necessary to determine whether the requisite tangible and concrete dispute has disappeared rendering the issues academic. If so, it is then necessary to decide if the court should exercise its discretion to hear the case. (In the interest of clarity, a case is moot if it does not present a concrete controversy even though a court may elect to address the moot issue.)

This appeal is moot as there is no longer a concrete legal dispute. The live controversy underlying this appeal—the challenge to the constitutionality of s. 251(4), (5) and (6) of the Code—disappeared when s. 251 was struck down in R. v. Morgentaler (No. 2). None of the relief sought in the statement of claim was relevant. Three of the five constitutional questions that were set explicitly concerned s. 251 and were no longer applicable. The remaining two questions addressed the scope of ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter and were not severable from the context of the original challenge to s. 251.

A constitutional question cannot bind this Court and may not be used to transform an appeal into a reference. Constitutional questions are stated to define with precision the constitutional points at issue, not to introduce new issues, and accordingly, cannot be used as an independent basis for supporting an otherwise moot appeal.

The second stage in the analysis requires that a court consider whether it should exercise its discretion to decide the merits of the case, despite the absence of a live controversy. Courts may be guided in the exercise of Arrêt: Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Le pourvoi est théorique et la Cour ne devrait pas exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire pour le trancher au fond. De plus, l'appelant n'a plus qualité pour continuer le pourvoi puisque les circonstances qui fondaient initialement la qualité pour agir ont disparu.

La doctrine relative au caractère théorique relève du principe général en vertu duquel un tribunal peut refuser de trancher une affaire qui ne soulève qu'une question hypothétique ou abstraite. Un appel est théorique lorsque la décision du tribunal n'aura pas pour effet de résoudre un litige qui a, ou peut avoir, des conséquences sur les droits des parties. Un litige actuel doit exister non seulement quand l'action ou les procédures sont engagées, mais aussi au moment où le tribunal doit rendre une décision. Le principe général s'applique aux litiges devenus théoriques à moins que le tribunal n'exerce son pouvoir discrétionnaire de ne pas l'appliquer.

La démarche à suivre pour déterminer si le litige est théorique comporte une analyse en deux temps. En premier, il faut se demander si le différend concret et tangible a disparu et si la question est devenue purement théorique. Si c'est le cas, le tribunal décide alors s'il doit exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire et entendre l'affaire. (Pour être précis, une affaire est «théorique» si elle ne présente pas de litige concret même si le tribunal choisit de trancher la question théorique.)

Le présent pourvoi est théorique puisqu'il n'y a plus de différend juridique concret. Le litige qui fondait le présent pourvoi—la contestation de la constitutionnalité des par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code—a disparu quand la Cour a déclaré cet article inopérant dans R. c. Morgentaler (n° 2). Aucun des redressements demandés dans la déclaration n'est pertinent. Trois des cinq questions constitutionnelles énoncées visent expressément l'art. 251 et n'ont plus d'objet. Les deux autres ont trait à la portée des droits garantis par les art. 7 et 15 de la Charte et ne peuvent être traitées séparément de la contestation initiale de l'art. 251.

Une question constitutionnelle ne lie pas la Cour et ne peut pas servir non plus à transformer un pourvoi en renvoi. Les questions constitutionnelles visent à définir avec précision les points litigieux dans une affaire constitutionnelle et non à introduire de nouvelles questions. Les questions ne peuvent donc servir de fondement distinct à un pourvoi qui est par ailleurs théorique.

La deuxième partie de l'analyse consiste pour le tribunal à déterminer s'il devrait exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire pour trancher l'affaire au fond, même en l'absence de litige actuel. Dans l'exercice de ce pouvoir their discretion by considering the underlying rationale of the mootness doctrine.

The first rationale for the policy with respect to mootness in that a court's competence to resolve legal disputes is rooted in the adversary system. A full adversarial context, in which both parties have a full stake in the outcome, is fundamental to our legal system. The second is based on the concern for judicial economy which requires that a court examine the circumstances of a case to determine if it is worthwhile to allocate scarce judicial resources to resolve the moot issue. The third underlying rationale of the mootness doctrine is the need for courts to be sensitive to the effectiveness or efficacy of judicial intervention and demonstrate a measure of awareness of the judiciary's role in our political framework. The Court, in exercising its discretion in an appeal which is moot, should consider the extent to which each of these three basic factors is present. The process is not mechanical. The principles may not all support the same conclusion and the presence of one or two of the factors may be overborne by the absence of the third, and vice versa.

The Court should decline to exercise its discretion to decide this appeal on its merits because of concerns for judicial economy and for the Court's role in the law-making process. The absence of an adversarial relationship was of little concern: the appeal was argued as fully as if it were not moot.

With respect to judicial economy, none of the factors justifying the application of judicial resources applied. The decision would not have practical side effects on the rights of the parties. The case was not one that was capable of repetition, yet evasive of review: it will almost certainly be brought before the Court within a specific legislative context or possibly in review of specific governmental action. An abstract pronouncement on foetal rights here would not necessarily obviate future repetitious litigation. It was not in the public interest, notwithstanding the great public importance of the question involved, to address the merits in order to settle the state of the law. A decision as to whether ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter protect the rights of the foetus is not in the public interest due to the potential uncertainty that could result from such a decision absent a legislative context.

A proper awareness of the Court's law-making function dictated against the Court's exercising its discretion to decide this appeal. The question posed here was not discrétionnaire, les tribunaux peuvent être guidés par l'étude des assises mêmes de la doctrine du caractère théorique.

La première raison d'être de la politique en matière de causes théoriques tient à ce que la capacité des tribunaux de trancher des litiges a sa source dans le système contradictoire. Le contexte réellement contradictoire, dans lequel les deux parties ont un intérêt dans l'issue du litige, est un élément fondamental de notre système juridique. La deuxième raison tient à l'économie des ressources judiciaires qui oblige les tribunaux à se demander si, compte tenu des circonstances d'une affaire, il y a lieu de consacrer des ressources judiciaires limitées à la solution d'un litige devenu théorique. La troisième raison d'être de la doctrine tient à la nécessité pour les tribunaux d'être sensibles à l'efficacité et à l'efficience de l'intervention judiciaire et d'être conscients de leur fonction juridictionnelle dans notre structure politique. En exerçant son pouvoir discrétionnaire à l'égard d'un pourvoi théorique, la Cour doit tenir compte de chacune de ces trois principales raisons d'être. Il ne s'agit pas d'un processus mécanique. Il se peut que les principes ne tendent pas tous vers la même conclusion. L'absence d'un facteur peut prévaloir malgré la présence de l'un ou des deux autres, ou inversement.

La Cour devrait refuser d'exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire de trancher le pourvoi au fond par souci d'économie des ressources judiciaires et en raison de sa fonction véritable dans l'élaboration du droit. L'absence de rapport contradictoire ne fait pas problème: le pourvoi a été plaidé aussi pleinement que s'il n'avait pas été théorique.

Aucun des facteurs qui justifieraient l'utilisation de ressources judiciaires ne s'applique. La décision n'aurait pas d'effets accessoires pratiques sur les droits des parties. Il ne s'agit pas d'une situation susceptible à la fois de se répéter et de ne jamais être soumise aux tribunaux. Il est en effet très probable que la question sera soumise à cette Cour à propos d'une loi précise ou peut-être à propos d'un acte gouvernemental précis. Une décision dans l'abstrait sur les droits du fœtus n'éliminerait pas nécessairement des litiges répétés à l'avenir. Malgré la grande importance de la question, il n'est pas dans l'intérêt public de statuer sur le fond pour déterminer l'état du droit. Une décision sur la question de savoir si les art. 7 et 15 de la Charte protègent les droits du fœtus n'est pas dans l'intérêt public vu l'état d'incertitude qui pourrait résulter d'une telle décision en dehors de tout contexte législatif.

La considération de la fonction véritable de la Cour dans l'élaboration du droit est une autre raison de refuser d'exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire pour tran-

the question raised in the original action. Indeed, what was sought—a Charter interpretation in the absence of legislation or other governmental action bringing it into play—would turn this appeal into a private reference. The Court, if it were to exercise its discretion, would intrude on the right of the executive to order a reference and pre-empt a possible decision of Parliament by dictating the form of legislation it should enact. To do so would be a marked departure from the Court's traditional role.

The appellant also lacked standing to pursue this appeal given the fact that the original basis for his standing no longer existed. Two significant changes in the nature of this action occurred since standing was granted by this Court in 1981. Firstly, the claim is now premised primarily upon an alleged right of a foetus to life and equality pursuant to ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. Secondly, the legislative context of original claim disappeared when s. 251 of the Code was struck down. Standing could not be based on s. 24(1) of the Charter for an infringement or denial of a person's own Charter-based right was required. Here, the rights allegedly violated were those of a foetus. Standing could not be based on s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 as this is restricted to litigants challenging a law or governmental action pursuant to power granted by law.

cher le pourvoi au fond. La question soumise à cette Cour n'est plus celle qui était l'objet de l'action initiale. En réalité, ce qu'on demande—une interprétation de la Charte en l'absence de texte législatif ou d'acte gouvernemental la faisant entrer en jeu—transformerait le pourvoi en renvoi d'initiative privée. Si elle exerçait son pouvoir discrétionnaire dans un tel cas, la Cour empiéterait sur le droit du pouvoir exécutif d'ordonner un renvoi et pourrait empêcher la législateur de prendre une décision, en lui dictant les termes des dispositions législatives à adopter. Ce serait une dérogation marquée au rôle traditionnel de la Cour.

De plus, l'appelant n'a plus qualité pour continuer le pourvoi puisque le fondement initial de sa qualité pour agir n'existe plus. Il s'est produit deux changements importants dans la nature de l'action en l'espèce depuis que la Cour a reconnu à l'appelant qualité pour agir, en 1981. Premièrement, la demande actuelle se fonde principalement sur l'allégation que le droit du fœtus à la vie et à l'égalité est garanti par les art. 7 et 15 de la Charte. Deuxièmement, en déclarant l'art. 251 du Code inopérant, la Cour a fait disparaître le contexte législatif de la demande. Il n'est pas possible d'invoquer en l'espèce le par. 24(1) comme fondement de la qualité pour agir puisqu'il faut qu'il y ait violation ou négation d'un droit garanti par la Charte à la personne qui l'invoque. En l'espèce, les droits qui auraient été violés sont ceux du fœtus. La qualité pour agir ne peut être accordée en vertu du par. 52(1) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 parce qu'une action fondée sur le par. 52(1) doit se limiter à la contestation d'une loi ou d'un acte gouvernemental pris en vertu d'un pouvoir conféré par la loi.

SOPINKA J.—This appeal by leave of this Court is from the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal, [1987] 4 W.W.R. 385, which affirmed the judgment at trial of Matheson J. of the Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench, [1984] 1 W.W.R. 15, dismissing the action of the plaintiff (appellant in this Court). In the courts below, the plaintiff attacked the validity of subss. (4), (5) and (6) of s. 251 of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, relating to abortion on the ground that they contravened protected rights of the foetus. Subsequent to the decision of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal but by the time the appeal reached this Court, s. 251, including the subsections under attack in this action, had been struck down in R. v. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 30 (hereinafter R. v. Morgentaler (No. 2)).

From this state of the proceedings it was apparent at the commencement of this appeal that a serious issue existed as to whether the appeal was moot. As well, it appeared questionable whether the appellant had lost his standing and, indeed, whether the matter was justiciable. The Court therefore called upon counsel to address these issues as a preliminary matter. Upon completion of these submissions, we reserved decision on these issues and heard the argument of the merits of the LE JUGE SOPINKA—Le présent pourvoi, sur autorisation de cette Cour, attaque un arrêt de la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan, [1987] 4 W.W.R. 385, confirmant le jugement du juge Matheson de la Cour du Banc de la Reine de la Saskatchewan, [1984] 1 W.W.R. 15, qui avait rejeté l'action du demandeur (l'appelant en cette Cour). Devant les cours d'instance inférieure, le demandeur a contesté la validité des par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, chap. C-34, relatifs à l'avortement pour le motif qu'ils enfreignent des droits garantis au fœtus. Après l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan et avant l'audition du présent pourvoi en cette Cour, l'art. 251, et donc les paragraphes contestés en l'espèce, a été déclaré inopérant par l'arrêt R. c. Morgentaler, [1988] 1 R.C.S. 30 (ci-après R. c. Morgentaler (n° 2)).

Vu l'évolution de la procédure, il était évident dès le début du pourvoi que la question de son caractère théorique se posait sérieusement. En outre, il paraissait douteux que le demandeur ait encore qualité pour agir et même que la question puisse être réglée par voie de justice. La Cour a donc demandé aux avocats de débattre ces points à titre de questions préliminaires. Après leurs plaidoiries, nous avons mis ces questions en délibéré et nous avons entendu le pourvoi au fond, de manière appeal so that we could dispose of the whole appeal without recalling the parties for argument should we decide that, notwithstanding the preliminary issues, the appeal should proceed.

In view of the conclusion that I have reached, it is necessary to deal with the issues of mootness and standing only. Since it is a change in the nature of these proceedings which gives rise to these issues, a review of the history of the action is necessary.

History of the Action

Mr. Borowski commenced an action in the Court of Queen's Bench of Saskatchewan by filing a statement of claim on September 5, 1978, which asked for the following relief:

(a) An Order of this Honourable Court declaring section 251, subsections (4), (5) and (6) of the Criminal Code invalid and inoperative;
(b) An Order of this Honourable Court declaring that the provisions of all Acts of the Parliament of Canada, and all legal instruments purporting to authorize the expenditure of public moneys for any of the purposes described in section 251, subsections (4), (5) and (6) are invalid and inoperative, and the outlay of such moneys is ultra vires and unlawful;
(c) A permanent injunction enjoining the Minister of Finance, his servants and agents, from allocating, disbursing or in any way providing public moneys out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund for the establishment or maintenance of therapeutic abortion committees, for the performance of abortions or in support of any act or object relating to the abortion and destruction of individual human foetuses;
(d) The costs of this action; and
(e) Such further and other relief as to this Honourable Court seems just and expedient.

Prior to trial, a motion was brought by the respondents questioning the jurisdiction of the Court of Queen's Bench. That motion culminated in an appeal to this Court in which a central issue was Mr. Borowski's standing to bring the action. The resulting decision of the majority of this Court, reported in Minister of Justice of Canada v. Borowski, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 575, was that Mr. Borowski had standing to attack the provisions of the Code referred to in his statement of claim.

à être en mesure de statuer sur la totalité du pourvoi sans devoir rappeler les parties pour plaider si, malgré les questions préliminaires, nous décidions que le pourvoi devait suivre son cours.

Compte tenu de la conclusion à laquelle je suis arrivé, il suffit de traiter des questions du caractère théorique et de la qualité pour agir. Puisque celles-ci résultent d'un changement dans la nature des procédures, il faut faire l'historique de l'action.

Historique de l'action

Monsieur Borowski a intenté une action devant la Cour du Banc de la Reine de la Saskatchewan en produisant, le 5 septembre 1978, une déclaration pour demander les redressements suivants:

a) Une ordonnance de la Cour déclarant que les par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code criminel sont nuls et inopérants;
b) Une ordonnance de la Cour déclarant que toutes les dispositions des lois du Parlement du Canada et tous les textes juridiques qui visent à autoriser l'utilisation de fonds publics pour les objets mentionnés aux par. 251(4), (5) et (6) sont nuls et inopérants et que le versement de ces sommes est ultra vires et illégal;
c) Une injonction permanente interdisant au ministre des Finances, ses agents et ses préposés, d'attribuer, de débourser ou de rendre autrement disponible quelque somme que ce soit sur le Fonds du revenu consolidé pour l'établissement ou le maintien de comités d'avortement thérapeutique, pour la pratique d'avortements ou pour tout acte ou objet afférent à l'avortement et à la destruction de fœtus humains;
d) Les dépens de la présente action;
e) Tout autre redressement que la Cour estime juste et approprié.

Avant l'audition de l'affaire, les intimés ont contesté par requête la compétence de la Cour du Banc de la Reine. Cette requête a abouti à un pourvoi en cette Cour qui portait principalement sur la qualité pour agir de M. Borowski. Selon la décision de cette Cour à la majorité, publiée sous l'intitulé Ministre de la Justice du Canada c. Borowski, [1981] 2 R.C.S. 575, M. Borowski avait qualité pour contester les dispositions du Code

Martland J., speaking for the majority, stated, at p. 598:

> I interpret these cases as deciding that to establish status as a plaintiff in a suit seeking a declaration that legislation is invalid, if there is a serious issue as to its invalidity, a person need only to show that he is affected by it directly or that he has a genuine interest as a citizen in the validity of the legislation and that there is no other reasonable and effective manner in which the issue may be brought before the Court. In my opinion, the respondent has met this test and should be permitted to proceed with his action.

Laskin C.J., with whom Lamer J. concurred, would have denied standing on the basis that Mr. Borowski was not a person affected by the legislation and that there were others, such as doctors and hospitals, who might be so affected. The Chief Justice concluded, therefore, that Mr. Borowski did not have any judicially cognizable interest in the matter and that the Court ought to exercise its discretion to deny standing.

An amended statement of claim was filed on April 18, 1983, in which the original claims based on an alleged violation of the Canadian Bill of Rights, R.S.C. 1970, App. III, were repeated. Allegations based upon the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which had been proclaimed on April 17, 1982, were added. The prayer for relief claimed:

> (a) An Order of this Honourable Court declaring Subsections (4), (5) and (6) of Section 251 of the Criminal Code to be ultra vires, unconstitutional, invalid, inoperative and of no force or effect;
> (b) An Order of this Honourable Court declaring that the provisions of all Acts of the Parliament of Canada, and all legal instruments purporting to authorize the expenditure of public moneys for any of the purposes described in Subsections (4), (5) and (6) of Section 251 of the Criminal Code are ultra vires, inoperative, unconstitutional, invalid and of no force or effect and the outlay of such moneys is unlawful:
> (c) The costs of this action; and
> (d) Such further and other relief as to this Honourable Court seems just.

The Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench dismissed Mr. Borowski's claim relating to an alleged violation of s. 1 of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

mentionnées dans sa déclaration. Le juge Martland dit au nom de la majorité, à la p. 598:

> Selon mon interprétation, ces arrêts décident que pour établir l'intérêt pour agir à titre de demandeur dans une poursuite visant à déclarer qu'une loi est invalide, si cette question se pose sérieusement, il suffit qu'une personne démontre qu'elle est directement touchée ou qu'elle a, à titre de citoyen, un intérêt véritable quant à la validité de la loi, et qu'il n'y a pas d'autre manière raisonnable et efficace de soumettre la question à la cour. À mon avis, l'intimé répond à ce critère et devrait être autorisé à poursuivre son action.

Le juge en chef Laskin, avec l'appui du juge Lamer, aurait statué que M. Borowski n'avait pas qualité pour agir parce qu'il n'était pas touché par la loi alors que d'autres, comme les médecins et les hôpitaux, pouvaient l'être. Le Juge en chef a conclu qu'en conséquence M. Borowski n'avait pas un intérêt judiciaire suffisant dans la question et que la Cour devrait exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire pour lui nier la qualité pour agir.

Le 18 avril 1983, le demandeur a produit une déclaration amendée par laquelle il renouvelait les allégations de violation de la Déclaration canadienne des droits, S.R.C. 1970, app. III. Il ajoutait des allégations de violation de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, qui était entrée en vigueur le 17 avril 1982. Il demandait les redressements suivants:

> a) Une ordonnance de la Cour déclarant que les par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code criminel sont ultra vires, inconstitutionnels, nuls et inopérants;
>
> b) Une ordonnance de la Cour déclarant que toutes les dispositions des lois du Parlement du Canada et tous les textes juridiques qui visent à autoriser l'utilisation de fonds publics pour les objets mentionnés aux par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code criminel sont ultra vires, inconstitutionnels, nuls et inopérants et que le versement de ces sommes est illégal;
> c) Les dépens de la présente action;

> d) Tout autre redressement que la Cour estime juste et approprié.

La Cour du Banc de la Reine de la Saskatchewan a rejeté les arguments de M. Borowski fondés sur l'article premier de la Déclaration canadienne

Matheson J. held that both Morgentaler v. The Queen, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 616 (hereinafter Morgentaler v. The Queen (No. 1)) and Dehler v. Ottawa Civic Hospital (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 677 (C.A.) (leave to appeal refused [1981] 1 S.C.R. viii) concluded that the Canadian Bill of Rights did not give the courts the right to assess the substantive content or wisdom of legislation.

Matheson J. noted that Mr. Borowski's principal argument under the Charter was that the foetus is a person and therefore should be afforded the protection of s. 7 of the Charter. It was held, however, that s. 251(4), (5), and (6) did not violate the Charter as a foetus is not included in "everyone" so as to trigger the application of any s. 7 rights.

On appeal Mr. Borowski did not pursue his claim that government funding of abortions was unlawful. The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal dismissed Mr. Borowski's appeal by concluding that neither s. 7 nor s. 15 (which had come into effect on April 17, 1985, prior to the hearing before the Court of Appeal) applied to a foetus. Speaking for the court, Gerwing J.A. examined the historical treatment of the foetus as well as the language and legislative history of s. 7 and concluded that the guarantees of s. 7 were not intended to extend to the unborn. As well, the foetus was held not to be included in "every individual" for the purpose of s. 15.

Leave to appeal to this Court was granted on September 3, 1987. The grounds for appeal alleged by the appellant in his notice of motion for leave to appeal refer primarily to ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter. On October 7, 1987, McIntyre J., pursuant to Rule 32 of the Supreme Court Rules, SOR/83-74, stated the following constitutional questions:

1. Does a child en ventre sa mère have the right to life as guaranteed by Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

2. If the answer to question 1 is "yes", do subsections (4), (5) and (6) of Section 251 of the Criminal Code violate or deny the principles of fundamental justice, contrary to Section 7 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

des droits. Le juge Matheson a décidé que les arrêts Morgentaler c. La Reine, [1976] 1 R.C.S. 616 (ci-après Morgentaler c. La Reine (n° 1)), et Dehler v. Ottawa Civic Hospital (1980), 29 O.R. (2d) 677 (C.A.), (autorisation de pourvoi refusée, [1981] 1 R.C.S. viii), concluaient que la Déclaration canadienne des droits ne permettait pas aux tribunaux de juger de la teneur ou de la sagesse des lois.

Le juge Matheson souligne que M. Borowski soutient essentiellement, en vertu de la Charte, que le fœtus est une personne et devrait donc être protégé par l'art. 7 de la Charte. La Cour conclut toutefois que les par. 251(4), (5) et (6) ne violent pas la Charte puisque le fœtus n'est pas visé par le mot «chacun» et ne bénéficie donc pas de l'application de l'art. 7.

En appel, M. Borowski n'a plus soutenu que la contribution du gouvernement au financement des avortements était illégale. La Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan a rejeté l'appel de M. Borowski en statuant que ni l'art. 7 ni l'art. 15 (qui était entré en vigueur le 17 avril 1985, avant l'audition de l'appel) ne s'appliquent au fœtus. Au nom de la cour, le juge Gerwing a examiné l'histoire du droit relatif au fœtus ainsi que la formulation de l'art. 7 et sa genèse législative, et il a conclu que les garanties de l'art. 7 ne s'appliquent pas à l'enfant à naître. De même, la cour a conclu que le fœtus n'est pas visé par les mots «personne» et «tous» aux fins de l'art. 15.

Cette Cour a accordé l'autorisation de pourvoi le 3 septembre 1987. Les moyens invoqués par l'appelant dans sa requête en autorisation visent principalement les art. 7 et 15 de la Charte. Le 7 octobre 1987, le juge McIntyre formulait ainsi les questions constitutionnelles, conformément à l'art. 32 des Règles de la Cour suprême, DORS/83-74:

1. Un enfant conçu a-t-il le droit à la vie que garantit l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

2. Si la réponse à la question 1 est affirmative, les par. 251(4), (5), (6) du Code criminel violent-ils ou nient-ils les principes de justice fondamentale contrairement à l'art. 7 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

3. Does a child en ventre sa mère have the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination because of age or mental or physical disability that are guaranteed by Section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

4. If the answer to question 3 is "yes", do subsections (4), (5) and (6) of Section 251 of the Criminal Code violate or deny the rights guaranteed by Section 15?

5. If the answer to question 2 is "yes" or if the answer to question 4 is "yes", are the provisions of subsections (4), (5) and (6) of Section 251 of the Criminal Code justified by Section 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and therefore not inconsistent with the Constitution Act, 1982?

On January 28, 1988, after leave to appeal was granted, this Court decided R. v. Morgentaler (No. 2), supra, in which all of s. 251 was found to violate s. 7 of the Charter. Accordingly, s. 251 in its entirety was struck down.

In July of 1988 in light of this Court's judgment in R. v. Morgentaler (No. 2), supra, counsel on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada applied to adjourn the hearing of the appeal. The respondent argued that the issue was now moot as s. 251 of the Criminal Code had been nullified and that the two remaining constitutional questions (numbers 1 and 3) which simply ask whether a child en ventre sa mère is entitled to the protection of ss. 7 and 15 of the Charter respectively are not severable from the other, now moot constitutional questions. Although the respondent claimed the matter was moot, no application to quash the appeal was made. The application to adjourn the hearing of the appeal was denied by Chief Justice Dickson on July 19, 1988, leaving it to the Court to address the mootness issue.

I am of the opinion that the appeal should be dismissed on the grounds that: (1) Mr. Borowski's case has been rendered moot and (2) he has lost his standing. When section 251 was struck down, the basis of the action disappeared. The initial prayer for relief was no longer applicable. The foundation for standing upon which the previous decision of this Court was based also disappeared.

3. L'enfant conçu a-t-il le droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi, indépendamment de toute discrimination en raison de l'âge ou de déficiences mentales ou physiques, que garantit l'art. 15 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

4. Si la réponse à la question 3 est affirmative, les par. 251(4), (5), (6) du Code criminel violent-ils ou nient-ils les droits garantis par l'art. 15?

5. Si la réponse à la question 2 est affirmative et si la réponse à la question 4 est affirmative, les par. 251(4), (5), (6) du Code criminel sont-ils justifiés par l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et donc compatibles avec la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982?

Le 28 janvier 1988, après avoir autorisé le pourvoi en l'espèce, la Cour a rendu l'arrêt R. c. Morgentaler (N° 2), précité, dans lequel elle a jugé que l'art. 251 viole l'art. 7 de la Charte. En conséquence, elle a déclaré inopérant l'ensemble de l'art. 251.

En juillet 1988, en raison de l'arrêt R. c. Morgentaler (n° 2) de cette Cour, le procureur général du Canada a demandé l'ajournement de l'audition du pourvoi. L'intimé soutenait que le litige concernant l'art. 251 du Code criminel était maintenant sans objet puisque cet article avait été déclaré inopérant et que les deux autres questions constitutionnelles (les questions 1 et 3), concernant le droit de l'enfant à naître à la protection des art. 7 et 15 de la Charte, ne pouvaient être séparées des questions constitutionnelles qui étaient devenues théoriques. Bien que l'intimé ait soutenu que la cause était théorique, il n'a pas demandé l'annulation du pourvoi. Le juge en chef Dickson a rejeté la demande d'ajournement le 19 juillet 1988. La Cour doit donc traiter de la question du caractère théorique du litige.

Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi pour les motifs suivants: (1) la cause de M. Borowski est devenue théorique et (2) il a perdu la qualité nécessaire pour agir. L'annulation de l'art. 251 a fait disparaître sa cause d'action. La demande initiale de redressement n'a plus d'objet. Le fondement même de la qualité pour agir reconnue par cette Cour dans sa décision antérieure a lui aussi disparu.

Mootness

The doctrine of mootness is an aspect of a general policy or practice that a court may decline to decide a case which raises merely a hypothetical or abstract question. The general principle applies when the decision of the court will not have the effect of resolving some controversy which affects or may affect the rights of the parties. If the decision of the court will have no practical effect on such rights, the court will decline to decide the case. This essential ingredient must be present not only when the action or proceeding is commenced but at the time when the court is called upon to reach a decision. Accordingly if, subsequent to the initiation of the action or proceeding, events occur which affect the relationship of the parties so that no present live controversy exists which affects the rights of the parties, the case is said to be moot. The general policy or practice is enforced in moot cases unless the court exercises its discretion to depart from its policy or practice. The relevant factors relating to the exercise of the court's discretion are discussed hereinafter.

The approach in recent cases involves a two-step analysis. First it is necessary to determine whether the required tangible and concrete dispute has disappeared and the issues have become academic. Second, if the response to the first question is affirmative, it is necessary to decide if the court should exercise its discretion to hear the case. The cases do not always make it clear whether the term "moot" applies to cases that do not present a concrete controversy or whether the term applies only to such of those cases as the court declines to hear. In the interest of clarity, I consider that a case is moot if it fails to meet the "live controversy" test. A court may nonetheless elect to address a moot issue if the circumstances warrant.

La doctrine relative au caractère théorique est un des aspects du principe ou de la pratique générale voulant qu'un tribunal peut refuser de juger une affaire qui ne soulève qu'une question hypothétique ou abstraite. Le principe général s'applique quand la décision du tribunal n'aura pas pour effet de résoudre un litige qui a, ou peut avoir, des conséquences sur les droits des parties. Si la décision du tribunal ne doit avoir aucun effet pratique sur ces droits, le tribunal refuse de juger l'affaire. Cet élément essentiel doit être présent non seulement quand l'action ou les procédures sont engagées, mais aussi au moment où le tribunal doit rendre une décision. En conséquence, si, après l'introduction de l'action ou des procédures, surviennent des événements qui modifient les rapports des parties entre elles de sorte qu'il ne reste plus de litige actuel qui puisse modifier les droits des parties, la cause est considérée comme théorique. Le principe ou la pratique général s'applique aux litiges devenus théoriques à moins que le tribunal n'exerce son pouvoir discrétionnaire de ne pas l'appliquer. J'examinerai plus loin les facteurs dont le tribunal tient compte pour décider d'exercer ou non ce pouvoir discrétionnaire.

La démarche suivie dans des affaires récentes comporte une analyse en deux temps. En premier, il faut se demander si le différend concret et tangible a disparu et si la question est devenue purement théorique. En deuxième lieu, si la réponse à la première question est affirmative, le tribunal décide s'il doit exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire et entendre l'affaire. La jurisprudence n'indique pas toujours très clairement si le mot «théorique» (moot) s'applique aux affaires qui ne comportent pas de litige concret ou s'il s'applique seulement à celles de ces affaires que le tribunal refuse d'entendre. Pour être précis, je considère qu'une affaire est «théorique» si elle ne répond pas au critère du «litige actuel». Un tribunal peut de toute façon choisir de juger une question théorique s'il estime que les circonstances le justifient.

When is an Appeal Moot?—The Authorities

The first stage in the analysis requires a consideration of whether there remains a live controversy. The controversy may disappear rendering an issue moot due to a variety of reasons, some of which are discussed below.

In The King ex rel. Tolfree v. Clark, [1944] S.C.R. 69, this Court refused to grant leave to appeal to applicants seeking a judgment excluding the respondents from sitting and exercising their functions as Members of the Ontario Legislative Assembly. However, the Legislative Assembly had been dissolved prior to the hearing before this Court. As a result, Duff C.J., on behalf of the Court, held at p. 72:

> It is one of those cases where, the state of facts to which the proceedings in the lower Courts related and upon which they were founded having ceased to exist, the sub-stratum of the litigation has disappeared. In accordance with well-settled principle, therefore, the appeal could not properly be entertained. [Emphasis added.]

A challenged municipal by-law was repealed prior to a hearing in Moir v. The Corporation of the Village of Huntingdon (1891), 19 S.C.R. 363, leading to a conclusion that the appealing party had no actual interest and that a decision could have no effect on the parties except as to costs. Similarly, in a fact situation analogous to this appeal, the Privy Council refused to address the constitutionality of challenged legislation where two statutes in question were repealed prior to the hearing: Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1939] A.C. 117 (P.C.)

Appeals have not been entertained in situations in which the appellant had agreed to an undertaking to pay the respondent the damages awarded in the court below plus costs regardless of the disposition of the appeal: Coca-Cola Company of Canada Ltd. v. Mathews, [1944] S.C.R. 385, and Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada v. Jervis, [1944] A.C. 111. In Coca-Cola v. Mathews, Rinfret C.J. held the result of the undertaking was to eliminate any further lis between the parties such

Quand un pourvoi est-il théorique?—La jurisprudence

La première étape de l'analyse exige qu'on se demande s'il reste un litige actuel. Diverses circonstances, dont je vais donner des exemples, peuvent faire disparaître un litige et rendre la question théorique.

Dans l'arrêt The King ex rel. Tolfree v. Clark, [1944] R.C.S. 69, cette Cour a refusé d'accorder une autorisation de pourvoi à des requérants qui demandaient un jugement interdisant aux intimés d'exercer leurs fonctions de députés de l'assemblée législative de l'Ontario et de participer à ses délibérations. L'assemblée législative avait été dissoute avant l'audition de l'affaire par cette Cour. Le juge en chef Duff, au nom de la Cour, dit à la p. 72:

Dans l'affaire Moir v. The Corporation of the Village of Huntingdon (1891), 19 R.C.S. 363, l'abrogation du règlement municipal contesté avant l'audition du pourvoi a entraîné la conclusion que l'appelant n'avait pas d'intérêt réel et qu'une décision n'aurait pas de conséquence pour les parties, sauf pour les dépens. De même, dans une situation analogue à l'espèce, le Conseil privé a refusé de se prononcer sur la constitutionnalité de dispositions législatives contestées parce que les lois en cause avaient été abrogées avant l'audition: Attorney-General for Alberta v. Attorney-General for Canada, [1939] A.C. 117 (C.P.)

Certains pourvois n'ont pas été entendus dans des cas où l'appelant avait pris l'engagement de verser à l'intimé les dommages-intérêts accordés par les cours d'instance inférieure et les dépens, quelle que soit l'issue du pourvoi: Coca-Cola Company of Canada Ltd. v. Mathews, [1944] R.C.S. 385, et Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada v. Jervis, [1944] A.C. 111. Dans l'affaire Coca-Cola v. Mathews, le juge en chef Rinfret a statué que l'engagement avait comme conséquence that the Court would have been forced to decide an abstract proposition of law.

As well, the sale of a restaurant for which a renewal of a licence was sought as required by the impugned municipal by-law rendered an issue technically moot: Vic Restaurant Inc. v. City of Montreal, [1959] S.C.R. 58. Issues in contention may be of a short duration resulting in an absence of a live controversy by the time of appellate review. Such a situation arose in International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 2085 v. Winnipeg Builders' Exchange, [1967] S.C.R. 628, in which the cessation of a strike between the parties ended the actual dispute over the validity of an injunction prohibiting certain strike action by one party.

The particular circumstances of the parties to an action may also eliminate the tangible nature of a dispute. The death of parties challenging the validity of a parole revocation hearing (Re Cadeddu and The Queen (1983), 41 O.R. (2d) 481 (C.A.)) and a speeding ticket (R. v. Mercure, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 234) ended any concrete controversy between the parties.

As well, the inapplicability of a statute to the party challenging the legislation renders a dispute moot: Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, [1984] 1 S.C.R. 357. This is similar to those situations in which an appeal from a criminal conviction is seen as moot where the accused has fulfilled his sentence prior to an appeal: Re Maltby and Attorney-General of Saskatchewan (1984), 10 D.L.R. (4th) 745 (Sask. C.A.)

The issue of mootness has arisen more frequently in American jurisprudence, and there, the doctrine is more fully developed. This may be due in part to the constitutional requirement, contained in s. 2(1) of Article III of the American Constitution, that there exist a "case or controversy":

Section 2. [1] The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, d'éliminer tout litige entre les parties de sorte que la Cour aurait été forcée de se prononcer sur une question juridique abstraite.

Dans un autre cas, la vente d'un restaurant pour lequel on cherchait à obtenir un renouvellement du permis exigé par le règlement municipal contesté avait rendu la question théorique: Vic Restaurant Inc. v. City of Montreal, [1959] R.C.S. 58. Pour certains problèmes de courte durée, le litige n'existe plus quand l'affaire est portée en appel. C'est ce qui est arrivé dans l'affaire International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 2085 v. Winnipeg Builders' Exchange, [1967] R.C.S. 628, quand la fin de la grève qui opposait les parties a mis fin au litige concernant la validité de l'injonction qui interdisait certains actes de grève à l'une de ces parties.

Un changement dans la situation des parties à une action peut aussi éliminer l'aspect tangible du litige. Le décès d'une partie qui contestait la validité d'une audition sur la révocation de sa libération conditionnelle (Re Cadeddu and The Queen (1983), 41 O.R. (2d) 481 (C.A.)) et, dans un autre cas, le décès d'une partie qui contestait une contravention pour excès de vitesse (R. c. Mercure, [1988] 1 R.C.S. 234) ont mis fin à des litiges concrets.

De même, l'inapplicabilité d'une loi à celui qui en conteste la validité rend le litige théorique: Law Society of Upper Canada c. Skapinker, [1984] 1 R.C.S. 357. Une situation semblable se présente quand l'appel d'une déclaration de culpabilité est considéré comme théorique parce que l'accusé a purgé la peine avant l'audition de l'appel: Re Maltby and Attorney-General of Saskatchewan (1984), 10 D.L.R. (4th) 745 (C.A. Sask.)

La question du caractère théorique a été étudiée plus fréquemment aux États-Unis, dans la jurisprudence et la doctrine, et l'analyse du principe y est plus développée. Cela tient vraisemblablement au par. 2(1) de l'article III de la Constitution américaine qui exige qu'il y ait «une cause ou un différend»:

2. (1) Le pouvoir judiciaire s'étendra à toutes les causes, en droit (Law) et en équité (Equity), survenues sous l'empire de la présente constitution, des lois des

However, despite the constitutional enshrinement of the principle, the mootness doctrine has its roots in common law principles similar to those in Canada: see "The Mootness Doctrine in the Supreme Court" (1974), 88 Harvard L.R. 373, at p. 374. Situations resulting in a finding of mootness are similar to those in Canada. For example, in Hall v. Beals, 396 U.S. 45 (1969), a challenge to a Colorado voter residency requirement of six months was held moot due to a legislative change in the law removing the plaintiff from the application of the statute. Mootness was also raised in United States v. W. T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629 (1953), where a defendant voluntarily ceased allegedly unlawful conduct. Similarly, in Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40 (1968), mootness was an issue where an accused completed his sentence prior to an appeal of his conviction.

Cependant, en dépit de la consécration du principe dans la Constitution, la doctrine du caractère théorique a ses sources dans des principes de common law semblables à ceux qui prévalent au Canada: voir «The Mootness Doctrine in the Supreme Court» (1974), 88 Harvard L.R. 373, à la p. 374. Les cas où l'on a conclu au caractère théorique de l'action sont semblables à ceux du Canada. Par exemple, dans Hall v. Beals, 396 U.S. 45 (1969), la contestation par un électeur du Colorado de la condition de résidence de six mois a été déclarée théorique parce qu'une modification de la loi avait soustrait le demandeur à l'application de cette loi. La question a été soulevée dans l'affaire United States v. W. T. Grant Co., 345 U.S. 629 (1953), parce que le défendeur avait volontairement mis fin à la conduite illégale alléguée. De même, dans Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40 (1968), le caractère théorique a été invoqué parce que l'accusé avait fini de purger sa peine avant l'appel de sa déclaration de culpabilité.

The American jurisprudence indicates a similar willingness to consider the merits of an action in some circumstances even when the controversy is no longer concrete and tangible. The rule that abstract, hypothetical or contingent questions will not be heard is not absolute (see: Tribe, American Constitutional Law (2nd ed. 1988), at p. 84; Kates and Barker, "Mootness in Judicial Proceedings: Toward a Coherent Theory" (1974), 62 Calif. L.R. 1385). A two-stage process is involved in which a court may consider the merits of an appeal even where the issue is moot.

La jurisprudence américaine manifeste le même souci de juger une action au fond dans certaines circonstances même si le litige n'est plus ni concret ni tangible. La règle selon laquelle les tribunaux ne se prononcent pas sur des questions abstraites, hypothétiques ou contingentes n'est pas absolue (voir: Tribe, American Constitutional Law (2e éd. 1988), à la p. 84; Kates et Barker, «Mootness in Judicial Proceedings: Toward a Coherent Theory» (1974), 62 Calif. L.R. 1385). L'analyse en deux temps permet à une cour d'entendre un appel au fond même si la question est théorique.

Is this Appeal Moot?

In my opinion, there is no longer a live controversy or concrete dispute as the substratum of Mr. Borowski's appeal has disappeared. The basis for the action was a challenge relating to the constitutionality of subss. (4), (5) and (6) of s. 251. That section of the Criminal Code having been struck down in R. v. Morgentaler (No. 2), supra, the raison d'être of the action has disappeared. None of the relief claimed in the statement of claim is relevant. Three of the five constitutional questions that were set explicitly concern s. 251 and are no longer applicable. The remaining two questions addressing the scope of ss. 7 and 15 Charter rights are not severable from the context of the original challenge to s. 251. These questions were only ancillary to the central issue of the alleged unconstitutionality of the abortion provisions of the Criminal Code. They were a mere step in the process of measuring the impugned provision against the Charter.

In any event, this Court is not bound by the wording of any constitutional question which is stated. Nor may the question be used to transform an appeal into a reference: Vadeboncœur v. Landry, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 179, at pp. 187-88, and Bisaillon v. Keable, [1983] 2 S.C.R. 60, at p. 71. The procedural requirements of Rule 32 of the Supreme Court Rules are not designed to introduce new issues but to define with precision the constitutional points in issue which emerge from the record. Rule 32 provides:

32. (1) When a party to an appeal

(a) intends to raise a question as to the constitutional validity or the constitutional applicability of a statute of the Parliament of Canada or of a legislature of a province or of Regulations made thereunder,

(b) intends to urge the inoperability of a statute of the Parliament of Canada or of a legislature of a province or of Regulations made thereunder.

such party shall, upon notice to the other parties, apply to the Chief Justice or a Judge for the purpose of stating the question, within thirty days from the granting of leave to appeal or within thirty days from the filing of the notice of appeal in an appeal with leave of the court

Le présent pourvoi est-il théorique?

À mon avis, il n'y a plus de litige actuel ni de différend concret puisque le substratum du pourvoi de M. Borowski a disparu. Son action était fondée sur une contestation de la constitutionnalité des par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code criminel. Cet article ayant été déclaré inopérant par l'arrêt R. c. Morgentaler (n° 2), précité, la raison d'être de l'action a disparu. Aucun des redressements demandés dans la déclaration n'est pertinent. Trois des cinq questions constitutionnelles énoncées visent expressément l'art. 251 et n'ont plus d'objet. Les deux autres ont trait à la portée des droits garantis par les art. 7 et 15 de la Charte et ne peuvent être traitées séparément de la contestation de l'art. 251. Ces questions étaient accessoires à la question principale de l'inconstitutionnalité des dispositions du Code criminel relatives à l'avortement. Elles n'étaient qu'une étape du processus d'examen des dispositions contestées en vertu de la Charte.

De toute façon, cette Cour n'est pas liée par la formulation d'une question constitutionnelle. La question ne peut servir non plus à transformer un pourvoi en renvoi: Vadeboncœur c. Landry, [1977] 2 R.C.S. 179, aux pp. 187 et 188, et Bisaillon c. Keable, [1983] 2 R.C.S. 60, à la p. 71. La procédure établie par l'art. 32 des Règles de la Cour suprême ne vise pas à introduire de nouvelles questions, mais à définir avec précision les questions constitutionnelles litigieuses qui ressortent du dossier. L'article 32 dit:

32. (1) Lorsque, dans le cas d'un pourvoi autorisé par la Cour, par la cour de dernier ressort d'une province, par la Cour d'appel fédérale ou d'un pourvoi de plein droit, une partie

a) entend contester la validité ou l'applicabilité constitutionnelle d'une loi du Parlement du Canada ou d'une loi, de la législature d'une province, ou de l'un de leurs règlements d'application,

b) entend plaider le caractère inopérant d'une loi du Parlement du Canada ou d'une loi de la législature d'une province ou de leurs règlements d'application, elle doit, après avoir donné un avis aux autres parties et dans les 30 jours de l'autorisation de pourvoi ou de of final resort in a province, the Federal Court of Appeal, or in an appeal as of right.

The questions cannot, therefore, be employed as an independent basis for supporting an appeal that is otherwise moot.

By reason of the foregoing, I conclude that this appeal is moot. It is necessary, therefore, to move to the second stage of the analysis by examining the basis upon which this Court should exercise its discretion either to hear or to decline to hear this appeal.

The Exercise of Discretion: Relevant Criteria

Since the discretion which is exercised relates to the enforcement of a policy or practice of the Court, it is not surprising that a neat set of criteria does not emerge from an examination of the cases. This same problem in the United States led commentators there to remark that "the law is a morass of inconsistent or unrelated theories, and cogent judicial generalization is sorely needed." (Kates and Barker, "Mootness in Judicial Proceedings: Toward a Coherent Theory", supra, at p. 1387). I would add that more than a cogent generalization is probably undesirable because an exhaustive list would unduly fetter the court's discretion in future cases. It is, however, a discretion to be judicially exercised with due regard for established principles.

In formulating guidelines for the exercise of discretion in departing from a usual practice, it is instructive to examine its underlying rationalia. To the extent that a particular foundation for the practice is either absent or its presence tenuous, the reason for its enforcement disappears or diminishes.

The first rationale for the policy and practice referred to above is that a court's competence to resolve legal disputes is rooted in the adversary system. The requirement of an adversarial context is a fundamental tenet of our legal system and helps guarantee that issues are well and fully l'inscription de l'avis de pourvoi, s'adresser au Juge en chef ou à un juge pour que soit formulée la question.

Les questions ne peuvent donc pas servir de fondement distinct à un pourvoi qui est par ailleurs théorique.

Compte tenu de ce qui précède, je conclus que le pourvoi est théorique. Il est donc nécessaire d'aborder la seconde étape de l'analyse et d'examiner les éléments sur lesquels la Cour devrait se fonder pour décider d'exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire pour entendre ou refuser d'entendre le pourvoi.

L'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire: les critères applicables

Puisque le pouvoir discrétionnaire à exercer concerne l'application d'une politique ou d'une pratique de la Cour, il n'est pas surprenant de ne pas pouvoir dégager de la jurisprudence un ensemble précis de critères. Aux États-Unis, le même problème a amené des commentateurs à dire que [TRADUCTION] «le droit est un fatras de théories incohérentes et disparates, ce qui rend indispensable une généralisation judiciaire convaincante.» (Kates et Barker, «Mootness in Judicial Proceedings: Toward a Coherent Theory», précité, à la p. 1387). J'ajouterais qu'il n'est pas souhaitable d'aller au-delà d'une généralisation convaincante parce qu'une liste exhaustive aurait comme conséquence d'entraver indûment, pour l'avenir, le pouvoir discrétionnaire de la Cour. Il s'agit néanmoins d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire à exercer de façon judiciaire selon les principes établis.

Pour formuler des lignes directrices applicables à l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire visant à écarter une pratique habituelle, il est utile d'en étudier les assises. Dans la mesure où une assise donnée de cette pratique est faible ou inexistante, les raisons de l'appliquer diminuent ou disparaissent.

La première raison d'être de la politique ou de la pratique en question tient à ce que la capacité des tribunaux de trancher des litiges a sa source dans le système contradictoire. L'exigence du débat contradictoire est l'un des principes fondamentaux de notre système juridique et elle tend à garantir argued by parties who have a stake in the outcome. It is apparent that this requirement may be satisfied if, despite the cessation of a live controversy, the necessary adversarial relationships will nevertheless prevail. For example, although the litigant bringing the proceeding may no longer have a direct interest in the outcome, there may be collateral consequences of the outcome that will provide the necessary adversarial context. This was one of the factors which played a role in the exercise of this Court's discretion in Vic Restaurant Inc. v. City of Montreal, supra. The restaurant, for which a renewal of permits to sell liquor and operate a restaurant was sought, had been sold and therefore no mandamus for a licence could be given. Nevertheless, there were prosecutions outstanding against the appellant for violation of the municipal by-law which was the subject of the legal challenge. Determination of the validity of this by-law was a collateral consequence which provided the appellant with a necessary interest which otherwise would have been lacking.

In the United States, the role of collateral consequences in the exercise of discretion to hear a case is well recognized. In Southern Pacific Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 219 U.S. 433 (1911), the United States Supreme Court was asked to examine an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission which fixed maximum rates for certain transportation charges. Despite the expiry of this order, it was held, in part, that the remaining potential liability of the railway company to shippers comprised a collateral consequence justifying a decision on the merits. The principle that collateral consequences of an already completed cause of action warrant appellate review was most clearly stated in Sibron v. New York, supra. The appellant in that case appealed his conviction although his sentence had already been completed. At page 55, Warren C.J. stated:

> . . . most criminal convictions do in fact entail adverse collateral legal consequences. The mere "possibility" that this will be the case is enough to preserve a criminal case from ending "ignominiously in the limbo of mootness."

que les parties ayant un intérêt dans l'issue du litige en débattent complètement tous les aspects. Il semble que cette exigence puisse être remplie si, malgré la disparition du litige actuel, le débat contradictoire demeure. Par exemple, même si la partie qui a engagé des procédures en justice n'a plus d'intérêt direct dans l'issue, il peut subsister des conséquences accessoires à la solution du litige qui fournissent le contexte contradictoire nécessaire. C'est un des facteurs qui a joué dans la décision de cette Cour d'exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire dans l'affaire Vic Restaurant Inc. v. City of Montreal, précitée. Après la vente du restaurant pour lequel on demandait le renouvellement du permis d'exploitation et de vente de boissons alcooliques, il n'était plus possible de délivrer le mandamus relatif au permis. Néanmoins, subsistaient des poursuites contre l'appelante pour infraction au règlement municipal que visait l'action en justice. La détermination de la validité du règlement avait des conséquences accessoires pour l'appelante et lui donnait l'intérêt requis pour agir qu'autrement elle n'aurait pas eu.

Aux États-Unis, les conséquences accessoires ont un rôle reconnu dans la décision d'exercer le pouvoir discrétionnaire d'entendre une affaire. Dans Southern Pacific Co. v. Interstate Commerce Commission, 219 U.S. 433 (1911), on avait demandé à la Cour suprême des États-Unis de se prononcer sur une ordonnance de l'Interstate Commerce Commission qui imposait un plafond sur certains prix de transport. Malgré la caducité de l'ordonnance, la Cour a conclu, entre autres choses, que la responsabilité éventuelle de la société de chemins de fer envers les expéditeurs constituait une conséquence accessoire qui justifiait une décision sur le fond. L'arrêt Sibron v. New York, précité, consacre le principe d'après lequel les conséquences accessoires d'une cause d'action terminée justifient un appel. Dans cette affaire, l'appelant avait interjeté appel de sa déclaration de culpabilité après avoir déjà purgé sa peine. Le juge en chef Warren dit, à la p. 55:

In Canada, the cases of Law Society of Upper Canada v. Skapinker, supra, and R. v. Mercure, supra, illustrate the workings of this principle. In those cases, the presence of interveners who had a stake in the outcome supplied the necessary adversarial context to enable the Court to hear the cases.

The second broad rationale on which the mootness doctrine is based is the concern for judicial economy. (See: Sharpe, "Mootness, Abstract Questions and Alternative Grounds: Deciding Whether to Decide", Charter Litigation.) It is an unfortunate reality that there is a need to ration scarce judicial resources among competing claimants. The fact that in this Court the number of live controversies in respect of which leave is granted is a small percentage of those that are refused is sufficient to highlight this observation. The concern for judicial economy as a factor in the decision not to hear moot cases will be answered if the special circumstances of the case make it worthwhile to apply scarce judicial resources to resolve it.

The concern for conserving judicial resources is partially answered in cases that have become moot if the court's decision will have some practical effect on the rights of the parties notwithstanding that it will not have the effect of determining the controversy which gave rise to the action. The influence of this factor along with that of the first factor referred to above is evident in Vic Restaurant Inc. v. City of Montreal, supra.

Similarly an expenditure of judicial resources is considered warranted in cases which although moot are of a recurring nature but brief duration. In order to ensure that an important question which might independently evade review be heard by the court, the mootness doctrine is not applied strictly. This was the situation in International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 2085 v. Winnipeg Builders' Exchange, supra. The issue was the validity of an interlocutory injunction prohibiting certain strike action. By the time the case reached this Court the strike had been settled. This is the usual result of the operation of a temporary injunction in labour cases. If the point was ever to be tested, it almost had to be in a case

Au Canada, les arrêts Law Society of Upper Canada c. Skapinker et R. c. Mercure, précités, illustrent le mécanisme de ce principe. Dans ces affaires, l'intérêt des intervenants dans l'issue du pourvoi fournissait le contexte contradictoire nécessaire pour permettre à la Cour d'entendre ces causes.

La deuxième grande raison d'être de la doctrine du caractère théorique tient à l'économie des ressources judiciaires. (Voir: Sharpe, «Mootness, Abstract Questions and Alternative Grounds: Deciding Whether to Decide», Charter Litigation.) La triste réalité est qu'il nous faut rationner et répartir entre les justiciables des ressources judiciaires limitées. Le fait que les litiges actifs qui reçoivent une autorisation de pourvoi en cette Cour représentent une faible proportion du nombre total des demandes présentées, témoigne de cette réalité. La saine économie des ressources judiciaires n'empêche pas l'utilisation de ces ressources, si limitées soient-elles, à la solution d'un litige théorique, lorsque les circonstances particulières de l'affaire le justifient.

L'économie des ressources judiciaires n'empêche pas non plus d'entendre des affaires devenues théoriques dans les cas où la décision de la cour aura des effets concrets sur les droits des parties même si elle ne résout pas le litige qui a donné naissance à l'action. L'influence de ce facteur, combiné au premier facteur mentionné plus haut, est évidente dans l'affaire Vic Restaurant Inc. v. City of Montreal, précitée.

De même, il peut être justifié de consacrer des ressources judiciaires à des causes théoriques qui sont de nature répétitive et de courte durée. Pour garantir que sera soumise aux tribunaux une question importante qui, prise isolément, pourrait échapper à l'examen judiciaire, on peut décider de ne pas appliquer strictement la doctrine du caractère théorique. Ce fut le cas dans l'arrêt International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Local Union 2085 v. Winnipeg Builders' Exchange, précité. L'affaire portait sur la validité d'une injonction interlocutoire qui interdisait certains actes de grève. Quand l'affaire a été soumise à cette Cour, la grève avait déjà fait l'objet d'un règlement. C'est le résultat habituel d'une injonction provithat was moot. Accordingly, this Court exercised its discretion to hear the case. To the same effect are Le Syndicat des Employés du Transport de Montréal v. Attorney General of Quebec, [1970] S.C.R. 713, and Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' Int. Union v. United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, [1973] S.C.R. 756. The mere fact, however, that a case raising the same point is likely to recur even frequently should not by itself be a reason for hearing an appeal which is moot. It is preferable to wait and determine the point in a genuine adversarial context unless the circumstances suggest that the dispute will have always disappeared before it is ultimately resolved.

There also exists a rather ill-defined basis for justifying the deployment of judicial resources in cases which raise an issue of public importance of which a resolution is in the public interest. The economics of judicial involvement are weighed against the social cost of continued uncertainty in the law. See Minister of Manpower and Immigration v. Hardayal, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 470, and Kates and Barker, supra, at pp. 1429-31. Locke J. alluded to this in Vic Restaurant Inc. v. City of Montreal, supra, at p. 91: "The question, as I have said, is one of general public interest to municipal institutions throughout Canada."

This was the basis for the exercise of this Court's discretion in the Re Opposition by Quebec to a Resolution to amend the Constitution, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 793. The question of the constitutionality of the patriation of the Constitution had, in effect, been rendered moot by the occurrence of the event. The Court stated at p. 806:

> While this Court retains its discretion to entertain or not to entertain an appeal as of right where the issue has become moot, it may, in the exercise of its discretion, take into consideration the importance of the constitutional issue determined by a court of appeal judgment which would remain unreviewed by this Court.

soire dans les conflits du travail. Si la question devait être tranchée un jour, il était presque inévitable qu'elle le soit dans un cas devenu théorique. La Cour a donc exercé son pouvoir discrétionnaire pour entendre l'affaire. D'autres exemples sont: Le Syndicat des Employés du Transport de Montréal c. Procureur général du Québec, [1970] R.C.S. 713, et Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' Int. Union c. United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, [1973] R.C.S. 756. Le simple fait, cependant, que la même question puisse se présenter de nouveau, et même fréquemment, ne justifie pas à lui seul l'audition de l'appel s'il est devenu théorique. Il est préférable d'attendre et de trancher la question dans un véritable contexte contradictoire, à moins qu'il ressorte des circonstances que le différend aura toujours disparu avant d'être résolu.

On justifie également de façon assez imprécise, l'utilisation de ressources judiciaires dans des cas où se pose une question d'importance publique qu'il est dans l'intérêt public de trancher. Il faut mettre en balance la dépense de ressources judiciaires et le coût social de l'incertitude du droit. Voir Ministre de la Main-d'œuvre et de l'Immigration c. Hardayal, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 470, et Kates et Barker, dans l'ouvrage précité, aux pp. 1429 à 1431. Le juge Locke a fait allusion à cela dans l'arrêt Vic Restaurant Inc. v. City of Montreal, précité, à la p. 91: [TRADUCTION] «La question a, je l'ai dit, de l'importance pour toutes les institutions municipales du Canada.»

C'est le motif pour lequel cette Cour a décidé d'exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire dans le Renvoi sur l'opposition du Québec à une résolution pour modifier la Constitution, [1982] 2 R.C.S. 793. La question de la constitutionnalité du rapatriement de la Constitution était devenue théorique après le rapatriement. La Cour dit à la p. 806:

> Tout en conservant son pouvoir discrétionnaire d'entendre ou non un pourvoi de plein droit lorsque la question est devenue théorique, la Cour peut, dans l'exercice de ce pouvoir, tenir compte de l'importance de la question constitutionnelle tranchée par une cour d'appel dont la décision serait soustraite à l'examen ultérieur de cette Cour.

In the circumstances of this case, it appears desirable that the constitutional question be answered in order to dispel any doubt over it and it accordingly will be answered.

Patently, the mere presence of an issue of national importance in an appeal which is otherwise moot is insufficient. National importance is a requirement for all cases before this Court except with respect to appeals as of right; the latter, Parliament has apparently deemed to be in a category of sufficient importance to be heard here. There must, therefore, be the additional ingredient of social cost in leaving the matter undecided. This factor appears to have weighed heavily in the decision of the majority of this Court in Forget v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1988] 2 S.C.R. 90.

The third underlying rationale of the mootness doctrine is the need for the Court to demonstrate a measure of awareness of its proper law-making function. The Court must be sensitive to its role as the adjudicative branch in our political framework. Pronouncing judgments in the absence of a dispute affecting the rights of the parties may be viewed as intruding into the role of the legislative branch. This need to maintain some flexibility in this regard has been more clearly identified in the United States where mootness is one aspect of a larger concept of justiciability. (See: Kates and Barker, "Mootness in Judicial Proceedings: Toward a Coherent Theory", supra, and Tribe, American Constitutional Law, supra at p. 67.)

In my opinion, it is also one of the three basic purposes of the mootness doctrine in Canada and a most important factor in this case. I generally agree with the following statement in P. Macklem and E. Gertner: "Re Skapinker and Mootness Doctrine" (1984), 6 Sup. Ct. L. Rev. 369, at p. 373:

The latter function of the mootness doctrine—political flexibility—can be understood as the added degree of flexibility, in an allegedly moot dispute, in the law-making function of the Court. The mootness doctrine permits the Court not to hear a case on the ground that there no longer exists a dispute between the parties, notwithstanding the fact that it is of the opinion that it

Dans les présentes circonstances, il appert souhaitable de répondre à la question constitutionnelle afin de dissiper tous les doutes qu'elle suscite; voilà pourquoi il y sera répondu.

Manifestement, la présence d'une question d'importance nationale dans un pourvoi, qui est par ailleurs théorique, ne suffit pas. Tous les pourvois en cette Cour doivent avoir une importance nationale, à l'exception des pourvois de plein droit considérés assez importants par le législateur pour être soumis à cette Cour. Il faut aussi l'élément additionnel que constitue le coût social de laisser une question sans réponse. Ce facteur paraît avoir largement influencé la décision de la majorité dans l'arrêt de cette Cour Forget c. Québec (Procureur général), [1988] 2 R.C.S. 90.

La troisième raison d'être de la doctrine du caractère théorique tient à ce que la Cour doit prendre en considération sa fonction véritable dans l'élaboration du droit. La Cour doit se montrer sensible à sa fonction juridictionnelle dans notre structure politique. On pourrait penser que prononcer des jugements sans qu'il y ait de litige pouvant affecter les droits des parties est un empiétement sur la fonction législative. La nécessité de garder une certaine souplesse à cet égard a été plus clairement reconnue aux États-Unis où la notion de caractère théorique est un aspect du concept plus large de justiciabilité. (Voir: Kates et Barker, «Mootness in Judicial Proceedings: Toward a Coherent Theory», précité, et Tribe, American Constitutional Law, précité, à la p. 67.)

À mon avis, c'est aussi l'un des trois objets fondamentaux de la doctrine canadienne du caractère théorique et un facteur très important en l'espèce. Je suis essentiellement d'accord avec ce que disent P. Macklem et E. Gertner dans «Re Skapinker and Mootness Doctrine» (1984), 6 Sup. Ct. L. Rev. 369, à la p. 373:

is a matter of public importance. Though related to the factor of judicial economy, insofar as it implies a determination of whether deciding the case will lead to unnecessary precedent, political flexibility enables the Court to be sensitive to its role within the Canadian constitutional framework, and at the same time reflects the degree to which the Court can control the development of the law.

I prefer, however, not to use the term "political flexibility" in order to avoid confusion with the political questions doctrine. In considering the exercise of its discretion to hear a moot case, the Court should be sensitive to the extent that it may be departing from its traditional role.

In exercising its discretion in an appeal which is moot, the Court should consider the extent to which each of the three basic rationalia for enforcement of the mootness doctrine is present. This is not to suggest that it is a mechanical process. The principles identified above may not all support the same conclusion. The presence of one or two of the factors may be overborne by the absence of the third, and vice versa.

Exercise of Discretion: Application of Criteria

Applying these criteria to this appeal, I have little or no concern about the absence of an adversarial relationship. The appeal was fully argued with as much zeal and dedication on both sides as if the matter were not moot.

The second factor to be considered is the need to promote judicial economy. Counsel for the appellant argued that an extensive record had been developed in the courts below which would be wasted if the case were not decided on the merits. Although there is some merit in this position, the same can be said for most cases that come to this Court. To give effect to this argument would emasculate the mootness doctrine which by definition applies if at any stage the foundation for the action disappears. Neither can the fact that this Court reserved on the preliminary points and heard the appeal be weighed in favour of the appellant. In the absence of a motion to quash in advance of the appeal, it was the only practical litige entre les parties, même si la Cour estime que la question a une importance nationale. Même si elle a des liens avec le facteur d'économie des ressources judiciaires, parce qu'il s'agit de déterminer si la décision de l'affaire aura comme conséquence de créer une jurisprudence inutile, la souplesse politique permet à la Cour de tenir compte de son rôle dans le cadre constitutionnel canadien et traduit en même temps la mesure dans laquelle la Cour peut diriger l'évolution du droit.

Je préfère toutefois ne pas utiliser l'expression «souplesse politique», afin d'éviter toute confusion possible avec la doctrine des questions politiques. Au moment de décider d'exercer le pouvoir discrétionnaire d'entendre une affaire théorique, la Cour doit être consciente de la mesure dans laquelle elle pourrait s'écarter de son rôle traditionnel.

En exerçant son pouvoir discrétionnaire à l'égard d'un pourvoi théorique, la Cour doit tenir compte de chacune des trois raisons d'être de la doctrine du caractère théorique. Cela ne signifie pas qu'il s'agit d'un processus mécanique. Il se peut que les principes examinés ici ne tendent pas tous vers la même conclusion. L'absence d'un facteur peut prévaloir malgré la présence de l'un ou des deux autres, ou inversement.

L'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire: application des critères

Pour l'application de ces critères au présent pourvoi, je ne crains pas vraiment l'absence de débat contradictoire. Le pourvoi a été plaidé avec autant de zèle et de ferveur de la part des deux parties que si la question n'avait pas été théorique.

Le second facteur à considérer est l'économie des ressources judiciaires. L'avocat de l'appelant soutient qu'un dossier imposant a été constitué devant les tribunaux d'instance inférieure et que ce dossier deviendrait inutile si l'affaire n'était pas jugée au fond. Quoique cet argument ait du mérite, on peut dire la même chose de presque tous les pourvois soumis à cette Cour. Faire droit à cet argument aurait comme conséquence d'affaiblir la doctrine du caractère théorique qui par définition s'applique si, à quelque étape que ce soit, le fondement de l'action disparaît. Il n'est pas possible non plus de faire jouer en faveur de l'appelant le fait que la Cour a mis les questions préliminaires en délibéré et a entendu le pourvoi. À défaut de course that could be taken to prevent the possible bifurcation of the appeal. It would be anomalous if, by reserving on the mootness question and hearing the argument on the merits, the Court fettered its discretion to decide it.

None of the other factors that I have canvassed which justify the application of judicial resources is applicable. This is not a case where a decision will have practical side effects on the rights of the parties. Nor is it a case that is capable of repetition, yet evasive of review. It will almost certainly be possible to bring the case before the Court within a specific legislative context or possibly in review of specific governmental action. In addition, an abstract pronouncement on foetal rights in this case would not necessarily promote judicial economy as it is very conceivable that the courts will be asked to examine specific legislation or governmental action in any event. Therefore, while I express no opinion as to foetal rights, it is far from clear that a decision on the merits will obviate the necessity for future repetitious litigation.

Moreover, while it raises a question of great public importance, this is not a case in which it is in the public interest to address the merits in order to settle the state of the law. The appellant is asking for an interpretation of ss. 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms at large. In a legislative context any rights of the foetus could be considered or at least balanced against the rights of women guaranteed by s. 7. See R. v. Morgentaler (No. 2), supra, per Dickson C.J., at p. 75; per Beetz J. at pp. 122-23; per Wilson J. at pp. 181-82. A pronouncement in favour of the appellant's position that a foetus is protected by s. 7 from the date of conception would decide the issue out of its proper context. Doctors and hospitals would be left to speculate as to how to apply such a ruling consistently with a woman's rights under s. 7. During argument the question was posed to counsel for R.E.A.L. Women as to what a hospital would do with a pregnant woman who required an abortion to save her life in the face of a ruling in favour of the requête en annulation, c'était la seule solution pratique pour éviter la division du pourvoi. Il serait anormal qu'en mettant en délibéré la question de la nature théorique et en entendant le pourvoi au fond, la Cour compromette son pouvoir discrétionnaire de le décider.

Aucun des autres facteurs dont j'ai parlé et qui justifieraient de consacrer des ressources judiciaires à l'affaire ne s'applique. L'affaire n'aura pas d'effets accessoires pratiques sur les droits des parties. Il ne s'agit pas d'une situation susceptible à la fois de se répéter et de ne jamais être soumise aux tribunaux. Il sera probablement possible de soumettre la question à la Cour à propos d'une loi précise ou peut-être à propos de l'examen d'un acte gouvernemental précis. De plus en l'espèce, une décision dans l'abstrait sur les droits du fœtus ne favoriserait pas nécessairement l'économie des ressources judiciaires puisqu'il est probable que, de toute façon, les tribunaux soient appelés à se prononcer sur des textes législatifs ou des actes gouvernementaux précis. Quoique je n'exprime pas d'opinion sur les droits du fœtus, je ne suis pas certain du tout qu'une décision sur le fond éliminerait la nécessité de litiges répétés.

De plus, même s'il soulève une question de grande importance pour le public, il ne s'agit pas d'un cas où il serait dans l'intérêt du public de statuer sur le fond de la question pour déterminer l'état du droit. L'appelant demande une interprétation générale des art. 7 et 15 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. Dans le contexte d'une loi, les droits du fœtus pourraient être examinés ou, du moins, considérés par rapport aux droits garantis à la femme par l'art. 7: voir R. c. Morgentaler (nº 2), précité, le juge en chef Dickson, à la p. 75, le juge Beetz, aux pp. 122 et 123, et le juge Wilson, aux pp. 181 et 182. Un jugement en faveur de la thèse de l'appelant, suivant laquelle le fœtus jouit des droits garantis par l'art. 7 dès sa conception, reviendrait à trancher la question hors de son contexte. Les médecins et les hôpitaux seraient alors obligés de se demander comment appliquer une telle décision et respecter les droits garantis aux femmes par l'art. 7. Pendant les plaidoiries, on a demandé à l'avocate de R.E.A.L. Women ce que les médecins feraient, si l'appelant appellant's position. The answer was that doctors and legislators would have to stay up at night to decide how to deal with the situation. This state of uncertainty would clearly not be in the public interest. Instead of rendering the law certain, a decision favourable to the appellant would have the opposite effect.

Even if I were disposed in favour of the appellant in respect to the first two factors which I have canvassed, I would decline to exercise a discretion in favour of deciding this appeal on the basis of the third. One element of this third factor is the need to demonstrate some sensitivity to the effectiveness or efficacy of judicial intervention. The need for courts to exercise some flexibility in the application of the mootness doctrine requires more than a consideration of the importance of the subject matter. The appellant is requesting a legal opinion on the interpretation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms in the absence of legislation or other governmental action which would otherwise bring the Charter into play. This is something only the government may do. What the appellant seeks is to turn this appeal into a private reference. Indeed, he is not seeking to have decided the same question that was the subject of his action. That question related to the validity of s. 251 of the Criminal Code. He now wishes to ask a question that relates to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms alone. This is not a request to decide a moot question but to decide a different, abstract question. To accede to this request would intrude on the right of the executive to order a reference and pre-empt a possible decision of Parliament by dictating the form of legislation it should enact. To do so would be a marked departure from the traditional role of the Court.

Having decided that this appeal is moot, I would decline to exercise the Court's discretion to decide it on the merits.

Standing

Mr. Borowski's original action alleged that subss. (4), (5) and (6) of the Criminal Code avait gain de cause, dans le cas d'une femme enceinte dont la vie ne pourrait être sauvée que par un avortement. Il a répondu que les médecins et les législateurs passeraient quelques nuits blanches à chercher une solution. Un tel état d'incertitude n'est certainement pas dans l'intérêt public. Au lieu de clarifier le droit, une décision en faveur de l'appelant aurait l'effet contraire.

Même si j'étais enclin à me prononcer en faveur de l'appelant pour les deux premiers facteurs, je refuserais d'exercer le pouvoir discrétionnaire de rendre une décision sur le fond du pourvoi à cause du troisième facteur. Un des éléments de ce troisième facteur est la nécessité d'être sensible à l'efficacité et à l'efficience de l'intervention judiciaire. La nécessité pour les tribunaux de faire preuve d'une certaine souplesse dans l'application de la doctrine du caractère théorique exige plus que la simple considération de l'importance de la question. L'appelant demande une opinion juridique sur l'interprétation de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés en l'absence de loi ou d'acte gouvernemental qui donnerait lieu à l'application de la Charte. Seul le gouvernement peut le faire. L'appelant cherche en réalité à transformer le pourvoi en renvoi d'initiative privée. En fait, il ne cherche même pas à faire trancher la question qui était l'objet de l'action, c'est-à-dire la validité de l'art. 251 du Code criminel. Il veut maintenant poser une question qui a trait à la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés uniquement. On ne demande pas une réponse à une question théorique, mais une réponse à une question différente, à une question abstraite. Faire droit à cette demande empiéterait sur le droit du pouvoir exécutif d'ordonner un renvoi et pourrait empêcher le législateur de prendre une décision, en lui dictant les termes des dispositions législatives à adopter. Ce serait une dérogation marquée au rôle traditionnel de la Cour.

Ayant décidé que le pourvoi est théorique, je suis d'avis de refuser d'exercer le pouvoir discrétionnaire de la Cour pour le trancher au fond.

La qualité pour agir

Dans son action initiale, M. Borowski soutenait que les par. 251(4), (5) et (6) du Code criminel violated the s. 1 right to life of the Canadian Bill of Rights: Minister of Justice of Canada v. Borowski, supra. This Court held Borowski had standing as he was able to demonstrate a "genuine interest" in the validity of the legislation.

Standing was granted premised upon Mr. Borowski's desire to challenge specific legislation. Martland J. considered the earlier standing decisions of the Supreme Court in Thorson v. Attorney General of Canada, [1975] 1 S.C.R. 138, and Nova Scotia Board of Censors v. McNeil, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 265, and concluded that the appellant had standing by reason of his "genuine interest as a citizen in the validity of the legislation" under attack (at p. 598):

The Court relied heavily upon the decision in Thorson, supra, where Laskin J. (as he then was), speaking for the majority, stated at p. 161:

> In my opinion, standing of a federal taxpayer seeking to challenge the constitutionality of federal legislation is a matter particularly appropriate for the exercise of judicial discretion, relating as it does to the effectiveness of process. Central to that discretion is the justiciability of the issue sought to be raised . . . . [Emphasis added.]

I believe these decisions were clear in allowing an expanded basis for standing where specific legislation is challenged on constitutional grounds.

There have been two significant changes in the nature of this action since this Court granted Mr. Borowski standing in 1981. The claim is now premised primarily upon an alleged right of a foetus to life and equality pursuant to ss. 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Secondly, by holding s. 251 to be of no force and effect in R. v. Morgentaler (No. 2), supra, the legislative context of this claim has disappeared.

By virtue of s. 24(1) of the Charter and s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, there are two possienfreignaient le droit à la vie garanti par l'article premier de la Déclaration canadienne des droits: Ministre de la Justice du Canada c. Borowski, précité. Cette Cour a statué que M. Borowski avait qualité pour agir parce qu'il pouvait faire la preuve d'«un intérêt véritable» quant à la validité de la loi.

La qualité pour agir a été reconnue à M. Borowski parce que celui-ci voulait contester une loi précise. Le juge Martland a examiné les arrêts antérieurs de cette Cour relatifs à la qualité pour agir, Thorson c. Procureur général du Canada, [1975] 1 R.C.S. 138, et Nova Scotia Board of Censors c. McNeil, [1976] 2 R.C.S. 265, et il a conclu que l'appelant avait qualité pour agir parce que «à titre de citoyen, [il avait] un intérêt véritable quant à la validité de la loi» contestée (à la p. 598).

La Cour s'est essentiellement appuyée sur l'arrêt Thorson, précité, dans lequel le juge Laskin (plus tard Juge en chef) a dit, au nom de la majorité, à la p. 161:

> À mon avis, la qualité pour agir d'un contribuable fédéral qui cherche à contester la constitutionnalité d'une loi fédérale est une matière qui relève particulièrement de l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire des cours de justice, puisqu'elle se rapporte à l'efficacité du recours. La question de savoir si la question qu'on cherche à soulever peut être réglée par les tribunaux est au cœur de ce pouvoir discrétionnaire . . . [Je souligne.]

Je crois que ces arrêts ont clairement élargi le fondement de la qualité pour agir quand une loi précise fait l'objet d'une contestation fondée sur des moyens constitutionnels.

Il s'est produit deux changements importants dans la nature de l'action en l'espèce depuis que la Cour a reconnu à M. Borowski la qualité pour agir en 1981. D'abord la demande actuelle se fonde principalement sur l'allégation que le droit du fœtus à la vie et à l'égalité est garanti par les art. 7 et 15 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. Deuxièmement, en déclarant l'art. 251 inopérant, l'arrêt R. c. Morgentaler (n° 2), précité, a fait disparaître le contexte législatif de la demande.

Par application du par. 24(1) de la Charte et du par. 52(1) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982, il y

ble means of gaining standing under the Charter. Section 24(1) provides:

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

In my opinion s. 24(1) cannot be relied upon here as a basis for standing. Section 24(1) clearly requires an infringement or denial of a Charter-based right. The appellant's claim does not meet this requirement as he alleges that the rights of a foetus, not his own rights, have been violated.

Nor can s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 be invoked to extend standing to Mr. Borowski. Section 52(1) reads:

52. (1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

This section offers an alternative means of securing standing based on the Thorson, McNeil, Borowski trilogy expansion of the doctrine.

Nevertheless, in the same manner that the "standing trilogy" referred to above was based on a challenge to specific legislation, so too a challenge based on s. 52(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 is restricted to litigants who challenge a law or governmental action pursuant to power granted by law. The appellant in this appeal challenges neither "a law" nor any governmental action so as to engage the provisions of the Charter. What the appellant now seeks is a naked interpretation of two provisions of the Charter. This would require the Court to answer a purely abstract question which would in effect sanction a private reference. In my opinion, the original basis for the appellant's standing is gone and the appellant lacks standing to pursue this appeal.

Accordingly, the appeal is dismissed on both the grounds that it is moot and that the appellant lacks standing to continue the appeal. In my opinion, in a deux moyens d'avoir qualité pour agir en vertu de la Charte. Le paragraphe 24(1) dit:

24. (1) Toute personne, victime de violation ou de négation des droits ou libertés qui lui sont garantis par la présente charte, peut s'adresser à un tribunal compétent pour obtenir la réparation que le tribunal estime convenable et juste eu égard aux circonstances.

À mon avis, il n'est pas possible d'invoquer en l'espèce le par. 24(1) comme fondement de la qualité pour agir. Le paragraphe 24(1) exige expressément qu'il y ait violation ou négation d'un droit garanti par la Charte. La demande de l'appelant ne remplit pas cette condition puisqu'il allègue la violation des droits du fœtus, et non de ses propres droits.

On ne peut non plus se fonder sur le par. 52(1) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 pour reconnaître à M. Borowski qualité pour agir. Le paragraphe 52(1) dit:

52. (1) La Constitution du Canada est la loi suprême du Canada; elle rend inopérantes les dispositions incompatibles de toute autre règle de droit.

Ce paragraphe prévoit donc un autre moyen d'avoir qualité pour agir selon les trois arrêts qui ont étendu la doctrine relative à cette question, les arrêts Thorson, McNeil et Borowski.

Cependant ces trois arrêts portaient sur la contestation d'une loi précise et, de la même manière, une action fondée sur le par. 52(1) de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 doit se limiter à la contestation d'une loi ou d'un acte gouvernemental pris en vertu d'un pouvoir conféré par la loi. Ici, l'appelant ne conteste ni «une loi» ni un acte gouvernemental qui fait jouer les dispositions de la Charte. L'appelant demande une interprétation pure et simple de deux dispositions de la Charte. Pour ce faire, la Cour devrait ainsi répondre à une question totalement abstraite et, par la même occasion, sanctionner un renvoi d'initiative privée. À mon avis, le fondement initial de la qualité pour agir a disparu et le demandeur n'a plus qualité pour continuer ce pourvoi.

En conséquence, le pourvoi est rejeté et pour le motif qu'il est théorique et pour le motif que l'appelant n'a plus qualité pour agir. À mon avis, lieu of applying to adjourn the appeal, the respondent should have moved to quash. Certainly, such a motion should have been brought after the adjournment was denied. Failure to do so has resulted in the needless expense to the appellant of preparing and arguing the appeal before this Court. In the circumstance, it is appropriate that the respondent pay to the appellant the costs of the appeal incurred subsequent to the disposition of the motion to adjourn which was made on July 19, 1988.

au lieu de demander l'ajournement du pourvoi, l'intimé aurait dû demander son annulation. Cette demande aurait certainement dû être présentée après le refus de la demande d'ajournement. En ne le faisant pas, on a occasionné des dépenses inutiles à l'appelant en l'obligeant à préparer et soutenir le présent pourvoi. 2018 BCCA 282 (CanLII)

Summary:

Six public interest groups and the Attorney General of Ontario apply for intervenor status. The appeal is from an order striking down legislation on the administrative segregation of federally incarcerated inmates. Held: Applications of the public interest applicants granted; application of Ontario dismissed. The public interest applicants will bring unique and helpful perspectives to the issues on appeal. Ontario's proposed submissions, however, go beyond the proper role of an intervenor. In particular, Ontario seeks to duplicate the appellant's submissions, make arguments the appellant could have made but chose not to, and address issues outside the scope of the appeal and the evidentiary record.

[1] GARSON J.A.: This is the application of six public interest advocacy groups, as well as the Attorney General for Ontario, for intervenor status in the within appeal. The Attorney General of Canada appeals from the order of Justice Leask declaring unconstitutional certain provisions governing the administrative segregation of inmates in the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, S.C. 1992, c. 20 [CCRA]. The constitutional challenge was brought by the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association ("BCCLA") and the John Howard Society of Canada.

[2] The issues on the applications are whether any of the intervenors are proposing to impermissibly expand the scope of the appeal and whether they would bring a unique or helpful perspective to the appeal.

[3] The appeal is scheduled for two days on November 13 and 14, 2018.

Background

[4] The respondent BCCLA is a non-profit advocacy group whose aims include promoting and defending civil liberties in British Columbia and Canada. The respondent John Howard Society is a non-profit organization with a history of involvement in penal policy and corrections. At trial, Canada did not dispute that the BCCLA and John Howard Society had public interest standing to challenge the constitutional validity of federal administrative segregation legislation.

[5] In the underlying proceeding, the BCCLA and John Howard Society (collectively "respondents") challenged the constitutional validity of ss. 31–33 and

s. 37 of the CCRA. Section 31 of the CCRA says the purpose of administrative segregation is to maintain safety and security. Section 31 also provides for release of inmates from administrative segregation "at the earliest appropriate time". Under s. 31(3), a warden can order an inmate to be placed in administrative segregation if "satisfied that there is no reasonable alternative" and if he or she believes on reasonable grounds that (a) the inmate is a risk to security or safety, (b) segregation is necessary to prevent interference with an investigation, or (c) allowing the inmate to associate with other inmates would jeopardize the inmate's safety. The CCRA and the regulations provide for periodic internal review of an inmate's placement in administrative segregation.

[6] At trial, the respondents said the impugned provisions constituted an unjustifiable infringement of ss. 7, 9, 10, 12 and 15 of the Charter. The respondents alleged that the impugned legislation authorizes indeterminate and prolonged solitary confinement, which causes significant adverse health effects for inmates. They also challenged the lack of independent oversight of segregation placements. Finally, they said the impugned provisions had a disproportionate impact on Aboriginal inmates and inmates with mental illness.

Trial Judge's Decision

[7] In its factum on appeal, Canada conveniently summarizes the trial judge's decision:

> After a 36-day trial, the trial judge made a s. 52(1) declaration that the administrative segregation provisions (ss. 31-33 and 37) are invalid pursuant to s. 7 of the Charter to the extent that they authorize and effect prolonged, indefinite, administrative segregation for anyone; authorize and effect the institutional head to be the judge and prosecutor of his own cause; authorize internal review; and authorize and effect the deprivation of inmates' right to counsel at segregation hearings and reviews.
> The trial judge further declared that the administrative segregation provisions infringe s. 15 of the Charter to the extent that they authorize and effect any period of administrative segregation for the mentally ill or disabled, and authorize and effect a procedure that results in discrimination against Aboriginal inmates.
> The trial judge granted a 12-month suspension of this declaration from January 17, 2018, as an immediate declaration would pose a potential danger to the public or threaten the rule of law. He did not address the request for s. 24(1) relief.

Issues on Appeal

[8] Canada submits that the trial judge erred in law by holding that:

a) the administrative segregation provisions infringe s. 7 of the Charter to the extent they authorize and effect the prolonged, indefinite segregation of inmates, authorize and effect the institutional head to be the judge and prosecutor of his own cause, authorize internal review, and authorize and effect the deprivation of inmates' right to counsel at segregation hearings and reviews;

b) the administrative segregation provisions infringe s. 15 of the Charter for inmates with mental illness or disability, and that compliance with s. 15 precludes any period of administrative segregation for inmates with mental illness or disability;

c) any Charter infringements are not justified under s. 1 of the Charter, and

d) the appropriate remedy was to grant a s. 52(1) declaration that the administrative segregation provisions are constitutionally invalid, save as regards internal review of segregation decisions.

[9] In other words, Canada says that the impugned provisions, properly interpreted, do not violate s. 7 or s. 15 of the Charter. Canada submits that any infringement of the Charter is the result of the improper application of the legislation. It says the appropriate remedy is not to strike down the legislation, but rather for an aggrieved individual to seek a remedy under s. 24(1) of the Charter.

[10] Canada is not challenging the trial judge's finding of discrimination against Aboriginal inmates. Canada only challenges the trial judge's finding that infirmities in the implementation of the administrative segregation provisions in the case of Aboriginal inmates entitle the respondents to the relief declared under s. 52(1).

[11] The respondents frame the issues somewhat differently on appeal as follows:

Leask J. was correct that:

a) the impugned laws infringe s. 7 of the Charter because they authorize and effect prolonged, indefinite administrative segregation of inmates, authorize and effect the institutional head to be the judge and prosecutor of his own cause, authorize internal review, and authorize and effect the deprivation of inmates' right to counsel at administrative segregation hearings and reviews;

b) the administrative segregation provisions infringe s. 15 of the Charter for > inmates with mental illness or disability, and that compliance with s. 15 precludes any period of administrative segregation for inmates with mental illness or disability;

> c) any Charter infringements are not justified under s. 1 of the Charter, and granting a s. 52(1) declaration that the administrative segregation provisions are constitutionally invalid for the above reasons, and because they infringe s. 15 of the Charter for Aboriginal inmates.

[12] In the alternative, if the Court accepts Canada's position that declaratory relief under s. 52(1) was inappropriate in this case, the respondents say relief under s. 24(1) of the Charter is available to them. They say there is no principled reason to deny a corporate party with public interest standing the ability to challenge state action rather than legislation.

Law on Applications to Intervene in an Appeal

[13] Rule 36 of the Court of Appeal Rules governs applications for intervenor status:

> 36 (1) Any person interested in an appeal may apply to a justice for leave to intervene on any terms and conditions that the justice may determine.
>
> (3) In any order granting leave to intervene, the justice
>
> (a) is to specify the date by which the factum of the intervenor must be filed, and
>
> (b) may make provisions as to additional disbursements incurred by the appellant or any respondent as a result of the intervention.
>
>
> (5) Unless a justice otherwise orders, an intervenor
> (a) must not file a factum that exceeds 20 pages,
>
> (b) must include in the factum only those submissions that pertain to the facts and issues included in the factums of the parties, and
> (c) is not to present oral argument.

[14] There are generally two routes to intervenor status. First, an applicant can show a direct interest in the outcome of the proceeding. None of the proposed intervenors in this case have a direct interest. They must rely on the second route, which is available to applicants with a public interest in a public law issue. The legal criteria that apply to intervenor applications under this second route are well settled and may be summarized as follows:

a) Does the proposed intervenor have a broad representative base?
b) Does the case legitimately engage the proposed intervenor's interests in the public law issue raised on appeal?
c) Does the proposed intervenor have a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court in the resolution of the issues?
d) Does the proposed intervenor seek to expand the scope of the appeal by raising issues not raised by the parties?

See Guadagni v. B.C. (W.C.B. of B.C.) (1988), 30 B.C.L.R. (2d) 259 (Chambers); R. v. Watson and Spratt, 2006 BCCA 234 at para. 3 (Chambers); Canada (Attorney General) v. Aluminum Company of Canada Ltd. (1987), 35 D.L.R. (4th) 495 (B.C.C.A.); Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2012 BCCA 502 at paras. 24, 68 (Chambers); and Vincent v. Roche-Vincent, 2013 BCCA 136 at para. 4 (Chambers).

[15] I would add to these established criteria that the court may, where appropriate, give consideration to factors relating to the orderly and efficient administration of justice. Clearly the number of intervenors ought not to overwhelm the appeal in a manner that may be overly burdensome for the parties or the court. I have given consideration to this factor in my assessment of the totality of the applications.

[16] None of the applicants or the parties dispute the applicable legal test. Rather, it is the application of that test that is controversial in relation to some of the applications.

The Proposed Intervenors

[17] The proposed intervenors are the Attorney General of Ontario, the Canadian Human Rights Commission, the Criminal Defence Advocacy Society, the Canadian Prison Law Association, the Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies, and the Native Women's Association of Canada together with the West Coast Legal Education and Action Fund.

[18] I shall briefly comment on the organizational goals of the public interest advocacy groups below in my consideration of their individual applications for intervenor status. The Attorney General of Ontario's interest in the appeal relates to its administration of Ontario's provincial prison system and its pending legislation concerning solitary confinement.

2018 BCCA 282 (CanLII)

Individual Applications

[19] I now turn to the individual applications.

Attorney General of Ontario

[20] I begin with the intervenor application of the Attorney General of Ontario.

[21] In oral submissions, Ontario agreed to limit its intervention to the ground of appeal based on s. 7 of the Charter. On the basis of that revised submission, Canada withdrew its objection to Ontario being granted intervenor status. However, the respondents maintain their objection to Ontario's application.

> 15. Ontario will also highlight how administrative segregation in the provincial and territorial correctional setting differs from the federal setting, and how conditions of administrative segregation may differ across different institutions. For example, the majority of Ontario's inmates have been remanded pending criminal charges, which means that there is significant and frequent movement among the inmate population. This contributes to increased security concerns and more limited opportunities for programming, which impacts how the province can house inmates who present unique challenges. This would provide valuable context for this Court's deliberations in this appeal. It does not appear that any other province or territory intends to seek intervention status in the appeal.
> 16. Ontario can also provide a different perspective from Canada, in particular in relation to the application of the Charter s. 7 test. Canada has not addressed the security of the person interest in its memorandum of argument on appeal. Ontario can make useful submissions as to the proper application of the second stage of the s. 7 test in light of this interest. Ontario will argue > that the question of whether a deprivation of liberty is arbitrary or overbroad may be different than the question of whether a deprivation of security of the person also fails to accord with the principles of fundamental justice.

> 17. Given that Ontario has recently passed new legislation to reform the operation of correctional facilities in the province (Correctional Services and Reintegration Act, 2018), Ontario's new legislation may be placed before this Court. Ontario is best positioned to assist the Court in understanding the similarities and differences between the challenged federal legislation and Ontario's new legislation. Ontario's position would be that both the federal and the provincial legislation comply with the Charter, and reflect reasonable policy choices by different levels of government.
> 18. Finally, if granted leave to intervene, Ontario would support Canada's position that where a statute can be administered in a manner that complies with the Charter, any remedy lies under s. 24(1), rather than s. 52. Given the decision of the British Columbia Supreme Court in this case that there was no evidence to support a finding that the legislation breached s. 12 of the Charter, Ontario would submit that the same conclusion should have been drawn with respect to the s. 7 analysis and that the declarations of invalidity should not have been ordered. It is only where the statute cannot be administered in a fashion consistent with the Charter that a s. 52 declaration would be the appropriate remedy.

[23] The respondents' objection to Ontario's participation in the appeal is based on the following points:

a) Ontario's proposed submissions will expand the issues under appeal without any evidentiary basis to support those submissions. The respondents point to Ontario's proposed submissions regarding Ontario's provincial corrections system. Ontario says its perspective, based on its experiential role in administering a different correctional system, will be unique and valuable. The respondents submit that there is no evidence about Ontario's correctional system. They say Ontario's proposed intervention is an inappropriate attempt to supplement the record.

b) Ontario's proposed submissions on s. 7 of the Charter are either an expansion into issues that are not under appeal or a duplication of Canada's position. For example, Ontario proposes to address the security of the person interest because Canada has not addressed this point in its factum. The respondents say this is a misapprehension of the role of an intervenor, as it is for the parties to frame the issues on appeal.

c) Ontario proposes to support Canada's submissions on the appropriate constitutional remedy in this case. The respondents say Ontario does not identify any unique or different perspective that it might contribute on this point.

[24] I accept that the question of the constitutionality of the federal administrative segregation provisions legitimately engages Ontario's interests in the administration of its provincial corrections system. However, I am unable to discern any unique or helpful perspective that Ontario could bring to this appeal within the confines of the issues under appeal and the record, aside from replicating Canada's submissions.

[25] Ontario proposes to highlight how administrative segregation in the provincial and territorial correctional setting differs from the federal setting, particularly in light of the mobility of the provincial inmate population. Although this proposed submission avoids duplication of Canada's position, I was advised by counsel that there is nothing in the trial record concerning administrative segregation in the provincial system. Given that the record concerns only the federal corrections system, Ontario's submissions on this point appear to stray outside the scope of the issues on appeal and the record. I would, with great respect for Ontario's efforts to assist on this appeal, dismiss Ontario's application for leave to intervene.

Canadian Prison Law Association ("CPLA")

[26] CPLA is a national organization of Canadian lawyers and academics practicing and researching in the area of prison law. It was founded in 1985. CPLA engages in education and advocacy activities with the aim of promoting the constitutional rights of prisoners. Its activities include intervening in litigation, issuing publications, and making submissions to governments on prison law reform. CPLA's members have worked to reform the use of administrative segregation in federal institutions for decades. Its members also act for prisoners in matters arising from their placement in administrative segregation.

[27] Canada objects to CPLA's application because CPLA seeks to make submissions on the availability of relief under s. 24(1), an issue Canada says is not engaged on this appeal. Canada asserts that the respondents did not cross-appeal the trial judge's omission to grant relief under s. 24(1) and, accordingly, issues concerning s. 24(1) will not be before the court on appeal.

[28] In my view, the question of whether s. 24(1) might be engaged as an issue on appeal is not a question that could or should be decided on this application. Accordingly, I would not refuse intervenor status to a party proposing to make submissions about s. 24(1) on the grounds that it may not be an issue on the appeal. Such a determination would be premature. The question of whether s. 24(1) is engaged on this appeal is a question for the division hearing the appeal.

[29] If s. 24(1) ultimately becomes an issue, this proposed intervenor has a unique perspective from which to make submissions on this issue. CPLA does not take any position in respect to the availability of declaratory relief under s. 52(1). However, it does dispute Canada's position that relief under s. 24(1) is unavailable to public interest standing litigants. CPLA proposes to submit that seeking relief under s. 24(1) is impractical and unrealistic for the population it represents, namely inmates, because segregation status changes so quickly that an individual claim is generally moot before it reaches a hearing. This unique perspective is directly relevant to Canada's position that any remedy for Charter breaches should be sought by individual prisoners when their individual Charter rights are infringed.

[30] I would therefore grant CPLA intervenor status.

Canadian Human Rights Commission ("Commission") and Canadian Association of Elizabeth Fry Societies ("CAEFS")

[31] Neither Canada nor the respondents object to the intervenor applications of the Commission or CAEFS. However, Canada contends that these two public interest organizations should be granted status as a joint intervenor. Canada says both organizations seek leave to submit that the legislative provisions dealing with administrative segregation discriminate against female, Aboriginal and mentally disabled inmates. The trial judge held that the impugned provisions do not have a disproportionate effect on women (RFJ at para. 463) and that finding is not under appeal.

[32] The Commission says that, if granted leave to intervene, it will expand on the question of whether solitary confinement discriminates against vulnerable prisoners with mental disabilities, including female prisoners. It also proposes to make submissions on the failure of the impugned provisions to prevent discrimination and the need to interpret “mental disability” broadly and liberally.

[33] CAEFS proposes to make submissions along similar lines. It says its submissions will assert that segregation has disparate discriminatory impacts on vulnerable prisoners, particularly women prisoners who are Indigenous, classified as maximum security, or suffering from disabling mental health issues.

[34] These two organizations have quite different mandates.

[35] I agree with Canada that these two organizations propose to make similar submissions, but each will do so from their own different and unique perspective.

[36] I conclude that both groups should be granted intervenor status but they should not be compelled to do so jointly. I grant both applications.

Criminal Defence Advocacy Society (“CDAS”)

[37] CDAS intervened at trial. No party objects to its application. Canada voices some concerns about the intended scope of its planned submissions.

[38] CDAS is a British Columbia non-profit society engaged in advocacy, law reform, and education. It was formed in 2015 to fill a perceived need for an organization focused on criminal justice issues impacting defence counsel and their clients. Its membership is made up of over 300 lawyers and law students in British Columbia. CDAS says its members have significant experience with the Charter, including protecting the Charter rights of imprisoned clients and addressing Parliamentary committees on the constitutionality of proposed legislation.

[39] CDAS submits that its members collectively represent thousands of incarcerated individuals who may face administrative segregation. CDAS says the appeal raises public law issues that engage its interests in the rule of law and the constitutional rights of accused persons. It also says the criminal defence bar has an interest in the development of the law surrounding the rights under ss. 7, 9, 10, and 12 of the Charter, since those rights are often engaged in the criminal justice process.

[40] CDAS says it will bring a unique and useful perspective to the appeal because its members have expertise in the protection of the Charter rights of accused and incarcerated persons and on the constitutionality of legislation. Its members also have insights on the interaction between defence counsel and inmates in administrative segregation.

[41] In its intervention at trial, CDAS' submissions primarily addressed the lack of access to counsel during the segregation review process. On appeal, CDAS seeks to make submissions on the review process and the right to counsel for segregated inmates. In particular, CDAS proposes to make submissions on:

a) The informational and implementational duties that may arise upon administrative segregation under ss. 7 and 10(b) of the Charter;

b) The impacts of administrative segregation on rehabilitation and other sentencing principles; and

c) An analysis of how administrative segregation affects the fitness and proportionality of an offender's sentence.

[42] I accept that CDAS has a broad representative base, as demonstrated by its membership and activities. I am also satisfied that CDAS can bring a unique perspective to this case due to the expertise and experience of its members.

[43] I would grant CDAS leave to intervene provided its submissions do not expand upon the issues as framed by the parties.

Native Women's Association of Canada ("NWAC") and West Coast Legal Education and Action Fund ("West Coast LEAF")

[44] NWAC and West Coast LEAF apply jointly for intervenor status. The parties do not object to this joint application. Canada opposes the application insofar as the proposed intervenors seek to make submissions on constitutional remedies under s. 24(1).

[45] West Coast LEAF intervened at the trial before Leask J. Its submissions focused on the disproportionate impact of administrative segregation on individuals with intersecting markers of historic disadvantage, particularly Aboriginal women with mental illness. West Coast LEAF has intervened in numerous other cases at all levels of court with a focus on principles of substantive equality.

[46] NWAC is a national non-profit organization incorporated in 1974. It is an aggregate of provincial and territorial member associations. Its goal is to empower Indigenous women and further substantive equality for Indigenous women. It has a long-standing commitment to addressing the disproportionate criminalization and incarceration of Indigenous women.

[47] West Coast LEAF has experience in prison and sentencing reform. It says it has expertise on the ways that sex inequality intersects with other forms of disadvantage to contribute to the criminalization and over-incarceration of certain groups.

[48] If granted leave to intervene, West Coast LEAF and NWAC propose to bring an "intersectional" lens to the constitutionality of administrative segregation under s. 15 of the Charter. They seek to make submissions on the following issues: (a) how Indigenous women and women with disabling mental health issues experience segregation; (b) the disproportionate harms that arise from the use of ostensibly neutral classification or assessment tools in prisons; (c) the significance of the distinction between substantive and formal equality in the context of indirect discriminatory impacts of legislation; (d) the importance of less drastic alternatives to segregation for imprisoned women who are Indigenous and/or have disabling mental health issues; and (e) constitutional remedies, particularly the importance of making those remedies responsive to the needs of disadvantaged members of society.

[49] I am satisfied that both organizations have a broad representative base, as demonstrated by their membership, activities, and objectives. Further, I am satisfied that they have an interest in the public law issues on appeal. In particular, the appeal engages the constitutional rights of imprisoned Indigenous women, a group at the core of NWAC's work.

[50] For the reasons already given, I decline to make any order limiting submissions under s. 24(1).

[51] I would grant joint intervenor status to West Coast LEAF and NWAC.

[52] Finally, I recognize that in totality I have granted a large number of intervenor applications. However, their proposed submissions are quite narrowly focussed. I propose to make ancillary orders that will hopefully result in an appeal that does not overwhelm the parties or the court. It is my view that these intervenors do have unique and important perspectives from which they propose to address the legal issues.

Terms

[53] I make the following ancillary orders:

- Each intervenor is permitted to file and serve a factum not exceeding 10 pages in length on or before a date to be specified by this court. For clarity, NWAC and West Coast LEAF are permitted to file one joint factum not exceeding 10 pages in length.

- Each intervenor shall confine their submissions to issues that are raised by one or more of the parties. The intervenors are not permitted to adduce further evidence or otherwise supplement the record of the parties. They are not entitled to raise new issues or duplicate the arguments of the appellant or respondents.

- The appellant and the respondents are each entitled to file and serve one factum not exceeding 12 pages in response to all the factums of the intervenors who take a position adverse to that party's position, such factum to be filed and served on or before a date to be specified by the court.

- The requests by the intervenors to present oral argument are deferred to the division hearing the appeal.

- There shall be no costs or disbursements awarded to or against an intervenor in this appeal.

[54] In a separate case management order I shall set out the filing schedule for the intervenor factums and consolidated books.

Summary:

The Applicants seek an extension of time to apply for leave to intervene and an order granting them intervener status on an appeal from an opinion given under s. 86(1) of the Trustee Act as to whether Beacon Hill Park can be used by the homeless for temporary sheltering. Held: The applications for an extension of time and for leave to intervene are granted. The Applicants did not form a bona fide intention to intervene within the 14-day period following the filing of the appellant's factum, but it is in the interests of justice to grant the orders sought. Any prejudice caused by the late application can be remedied by constraining the scope of the intervention and requiring expeditious filing of the interveners' factum. The applicants have met the test for public interest intervention. They have a unique perspective that will assist the Court, as no parties to the appeal address how a restrictive interpretation of the Trust terms may affect future Indigenous cultural activity in the Park.

FITCH J.A.:

I. Nature of the Application

[1] The Songhees and Esquimalt Nations, collectively known as the Lekwungen people (the "Lekwungen"), seek leave to intervene on an appeal launched by the Province from a judicial opinion given by Justice Punnett on a question referred by the City of Victoria to the Supreme Court of British Columbia pursuant to s. 86(1) of the Trustee Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 464 [Trustee Act].

[2] The question that was referred to the Court by the City is this: "Can the land known as Beacon Hill Park, held in trust by the City of Victoria, be used by persons experiencing homelessness for temporary sheltering?"

[3] In reasons for judgment indexed as 2022 BCSC 284, Punnett J. answered the question in the negative. He held that use of the Park for temporary sheltering by the homeless is contrary to the express purpose of the Trust: preservation of the Park for the use, recreation and enjoyment of the public.

[4] As the application for leave to intervene was filed out of time, the Lekwungen also require an extension of time.

[5] The application for leave to intervene is brought pursuant to Rule 61 of the Court of Appeal Rules, B.C. Reg 120/2022 [Rules] and s. 30(a) of the Court of Appeal Act, S.B.C. 2021, c. 6 [Act]. The application for an extension of time to file the intervener application is brought pursuant to Rule 41 and s. 32 of the Act.

[6] The Province consents to the application to extend time and to the application to intervene. The City of Victoria also consents to the applications, provided that granting intervener status to the Lekwungen does not delay the hearing of the appeal. Mr. Shea Smith takes the same position as the City. The Province, the City and Mr. Smith all submit that the applicants have an interest in the public law issue raised on appeal and a unique perspective of which the Court should be informed before interpreting the terms of the Trust.

[7] The application to extend time and the application to intervene are opposed by the Friends of Beacon Hill Park ("FBHP"), who argue, among other things, that the applicants are seeking to raise a new issue at the eleventh hour that would effectively "hijack" the appeal.

[8] The appeal is set to be heard on November 14 and 15, 2022.

[9] For the reasons that follow, I grant the extension of time to file the application to intervene. I also grant the application to intervene on the conditions set out in these reasons.

II. Brief Overview

[10] On February 20, 1882, the Lieutenant Governor in Council granted the Park to the City of Victoria (the "City") pursuant to the Public Parks Act, 1876 by Crown Grant on Trust terms that the Park be "…for the use recreation and enjoyment of the public…".

[11] The Park is the primary park in Victoria and it has, over the years, been used for a variety of purposes.

[12] With the onset of COVID-19, homeless shelters in the Victoria area reduced capacity, which led to an increase in sheltering in the Park. To permit self-isolation, the City stopped enforcement of its prohibition on daytime sheltering, and amended its bylaw to permit daytime sheltering, provided certain conditions were met.

[13] The proceeding in the court below was formally commenced by the City on March 30, 2021. Section 86(1) of the Trustee Act provides that a trustee may, by petition, apply to the court for the opinion, advice or direction of the court on a question respecting the management or administration of the trust property. Section 86(2) of the Trustee Act contemplates the participation of interested persons in the proceeding.

[15] On April 13, 2021, a judge of the Supreme Court made an order requiring the giving of notice to all persons who may be interested in the question raised by the petition, and desirous of participating in the proceeding.

[16] The applicants did not respond to the City, nor did they seek to be added as respondents and heard on the question raised by the petition.

[17] The City did not take a position on how the question it referred to the Court should be answered, but submitted that the Crown Grant is a contractual document rather than a statutory enactment, and must be interpreted in accordance with the approach set out in Sattva Capital Corp. v. Creston Moly Corp., 2014 SCC 53.

[18] The Province argued that the Trust is a statutory instrument to be interpreted in accordance with constitutional obligations and in recognition of the fact that s. 7 of the Charter may be infringed by laws that prohibit homeless people from sheltering overnight in parks: see Victoria (City) v. Adams, 2009 BCCA 563. The Province also submitted that the question posed did not lend itself to a simple ‘yes’ or ‘no’ answer. The Province argued that temporary sheltering is a use by the public of the Park that is permitted by the terms of the Trust, but, nevertheless, a use that must be limited so as to preserve and maintain the Park as a nature park. The Province also submitted that the Court’s answer to the question should provide guidance to the City as to how it could balance the public interest in the Park with the s. 7 interests of those experiencing homelessness.

[19] Mr. Smith (a person who had sheltered in the Park), along with the Together Against Poverty Society, argued that there is nothing in the terms of the Trust that prohibits use of the Park by persons experiencing homelessness for shelter. Further, they argued that the Trust must be read in a manner consistent with Charter values.

[20] Like the City, FBHP argued that the Crown Grant is a contractual document. FBHP submitted that when interpreted through this lens, the Trust terms do not allow temporary sheltering.

[21] Justice Punnett concluded that the Trust is a contractual document rather than an enactment. He held that on a plain reading of the phrase “use, recreation and enjoyment”, sheltering is not a permitted use of the Park because it is not done for the purposes of recreation and enjoyment.

[22] The Province filed its notice of appeal on March 23, 2022. A timetable for the exchange of factums was fixed by Justice Groberman on June 13, 2022. The Province filed its factum on July 8, 2022.

[23] A person interested in an appeal must apply for leave to intervene 14 days after the appellant files its factum. The applicants were required to seek leave to intervene by no later than July 22, 2022.

[24] On September 1, 2022, counsel for the proposed intervener advised the parties who had participated in the petition proceeding that the Lekwungen “will likely be seeking [intervener] status” on the appeal. She advised that:

> The two nations plan on advancing the argument that any interpretation of the trust should be limited so as not to preclude potential future use of the park by indigenous communities for cultural uses, including burials or the interment of remains. To be clear, we will not be arguing that the trust should be read at this time to include those uses; rather, that any decision on the interpretation of the trust in this case should not exclude the possibility of the park being used for those purposes in the future.

2022 BCCA 383 (CanLII)

[25] The applications before me were not filed until September 26, 2022. I was advised at the hearing of the application that scheduling difficulties prevented the applications from being set down for hearing before yesterday.

[26] Unfortunately, the applications come before the Court a mere two weeks before the dates upon which the appeal is scheduled to be argued.

III. The Applicants

[27] The Songhees and Esquimalt are the descendants of the Lekwungen, who have historically used and occupied the lands and waters in present day Greater Victoria. The Park is located within the traditional territory of the Lekwungen and, according to the applicants, the Park is “an important place for Lekwungen history and cultural practices”. Chief Ron Sam of the Songhees Nation deposes that, historically, there was a small village on the site now occupied by the Park, and the area was used as a defensive site, as well as for fishing, for agriculture, and for burials.

[28] The applicants point out that the Songhees and Esquimalt reserves consist of relatively small parcels of land that must accommodate both member and non-member residents, along with businesses and services. Chief Sam deposes that excavations in the Greater Victoria area associated with development projects sometimes uncover ancestral remains that are then returned to the Lekwungen. These remains must then be re-interred in a culturally appropriate way. Due to the limited burial space remaining on the Songhees and Esquimalt reserve lands, the Lekwungen desire a suitable place to bury the remains of their ancestors. One option that has been considered is the establishment of a Lekwungen cemetery in the Park. Chief Sam also deposes that the Lekwungen hope to one day “use the Park for burials, the interment of remains, or other cultural purposes including the building of a long house”.

[29] The applicants insist, as they did in their September 1, 2022 communication to the parties, that they do not “[seek] to expand the hearing to deal with whether the Trust permits Indigenous cultural uses”. Rather, the applicants seek leave to advance what I would characterize as a protective position. Specifically, they seek leave to intervene to caution the Court about bringing an unnecessary and unduly restrictive interpretation to the Trust terms that could, perhaps even inadvertently, preclude future Indigenous uses of the Park. They submit that this issue can only be resolved on a record that will not be before the Court on this appeal and is, in any event, one that may best be addressed through consultation and negotiation.

IV. Law and Analysis

1. The Test for an Extension of Time to File the Intervener Application

[30] The well-known criteria on an application to extend time to commence an appeal were set out in Davies v. C.I.B.C. (1987), 15 B.C.L.R. (2d) 256 at 259–260, 1987 CanLII 2608 (C.A.) [Davies]:

> 1) Was there a bona fide intention to appeal?
> 2) When were the respondents informed of the intention?
> 3) Would the respondents be unduly prejudiced by an extension of time?
> 4) Is there merit in the appeal?
> 5) Is it in the interest of justice that an extension be granted?

[31] The “interests of justice” frame the overriding question and embrace the first four considerations; it is “the decisive question” on an application to extend time: Davies at 260–261.

[32] These factors can be modified to fit other circumstances, including when there has been a failure to take a timely step required in an appeal proceeding: Salfinger v. Salfinger, 2013 BCCA 217 at para. 16 (Chambers). I accept that the weight to be given to the Davies factors is a case-specific determination that must take account of the context in which an extension of time is being sought. I do not, however, accept the position of the applicants that the first and second factors have little or no application in this context.

Was there a bona fide intention to intervene?

[33] The FBHP say that the applicants have failed to demonstrate a bona fide intention to intervene. They rely on R. v. R.(L.G.), 1994 BCCA 1 at para. 31, for the proposition that a bona fide intention must be formed within the prescribed time period, but "was frustrated by matters which adequately explain the delay". The FBHP assert that the applicants have not provided any explanation for the delay in seeking leave to intervene, nor have they explained why they did not seek to be added as an interested party in the underlying petition.

[34] I agree with FBHP that the applicants have provided no explanation for the delay in filing the leave application between July 22 and September 26. On the evidence before me, the applicants have not established they had a bona fide intention to seek leave to intervene within the 14-day period following the filing of the appellant's factum.

[35] While this factor, standing alone, weighs against the granting of an extension of time, it must be assessed in light of the other considerations and with regard to the overall interests of justice: Irving v. Irving (1982), 38 B.C.L.R. 318 (C.A.) at para. 22, Chaube v. Campbell, 2004 BCCA 85 at para. 9 (Chambers), Rapton v. British Columbia (Motor Vehicles), 2011 BCCA 71 at para. 21 (Chambers).

When were the respondents informed of the intention to intervene?

[36] As noted, the appellant and respondents to the appeal were informed that the applicants would likely apply to intervene by email sent on September 1, 2022. I have nothing before me to confirm that the applicants informed the other parties of their settled intention to apply for intervener status until the application was filed on September 26, 2022.

Would the respondents be unduly prejudiced by an extension of time?

[37] The Lekwungen contend that the parties to the appeal would not be unduly prejudiced by granting an extension of time.

[38] The FBHP dispute this, pointing out that the Lekwungen applications have been brought shortly before the appeal hearing, and after factums and reply factums have already been exchanged. The FBHP emphasize that it is the only party on appeal to take the position that the judge was correct in his interpretation of the Trust. The FBHP argue that "any interpretation of the [Park] Trust to protect the [Lekwungen's] potential future cultural uses will require consideration of aboriginal rights in relation to [the Park]", which is a complex issue that cannot be assessed quickly or in the absence of a factual foundation. Citing Apsassin v. British Columbia (Oil and Gas Commission), 2004 BCCA 240 at para. 8, FBHP submit it would be unfair to impose upon them the burden of meeting these additional arguments.

[39] While I am sympathetic to FBHP's perspective, I am not convinced that granting the applications will, of necessity, broaden the scope of the appeal or require the resolution of Aboriginal rights in relation to the Park. As noted, the Lekwungen seek leave to intervene to ensure that, in resolving the appeal, an important point of view is not overlooked, and that the Court does not inadvertently speak to issues that implicate their interests and need not be resolved.

[40] Should the extension of time and leave to intervene be granted, it seems to me that the prejudice caused by the lateness of this application can be remedied by constraining the nature and scope of the intervention and requiring the applicant to expeditiously file its factum. On balance, I do not consider the prejudice caused to the parties, and FBHP in particular, to be fatal to the application.

Is there merit in the intervener's application?

[41] In my view, the Court would be assisted by having the submissions of the Lekwungen people on the potential implications to them of a restrictive interpretation of the terms of the Trust.

[42] Looking at the extension of time considerations collectively, and under the rubric of the interests of justice, I am satisfied that while many of the factors, viewed in isolation, militate against granting the order sought, the extension of time is nonetheless in the interests of justice. The application to extend time is granted. The time to apply for intervener status is extended to September 26, 2022, the date upon which the application was made.

2. The Test for Leave to Intervene in an Appeal

[43] There are generally two routes to intervener status: (1) the applicant demonstrates that they have a direct interest in a matter; or (2) the applicant has a public interest in the public law issue in question, and brings a different and useful perspective to the issue that will assist the court: British Columbia Civil Liberties Association v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 BCCA 282 at para. 14 (Chambers) [BCCLA].

[44] On this application, the Lekwungen seek to intervene under the second branch.

[45] As Justice Newbury confirmed in Linkletter v. Proctorio, Incorporated, 2022 BCCA 313 at para 14 (Chambers), despite the enactment of the new Rules, "the substantive considerations applicable to [intervener] applications remain the same as under the previous [Rules]".

[46] The criteria for public interest intervention were summarized in BCCLA at para. 14:

> a) Does the proposed [intervener] have a broad representative base?
>
> b) Does the case legitimately engage the proposed [intervener]'s interests in the public law issue raised on appeal?
>
> c) Does the proposed intervener have a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court in the resolution of the issues?
> d) Does the proposed intervener seek to expand the scope of the appeal by raising issues not raised by the parties?

[47] In deciding whether to grant public interest intervener status, the Court is concerned with ensuring that important perspectives are not overlooked. Prospective interveners must therefore demonstrate that it is in the Court's interest or, more broadly, the public interest to grant leave to intervene: Beaudoin v. British Columbia

(Attorney General), 2022 BCCA 66 at para. 12 (Chambers); Equustek Solutions Inc. v. Google Inc., 2014 BCCA 448 at para. 8 (Chambers) [Equustek].

Does the proposed intervener have a broad representative base?

[48] The applicants submit that the Songhees and Esquimalt have a broad representative base in that they collectively represent over 800 Indigenous people in the Greater Victoria area and are the descendants of the original occupants of the Park.

[49] The FBHP argue that the Lekwungen "do not have a sufficiently broad representative base". On this point, they rely on Snaw-Naw-As First Nation v. Canada (Attorney General), 2021 BCCA 89 at paras. 13, 32 (Chambers) [Snaw-Naw-As].

[50] In my view, Snaw-Naw-As is distinguishable on its facts. In that case, Justice Fisher found that the proposed intervener, Cowichan Tribes, did not have a broad representative base in part because it had initiated its own litigation that "[sought] the same relief against the same defendants respecting the same right of way": at para. 32. Its interests were found to prevail over the public interest. I would add that Justice Fisher also found that the perspective to be presented by the Cowichan Tribes duplicated the perspective presented by the Snaw-Naw-As First Nation: at para. 33.

[51] I accept that the Lekwungen have a broad representative base.

Does the case legitimately engage the proposed intervener's interests in the public law issue?

[52] The applicants say they have a legitimate interest in ensuring that, in addressing the question of whether the Trust permits sheltering in the Park, the Court does not reach an overly restrictive definition that would, without further argument, effectively forestall the Lekwungen's contemplated future uses of the Park.

[53] The FBHP submit that the Lekwungen have not identified a “distinct public interest”, but instead focus upon their own intended cultural uses of the Park. The FBHP argue that the Lekwungen have not demonstrated that it is in the Court’s interest or the public interest for their intervention to be heard.

[54] Respectfully, I disagree. As the Province notes in its appeal factum, it “…has granted other parks on similar terms to those in the Trust to other municipalities…” and, accordingly, “…there may be other parks held in trust by municipalities on similar terms…”. I accept that interpretation of this Trust might have a bearing on the acceptable use of other parks. Against this background, I am of the view that it is in the Court’s interest to hear how a restrictive interpretation of the Trust terms might constrain Lekwungen cultural use of the Park, because this could have a bearing, more generally, on First Nations’ cultural use of other parks granted in Trust on similar terms. In my view, this constitutes a public interest.

Does the proposed intervener have a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court in the resolution of the issues?

[55] The applicants submit that, given their historical and cultural connection to the Park, it is only the Lekwungen who can speak to its cultural activities in the Park, and the way in which a narrow interpretation of the Trust could conceivably impact these activities.

[56] The FBHP argue that, while the Lekwungen have a unique perspective on Aboriginal or treaty rights, this perspective is not of assistance to the Court in deciding the narrow question before it: whether the Trust permits sheltering in the Park by those experiencing homelessness.

[57] In addition, FBHP argues that courts are aware that their decisions may, and often do, have consequences that go beyond the interests of the immediate parties. In support of this proposition, FBHP directed my attention to Equustek and to Justice Groberman’s adoption in that case of the reasoning of Justice Esson in Hobbs v. Robertson, 2002 BCCA 168 at paras. 9–10.

[58] In my view, the Lekwungen do have a unique perspective that will assist the Court. At this point, each of the four parties to the appeal have filed a factum and a reply. As would be expected, none of the parties address how a restrictive interpretation of the Trust terms may affect future Indigenous cultural activity in the Park. I do not think that the Court can be taken to know the potential implications of its interpretation of the Trust terms on the Lekwungen peoples. I am satisfied that the Court will benefit from the perspective of the Lekwungen as an intervener in this appeal.

Does the proposed intervener seek to expand the scope of the appeal by raising issues not raised by the parties?

[59] The applicants claim they are not seeking to expand the scope of the appeal. The FBHP say the Lekwungen seek to expand the scope of the appeal to address a new issue—potential future use of the Park for Indigenous cultural practices.

[60] To assist me in assessing this issue, and at my request, counsel for the applicants provided me with a draft copy of the intervener's factum after the applications had been argued and the matter taken under reserve.

[61] Having reviewed the draft, I am satisfied the applicants are seeking only to caution against a restrictive interpretation of the Trust; they are not seeking, nor could they seek, an order from this Court that the Trust permits Indigenous cultural practices, including burial practices, in the Park. I say this because the question referred for judicial opinion relates solely to the issue of whether the Park can be used by persons experiencing homelessness for temporary sheltering. By the order made on June 8, 2021, no respondent was permitted to seek any relief or remedy beyond the question posed by the trustee under s. 86(1) of the Trustee Act. Further, as Punnett J. observed in his reasons for judgment, "The Court is not being asked to answer questions of what particular uses are permitted under the Trust…The Court is only being asked to provide its advice, opinion or direction on the question posed.": at para. 11.

[62] In my view, FBHP's concerns about expanding the scope of the appeal can be addressed by attaching conditions to the order granting intervener status.

[63] Ultimately, I am of the view that the applicants have established that the criteria for public interest intervention are met in this case.

V. Disposition

[64] The extension of time to file an application for leave to intervene is granted as is the application for leave to intervene.

[65] I consider it appropriate to attach the following conditions to the order permitting the Lekwungen to intervene:

a) The submissions of the interveners will be limited to cautioning the Court against adopting a restrictive interpretation of the Trust terms that could preclude Indigenous uses of the Park. For clarity, the interveners shall not advance an argument that the Trust terms permit use of the Park for Indigenous cultural purposes;

b) The interveners shall not advance an argument respecting the standard of review applicable to the order made below;

c) The Lekwungen shall not be permitted to adduce new evidence or otherwise seek to supplement the appeal record;

d) The Lekwungen will file one factum, not to exceed 8 pages in length; and

e) The Lekwungen will file their factum and deliver it to the parties on or before November 3, 2022.

[66] The parties have leave to file five-page factums in response to the interveners. Those factums shall be filed on or before November 9, 2022.

[67] It will be for the division that hears the appeal to decide if the intervener should be given the opportunity to make oral submissions and, if so, the time that should be allotted for this purpose.

[68] The intervener will not be liable for or entitled to any costs on this motion or on the appeal.

Court of Appeal for British Columbia
C. R. F. Holdings Ltd. v. Fundy Chemical International Limited
Date: 1981-12-29

R. Brock and P. G. Foy, for appellant Smerchanski.

D. B. Kirkham, for appellant Fundy Chemical International Limited.

J. Cram and J. Ince, for respondents.

(Vancouver No. CA800750)

[1] 29th December 1981. CRAIG J.A.:— The defendants appeal from the finding that a contract for the sale of property made on 6th December 1974, was induced by "deceit and fraudulent misrepresentation" and that the defendants are liable for the resulting damages. The facts and circumstances are set out in the report [1980 CanLII 586 (BC SC), 21 B.C.L.R. 345, 14 C.C.L.T. 87], and I will not reiterate them. The plaintiffs, alleging that C.R.F. Holdings Ltd. had been induced to enter into a contract to purchase the Anvil Way property by the fraud and deceit of Smerchanski, acting in his capacity as officer and agent for Fundy Chemical International Limited, claimed: (1) damages from both defendants for fraud and deceit: and (2) alternatively, damages from Smerchanski for breach of warranty of authority and for negligence. The plaintiffs contend that Smerchanski's statements regarding the slag, including a statement that it "makes excellent fill", were meant to convey the view that the slag was harmless and could remain on the property, or be removed from the property, at the will of the owner, and that this was fraudulent, because Smerchanski knew that the slag was radioactive and thus not harmless and knew also that possession of and movement of the slag was subject to the direction and order of the Atomic Energy Control Board. In alleging, alternatively, that Smerchanski was negligent, the plaintiff said that Smerchanski was negligent in:

(a) not informing the plaintiff that the said slag material was radioactive;

(b) not informing the plaintiff that the Atomic Energy Control Board permits were required to possess the material and had to be renewed each year and that the material could not be disposed of without the permission of the Atomic Energy Control Board;

(c) not informing the plaintiff that some of the radioactive material had already been buried on the site, the said defendant failing to inform the plaintiff as to where it was buried, or that it was in fact buried under a building where personnel would be working; and

(d) failing to inform the plaintiff that the presence of the radioactive material resulted in restrictions upon the use or future use that could be made of the property.

In his factum, counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that, even if Faessler had not asked Smerchanski about the slag, Smerchanski had a duty to disclose all the circumstances pertaining to the slag, particularly the radioactive nature of it, and because: (1) the radioactivity of the slag was a latent defect; (2) the radioactive slag was a dangerous substance; and (3) the Atomic Energy Control Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. A-19, and the regulations imposed a duty to disclose fully the possible dangers to any person who might be interested in the property. Although counsel for Fundy dealt with these submissions in his factum in reply, he objected at the hearing of the appeal to the plaintiffs relying on them because they had not specifically relied on these points before the trial judge. The counsel for the plaintiffs then moved to amend the statement of claim to include these three allegations, contending that the breach of these duties amounted to: (a) fraud; or, alternatively, (b) negligence. Having examined the pleadings and considered the submissions of counsel. I think that para. 6 and para. 12 of the amended statement of claim permit the raising of these arguments on the issue of negligence and that the amendment is unnecessary with regard to these issues. In the same notice of motion, counsel for the plaintiffs contended also that these duties would support the proposition that "there was an implied term, or warranty in the contract to purchase that there was no radioactive material on the property. As I think the issue of liability in this case can be resolved on the basis of fraud, I do not propose to deal with this particular aspect of the motion other than to say that I would not be disposed to allow the amendment. As I think the issue of liability in this case can be resolved on the basis of fraud. I do not propose to deal with this particular aspect of the motion other than to say that I would not be disposed to allow the amendment.

[2] The appellants challenge the finding that Smerchanski was deceitful, contending that he was not deceitful and that, even if he had been, his deceit did not induce the contract, and challenge also the basis upon which the judge assessed the damages, contending that he erred in principle. Concerning the claim in negligence, the appellants submit that Smerchanski did not owe a duty to the respondents to disclose the fact that the slag was radioactive and that, therefore, there could not be a finding of negligence. Counsel for the appellants rely on the statement in Derry v. Peek (1889), 14 App. Cas. 337 at 374 (H.L.), that in order to sustain an action of deceit there must be proof of fraud, and submit that a false statement which is made in the honest belief that it is true is not fraudulent. They contend: (1) that the statement that the slag would make "excellent fill" was true; and (2) that, in any event, Smerchanski honestly believed it to be true and therefore the statement was not deceitful. They submit that Smerchanski's belief was clearly justified by Welsh's letter of 21st December 1971, which authorized the appellant to use the slag material on the property as land-fill, providing the property would not be subsequently used for residential development. They submit that the trial judge did not give due weight to this letter and he thereby erred. They submit that, if there was any deception, it was caused by the initial silence on the question of radioactivity. They submit that the statement that the slag made "excellent fill" did not "increase" or "contribute" to the deception. Counsel for Fundy submitted also that:

> It is not the law that any statement automatically triggers the obligation of full disclosure. The vendor may maintain silence, with impunity, regardless of his fraudulent intent. He may also make statements, provided those statements with themselves are not misleading. If the purchaser is deceived by what is withheld there is no cause of action unless the statement actually made caused the deception.

[3] I think that anyone in Smerchanski's position would be entitled to infer from the letter of 21st December that he could use the slag as land-fill on his industrial property and that, to the extent that he actually used it for fill, he would not require a yearly licence to possess the slag. During argument, I inclined to the view that the trial judge had unduly discounted the effect of the letter on the mind of the reader, but, having analyzed the judgment, I have concluded that, while he may have attached less importance than he should have done, he based his conclusion on the evidence generally. Obviously, he did not regard Smerchanski as a completely credible witness, preferring the evidence of Faessler to that of Smerchanski where there was a conflict. The trial judge said that, although the letter was capable of the interpretation that the slag could be used as land-fill on the property, as Smerchanski contended, it did not amount to an exemption to Smerchanski from obtaining a yearly licence for the possession of the slag. He refused to accept Smerchanski's testimony on this issue, stating [p. 94] that:

> … Mr. Smerchanski was still well aware at the time of sale that most of the slag was in no way disposed of, but was stored in a stockpile and in drums.

[4] The trial judge pointed out that only some of the slag material had been used as fill and that most of the slag was stockpiled, either in bulk or in drums, and that until such time as Smerchanski used the slag as fill he had to have a licence to possess the slag on the property. The judge considered that when Faessler inquired about the slag

Smerchanski was bound to reveal that the slag was radioactive and was subject to the control of the Atomic Energy Control Board, and that his failure to do so in a statement that the slag made "excellent fill" was calculated to deceive Faessler and did deceive him. He referred to a passage in Spencer Bower and Turner on Actionable Misrepresentation, 3rd ed. (1974), at p. 94:

> To state a thing which is true only with qualifications or additions known to, but studiously withheld by, the representors, is to say the thing which is not. Such a statement is a "lie", and one of the most dangerous and insidious forms of lie.

[5] Counsel for the appellant submit that this is a finding of law. I think, however, that it is a finding of fact, and I proceed on the premise that an appellate court should not set aside findings of fact, particularly those based on credibility, nor substitute its interpretation of the evidence as a whole for that of the trial judge's, unless it is satisfied that his conclusion is "plainly wrong".

[6] I think that there is evidence upon which the trial judge could find, as he did find, that the statement was deceitful and was intended to be deceitful.

[7] Mr. Kirkham argues that, even if Smerchanski intended to deceive Faessler and did in fact deceive him, the plaintiffs cannot maintain an action for deceit because the statement did not induce the contract. He points out that on 28th November 1974 Faessler made, an offer to purchase the land for $243,000 to Smerchanski's real estate agent, and that the slag was not a material factor in that offer. He says that Faessler met Smerchanski only on or about 6th December, when Smerchanski made a counter-offer of $260,000, which Faessler agreed to pay. He submits that Faessler wanted the property primarily because it was in the right location and provided ample room for expanding his industrial activities. He says that the slag was not a marerial consideration in the purchase and that Faessler would have purchased the property regardless of the slag. He says that the radioactivity of the slag was not a matter of great public concern in 1974.

[8] I have found this to be a very difficult aspect of this case. What constitutes an inducement depends on the circumstances of each case. There may be only one thing which induces a transaction, or there may be several things collectively which induce it. Whether it be one thing or several things, it must be a material factor, not merely an incidental factor. In Hinchey v. Gonda, [1955] O.W.N. 125 (H.C.), Schroeder J. said at p. 126:

> In order that a misrepresentation, whether innocent or fraudulent, may support an action or a defence, it is essential that it should be material in its nature, that it should be intended to be acted upon and should be a determining ground of the transaction [citing among other cases, Smith v. Chadwick (1884), 9 App. Cas. 187 (H.L.)].

> A misrepresentation, to be material, must be one necessarily influencing and inducing the transaction and affecting and going to its very essence and substance. Misrepresentations which are of such a nature as, if true, to add substantially to the > value of property, or are calculated to increase substantially its apparent value, are material.

[9] I agree with this statement, and, having regard to it, I have had some difficulty in accepting that the representation regarding the slag was a material factor in inducing this sale. On the other hand, the judge accepted Faessler's testimony that he would not have purchased the property had he known that the slag was radioactive, and concluded that the representation had been a material inducement. I think that the matter is borderline, but I am not prepared to say that the judge was plainly wrong in holding that this was a material misrepresentation that induced the contract.

[10] The question of damages poses many difficulties. Generally, the measure of damages in a fraud action involving the sale of land is the difference between the price paid and the actual value of the property purchased: Hepting v. Schaaf, 1963 CanLII 93 (SCC), [1964] S.C.R. 100, 46 W.W.R. 161, 43 D.L.R. (2d) 168. The object of an award of damages is to compensate the plaintiff for the loss which he has suffered insofar as he can be reasonably compensated by money. The relevant date for measuring the damages is, normally, the time of the deceit. In this case, the trial judge concluded that the total damages should include not only the normal loss but also consequential losses, and that the date for determining the loss was not the date of the deceit (6th December 1974), but rather the date of the discovery of the deceit (December 1976), and that, insofar as the damages included the cost of the repairs necessitated by the deceit, the costs of the repairs should be assessed as of the date of the trial (February 1980). The trial judge's reason for so concluding was that this was necessary to make the plaintiff "financially whole", stating at p. 108:

> While the Court must, I think, assess damages with a view to making the plaintiffs whole in the sense of being in the financial position they would have been in had the land been free from contamination at the end of 1976, when they discovered the fraud, that can in this case be done only by awarding the cost of placing the land in the physical condition which it ought to have been in had the representation been true.

[11] In summary, the trial judge awarded the plaintiffs a total of $458,700 damages — $415,000 relating to the Anvil Way property, the property which was the subject of the sale, and $43,700 relating to the 116th Avenue property, on the following basis:

Anvil Way property

[12] C.R.F Holding (including $315,000 for removing and disposing of fill) — $400.000; Comor Supplies Ltd — $15,000; showing a total of $415,000 (including $315,000 for the removal of the slag which was used as fill).

116th Avenue property

[13] Faessler (this is made up of $37,500 for the reduction in value of property plus $2,000 for the cost of relocating the slag on the property) — $39,500; Comor Supplies

Ltd. — $4,200; Total — $43,700. The $4,200 is apparently for storage costs. The trial judge awarded prejudgment interest of $6,200 of the total amount awarded.

Total — $428,700.

[14] Counsel for the appellants submit that the trial judge erred in principle in calculating damages in two respects: (1) he erred in considering that damages must be calculated on the basis that the representation was true, and (2) he erred in considering consequential loss. They submit that the measure of damages in the case of deceit relating to the sale of land is the price paid for the land less the actual value of it.

[15] The cases dealing with deceit state that generally the measure of damages is the price paid for the property less the actual value. The case usually cited as authority for this proposition is McConnel v. Wright, [1903] 1 Ch. 546, a decision of the English Court of Appeal, which was cited with approval by the Supreme Court of Canada in Hepting v. Schaaf, supra, and this court in Zorzi v. Baker (1957), 1957 CanLII 284 (BC CA), 8 D.L.R. (2d) 164. The statement that the normal measure of damages in a deceit action is the price paid for the property less the actual value might appear to preclude a consideration of consequential loss. I think that the Hepting case and the Zorzi case do not preclude us from holding that consequential loss may be a proper consideration in awarding damages for deceit relating to the sale of land and that, on principle, consequential loss may be a proper consideration in such a case. The most authoritative case on this subject is Doyle v. Olbe (Ironmongers) Ltd., [1969] 2 Q.B. 158, [1969] 2 All E.R. 119, a decision of the English Court of Appeal, a case dealing with deceit in the sale of a business. In the course of his judgment, Lord Denning M.R. referred to the judgment of Collins M.R. in McConnel v. Wright, supra, and referred to the comments of Lord Atkin in the case of Clark v. Urquhart; Stracey v. Urquhart, [1930] A.C. 28 at 67-68 (H.L.), where Lord Atkin said:

> I find it difficult to suppose that there is any difference in the measure of damages in an action of deceit depending upon the nature of the transaction into which the plaintiff is fraudulently induced to enter. Whether he buys shares or buys sugar, whether he subscribes for shares, or agrees to enter into a partnership or in any other way alters his position to his detriment, in principle, the measure of damages should be the same, and whether estimated by a jury or a judge. I should have thought it would be based on the actual damage directly flowing from a fraudulent enducement. The formula in McConnel v. Wright [supra] may be correct or it may be expressed in too rigid terms.

Lord Denning M.R. (at p. 167) concluded that Collins M.R. had indeed expressed himself "in too rigid terms". He compared the damages assessable in contract and in fraud, and said:

> In contract, the damages are limited to what may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties. In fraud, they are not so limited. The defendant is bound to make reparation for all the actual damages directly flowing from the fraudulent inducement …

> All such damages can be recovered: and it does not lie in the mouth of the fraudulent person to say that they could not reasonably have been foreseen.

[16] I query whether Lord Denning M.R. is right when he suggests, as he apparently does, that foreseeability can never be a factor in considering what damages are recoverable in a case of fraud. I think that in some cases, at least, foreseeability may be a factor in the assessment of damages, particularly on the issue of remoteness.

[17] Although the judge did not use the phrase "consequential damage", he obviously considered that consequential loss was a factor in the damage award. While I think that the judge was correct in concluding that consequential loss was a factor in the damage award, I think that he erred in proceeding on the premise that the plaintiffs should be put in the financial position in which they would have been had the representation been true. I think that the authorities support the view that in a deceit action the plaintff would be placed in the financial position in which he would have been had the representation not been made.

[18] Counsel for the defendant Smerchanski took the position at the trial that the basis for a damage award in the event that there is deceit was the difference between the price paid and the actual value of the property. He did not, however, lead any evidence at the trial regarding the actual value of the property at the time of the alleged fraud, namely, 6th December 1974. Counsel for the plaintiff did not adduce any evidence regarding this value. There is nothing in the evidence, so far as I can ascertain, from which the trial judge could infer the value of the land at the time of the misrepresentation. Although the judge did not make a finding regarding the actual value of the land at the time of the deception, he did conclude that the value of the land at the time of the discovery of the deception was approximately $150,000. I think that the judge initially should have attempted to ascertain the normal measure of damages, that is, the difference between the price paid and the actual value of the property. This would involve a consideration of to what extent the slag had reduced the value of the property. If, for example, the actual value of the property on 6th December 1974, was, say, $150,000, the normal measure of damages would be $110,000. Following this, the trial judge should have considered whether there was consequential loss and whether an award should be made for such loss. As I understand his reasons for judgment, he treated the cost of removal of the slag, namely, $315,000, as consequential loss. I think that he erred in including this whole amount as part of the consequential award, because this in effect would be awarding damages to the plaintiff on the basis of the value of the property had the representation been true. Whether any portion of this amount should be treated as consequential loss for the purpose of the damage award, or whether, indeed, there is any consequential loss, should be the subject of argument and, if necessary, evidence.

[19] I think that the trial judge was correct in treating the decrease in value of the 116th Avenue property in the sum of $37,500 as consequential loss and also in awarding a further sum of $2,000 with respect to the cost of relocating the barrelled slag on the 116th

Avenue property, but I do not see how an award of $4,200 for storage of the barrelled slag can be properly considered a consequential item, and I would not make any allowance for this aspect of the case.

[20] I think that the trial judge should have awarded prejudgment interest with regard to the damage to the Anvil Way property from 6th December 1974 and should have awarded prejudgment interest with regard to the diminution in value of the 116th Avenue property from the date that the slag was put on that property.

[21] Initially I was inclined to the view that we should hear further argument on consequential loss and attempt to assess the damages. On further consideration, I have come to the conclusion that this would be inappropriate and that the proper course would be to remit the matter to the trial judge for argument and evidence on the aspect of consequential loss. I regret that this is necessary, in view of the fact that this matter has been before the courts for some time, but I think that it is the most appropriate course in the circumstances. I would therefore dismiss the appeal from liability but allow the appeal from the assessment of damages and remit the matter to the trial judge for reassessment. As success has been divided, I would not make any order as to costs.

[22] MACDONALD J.A.:— I agree with my brother Craig in dismissing the appeal against the learned trial judge's finding of liability in damages for deceit [1980 CanLII 586 (BC SC), 21 B.C.L.R. 345, 14 C.C.L.T. 87]. With respect, I do not share his concern with regard to the element of inducement. The judge must have accepted Faessler's evidence that he would not have bought the property if he had known that the slag was radioactive. Certainly, in 1976 the public attitude with respect to disposal of radioactive waste became more severe. But it must have been a subject of considerable concern in December 1974. Otherwise Smerchanski would have given a truthful answer to Faessler's inquiry. He made a deceitful statement because he was afraid that telling the truth would have resulted in no sale. On the balance of probabilities, the transaction would not have proceeded as it did without the deceitful statement.

[23] The judge faced a particularly difficult problem in the assessment of damages. The defendants, citing Sorenson v. Kaye Holdings Ltd., 1979 CanLII 621 (BC CA), [1979] 6 W.W.R. 193, 14 B.C.L.R. 204, submitted to him that the correct measure of damages was the difference between the price paid and the actual value of the property purchased. The judge's concern with that submission is apparent from this passage in his reasons [p. 355]:

> In the present case, it is therefore clear that were only the actual purchase of the land and chattels involved, the damages, assuming they had been proved, would be related to the $260,000 which Mr. Faessler's company actually paid. In this litigation, however, unlike the Sorenson case, the claim is based on much more than an improvident purchase. The plaintiffs here were led by the deceptive statement of the defendants into spreading radioactive material over the land and building on it, and into moving material in barrels to another site, so as to infect a second parcel which Mr. Faessler controlled.

> The approach for which the plaintiffs in effect contend is that of simply taking present-day cost of excavation, removal and disposal of the radioactive waste, adding to it an allowance for business disruption and residual injurious affection, and using this as the measure of damages resulting from the misrepresentation of five and a half years ago.

[25] This was the judge's resolution of the problem [p. 362]:

> While the court must, I think, assess damages with a view to making the plaintiffs whole in the sense of being in the financial position they would have been in had the land been free from contamination at the end of 1976, when they discovered the fraud, that can in this case be done only by awarding the cost of placing the land in the physical condition which it ought to have been in had the representation been true.

[26] The learned judge proceeded to assess in accordance with this principle. I agree with the defendants that he erred in so doing.

[27] I endeavour now to state how the assessment of damages in this case ought to be undertaken. Firstly, the long-established measure of damages for the tort of deceit ought to be applied. That is that the damages are the difference between the price paid and the actual value of the property purchased: Zorzi v. Barker (1957), 1957 CanLII 284 (BC CA), 8 D.L.R. (2d) 164 (B.C.C.A.); Hepting v. Schaaf, 1963 CanLII 93 (SCC), [1964] S.C.R. 100, 46 W.W.R. 161, 43 D.L.R. (2d) 168; and Sorenson v. Kaye Holdings Ltd., supra. The price, of course, is $260,000. But there is no finding of actual value as at 6th December 1974, and this court cannot make that finding. So the calculation cannot yet be made.

[28] When that calculation is completed, one goes on to consider consequential loss. The right to recover for such loss did not have to be decided in the cases in which the established rule for the measure of damages in deceit was applied. The learned trial judge was of the opinion, in taking as authority the judgment of the English Court of Appeal in Doyle v. Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd., [1969] 2 Q.B. 158, [1969] 2 All E.R. 119, that damages for consequential loss could be awarded. I agree with that opinion. Now a claim for such damages has to be considered here with respect to the $318,400 spent on improvements to the contaminated property in 1975, before the plaintiffs were aware of the deception. It is an assessment which this court is not in a position to make. The plaintiffs carry the onus of proof. The mere expenditure of the money is not proof of loss. And it is clear that there has not been loss to the total amount spent. The expenditure created facilities which have been used to facilitate the business of the plaintiff Comor Supplies Ltd. for some five years up to date of trial. A number of factors have to be weighed in the assessment of the loss, if any. It is undesirable to discuss the matter further before the assessment takes place.

[29] The plaintiff Faessler claims consequential loss, arising out of the deceit, with respect to the 116th Avenue property. The trial judge allowed him $37,500 for diminution in value due to the presence of the radioactive material on that property, and $2,000, being the cost of relocating the barrels on the land. In my opinion, that was a proper assessment of consequential loss, and I would not disturb those awards. In addition, he awarded the plaintiff Comor Supplies Ltd. $4,200 for storage of the barrels. In my opinion, that is too remote and cannot be considered a loss flowing from the deception. It should be disallowed.

[30] I would remit the matter to the trial judge to complete the assessment of damages. He will have to consider the application of prejudgment interest to amounts he awards. As success has been divided, the respondents succeeding upon the issue of liability and the appellants upon the issue of damages, I would allow no costs.

[31] ANDERSON J.A. (dissenting in part):— This is an appeal from the judgment of Taylor J. [1980 CanLII 586 (BC SC), 21 B.C.L.R. 345, 14 C.C.L.T. 87], awarding damages for fraud against both appellants.

[32] The reasons for judgment of the learned trial judge insofar as the issue of liability is concerned read as follows [pp. 346-53]:

> The defendant Mark Smerchanski, a consulting geologist, promotor of mining and metallurgical enterprises and former Member of Parliament, sold four acres of land in Surrey to the plaintiff Court Faessler, a wire rope dealer, in December 1974, after having told him that certain material piled there made "excellent fill" but without having mentioned it was radioactive waste.
>
> Relying on what Mr. Smerchanski had said, and in ignorance of that which he had not, Mr. Faessler thereafter spread this material over the property, put a warehouse addition and blacktopped cable storage area on top of it, and moved some of the material which had been put in drums to a piece of land he owned nearby. In December 1976, officials of the Atomic Energy Contol Board, alerted to certain dangers caused by such low-grade radioactive material, set out on a search for Mr. Smerchanski's waste, and found most of it beneath Mr. Faessler's warehouse and yard. The visit, which was well publicized, has been followed by three years of intensive investigation and paper work and expressions both of governmental disapproval and reassurance concerning the presence of radioactive waste in a populous Vancouver suburb.
> Governmental action to date has been restricted to such expressions of concern and has stopped short of any actual remedy. While a substantial amount of public money has been spent on departmental investigations and demonstrations of interest, actual removal of waste has proved politically impossible. The federal government position is that the material ought to have gone to an approved radioactive waste disposal site. The only such disposal site in Canada is at Chalk River, Ontario, and the Ontario government position is that it is not to be used as a dumping ground for nuclear waste from other provinces. The position of the government of British Columbia to date is that it will not authorize disposal of radioactive waste anywhere in this province. The position of the federal Atomic Energy Control Board, as explained at trial, is that it will take away the slag stored in drums if it can find somewhere to put it, but it has given no undertaking with respect to the material under Mr. Faessler's plant. The board has insisted that the latter material does not represent a health hazard. The board's efforts to discover and expose the material have suggested to some, however, that it does and there are those, too, who wonder why the board would undertake to remove the material stored in drums if it did not. The plaintiff says the principal result of governmental activity to date has probably been to render his land the least desirable piece of industrial property in the Lower Mainland, and thus destroy most of its value.

It is against this background that Mr. Faessler and his companies seek to recover damages for fraud and negligent misrepresentation against Mr. Smerchanski and his company, and the latter counterclaim for defamation, alleging that the plaintiffs exceeded the bounds of truth and fair comment in the manner in which they chose to describe Mr. Smerchanski's conduct to the newspapers.

(1) The Defendant's Justification

Departing somewhat from his evidence on examination for discovery, Mr. Smerchanski conceded at trial that he did not tell Mr. Faessler that the slag contained radioactive material.

Mr. Smerchanski's reason for saying that it made good fill constitutes his defence and his justification for his silence on a subject which, had it been mentioned, must surely have had a marked impact on any potential purchaser. The material is waste remaining after the extraction of columbium, an agent used for hardening steel, from columbium concentrates containing thorium, which had been imported by the corporate defendant from the United States with permission of the Atomic Energy Control Board. The waste contains approximately two per cent thorium, which is a radioactive mineral and "prescribed substance" under the Atomic Energy Control Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. A-19. The regulations enacted pursuant to the Act provide that no person shall have possession of any thorium-bearing material except under licence from the board, unless the proportion of thorium contained is less that .05 per cent by weight. Both the concentrate imported by the corporate defendant and the resulting slag contained at least 20 times this maximum thorium content, so that a licence was required both for possession of the concentrate and for possession of the waste material after removal of the columbium.

During 1971 Mr. Smerchanski, then a Member of Parliament, had communications with the Radiation Protection Division of the Department of Health and Welfare, which was carrying out certain responsibilities of the Atomic Energy Control Board. These communications resulted in a letter of 21st December 1971 from that department in the following terms:

"21 December, 1971

"Dear Mr. Smerchanski:

"This Division has recently granted health approval for the issuance of a Permit to allow you to procure a quantity of columbium containing approximately 2% thorium. This Permit should be forthcoming from the Atomic Energy Control Board in the near future.

"On this Permit there is a condition covering the disposal of wastes containing thorium. The usual procedure for disposal of unwanted radioactive material is shipment to Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, Ottawa for burial at their Chalk River site; however this method of disposal becomes quite unrealistic for the volume of thorium-bearing wastes which you will be disposing of. As an alternative, since the wastes will only contain about 2% thorium, the slag material from your process could be used for land fill on your property in an area which will not be subsequently used for residential developments. This waste material could also be use for land fill off your property, railway and road bedding, etc,; however these latter methods of disposal would require prior approval of the Atomic Energy Contol Board.

"I trust that the above information will be of some assistance to you in disposing of your unwanted waste materials. Should you require any further information, please feel free to get in touch with us.

"Yours sincerely,

" 'W. J. Welsh'

"W. J. Welsh

Radioisotope Safety Officer."

The board received a copy of this letter and, by its subsequent silence, may be taken to have adopted it content. On 5th January 1972 the board issued the promised licence authorizing importation of 340,000 pounds of columbium concentrate containing 6,000 pounds of thorium. It was expressed to expire 31st December 1972, and was subject to the condition: "Wastes containing thorium shall not be disposed of without prior approval from the Atomic Energy Control Board".

Mr. Smerchanski took the position at trial that the letter constituted prior authority from the board to dispose of the slag as land-fill on his property. The letter is, of course, capable of that interpretation. The phrase "however these latter methods of disposal would require approval of the Atomic Energy Control Board" (the italics are mine) could refer either to all disposal as land-fill or to disposal as land-fill off the applicant's premises. Mr. Smerchanski asserted that he understood it in the latter sense, and felt he was entitled to use the waste material as land-fill on the property without obtaining any further approval from the board.

But Mr. Smerchanski had a copy of the regulations and knew very well what they said: he must have known, as well as any man could, that what he subsequently did was in breach of both the letter and spirit of the Act. He knew that even if he did use the waste as fill on his company's land, it would still remain in his company's possession so as to require continued authority under valid licence from the board. The regulations draw no distinction between possession for use, possession for storage and possession by way of disposal. In each case the person in possession must, and obviously for good reason, have a valid licence. He knew, too, that the slag had not been disposed of as fill; most was in a stockpile at the time of sale of the property; some was stored in drums. All of it remained in his possession, yet in December 1973 he let the licence lapse. Even if he believed that a licence was not needed after possession became possession as land-fill only — and I regret that I cannot accept that he did — Mr. Smerchanski was still well aware at the time of sale that most of the slag was in no way disposed of, but was stored in a stockpile and in drums. He was plainly in violation of the Atomic Energy Control Act and liable upon conviction to a fine or imprisonment.

It is clear that Mr. Smerchanski and his company well knew that a purchaser of the property would require a licence from the board, too, in order that possession of the property be lawful, whether as to the slag by then buried or that remaining in the stockpile and drums. He had reason to hope that no problem would in fact arise as a result of the unlawful presence of the material, but I have no doubt that he knew he was in breach of the law in having the material there without a licence from the board. He knew that a purchaser would be in breach of the Act, too, unless he obtained a licence from the board. Mr. Smerchanski gambled on a continuation of the board's somewhat complacent attitude towards low-grade radiation hazards.

(2) The Claim in Deceit

Mr. Brock has argued forcefully that a sale of land without express disclosure of the fact that it is being used unlawfully does not constitute fraud, relying particularly on the recent case of Sorenson v. Kaye Holdings Ltd., 1979 CanLII 621 (BC CA), [1979] 6 W.W.R. 193, 14 B.C.L.R. 204 (C.A.), and the statement of Lambert J.A. (at p. 235) that normally "it is not deceit for a vendor to fail to decry his own wares unless he makes some positive assertion that becomes distorted by the failure" or there is a relationship of trust.

While the facts of the cases have some striking similarities, there are, I think, on closer examination, features which distinguish that case from the situation involved in the present litigation. In the Sorenson case the purchasers knew that the swimming pool on the land they bought might not conform with applicable regulations; they knew more than enough to alert them to the advisability of independent inspection and inquiry as to its status. To suggest in the present case that the purchaser knew there was slag material on the land and ought to have made inquiry to determine whether it might be radioactive, and whether or not it was lawfully there, would, of course, be absurd, and counsel did not suggest it. The majority of the Court of Appeal in Sorenson found there had been neither intent to deceive nor the making of any deceptively inadequate representation. While the swimming pool problem was not disclosed to the purchasers in all its detail, sufficient had been said to enable them to assess the legal position for themselves; and what was withheld had been withheld without fraudulent intent and without deceptive effect.

I find the situation here quite different. Mr. Faessler says he and Mr. Smerchanski had a discussion at the property on 6th December 1974, shortly before executing the interim agreement. Mr. Faessler says he disclosed his intention to build another warehouse on the land. He said he asked Mr. Smerchanski what he had been doing there and Mr. Smerchanski replied that he had been conducting a process which involved "something to make metal stronger". He asked what Mr. Smerchanski was going to do with the slag and Mr. Smerchanski said he hoped to take away the slag which was in barrels but was selling with the land the stockpiled material, which he had been using to fill soft spots on the property. Mr. Smerchanski said it "makes excellent fill".

No specific arrangement was made at that time as to when Mr. Smerchanski would remove the material which he had put into barrels. The parties proceeded to execute the interim agreement by amending Mr. Faessler's original offer of $243,000 to read $260,000 in accordance with Mr. Smerchanski's counterproposal, in which form the offer was accepted on behalf of the corporate defendant.

Mr. Smerchanski agreed in evidence that he said the material made excellent fill, and did so during a discussion with Mr. Faessler at the property. But he did not believe that he met Mr. Faessler on 6th December 1974, and asserted that this discussion must have taken place in mid-January, after the interim agreement had been entered into, but before completion and execution of a registrable agreement for sale. On examination for discovery Mr. Smerchanski had been entirely unsure when the discussion occurred. He thought at that time it could have been at a meeting in December. Mr. Faessler is certain the discussion occurred just before the interim agreement was executed on 6th December and the evidence of the real estate agent, Mr. O'Connor, is consistent with the meeting having occurred on that date. I accept Mr. Faessler's recollection as to the date of the meeting, and that it was in the context of an inquiry as to the nature of the material, and with knowledge that Mr. Faessler was considering erecting further improvements, that Mr. Smerchanski told him that the slag made "excellent fill".

The law with respect to deceit by half-truth has its foundation in the colourful dictum of Chambre J. in Tapp v. Lee (1803), 3 Bos. & P. 367, 127 E.R. 200 at 203:

"An action on the case for deceit is an action well known to the law, and I cannot agree in the argument which has been used for the Defendant, that such actions ought to be confined to representations which are literally false. Fraud may consist as well in the suppression of what is true, as in the representation of what is false. If a man, professing to answer a question, select those facts only which are likely to give a credit to the person of whom he speaks, and keep back the rest, he is a more artful knave than he who tells a direct falsehood."

In Peek v. Gurney (1873), L.R. 6 H.L. 377, Lord Chelmsford observes (at p. 391) that while mere concealment will not suffice to give rise to a right of action in deceit, so that there must be "something actively done to deceive [the other party] and draw him in to deal with the person withholding the truth from him", this may well be accomplished by a half-truth. He observes (at p. 392) that half a truth will sometimes amount to a "real falsehood", and may contain " a positive misrepresentation". The law is summarized in Spencer Bower on Actionable Misrepresentation, 3rd (Turner) ed. (1974), at p. 94, in this passage:

"To state a thing which is true only with qualifications or additions known to, but studiously withheld by, the representor, is to say the thing which is not. Such a statement is a 'lie', and one of the most dangerous and insidious forms of lie."

While it is true that in Canada the concept of fraudulent concealment by silence alone has not gained the acceptance which it has found in the United States law governing sale of land, the concept of deceit by incomplete disclosure which is here recognized may impose very similar obligations on a vendor who answers a prospective purchaser's questions.

In the present case, the fact that unlicensed possession of the radioactive material on the land was, to the vendor's knowledge, unlawful, and the obvious difficulties of effecting a resale of the land if its presence there became publicly known, were matters of such moment to a purchaser that it is difficult to conceive of any sufficient statement Mr. Smerchanski might have made about the material which did not include disclosure of its radioactive character. How could he speak of it and keep that fact secret?

There was something unusual about the operation producing the slag, either in the appearance of the waste material or the manner in which it was piled and stored, which caused Mr. Faessler to make inquiry. The statement that the slag made "excellent fill" was calculated to bring that inquiry to an end. The statement was true only with the qualifications that possession of the material required a licence, certainly until it had been used as fill, and that if not used as fill on that property, it could only be disposed of in certain specified ways and with consent of the Atomic Energy Control Board, and that permitted disposal methods would not include use for fill on residential projects. To describe the material as excellent fill was in the circumstances deceptive and the statement as a whole was deliberately deceptive as a half-truth within each of the definitions cited above. It was a "positive assertion that becomes distorted" by failure to disclose other relevant facts, in the sense mentioned by Lambert J.A. in the Sorenson case, supra. I have no doubt that Mr. Smerchanski intended to lead Mr. Faessler by this half-truth into the belief that the slag need give him no concern. No doubt he hoped that it would be used as fill and forgotten. The board's lack of interest during the year since his licence lapsed would have given Mr. Smerchanski some reason to hope that Mr. Faessler would have no problems with it. But the risk was there and Mr. Smerchanski knew of it. If he told Mr. Faessler anything about the slag, and certainly if he told him what he did, he could not limit his disclosure so as to pass that risk on without making Mr. Faessler aware that there was, in fact, such a risk.

I find that the transactions of 6th December 1974 were induced by deceit and fraudulent misrepresentation as to the character of the slag material, made by the defendant Mark Gerald Smerchanski on behalf of the defendant Fundy Chemical International Ltd., for which both of the defendants are liable.

On behalf of Mr. Smerchanski, the court was urged by Mr. Brock to resolve the problem by making the finding of fact that the thorium waste presents no danger whatever to persons using the property, a finding which, it was argued, would dispel any concern which users of the property or prospective purchasers might otherwise have had as a result of the public tumult which has lasted for 3½ years since its discovery.

The evidence at trial of Joseph Paul Didyk, a senior engineer on the staff of the Atomic Energy Control Board, would, I think, support such a finding. But I am certain that such a declaration as counsel seeks, made on the basis of expert evidence given on behalf of litigants in a private lawsuit, even if there were several such witnesses, would not serve to put to rest the concern which has been expressed about this material. The court's inquiry must be directed to the task of determining, not whether that concern is justified, but whether it is in fact entertained by reasonable people and, if it is, whether those likely to be interested in purchasing property of this sort would be influenced by that fact in deciding how much they would be willing to pay for it.

Mr. Didyk said that hazards to health created by the presence of thorium are similar to those associated with the presence of radium. It was the discovery of hazardous conditions created by construction of houses and schools above radium-bearing waste used as fill at Port Hope, Ontario, which led to the search for other radioactive slag material in 1976 and to the discovery of the Surrey wastes. The material at Port Hope, and some similar material in Ottawa, has been excavated and removed by truck to the Chalk River disposal site on the insistence of the board.

Mr. Didyk's evidence leads the layman, I think, to these conclusions. Radioactive waste materials of the type in question may create three possible dangers to human health: the danger of exposure to low-grade gamma radiation, the danger of inhalation of radon gas, which may be built up within a closed building above such material, and the danger that the actual waste material may be swallowed, Exposure to low-grade radiation over long periods of time is thought by some experts to carry the possibility of developing malignancies, but the level of radioactivity produced by the slag at Surrey is not remarkable in comparison with that produced by sunlight, some neon lighting and other sources to which people are continually exposed. The radon gas problem arises mainly in confined spaces, such as basements, and is principally considered a danger in residential premises, where inhalation may continue over long continuous periods. The possibility of ingestion of the waste material is fairly remote, probably having relevance only where children are likely to be present on the premises.

This witness said that with radiation there is no "safe" level, as there is with many toxic substances. But there is an "acceptable" level which can be justified in relation to other sources of radiation exposure which all people experience in their ordinary lives. Radiation produced by the slag buried on the property which Mr. Faessler purchased is classified as in the acceptable range; exposure over two or three years to radiation at this level is said to be less, for instance, than a single exposure to radiation created by certain types of X-ray examination. Tests for the presence of radon gas at the property produced negative results and the likelihood of the material being eaten clearly is not a serious danger, the site being in an area zoned for industrial purposes only.

The evidence presented, of course, by no means reflects the whole spectrum of expert opinion on the subject. It suggests that according to the board's standards, and those of other knowledgeable and responsible public health bodies, there is no > significant health hazard created by the thorium slag which has given rise to this action. But that is not because the material is harmless. The evidence is clear that it emits radiation and that all radiation is potentially harmful, and ought to be avoided. The reason why the material cannot, on the evidence, be classed as hazardous is that the radiation exposure to be derived from it, considered in relation to the exposure to which most of mankind is inevitably exposed, cannot be regarded as exceptional. From a health point of view it is clear that it would have been better that the material had not been put there. But so long as the property is used as at present, there is nothing to suggest that the presence of the slag there will result in those using it necessarily receiving greater exposure to radiation than they would otherwise have experienced in their daily lives. This seems to be the implication of Mr. Didyk's evidence.

> Unfortunately, the board's public position is not quite so clear. The board regards the present resting places of both buried and barrelled slag as temporary only; its official position is that all the material ought to be moved to a proper disposal site. Mr. Didyk said the view of the board's chairman is that each province should make proper provision for disposal of radioactive waste resulting from operations within its own boundaries. While the federal authority claims constitutional jurisdiction over importation and possession of radioactive substances, and appears to have made no inquiry of the province before authorizing Mr. Smerchanski to bring radioactive material to Surrey to process it there, yet provision of a site for disposal of resulting wastes is said to be a provincial responsibility. The province has not to date been prepared to accept that responsibility so far as the Surrey waste is concerned, with the inevitable result that the plaintiffs are left with the problem. In recognition of this reality the board mailed Mr. Faessler an unsolicited licence authorizing his continued possession of the material.
> It is hardly surprising in the circumstances that there have been local public demonstrations of concern, including the formation of a Surrey Organization for Nuclear Awareness, angry observations by members of the municipal council, a threatened strike by employees at the adjoining Canadian National Railway yard, attempts by residents to establish a roadblock nearby, and extensive coverage on television and in the metropolitan and local weekly newspapers.
>
> The fact that similar material in Ontario has been removed to a proper disposal site at the board's direction, and under its supervision, makes it difficult for people to accept that failure to remove the Surrey slag is due to the fact that it presents no health hazard, rather than to the fact that no government is willing to take responsibility for it. The board's reaction and response here and in Ontario is not wholly consistent with the suggestion that the material need give no concern. It is quite apparent that many people continue to place greater weight on the conduct of the governmental agencies involved rather than on what they say. I conclude that the concern expressed in evidence by employees of the plaintiff, real estate agents and appraisers, the local citizens' organizations and others, whether justifiable or not in fact, cannot be dismissed as unreasonable, and would undoubtedly be reflected in the price which a prudent purchaser would be willing to pay for the property.
>
> I conclude that loss of value due to public reluctance to be exposed to radiation, no matter how small that risk may be, is something for which the plaintiffs are entitled to be compensated in damages; I deal first with such damages in relation to the Anvil Way property, the land on which the slag was used as fill, and thereafter with damages in relation to the property on 116th Avenue, to which the barrelled slag was taken for storage, and the buried slag generally.

And, finally, at pp. 367-68:

The radioactive "half-life" of thorium — the time which it takes for the level of radiation emission to decline by one-half — is said to be 80,000 years. The conduct of the defendant in passing off such material to the plaintiff's as "excellent fill" can only be regarded in the circumstances as a shameless act of deception.

The increased vigour with which the Atomic Energy Control Act has been enforced following discovery in 1976 of new hazards associated with low-grade radiation could not, of course, have been expected at the time of the sale to the plaintiffs. Much was then, and still remains, unknown about radiation; hence, no doubt, the Atomic Energy Control Board's broad regulatory authority over radioactive material. Mr. Smerchanski and his company were well aware, however, of the political implications of radioactive waste disposal, and the dangers which the board's powers held for a person in possession of such material in the event of discovery of new hazards or a change in public attitudes towards those hitherto known. The manner in which the problem of the Surrey wastes has been dealt with by government agencies, influenced in part by the desire to achieve political, rather than practical, objectives, could well have been foreseen by Mr. Smerchanski and his company, and the loss which has been suffered by the plaintiffs as a consequence is plainly a proximate result of his deception.

[33] In addition to the findings of fact and the inferences drawn by the learned trial judge from the facts, the following evidence may be of assistance in dealing with the issues raised on this appeal:

ATOMIC ENERGY CONTROL BOARD

BY_____

2. Smerchanski renewed Fundy's licence for the year 1973.

3. Smerchanski failed to renew Fundy's licence for the year 1974.

[34] It will also be necessary to consider the Atomic Energy Control Regulations, C.R.C. 1978, c. 365, made pursuant to the Atomic Energy Control Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. A-19, relating to the possession and disposal of "prescribed substances" such as thorium waste. Certain of the regulations are reproduced as follows:

3. Subject to section 6, no person shall, unless exempted in writing by the Board, produce, mine, prospect for, refine, use, sell or possess for any purpose any prescribed substance except in accordance with a licence issued pursuant to section 7 …

7.(1) The Board or a designated officer may issue a licence for any purpose referred to in section 3 or in respect of any device or equipment referred to in section 4 upon receipt of a written application from the person requiring such licence.

(2) An application for a licence for any purpose referred to in section 3 or in respect of any device or equipment referred to in section 4 shall set out such of the following information as the Board may require:

(a) the nature and quantity of the prescribed substance and the purpose for which it is required;

(b) the maximum quantity of the prescribed substance likely to be required at any one time for the purpose set out in the application;

(c) a description of the premises in which the prescribed substance is to be located and of any equipment in connection with which it is to be used;

(d) a description of the measures to be taken to prevent theft, loss or any unauthorized use of the prescribed substance;

(e) a description of the measures to be taken, including any plan in case of accident, to prevent the receipt by any person of a dose of ionizing radiation in excess of any dose specified in respect of such person in Schedule II;

(f) a description of the method of disposing of the radioactive prescribed substance;

(g) a description of the qualifications, training and experience of any person who is to use the prescribed substance; and

(h) any other information necessary to evaluate the application.

(3) A licence issued by the Board pursuant to subsection (1) may contain such conditions as the Board deems necessary in the interests of health, safety and security and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, may include conditions respecting

(a) the measures to be taken to prevent the receipt by any person of a dose of ionizing radiation in excess of any dose specified in respect of such person in Schedule II;

(b) the monitoring devices and other methods for measuring the dose of ionizing radiation received by any person;

(c) instructions to be given to atomic radiation workers respecting the hazards of ionizing radiation and the procedures to be followed to limit exposure to ionizing radiation;

(d) the maximum quantity and concentration of radioactive or other hazardous material that may be discharged into the air and water as a result of the use of the prescribed substance;

(e) the method of disposing of radioactive prescribed substance;

(f) the measures to be taken to prevent theft, loss or any unauthorized use of the prescribed substance; and

(g) the qualifications, training and experience of any person who is to use or supervise the use of the prescribed substance or any device or equipment to which the licence applies …

11. (1) Every person to whom a licence has been issued shall

(a) where the licence has been issued pursuant to section 7, keep all necessary records in respect of the prescribed substance that is the subject matter of the licence to show

(i) the nature, form and quantity in which the licence under which such substance was obtained.

(ii) the location thereof.

(iii) the names of all persons involved in the use and handling thereof, and

(iv) where such substance has been disposed of, full particulars of such disposal, whether by sale or otherwise, and the licence, if any, under which such disposal was made;

(b) where the licence has been issued pursuant to section 9,

(i) keep all records required by paragraph (a) in respect of any prescribed substance at the nuclear facility, and

(ii) keep all necessary records to show the maintenance and operation of the nuclear facility; and

(c) keep all necessary records to show the dose of ionizing radiation received by any person as a result of the use of the prescribed substance or the operation of the nuclear facility, as the case may be;

(d) keep all reports of medical examinations that are required pursuant to subsection 17(1); and

(e) keep such other records as the Board may require in the interests of health, safety and security.

(2) The Board may require any person to whom a licence has been issued to deposit the records required to be kept under paragraph (1)(c) or a copy thereof with any person or agency specified in writing by the Board.

(3) No person shall destroy or otherwise dispose of any records required to be kept under subsection (1) except in accordance with the written authority of the Board …

20.(1) Every person in possession of a prescribed substance or operating a nuclear facility in which a prescribed substance is located shall, in the event of any loss or theft of such prescribed substance in a quantity exceeding ten times the scheduled quantity, make a report of such loss or theft within 24 hours to the inspector appointed for the place or area in which the loss or theft occurred and shall as soon as possible thereafter send a complete report of such loss or theft to the Board, such inspector and the person, if any, appointed pursuant to section 16 as radiation safety adviser for the place or area in which the loss or theft occurred …

22.(1) No person shall use a container to store or otherwise hold radioactive prescribed substances, except where such container forms part of the machinery attached to the manufacturing or processing equipment of a nuclear facility, unless there appears on such container

(a) the radiation warning symbol set out in Schedule III and the words "RADIATION-DANGER-RAYONNEMENT", clearly and prominently displayed on the outside thereof; and

(b) information with respect to the nature, form, quantity and date of measurement of the radioactive isotopes in the container …

23. (1) No person shall ship any radioactive prescribed substances unless the shipment thereof complies with the requirement respecting packaging and labelling and any other requirements prescribed

(a) by any body having jurisdiction by statute over the proposed mode of transport; or

(b) by the Canadian Transport Commission, if no requirements have been prescribed by any body described in paragraph (a) …

24.(1) Every person operating a nuclear facility or carrying on a business or undertaking involving the use of a prescribed substance shall, in addition to any other requirements of these Regulations,

(a) take all reasonable precautions in relation to the nuclear facility or the prescribed substance to protect persons and property from injury or damage; …

25. No person shall abandon or dispose of any prescribed substance except

(a) in accordance with the conditions in any licence that is applicable to the prescribed substance and that is in force; or

(b) in accordance with the written instructions of the Board …

27.(1) Subject to subsections (2) and (3), the Board or a designated officer may, by notice in writing to the holder of any licence, revoke or suspend the licence or amend the terms and conditions thereof,

[35] It will be noted, as well, that Pt. VI of the regulations is entitled "Health and Safety". The regulations make reference to "medical advisers" and "radiation safety advisers".

[36] The submissions of the appellant as to liability may be summarized as follows:

(1) that Fundy was exempted from the licensing requirements of the regulations pursuant to a letter written by one Welsh, a safety officer of the Radiation Protection Division of the Department of Health and Welfare, to Fundy on 21st December 1971;

(2) that the representation made by Smerchanski that the thorium waste stored on the property made "excellent fill" was true and, in the circumstances, could not be construed as a "half-truth" or a positive fraudulent misrepresentation;

(3) that the thorium waste was not dangerous or hazardous to health, at least in respect of persons using the Anvil Way property, and therefore the disclosure of the existence of the thorium waste on the property would not be of any concern to the plaintiffs or to any prospective purchasers of the property;

(4) that the learned trial judge erred in holding that the letter of Mr. Welsh to Smerchanski could be interpreted as requiring further approval of the board to dispose of the thorium waste on the Anvil Way property and, as a result, his finding of fraud, being based partly on an erroneous determination as to fact, cannot stand;

(5) that the cause of the problems encountered by the respondents and the diminution in values of the Anvil Way property were caused by political and media events which took place in 1976 and were not foreseeable at the time of the sale in 1974; and

(6) that, even if the representation made by Smerchanski was fraudulent, it did not induce the respondents to purchase the Anvil Way property.

[37] Upon reviewing the findings of the learned trial judge in dealing with the Welsh letter (21st December 1971), I have reached the conclusion that this letter was not fairly open to the interpretation placed upon it by him. In my view, the letter authorizes Fundy to use the thorium waste as fill on the Anvil Way property without further approval of the board. The thorium waste could not, however, be removed from the Anvil Way property, even for use as fill in other locations, without prior approval of the board.

[38] The Welsh letter does not, however, constitute an exemption from the mandatory language of s. 3 of the regulations, which required Fundy to "possess" the thorium waste in accordance with the terms of the licence issued by the board. All exemptions from the licensing requirements of the regulations are required to be in writing. Even if the Welsh letter could be construed as being an exemption granted by the board, the only exemption set out in the Welsh letter is that the thorium waste could be used as fill on the Anvil Way property. The licence issued by the board on 5th January 1972 (about two weeks after the date of the Welsh letter) contains the following language:

> 2. Wastes containing thorium shall not be disposed of without prior approval from the Atomic Energy Control Board.
> 3. Authority under this permit shall expire 31 December 1972.

[39] To argue that the Welsh letter amounted to an exemption from the board's licensing requirements in the light of the limited approval contained in the Welsh letter and the express and specific language of the licence is to fly in the face of the facts and the regulations.

[40] It should also be noted that the licence issued by the board was subject to amendment by the board at any time: see reg. 27(1).

[41] Smerchanski was conversant with the regulations and knew that the Welsh letter was not an exemption. He renewed Fundy's licence in 1973. He admitted that he should have obtained a licence in 1974.

[42] It is in the above context that I come to review the submissions made on behalf of the appellants.

[43] Firstly, after reviewing the reasons for judgment of the learned trial judge in the light of his erroneous interpretation of the Welsh letter, I am quite unable to reach the conclusion that he committed any palpable or overriding error. The error made by the trial judge was inconsequential and was not central to his determination that the purchaser was induced by the fraudulent representations of Smerchanski to buy the property, I cannot interfere: see Taylor v. Jaegli Enterprises Ltd. (1981), 1981 CanLII 26 (SCC), 124 D.L.R. (3d) 415 (S.C.C.); and Lewis v. Todd (1980), 1980 CanLII 20 (SCC), 14 C.C.L.T. 294, 115 D.L.R. (3d) 257 at 260-61, 34 N.R. 1 (S.C.C.).

[44] Secondly, I am convinced that the learned trial judge reached the correct conclusion. The facts as found demonstrate clearly that the comment by Smerchanski that the slag would make "excellent fill" was a false and misleading statement. The words "excellent fill" surely must be taken to mean, at the very least, that the use of the slag as fill was unrestricted. The slag could not be used as fill in any other location without the consent of the board. The slag used as fill on the Anvil Way property was subject to licensing conditions fixed by the board from time to time. Even if the slag used as fill on the Anvil Way property was not subject to the regulations, the remaining slag (not used as fill) was subject to such licensing conditions as might be fixed by the board. Possession of the remaining slag in the absence of a licence was unlawful. The slag could not be abandoned or disposed of without the permission of the board. The board could prescribe conditions as to how the slag was to be dealt with on or off the Anvil Way property. In short, the possession and/or the disposal of the slag was subject to the dictates of the board. Quite apart from licensing requirements, the slag, because of its inherently dangerous propensities, would not make "excellent fill" except in very limited circumstances. The slag could not be used as fill in any residential environment. The slag could not be used as fill in schoolyards, parks or in any places frequented by children. It could not be safely used under conditions which might give rise to a danger from the formation of radon gas. If the slag was used as fill on the Anvil Way property, it could not be removed therefrom without the consent of the board. It follows that, if it became necessary at some future date as part of an industrial or commercial development of the property to excavate and remove the fill to another site, such excavation and removal would require the board's approval.

[45] The fill was not in any sense "excellent fill", but was fill that no reasonable owner would desire to use.

[46] The case for the appellants is that, insofar as the slag could be disposed of on the Anvil Way property, as the slag so disposed of was not hazardous to health, the words "excellent fill" properly described the thorium waste. The appellants point out as well that, as a board licence was not required, except perhaps in a technical sense, the failure to disclose that the respondents would have to obtain a licence from the board was not material. To so view the words "excellent fill" is to take too narrow an approach, and is to treat these words as though they are to be construed in a vacuum, without regard to the background in which the words were uttered. The words "excellent fill" cannot be read as meaning "excellent fill if used on this property".

[47] At the risk of repetition, the words used were fraudulent, in that they emphasized only the favourable qualities of the slag, thus leading the respondents to believe that the use of the fill was not subject to any restrictions or qualifications, when Smerchanski well knew that the slag not disposed of as fill on the Anvil Way property was subject to the regulations and could, in certain circumstances, create an immediate hazard to health. Quite apart from the above matters, it appears to me that in the marketplace one of the most important considerations was that it consisted of radioactive waste. As the learned trial judge found, all the expert advice in the world will not convince the average citizen that radioactive waste makes "excellent fill". This was so in 1974 as it was in 1976. The fact that the views of the average citizen may be "irrational' ' is of little consequence. The fact is that the market for real property is determined by the views of average citizens, be they rational or irrational. I pause here to state that, in my view, it is not "irrational" to fear that proximity to radioactive waste may create a dangerous environment. The average citizen is aware, for example, that radioactive waste can be disposed of only at specific sites designated by the government. He can rationally conclude only that such measures are necessary for reasons of health and safety.

[48] I think it is also important that the representations made by Smerchanski were made after inquiry by R. Faessler as to what the slag was. The evidence of R. Faessler relating to this matter reads as follows:

> So then we walked out to the back of the building and there was railway tracks there. And he — he explained to me about the railway tracks and — you know — access of the railway tracks and so on, and from there we walked around the end of the building, the end of what we called the "old building", which is 40 by 60, and we walked right up on an area that he had levelled out of slag, and there was quite a pile of slag, as I indicated yesterday on the map, and I asked him what it was, what the material was, and what he was going to do with the — with it.
> Mainly, I said — you know — "What are you going to do with this?" And he said, "Well, I — "He said. "Over there you have some fairly soft spots in the property. We have been levelling it out as we go. We just bulldoze it once a month or so to keep it down."

> We were standing there, and he demonstrated it, and he said that you can see that there is nothing better for fill. He said that it makes a really good hardbed and he said that your low spots there to fill in, level it out and use it for fill.
> I said, "Well, are you sure it's good for fill?" and he said, "Yes, it makes excellent fill. See for yourself." (The italics are mine.)

[49] The answers given by Smerchanski as to "what the slag was" were such as to dispel any further desire to inquire into the nature of the slag on the part of Faessler.

[50] As to the law, the appellants rely on the judgment of this court in Sorenson v. Kaye Holdings Ltd., 1979 CanLII 621 (BC CA), [1979] 6 W.W.R. 193, 14 B.C.L.R, 204 (C.A.). The [B.C.L.R.] headnote in that case reads in part as follows:

> The appellants operated a seaside resort with a "fill-and-draw" swimming pool. The operation of such pools was contrary to health regulations, and the male appellant had in fact been convicted of violating those regulations. In order to make the pool conform to the regulations, expenditure in the area of $30,000 would have been necessary. In 1974 the appellants sold the resort to the respondents without fully informing them of the problems they had had with health authorities. The appellants simply advised the respondents that there "could" be a problem in that regard, and that the health board "may" require a permit. The appellants allayed the respondents' fears by showing them a newspaper story reporting that a similar pool in Vancouver had been allowed to remain open. The respondents discovered the facts after taking possession of the property but before the sale was completed. In this action they sought damages for fraud. At trial, $30,000 damages were awarded against the appellants, and this appeal was brought on the issue of liability …
>
> PER MCFARLANE J.A.: This was not an action for damages for breach of contract. It was an action in deceit, and for the action to succeed nothing short of proof of fraudulent intention to deceive in the strict sense would suffice. Accordingly, this action could not succeed because the evidence showed that the respondents were well aware of the true state of affairs at the relevant time. In any case, the measure of damages in an action like this is the difference between the price paid and the actual value of the property purchased, and the respondents had failed to adduce any evidence as to actual value. Accordingly, an essential element of the cause of action had not been proved …
> PER LAMBERT J.A.: The issue was whether the appellants had intentionally deceived the respondents by fraudulent misrepresentation and so induced them to buy the property. Because this was not a contract of "utmost good faith" and there was no fiduciary relationship between the parties, silence could not constitute a misrepresentation. Therefore, for this claim to succeed it would have to be proved that there was a positive assertion which amounted to a misrepresentation. There was no such assertion here. Moreover, the tort of deceit involves intent, and the appellants here had not intended to deceive the respondents.

[51] That case may be distinguished on the following bases:

(a) the plaintiffs in Sorenson were well aware of the relevant facts at all material times;

(b) there was no evidence that any positive assertion amounting to a misrepresentation had been made;

(c) the plaintiffs were put on inquiry (they were told that the board of health might require a permit to operate the pool); and

(d) Lambert J.A. held, on the facts, that there was no intent to deceive.

[52] In the case on appeal, there is no evidence that the respondents were aware of the existence of radioactive waste or that they were put on inquiry. The learned trial judge made a finding of fact that Smerchanski intended to deceive the respondents and that a positive misrepresentation had been made by Smerchanski.

[53] Furthermore, in my view, the judgment of Lambert J.A. supports the case for the respondents. His judgment reads, in part, at p. 235, as follows:

> The first question is whether silence constituted a misrepresentation. This is not a contract of utmost good faith, nor was there a fiduciary relationship between the parties. In the absence of such a special contract or relationship, it is not deceit for a vendor to fail to decry his own wares unless he makes some positive assertion that becomes distorted by failure.

[54] In the case on appeal, the positive assertion of the vendor (the slag makes "excellent fill") becomes distorted by the vendor's failure to disclose that the right to use the slag as fill was qualified and restricted and that the slag was an inherently dangerous substance.

[55] In addition to the authorities referred to by the trial judge, I would make reference to several cases where it has been held that to knowingly represent only favourable aspects without disclosing the fact that those favourable aspects are substantially qualified by restrictions and unfavourable aspects known to the person making the representation, amounts to fraud.

[56] Firstly, I make reference to the judgment of Denning L.J. in Curtis v. Chemical Cleaning & Dyeing Co., [1951] 1 K.B. 805, [1951] 1 All E.R. 631 at 634 (C.A.), as follows:

> In my opinion, any behaviour by words or conduct is sufficient to be a misrepresentation if it is such as to mislead the other party about the existence or extent of the exemption. If it conveys a false impression, that is enough. If the false impression is created knowingly, it is a fraudulent misrepresentation; if it is created unwittingly, it is an innocent misrepresentation; but either is sufficient to disentitle the creator of it to the benefit of the exemption. In R. v. Lord Kylsant, [1932] 1 K.B. 442, 23 Cr. App. R. 83, it was held that a representation might be literally true but practically false, not because of what it said, but because of what it left unsaid. In short, because of what it implied.

See also the judgment of Avory J. in R. v Lord Kylsant, supra. In that case the following comments were made:

(a) "Sometimes a half truth is no better than a downright falsehood." (p. 446)

(b) "There must in my opinion be some active misstatement of fact, or at all events, such a partial and fragmentary statement of fact, as that the withholding of that which is not stated, makes that which is stated absolutely false." (p. 447)

(c) "I do not care by what means it is conveyed — by what trick or device or ambiguous language: all those are expedients by which fraudulent people seem to think they can escape from the real substance of the transaction." (p. 448); and

(d) "There was ample evidence on which the jury could come to the conclusion that this prospectus was false in a material particular in that it conveyed false impression." (p. 448).

[57] If the representations made by Smerchanski are tested in any of the ways suggested in Kylsant, one cannot reach any conclusion but that the representations were clearly fraudulent.

[58] Even if the learned trial judge was wrong in holding that the use of the words "excellent fill" constituted a positive fraudulent misrepresentation, the case for the respondents may be upheld on another ground. In the circumstances of this case, the failure to disclose the inherently dangerous nature of the thorium waste was fraudulent: see the judgment of Ritchie J. in Rivtow Marine Ltd. v. Washington Iron Works Ltd., 1973 CanLII 6 (SCC), [1974] S.C.R. 1189 [1973] 6 W.W.R. 692, 40 D.L.R. (3d) 530 at 538, as follows:

> It is no novelty to state that prior to the case of George v. Skivington (1869), L.R. 5 Ex. 1, it was generally accepted in the law of England that the breach of a contract requiring the use of skill and care in the manufacture of an article did not of itself give any cause of action to a stranger to that contract who was injured by reason of the article proving to be defective. Even from the earliest times articles dangerous in themselves as well as articles which were made dangerous by reason of some defect known to the manufacturer were excepted from this general rule, but the ground for excepting the latter class of articles was first based on the fact that the vendor of the article who knew it to be defective was guilty of fraud or deceit and for this reason liable to anyone who suffered as a result of an injury: see Langridge v. Levy (1837), 2 M. & W. 519, 150 E.R. 863.

[59] There can be no doubt that the thorium waste is an inherently dangerous substance. The fact that it does not create any danger to health, when properly buried beneath the ground on the Anvil Way property, is not of importance. There are at least three reasons why the thorium waste should be classified as inherently dangerous, as follows:

1. The only rational explanation for the making of the regulations is that they were created in the public interest for health and safety purposes. The regulations refer specifically to "health and safety".

2. The requirement in the regulations that radioactive wastes shall not be abandoned or disposed of without the consent of the board must be regarded as a declaration that such wastes, unless properly dealt with in accordance with board orders, constitute a danger to health and safety.

3. Thorium waste constitutes a danger to health when deposited in residential areas or any public places frequented by children.

[60] In my view, the principle enunciated by Ritchie J. in Rivtow, supra, while not literally applicable to the facts of the case on appeal, may be reasonably extended to cover cases of this kind. The rule may be stated as follows:

> The vendor of land on which is situate an inherently dangerous substance is guilty of fraud if he sells such land to a purchaser without warning the purchaser that, if the dangerous substance is not used or disposed of in a specified manner or in the manner prescribed by statute, the purchaser and/or strangers to the contract may suffer a serious risk of injury.

[61] The law with respect to the sale of dangerous chattels is summarized in Clerk and Lindsell on Torts, 14th ed. (1975), p. 927, para. 1623, as follows:

> Sale of chattel known to be dangerous. It seems that a person who sells a gun to another for use impliedly represents thereby that so far as he • knows the gun is a safe one. So, too, one who sells animals which he knows to be suffering from an infectious disease and which he also knows the purchaser is likely to place with his own uninfected animals, is presumably liable to an action of deceit if by reason of the non-disclosure of the disease the purchaser's other animals are injured. Thus, when the defendant was alleged to have knowingly sold a diseased cow at a market without disclosing the fact of the disease, and the purchaser put the cow in a field with other cattle which caught the disease and died. Blackburn, J, said, "I entertain no doubt that the defendant by taking the cow to a public market to be sold, though he does not warrant her to be sound, yet thereby furnishes evidence of a representation that, so far as his knowledge goes, the animal is not suffering from any infectious disease. To say otherwise would be to run counter to the common sense of mankind." In Mullen v. Mason (1866), L.R. 1 C.P. 559 at 563, a similar case in which the first count was on warranty, Willes, J. said, "I agree with my Lord that it is not necessary to say what the plaintiff would be entitled to recover if he rested his case only on the warranty … was it not necessarily within the contemplation of the parties that it might be placed with other cows?"

[62] There would seem to be no good reason why the law relating to the sale of dangerous chattels should not be applied to the sale of land, where it is reasonably foreseeable that the dangerous substance, situate on the land in question, may be used or disposed of in a manner causing a risk of injury to health. I would add that the language used by Blackburn J. in Badger v. Nichols (1873), 28 L.T. 441 (Q.B.), may be paraphrased in relation to the case on appeal as follows:

> I entertain no doubt that Smerchanski, by selling the land on which was situate the dangerous thorium waste, furnished evidence of a representation that, as far as his knowledge went, the land was free of any dangerous substances. To say otherwise would be contrary to the common sense of mankind. (The italics are mine.)

[63] I come next to the submission that, as the damages suffered by the respondent could not be foreseen, the issue of liability must be resolved in favour of the appellants. This submission appears in the factum of counsel for Smerchanski as follows:

> The discovery in 1976 of low level radioactive landfill in Ontario, the change in the aproach to administration of the Regulations by A.E.C.B.: its activities in relation to the material at Surrey and the public reaction were subsequent, supervening circumstances which could not have been contemplated in 1974 when the land was sold.

[64] This submission must fail, for the reasons given by the learned trial judge as follows [pp. 367-68]:

> The increased vigour with which the Atomic Energy Control Act has been enforced following disovery in 1976 of new hazards associated with low-grade radiation could not, of course, have been expected at the time of the sale to the plaintiffs. Much was then, and still remains, unknown about radiation; hence no doubt, the Atomic Energy Control Board's broad regulatory authority over radioactive material. Mr. Smerchanski and his company were well aware, however, of the political implications of radioactive waste disposal, and the dangers which the board's powers held for a person in possession of such material in the event of discovery of new hazards or a change in public attitudes towards those hitherto known. The manner in which the problem of the Surrey wastes has been dealt with by the government agencies, influenced in part by the desire to achieve political, rather than practical, objectives, could well have been foreseen by Mr. Smerchanski and his company, and the loss which has been suffered by the plaintiffs as a consequence is plainly a proximate result of his deception.

[65] In relation to this submission, I would make reference to the judgement of Lord Denning MR. in Doyle v. Olby (Ironmongers) Ltd., [1969] 2 Q.B. 158, [1969] 2 All E.R. 119 at 122 (C.A.), as follows:

> The defendant is bound to make reparation for all the actual damages directly flowing from the fraudulent inducement. The person who has been defrauded is entitled to say: "I would not have entered into this bargain at all but for your representation. Owing to your fraud, I have not only lost all the money I paid you, but, what is more, I have been put to a large amount of extra expense as well and suffered this or that extra damages." All such damages can be recovered; and it does not lie in the mouth of the fraudulent person to say that they could not reasonably have been foreseen. (The italics are mine.)

[66] In conclusion, it should be noted that, while it could be argued that the full extent of the injury to the respondents was not foreseeable, it was foreseeable that as of the date of the completion of the sale of the Anvil Way property the respondents would suffer substantial injury of the type actually suffered.

[67] It was also contended by counsel for Smerchanski that, by mixing the thorium waste with other materials, the thorium content would be so minimal as not to constitute a "prescribed substance" within the meaning of the regulations. There is no evidence to support this contention. The mere mixing of thorium with other materials does not diminish the quantity of thorium waste on the Anvil Way property. In any event, expert evidence would be required to show that the mixing of the thorium waste with other materials was carried out in such a way as to show that all the thorium waste had been so diluted with other materials so as not to constitute a "prescribed substance".

[68] The appellants also submit that, even if the representations made by Smerchanski were fraudulent, C.R.F. was not induced to purchase the Anvil Way property by those representations. They contend that, as C.R.F. made an offer of $234,000 to purchase the property prior to the making of any representations, it could not have been induced to purchase by the representations made by Smerchanski. The fact is that on the date the fraudulent representations were made this offer had expired. The trial judge accepted R. Faessler's evidence that C.R.F. would not have purchased the property for $260,000 if it had not been for the fraudulent representations made by Smerchanski. The authorities are clear that it is not open to us to reverse this finding of fact.

[69] I come now to deal with the argument of the appellant that the learned trial judge applied wrong principles in assessing damages for fraudulent misrepresentation.

[70] The facts relating to the issue of damages may be summarized as follows [excerpts are from the trial decision]:

>
> The transactions of 6th December 1974 involved both the sale of real estate in the form of land (including buried slag) and improvements, and the sale of chattels including the slag piled behind one of the buildings: shortly after the original sale transactions, but as part of the same bargain, there was an agreement by the purchaser to take possession and care of the vendor's slag material stored in drums for eight months without charge.
>
> After they had taken possession, but long before discovery of the radioactive nature of the slag, the plaintiffs, in reliance on the deceptive representation made by the defendants, used the piled slag material as fill, and placed a warehouse addition and blacktopped wire-rope storage yard on top of it, and removed the material stored in drums to another site with the knowledge and approval of the defendants. Thus the consequences of the deceit of the defendants went a good deal further than merely inducing the sale of the real estate and chattels of 6th December 1974. It was in reliance on the same deception that the plaintiffs took possession of the piled radioactive material, moved that in barrels, and spread the material over the land and built on it. [pp. 353-54].
>
> The cost (as of the date of trial) of removing the thorium waste from the Anvil Way property to an approved disposal site is approximately $315,000.
>
> As of the date of trial, no approved disposal site had been designated by the federal or provincial governments.
>
> Had the clean-up been done in January 1977, when the contamination was discovered, it would have cost less to do the job, but the value of the land in an uncontaminated state would, I think, have been lower by a greater proportion. This evidence suggests a residual value of the property immediately after discovery of the fraud, with means of disposal, would have been in the neighbourhood of $450,000.
> But the uncontradicted appraisal evidence is that lack of an assurance of some alternative disposal site greatly reduces the actual market value below this residual value derived by deducting clean-up cost from the uncontaminated value. Without such an assurance the land is said today to be worth less than $200,000, and presumably would have been worth no more than $150,000 at time of discovery of the fraud. Much turns on whether in fact the province will permit disposal of the radioactive material at any other site. If. the material is not in fact hazardous, governments could hardly object to it being put somewhere else. If the material is hazardous, governments could hardly refuse to permit it to be taken away from the centre of population to a site properly engineered for radioactive waste disposal, rather than left in an unprepared site located within the metropolitan area. One would prefer to assume, in assessing damages, that governments would act reasonably in the matter, and that governmental permission to put the material elsewhere will soon be forthcoming. But appraisal evidence suggests that this is not the view of the market. The appraised value today in contaminated condition, without assurance of an alternative disposal site, is less than half what the evidence indicates the value would be on the assumption that such a site had been provided. In matters of value the court must, of course, be concerned with the view which the market is thought to hold.

The cost of the property to the plaintiff C. R. F. Holdings Ltd. at date of discovery of the fraud consisted of the $260,000 purchase price paid to the corporate defendant, $248,000 spent on the warehouse addition, $65,700 spent on paving and $4,700 spent on fencing, for a total of $578,000. If the damages were computed by deducting value at that date, say $150,000, from cost to that date, the damages of the plaintiff C. R. F. Holdings Limited in respect of this property would thus amount to approximately $425,000. To this would be added prejudgment interest at least for the period from discovery of the fraud to date of judgment, [p. 360].

Clearly the problem of assessing damages in this, as in so many cases today, is compounded by inflation, Evidence shows that property in which the plaintiff owner invested $575,000 would, but for the fraudulent misrepresentation, be worth $825,000 today, 44 per cent more than cost. It seems, at first impression, that the benefit of some $250,000 in enhanced value should be credited to the defendants in determining the extent of their liability for misleading the plaintiff into what is alleged to be an improvident transaction. But the increase in value is an illusion — in terms of purchasing power the plaintiff has made no real gain. It would have enjoyed the same 30 per cent "gain" had it purchased a piece of property free from contamination, in any event, [p. 361].

I assess the damages of the plaintiff C. R. F. Holdings Ltd., as owner of the Anvil Way property, at $400,000, inclusive of some compensation for the contingency that governmental action may prevent any clean-up, and those of Comor Supplies Ltd. as operator of the wire rope business, at $15,000, being partial compensation for business interruption in the event governmental action permits clean-up to occur.

By virtue of s. 2(a) of the Prejudgment Interest Act, 1974 (B.C.), c. 65, [now the Court Order Interest Act, R.S.B.C. 1979, c. 76], there will be no prejudgment interest on either award.

The effect of the award is that should immediate clean-up take place the plaintiff C. R. F. Holdings Ltd. would be over-compensated for loss of value of the land and the plaintiff Comor Supplies Ltd. undercompensated for business interruption. Should clean-up never take place, so that the damages were to stand in place of loss of what would have been the value of the land in uncontaminated condition, then the plaintiff owner would, on today's values, be approximately $225,000 short of proper compensation, and the plaintiff operating company would be compensated for a loss which never in fact occurred, but would no doubt be exposed to other business losses. Thus the award, as is so often the case, falls short of perfect compensation; its adequacy depends essentially on the willingness of the governments to discharge their responsibility in the matter by providing an alternative disposal site at reasonable cost as a final resting place for the radioactive material which, as is now conceded, ought never to have been there. [p. 363].

The damages suffered at the 116th Avenue property are of a different nature; they result from the transfer of some 280 drums containing slag material there from the Anvil Way property for storage purposes prior to discovery of its radioactivity, a move which is alleged to have rendered part of the property temporarily unusable and to have reduced the value of the remainder of the land when sold in 1979.

At the meeting of 6th December 1974, Mr. Smerchanski indicated he wished to remove the barrelled material from the Anvil Way property at some future date and there was subsequent agreement, before completion of the sale, at which a deadline of 15th August 1975 was set for its removal. Mr. Faessler agreed to keep the barrels until that date without charge. During June, however, he decided he would have to move the barrels so that the property could be paved, and Mr. Smerchanski's office agreed to them being removed to the 116th Avenue property which Mr. Faessler controlled. The move took place during July and the moving bill sent to the defendant company during August was eventually paid by it. In late August, Mr. Faessler was in touch with Mr. Smerchanski's office again to point out that the free storage period was over. He was then advised to dump the material and sell the drums. Mr. Faessler found the stuff would not come out and the drums were too rusted to be saleable; he told the defendants he would have to charge rent if they were not removed. Later he sent bills for storage of the drums but none of these bills appears to ever have been paid.

When the Atomic Energy Control Board representatives arrived in December 1976, they checked the Anvil Way and 116th Avenue sites and found radioactivity at both which was above that found in the surrounding area. They told Mr. Faessler to put the barrels and loose rock together on part of the 116th Avenue property, rope it off, and erect radioactivity warning signs. Later he was told by the board to put a fence around the barrels. There were no offers from the defendants to pay any of these costs. In March 1979, Mr. Faessler moved the barrels to another corner of the property in accordance with an agreement he had made with a company willing to purchase the property. He put the drums into large steel containers piled two high on a pad of gravel and hog fuel which he had prepared, and set up a fence around the area, all in accordance with Atomic Energy Control Board directions. The board paid for some of the materials used but did not pay for the steel boxes, nor for the labour and equipment employed. The defendants contributed nothing.

In order to make a sale possible, the board gave its assurance that it would remove the barrelled material from the site. This did not, of course, prove to be possible, but the board has indicated that, one way or, another, it hopes to move the material before the end of 1980. The appraisal evidence is that as a consequence of the presence of this material the property sold for 19 per cent, or $37,500, less than the price it would have commanded had it not been contaminated. From this evidence it is argued that there will be continuing loss of value resulting from the previous radioactive contamination if and when the slag is removed. I find it more probable that the diminution in value is due to continuing uncertainty that governments will in fact permit removal of the material. The claim for diminution in value is made by Mr. Faessler personally, as equitable owner of the property; in addition he claims the cost of relocating the barrels on the land, which is stated at $2,200, and the plaintiff Comor Supplies Ltd. claims $8,864 for storage of the barrels from August 1975 to January 1979.

Mr. Faessler's claim for diminution in value is, I think, the proper measure of loss in respect of this aspect of the damages flowing from the fraudulent misrepresentation. Since the defendants authorized removal of the drums to the 116th Avenue property, remaining silent about the character of the content, the consequences in loss of value of that land are not too remote. The damages ought, perhaps, to be assessed as at the date of the move, in 1976, and to bear prejudgment interest from that date, and I would permit further evidence to be adduced for that purpose if either party desires. Failing any application to adduce further evidence, I would assess Mr. Faessler's damages at the appraised figure of $37,500 for loss of value plus $2,000 for labour, equipment and materials employed in relocating the barrels, that is to say $39,500 in all, upon $2,000 on which there will be prejudgment interest at the appropriate rates prevailing for each period since 31st March 1979, as set by the registrar.

The claim of the plaintiff Comor Supplies Ltd. for storage of the barrelled material gives rise to considerable difficulty. The position of the defence is that the $8,864 claimed is unconscionable. At $100 per month for the 3½ years the claim would come to $4,200 plus prejudgment interest at the appropriate rate for each applicable period on each monthly payment 30 days after billing date. Subject to further submissions. I would make that award [pp. 364-65].

[71] The learned trial judge fixed the damages in respect of the Anvil Way property in the sum of $400,000, made up as follows:

(a) estimated removal or "clean-up" costs — $315,000; and

(b) compensation for the contingency that "clean-up" may be impossible because of continued governmental opposition or inaction.

[72] The submission of the appellants in respect of this issue is set out in the factum of Smerchanski as follows:

1. IN THE ALTERNATIVE, THE LEARNED TRIAL JUDGE ERRED IN THE PRINCIPLES TO BE APPLIED IN ASSESSING DAMAGES FOR FRAUDULENT MISREPRESENTATION.

2. The learned trial judge erred in both damage assessments in holding that these damages flowed from the representation made by Mr. Smerchanski. The fact is that any diminution in value of these properties was caused by the change in attitude towards disposal of radioactive waste, a change which, according to the trial judge, "could not have been expected at the time of the sale to the Plaintiffs".

3. Such damages were not causally related to any representation by Mr. Smerchanski.

4. In arriving at his assessment of damages, the learned trial judge attempted to put the Plaintiffs in the position they would have been in if the representation had been true. In so doing, he erred in principle. In cases of fraudulent misrepresentation, the correct measure is to put the Plaintiff in the position he would have been in if the representation had not been made to him, and not, as with breach of condition or warranty in contract, into the position he would have been in if the representation had been true.

See McGregor on Damages, 14th ed. (1980), para. 1459.

5. The well-established rule in cases of representations inducing the sale of property is to award damages in the amount of the price paid for the property less the actual value as of the date of acquisition.

See Sorenson v. Kaye Holdings Ltd. [supra].

6. The learned trial judge erred in law in not applying this principle in assessing damages in so far as the Anvil Way property is concerned.

> 7. The learned trial judge erred in assessing damages on the basis of the diminution in value as of the date of the sale of this property and not as of the date the representation was made, in this case, the date Mr. Smerchanski represented the material could be moved from Anvil Way to 116th Avenue. The presence of the material in containers at 116th Avenue being temporary gave rise to no damage except possibly such costs as storing and fencing.
> 8. The learned trial judge erred in taking into account removal of all of the landfill when such was not necessary. In his approach to damages, he endeavoured to give complete or perfect compensation. This was an error.
> 9. Apart from the lack of a causative link between the representation, the damage alleged was too remote. Public reaction to the landfill when it posed no significant hazard was not a foreseeable or direct consequence of any representation made by Mr. Smerchanski.

[73] The rule enunciated in Sorenson, supra, that damages for fraud are to be measured by deducting from the price paid the actual value of the land at the date of the sale is inapplicable to the facts of the case on appeal insofar as consequential damages are concerned. To endeavour to apply that rule here would be to overlook the fact that the fraudulent representations of merchandise induced C.R.F. to bury the thorium waste on its land and to construct the improvements detailed by the learned trial judge. It was not until after this work had been done that the fraud was discovered. The representations made by Smerchanski induced C.R.F, to worsen its position. To apply the Sorenson rule would be to disregard the facts, and would result in a clearly inadequate award. It should also be noted that, if the Sorenson rule was applied here, the damages recoverable for fraud would be considerably less than if the claim were based on negligent misstatement, and there would be no award for consequential damages. Such an anomalous situation cannot be permitted to exist.

[74] How are the consequential damages in the case on appeal to be assessed? In my view, where by reason of the fraud of the defendants the plaintiff has made substantial improvements to his property prior to the discovery of the fraud, the most practical approach is to adopt the reasoning of Lord Denning M.R. in Doyle, supra, at p. 122 as follows:

> I think that Sir Richard Henn Collins, M.R., did express himself in too rigid terms. He seems to have overlooked consequential damages. On principle the distinction seems to be this: in contract, the defendant has made a promise and broken it. The object of damages is to put the plaintiff in as good a position, as far as money can do it, as if the promise had been performed. In fraud, the defendant has been guilty of a deliberate wrong by inducing the plaintiff to act to his detriment. The object of damages is to compensate the plaintiff for all the loss he has suffered, so far, again, as money can do it. In contract, the damages are limited to what may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties. In fraud, they are not so limited. The defendant is bound to make reparation for all the actual damages directly flowing from the fraudulent inducement. The person who has been defrauded is entitled to say: "I would not have entered into this bargain at all but for > your representation. Owing to your fraud, I have not only lost all the money I paid you, but, what is more, I have been put to a large amount of extra expense as well and suffered this or that extra damages." All such damages can be recovered: and it does not lie in the mouth of the fraudulent person to say that they could not reasonably have been foreseen. For instance, in this very case Mr. Doyle has not only lost the money which he paid for the business, which he would never have done if there had been no fraud: he put all that money in and lost it; but also he has been put to expense and loss in trying to run a business which has turned out to be a disaster for him. He is entitled to damages for all his loss, subject, of course to giving credit for any benefit that he has received. There is nothing to be taken off in mitigation: for there is nothing more that he could have done to reduce his loss. He did all that he could reasonably be expected to do.

[75] In the Doyle case, the court also recognized that the plaintiff's position before the fraudulent inducement should be compared with his position at the end of the transaction (in the case on appeal, the plaintiff's position at the time the fraud was discovered). In this respect, reference may be made to the judgment of Sachs L.J. in the Doyle case at p. 126 as follows:

> In cases such as the present the wrong done is tricking a plaintiff into a contract, and the plaintiff is entitled by way of damages to whatever sum he has lost by being thus tricked. The question as to what a purchaser has lost must naturally depend on the subject-matter of the contract. If the contract is simply one such as the purchase of shares, normally the maximum loss will be the money out of which the purchaser has been tricked, a sum which, however, may well include brokerage or stamp duty: the value of benefits received will be taken into account. If the purchase is one of a business which the plaintiff but for the fraud would not have acquired at all, the objective of the court is to put the plaintiff, so far as it is possible, into the same position financially as if he had not entered into the contract at all; in other words, one must look at the end result of his having entered into the transaction and find out what was his loss over all. In this behalf, I entirely agree with what has fallen from my Lords. The acquiring of a business normally entails the expenses of moving into fresh premises, keeping the business going, and at any rate continuing to keep it going until such time as it can be disposed of; and then one looks also at the expenses of selling. The computation of the loss may in many cases not be easy. Thus, the court must obviously take care not to include sums for consequences which may be due to the plaintiff's own unreasonable actions, and also not to include results which are too remote — matters which often involve difficult questions of fact and degree. But such difficulties do not alter the duty of the court, which should approach the matter on a broad basis.

[76] In Dodd Properties Ltd. v. Canterbury, [1980] 1 W.L.R. 433, [1980] 1 All E.R, 928 (C.A.), Megaw L.J. pointed out that the general rule that damages are to be assessed as of the date of the breach is subject to many exceptions and qualifications. His judgment reads, in part, at pp. 933-34, as follows:

> The general principle, referred to in many authorities, has recently been recognized by Lord Wilberforce in Miliangos v. George Frank (Textiles) Ltd., [1976] A.C. 443 at 468, [1975] 3 All E.R. 801 (C.A.), namely, that "… as a general rule in English law damages for tort or for breach of contract are assessed as at the date of the breach".
> But in the very passage in which this "general rule" is there stated, it is stressed that it is not a universal rule. That it is subject to many exceptions and qualifications is > clear. Cantley J. in the present case rightly recognized that that was so, in the passage from his judgment which I have recently read.

>
> Indeed, where, as in the present case, there is serious structural damage to a building, it would be patently absurd, and contrary to the general principle on which damages fall to be assessed, that a plaintiff, in a time of rising prices, should be limited to recovery on the basis of the prices of repair at the time of the wrongdoing, on the facts here being two years, at least, before the time when, acting with all reasonable speed, he could first have been able to put the repairs in hand. Once this is accepted, as it must be, little of practical reality remains in postulating that, in a tort such as this, the "general rule" is applicable. The damages are not required by English law to be assessed as at the date of breach.
>
> The true rule is that, where there is a material difference between the cost of repair at the date of the wrongful act and the cost of repair when the repairs can, having regard to all relevant circumstances, first reasonably be undertaken, it is the latter time by reference to which the cost of repair is to be taken in assessing damages. That rule conforms with the broad and fundamental principle as to damages, as stated in Lord Blackburn's speech in Livingstone v. Rawyards Coal Co. (1880), 5 App. Cas. 25 at 39 (H.L.), where he said that the measure of damages is —
> "… that sum of money which will put the party who has been injured, or who has suffered, in the same position as he would have been in if he had not sustained the wrong for which he is now getting his compensation or reparation."

[77] Unfortunately, in my opinion, while the learned trial judge correctly stated the law as to how damages should be ascertained, he did not apply that law to the facts of the case on appeal.

[78] The learned trial judge did not apply the Sorenson rule to the loss which occurred at the time of the sale, as he should have done.

[79] He did not, moreover, attempt to ascertain the consequential damages caused by the fact that C.R.F. was induced to construct the improvements on the Anvil Way property in the belief that the property was uncontaminated. In his reasons for judgment he did endeavour to utilize the principles enunciated in Sorenson in dealing with the loss to C.R.F. by deducting from the combined cost of the land and improvements the presumed market value of the lands and improvements as of 1976, thus fixing the damages at the sum of $425,000. To be more precise I quote from his reasons for judgment as follows [p. 360]:

> Had the clean-up been done in January 1977, when the contamination was discovered, it would have cost less to do the job, but the value of the land in an uncontaminated state would, I think, have been lower by a greater proportion. This evidence suggests a residual value of the property immediately after discovery of the fraud, with means of disposal, would have been in the neighbourhood of $450,000.
> But the uncontradicted appraisal evidence is that lack of an assurance of some alternative disposal site greatly reduces the actual market value below this residual value derived by deducting clean-up from the uncontaminated value. Without such an assurance the land is said today to be worth less than $200,000, and presumably would have been worth no more than $150,000 at time of discovery of the fraud. Much turns on whether in fact the province will permit disposal of the radioactive > material at any other site. If the material is not in fact hazardous, governments could hardly object to it being put somewhere else. If the material is hazardous, governments could hardly refuse to permit it to be taken away from the centre of population to a site properly engineered for radioactive waste disposal, rather than left in an unprepared site located within the metropolitan area. One would prefer to assume, in assessing damages, that governments would act reasonably in the matter, and that governmental permission to put the material elsewhere will soon be forthcoming. But appraisal evidence suggests that this is not the view of the market. The appraised value today in contaminated condition, without assurance of an alternative disposal site, is less than half what the evidence indicates the value would be on the assumption that such a site had been provided. In matters of value the court must, of course, be concerned with the view which the market is thought to hold.

> The cost of the property to the plaintiff C.R.F. Holdings Ltd. at date of discovery of the fraud consisted of the $260,000 purchase price paid to the corporate defendant, $248,000 spent on the warehouse addition, $65,700 spent on paving and $4,700 spent on fencing, for a total of $578,000. If the damages were computed by deducting value at that date, say $150,000, from cost to that date, the damages of the plaintiff C.R.F. Holdings Ltd. in respect of this property would thus amount to approximately $425,000. To this would be added prejudgment interest at least for the period from discovery of the fraud to date of judgment.

[80] Having reached this conclusion, he immediately discarded this approach, and thereby failed to ascertain the loss incurred in 1974. In addition, he failed to make any estimate of the consequential losses resulting from the construction of the improvements in 1975. Instead, he proceeded to assess the damages in the amount of $400,000 by awarding the amount required to remove the thorium waste ($315,000) together with the sum of $85,000 to cover residual damages and by allowing for the contingency that government permission to move the waste might be delayed.

[81] In so doing, he made the following statement [p. 362]:

> While the court must, I think, assess damages with a view to making the plaintiffs whole in the sense of being in the financial position they would have been in had the land been free from contamination at the end of 1976, when they discovered the fraud, that can in this case be done only by awarding the cost of placing the land in the physical condition which it ought to have been in had the representation been true. (The italics are Taylor J.'s.)

[82] The courts have consistently held that it is not proper to ascertain damages by awarding the amount required to place the land in the physical condition which it ought to have been in had the representation been true.

[83] The proper method of ascertaining damages was, in my opinion, as follows:

Loss in 1974 — Cost of land	$260,000
Market value	150,000
	110,000
Consequential losses
Cost of land and improvements	$578,400
(assuming that the value of the land as improved uncontaminated would increase by at least the cost of the improvements)

Market value of land as of date of completion of improvements in 1975	X
Consequential loss		X

The sum of $110,000 would bear prejudgment interest from December 1974. The amount ascertained for consequential losses would bear prejudgment interest from the date of completion in 1975.

[84] As the damage award could not exceed the amount required to decontaminate the property (together with residual damages, etc.) if the amount of the 1974 loss and the consequential losses exceeded the removal costs, the removal costs would constitute the award of damages, in this case, $400,000.

[85] The reason why the award for damages cannot exceed the removal costs (together with residual damages, etc.) is that the plaintiff is required to mitigate his damages.

[86] The difficulty with applying the above formula to the facts in the case on appeal is that the only valuation to the property is the appraisal of the property made in 1980 by one A. R. Nesbitt. A summary of his appraisal is contained in a letter which he wrote on 5th February 1980, reading, in part, as follows:

> Thus, I have concluded that, without the availability of an alternative permanent radio-active [sic] disposal site at this time, there would be a very small probability and possibility of locating a potential purchaser who would accept title to the site, without some guarantee of decontamination and that if such a purchaser were found, he would, in all probability, be willing to pay only something less than $200,000 for the property in its present condition.

[87] We do not have valuations for the years 1974, 1975 or 1976.

[88] The usual course in cases of this kind where the trial judge has utilized a wrong formula in ascertaining damages is to remit the case to the trial judge so that he may hear further evidence and argument and re-assess the damages. I would pursue that course here, except for the following circumstances:

(a) The learned trial judge made a finding of fact that the land today is said to be worth less than $200,000 and presumably would not have been worth more than $150,000 at the time of discovery of the fraud. The presumption made by the learned trial judge was, no doubt, based on the sensible and common sense basis that, if the land, as improved, was worth $200,000 in 1980, it would be worth less in 1975. Thus the total damages could not in any case be less than $378,400.

(b) While no appraisals were made for the years 1974, 1975 and 1976, the findings of the learned trial judge were not attacked by counsel for C.R.F. or the appellants.

(c) Even if different appraisals were given for the years 1974, 1975 and 1976, it is highly unlikely that the losses computed in accordance with the formula suggested by me would be significantly different than the sum awarded by the learned trial judge.

(d) Even if the damages were reduced very substantially, the award would bear prejudgment interest, and thus C.R.F. would recover an amount in excess of that awarded by the learned trial judge.

(e) C.R.F. did not cross-appeal.

(f) Counsel for C.R.F. did not deal with consequential damages, except to assert that the approach taken by the learned trial judge was correct.

(g) Counsel for the appellants did not deal with consequential damages at all, except to argue that the only measure of damages was to apply the Sorenson rule as of December 1974.

[89] In the above circumstances, I would not take any step which would further protract this litigation and cause great expense to the parties and which might have the effect of giving C.R.F. a benefit which it did not seek, here or below. I would not, therefore, disturb the award made by the learned trial judge in respect of the Anvil Way property, or in any respect whatsoever.

[90] While I think the award of $4,200 in respect of storage costs to Comor Supplies Ltd. is too remote, as this part of the award was not attacked in argument, as I have already said, I would not disturb the award made by the learned trial judge in this regard.

[91] I must, of course, deal with the other issues raised by counsel for the respondents.

[92] On the issue of damages, the appellants again raise the issue of foreseeability. I held in dealing with this matter on the issue of liability that there was no doubt that the respondents had suffered some injury which was clearly foreseeable. The appellants submit, however, that after 1974 events occurred which were not foreseeable, and that they should not be held responsible for the damages flowing from these unforeseen events. They contend that several of the factors contributing substantially to the damages claimed were not, as found by the learned trial judge, foreseeable at the time of the sale in 1974. These unforeseen factors were:

(a) the increased concern of the Atomic Energy Control Board over the long term effects of low-level radiation, including the prospect that the board might require that the thorium waste be removed and transported to a waste disposal site; and

(b) the public outcry which arose after the 1976 investigations made by the board, which investigations were the subject of extensive comment by the media.

[93] Before dealing with the legal aspects of this matter, the issue of foreseeability should be considered in relation to the findings of fact made by the learned trial judge. I repeat what the trial judge said on this issue as follows [pp. 367-68]:

> The increased vigour with which the Atomic Energy Control Act has been enforced following discovery in 1976 of new hazards associated with low-grade radiation could not, of course, have been expected at the time of the sale to the plaintiffs. Much was then, and still remains, unknown about radiation; hence no doubt, the Atomic Energy Control Board's broad regulatory authority oyer radioactive material, Mr. Smerchanski and his company were well aware, however, of the political implications of radioactive waste for a person in possession of such material in the event of discovery of new hazards, or a change in public attitudes towards those hitherto known. The manner in which the problem of the Surrey wastes has been dealt with by government agencies, influenced in part by the desire to achieve political, rather than practical, objectives, could well have been foreseen by Mr. Smerchanski and his company, and the loss which has been suffered by the plaintiffs as a consequence is plainly a proximate result of his deception.

[94] It is implicit in the finding of fraud that the appellants deliberately undertook the risk that their fraudulent conduct might be discovered. They undertook the risk that damages would result to the respondents as a result of the fraud. The arguments put forward by the appellants are similar to the arguments which used to be made in the "thin-skull" cases. Such arguments have long been rejected in our courts. See the article by Professor A. M. Linden, "Foreseeability in Negligence Law" (1973), L. Soc. of Upper Can. Special Lectures, 55 at 69:

> The recurring situation that is the most settled and therefore the easiest to handle is the thin-skull problem. Since the turn of the century, it has been crystal-clear that a negligent defendant must take his victim as he finds him. The thin-skull rule, as this principle is often identified, was first enunciated before Polemis [Re Polemis and Furness, Withy & Co., [1921] 3 K.B. 560 (C.A.)] was decided by Lord Justice Kennedy in Dulieu v. White & Sons, [1901] 2 K.B. 669 at 679 (D.C.), in these words:
> "If a man is negligently run over or otherwise negligently injured in his body, it is no answer to the sufferer's claim for damage that he would have suffered less injury, or no injury at all, if he had not had an unusually thin skull or an unusually weak heart."
>
> Some years after the Polemis decision, this principle was repeated by Lord Just MacKinnon in Owens v. Liverpool, [1939] 1 K.B. 394 at 400, [1938] 4 All E.R. 727 (C.A.), as follows:
>
> "One who is guilty of negligence to another must put up with idiosyncracies of his victim that increase the likelihood or extent of damage to him — it is no answer to a claim for a fractured skull that its owner had an unusually fragile one."
> His lordship did not feel it necessary to cite the Polemis case, which had been decided in the interim, nor did he give any reasons for the decision. He merely asserted that, if the defendant's negligence "in fact caused" the damage, he should have to pay.

[95] The risk of harm was assumed by the appellants. That harm was more extensive than they could foresee. That is no reason to relieve them from liability. The type of injury here was reasonably foreseeable, given the premise that the thorium waste was a dangerous, regulated material.

[96] In Vacwell Enrg. v. B.D.H. Chemicals, [1971] 1 Q.B. 88, [1969] 3 All E.R. 1681, varied [1971] 1 Q.B. 111, [1970] 3 All E.R. 553n (C.A.) (a negligence case), Rees J. said at pp. 1698-99:

The duty which Vacwell allege rested upon B.D.H. was to take reasonable care to ascertain major industrial hazards of chemicals marketed by them and to give warning of such hazards to their customers. It was not argued before me that there was an absolute duty upon B.D.H. to give warning of industrial hazards of dangerous chemicals, whether they could have discovered them by the exercise of reasonable care or not. I find that the duty to take reasonable care as stated above is the duty which rested upon B.D.H. in the circumstances of this case. I have already reviewed the evidence in relation to this aspect of the matter and I need not repeat it. I am satisfied that B.D.H. failed to comply with their duty in two respects: first, they failed to provide and maintain a system for carrying out an adequate research into scientific literature to ascertain known hazards; secondly, by Mr. Hill and Dr. Muir, they failed to carry out an adequate research into the scientific literature available to them in order to discover the industrial hazards of a new, or little-known, chemical, If that duty had been complied with, I have no doubt that the explosion hazard noted by GAUTIER and others would have come to light and a suitable warning been given, which would have prevented Vacwell dealing with the ampoules of boron tribromide as they did. The greater part of the observations I have made earlier in this judgment in relation to causation and remoteness of damage apply in the present context also. But in tort, foreseeability of damage is the paramount test. It will be sufficient if I refer briefly to the judgment of Lord Parker C.J. in Smith v. Leech Brain & Co. Ltd., [1962] 2 Q.B. 405, [1961] 3 All E.R. 1159. In that case a workman received a burn from molten metal in foreseeable circumstances, for which the employer was responsible in law. The burn caused cancer, from which the plaintiff died, which was not a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the burn. His widow brought a claim for damages, Lord Parker C.J. … said, at p. 415:

"The Judicial Committee were, I think, disagreeing with the decision in Re Polemis [supra] that a man is no longer liable for the type of damage which he could not reasonably anticipate. The Judicial Committee were not, I think, saying that a man is only liable for the extent of damage which he could anticipate, always assuming the type of injury could have been anticipated. That view is really supported by the way in which cases of this sort have been dealt with in Scotland. Scotland has never, so far as I know, adopted the principle laid down in Re Polemis, and yet I am quite satisfied that they have throughout proceeded on the basis that the tortfeasor takes the victim as he finds him. In those circumstances, it seems to me that this is plainly a case which comes within the old principle. The test is not whether these employers could reasonably have foreseen that a burn would cause cancer and that he would die. The question is whether these employers could reasonably foresee the type of injury he suffered, namely, the burn. What, in the particular case, is the amount of damage which he suffers as a result of that burn, depends upon the characteristics and constitution of the victim."

Here it was a foreseeable consequence of the supply of boron tribromide without a warning — and a fortiori with an irrelevant warning about harmful vapour — that in the ordinary course of industrial use it could come into contact with water and cause a violent reaction and possibly an explosion. It would also be foreseeable that some damage to property would or might result. In my judgment the explosion and the type of damage being foreseeable, it matters not in the law that the magnitude of the former and the extent of the latter were not.

[97] As long as a chain of causation can be traced from the tort to the damage and that damage is "foreseeable as possible" damages are recoverable: see the judgment of Dickson J.A. (as he then was) in Assinaboine South S.D. v. Greater Winnipeg Gas Co.,

> The force of The Wagon Mound (No. 1) [Overseas Tankship U.K. Ltd. v. Morts Dock and Enrg. Co., [1961] A.C. 388, [1961] 1 All E.R. 404 (P.C.)] was somewhat dissipated by Hughes v. Lord Advocate, [1963] A.C. 837, [1963] 1 All E.R. 705 (P.C.) (per Lord Jenkins at p. 710:
> "It is true that the duty of care expected in cases of this sort is confined to reasonably foreseeable dangers, but it does not necessarily follow that liability is escaped because the danger actually materialising is not identical with the danger reasonably foreseen and guarded against."
>
> One need not envisage "the precise concatenation of circumstances which led up to the accident", p 712 [per Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest quoting from Harvey v. Singer Mfg. Co. Ltd., [1960] S.C. 155 at 172].
>
> In Overseas Tankship (U.K.) Ltd. v. Miller SS. Co. Proprietary Ltd. (The Wagon Mound (No. 2)), [1967] 1 A.C. 617, [1966] 2 All E.R. 709, the Privy Council, on different findings of fact, reached a conclusion different from that in The Wagon Mound (No. 1). Lord Reid said at p. 717:
>
> "The vital parts of the findings of fact which have already been set out in full are (i) that the officers of the Wagon Mound 'would regard furnace oil as very difficult to ignite on water' — not that they would regard this as impossible; (ii) that their experience would probably have been 'that this had very rarely happened' — not that they would never have heard of a case where it had happened; and (iii) that they would have regarded it as a 'possibility, but one which could become an actuality only in very exceptional circumstances' — not, as in The Wagon Mound (No. 1), that they could not reasonably be expected to have known that this oil was capable of being set afire when spread on water."
> These words would suggest that recovery may be had, provided the event giving rise to the damage is not regarded as "impossible", and even though it "very rarely happened", "only in very exceptional circumstances". The test of foreseeability of damage becomes a question of what is possible rather than what is probable.

[98] The rules as to remoteness are more favourable to the plaintiff in actions of deceit than they are in actions for breach of contract; see Treitel, Law of Contracts, 4th ed. (1975), p. 236.

[99] I refer again to the statement of Lord Denning M.R. in Doyle, supra, at p. 122, where he said: "… it does not lie in the mouth of the fraudulent person to say that the damages could not be reasonably foreseen."

[100] In Hoffer, supra, it was "foreseeable as possible" that a negligently operated snowmobile might escape control, crash into a school and' knock off a negligently constructed gas main, leading to an explosion which destroyed the school.

[101] In Smith v. Leech Brain, supra, some molten metal spattered on to a worker's lip, leading to development of cancer, and death. This type of injury and damage was held to be reasonably foreseeable.

[102] In Vacwell, supra, it was foreseeable that a minor explosion would result and lead to some damage, and the defendants were held liable for all damages from the large explosion which actually occurred.

[103] All of the above situations seem much more unlikely to occur and much more difficult to foresee than the matters referred to by the appellants in the case on appeal.

[104] Counsel for the appellants also argues that the public outcry and the increased concern of the Atomic Energy Control Board constitute a novus actus interveniens. This argument is without merit. The harm inflicted by the appellants was the same throughout, and the suggested "intervening forces" were merely a recognition of existing damage.

[105] In conclusion, I point out that the time of sale (1974) is not an appropriate date for testing foreseeability in this case. While the major fraudulent misrepresentations were made in 1974, the fraud was a continuing one. Further wrongs were committed later by permitting the drummed materials to be stored at the 116th Avenue property and abandoning this material to the respondents.

[106] The final submission of counsel for the appellants on the subject of damages was that the learned trial judge erred in refusing to include in his order a provision for relief or reimbursement in the event of a contribution to the cost of "clean-up" by government agencies.

[107] I agree with the determination made by the learned trial judge in respect of this contention, as follows:

> After reflection I have concluded that it would be inconsistent with the finality which the law requires of judgments that any provision be made in the present judgment for relief or reimbursement of the defendants in the event that a government contribution should be made towards the solution of the problem.

[108] I would also point out that ex gratia payments made prior to judgment by a government to a plaintiff are not taken into account in the calculation of awards for damages: see the judgment of Denning J. (as he then was) in Dennis v. London Passenger Tpt. Bd., [1948] 1 All E.R. 779 at 779 (K.B.), as follows:

> The cardinal point to remember is that it is the defendants who are responsible for what has occurred. In my opinion, a wrongdoer is not to be allowed to reduce damages by the fact that other persons have made up to the plaintiff his wages, like the London County Council and the Ministry of Pensions in this case. The plaintiff has lost his wages. In point of law, therefore, prima facie he should have them paid by the wrongdoer.

[109] It would seem to follow that ex gratia payments made after judgment should not be considered by the court.

[110] I would think it extremely unlikely that any government agency would make any payment to the respondents in respect of "clean-up" costs when, as in this case, the respondents have already received compensation from the appellants. It is more likely that any compensation paid by a government agency would go to the appellants. If the respondents were compensated by a government agency in respect of "clean-up" costs, it might well be that the appellants would have a claim against the respondents for "unjust enrichment". Whether such a claim would succeed is not for us to decide.

[111] For the above reasons, I would dismiss the appeals.

Appeal from liability dismissed; appeal from assessment of damages allowed; case remitted to trial judge for reassessment of damages.

Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation v. The City of Toronto

[1951] O.R. 726-735

ONTARIO
[COURT OF APPEAL]
ROBERTSON C.J.O. and HOPE and BOWLBY JJ.A.
4th OCTOBER 1951.

Pleadings -- Amendment -- General Rule as to Permitting Amendments -- Exceptions to General Rule -- Withdrawal of Admission -- Prejudice -- Rules 183, 184.

An admission made in pleadings or otherwise for the purpose of trial is a judicial admission, and the vital feature of a judicial admission is its conclusiveness upon the party making it. Although an admission may, in some circumstances and upon proper terms, be withdrawn by leave of the Court, this should never be permitted unless it is proved by satisfactory evidence that the fact admitted was not true. The withdrawal of an admission of fact in a pleading is not something for which the other side can be compensated in costs, and is therefore not within the general rule stated in Williams v. Leonard et al. (1895), 16 P.R. 544 at 549. Delap v. Canadian Pacific R.W. Co. (1915), 8 O.W.N. 293; Wright v. Way (1880), 8 P.R. 326; Gesman v. The City of Regina et al. (1907), 1 Sask. L.R. 39; Wampler v. British Empire Underwriters Agency (1920), 48 O.L.R. 428, quoted and applied.

Judgment of Kelly J., [1951] O.W.N. 574, reversed.

AN APPEAL, by leave of Spence J., from the order of Kelly J. allowing an appeal from an order of Conant, Senior Master. The reasons of Kelly J. and Spence J. are set out in [1951] O.W.N. 574.

19th September 1951. The appeal was heard by ROBERTSON C.J.O. and HOPE and BOWLBY JJ.A.

R.N. Starr, K.C., for the plaintiff, appellant: Not only was the writing of the letter admitted in the statement of defence, but it was again set out in the defendant's affidavit on production. We obtained leave to amend our statement of claim to plead laches, estoppel, ratification and other equitable principles after we had obtained partial production from the City. The order permitted amendment of the statement of defence, but my submission is that the purpose of this leave was merely to enable the defendant to reply as might be necessary to our amendments. The amended statement of defence not only did this, but went further and withdrew the prior admission that the letter had been written.

I can find no Ontario case as to how a party should plead to an amended pleading of his opponent, but it seems obvious that he should go no further than is necessary to reply to the amendment.

The affidavit filed by the defendant does not say that the letter was not written, and that the original admission was not true. Our position is prejudiced by the withdrawal of the admission, because without it we shall have to prove the letter at the trial, which may be a matter of some difficulty.

[BOWLBY J.A.: What right has the Court to interfere with the Master's discretion?] I submit there is none, and I so argued before Kelly J., but he did not give effect to my submission. [BOWLBY J.A.: The City, by its counter-motion, invoked the discretion, and it is difficult to see how it can now complain of the way in which that discretion was exercised.]

The general principle is that an admission, once made, cannot be withdrawn unless it is proved by satisfactory evidence that the fact admitted was not true. This is both good law and good sense, and if the rule did not exist there would be little finality to pleadings. The rule is so well established that Wigmore on Evidence, 3rd ed. 1940, s. 2590 (vol. 9), states that admissions of fact are judicial admissions. I rely also on Greenwood v. Atkinson (1830), 4 Sim. 54, 58 E.R. 22; Livesey v. Wilson (1812), 1 Ves. & B. 149, 35 E.R. 58; Wright v. Way (1880), 8 P.R. 326; Chechik v. Bronfman et al., 18 Sask. L.R. 512 at 519, [1924] 2 W.W.R. 1165, [1924] 3 D.L.R. 1065; Guinn v. Cully et al., [1941] O.W.N. 189. There is nothing here to prove that these admissions were not correct; on the contrary, there is actual evidence that they were true.

The whole defence is a technical one; substantially the defendant says, as to each of our allegations of fact, that what was done was done without authority. There is in general no objection to a technical defence, but in the circumstances of this case the defence, in view of the City's conduct over 40 years, is intellectually dishonest.

The power of amendment under Rule 183 is not to be exercised to enable a defendant to put technical difficulties in the plaintiff's way, when they do not go to the merits of the action, or to assist a litigant to obtain a dishonest advantage: Wampler v. British Empire Underwriters Agency (1920), 48 O.L.R. 428, 57 D.L.R. 88; Witherspoon v. Township of East Williams (1918), 44 O.L.R. 584, 47 D.L.R. 370.

The disadvantage to us cannot be compensated in costs. If worst comes to worst it may be necessary for us to call the city treasurer, and he would be a hostile witness. We have also lost a year's time that might have been given to a further attempt to find the letter.

J. Johnston, for the defendant, respondent: I admit that this letter is important. If it was written it should not have been. It was nine years before the decision in John Mackay and Company v. The City of Toronto, [1920] A.C. 208, 48 D.L.R. 151, [1919] 3 W.W.R. 253, which finally decided that municipalities could act only by by-law, and lawyers were then not so sure as to the powers of municipalities. The only by-law in this connection was that providing for the original debentures, which specified that they were to be payable in sterling. When the affidavit on production was made the question of this letter had not come to the fore; doubt arose later as to whether it was written or, if written, delivered.

The affidavit on production was drafted in a solicitor's office, and the deponent might easily overlook this item. Mr. Lascelles could hardly know what was sent 40 years before, and no one else in his department would have knowledge of this matter. He probably simply accepted the affidavit as drawn by the solicitor. It was not until the plaintiff's examination for discovery that we discovered that the original letter was not available. The plaintiff may be able to prove this letter at the trial, but it should not escape the necessity for proving its case merely because of a slip on our part.

Before the Master the plaintiff based its argument on a firm rule that an admission, once made, cannot be withdrawn unless there is evidence that the admission was not in accordance with the facts. It is impossible to prove that in this case. This being the case, however, it follows that the Master's order was not made in the exercise of any discretion, but was made because there was no evidence to show that the admission was not true.

The order of Kelly J. was based on the proposition that the Court has a discretion to amend pleadings so that the trial of an action will not be governed by a solicitor's slip. There is no reason why this order should be interfered with. There is no injustice in the solicitor attempting to rectify his mistake or to rely on a weak point in his opponent's case, and put his case in proper shape, so that it can be tried on the proper facts. [BOWLBY J.A.: You originally admitted the letter but said that the person who wrote it had no authority to do so. You have copy on file. Is the admission not therefore in accordance with the obvious facts?] The copy may have been merely a draft. We want this feature of the case passed on by the trial judge, and do not want to be governed by the solicitor's hastily-made admissions. I rely on Roe v. Davies (1876), 2 Ch. D. 729 at 733.

Pleadings are often amended in the course of an action to fit the evidence; pleadings are only the frame of the action. If an admission like this could not be withdrawn except on positive proof of its incorrectness, no admission would ever be made. Such a ridiculous result should be avoided by the practice: Smith v. Smith (1884), 5 O.R. 690; Northern Sulphite v. Occidental Syndicate (1911), 2 O.W.N. 1015, 19 O.W.R. 69; McQuade & Clark v. Moncrieff et al., [1929] 1 D.L.R. 984; Peterkin v. MacFarlane et al. (1878), 4 O.A.R. 25 at 46; Tildesley v. Harper (1878), 10 Ch. D. 393; Steward v. North Metropolitan Tramways Company (1886), 16 Q.B.D. 556; Weldon v. Neal (1887), 19 Q.B.D. 394; McLeod v. Crawford (1905), 6 O.W.R. 797 at 799; Ormsby v. Township of Mulmur (1916), 36 O.L.R. 566, 31 D.L.R. 76.

The order of the Master re-opened the pleadings and we took it that we could plead at large because the statement of claim was so completely changed. Our defence is not technical but the reverse, and goes to the substance of the whole action.

R.N. Starr, K.C., in reply: I refer to the following authorities as to pleading to an amendment: Bowes v. Chaleyer (1921), 32 C.L.R. 159; Hawthorne v. Siegel (1891), 88 Cal. 159, 22 Am. St. Rep. 291 at 296. Greenwood v. Atkinson (1830), 4 Sim. 54 at 634, 58 E.R. 22, is, I submit, still the law to-day. Rex et al. v. Meilicke et al., [1937] 3 W.W.R. at 257, should not be followed, being based on a misinterpretation of the English Annual Practice.

Cur adv. vult.

4th October 1951. The judgment of the Court was delivered by

HOPE J.A.:-- This is an appeal by the plaintiff by virtue of leave of Spence J., dated 5th June 1951, pursuant to Rule 493

from an order of Kelly J. dated 22nd May 1951, reversing an order of the Senior Master dated 9th April 1951, striking out paras. 4 and 6 of the amended statement of defence filed herein and restoring in place thereof paras. 4 and 6 appearing in the original statement of defence filed. The original statement of defence contained, as paras. 4 and 6, statements which were an admission by the defendant that a certain letter dated 18th November 1911 had been written by the then City Treasurer of the defendant corporation to Messrs. G.A. Stimson and Company. The paragraphs in question read as follows:

"4. The defendant further admits that R.T. Coady who was the treasurer of The Corporation of the City of Toronto at the time in question wrote a letter date November 18, 1911 to Messrs. G.A. Stimson and Company, stock brokers, Toronto, advising that the Corporation in order to suit the convenience of their client would make payment of principal and interest either at the Canadian Bank of Commerce, New York City, or the Bank of Toronto at Toronto instead of at London, England, at the par of exchange (9 1/2%) in regard to the debentures referred to in paragraph 3 hereof and the letter purported to have the corporate seal attached. This letter was not the act of the defendant and the said Coady had no authority to alter the terms of the debentures or to affix the seal of the corporation to the said letter, his powers in the latter regard being limited to those set out in section 20 by By-law No. 4295 of the defendant corporation. Accordingly the said letter had no binding effect on the defendant. Furthermore the letter could not be considered as part of the debentures because it did not comply with section 334 of the Municipal Act, chapter 266, Revised Statutes of Ontario 1937 and antecedent statutes. The defendant says that its Deputy City Treasurer Henry Reburn did write a letter dated June 1, 1936 to Mr. E. Reburn of Canada Permanent Mortgage Corporation enclosing a copy of the letter from Coady to G.A. Stimson and Company referred to above but the said letter was not the act of the defendant and had no binding effect on the defendant."

"6. In the alternative if it should be found that the letter of Coady was binding on the defendant, it did not bind the defendant to pay the principal and interest on the debentures when they became due in United States Dollars at the par of exchange for the pound as the plaintiff claims."

Subsequent to the delivery and filing of the original statement of defence, the plaintiff moved to amend its statement of claim. Leave to do so was granted by the Senior Master on the 3rd January 1951. This order provided, inter alia, as follows:

"2. IT IS FURTHER ORDERED that the pleadings be and they are hereby re-opened and that the Plaintiff shall amend the Statement of Claim as aforesaid and serve an amended copy thereof upon the Defendant within 10 days from the date hereof, and the Defendant shall have 10 days from the date of service to file an amended Statement of Defence, and the Plaintiff shall have 10 days from the service of the said amended Statement of Defence, if any, to reply thereto."

The amended statement of claim, dated the 11th January 1951, was delivered and filed. The amendment effected thereby in no way related to the letter above mentioned. In the amended statement of defence, dated 30th January 1951, the defendant corporation amended paras. 4 and 6 of its original defence by withdrawing its admission that the letter referred to was written. The amended paragraphs read as follows:

"4. The defendant does not admit that its Treasurer wrote letters as set out in paragraph 5 of the said statement of claim and paragraph 9 of the amended statement of claim or that the seal of the Corporation was affixed. However if it should be proved that such letters were written and received by Stimson and Company such acts were not the acts of the defendant and the said treasurer had no authority to alter the terms of the debentures or to affix the seal of the Corporation to the said letter, his powers in the latter regard being limited to those set out in section 20 of By-law No. 4295 of the defendant corporation. Accordingly the said letters had no binding effect on the defendant. Furthermore the letters could not be considered as part of the debentures because they did not comply with section 333 of The Municipal Act, chapter 243, Revised Statutes of Ontario 1950 and antecedent statutes."

"6. In the alternative if it should be found that the said Treasurer wrote the said letters and that such letters are binding on the defendant, it did not commit the defendant to pay the principal and interest on the debentures when they became due in United States Dollars at the par of exchange for the pound, as the plaintiff claims."

Then followed the motion to the Senior Master by notice dated 31st January 1951 to strike out, inter alia, these paragraphs from the amended statement of defence and to restore the paragraphs of corresponding numbers from the original pleading. The defendant, by notice dated 1st February 1951, launched a counter-motion asking the Master to exercise his discretion and allow the amended defence to stand in the place of the original defence. The order of the Senior Master dated 9th April 1951 makes no specific reference to the counter-motion and no separate order in respect thereof appears in the appeal book. The order was, however, granted as requested, striking out the paragraphs numbered 4 and 6 from the amended pleading and restoring the paragraphs of the same numbers from the original pleading. Thereupon, on an appeal heard by Kelly J., the last-named order of the Master was set aside.

The question on this appeal can be reduced to a very simple point, namely: May a litigant, having made an admission of fact in his pleading, be permitted to withdraw such admission from the record, and, if so, in what circumstances? The rule which still prevails was well stated by Street J. in Williams v. Leonard et al. (1895), 16 P.R. 544, affirmed 17 P.R. 73; 26 S.C.R. 406. Although somewhat lengthy, I quote as follows: Street J. who delivered the judgment of a Divisional Court composed of himself and Falconbridge J., said at p. 549:

"... a rule has been enunciated in England which has been expressly approved by the Court of Appeal there in Steward v. North Metropolitan Tramways Co., 16 Q.B.D. 556, which I think we are bound to follow, and which has the merit of placing the obligation to allow amendments upon a more solid basis than that afforded by a balancing of the respective merits of the parties in each case in which an application to amend is made.

"The rule to which I refer is thus stated by Lord Esher, M.R.: 'The rule of conduct of the Court in such a case is that, however negligent or careless may have been the first omission, and however late the proposed amendment, the amendment should be allowed, if it can be made without injustice to the other side. There is no injustice if the other side can be compensated by costs: but, if the amendment will put them into such a position that they must be injured, it ought not to be made;' and Lord Justice Lindley says, at p. 559: 'I entirely agree with the terms in which the rule as to amendments has been laid down in the cases cited by the Master of the Rolls. I think an amendment ought always to be allowed, except when the other party cannot be placed in the same position, but an injury would be occasioned to him by the amendment which could not be compensated by costs.'

"I have not failed to observe the difference between the English Rule (309 of the year 1883), under which the cases to which I have referred were decided, and our own Rule 444. The former requires that 'all such amendments shall be made as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real questions in controversy between the parties.' Our Rule is that 'all such amendments may be made as may be necessary for the advancement of justice, determining the real question or issue raised by or depending on the proceedings, and best calculated to secure the giving of judgment according to the very right and justice of the case.' A reference, however, to the cases decided upon the English rule will shew that they have practically construed it as if it contained the language used in ours. Notwithstanding its imperative language, they have in many cases refused leave where they deemed the amendments not conducive to the advancement of justice, or of a technical character and therefore not best calculated to secure the giving of judgment according to the very right and justice of the case."

Admissions made in pleadings or otherwise for the purpose of trial are judicial admissions. The vital feature of a judicial admission is universally conceded to be its conclusiveness upon the party making it, i.e., the prohibition of any further dispute of the effect by him and by any use of evidence to dispute or contradict it.

An admission may, in certain circumstances and upon proper terms, be withdrawn on leave of the Court. Nevertheless it is well established that facts admitted cannot be withdrawn unless it is proved by satisfactory evidence that the fact so admitted was not true. Decisions both in our Courts and in other Provinces sustain this statement and it is cited by the respondent's counsel in his memorandum of fact and law in the words found in 25 Halsbury's Laws of England, 2nd ed. 1937, pp. 256 et seq., particularly in s. 425, which reads in part as follows:

"If the amendment for which leave is asked seeks to repair an omission due to negligence or carelessness, leave to amend is granted if the amendment can be made without injustice to the other side. There is no injustice if the other side can be compensated by an order as to costs; but if, owing to the way in which the pleading has been framed, the other party has been put into such a position that an injury would be done to him by an amendment, the Court will not give leave."

In Delap v. Canadian Pacific R.W. Co. (1915), 8 O.W.N. 293, Middleton dealing with a motion to amend by withdrawing an admission said: "This amendment was sought as of right, without any evidence shewing why that which was once stated and admitted should now be withdrawn. It was not to be supposed that such a statement, deliberately made, could be without foundation; and the defendants were justified in asking that it should remain of record, so that they might have whatever advantage it might give them."

In Wright v. Way (1880), 8 P.R. 326, Blake V.C. said: "... I think the Court should not allow a defendant to vary his answer unless a mistake or misapprehension is clearly made out, and some reason assigned for this existing."

In Gesman v. The City of Regina et al. (1907), 1 Sask. L.R. 39, 7 W.L.R. 307, a single judge (Newlands J.) stated the rule thus: "Before an admission made on the pleadings can be withdrawn, there should be evidence produced that it was inadvertently made, and that the admission is not correct."

In Wampler v. British Empire Underwriters Agency (1920), 48 O.L.R. 428, 57 D.L.R. 88, Masten J.A. at pp. 433-4, delivering the judgment of the Court of Appeal, concurred in by Mulock C.J.O. and Magee and Riddell JJ.A., said: "Our Rule 183 is not quite the same as the English Rule; but, even under our Rule it has been held by my brother Riddell, in a judgment concurred in by my brother Sutherland -- Witherspoon v. Township of East Williams (1918), 44 O.L.R. 584, at p. 602, 47 D.L.R. 370, at p. 387 -- that 'Rule 183 does not compel us to amend proprio motu: amendments under that Rule are "to secure the advancement of justice," not to enable a litigant to obtain a dishonest advantage.' "

After considering these authorities and those others to which counsel referred, and in the light of the circumstances in this case, I am of the opinion that the appeal must be allowed. Counsel for the respondent made some effort to argue that the admission in the original statement of defence had been a slip of a solicitor in the rush of preparing the pleading, but it is quite clear that subsequent thereto a copy of the same letter was set out in the affidavit on production filed on behalf of the defendant. Moreover, counsel for the respondent produced no evidence or argument whatsoever that the admission contained in the original pleading was not, in fact, correct. I do not consider that this is a case where the amended pleadings should be allowed on the grounds that the appellant can be compensated in costs. The appeal is therefore allowed and the order of the Senior Master is restored. Costs both here and below to the appellant.

Appeal allowed with costs.

publication — Refus de la Cour d'appel d'entendre la motion au motif qu'elle a épuisé sa compétence — Un tribunal demeure-t-il compétent pour réexaminer des ordonnances de non-publication et d'autres ordonnances accessoires de cette nature après qu'il a été statué sur le fond d'une instance criminelle?

An affidavit filed in a criminal matter before the Court of Appeal had been subject to a publication ban pending a decision as to its admissibility as new evidence. In its November 2018 reasons allowing the appeal on the merits, the Court of Appeal dismissed the motion for new evidence but ordered that the publication ban remain in effect indefinitely. In May 2019, the CBC brought a motion before the Court of Appeal to have the publication ban set aside, arguing that having access to the affidavit would shed light on the criminal matter before the Court of Appeal and the court's conclusion on the merits that a miscarriage of justice had occurred at trial.

Un affidavit déposé dans une affaire criminelle dont était saisie la Cour d'appel avait fait l'objet d'une interdiction de publication en attendant qu'il soit statué sur son admissibilité en tant que nouvel élément de preuve. Dans ses motifs de novembre 2018 accueillant l'appel sur le fond, la Cour d'appel a rejeté la motion pour présentation d'éléments de preuve nouveaux, mais elle a ordonné que l'interdiction de publication reste en vigueur indéfiniment. En mai 2019, la SRC a présenté une motion à la Cour d'appel sollicitant l'annulation de l'interdiction de publication, soutenant que l'accès à l'affidavit permettrait de faire la lumière sur l'affaire criminelle dont la Cour d'appel était saisie et sur la conclusion de cette dernière sur le fond selon laquelle une erreur judiciaire s'était produite au procès.

The Court of Appeal declined to consider the CBC's motion, citing its rule of practice against rehearings and the doctrine of functus officio. The court reasoned that its jurisdiction was exhausted once it had decided the merits of the case and entered its formal judgment disposing of the appeal. It concluded that it had no authority to hear the motion. The CBC applied for and was granted leave to appeal to the Court from both the Court of Appeal's 2019 decision refusing to reconsider the publication ban ("2019 Jurisdiction Judgment") and the Court of Appeal's 2018 decision ordering the indefinite publication ban ("2018 Publication Ban Judgment").

La Cour d'appel a refusé d'examiner la motion de la SRC, invoquant la règle du functus officio et sa règle de pratique qui interdit les nouvelles audiences. La cour estimait avoir épuisé sa compétence dès qu'elle s'était prononcée sur le fond de l'affaire et avait inscrit son jugement formel tranchant l'appel. Elle a conclu qu'elle n'avait pas compétence pour entendre la motion. La SRC a demandé et obtenu l'autorisation d'interjeter appel à la Cour à la fois de la décision, rendue par la Cour d'appel en 2019, portant refus de réexaminer l'interdiction de publication (« jugement de 2019 sur la compétence ») et de la décision, rendue par la Cour d'appel en 2018, d'imposer l'interdiction de publication d'une durée indéterminée (« jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication »).

Held (Abella J. dissenting): The appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment should be allowed and the matter remanded to the Court of Appeal. The appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment should be adjourned sine die.

Arrêt (la juge Abella est dissidente) : Le pourvoi contre le jugement de 2019 sur la compétence est accueilli et l'affaire est renvoyée à la Cour d'appel. Le pourvoi contre le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication est ajourné sine die.

Per Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Côté, Brown, Rowe, Martin and Kasirer JJ.: The Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion to set aside the publication ban. While the court could not rehear the appeal on the merits and while the doctrine of functus officio precluded it from reconsidering the substance of the appeal, the court retained the authority to supervise access to the record of its own proceeding, which allowed it to ensure compliance with the constitutionally-protected open court principle and the protection of other important public interests against which it must be weighed. The matter

Le juge en chef Wagner et les juges Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Côté, Brown, Rowe, Martin et Kasirer : La Cour d'appel avait compétence pour examiner la motion de la SRC visant à faire annuler l'interdiction de publication. Même si la cour ne pouvait pas entendre de nouveau l'appel sur le fond et bien que la règle du functus officio l'empêche de se prononcer encore une fois sur le mérite de l'appel, elle a conservé le pouvoir de superviser l'accès au dossier de sa propre instance, ce qui lui permettait d'assurer la conformité au principe constitutionnel de la publicité des débats judiciaires et la protection d'autres should be remanded to the Court of Appeal, as it is best placed to decide the CBC's motion and the discretionary and fact-specific issues raised. It would be inappropriate for the Court to decide the CBC's appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment before the Court of Appeal has had a chance to consider the CBC's motion to have the publication ban set aside.

intérêts publics importants par rapport auxquels il doit être soupesé. Il y a lieu de renvoyer l'affaire à la Cour d'appel, car elle est la mieux placée pour trancher la motion de la SRC ainsi que les questions discrétionnaires et tributaires des faits qui sont soulevées. Il serait inopportun que la Cour décide du pourvoi formé par la SRC contre le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication avant que la Cour d'appel ait eu une occasion d'examiner la motion déposée par la SRC en vue de faire annuler l'interdiction de publication.

According to the rule of functus officio, a final decision of a court that is susceptible of appeal cannot, as a general rule, be reconsidered by the court that rendered that decision. A court loses jurisdiction once the formal judgment has been entered. This rule serves goals of finality and of an orderly appellate procedure. If lower courts could continuously reconsider their own decisions, litigants would be denied a reliable basis from which to launch an appeal to a higher court.

Selon la règle du functus officio, la décision définitive d'un tribunal qui est susceptible d'appel ne peut pas, en règle générale, être examinée de nouveau par le tribunal qui a rendu cette décision. Un tribunal perd sa compétence une fois le jugement officiel rendu. Cette règle favorise la reconnaissance du caractère définitif des procédures et une procédure d'appel ordonnée. Si les juridictions inférieures pouvaient réexaminer continuellement leurs propres décisions, les justiciables seraient privés d'une assise fiable à partir de laquelle interjeter appel à une juridiction supérieure.

That said, it is important to distinguish between jurisdiction over the merits lost by operation of the doctrine of functus officio and jurisdiction that exists to supervise the court record. Even when a court has lost jurisdiction over the merits of a matter as a result of having entered its formal judgment, it retains jurisdiction to control its court record with respect to proceedings generally understood to be an ancillary but independent matter. This power is part of a court's authority to control its own process and arises by necessary implication from the legislative grant of a court's adjudicative authority. It is anchored in the vital public policy favouring public access to the workings of the courts. Important decisions about the openness of the court record, such as rendering, varying or vacating publication bans and sealing orders, may need to be taken after the proceeding on the merits is over. Recognizing that a court's jurisdiction to control its record survives the end of the underlying proceeding is not inconsistent with the purposes of finality and stability of judgments as the doctrine of functus officio was never intended to restrict the ability of lower courts to control their own files.

Cela dit, il importe de faire la distinction entre le pouvoir de connaître du fond, perdu par l'application de la règle du functus officio, et la compétence qui existe pour superviser le dossier judiciaire. Même lorsqu'un tribunal a perdu le pouvoir de connaître du fond d'une affaire pour avoir inscrit son jugement formel, il demeure compétent pour contrôler son propre dossier à l'égard d'une instance généralement considérée comme étant une affaire accessoire, mais indépendante. Ce pouvoir fait partie de la maîtrise par le tribunal de sa propre procédure et découle, par déduction nécessaire, de l'octroi par voie législative du pouvoir juridictionnel d'un tribunal. Il est ancré dans la politique publique essentielle favorisant l'accès aux rouages des tribunaux. D'importantes décisions au sujet de la publicité du dossier judiciaire, comme prononcer, modifier ou annuler des interdictions de publication et ordonnances de mise sous scellés, peuvent devoir être prises après la fin de l'instance sur le fond. Reconnaître que cette compétence subsiste après la fin de l'instance sous-jacente n'est pas incompatible avec les objectifs du caractère définitif des procédures et de la stabilité des jugements, car la règle du functus officio n'a jamais eu pour but de restreindre la capacité des tribunaux d'instance inférieure d'être maîtres de leurs propres dossiers.

That courts retain supervisory jurisdiction over their court records is not to say that once decisions concerning court openness have been made they are open to reconsideration at any time or for any reason. A publication ban or sealing order is susceptible of reconsideration by the issuing court on two narrow grounds and regardless of whether formalized in an order or not.

Le fait que les tribunaux conservent un pouvoir de surveillance à l'égard de leurs dossiers judiciaires ne veut pas dire que les décisions portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires, une fois prises, sont susceptibles d'être réexaminées n'importe quand ou pour n'importe quelle

raison. Une interdiction de publication ou une ordonnance de mise sous scellés est susceptible d'être réexaminée par le tribunal qui l'a prononcée pour deux motifs restreints et peu importe qu'elle soit consacrée dans une ordonnance ou non.

First, a court may vary or set aside a publication ban or sealing order it has made on timely motion by an affected person, such as the media, who was not given notice of the making of that order and to whom it is appropriate to grant standing for this purpose. Regarding publication bans in criminal matters, standing should be thought of as a matter of a court's discretion. The media should generally have standing to challenge an order that threatens the open court principle where they are able to show they will make submissions that were not considered and that could have affected the result. A court does retain residual discretion to deny standing where hearing the motion would not be in the interests of justice, such as where it would unduly harm the parties or duplicate argument already before the court. As to delay, a moving party is expected to take prompt action to challenge such an order once it has become aware it exists. In the absence of legislative direction, a court must be guided by the purpose of the rule and the circumstances of each case. The task is a contextual balancing of finality and timely justice against the importance of the matter being heard on the merits. This determination is inherently tied to the facts of each particular case and the nature of the issue raised.

Premièrement, un tribunal peut modifier ou annuler une interdiction de publication ou une ordonnance de mise sous scellés qu'il a rendue sur motion déposée en temps opportun par une personne touchée, tels les médias, qui n'a pas été avisée du prononcé de cette ordonnance et à qui il y a lieu d'accorder la qualité pour agir à cette fin. Pour ce qui est des interdictions de publication dans les affaires criminelles, la qualité pour agir devrait relever du pouvoir discrétionnaire d'un tribunal. Les médias devraient généralement avoir qualité pour contester une ordonnance qui menace le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires s'ils sont à même de démontrer qu'ils présenteront des observations qui n'ont pas été prises en compte et qui auraient pu influer sur le résultat. Le tribunal conserve effectivement le pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser la qualité pour agir lorsque l'audition de la motion ne serait pas dans l'intérêt de la justice, comme dans le cas où la motion serait indûment préjudiciable aux parties, ou ne ferait que répéter des arguments dont le tribunal a déjà connaissance. Quant au délai, on s'attend à ce que la partie requérante agisse avec célérité pour contester pareille ordonnance dès qu'elle en apprend l'existence. Faute d'une directive législative, les tribunaux doivent être guidés par l'objet de la règle et les circonstances de chaque cas. Leur tâche consiste à mettre en balance dans le contexte le caractère définitif d'une décision et la justice rendue en temps utile par rapport à l'importance que l'affaire soit instruite sur le fond. Cette détermination est intrinsèquement fonction des faits de chaque affaire et de la nature de la question soulevée.

Second, a court may vary or set aside a publication ban or sealing order where the circumstances relating to the making of the order have materially changed. The moving party must establish both that a change of circumstances has occurred and that the change, if known at the time of the initial order, would likely have resulted in an order on different terms. The correctness of the initial order is presumed and is not relevant to the existence of a material change of circumstances.

Deuxièmement, le tribunal peut modifier ou annuler une interdiction de publication ou une ordonnance de mise sous scellés lorsqu'il y a eu changement important des circonstances relatives au prononcé de l'ordonnance. La partie requérante doit établir à la fois qu'il y a eu changement de circonstances et que le changement, s'il avait été connu à l'époque de l'ordonnance initiale, se serait vraisemblablement traduit par une ordonnance aux conditions différentes. La justesse de l'ordonnance initiale est présumée et n'est pas pertinente quant à l'existence d'un changement important de circonstances.

Instances in which a court may reconsider a publication ban or sealing order are distinct from an appeal or application for certiorari made to a higher court from such decisions, as the original court is not being asked to reconsider its decision because it is wrongly decided. Finally, the general principles underlying the two grounds for reconsideration can be displaced by legislation, such as applicable rules of court.

Les situations dans lesquelles un tribunal peut réexaminer une interdiction de publication ou une ordonnance de mise sous scellés se distinguent de l'appel ou d'une demande de certiorari faits à une juridiction supérieure de

In the present case, the Court of Appeal erred in concluding that applicable legislation, such as its rules of court procedure, or the doctrine of functus officio deprived it of jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion to set aside the publication ban. The Court of Appeal retained jurisdiction to oversee its record even after the certificate of decision in the underlying proceeding on the merits was entered. That the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion does not mean, however, that the CBC is entitled to the relief it sought. The availability of relief turns on the proper application of the law to the facts, a determination that should be made by the Court of Appeal. Since the CBC has not established a material change of circumstances, it will therefore have to rely on the Court of Appeal's power to reconsider an order on the basis that it was made without notice to an affected party. The impugned order was made of the Court of Appeal's own accord at the oral hearing and then continued indefinitely. The court heard no submissions on point and provided no prior notice to anyone, including the media, notably the CBC who learned of the impugned ban shortly after the reasons were released. The Court of Appeal will have to determine whether the CBC has standing to challenge the relevant order and whether CBC's motion was timely. Furthermore, any discretionary limits on access to and publication of the contents of the court record must be understood in reference to the test for discretionary limits on court openness: a court can order discretionary limits on openness only where (1) openness poses a serious risk to an important public interest, (2) the order sought is necessary to prevent that risk and (3) the benefits of the order outweigh its negative effects.

Per Abella J. (dissenting): The appeals should be dismissed. The CBC is not entitled to reconsideration of the publication ban as a result of its undue and unjustified delay.

The media is a crucial voice in protecting and promoting the openness of courts, and their right to challenge publication bans is undisputed. But once the underlying proceedings are over, the doctrine of functus officio means as a general rule that a final decision cannot ces décisions, car on ne demande pas au tribunal d'origine de réexaminer sa décision parce qu'elle était erronée. Enfin, les principes généraux qui sous-tendent les deux motifs de réexamen peuvent être écartés par une mesure législative, par exemple les règles de procédure applicables.

En l'espèce, la Cour d'appel a eu tort de conclure que les textes législatifs applicables, comme ses règles de procédure, ou la règle du functus officio lui enlevait compétence pour examiner la motion de la SRC visant à faire annuler l'interdiction de publication. La Cour d'appel est demeurée compétente pour surveiller son dossier, même après que le certificat de décision dans l'instance sous-jacente sur le fond a été inscrit. Ce n'est toutefois pas parce que la Cour d'appel avait compétence pour examiner la motion de la SRC que cette dernière a droit à la mesure de redressement qu'elle a demandée. La possibilité d'obtenir cette mesure de redressement dépend d'une bonne application du droit aux faits, une décision qui devrait être rendue par la Cour d'appel. Puisque la SRC n'a pas établi un changement important de circonstances, elle devra s'appuyer sur le pouvoir de la Cour d'appel de réexaminer une ordonnance au motif qu'elle a été rendue sans avis à une partie touchée. L'ordonnance attaquée a été prononcée du propre chef de la Cour d'appel à l'audience, puis maintenue pour une durée indéterminée. La cour n'a entendu aucune observation sur le point, et n'a donné de préavis à qui que ce soit, dont les médias, notamment la SRC qui a eu vent de l'interdiction attaquée peu après le prononcé des motifs. La Cour d'appel devra se demander si la SRC a qualité pour contester l'ordonnance en question et si la SRC a déposé sa motion en temps opportun. De plus, toute limite discrétionnaire à l'accès au dossier judiciaire et à la publication de son contenu doit être comprise à l'aune du test concernant les limites discrétionnaires à la publicité des débats judiciaires : un tribunal ne peut imposer de limites discrétionnaires portant sur la publicité des débats que si les conditions suivantes sont remplies : (1) la publicité des débats pose un risque sérieux pour un intérêt public important; (2) l'ordonnance sollicitée est nécessaire pour écarter ce risque; (3) les avantages de l'ordonnance l'emportent sur ses effets négatifs.

La juge Abella (dissidente) : Il y a lieu de rejeter les pourvois. La SRC n'a pas droit au réexamen de l'interdiction de publication en raison de son retard indu et injustifié à présenter sa motion.

Les médias jouent un rôle crucial dans la protection et la promotion de la publicité des débats judiciaires, et leur droit d'attaquer des interdictions de publication n'est pas contesté. Cependant, au terme de l'instance sous-jacente, la règle du functus officio fait en sorte qu'une be reconsidered by the court that rendered the decision. Although the application of functus officio is less formalistic and more flexible in respect of ancillary orders and publication bans, and circumscribed avenues must be maintained through which the media can ask a court to reconsider a publication ban after the underlying proceedings are over, the rationales underlying this doctrine show that it has a role to play in respect of publication ban orders.

Finality matters. The parties are entitled to move on with their lives and to be protected from the psychological and financial costs of being dragged back into the justice system when a case is over. A reconsideration of a publication ban must therefore be sought in a timely manner, and a publication ban should not generally be reconsidered after the main proceedings have ended unless there is a sound basis for believing the media's application is in the public interest and could reasonably lead to a different result. It is a balancing exercise, not a hierarchical grid, between the interests of finality and the interests in support of the open court principle. Courts issuing publication bans are expected to consider the importance of the open court principle, even in the absence of a media representative making submissions, and there is no reason to assume that did not happen in this case.

In the present case, the CBC is unable to establish a material change in circumstances. The only bases under which it could move for reconsideration of the publication ban are by showing that the ban was issued without notice, that its submissions could make a material difference to the outcome, and that it moved for reconsideration in a timely manner. None of these conditions has been met.

First, the publication ban was not issued without notice. If the media is present in the courtroom when a publication ban is issued, as was the CBC, it follows that it knows of its existence. Second, the CBC has not discharged its burden of showing that its proposed submissions could make a material, or even any difference in the outcome.

décision définitive ne peut pas, en général, être réexaminée par le tribunal qui l'a rendue. Bien que l'application de la règle du functus officio soit moins formaliste et plus souple en ce qui concerne les ordonnances accessoires et les interdictions de publication, et qu'il faille maintenir des voies circonscrites par lesquelles les médias peuvent demander à un tribunal de réexaminer une interdiction de publication après la fin de l'instance sous-jacente, les considérations qui sous-tendent cette règle montrent qu'elle a un rôle à jouer relativement aux ordonnances de non-publication.

Le caractère définitif d'une décision est important. Il faut que les parties puissent tourner la page et être à l'abri des préjudices psychologiques et financiers associés au fait d'être entraînées de nouveau malgré elles dans le système de justice lorsqu'une affaire est close. Voilà pourquoi il faut demander le réexamen d'une interdiction de publication en temps opportun et pourquoi les tribunaux ne devraient généralement pas réexaminer une interdiction de publication après la fin de l'instance principale, sauf s'il existe une raison valable de croire que la demande formulée par un représentant des médias sert l'intérêt public et qu'elle pourrait raisonnablement amener le tribunal à rendre une décision différente. Il s'agit d'un exercice de pondération, sans barème préétabli, entre les intérêts qui sous-tendent le caractère définitif d'une décision et les intérêts liés au principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires. Les tribunaux qui prononcent des interdictions de publication sont censés tenir compte de l'importance du principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires, même lorsqu'aucun représentant des médias ne présente d'arguments à ce sujet, et il n'y a aucune raison de supposer que cela ne s'est pas produit en l'espèce.

Dans la présente affaire, la SRC ne peut établir qu'un changement important de circonstances s'est produit. Elle ne peut demander un réexamen de l'interdiction de publication que si elle démontre que l'interdiction de publication a été prononcée sans avis, que ses observations peuvent avoir une incidence importante sur le résultat, et qu'elle a déposé la motion en réexamen en temps opportun. Aucune de ces conditions n'a été remplie.

Premièrement, l'interdiction de publication n'a pas été prononcée sans avis. Si les médias sont présents dans la salle d'audience lorsqu'une interdiction de publication est prononcée, comme l'était la SRC, il s'ensuit qu'ils en connaissent l'existence. Deuxièmement, la SRC ne s'est pas acquittée de son fardeau de démontrer que ses observations envisagées pourraient avoir une incidence importante, ou quelque incidence que ce soit, sur le résultat.

Third, and more significantly, the CBC's failure to act in a timely manner is determinative. An unexplained six-month delay for filing a motion to have a publication ban reconsidered is inordinately long. Under no definition of "due dispatch" can this delay be justified, particularly since the CBC was fully aware of the ban from the outset of the proceedings. The delay in this case causes acute harm to the parties, who reasonably expected that their privacy and dignity interests were protected by the finality of the proceedings.

Troisièmement, fait plus important encore, la tardiveté de la SRC à agir est déterminant. Un délai non expliqué de six mois pour déposer une motion en réexamen d'une interdiction de publication est excessif. Peu importe la définition que l'on donne au concept d'agir « avec célérité », le délai ne saurait être justifié, en particulier parce que la SRC était parfaitement au courant du prononcé de l'interdiction dès le début de l'instance. Le délai en l'espèce cause un préjudice grave aux parties, qui s'attendaient raisonnablement à ce que leur droit au respect de la vie privée et à la dignité soit protégé par le caractère définitif de l'instance.

The judgment of Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Côté, Brown, Rowe, Martin and Kasirer JJ. was delivered by

KASIRER J. —

I. Overview

[1] The principal issue in these appeals concerns a court's jurisdiction to render, vary or vacate orders — sealing orders, publication bans and the like — that limit the open court principle. The question is whether a court retains jurisdiction over these ancillary matters after it has decided the merits of the case and has entered its formal judgment. Does the doctrine of functus officio — the notion that once a court has performed its function, it has exhausted its authority — preclude that court from revisiting a publication ban that it had ordered or a sealing order put in place in the course of criminal proceedings?

[2] An affidavit filed in a criminal matter before the Court of Appeal of Manitoba had been held under seal and subject to a publication ban pending a decision as to its admissibility as new evidence. In its reasons allowing the appeal on the merits, the court dismissed the motion for new evidence because it was not relevant to the issue at hand. It nevertheless ordered that the publication ban remain in place indefinitely.

[3] Relying on the open court principle and the constitutionally-protected right of freedom of the press with which it is bound up, the appellant Canadian Broadcasting Corporation ("CBC") brought a motion in which it sought access to the affidavit and asked to have the publication ban set aside. It had been covering the proceedings as a representative of the media. Lifting the publication ban, said the CBC, would shed light on the principal matter before the Court of Appeal and its conclusion on

LE JUGE KASIRER —

I. Vue d'ensemble

[1] La question principale en litige dans les présents pourvois concerne le pouvoir d'un tribunal de rendre, de modifier ou d'annuler des ordonnances — ordonnances de mise sous scellés, interdictions de publication et ainsi de suite — qui limitent le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires. La question est de savoir si un tribunal demeure compétent à l'égard de ces matières accessoires après qu'il se soit prononcé sur le fond de l'affaire et ait inscrit son jugement formel. La règle du functus officio — l'idée selon laquelle dès qu'un tribunal a exercé sa fonction, il a épuisé sa compétence — interdit-elle à ce tribunal de se pencher de nouveau sur une interdiction de publication qu'il a prononcée ou sur une ordonnance de mise sous scellés mise en place lors d'une instance criminelle?

[2] Un affidavit déposé dans une affaire criminelle dont était saisie la Cour d'appel du Manitoba avait été gardé sous scellés et était visé par une interdiction de publication en attendant qu'il soit statué sur son admissibilité en tant que nouvel élément de preuve. Dans ses motifs accueillant l'appel sur le fond, le tribunal a rejeté la motion pour présentation d'éléments de preuve nouveaux, jugeant que ceux-ci n'étaient pas pertinents quant à la question en litige. Il a néanmoins ordonné que l'interdiction de publication reste en vigueur indéfiniment.

[3] Invoquant le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires et le droit constitutionnel à la liberté de la presse avec lequel il est intimement lié, la Société Radio-Canada appelante (« SRC ») a présenté une motion dans laquelle elle sollicitait l'accès à l'affidavit et demandait l'annulation de l'interdiction de publication. Elle avait assuré la couverture de l'instance en tant que représentante des médias. Aux dires de la SRC, la levée de l'interdiction de publication ferait la lumière sur la principale question dont était the merits that a miscarriage of justice had occurred at trial. The Crown opposed the motion to disturb the ban, however, arguing that the affidavit was not relevant and the Court of Appeal had no continuing authority over the matter. Family members of a deceased person mentioned in the affidavit under seal also opposed lifting the ban since, they said, doing so would result in an unjustifiable violation of their privacy.

[4] The Court of Appeal declined to consider the CBC's motion, citing its rule of practice against rehearings and the doctrine of functus officio. The court reasoned that its jurisdiction was exhausted once it had decided the merits of the case and entered its formal judgment disposing of the appeal. It concluded that it had no authority to hear the motion and said the CBC should turn to this Court, on appeal, to seek redress.

[5] In point of fact, this Court is seized of two appeals. In the first, leave was granted from the Court of Appeal's refusal to hear the motion in which it was asked to reconsider its own publication ban and, in addition, to grant the CBC access to the affidavit. This first appeal raises preliminary issues about the Court of Appeal's powers to reconsider such decisions after it had entered the formal order on the merits of the miscarriage of justice case, including consideration of the doctrine of functus officio. In the second appeal for which leave was also granted, the CBC challenges the publication ban directly. This second appeal is taken directly from the publication ban itself, and unlike the first appeal, it does not concern the order granting access to the affidavit also sought in the CBC's motion. It raises the sole issue of whether the Court of Appeal was correct to order the final, indefinite publication ban made in the judgment which disposed of the merits of the appeal.

saisie la Cour d'appel et sa conclusion sur le fond selon laquelle une erreur judiciaire s'était produite au procès. Cependant, la Couronne s'est opposée à la motion en modification de l'interdiction, plaidant que l'affidavit n'était pas pertinent et que la Cour d'appel n'avait plus compétence sur la matière. Des membres de la famille d'une personne décédée mentionnée dans l'affidavit sous scellés se sont eux aussi opposés à la levée de l'interdiction, car, disaient-ils, pareille mesure entraînerait une violation injustifiable de leur vie privée.

[5] En fait, notre Cour est saisie de deux pourvois. Dans le premier, elle a accordé l'autorisation de pourvoi à l'encontre du refus de la Cour d'appel d'entendre la motion dans laquelle il lui était demandé de réexaminer sa propre interdiction de publication et, en outre, de donner à la SRC accès à l'affidavit. Ce premier pourvoi soulève des questions préliminaires relatives aux pouvoirs de la Cour d'appel de réexaminer les décisions de cette nature après qu'elle eut rendu l'ordonnance formelle sur le bien-fondé de l'allégation d'erreur judiciaire, notamment l'examen de la règle du functus officio. Dans le second pourvoi, autorisé lui aussi, la SRC conteste directement l'interdiction de publication. Ce deuxième pourvoi prend sa source directement dans l'interdiction de publication elle-même, et contrairement au premier pourvoi, il ne concerne pas l'ordonnance donnant accès à l'affidavit sollicité lui aussi dans la motion de la SRC. Il soulève l'unique question de savoir si la Cour d'appel a eu raison d'imposer l'interdiction de publication définitive de durée indéterminée décrétée dans le jugement qui tranchait l'appel sur le fond.

[6] As to the first appeal, and so said with great respect, I do not share the Court of Appeal's view that it was without jurisdiction to consider the motion brought by the CBC. It is true that, in the exercise of its appellate authority, the Court of Appeal could not rehear the appeal on the merits and that the doctrine of functus officio precludes it from reconsidering the substance of the appeal. But after a court loses jurisdiction over the merits, it generally retains the authority to supervise access to the record of its own proceedings. Even after the formal judgment on the merits is filed, this ongoing authority allows the court to ensure compliance with the constitutionally-protected open court principle and the protection of other important public interests against which it must be weighed. Indeed, it is critical to upholding the responsibility all courts have to manage their records in accordance with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the proper administration of justice. As ancillary court openness issues have no bearing on the judgments on the merits, there was no reason for the Court of Appeal to tie its own hands in service of the finality of the underlying judgment that was not at risk.

[6] En ce qui concerne le premier pourvoi, et soit dit en tout respect, je ne partage pas l'opinion de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle elle n'avait pas compétence pour examiner la motion présentée par la SRC. Il est vrai que, dans l'exercice de sa compétence en tant que juridiction d'appel, la Cour d'appel ne pouvait pas entendre de nouveau l'appel sur le fond et que la règle du functus officio l'empêche de se prononcer encore une fois sur le mérite de l'appel. Toutefois, après qu'un tribunal perde compétence sur le fond, il conserve généralement le pouvoir de superviser l'accès au dossier de sa propre instance. Même après le dépôt du jugement formel sur le fond, ce pouvoir continu permet au tribunal d'assurer la conformité au principe constitutionnel de la publicité des débats judiciaires et la protection d'autres intérêts publics importants par rapport auxquels il doit être soupesé. En effet, il est essentiel au maintien de la responsabilité de tous les tribunaux d'administrer leurs dossiers conformément à la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et à la bonne administration de la justice. Puisque ces questions accessoires liées à la publicité des débats judiciaires n'ont aucune incidence sur les jugements au fond, la Cour d'appel n'avait aucune raison de se lier les mains au service du caractère définitif du jugement sous-jacent, lequel n'était pas menacé.

[7] Moreover, the Court of Appeal had ordered the continuing publication ban in its judgment on the merits without a hearing to determine whether the open court principle should be limited in the circumstances. The Court of Appeal ought to have considered whether it was appropriate to set aside its publication ban on motion by the CBC in these circumstances.

[8] For the reasons that follow, to dispose of the first appeal I propose that the matter should be remanded to the Court of Appeal to decide the CBC's motion. That court is best placed to decide the discretionary and fact-specific issues raised, including whether the CBC should be granted standing to challenge the publication ban, whether the motion was unreasonably delayed such that it is not in the interests of justice to hear it and whether the lifting of the publication ban is justified here taking into account this Court's decision in Sherman Estate v. Donovan, 2021 SCC 25, [2021] 2 S.C.R. 521.

[8] Pour les motifs qui suivent, en vue de statuer sur le premier pourvoi, je propose que l'affaire soit renvoyée à la Cour d'appel pour qu'elle tranche la motion de la SRC. Ce tribunal est le mieux placé pour trancher les questions discrétionnaires et tributaires des faits qui sont soulevées, dont celle de savoir s'il y a lieu d'accorder à la SRC qualité pour contester l'interdiction de publication, celle de savoir si la motion a été déraisonnablement tardive

si bien qu'il n'est pas dans l'intérêt de la justice de l'entendre, et celle de savoir si la levée de l'interdiction de publication est justifiée en l'espèce compte tenu de la décision rendue par notre Cour dans Sherman (Succession) c. Donovan, 2021 CSC 25, [2021] 2 R.C.S. 521.

[9] Given that I propose to dispose of the first appeal by returning the matter to the Court of Appeal to decide the CBC's motion, in my respectful view it would be inappropriate for this Court to decide the second appeal challenging the ban directly now, before the Court of Appeal has had a chance to reconsider the matter. Accordingly, I would adjourn the second appeal sine die.

[9] Comme je propose de statuer sur le premier pourvoi en renvoyant l'affaire à la Cour d'appel pour qu'elle se prononce sur la motion de la SRC, je suis respectueusement d'avis qu'il serait inopportun que notre Cour décide du second pourvoi contestant l'interdiction de publication elle-même, avant que la Cour d'appel ait eu une occasion de réexaminer l'affaire. Par conséquent, j'ajournerais le second pourvoi sine die.

II. Background and Proceedings Below

II. Contexte et instances devant les juridictions inférieures

A. The Miscarriage of Justice Reference

A. Le renvoi sur l'erreur judiciaire

[10] Following a jury trial in 1987, Stanley Ostrowski was convicted of first degree murder. He appealed the conviction unsuccessfully to the Court of Appeal and later this Court (R. v. Ostrowski and Correia (1989), 57 Man. R. (2d) 255, aff'd R. v. Ostrowski, [1990] 2 S.C.R. 82).

[10] Au terme d'un procès devant jury en 1987, Stanley Ostrowski a été déclaré coupable de meurtre au premier degré. Il a interjeté appel sans succès de la déclaration de culpabilité à la Cour d'appel et, plus tard, à notre Cour (R. c. Ostrowski and Correia (1989), 57 Man. R. (2d) 255, conf. par R. c. Ostrowski, [1990] 2 R.C.S. 82).

[11] In 2014, the Minister of Justice referred the matter to the Court of Appeal pursuant to ss. 696.1 and 696.3(3)(a)(ii) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46. These provisions allow matters to be referred back to the Court of Appeal in circumstances where, in the Minister's view, there is a reasonable basis to conclude that a miscarriage of justice has likely occurred.

[11] En 2014, le ministre de la Justice a renvoyé l'affaire à la Cour d'appel en application de l'art. 696.1 et du sous-al. 696.3(3)a)(ii) du Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, c. C-46. Ces dispositions permettent de renvoyer des causes à la Cour d'appel dans des situations où, de l'avis du ministre, il y a des motifs raisonnables de conclure qu'une erreur judiciaire s'est probablement produite.

[12] Certain new evidence relating to the conviction at trial in 1987 was proposed for consideration by the Court of Appeal upon joint motion of the Crown and Mr. Ostrowski. Unusually, this included the live testimony of 12 witnesses heard before a panel of appellate justices. The Crown conceded this evidence was admissible, that it proved a miscarriage of justice had occurred and, accordingly, that the 1987 conviction should be set aside. The concession was based on evidence pointing to the existence of a deal made between prosecutors and a witness whose testimony had linked Mr. Ostrowski to the murder. The evidence had not been disclosed to Mr. Ostrowski at trial, violating his right to make full answer and defence.

[12] Certains éléments de preuve nouveaux liés à la déclaration de culpabilité au procès en 1987 ont été proposés pour examen par la Cour d'appel sur motion conjointe de la Couronne et de M. Ostrowski. Fait inusité, ceci comprenait le témoignage de vive voix de 12 témoins entendus devant une formation de juges de la Cour d'appel.

La Couronne a concédé que ces éléments de preuve étaient admissibles, qu'ils prouvaient une erreur judiciaire et, par conséquent, qu'il y avait lieu d'annuler la déclaration de culpabilité de 1987. La concession était fondée sur des éléments de preuve qui indiquaient l'existence d'un marché conclu entre les poursuivants et un témoin dont le témoignage au procès avait lié M. Ostrowski au meurtre. Ces éléments n'avaient pas été communiqués à M. Ostrowski au procès, ce qui violait son droit de présenter une défense pleine et entière.

[13] The parties did not agree on the appropriate remedy for the miscarriage of justice. The Crown sought a new trial order and a judicial stay of those proceedings, while Mr. Ostrowski asked that an acquittal be entered by the Court of Appeal.

[13] Les parties ne s'entendaient pas sur la réparation qu'il convenait d'accorder pour l'erreur judiciaire. La Couronne a demandé à la Cour d'appel d'ordonner la tenue d'un nouveau procès et l'arrêt de ces procédures, alors que M. Ostrowski lui a demandé d'inscrire un acquittement.

[14] Mr. Ostrowski also sought to introduce further new evidence, specifically an affidavit sworn by his lawyer, Richard Posner ("Posner affidavit"). The affidavit contained details of certain events that had occurred after one of the 12 witnesses, M.D., had testified before the Court of Appeal in this matter. Unlike the material relating to the other motion for new evidence, the Crown did not consent to the Posner affidavit being admitted into evidence.

[14] Monsieur Ostrowski a également cherché à produire un autre nouvel élément de preuve, à savoir un affidavit souscrit par son avocat, Richard Posner (« affidavit de Me Posner »). L'affidavit renfermait des détails de certains événements qui s'étaient produits après qu'un des 12 témoins, M.D., eut témoigné devant la Cour d'appel dans cette affaire. Contrairement aux documents liés à l'autre motion en présentation d'éléments de preuve nouveaux, la Couronne n'a pas consenti à ce que l'affidavit de Me Posner soit admis en preuve.

[15] The Court of Appeal heard oral argument from the parties on May 28, 2018, including submissions regarding the admissibility of the Posner affidavit. The affidavit was sealed, pursuant to the Court of Appeal Rules, Man. Reg. 555/88R, relating to motions for new evidence, but the Court of Appeal nevertheless reviewed it on the consent of the parties (r. 21(4)). It also ordered a publication ban respecting this material at the outset of the May 28 hearing:

[15] Le 28 mai 2018, la Cour d'appel a entendu les plaidoiries des parties, notamment leurs observations sur l'admissibilité de l'affidavit de Me Posner. L'affidavit était mis sous scellés, en application des Règles de la Cour d'appel, Règl. Man. 555/88R, relatives aux motions en présentation d'éléments de preuve nouveaux, mais la Cour d'appel l'a néanmoins examiné avec le consentement des parties (par. 21(4)). Elle a également prononcé une interdiction de publication de ce document à l'ouverture de l'audience du 28 mai :

THE COURT: . . . [I]n our view, unless counsel feel otherwise, there must be a publication ban. There's no point in having the sealed material to the extent that it's referred to in argument without a publication ban. So there will be a publication ban as well unless counsel wish to address that?

Ban on Publication

(R.R. (Crown), at p. 137)

[16] As it would later concede before the Court of Appeal, the CBC was reporting on the proceedings, and its journalists could have attended any of the hearings, including the May 28 hearing.

B. The 2018 Publication Ban Judgment (2018 MBCA 125, 369 C.C.C. (3d) 139 — Beard, Burnett and Pfuetzner JJ.A.)

[17] The Court of Appeal found a miscarriage of justice as a result of the non-disclosure based on material revealed by the first motion for new evidence, accepting the concession of the Crown noted above. This was sufficient to conclude the conviction should be set aside. The Court of Appeal ultimately quashed the conviction, ordered a new trial and entered a stay of any further proceedings, and continued the publication ban indefinitely ("2018 Publication Ban Judgment").

[18] The court declined to admit the Posner affidavit as further new evidence, because it concluded that it was not relevant to the determination of the only live issue of the appropriate remedy for Mr. Ostrowski. Instead, the evidence went to "the issue of whether there was Crown misbehaviour, which was relevant to whether there had been a miscarriage of justice" (para. 82). Beard J.A. wrote the following in concluding: "I am of the view that the evidence is not relevant to the issues to be determined and the motion should be dismissed. I would order that the publication ban regarding this evidence should remain in effect" (ibid.).

[19] For our purposes, it bears emphasizing that the publication ban that the Court of Appeal had ordered dans les plaidoiries sans interdiction de publication. Il y aura donc en outre une interdiction de publication, à moins que les avocats veuillent se prononcer sur cette question?

Interdiction de publication

(d.i. (Couronne), p. 137)

B. Le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication (2018 MBCA 125, 369 C.C.C. (3d) 139 — les juges Beard, Burnett et Pfuetzner)

[17] La Cour d'appel a conclu à une erreur judiciaire en raison de la non-communication sur la foi de documents révélés par la première motion en présentation d'éléments de preuve nouveaux, prenant acte de la concession susmentionnée de la Couronne. Ceci était suffisant pour conclure que la déclaration de culpabilité devrait être annulée. La Cour d'appel a fini par annuler la déclaration de culpabilité, ordonner la tenue d'un nouveau procès, inscrire l'arrêt de toute autre procédure et reconduire indéfiniment l'interdiction de publication (« jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication »).

[18] La cour a refusé d'admettre l'affidavit de Me Posner en tant qu'autre élément de preuve nouveau, car elle a conclu qu'il n'était pas pertinent pour trancher la seule question en litige de la réparation qu'il convenait d'accorder à M. Ostrowski. La preuve concernait plutôt [TRADUCTION] « la question de savoir si la Couronne s'était mal conduite, un enjeu pertinent pour décider s'il y avait eu erreur judiciaire » (par. 82). La juge Beard a conclu en ces termes : « Je suis d'avis que l'élément de preuve n'est pas pertinent quant aux questions à trancher et qu'il y a lieu de rejeter la motion. J'ordonnerais que l'interdiction de publication portant sur cet élément de preuve demeure en vigueur » (ibid.).

[19] Pour nos besoins, il convient de souligner que l'interdiction de publication que la Cour d'appel

at the hearing was, in para. 82 of the court's reasons on the merits, ordered to "remain in effect." This was done without either a motion to that end or particularized pleadings on the appropriateness of the continuing order in light of the open court principle. The Posner affidavit had been sealed pursuant to a rule of court during the proceedings on appeal (Court of Appeal Rules, r. 21(4)). That sealing order is not mentioned in the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment.

avait prononcée à l'audience devait, comme il est dit au par. 82 des motifs de la cour sur le fond, [TRADUCTION] « demeurer en vigueur ». Cette décision a été rendue sans qu'il y ait eu de motion en ce sens et en l'absence de plaidoiries précises sur la justesse du maintien de l'interdiction de publication à la lumière du principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires. L'affidavit de Me Posner avait été mis sous scellés en application d'une règle de procédure pendant l'instance en appel (Règles de la Cour d'appel, par. 21(4)). Cette ordonnance de mise sous scellés n'est pas mentionnée dans le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication.

[20] A formal certificate of decision of this judgment was entered in January 2019, recording the orders on the appeal and the two new evidence motions. The certificate made no reference to a sealing order or a publication ban.

C. Le jugement de 2019 sur la compétence (2019 MBCA 122 — les juges Beard, Burnett et Pfuetzner)

[21] Following the disposition of the appeal on the miscarriage of justice, the CBC petitioned the Court of Appeal to obtain access to the Posner affidavit and to ask the court to set aside the publication ban referred to in the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment. The CBC's motion was brought in May 2019, following the release of reasons on the merits of Mr. Ostrowski's appeal and the filing of the formal judgment in that matter.

[21] À la suite de la décision sur l'appel concernant l'erreur judiciaire, la SRC a demandé à la Cour d'appel l'accès à l'affidavit de Me Posner et l'annulation de l'interdiction de publication mentionnée dans le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication. La motion de la SRC a été présentée en mai 2019, après le prononcé des motifs sur le bien-fondé de l'appel de M. Ostrowski et le dépôt du jugement formel dans cette affaire.

[22] The CBC had contacted the Registrar at the Court of Appeal seeking access to the Posner affidavit. Evidence suggests the CBC received word from the Court of Appeal's media relations officer alerting it to the existence of the publication ban in the days following the release of the 2018 reasons on the merits of Mr. Ostrowski's appeal. However, it was over five months later that the CBC filed the above-mentioned motion.

[23] The CBC relied on s. 2(b) of the Charter and alleged that the evidence did not support "any continued restriction on the right of the media and the public to access and report upon the full record of these [p]roceedings" (A.R., at p. 75). In its motion brief, the CBC emphasized its purpose to render transparent the circumstances that led to the miscarriage of justice, arguing that it was of the utmost importance that material in the Posner affidavit concerning M.D., one of the 12 witnesses at the miscarriage of justice proceeding, be open to public scrutiny. In an affidavit filed in support of the motion, the CBC's Director of Investigative Journalism: Regions observed that there had been no formal motion filed requesting a publication ban of the material and there was no notice to the public or the media that a ban was being sought.

[23] La SRC s'est fondée sur l'al. 2b) de la Charte et a allégué que la preuve ne justifiait [TRADUCTION] « aucune restriction continue au droit des médias et

du public d'avoir accès au dossier intégral de cette instance et de réaliser un reportage sur celui-ci » (d.a., p. 75). Dans son mémoire relatif à la motion, la SRC a souligné son objectif de rendre transparentes les circonstances qui ont mené à l'erreur judiciaire, plaidant qu'il était de la plus haute importance que des éléments dans l'affidavit de Me Posner relatifs à M.D., un des 12 témoins à l'instance en matière d'erreur judiciaire, puissent être ouverts à l'examen du public. Dans un affidavit déposé au soutien de la motion, le directeur du journalisme d'enquête (régions) de la SRC a fait remarquer qu'aucune motion officielle n'avait été déposée pour solliciter une interdiction de publication des éléments et qu'il n'y avait eu aucun avis au public ou aux médias qu'une interdiction était demandée.

[24] M.D.'s spouse, B.B., and the executor of his estate, J.D. (collectively, "interested parties") opposed the CBC's motion on jurisdictional grounds, as did the Crown. Noting that the certificate of decision had already been entered, the interested parties and the Crown argued that the Court of Appeal had no authority to decide the motion by reason of the rule against rehearing in the Court of Appeal Rules.

[24] La conjointe de M.D., B.B., et l'exécuteur de sa succession, J.D. (collectivement, les « parties intéressées »), se sont opposés à la motion de la SRC pour des motifs de compétence, comme l'a fait la Couronne. Signalant que le certificat de décision avait déjà été inscrit, les parties intéressées et la Couronne ont plaidé que la Cour d'appel n'avait pas compétence pour trancher la motion en raison de la règle interdisant les nouvelles audiences, prévue dans les Règles de la Cour d'appel.

[25] The Court of Appeal dismissed the motion, citing a lack of jurisdiction ("2019 Jurisdiction Judgment"). It explained that the CBC was seeking a rehearing of a publication ban order made as part of the final disposition of Mr. Ostrowski's appeal. "[N]o rehearing of an appeal, or any issue dealt with on an appeal, can occur once the certificate of decision has been entered", wrote Pfuetzner J.A. for the court, relying on r. 46.2 of the Court of Appeal Rules and the common law doctrine of functus officio (para. 17 (CanLII)). The certificate had been entered well before the motion was brought. The fact that the certificate did not mention the publication ban was held not to be determinative because it was "subsidiary" to the ruling on the new evidence motion and the final disposition of the appeal. It was further barred by r. 46.2(12), which provides a motion cannot be reheard. The Court of Appeal concluded that the "proper route for a third party . . . to challenge a publication ban issued by a superior court (including one issued by an appellate court) is to seek leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada" (para. 21). It dismissed the motion on this jurisdictional basis alone.

qu'une motion ne peut faire l'objet d'une nouvelle audience. La Cour d'appel a conclu que « la marche à suivre pour un tiers [. . .] qui entend contester une interdiction de publication prononcée par une cour supérieure (y compris une interdiction prononcée par une cour d'appel) consiste à solliciter l'autorisation de se pourvoir en appel devant la Cour suprême du Canada » (par. 21). La Cour d'appel a rejeté la motion pour ce motif de compétence uniquement.

III. Issues

III. Questions en litige

[26] As is plain from the CBC's two applications seeking leave, the terms of the leave judgment and the arguments of the parties before us, this matter raises two distinct appeals. The CBC is appealing both from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment dismissing the motion for reconsideration, and from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment, which made the indefinite publication ban at issue in this case.

[26] Tel qu'il ressort des deux demandes d'autorisation de la SRC, des dispositions du jugement sur autorisation et de l'argumentation présentée devant nous par les parties, la présente affaire met en jeu deux pourvois distincts. La SRC interjette appel à la fois du jugement de 2019 sur la compétence rejetant la motion en réexamen et du jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication qui a imposé l'interdiction de publication d'une durée indéterminée litigieuse en l'espèce.

[27] In these two appeals, the CBC seeks three orders from this Court. First, the CBC asks for an order setting aside the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment. It argues the Court of Appeal erred in concluding it had no jurisdiction to hear its motion and should have addressed the issues of whether to reconsider the publication ban and of whether the public and the press have the right to access the Posner affidavit. Notably, the CBC argues that neither the rule against rehearings in the Court of Appeal Rules nor the doctrine of functus officio deprived the Court of Appeal of jurisdiction to consider the motion based in constitutional principles of court openness. It says that the publication ban could be reconsidered on the basis of a change in circumstances or because, as an affected party, it did not have notice of the making of this order.

[27] Dans les deux présents pourvois, la SRC sollicite trois ordonnances de notre Cour. En premier lieu, la SRC demande une ordonnance annulant le jugement de 2019 sur la compétence. Elle soutient que la Cour d'appel a eu tort de conclure qu'elle n'avait pas compétence pour entendre sa motion, et qu'elle aurait dû aborder les questions de savoir s'il y a lieu de réexaminer l'interdiction de publication et si le public et la presse ont le droit d'avoir accès à l'affidavit de Me Posner. Signalons que, d'après la SRC, ni la règle interdisant les nouvelles audiences, prévue dans les Règles de la Cour d'appel, ni la règle du functus officio ne privait la Cour d'appel du pouvoir d'examiner la motion eu égard aux principes constitutionnels de la publicité des débats judiciaires. Selon elle, l'interdiction de publication pourrait être réexaminée en raison d'un changement de circonstances ou parce que, à titre de partie touchée, elle n'avait pas été avisée du prononcé de cette ordonnance.

[28] The CBC also asks this Court for a second order setting aside the continuing publication ban in the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment and a third giving it access to the Posner affidavit as part of the court record. It argues the open court principle applies to material that is tendered as new evidence even if, at the end of the day, it is not admitted. In this instance, it says the publication ban fails the test for discretionary limits on this principle set forth in Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835, and R. v. Mentuck, 2001 SCC 76, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 442. It contends further that the public is legally entitled to access the Posner affidavit because the applicable rules do not provide for continued sealing of this material. Mr. Ostrowski adopts the CBC's position and adds that the orders of the Court of Appeal preclude the proper accountability of public officials whose actions he alleges contributed to his wrongful conviction.

[28] La SRC demande aussi à notre Cour une deuxième ordonnance annulant le maintien de l'interdiction de publication décrétée dans le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication, et une

troisième lui donnant accès à l'affidavit de Me Posner en tant qu'élément du dossier judiciaire. Elle soutient que le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires s'applique aux documents qui sont présentés comme éléments de preuve nouveaux même si, au bout du compte, ils n'ont pas été admis. Dans le cas présent, elle affirme que l'interdiction de publication ne satisfait pas au critère des limites discrétionnaires à ce principe établies dans les arrêts Dagenais c. Société Radio-Canada, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 835, et R. c. Mentuck, 2001 CSC 76, [2001] 3 R.C.S. 442. Elle prétend en outre que le public a légalement le droit d'avoir accès à l'affidavit de Me Posner parce que les règles applicables ne prévoient pas le maintien sous scellés de ce document. Monsieur Ostrowski fait sienne la thèse de la SRC et ajoute que les ordonnances de la Cour d'appel excluent une transparence adéquate de la part des titulaires de charge publique dont les gestes, allègue-t-il, ont contribué à sa condamnation injustifiée.

[29] The Crown takes the position that the Court of Appeal was right to conclude that it had no jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion. The Crown says, however, that if the Court of Appeal had authority to consider these issues, this Court does not have jurisdiction with respect to the publication ban and, if it does, it should decline to exercise its authority. Should this Court proceed to consider the merits, the Crown's position is that the Court of Appeal's decision to impose a continuing publication ban was correct, even if it might have given more fulsome reasons. The material in the Posner affidavit is deeply personal and speaks to intimate details about M.D. that would re-traumatize the family, such that a discretionary limit on court openness was justified here. Similarly, the interested parties argue that the limits on court openness are necessary to protect the privacy of M.D.'s family and that the limit is justified given the inadmissible, irrelevant and unreliable nature of the proposed new evidence.

[29] La Couronne soutient que la Cour d'appel a eu raison de conclure qu'elle n'avait pas compétence pour examiner la motion de la SRC. Cependant, la Couronne affirme que, si la Cour d'appel avait le pouvoir d'examiner ces questions, notre Cour n'a pas compétence à l'égard de l'interdiction de publication et que, si elle a cette compétence, elle devrait refuser de l'exercer. Si notre Cour procède sur le fond, la Couronne est d'avis que la décision de la Cour d'appel d'imposer le maintien de l'interdiction de publication était fondée, et ce, même si elle aurait pu donner des motifs plus étoffés. Les éléments qui se trouvent dans l'affidavit de Me Posner sont très personnels et traitent de détails intimes concernant M.D. qui feraient vivre à la famille une nouvelle épreuve, si bien que la limite discrétionnaire à la publicité des débats judiciaires était justifiée en l'espèce. Pareillement, les parties intéressées soutiennent que les limites à la publicité des débats judiciaires sont nécessaires pour protéger la vie privée de la famille de M.D. et que la limite est justifiée compte tenu du caractère inadmissible, non pertinent et non fiable des nouveaux éléments de preuve proposés.

[30] The parties raise a broad series of questions before this Court bearing on jurisdiction over and the appropriateness of a publication ban or sealing order in the circumstances. It is sufficient to answer the following questions to dispose of this matter:

1. Did the Court of Appeal err in concluding it had no jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion to reconsider the publication ban and gain access to the Posner affidavit?

2. Should the matter be remanded to the Court of Appeal to hear the merits of that motion?

[31] For the reasons that follow I am respectfully of the view, in the first appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment, that the Court of Appeal did err on the issue of jurisdiction and that as a result the matter should be remanded to that court. This ends the analysis. The second appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment would best not proceed until the Court of Appeal decides the CBC's motion.

IV. Analysis

A. Jurisdiction to Make, Vary and Set Aside Orders Concerning Court Openness

(1) Supervisory Jurisdiction Over the Court Record Survives Entering a Judgment on the Merits

[32] In concluding that it lacked jurisdiction to vary or set aside the relevant orders concerning court openness, the Court of Appeal relied, in part, on the doctrine of functus officio. The term functus officio — often rendered as "having performed his or her office" — has traditionally been understood to mean that once a judge decided a matter, they had discharged their office and did not have the ability to return to and correct their decision (A. S. P. Wong, "Doctrine of Functus Officio: The Changing Face of Finality's Old Guard" (2020), 98 Can. Bar Rev. 543, at pp. 546-47; see A. Mayrand, Dictionnaire d'une ordonnance de mise sous scellés de même que sur l'opportunité de ces mesures dans les circonstances. Il suffit de répondre aux questions suivantes pour trancher la présente affaire :

1. La Cour d'appel a-t-elle eu tort de conclure qu'elle n'avait pas compétence pour examiner la motion de la SRC pour le réexamen de l'interdiction de publication et pour avoir accès à l'affidavit de Me Posner?

2. L'affaire devrait-elle être renvoyée à la Cour d'appel pour qu'elle se prononce sur le bien-fondé de cette motion?

[31] Pour les motifs qui suivent, je suis respectueusement d'avis, à l'égard du premier appel formé contre le jugement de 2019 sur la compétence, que la Cour d'appel a fait erreur au sujet de la compétence et qu'en conséquence, l'affaire devrait être renvoyée à cette cour. Cela met un terme à l'analyse. Il vaut mieux que le second appel du jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication n'aille pas de l'avant jusqu'à ce que la Cour d'appel tranche la motion de la SRC.

IV. Analyse

A. Compétence pour rendre, modifier ou annuler des ordonnances portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires

(1) Le pouvoir de surveillance du dossier judiciaire subsiste après l'inscription du jugement sur le fond de maximes et locutions latines utilisées en droit (4th ed. 2007), at p. 193, who also uses the term functa officio).

[32] En concluant qu'elle n'avait pas compétence pour modifier ou annuler les ordonnances en cause concernant la publicité des débats judiciaires, la Cour d'appel s'est appuyée, en partie, sur la règle du functus officio. Dans son acception traditionnelle, le terme functus officio — souvent rendu par l'expression [TRADUCTION] « ayant rempli sa fonction » — signifie que lorsqu'un juge a tranché une question, il s'est acquitté de sa fonction et n'a plus la faculté de revenir sur sa décision pour la corriger (A. S. P. Wong, « Doctrine of Functus Officio : The Changing Face of Finality's Old Guard » (2020), 98 R. du B.

[33] In its contemporary guise, functus officio indicates that a final decision of a court that is susceptible of appeal cannot, as a general rule, be reconsidered by the court that rendered that decision (see Chandler v. Alberta Association of Architects, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 848, at p. 860; Reekie v. Messervey, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 219, at pp. 222-23; Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), 2003 SCC 62, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, at paras. 77-79). A court loses jurisdiction, and is thus said to be functus officio, once the formal judgment has been entered (R. v. Adams, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 707, at para. 29; R. v. Smithen-Davis, 2020 ONCA 759, 68 C.R. (7th) 75, at paras. 33-34). After this point, the court is understood only to have the power to amend the judgment in very limited circumstances, such as where there is a statutory basis to do so, where necessary to correct an error in expressing its manifest intention, or where the matter has not been heard on its merits (Chandler, at p. 861, citing Paper Machinery Ltd. v. J.O. Ross Engineering Corp., [1934] S.C.R. 186; R. v. H. (E.) (1997), 33 O.R. (3d) 202 (C.A.), at pp. 214-15, citing The Queen v. Jacobs, [1971] S.C.R. 92; see also R. v. Burke, 2002 SCC 55, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 857, at para. 54).

can. 543, p. 546-547; voir A. Mayrand, Dictionnaire de maximes et locutions latines utilisées en droit (4e éd. 2007), p. 193, qui emploie également le terme functa officio).

[33] Suivant son acception actuelle, la règle du functus officio indique que la décision définitive d'un tribunal qui est susceptible d'appel ne peut pas, en règle générale, être examinée de nouveau par le tribunal qui a rendu cette décision (voir Chandler c. Alberta Association of Architects, [1989] 2 R.C.S. 848, p. 860; Reekie c. Messervey, [1990] 1 R.C.S. 219, p. 222-223; Doucet-Boudreau c. Nouvelle-Écosse (Ministre de l'Éducation), 2003 CSC 62, [2003] 3 R.C.S. 3, par. 77-79). Un tribunal perd sa compétence, auquel cas on dit qu'il est functus officio, une fois le jugement officiel rendu (R. c. Adams, [1995] 4 R.C.S. 707, par. 29; R. c. Smithen-Davis, 2020 ONCA 759, 68 C.R. (7th) 75, par. 33-34). À partir de ce moment, il est entendu que le tribunal ne peut modifier le jugement que dans des circonstances très limitées, par exemple s'il existe une assise législative pour ce faire, s'il faut corriger une erreur dans l'expression de son intention manifeste ou lorsque l'affaire n'a pas été entendue sur le fond (Chandler, p. 861, citant Paper Machinery Ltd. c. J.O. Ross Engineering Corp., [1934] R.C.S. 186; R. c. H. (E.) (1997), 33 O.R. (3d) 202 (C.A.), p. 214-215, citant The Queen c. Jacobs, [1971] R.C.S. 92; voir également R. c. Burke, 2002 CSC 55, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 857, par. 54).

record would be written on "shifting sand", ultimately inhibiting effective review (Wong, at p. 548).

(Doucet-Boudreau, par. 79; voir aussi Ayangma c. French School Board, 2011 PECA 3, 306 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 103, par. 11-12). Le dossier d'appel serait rédigé sur du [TRADUCTION] « sable mouvant », ce qui finirait par faire obstacle à un contrôle efficace (Wong, p. 548).

[35] That said, functus officio is only one of several legal principles designed to promote the goal of finality. Indeed, given it is inherently tied to the entering of the formal judgment and its exceptions are relatively restrictive, this Court has described the doctrine of functus officio as narrow in scope (Reekie, at pp. 222-23; see also Wong, at pp. 555-56). So, while it is an important norm recognized in our jurisprudence to serve this necessary purpose, no one rule has a monopoly on finality.

[36] It is useful to distinguish between jurisdiction over the merits lost by operation of the doctrine of functus officio and jurisdiction that exists to supervise the court record. As I will endeavour to explain, even when a court has lost jurisdiction over the merits of a matter as a result of having entered its formal judgment, it retains jurisdiction to control its court record with respect to proceedings generally understood to be an ancillary but independent matter (see, e.g., GEA Refrigeration Canada Inc. v. Chang, 2020 BCCA 361, 43 B.C.L.R. (6th) 330, at paras. 185-86).

to "competing important public interests" that may be put at risk by that openness (Vancouver Sun (Re), 2004 SCC 43, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 332, at paras. 26 and 28).

du solide principe, protégé par la Constitution, de la publicité des débats judiciaires, tout en demeurant sensibles aux « importants intérêts publics divergents » que cette publicité des débats peut mettre en péril (Vancouver Sun (Re), 2004 CSC 43, [2004] 2 R.C.S. 332, par. 26 et 28).

[38] The need to attend to the appropriate balance between these fundamental public interests does not disappear merely because the order on the merits is final and could have been appealed. Court records may be accessed even when proceedings have come to an end. Indeed, important decisions about the openness of the court record may need to be taken after the proceeding on the merits is over (see, e.g., R. v. Wagner, 2017 ONSC 6603; R. v. Henry, 2012 BCCA 374, 327 B.C.A.C. 190). If jurisdiction over court openness ceased when the formal order on the merits were entered, courts would lose control over their own record without good reason. Consider, for example, a case where no order limiting court openness is made before the formal judgment on the merits is entered, and a need to protect an important public interest is later discovered. In my respectful view, to conclude that this power is wholly lost once the formal order on the merits is entered would risk undermining the proper administration of justice in service of a reading of the doctrine of functus officio unconnected with its purpose.

[38] Le besoin d'établir un juste équilibre entre ces intérêts publics fondamentaux ne disparaît pas du seul fait que l'ordonnance sur le fond est définitive et aurait pu être portée en appel. On peut avoir accès aux dossiers judiciaires même lorsque l'instance est arrivée à terme. De fait, d'importantes décisions au sujet de la publicité du dossier judiciaire peuvent devoir être prises après la fin de l'instance sur le fond (voir, p. ex., R. c. Wagner, 2017 ONSC 6603; R. c. Henry, 2012 BCCA 374, 327 B.C.A.C. 190). Si la compétence à l'égard de la publicité des débats judiciaires cessait lorsque l'ordonnance officielle sur le fond était inscrite, les tribunaux perdraient la maîtrise de leur propre dossier sans raison valable. Prenez par exemple le cas où aucune ordonnance limitant la publicité des débats judiciaires n'est rendue avant l'inscription du jugement formel sur le fond et où l'on constate par la suite qu'il faut protéger un intérêt public important. À mon humble avis, conclure que ce pouvoir est entièrement perdu une fois l'ordonnance formelle sur le fond inscrite risque de mettre à mal la bonne administration de la justice au service d'une interprétation de la règle du functus officio qui est étrangère à son objectif.

[39] Recognizing that this jurisdiction survives the end of the underlying proceeding is not inconsistent with the purposes of finality and stability of judgments associated with the doctrine of functus officio. Relief granted pursuant to this power leaves the substance of the underlying proceeding and the reasons that support it undisturbed. While some interlocutory motions, such as motions relating to the admissibility of evidence, may have an impact on the final decision on the merits, deciding public access to the court record has no bearing on the underlying proceeding or its appeal. The doctrine of functus officio reflects the transfer of the decision-making authority in respect of final judgments from the court of first instance to the appellate court (Chandler, at p. 860, citing In re St. Nazaire Co. (1879), 12 Ch.

D. 88). It was never intended to restrict the ability of those lower courts to control their own files in respect of these decisions.

d'appel (Chandler, p. 860, citant In re St. Nazaire Co. (1879), 12 Ch. D. 88). Cette règle n'a jamais eu pour but de restreindre la capacité de ces tribunaux d'instance inférieure d'être maîtres de leurs propres dossiers en ce qui concerne ces décisions.

[40] To be clear, this does not mean that functus officio never applies to publication bans or sealing orders. The point is simply that a court is not precluded from deciding a motion concerning court openness merely because it is functus officio with respect to the merits of the underlying proceeding.

(2) Decisions Regarding Court Openness May Be Reconsidered in Limited Circumstances

(2) Les décisions portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires peuvent être réexaminées dans des circonstances limitées

[41] That courts retain supervisory jurisdiction over their court records is not to say that once decisions concerning court openness have been made they are open to reconsideration at any time or for any reason. Where a decision concerning court openness is formalized in an order, functus officio may apply, regardless of whether or not it is ancillary to some other proceeding. Even where, as here, a decision concerning court openness is not formalized in an order, finality remains an important value in the making of publication bans and sealing orders. Indeed, in this case the CBC has in fact appealed an ancillary publication ban that has never been formalized in an order. The need to provide litigants with a stable basis from which to launch an appeal — a central rationale underpinning functus officio (see Doucet-Boudreau, at para. 79) — can apply, even where functus officio technically does not.

[41] Le fait que les tribunaux conservent un pouvoir de surveillance à l'égard de leurs dossiers judiciaires ne veut pas dire que les décisions portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires, une fois prises, sont susceptibles d'être réexaminées n'importe quand ou pour n'importe quelle raison. Lorsqu'une décision sur la publicité des débats judiciaires est officialisée sous la forme d'une ordonnance, la règle du functus officio peut opérer, peu importe si la décision est accessoire ou non à une autre procédure. Même dans les cas où, comme en l'espèce, une décision en matière de publicité des débats judiciaires n'est pas officialisée sous la forme d'une ordonnance, le caractère définitif d'une décision reste une valeur importante du prononcé d'interdictions de publication et d'ordonnances de mise sous scellés. D'ailleurs, en l'espèce, la SRC a effectivement interjeté appel d'une interdiction de publication accessoire qui n'a jamais été consacrée dans une ordonnance. Le besoin de fournir aux parties une base stable à partir de laquelle elles peuvent former un appel — la raison d'être de la règle du functus officio (voir Doucet-Boudreau, par. 79) — peut se présenter, même lorsque ce n'est, techniquement parlant, pas le cas de la règle du functus officio.

[42] Therefore, regardless of whether a court is deprived of jurisdiction by the doctrine of functus officio, the importance of finality will mean courts will be rightly reluctant to reconsider questions of court openness. A publication ban or sealing order is, however, susceptible to reconsideration by the issuing court, albeit on narrow grounds. This will include cases where an affected party not given notice proposes to make novel submissions that could affect the result, or on the basis of a material change in circumstances. This applies to both publication bans and sealing orders that are formalized in an order and those that are not.

[42] En conséquence, peu importe qu'un tribunal soit privé ou non de compétence par la règle du functus officio, l'importance du règlement définitif

signifie que les tribunaux hésiteront, à juste titre, à réexaminer des questions relatives à la publicité des débats judiciaires. Une interdiction de publication ou une ordonnance de mise sous scellés est toutefois susceptible d'être réexaminée par le tribunal qui l'a prononcée, quoique pour des motifs restreints. Ce sera notamment le cas lorsqu'une partie touchée et non avisée propose de présenter de nouveaux arguments qui peuvent influer sur le résultat, ou en raison d'un changement important de circonstances. Cela vaut tant pour les interdictions de publication et les ordonnances de mise sous scellés consacrées dans une ordonnance que pour celles qui ne le sont pas.

[43] Central to the CBC's claim that the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to vary the 2018 publication ban is that it was made without proper notice to the press as an affected party.

[44] One basis for revisiting a publication ban or sealing order may indeed arise when an affected person who was not given notice of the making of the order later seeks to vary it or have it set aside. Natural justice is understood to require that whenever a person is affected by a decision, they generally have the right to appropriate notice of that decision and an opportunity to be heard (Supermarchés Jean Labrecque Inc. v. Flamand, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 219, at pp. 233-34). When an order is made without the submissions of an affected person because that person was not given proper notice, such as an ex parte order, the law recognizes that the court that made that order generally has authority to review it on motion of that affected person (Wilson v. The Queen, [1983] 2 S.C.R. 594, at p. 607, citing Dickie v. Woodworth (1883), 8 S.C.R. 192). This ensures that affected persons are not unfairly subjected to orders made without the benefit of their submissions (see, generally, F.-O. Barbeau, "Rétractation du jugement", in JurisClasseur Québec — Collection droit civil — Procédure civile I (2nd ed. (loose-leaf)), by P.-C. Lafond, ed., fasc. 31, at No. 39). This principle also finds expression in various rules of court procedure (see, e.g., Court of Queen's Bench Rules, Man. Reg. 553/88R, r. 37.11 ("Queen's Bench Rules")). Similar principles apply to orders concerning court openness: I note for example that courts in Ontario

[44] Il peut effectivement y avoir lieu de réexaminer une interdiction de publication ou une ordonnance de mise sous scellés lorsque la personne touchée qui n'a pas été avisée du prononcé de l'ordonnance cherche ultérieurement à la faire modifier ou annuler. La justice naturelle veut que lorsqu'une personne est touchée par une décision, celle-ci ait généralement le droit d'en être dûment avisée et d'avoir l'occasion d'être entendue (Supermarchés Jean Labrecque Inc. c. Flamand, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 219, p. 233-234). Lorsqu'une ordonnance est rendue sans qu'une personne touchée n'ait présenté d'observations parce qu'elle n'en a pas été dûment avisée, comme dans le cas d'une ordonnance ex parte, le droit reconnaît que le tribunal qui a rendu cette ordonnance a généralement le pouvoir de l'examiner sur requête de la personne touchée (Wilson c. La Reine, [1983] 2 R.C.S. 594, p. 607, citant Dickie c. Woodworth (1883), 8 R.C.S. 192). Ceci fait en sorte que les personnes touchées ne sont pas injustement soumises à des ordonnances rendues sans que l'on ait pris connaissance de leurs arguments (voir, en général, F.-O. Barbeau, « Rétractation du jugement », dans JurisClasseur Québec — Collection droit civil — Procédure civile I (2e éd. (feuilles mobiles)), par P.-C. Lafond, dir., fasc. 31, nº 39). Ce principe trouve en outre son expression dans diverses règles de procédure (voir, p. ex., Règles de la Cour du Banc de la

have relied on the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, to decide challenges to sealing orders brought by media representatives who were not given proper notice of the hearing at which the order was made (Hollinger Inc. v. The Ravelston Corp., 2008 ONCA 207, 89 O.R. (3d) 721, at para. 43, per Juriansz J.A., dissenting in part but not on this point).

Reine, Règl. du Man. 553/88R, r. 37.11 (« Règles du Banc de la Reine »)). Des principes analogues s'appliquent aux ordonnances portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires : je note par exemple que les tribunaux de l'Ontario se sont appuyés sur les Règles de procédure civile, R.R.O. 1990, règl. 194, pour trancher des contestations d'ordonnances de mise sous scellés présentées par des représentants des médias qui n'avaient pas été dûment avisés de l'audience à laquelle l'ordonnance a été rendue (Hollinger Inc. c. The Ravelston Corp., 2008 ONCA 207, 89 O.R. (3d) 721, par. 43, le juge Juriansz, dissident en partie, mais non sur ce point).

[45] To challenge an existing order concerning court openness, the moving party must qualify as an affected person to whom standing should be granted. Further, where so required, that party must have acted with due dispatch in seeking to set aside the impugned order. Both of these points merit brief comment in view of arguments made here.

[45] Pour contester une ordonnance existante en matière de publicité des débats judiciaires, la partie requérante doit être une personne touchée à qui il convient de reconnaître la qualité pour agir. De plus, s'il y a lieu, la partie doit avoir agi avec célérité dans sa demande d'annulation de l'ordonnance contestée. Compte tenu des arguments présentés en l'espèce, de brèves remarques s'imposent en ce qui concerne ces deux points.

[46] First, it is important to recognize that applying this principle to publication bans or sealing orders requires some consideration of standing, because of the broad effects of such an order. Insofar as a publication ban or a sealing order impinges on the open court principle, such orders can, for example, affect the public's right to freedom of expression and freedom of the press under s. 2(b) of the Charter (Vancouver Sun, at para. 26). Court openness is understood as a public good, not an interest that belongs to a particular individual or entity. Further, the risks to competing important interests which justify limits on court openness must also reflect public values, even if they might be aimed at protecting particular persons (Sierra Club of Canada v. Canada (Minister of Finance), 2002 SCC 41, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 522, at para. 55). Yet, in the interest of the orderly administration of justice, it cannot be that every member of the public or media entity has standing to bring an individual motion to set publication bans aside in the absence of such notice. This would make the number of parties entitled to reconsideration potentially endless. Instead, as this Court held in Dagenais, with regard to publication bans in criminal matters, [46] En premier lieu, il importe de reconnaître que l'application du principe susmentionné aux interdictions de publication ou aux ordonnances de mise sous scellés nécessite la prise en compte de la qualité pour agir, en raison des répercussions générales d'une telle ordonnance. Dans la mesure où une interdiction de publication ou une ordonnance de mise sous scellés fait entorse au principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires, les ordonnances de ce genre peuvent, par exemple, porter atteinte au droit du public à la liberté d'expression et à la liberté de la presse que confère l'al. 2b) de la Charte (Vancouver Sun, par. 26). La publicité des débats judiciaires se conçoit comme un bien public, et non un intérêt qui appartient à une personne ou à une entité en particulier. En outre, les risques pour les intérêts importants et divergents qui justifient des limites à la publicité des débats judiciaires doivent eux aussi refléter des valeurs publiques, même s'ils visent à protéger certaines personnes (Sierra Club du Canada c. Canada (Ministre des Finances), 2002 CSC 41, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 522, par. 55). En revanche, dans l'intérêt d'une administration ordonnée de la justice, on ne peut pas donner à chaque membre du standing in these cases should be thought of as a matter of the court's discretion (pp. 869 and 872; see also R. v. White, 2008 ABCA 294, 93 Alta. L.R. (4th) 239, at para. 12, aff'd Toronto Star Newspaper Ltd. v. Canada, 2010 SCC 21, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 721).

public ou entité médiatique qualité pour présenter une motion visant à faire annuler des interdictions de publication en l'absence d'un tel préavis. Le nombre de parties ayant droit à un réexamen risquerait d'être infini. Ainsi que notre Cour l'a mentionné dans l'arrêt Dagenais, pour ce qui est des interdictions de publication dans les affaires criminelles, la qualité pour agir dans ces affaires devrait plutôt relever du pouvoir discrétionnaire du tribunal (p. 869 et 872; voir aussi R. c. White, 2008 ABCA 294, 93 Alta. L.R. (4th) 239, par. 12, conf. par Toronto Star Newspaper Ltd. c. Canada, 2010 CSC 21, [2010] 1 R.C.S. 721).

[47] In respect of standing, an order limiting court openness engages the constitutionally-protected right of a free press to report on judicial proceedings (Canadian Broadcasting Corp. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2011 SCC 2, [2011] 1 S.C.R. 19, at para. 2; Vancouver Sun, at para. 26). When that order has been made in the absence of notice to the media, a representative of the media should generally have standing to challenge an order that threatens the open court principle where they are able to show that they will make submissions that were not considered in its making that could affect the result (see, generally, Hollinger, at paras. 36-39). In practice, and properly in my view, standing is seldom refused to the media to participate in open court proceedings where it is sought (J. Rossiter, Law of Publication Bans, Private Hearings and Sealing Orders (loose-leaf), s. 8.1.10). Equally, a person directly affected by an order concerning court openness because it might harm their individual interests should, as a matter of course, have standing to challenge that order (see, generally, Ivandaeva Total Image Salon Inc. v. Hlembizky (2003), 63 O.R. (3d) 769 (C.A.), at para. 27). Courts should nevertheless retain some residual discretion to deny standing where hearing the motion would not be in the interests of justice, as in the case, for example, that it would unduly harm the parties or merely duplicate argument that is already before the court (Dagenais, at p. 869; White, at para. 12; see, e.g., Canadian Transportation Accident Investigation and Safety Board v. Canadian Press (2000), 184 N.S.R. (2d) 159 (S.C.), at paras. 18-21). The requirement of standing, therefore, by limiting who may challenge a publication ban or sealing order, serves the goals of finality and mirrors the discretionary approach to standing that this Court has previously endorsed.

[47] Au chapitre de la qualité pour agir, une ordonnance limitant la publicité des débats judiciaires fait entrer en jeu le droit constitutionnel de la liberté de la presse de relater des procédures judiciaires (Société Radio-Canada c. Canada (Procureur général), 2011 CSC 2, [2011] 1 R.C.S. 19, par. 2; Vancouver Sun, par. 26). Lorsque cette ordonnance a été rendue sans avis aux médias, un représentant des médias devrait généralement avoir qualité pour contester une ordonnance qui menace le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires s'il est à même de démontrer qu'il présentera des observations qui n'ont pas été prises en compte au moment du prononcé de l'ordonnance et qui peuvent influer sur le résultat (voir, en général, Hollinger, par. 36-39). En pratique, et à juste titre selon moi, la qualité pour participer aux instances portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires est rarement refusée aux médias quand ils la demandent (J. Rossiter, Law of Publication Bans, Private Hearings and Sealing Orders (feuilles mobiles), section 8.1.10). De même, une personne directement touchée par une ordonnance portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires parce que l'ordonnance est susceptible de porter atteinte à ses droits individuels devrait, dans le cours normal des choses, avoir qualité pour contester cette ordonnance (voir, en général, Ivandaeva Total Image Salon Inc. c. Hlembizky (2003), 63 O.R. (3d) 769 (C.A.), par. 27). Les tribunaux devraient néanmoins conserver un certain pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser la qualité pour agir lorsque l'audition de la requête ne serait pas dans l'intérêt de la justice, comme dans le cas, par exemple, où la requête serait indûment préjudiciable aux parties, ou ne ferait que répéter

des arguments dont le tribunal a déjà connaissance (Dagenais, p. 869; White, par. 12; voir, p. ex., Canadian Transportation Accident Investigation and Safety Board c. Canadian Press (2000), 184 N.S.R. (2d) 159 (C.S.), par. 18-21). Par conséquent, l'exigence de faire valoir la qualité pour agir, en limitant ceux et celles qui peuvent contester une interdiction de publication ou une ordonnance de mise sous scellés, favorise la réalisation des objectifs du caractère définitif d'une décision et reflète la démarche discrétionnaire que notre Cour a déjà adoptée à l'égard de la qualité pour agir.

[48] Second, as to delay, courts may decline to hear a motion to vary or set aside an order dealing with court openness made without notice if the moving party was unreasonably slow in bringing that motion after becoming aware of the order, such that it is no longer in the interests of justice to hear it. Once the moving party has become aware the order exists, they are then expected to take prompt action to challenge the order or otherwise acquiesce to its existence (see, e.g., 9095-7267 Québec inc. v. Caisse populaire Ste-Thérèse-de-Blainville, 2001 CanLII 14878 (Que. C.A.), at para. 46; see also Rules of Civil Procedure, r. 37.14 (Ontario); Code of Civil Procedure, CQLR, c. C-25.01, art. 349 (Quebec); Alberta Rules of Court, Alta. Reg. 124/2010, r. 9.15; Queen's Bench Rules, r. 37.11 (Manitoba)). Strathy J., as he then was, explained that a timeliness requirement reflects the common sense presumption that "a party who sits on his or her rights in the face of a court order has accepted the legitimacy of the order" (Attorney General of Ontario v. 15 Johnswood Crescent, 2009 CanLII 50751 (Ont. S.C.), at para. 43).

[49] In some instances, the legislature will provide indications of the appropriate period of delay. In the absence of legislative direction, courts must be guided by the purpose of the rule and the circumstances of each case (see, generally, Johnswood, at para. 45). As in other cases where courts are asked not to hear proceedings by reason of an unacceptable delay, the task is not a mechanical calculation, but rather a contextual balancing of finality and timely justice against the importance of the matter being heard on its merits (Marché D'Alimentation Denis Thériault Ltée v. Giant Tiger Stores Ltd., 2007 ONCA 695, 87 O.R. (3d) 660, at para. 34; 1196158 Ontario Inc. v. 6274013 Canada Ltd., 2012 ONCA 544, 112 O.R. (3d) 67, at para. 19). By way of example, under the Rules of Civil Procedure, a period of three months to bring a motion to set aside an order dismissing the action for delay was held to be reasonable in the context of one dispute (Toronto Standard Condominium Corporation No. 2058 v. Cresford Developments Inc., 2019 ONSC 801, 97 C.L.R. (4th) 306, at para. 36), but a largely unexplained ten-month delay meant in another case that the applicant had not moved forthwith (1202600 Ontario Inc. v. Jacob, 2012 ONSC 361, at paras. 102 and 121 (CanLII)). In one Manitoba case, a delay of five months in moving to set aside a judgment was found not to be unreasonable in the circumstances (585430 Alberta Ltd. v. Trans Canada Leasing Inc., 2005 MBQB 220, 196 Man. R. (2d) 191, at para. 56). I stress, however, that this determination is inherently tied to the facts of each particular case and the nature of the issue raised. Especially where this delay has caused meaningful prejudice to the responding parties, courts may conclude it is not in the interests of justice to hear a motion. This requirement safeguards finality by circumscribing reconsideration in the temporal dimension.

[50] On the basis of these principles, then, and in the absence of explicit legislation to the contrary, a court may vary or set aside an order concerning court openness it has made on timely motion by an affected person who was not given notice of the making of that order and to whom it is appropriate to grant standing for this purpose.

[51] To be clear, limits on court openness, such as a publication ban, can be made without prior notice to the media. Given the importance of the open court principle and the role of the media in informing the mécanique, mais plutôt à mettre en balance dans le contexte le caractère définitif d'une décision et la justice rendue en temps utile par rapport à l'importance que l'affaire soit instruite sur le fond (Marché D'Alimentation Denis Thériault Ltée c. Giant Tiger Stores Ltd., 2007 ONCA 695, 87 O.R. (3d) 660, par. 34; 1196158 Ontario Inc. c. 6274013 Canada Ltd., 2012 ONCA 544, 112 O.R. (3d) 67, par. 19). À titre d'exemple, en vertu des Règles de procédure civile, un délai de trois mois pour présenter une motion en vue de faire annuler une ordonnance rejetant l'action pour cause de retard a été jugée raisonnable dans le contexte d'un différend (Toronto Standard Condominium Corporation No. 2058 c. Cresford Developments Inc., 2019 ONSC 801, 97 C.L.R. (4th) 306, par. 36), mais un délai de dix mois en grande partie inexpliqué a été vu dans une autre affaire comme signifiant que la demanderesse n'avait pas procédé sans délai (1202600 Ontario Inc. c. Jacob, 2012 ONSC 361, par. 102 et 121 (CanLII)). Dans une affaire manitobaine, un délai de cinq mois pour solliciter l'annulation d'un jugement a été jugé non déraisonnable dans les circonstances (585430 Alberta Ltd. c. Trans Canada Leasing Inc., 2005 MBQB 220, 196 Man. R. (2d) 191, par. 56). Je souligne toutefois que cette détermination est intrinsèquement fonction des faits de chaque affaire et de la nature de la question soulevée. Surtout si ce retard a causé un préjudice réel aux parties intimées, les tribunaux peuvent conclure qu'il n'est pas dans l'intérêt de la justice d'entendre une motion. Cette exigence préserve le caractère définitif d'une décision en circonscrivant le réexamen dans la dimension temporelle.

[50] Sur le fondement de ces principes, donc, et faute de disposition contraire explicite, un tribunal peut modifier ou annuler une ordonnance concernant la publicité des débats judiciaires qu'il a rendue sur motion déposée en temps opportun par une personne touchée qui n'a pas été avisée du prononcé de cette ordonnance et à qui il y a lieu d'accorder la qualité pour agir à cette fin.

[51] Soyons clairs, il est possible d'imposer des limites à la publicité des débats judiciaires, par exemple une interdiction de publication, sans avis préalable aux médias. Vu l'importance du principe public about the activities of courts, it may generally be appropriate to give prior notice to the media, in addition to those persons who would be directly affected by the publication ban or sealing order, when seeking a limit on court openness (see Jane Doe v. Manitoba, 2005 MBCA 57, 192 Man. R. (2d) 309, at para. 24; M. (A.) v. Toronto Police Service, 2015 ONSC 5684, 127 O.R. (3d) 382 (Div. Ct.), at para. 6). But whether and when this notice should be given is ultimately a matter within the discretion of the relevant court (Dagenais, at p. 869; M. (A.), at para. 5). I agree with the submissions of the attorneys general of British Columbia and Ontario that the circumstances in which orders limiting court openness are made vary and that courts have the requisite discretionary authority to ensure justice is served in each individual case.

[52] Indeed this Court has explicitly recognized the discretion of courts to decide when notice to the media is required in the case of search warrants and production orders. In R. v. National Post, 2010 SCC 16, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 477, this Court held that granting a search warrant in the absence of the affected media organization was not a jurisdictional error; the issuing judge had discretion regarding the timing and modality of notice to the media (paras. 83-84). Similarly, in R. v. Vice Media Canada Inc., 2018 SCC 53, [2018] 3 S.C.R. 374, Moldaver J. considered a media organization's argument that notice of an application for a production order affecting it was required (para. 59). He rejected that submission because the Criminal Code explicitly provided for ex parte proceedings and the negative impact on the media was mitigated by the statutory right to apply to have the order varied or revoked at a later stage (paras. 61-62). It follows from these authorities that giving notice is not a pre-requisite to the issuance of a valid order in these circumstances. At the same time, this jurisprudence does not exclude the possibility of providing notice after an order has been granted or entertaining a motion to vary or set aside de la publicité des débats judiciaires et le rôle qu'ont les médias d'informer le public au sujet des activités des tribunaux, il sera généralement opportun de donner avis aux médias, en plus des personnes qui seraient directement touchées par l'interdiction de publication ou l'ordonnance de mise sous scellés, lorsqu'on cherche à limiter la publicité des débats judiciaires (voir Jane Doe c. Manitoba, 2005 MBCA 57, 192 Man. R. (2d) 309, par. 24; M. (A.) c. Toronto Police Service, 2015 ONSC 5684, 127 O.R. (3d) 382 (C. div.), par. 6). Toutefois, la question de savoir si et quand cet avis doit être donné relève en dernier ressort du pouvoir discrétionnaire du tribunal compétent (Dagenais, p. 869; M. (A.), par. 5). Je suis d'accord avec les observations des procureurs généraux de la Colombie-Britannique et de l'Ontario selon lesquelles les circonstances dans lesquelles les ordonnances limitant la publicité des débats judiciaires sont prononcées varient et que les tribunaux doivent avoir le pouvoir discrétionnaire nécessaire pour veiller à ce que justice soit rendue dans chaque cas.

[52] En effet, notre Cour a explicitement reconnu le pouvoir discrétionnaire des tribunaux de décider quand il faut donner un avis aux médias dans le cas des mandats de perquisition et des ordonnances de communication. Dans l'arrêt R. c. National Post, 2010 CSC 16, [2010] 1 R.C.S. 477, notre Cour a conclu que délivrer un mandat de perquisition en l'absence du média touché n'était pas une erreur de compétence; le juge qui a décerné le mandat avait le pouvoir discrétionnaire de décider du moment où il convenait de donner l'avis aux médias ainsi que de ses modalités (par. 83-84). De même, dans R. c. Média Vice Canada Inc., 2018 CSC 53, [2018] 3 R.C.S. 374, le juge Moldaver a étudié l'argument d'un média suivant lequel il devait être informé d'une demande d'ordonnance de communication qui le concernait (par. 59). Mon collègue a rejeté cet argument parce que le Code criminel prévoyait expressément la tenue d'instances ex parte et que les répercussions négatives sur le média étaient atténuées par le droit légal de demander la modification ou la révocation de l'ordonnance à un stade ultérieur (par. 61-62). Il découle de ces sources que la signification d'un avis n'est pas une condition préalable an order by an affected person who was not given prior notice.

au prononcé d'une ordonnance valide dans ces circonstances. En revanche, cette jurisprudence n'exclut pas la possibilité de donner avis après qu'une ordonnance eut été rendue, ou d'entendre une motion présentée par une personne touchée en vue de faire modifier ou annuler une ordonnance dont elle n'a pas été avisée préalablement.

[53] I also agree with the CBC that courts may exercise discretion to vary or set aside a publication ban or sealing order where the circumstances relating to the making of the order have materially changed in accordance with the principle set out by this Court in Adams. As Sopinka J. observed in that case, "[a]s a general rule, any order relating to the conduct of a trial can be varied or revoked if the circumstances that were present at the time the order was made have materially changed" (para. 30). This rule applies to orders involving court openness (see, e.g., British Columbia v. BCTF, 2015 BCCA 185, 75 B.C.L.R. (5th) 257, at paras. 15-22; Morin v. R. (1997), 32 O.R. (3d) 265 (C.A.), at pp. 272-73).

[54] I hasten to say, however, that I do not read Adams to bear the meaning the CBC attributes to it in their factum. The CBC says the case was about "whether the doctrine of functus officio prevented a trial judge from rescinding a publication ban it had previously issued" and suggests that it is a case about how the doctrine of functus officio applies to ancillary orders (A.F., at paras. 82-83). On my understanding, Adams dealt simply with the question as to when a judge could reconsider a previous order made in the course of trial. The impugned order, which purported to lift a publication ban previously made, was decided as the trial judge dismissed the charges against the accused (Adams, at para. 5). This Court concluded that the trial judge did not have the power to revoke the order because the circumstance that made the order mandatory had not changed (para. 31). Subsequent appellate jurisprudence has interpreted the judgment to provide a general rule about varying such orders, rather than a rule about functus officio (see, e.g., BCTF, at para. 22; R. v.

[54] Je m'empresse toutefois de mentionner qu'à mon avis, l'arrêt Adams n'a pas la signification que lui attribue la SRC dans son mémoire. La SRC dit que l'affaire concernait [TRADUCTION] « la question de savoir si la règle du functus officio empêchait un juge de première instance d'annuler une interdiction de publication qu'il avait prononcée auparavant », et elle postule qu'il y est question de la manière dont la règle du functus officio s'applique aux ordonnances accessoires (m.a., par. 82-83). D'après moi, l'arrêt Adams traitait simplement des circonstances où un juge peut réexaminer une ordonnance rendue plus tôt au cours du procès. Le sort de l'ordonnance attaquée, qui visait à lever une interdiction de publication en vigueur, a été décidé au moment où le juge du procès rejetait les accusations portées contre l'accusé (Adams, par. 5). Notre Cour a conclu que le juge du procès n'avait pas le pouvoir de révoquer l'ordonnance parce que les circonstances qui ont exigé le prononcé de l'ordonnance n'avaient pas changé (par. 31). Dans des décisions subséquentes, les cours

B. (H.), 2016 ONCA 953, 345 C.C.C. (3d) 206, at para. 51; R. v. Le, 2011 MBCA 83, 270 Man. R. (2d) 82, at para. 123). The principles in Adams balance finality and flexibility even when the court is not functus officio, by permitting the reconsideration of such orders where there has been a material change of circumstances.

d'appel ont considéré que le jugement établissait une règle générale à propos de la modification de ces ordonnances plutôt qu'une règle au sujet du functus officio (voir, p. ex., BCTF, par. 22; R. c. B. (H.), 2016 ONCA 953, 345 C.C.C. (3d) 206, par. 51; R. c. Le, 2011 MBCA 83, 270 Man. R. (2d) 82, par. 123). Les principes établis dans Adams concilient le caractère définitif d'une décision et la souplesse même lorsque le tribunal n'est pas functus officio, en autorisant le réexamen de ces ordonnances lorsqu'il y a eu changement important de circonstances.

[55] In deciding whether this rule from Adams applies, I do agree that a first question for the court will be whether there has been a material change in circumstances since the making of the initial order (para. 30). The burden of establishing this change falls to the party seeking a variation in the order (see, by analogy, L.M.P. v. L.S., 2011 SCC 64, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 775, at para. 31). That party must establish both that a change of circumstances has occurred and that the change, if known at the time of the initial order, would likely have resulted in an order on different terms (L.M.P., at para. 32; Droit de la famille — 132380, 2013 QCCA 1504, 37 R.F.L. (7th) 1, at paras. 75-76; R. v. Baltovitch (2000), 47 O.R. (3d) 761 (C.A.), at para. 6). The correctness of the initial order is presumed and is not relevant to the existence of a material change of circumstances (L.M.P., at para. 33; Droit de la famille — 132380, at para. 78).

[56] Instances in which a court may reconsider a decision respecting its court record are distinct from an appeal or application for certiorari made to a higher court from such decisions (see, generally, Dagenais, at pp. 870-72). In a motion to reconsider on both grounds described above, the original court is not being asked to reconsider its decision because it is wrongly decided, but rather because it was made without relevant submissions from an affected party or on the basis of a material change in the circumstances that justified the initial decision.

[57] Finally, I note that the general principles considered here can, of course, be displaced by legislation, such as the applicable rules of court, designed to determine more exactly when it is appropriate to reconsider orders concerning court openness.

[57] Enfin, je souligne que les principes généraux examinés ici peuvent, bien entendu, être écartés par une mesure législative, par exemple les règles de procédure applicables, conçue pour décider plus exactement dans quelles circonstances il y a lieu de réexaminer des ordonnances portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires.

B. Application to the Facts of This Case

(1) The Court of Appeal Erred in Concluding It Had No Jurisdiction to Consider the CBC's Motion

[58] In answer to the preliminary question raised by the first appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment, I turn now to whether the Court of Appeal erred in concluding it did not have jurisdiction to hear the CBC's motion to gain access to the Posner affidavit and set aside the publication ban.

[59] The CBC submits that the Court of Appeal was mistaken when it declined jurisdiction on the basis of the doctrine of functus officio. For the CBC, the flexible approach to functus officio spoken to in Adams requires ancillary orders, such as the publication ban here, to be treated separately from the merits of the main proceeding. Moreover, the circumstances in which the ban was ordered had changed. It was made without notice to the affected parties and no mention in a certificate of decision of the publication ban had been entered. The CBC maintains that it was not asking for a "rehearing" of the appeal or of the motion which, it recognizes, is prohibited by the Court of Appeal Rules. In the alternative, even if the prohibition against rehearings does apply, it must be interpreted flexibly as is the case with the doctrine of functus officio.

[60] The Crown answers that the Court of Appeal rightly held it was without jurisdiction given that the formal judgment had been entered. In its view, the only exception to the doctrine of functus officio that might conceivably apply here is that the CBC's

B. Application aux faits de l'espèce

(1) La Cour d'appel a eu tort de conclure qu'elle n'avait pas compétence pour examiner la motion de la SRC

[58] En réponse à la question préliminaire qu'a soulevée le premier appel du jugement de 2019 sur la compétence, j'en viens maintenant à la question de savoir si la Cour d'appel a eu tort de conclure qu'elle n'avait pas compétence pour entendre la motion de la SRC sollicitant l'accès à l'affidavit de Me Posner et l'annulation de l'interdiction de publication.

[59] La SRC prétend que la Cour d'appel a fait erreur lorsqu'elle a décliné compétence sur le fondement de la règle du functus officio. Selon la SRC, l'approche souple à l'égard du functus officio dont il est question dans Adams exige que les ordonnances accessoires, par exemple l'interdiction de publication en l'espèce, soient traitées séparément du fond de l'instance principale. Qui plus est, les circonstances dans lesquelles l'interdiction de publication a été prononcée avaient changé. L'interdiction a été prononcée sans avis aux parties touchées, et aucune mention de l'interdiction de publication n'avait été inscrite dans un certificat de décision. La SRC soutient qu'elle n'avait pas demandé que l'appel ou la motion fasse l'objet d'une « nouvelle audience » ce qui, elle le reconnaît, est interdit par les Règles de la Cour d'appel. Subsidiairement, même si l'interdiction des nouvelles audiences s'applique, elle doit être interprétée avec souplesse, à l'instar de la règle du functus officio.

[60] La Couronne répond que la Cour d'appel a statué à bon droit qu'elle n'avait pas compétence, vu que le jugement formel avait été inscrit. À son avis, la seule exception à la règle du functus officio qui pourrait théoriquement s'appliquer en l'espèce est arguments were never heard on their merits. That exception, says the Crown, does not apply here. While the CBC did not make submissions, it was covering the case and could have challenged the ban anytime between when the initial publication ban was made in May 2018 and when the certificate of decision was entered in January 2019. The CBC provides no proper explanation for its delay in taking action to set aside the publication ban. Even if a material change of circumstances would allow the Court of Appeal to reconsider its order, there was no such change in this case. The Court of Appeal's jurisdiction over the matter was exhausted.

que les arguments de la SRC n'ont jamais été entendus sur le fond. Selon la Couronne, cette exception ne s'applique pas en l'espèce. Bien que la SRC n'ait pas présenté d'observations, elle couvrait l'affaire et aurait pu contester l'interdiction en tout temps entre le prononcé de l'interdiction de publication initiale en mai 2018 et l'inscription du certificat de décision en janvier 2019. La SRC n'explique pas correctement pourquoi elle a tardé à agir pour faire annuler l'interdiction de publication. Même si un changement important de circonstances permettrait à la Cour d'appel de réexaminer son ordonnance, il n'y a pas eu un tel changement en l'espèce. La compétence de la Cour d'appel sur l'affaire était épuisée.

[61] I agree with the CBC that the Court of Appeal did have the authority to uphold, vary or vacate the 2018 publication ban and grant or withhold access to the court record.

[61] Je suis d'accord avec la SRC pour dire que la Cour d'appel avait le pouvoir de confirmer, de modifier ou d'annuler l'interdiction de publication de 2018 et de donner ou de refuser accès au dossier judiciaire.

[62] It is best to note at the outset that appellate jurisdiction, such as that being exercised by the Court of Appeal in the proceeding below, must be grounded in legislation (R. v. Smith, 2004 SCC 14, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 385, at para. 21). In addition to any explicit grant, statutory and appellate courts should be understood to have the implicit power to control their own process and exercise other powers that are practically necessary to accomplish the role the law assigns them (R. v. Cunningham, 2010 SCC 10, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 331, at para. 19; Lochner v. Ontario Civilian Police Commission, 2020 ONCA 720, at para. 27 (CanLII)). I agree with the Attorney General of British Columbia that it may be unhelpful to describe this implicit authority as "inherent jurisdiction" given that appellate powers are, ultimately, rooted in statute (transcript, at pp. 100-1).

[62] Il vaut mieux souligner d'entrée de jeu que la compétence en matière d'appel, comme celle qu'exerce la Cour d'appel dans l'instance inférieure, doit reposer sur la loi (R. c. Smith, 2004 CSC 14, [2004] 1 R.C.S. 385, par. 21). Outre les pouvoirs qui leur sont explicitement conférés, les tribunaux d'origine législative et les cours d'appel ont la maîtrise implicite de leur propre procédure et d'autres pouvoirs qui sont de fait nécessaires à l'exercice du rôle que la loi leur confie (R. c. Cunningham, 2010 CSC 10, [2010] 1 R.C.S. 331, par. 19; Lochner c. Ontario Civilian Police Commission, 2020 ONCA 720, par. 27 (CanLII)). Je suis d'accord avec le procureur général de la Colombie-Britannique pour dire qu'il est peut-être inutile de qualifier ce pouvoir implicite de [TRADUCTION] « compétence inhérente », vu que les pouvoirs en matière d'appel prennent leur source, en définitive, dans la loi (transcription, p. 100-101).

[63] The legislative foundation for the Court of Appeal's jurisdiction over the motion on court openness is plain here. As I have said, the supervisory jurisdiction over the court record is a feature of all courts (MacIntyre, at p. 189) and this is no less true of an appellate court. As part of the court's authority to control its own process, the power over the openness of proceedings and over the court record arises here by necessary implication from the legislative grant of the appellate court's adjudicative authority (see, generally, Cunningham, at para. 19). As a matter of procedural necessity — a publication ban or a sealing order may remain in place long after the substance of the appeal has been decided — this jurisdiction continues even after the formal judgment on the merits of a given appeal has been entered unless ousted by legislation. The Court of Appeal therefore had continuing, ancillary jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion regarding sealing orders and publication bans. This included implied jurisdiction to vary or vacate its orders limiting court openness in accordance with the common law principles considered above. The only remaining question is whether any applicable legislation limits this jurisdiction for the Court of Appeal in this case.

d'appel. Dans le cadre de la maîtrise par le tribunal de sa propre procédure, le pouvoir à l'égard de la transparence de l'instance et du dossier judiciaire découle en l'espèce, par déduction nécessaire, de l'octroi par voie législative du pouvoir juridictionnel de la cour d'appel (voir, en général, Cunningham, par. 19). Par la force des choses sur le plan de la procédure — une interdiction de publication ou une ordonnance de mise sous scellés peut demeurer en place longtemps après qu'il a été statué sur le fond de l'appel — cette compétence subsiste même après que le jugement formel sur le bien-fondé d'un appel donné a été inscrit, à moins qu'elle n'ait été écartée par un texte législatif. En conséquence, la Cour d'appel avait encore le pouvoir accessoire d'examiner la motion de la SRC visant les ordonnances de mise sous scellés et les interdictions de publication. Ceci comprenait la compétence implicite pour modifier ou annuler ses ordonnances limitant la publicité des débats judiciaires conformément aux principes de common law examinés ci-dessus. La seule question qui demeure est celle de savoir si des textes législatifs applicables limitent cette compétence de la Cour d'appel en l'espèce.

[64] The Court of Appeal Rules do prohibit a "rehearing of an appeal" (in French, "appel . . . entendu de nouveau") after the certificate of decision has been entered, a rule on which the Court of Appeal relied in this case (r. 46.2(1) and (2), applicable by virtue of r. 45 of the Manitoba Criminal Appeal Rules, SI/92-106). This rule also prohibits the "rehearing" of motions (in French, "faire l'objet d'une nouvelle audience") (r. 46.2(12)). Relevant portions of r. 46.2 are as follows:

[64] Les Règles de la Cour d'appel interdisent effectivement qu'un « appel [soit] entendu de nouveau » (en anglais, « [the] rehearing of an appeal ») après que le certificat de décision ait été inscrit, une règle sur laquelle la Cour d'appel s'est appuyée en l'espèce (par. 46.2(1) et (2), applicables en raison de la règle 45 des Règles de procédure de la cour d'appel du Manitoba en matière criminelle, TR/92-106). Cette règle interdit également que les motions « fa[ssent] l'objet d'une nouvelle audience » (en anglais, « [the] rehearing of [. . .] a motion ») (par. 46.2(12)). Les extraits pertinents de la règle 46.2 prévoient ce qui suit :

46.2(1) There shall be no rehearing of an appeal except by order of the court or at the instance of the court.

46.2(1) Aucun appel ne peut être entendu de nouveau, sauf sur ordonnance du tribunal ou à son initiative.

46.2(2) A rehearing of an appeal may be ordered before the certificate of decision has been entered.

46.2(2) Une nouvelle audition d'un appel peut être ordonnée avant que le certificat de décision n'ait été inscrit.

46.2(12) There shall be no rehearing on an application for leave or a motion.

46.2(12) Aucune requête en autorisation ni aucune motion ne peuvent faire l'objet d'une nouvelle audience.

[65] It is true that the certificate of decision referred to in r. 46.2(2) has been entered here in respect of the appeal bearing on the miscarriage of justice. Accordingly, a rehearing of Mr. Ostrowski's appeal on the merits is precluded in accordance with r. 46.2. Similarly, any motion that had been heard in the course of the proceeding cannot now be reheard, as this is foreclosed by r. 46.2(12).

[66] But these rules did not deprive the Court of Appeal of the ability to hear the CBC's motion concerning court openness. This is certainly not a "rehearing of an appeal" as contemplated by r. 46.2(1) and (2). The CBC brought a motion concerning access to the court file and did not seek to reopen the miscarriage of justice proceeding itself. Interpreting the prohibition against rehearing an appeal as precluding the Court of Appeal from hearing a motion concerning court openness, distinct from the merits of the appeal, is not plain from the text. The appeal is not to be "entendu de nouveau", to advert to the French text of r. 46.2(1) and (2). Nor does it accord with the purpose of rules prohibiting rehearings of the appeal that reflect the same core objectives of finality and stability of judgments associated with the doctrine of functus officio (see Doucet-Boudreau, at para. 79). There is nothing in r. 46.2 that prevents the CBC from seeking ancillary orders related to court openness after the certificate of decision has been entered on the merits.

[67] Similarly, the prohibition on the rehearing of motions in r. 46.2(12) cannot be interpreted to prohibit the CBC from moving to set aside the publication ban made without notice and which affects the open court principle. The impugned order was made of the Court of Appeal's own accord, with the consent of the parties, at the oral hearing and then continued indefinitely in para. 82 of the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment. The court heard no submissions on point and provided no prior notice to anyone, including the media, notably the CBC who learned of the impugned ban shortly after the reasons

[66] Toutefois, ces règles n'ont pas privé la Cour d'appel de la faculté d'entendre la motion de la SRC portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires. Ceci n'est certainement pas un « appel [. . .] entendu de nouveau » ni une « nouvelle audition d'un appel » visé aux par. 46.2(1) et (2). La SRC a présenté une motion portant sur l'accès au dossier judiciaire et n'a pas tenté de rouvrir l'instance en matière d'erreur judiciaire elle-même. Considérer que l'interdiction d'une nouvelle audition d'un appel empêche la Cour d'appel d'entendre une motion portant sur la publicité des débats judiciaires, distincte du fond de l'appel, ne ressort pas manifestement du texte. Il n'y a pas de « rehearing of an appeal », pour reprendre le texte anglais des par. 46.2(1) et (2). Une telle interprétation ne s'accorde pas non plus avec l'objet des règles interdisant les nouvelles auditions de l'appel qui reflètent les mêmes objectifs fondamentaux du caractère définitif et de la stabilité des jugements que l'on associe à la règle du functus officio (voir Doucet-Boudreau, par. 79). La règle 46.2 n'empêche aucunement la SRC de solliciter des ordonnances accessoires liées à la publicité des débats judiciaires après que le certificat de décision ait été inscrit sur le fond.

[67] Pareillement, on ne saurait considérer que l'interdiction de la nouvelle audition d'une motion, prévue au par. 46.2(12), a pour effet d'interdire à la SRC de demander par motion l'annulation de l'interdiction de publication prononcée sans avis et qui a une incidence sur le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires. L'ordonnance attaquée a été prononcée du propre chef de la Cour d'appel, avec le consentement des parties, et à l'audience, puis maintenue pour une durée indéterminée au par. 82 du jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication. Le tribunal n'a entendu aucune observation sur le were released. The CBC was not asking the Court of Appeal for a "rehearing" of a motion. The idea of a "rehearing" spoken to in r. 46.2 necessarily implies there was an original hearing and that the court would be hearing the same motion again, as the French ("nouvelle audience") in r. 46.2 makes plain.

point, et n'a donné de préavis à qui que ce soit, dont les médias, notamment la SRC qui a eu vent de l'interdiction attaquée peu après le prononcé des motifs. La SRC ne demandait pas à la Cour d'appel qu'une motion fasse l'objet d'une « nouvelle audience ». L'idée d'un « rehearing » dont il est question à la règle 46.2 implique nécessairement qu'il y a eu une première audience et que le tribunal entendrait la même motion de nouveau, comme l'indique clairement l'expression française « nouvelle audience » à la règle 46.2.

[68] Instead, the CBC brought an altogether new motion to set aside the 2018 publication ban made in its absence. This may engage, as the CBC suggests, a fundamental principle of the administration of justice that parties affected by orders be given the opportunity to be heard. There is nothing in the text of r. 46(12) that modifies the generally applicable rule allowing the Court of Appeal to vary or rescind its publication ban or sealing order on motion from an affected person not given notice of the making of the order.

[68] La SRC a plutôt déposé une motion entièrement nouvelle pour faire annuler l'interdiction de publication de 2018 prononcée en son absence. Cela peut faire entrer en jeu, comme le prétend la SRC, un principe fondamental de l'administration de la justice voulant que les parties touchées par des ordonnances se voient accorder l'occasion d'être entendues. Rien dans le libellé du par. 46(12) n'a pour effet de modifier la règle généralement applicable qui permet à la Cour d'appel de modifier ou d'annuler son interdiction de publication ou ordonnance de mise sous scellés sur motion d'une personne touchée qui n'a pas été avisée du prononcé de l'ordonnance.

[69] The CBC also argued that the Court of Appeal should have taken up its rightful jurisdiction to vary the publication ban covering the Posner affidavit because there had been a material change of circumstances.

[69] La SRC ajoute que la Cour d'appel aurait dû assumer sa compétence légitime pour modifier l'interdiction de publication portant sur l'affidavit de Me Posner parce qu'il y avait eu un changement important de circonstances.

[70] I disagree. I think it should be recorded that the CBC did not, in the proceedings below, establish a material change of circumstances.

[71] While it may be the case that the finding of a miscarriage of justice by the Court of Appeal increased the public interest in the materials, that conclusion was made in the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment in which the continuation of the publication ban was ordered. It cannot, therefore, be a change of circumstances that has occurred since the impugned order was made, as is required (Adams, at para. 30; L.M.P., at para. 31).

[71] Bien que la conclusion d'erreur judiciaire à laquelle est arrivée la Cour d'appel ait pu accroître l'intérêt du public à l'égard des documents, la Cour d'appel a conclu à l'existence de cette erreur dans le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication, où elle a ordonné le maintien de l'interdiction de publication. Il ne peut donc s'agir d'un changement de circonstances qui s'est produit depuis le prononcé de l'ordonnance contestée, comme le veut la règle (Adams, par. 30; L.M.P., par. 31).

[72] Equally, the subsequent appearance of the CBC in the proceedings as a party did not constitute, in itself, a material change in circumstances. Assuming the initial order was correctly made, as one must at this stage (L.M.P., at para. 33), and recognizing that the CBC did not make submissions on the initial order, in my view the CBC's mere presence would not likely have resulted in a different outcome for the purposes of the applicable test. This is not to exclude the possibility that, had the CBC made submissions, the result might have been different. But acknowledging this possibility requires one to consider whether the Court of Appeal may have erred in applying the relevant test without the benefit of the CBC's argument. This is contrary to the well-established principle that one must not consider the possibility that the original court erred when determining whether a material change has occurred (L.M.P., at para. 33). The Court of Appeal is therefore presumed at this stage to have balanced the interest of the media in open court proceedings with competing public interests even in the absence of a representative of the press, as is required (Mentuck, at para. 38). The CBC's absence at the making of the initial order is more properly considered in reference to the principles relating to orders made without notice to an affected party, since it is a lost opportunity to make submissions, and not in reference to a change in the circumstances relied on by the Court of Appeal.

[73] In sum, the Court of Appeal erred in concluding that r. 46.2 or the doctrine of functus officio deprived it of jurisdiction to hear the CBC's motion. Said respectfully, the Court of Appeal's interpretation of these principles was unnecessary to protect the values of finality and orderly appellate review. It had an adverse impact on the opportunity of the media to make representations in respect of this order limiting the open court principle. The better view is that the Court of Appeal retained jurisdiction to oversee its record even after the certificate of decision in the underlying proceeding on the merits was entered.

[72] De même, la comparution subséquente de la SRC dans l'instance en qualité de partie ne constituait pas, en soi, un changement important de circonstances. En présumant que l'ordonnance initiale était bien fondée, comme on doit le faire à ce stade (L.M.P., par. 33), et en reconnaissant que la SRC n'avait pas présenté d'observations portant sur l'ordonnance initiale, j'estime que la simple présence de la SRC n'aurait vraisemblablement pas donné lieu à un résultat différent pour les besoins du test applicable. Cela n'exclut pas la possibilité que le résultat eût été différent si la SRC avait présenté des observations. Mais en reconnaissant cette possibilité, on doit se demander si la Cour d'appel a peut-être fait erreur dans l'application du test en question sans avoir pris connaissance de l'argument de la SRC. Cela va à l'encontre du principe bien établi voulant qu'on ne doive pas envisager la possibilité que le tribunal d'origine ait commis une erreur au moment de décider s'il y a eu un changement important (L.M.P., par. 33). On présume donc à ce stade que la Cour d'appel a mis en balance, comme elle doit le faire, l'intérêt des médias dans la publicité des débats judiciaires et les intérêts publics opposés, même en l'absence d'un représentant de la presse (Mentuck, par. 38). Il vaut mieux examiner l'absence de la SRC lors du prononcé de l'ordonnance initiale en fonction des principes applicables aux ordonnances rendues sans qu'une partie touchée en ait été avisée, car il s'agit d'une occasion perdue de présenter des observations, et non au regard d'un changement de circonstances invoqué par la Cour d'appel.

(2) The Matter Should Be Remanded to the Court of Appeal

[74] That the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to consider the CBC's motion and its request for access to the Posner affidavit, does not mean, of course, that the CBC is entitled to the relief it sought. The availability of relief turns on the proper application of the law to the facts here, a determination that would be best made at first instance by the Court of Appeal.

[75] In respect of the publication ban, the CBC will rely on the Court of Appeal's power to rescind an order on the basis that it was made without notice to an affected party. As a preliminary matter, the Court of Appeal must determine, in keeping with the principles sketched above, whether the CBC has standing to challenge the relevant order. This initial hurdle, which the CBC must clear, serves to restrict the scope of those who are able to challenge an order made without notice to the media to those representatives who were deprived of the ability to make useful submissions that may have affected the result.

[76] The CBC will also be required to show that the delay from the time it became aware of the impugned order to the time it filed its motion in May 2019 was not unreasonable. I note that the Crown argues the CBC ought to have brought its motion earlier. In response to questions from my colleagues at the oral hearing, the CBC rightly conceded it knew of the publication ban shortly after the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment was released. Its delay in bringing the motion was in the order of six months. While the matter was not advanced by the Crown as a basis for dismissing the appeal, at the hearing before this Court the CBC did say the delay was justified in the circumstances, pointing to initial confusion as to the nature of the order, and asserted the public interest in deciding this open court issue that affects the rights of all Canadians.

(2) L'affaire doit être renvoyée à la Cour d'appel

[75] Pour ce qui est de l'interdiction de publication, la SRC s'appuiera sur le pouvoir de la Cour d'appel d'annuler une ordonnance au motif qu'elle a été rendue sans avis à une partie touchée. À titre préliminaire, la Cour d'appel doit se demander, compte tenu des principes sommairement exposés ci-dessus, si la SRC a qualité pour contester l'ordonnance en question. Ce premier obstacle, que doit surmonter la SRC, fait en sorte que seuls les représentants qui sont privés de la possibilité de présenter des observations utiles et susceptibles d'avoir influé sur le résultat peuvent contester une ordonnance rendue sans que les médias en aient été avisés.

[76] La SRC aura également à démontrer que le délai qui s'est écoulé entre le moment où elle a pris connaissance de l'ordonnance contestée et le moment où elle a déposé sa motion en mai 2019 n'était pas déraisonnable. Je prends note que la Couronne prétend que la SRC aurait dû présenter sa motion plus tôt. En réponse aux questions posées par mes collègues à l'audience, la SRC a concédé à juste titre qu'elle avait eu connaissance de l'interdiction de publication peu de temps après le prononcé du jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication. Le délai qui s'est écoulé avant qu'elle présente la motion était de l'ordre de six mois. Bien que la question n'ait pas été invoquée par la Couronne en tant que motif du rejet du pourvoi, la SRC a mentionné à l'audience devant notre Cour que le délai était justifié dans les circonstances, soulignant la confusion au départ quant à la nature de l'ordonnance et faisant valoir l'intérêt public à trancher cette question de publicité des débats judiciaire qui touche les droits de tous les Canadiens et les Canadiennes.

[77] Turning to the substance of the CBC's motion, any discretionary limits on access to and publication of the contents of the court record must be understood in reference to the test from Sierra Club as recently recast by this Court in Sherman. Court proceedings are presumptively open to the public (A.B. v. Bragg Communications Inc., 2012 SCC 46, [2012] 2 S.C.R. 567, at para. 11). A court can order discretionary limits on openness only where (1) openness poses a serious risk to an important public interest, (2) the order sought is necessary to prevent that risk and (3) the benefits of the order outweigh its negative effects (Sherman, at para. 38, citing Sierra Club, at para. 53).

[78] Before this Court, both the Crown and M.D.'s family invoke the privacy and dignity of the interested parties as an important public interest that would be threatened if the publication ban was lifted. The CBC answers that the interests raised are merely personal, without the public component required to displace the open court principle. Much like in Sherman, the parties' disagreement is rooted in the inherent tension between the open court principle and what Dickson J., as he then was, once described as competing "superordinate" values (MacIntyre, at pp. 186-87). Both privacy and court openness have been recognized in law as pillars of a free and democratic society (Canadian Broadcasting Corp. v. New Brunswick (Attorney General), [1996] 3 S.C.R. 480, at para. 23; Lavigne v. Canada (Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages), 2002 SCC 53, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 773, at para. 25). If open courts are to remain the rule rather than the exception, some degree of privacy loss for those whose lives are the subject of litigation is inevitable. But circumstances do exist where openness poses a serious risk to an aspect of privacy that evinces an important public interest.

[79] The Court of Appeal did not have the advantage of considering the judgment of this Court in Sherman where it was held that there is an important public interest in a narrower dimension of privacy

[77] En ce qui a trait au fond de la motion de la SRC, toute limite discrétionnaire à l'accès au dossier judiciaire et à la publication de son contenu doit être comprise à l'aune du test de l'arrêt Sierra Club récemment reformulé par notre Cour dans Sherman. Les procédures judiciaires sont présumées accessibles au public (A.B. c. Bragg Communications Inc., 2012 CSC 46, [2012] 2 R.C.S. 567, par. 11). Un tribunal ne peut imposer de limites discrétionnaires à la publicité des débats que si les conditions suivantes sont remplies : (1) la publicité des débats pose un risque sérieux pour un intérêt public important; (2) l'ordonnance sollicitée est nécessaire pour écarter ce risque; (3) les avantages de l'ordonnance l'emportent sur ses effets négatifs (Sherman, par. 38, citant Sierra Club, par. 53).

[78] Devant notre Cour, la Couronne et la famille de M.D. invoquent toutes les deux la vie privée et la dignité des parties intéressées comme un intérêt public important qui serait menacé si l'interdiction de publication était levée. La SRC répond que les intérêts invoqués ne sont que personnels, sans l'élément public qu'il faut pour écarter le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires. Tout comme dans l'affaire Sherman, le désaccord des parties repose sur la tension inhérente entre le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires et ce que le juge Dickson, plus tard juge en chef, a déjà qualifié de valeurs ayant « préséance » (MacIntyre, p. 186-187). La vie privée et la publicité des débats judiciaires ont toutes les deux été reconnues dans la jurisprudence comme étant des piliers d'une société libre et démocratique (Société Radio-Canada c. Nouveau-Brunswick (Procureur général), [1996] 3 R.C.S. 480, par. 23; Lavigne c. Canada (Commissariat aux langues officielles), 2002 CSC 53, [2002] 2 R.C.S. 773, par. 25). Si la publicité des débats judiciaires doit demeurer la règle plutôt que l'exception, il est inévitable que ceux dont la vie fait l'objet d'un litige subissent une certaine atteinte à leur vie privée. Toutefois, il existe effectivement des circonstances où la publicité des débats pose un risque sérieux pour un aspect de la vie privée qui fait état d'un intérêt public important.

concerning the protection of individual dignity. In order to show a serious risk to this interest, an individual must establish that the information about them that would be disseminated as a result of court openness is sufficiently sensitive such that it strikes at their biographical core, revealing something "intimate and personal about the individual, their lifestyle or their experiences" (Sherman, at paras. 73-77, 79 and 85). If they succeed, the question becomes whether, in light of the totality of the circumstances, court openness poses a risk to individual dignity that strikes meaningfully at this important public interest. A serious risk need not be supported by direct evidence but may be reasonably inferred on the basis of available circumstantial facts (Bragg, at paras. 15-16). If the party succeeds in establishing this serious risk, they must then show that the order they seek is necessary to prevent the risk and that the benefits of the order outweigh its negative effects, including the effects on constitutionally-protected court openness (Sierra Club, at para. 53).

protection de la dignité individuelle. Afin de démontrer l'existence d'un risque sérieux pour cet intérêt, une personne doit établir que les renseignements à son sujet qui seraient diffusés en raison de la publicité des débats judiciaires sont suffisamment sensibles, si bien qu'ils représentent des renseignements biographiques, révélant quelque chose « d'intime et de personnel au sujet de la personne, de son mode de vie ou de son vécu » (Sherman, par. 73-77, 79 et 85). Si elle réussit, il s'agit de se demander si, eu égard à l'ensemble des circonstances, la publicité des débats judiciaires pose un risque pour la dignité individuelle qui concerne concrètement cet important intérêt public. Il n'est pas nécessaire que le risque sérieux soit étayé par une preuve directe; il peut être raisonnablement inféré sur le fondement de faits circonstanciels connus (Bragg, par. 15-16). Si la partie réussit à établir ce risque sérieux, elle doit ensuite démontrer que l'ordonnance qu'elle sollicite est nécessaire pour écarter le risque et que les avantages de l'ordonnance l'emportent sur ses effets négatifs, y compris les effets sur la publicité des débats judiciaires, protégée par la Constitution (Sierra Club, par. 53).

[80] The parties disagree about the extent to which the test for discretionary limits on court openness applies to determine access to and publication of the Posner affidavit. The CBC argued that the sealing order that applied to the affidavit by operation of the Court of Appeal Rules ended once the new evidence motion was dismissed. The Crown took the position that the relevant rule is silent on what happens to material under seal after a new evidence motion is dismissed such that the Court of Appeal was entitled not to enter the proposed evidence into the public record. As for the publication ban covering the details of this evidence, the CBC argued that it fails the test for discretionary limits on court openness, which it says applies even though the Posner affidavit was ultimately not admitted into evidence. The Crown and the interested parties stressed instead the Posner affidavit's alleged irrelevance as a factor in this analysis.

[81] For two reasons, I conclude that any limits on access to or publication of the Posner affidavit in this case must meet the generally applicable test for discretionary limits on court openness. First, I agree with the CBC that r. 21(4) of the Court of Appeal Rules does not provide for a permanent sealing order over the Posner affidavit. Rule 21(4), which specifies that the new evidence remains sealed "until the motion is decided", explicitly anticipates that the sealing prescribed by this rule will cease once there is a decision. This decision occurred when the new evidence motion was dismissed. There is nothing in the rule to indicate that the seal is to protect the information from public dissemination and that this is meant to extend indefinitely after the motion is decided. In my view, r. 21 does not continue to seal the Posner affidavit.

[81] Deux raisons m'amènent à conclure que toute limite à l'accès à l'affidavit de Me Posner ou à sa publication en l'espèce doit satisfaire au critère généralement applicable aux limites discrétionnaires sur la publicité des débats judiciaires. Premièrement, je suis d'accord avec la SRC pour dire que le par. 21(4) des Règles de la Cour d'appel ne prévoit pas d'ordonnance permanente de mise sous scellés à l'égard de l'affidavit de Me Posner. Le paragraphe 21(4), qui précise que les nouveaux éléments de preuve demeurent scellés « jusqu'à ce qu'il soit statué sur la motion », prévoit expressément que la mise sous scellés prescrite par cette règle cessera lorsqu'il y aura une décision. Cette décision a eu lieu lorsque la motion en présentation d'éléments de preuve nouveaux a été rejetée. Rien dans la règle n'indique que la mise sous scellés vise à protéger les renseignements contre une diffusion publique et que cette mesure est censée se poursuivre indéfiniment après qu'il a été statué sur la motion. À mon avis, la règle 21 ne maintient pas la mise sous scellés de l'affidavit de Me Posner.

[82] Second, the fact that the Posner affidavit was not admitted as new evidence for the purposes of the miscarriage of justice proceeding should not shield the publication ban from review. The Crown submits that the Court of Appeal's "practice" not to admit such evidence into the court registry fills the silence in r. 21(4). But an administrative practice cannot have the effect of taking this matter outside the scope of the test for discretionary limits on the open court principle. Court openness serves to maintain the legitimacy of the exercise of judicial power — including the decision to dismiss the motion for new evidence — by allowing the public to scrutinize this exercise in service of ensuring that justice is being dispensed fairly (Vancouver Sun, at para. 25). Public access to the court record facilitates this scrutiny (Edmonton Journal v. Alberta (Attorney General), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1326, at p. 1339, per Cory J.).

[82] Deuxièmement, le fait que l'affidavit de Me Posner n'a pas été admis comme élément de preuve nouveau pour les besoins de l'instance portant sur l'erreur judiciaire ne doit pas mettre l'interdiction de publication à l'abri d'un contrôle. La Couronne soutient que la [TRADUCTION] « pratique » de la Cour d'appel qui consiste à ne pas admettre de tels éléments de preuve pour dépôt au greffe du tribunal comble le silence du par. 21(4). Toutefois, une pratique administrative ne saurait avoir pour effet de placer cette affaire en dehors de la portée du test concernant les limites discrétionnaires au principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires. Cette publicité sert à maintenir la légitimité de l'exercice du pouvoir judiciaire — y compris la décision de rejeter la motion en présentation d'éléments de preuve nouveaux — en permettant au public d'examiner attentivement cet exercice dans le but de s'assurer que la justice est dispensée équitablement (Vancouver Sun, par. 25). L'accès public au dossier judiciaire facilite cet examen attentif (Edmonton Journal c. Alberta (Procureur général), [1989] 2 R.C.S. 1326, p. 1339, le juge Cory).

[83] Consistent with this purpose, all materials that are made available to the court for the purposes of deciding the case — in other words, for the purposes of exercising its judicial power — are subject to the open court principle (see Canadian Broadcasting Corp. v. R., 2010 ONCA 726, 102 O.R. (3d) 673, at paras. 42-44; see also Aboriginal Peoples Television Network v. Alberta (Attorney General), 2018 ABCA 133, 70 Alta. L.R. (6th) 246, at para. 48). In this case, the Court of Appeal had before it a motion to admit the Posner affidavit as new evidence. With the consent of the parties, the court reviewed that affidavit in considering the motion. While the court ultimately declined to admit it, the affidavit was considered in deciding the new evidence motion. It follows that any discretionary limit on access to or publication of the Posner affidavit must meet the requirements affirmed in Sierra Club and Sherman.

[83] Dans le respect de cet objectif, tous les documents mis à la disposition du tribunal en vue de trancher l'affaire, autrement dit pour lui permettre d'exercer son pouvoir judiciaire, sont visés par le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires (voir Canadian Broadcasting Corp. c. R., 2010 ONCA 726, 102 O.R. (3d) 673, par. 42-44; voir également Aboriginal Peoples Television Network c. Alberta (Attorney General), 2018 ABCA 133, 70 Alta. L.R. (6th) 246, par. 48). En l'espèce, la Cour d'appel était saisie d'une motion en vue de faire admettre l'affidavit de Me Posner en tant que nouvel élément de preuve. Avec le consentement des parties, le tribunal a étudié cet affidavit lors de l'examen de la motion. Bien que le tribunal ait fini par refuser d'admettre l'affidavit, celui-ci a été examiné lorsqu'il a été statué sur la motion en présentation d'éléments de preuve nouveaux. Il s'ensuit que toute limite discrétionnaire à l'accès à l'affidavit de Me Posner ou à sa publication doit satisfaire aux exigences énoncées dans les arrêts Sierra Club et Sherman.

[84] In sum, to the extent the requested relief required it to reconsider its publication ban, the Court of Appeal should have asked whether it was appropriate to vary or set aside that decision on motion by the CBC given it was made without notice. On the substance of the motion, the Court of Appeal should have considered whether any discretionary limits it imposed on publication of the court record, which includes the Posner affidavit, complied with the test for discretionary limits on court openness.

[85] The remaining question is which court should decide these issues raised in the context of the first appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment. I recall that the Crown suggests that if the Court of Appeal had jurisdiction to hear the motion for reconsideration, it follows that this Court does not. It argues that in this scenario the publication ban is not a "final or other judgment of . . . the highest court of final resort" for the purposes of s. 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26, under which leave to appeal in this matter was granted.

[85] Il reste à se demander quel tribunal doit trancher ces questions soulevées dans le contexte du premier appel du jugement de 2019 sur la compétence. Tel qu'il est indiqué ci-dessus, la Couronne prétend que, si la Cour d'appel avait compétence pour entendre la motion en réexamen, il s'ensuit que notre Cour ne l'a pas. Elle plaide que dans ce scénario, l'interdiction de publication n'est pas un « jugement, définitif ou autre, rendu par [. . .] le plus haut tribunal de dernier ressort » pour l'application du par. 40(1) de la Loi sur la Cour suprême, L.R.C. 1985, c. S-26, en vertu duquel l'autorisation d'appel en l'espèce a été accordée.

[86] I disagree. The Court of Appeal's reconsideration of its publication ban is not, as we have seen, an appeal of the publication ban order. The only route of appeal from either the Court of Appeal's 2018 Publication Ban Judgment or the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment was to this Court with leave pursuant to s. 40(1) of the Supreme Court Act (see, generally, Dagenais, at p. 872). Accordingly, I have no difficulty concluding that both were "final or other judgment[s] of . . . the highest court of final resort" from which this Court has jurisdiction to hear an appeal with leave (see, generally, Mentuck, at paras. 20-21).

[87] That said, I am of the view that fairness to all the parties requires that we remand the motion that resulted in the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment to the Court of Appeal. The remaining issues raised are best decided by the Court of Appeal. The Court of Appeal ended its analysis after concluding it was functus officio and we do not have the benefit of any reasons below on these issues. As I have noted above, the motion required the Court of Appeal to make several discretionary decisions: whether to grant the CBC standing, whether to hear the motion given the delay, and ultimately whether to uphold a discretionary limit on the openness of its own record. These are decisions the Court of Appeal is best placed to make given they are intimately connected to the facts and procedural history of this case, in which that court effectively acted as a court of first instance.

[88] In my view, it is not in the interests of justice for this Court to step into the Court of Appeal's shoes and decide these matters at first instance. This is quite different from considering such issues on appeal through the deferential lens this Court would take in reviewing the exercise of discretion below (see R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297, at para. 117). Other appellate courts have been rightly cautious to dictate to lower courts in this way (see, e.g., GEA Refrigeration, at para. 184).

[86] Je ne suis pas de cet avis. Le réexamen, par la Cour d'appel, de son interdiction de publication n'est pas, comme nous l'avons vu, un appel de l'ordonnance. La seule voie d'appel du jugement rendu en 2018 par la Cour d'appel sur l'interdiction de publication ou de son jugement de 2019 sur la compétence était l'appel à notre Cour, avec son autorisation, en application du par. 40(1) de la Loi sur la Cour suprême (voir, en général, Dagenais, p. 872). Par conséquent, je n'ai aucune difficulté à conclure que les deux étaient des « jugement[s], définitif[s] ou autre[s], rendu[s] par [. . .] le plus haut tribunal de dernier ressort » à l'égard desquels notre Cour a compétence pour entendre un appel avec autorisation (voir, en général, Mentuck, par. 20-21).

[88] À mon avis, il n'est pas dans l'intérêt de la justice que notre Cour se mette à la place de la Cour d'appel et tranche ces questions en première instance. Cela est très différent du fait d'examiner ces questions en appel avec un regard empreint de déférence que notre Cour adopterait pour contrôler l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire de la juridiction inférieure (voir R. c. Regan, 2002 CSC 12, [2002] 1 R.C.S. 297, par. 117). D'autres cours d'appel ne se sont pas hasardées à bon droit à dicter ainsi aux juridictions inférieures leur conduite (voir, p. ex., GEA Refrigeration, par. 184).

[89] I note as well that the issue of delay was not fully argued before this Court and we are therefore not well placed to come to the appropriate balance in this case in any event. This Court has remanded matters to the Court of Appeal where a question was not addressed below and the record and arguments are "too sparse to . . . resolve the matter confidently" (see, e.g., Galambos v. Perez, 2009 SCC 48, [2009] 3 S.C.R. 247, at para. 46). The CBC did not raise the issue in its factum because it considered the issue to have been resolved when we granted its motions for extensions of time to seek leave to appeal. While the Crown pointed to the delay in passing, it never argued the appeal bearing on the motion for reconsideration could be dismissed on that basis alone. This further militates towards remanding the matter.

[89] Je signale en outre que la question du délai n'a pas été pleinement débattue devant notre Cour et que nous sommes donc mal placés pour réaliser le juste équilibre en l'espèce de toute manière. Notre Cour a renvoyé à la Cour d'appel des affaires où une question n'avait pas été examinée par les tribunaux d'instance inférieure, et le dossier ainsi que les arguments ne sont « pas suffisamment étoffés pour [. . .] permettre de statuer sur cette question sans crainte de [s]e tromper » (voir, p. ex., Galambos c. Perez, 2009 CSC 48, [2009] 3 R.C.S. 247, par. 46). La SRC n'a pas soulevé la question dans son mémoire parce que, selon elle, la question avait été réglée lorsque nous avons accueilli ses requêtes en prorogation du délai pour solliciter l'autorisation d'appel. Bien que la Couronne ait fait allusion au délai en passant, elle n'a jamais plaidé que l'appel portant sur la motion en réexamen pouvait être rejeté pour ce seul motif. Cela milite encore davantage en faveur du renvoi de l'affaire.

[90] Even if this Court were to exercise its jurisdiction to decide these issues, it does not have the benefit of submissions from the parties on how the principles from Sherman outlined above apply to these facts. That decision was released only after this matter had been heard and, in my view, fairness would require further submissions from the parties with respect to its impact on the issue at hand. This Court had previously considered privacy in the context of this test in Bragg, but was clear that it was not a question of privacy without more but was combined with "the relentlessly intrusive humiliation of sexualized online bullying" (para. 14).

[90] Même si notre Cour exerçait sa compétence pour trancher ces questions, elle ne dispose pas d'observations des parties sur la manière dont les principes de l'arrêt Sherman énoncés ci-dessus s'appliquent aux faits de l'espèce. Cet arrêt n'a été prononcé qu'après l'instruction de la présente affaire, et j'estime que l'équité exigerait des observations supplémentaires de la part des parties en ce qui concerne l'incidence de l'arrêt Sherman sur la question à l'étude. Notre Cour s'est déjà penchée sur la protection de la vie privée dans le cadre de ce test dans l'arrêt Bragg, mais elle a clairement affirmé qu'il s'agissait non pas uniquement de protection de la vie privée, mais aussi de « l'humiliation constamment envahissante liée à l'intimidation à caractère sexuel en ligne » (par. 14).

[91] Sherman provided an opportunity for this Court to confront this issue directly from a distinct perspective. The Court of Appeal had identified privacy interests as mere personal concerns that could not "without more" justify a limit on court openness (Sherman, at para. 18). This Court concluded on appeal that it was "inappropriate . . . to dismiss the public interest in protecting privacy as merely a personal concern" (para. 52), and went on to recognize that "privacy understood in relation to dignity is an important public interest for the purposes of the test" (para. 86).

s'agit d'une simple préoccupation personnelle » (par. 52), et elle a ensuite reconnu que la « vie privée considérée au regard de la dignité constitue un intérêt public important pour l'application du test » (par. 86).

[92] Of course, it is not uncommon that this Court clarifies the law in an appeal, or series of appeals heard together, and then applies that clarified law to those appeals. But the situation here is different because these parties were not heard in settling the approach taken in Sherman. That they would also not be heard on how this approach applies on the facts of their case would be fundamentally unfair to them, not to mention a disadvantage to this Court in deciding the matter. The need for these further submissions on Sherman attenuates any judicial economy that would be gained by deciding the matter here rather than remanding it below.

[93] I recognize, as the Crown argued at the hearing, that remanding the matter will prolong the period of uncertainty for the interested parties as to whether the publication ban will ultimately be set aside. It is important to remember, however, that the interested parties will continue to benefit from the publication ban they say is necessary to protect their privacy in the interim.

[93] Je reconnais, tout comme la Couronne l'a plaidé à l'audience, que le renvoi de l'affaire prolongera l'incertitude pour les parties intéressées sur la question de savoir si l'interdiction de publication finira par être annulée. Il importe toutefois de se rappeler que les parties intéressées bénéficieront toujours de l'interdiction de publication qui, à leurs dires, est essentielle à la protection de leur vie privée dans l'intervalle.

[94] This is a completely different situation from cases such as Saadati v. Moorhead, 2017 SCC 28, [2017] 1 S.C.R. 543, and Wells v. Newfoundland, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 199, where it had been approximately a decade since the impugned conduct that was the subject of the litigation and this Court had the benefit of a reasonable decision supported by the record and made by the appropriate first instance decision-maker (Saadati, at para. 45; Wells, at para. 68). In this case, the publication ban that is the subject of these proceedings was made less than three years ago and we have no decision from a first instance decision-maker on the motion, let alone a reasonable one.

[94] Il s'agit d'une situation tout à fait différente de celle qui prévalait dans des affaires comme Saadati c. Moorhead, 2017 CSC 28, [2017] 1 R.C.S. 543, et Wells c. Terre-Neuve, [1999] 3 R.C.S. 199, où il s'était écoulé environ une décennie depuis la conduite reprochée qui faisait l'objet du litige, et notre Cour avait pris connaissance d'une décision raisonnable étayée par le dossier et rendue par le décideur compétent de première instance (Saadati, par. 45; Wells, par. 68). En l'espèce, l'interdiction de publication sur laquelle porte la présente instance a été imposée il y a moins de trois ans, et aucune décision n'a été rendue en première instance sur la motion, encore moins une décision raisonnable.

[95] In the circumstances, the value of shortening this period of uncertainty does not outweigh the importance of fairness to all parties, served by ensuring the matter is decided by the appropriate first instance decision-maker and with the benefit of appropriate submissions.

[96] I would therefore allow the appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment and remand the matter to the Court of Appeal to decide the CBC's motion in accordance with these reasons (Supreme Court Act, s. 46.1).

[97] The second appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment itself presents a procedural complication. As I mentioned above, the CBC sought and was granted leave not only from the dismissal of its motion for reconsideration, but also directly from the publication ban. This is plain from the leave judgment and the parties specifically argued both appeals before this Court. That appeal raises a single remaining issue concerning the legality of the publication ban as an exception to the open court principle.

[98] In light of my conclusion that the Court of Appeal did have jurisdiction to hear the CBC's motion, I would not decide the issues raised in the appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment before the Court of Appeal has decided the motion for reconsideration. I note that appellate courts in similar circumstances have generally insisted that recourse be sought at the original court before hearing an appeal (see, e.g., Secure 2013 Group Inc. v. Tiger Calcium Services Inc., 2017 ABCA 316, 58 Alta. L.R. (6th) 209, at paras. 54-55; GEA Refrigeration, at para. 184). Similarly, in this case, it is not in the interests of justice to consider the appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment before the CBC's motion is decided, given this appeal could be rendered moot as a consequence of that proceeding. We are accordingly not in a useful or informed position to dismiss or allow the second appeal.

[98] Vu ma conclusion que la Cour d'appel avait compétence pour entendre la motion de la SRC, je ne suis pas d'avis de trancher les questions soulevées dans l'appel du jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication avant que la Cour d'appel n'ait statué sur la motion en réexamen. Je signale que les tribunaux d'appel se trouvant dans des situations semblables ont généralement insisté pour que ce type de recours soit introduit au tribunal initial avant d'entendre un appel (voir, p. ex., Secure 2013 Group Inc. c. Tiger Calcium Services Inc., 2017 ABCA 316, 58 Alta. L.R. (6th) 209, par. 54-55; GEA Refrigeration, par. 184). Pareillement, en l'espèce, il n'est pas dans l'intérêt de la justice de se pencher sur l'appel contre le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication avant qu'il ne soit statué sur la motion de la SRC, vu que cet appel pourrait devenir théorique par suite de l'instance en question. En conséquence, nous ne sommes pas en position utile ou éclairée pour rejeter ou accueillir le second appel.

[99] Nor would it be appropriate to remand this appeal in whole to the Court of Appeal. Unlike remanding the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment to the Court of Appeal to reconsider the publication ban following submissions from an affected party not given notice, which as I noted earlier is distinct from an appeal, returning the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment to the Court of Appeal would require it to sit in appeal of its own publication ban.

[100] It follows, in the unusual circumstances of this case, that the appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment should be adjourned sine die pending determination of the motion for reconsideration at the Court of Appeal (see, e.g., Canadian Planning and Design Consultants Inc. v. Libya (State), 2015 ONCA 661, 340 O.A.C. 98, at para. 61). I note that if the Court of Appeal engages with the merits of the publication ban and the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment appeal is then reopened, then those reasons will be before this Court and it will benefit from them as it decides this appeal.

[101] This Court heard appeals thus both directly from a judgment and, simultaneously, from the denial of reconsideration of that same judgment. Leave was granted from both judgments here, a fact that has created the procedural difficulty, but this difficulty is not insurmountable. Appellate courts have used the sine die adjournment to deal with appeals identified as premature due to ongoing proceedings below which ought to be completed before the appeal is heard (Libya, at para. 83; Gray v. Gray, 2017 ONCA 100, 137 O.R. (3d) 65, at para. 33; MK Engineering Inc. v. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of Alberta Appeal Board, 2014 ABCA 58, 68 Admin. L.R. (5th) 135, at para. 22; Aleong v. Aleong, 2013 BCCA 299, 340 B.C.A.C. 44, at para. 47). This is more than a procedural concern here: we cannot, in my respectful view, dismiss the second appeal now without conflating the issues at stake on reconsideration of the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment and those at play in a direct appeal of the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment.

[101] Notre Cour a donc entendu des pourvois à la fois directement à l'encontre d'un jugement et, parallèlement, contre le refus de réexaminer ce même jugement. L'autorisation d'appel a été accordée à l'égard des deux jugements en l'espèce, un fait à l'origine de la complication procédurale, mais cette complication n'est pas insurmontable. Les cours d'appel ont utilisé l'ajournement sine die pour traiter des appels jugés prématurés à la suite de l'instance en cours devant la juridiction inférieure qui devrait être menée à terme avant l'audition de l'appel (Libya, par. 83; Gray c. Gray, 2017 ONCA 100, 137 O.R. (3d) 65, par. 33; MK Engineering Inc. c. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of Alberta Appeal Board, 2014 ABCA 58, 68 Admin. L.R. (5th) 135, par. 22; Aleong c. Aleong, 2013 BCCA 299, 340 B.C.A.C. 44, par. 47). C'est plus qu'une préoccupation d'ordre procédural en l'espèce : avec égards pour l'avis contraire, j'estime que nous ne pouvons rejeter le second pourvoi sans confondre les questions en jeu dans le réexamen du jugement de 2019 sur la compétence et celles en jeu dans un appel formé directement contre le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication.

[102] Finally, even if it were appropriate for this Court to decide the reasonableness of the CBC's delay in bringing its motion, and even if its view was that the motion should have been dismissed on this basis, that conclusion alone would be insufficient to dismiss the appeal directly from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment. This Court granted leave to appeal, and an extension of time to seek leave to appeal, directly from this separate judgment. I am of the respectful view that it would be inappropriate to effectively reverse these decisions or retroactively limit their scope. If this Court sought only to dispose of the reconsideration issues raised in the appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment, it could have granted leave from that judgment alone. But it granted leave from both judgments.

[103] The CBC has not acquiesced in the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment from which it appeals directly to this Court and, with respect for other views, this second appeal has not "lost its raison d'être" (Canadian Cablesystems (Ontario) Ltd. v. Consumers' Association of Canada, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 740, at pp. 744 and 747). The question it raises is whether the publication ban should be set aside, which is an ongoing issue of live controversy between the parties, and which is distinct from the appropriateness of the reconsideration raised in the appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment. There is no basis to say this second appeal has become moot.

[104] Unlike in the first appeal bearing on the reconsideration motion, in the direct appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment there is no preliminary issue about the delay in bringing the motion, a motion that was not even filed before this judgment was rendered. The only issue in this second appeal is the validity of the final and indefinite publication ban imposed in the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment, which requires the application of the test for discretionary limits on court openness. To resolve this issue now, this Court would have to advert to and apply this test, including, with proper submissions,

[103] La SRC n'a pas acquiescé au jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication dont elle interjette appel directement à notre Cour et, malgré tout le respect que je dois à d'autres points de vue, ce second appel n'a pas « perdu sa raison d'être » (Canadian Cablesystems (Ontario) Ltd. c. Association des consommateurs du Canada, [1977] 2 R.C.S. 740, p. 744 et 747). La question que cet appel soulève est de savoir s'il y a lieu d'annuler l'interdiction de publication, un enjeu qui divise encore les parties et qui se distingue du caractère opportun du réexamen évoqué dans l'appel du jugement de 2019 sur la compétence. Il n'y a aucune raison d'affirmer que ce second appel est devenu théorique.

[104] Contrairement au premier appel portant sur la motion en réexamen, l'appel formé directement contre le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication ne soulève pas de question préliminaire au sujet du temps pris pour présenter la motion, une motion qui n'a même pas été déposée avant que ce jugement n'ait été rendu. La seule question en litige dans ce second appel est la validité de la dernière interdiction de publication, de durée indéterminée, qui a été imposée dans le jugement de 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication, ce qui nécessite l'application du test concernant les limites discrétionnaires the recent judgment of this Court in Sherman. In my respectful view, that task should not be undertaken until the motion for reconsideration is resolved by the Court of Appeal.

à la publicité des débats judiciaires. Pour résoudre cette question maintenant, notre Cour serait obligée de faire allusion à ce critère, ainsi qu'au récent jugement de notre Cour dans Sherman en disposant des observations voulues, et de les appliquer. Je suis respectueusement d'avis qu'il ne convient pas d'entreprendre cette tâche tant que la Cour d'appel n'a pas statué sur la motion en réexamen.

V. Conclusion

V. Conclusion

[105] I would allow the appeal from the 2019 Jurisdiction Judgment of the Court of Appeal, set aside that judgment, and remand the matter to that court to decide the CBC's motion in accordance with these reasons.

[105] Je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi contre le jugement sur la compétence rendu par la Cour d'appel en 2019, d'annuler ce jugement et de renvoyer l'affaire à ce tribunal pour qu'il tranche la motion de la SRC conformément aux présents motifs.

[106] I would adjourn the appeal from the 2018 Publication Ban Judgment of the Court of Appeal sine die. I would order that if no motion for directions is filed in this Court within 30 days after the date of the judgment of the Court of Appeal deciding the matter remanded to it in accordance with these reasons, the appeal will be dismissed as abandoned.

[106] Je suis d'avis d'ajourner sine die le pourvoi contre le jugement rendu par la Cour d'appel en 2018 sur l'interdiction de publication. J'ordonnerais que si aucune requête pour directives n'est déposée à notre Cour dans les 30 jours qui suivent la date du jugement de la Cour d'appel tranchant l'affaire qui lui est renvoyée conformément aux présents motifs, le pourvoi soit rejeté pour cause d'abandon.

[107] The CBC does not request costs of these appeals and I would make no order as to costs.

[107] La SRC ne demande pas l'adjudication de dépens dans les présents pourvois, et je ne rendrais aucune ordonnance concernant les dépens.

The following are the reasons delivered by Version française des motifs rendus par

[108] Abella J. (dissenting) — These appeals involve a request by a member of the media to reconsider a publication ban after the underlying proceedings have ended. While I generally agree with Justice Kasirer's analysis of the "notice" issues, I do not share his view that the appeal should be remanded to the Manitoba Court of Appeal for disposition.

[108] La juge Abella (dissidente) — Les présents pourvois concernent une demande déposée par un représentant des médias en vue de faire réexaminer une interdiction de publication après la fin de l'instance sous-jacente. Je souscris dans l'ensemble à l'analyse du juge Kasirer concernant les points relatifs aux « avis », mais je ne suis pas d'accord avec lui pour dire que l'affaire devrait être renvoyée à la Cour d'appel du Manitoba pour décision.

[109] As this Court has repeatedly stressed, the media is a crucial voice in protecting and promoting the openness of courts. That is why the media's right to challenge orders like publication bans is undisputed and why the courts have the discretion to give them

[109] Comme notre Cour l'a souligné à maintes reprises, les médias jouent un rôle crucial dans la protection et la promotion de la publicité des débats judiciaires. C'est pour cette raison que le droit des médias d'attaquer des ordonnances comme les notice of publication ban hearings. In Dagenais v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp., [1994] 3 S.C.R. 835, this Court clearly stated that members of the media are "third parties" and that notice remains "in the discretion of the judge to be exercised in accordance with the provincial rules of criminal procedure and the relevant case law" (p. 869).

interdictions de publication n'est pas contesté et que les tribunaux ont le pouvoir discrétionnaire d'aviser les médias de la tenue d'audiences sur le sujet. Dans l'arrêt Dagenais c. Société Radio-Canada, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 835, notre Cour a affirmé sans équivoque que les représentants des médias sont des « tiers » et que la notification relève « du pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge, exercé conformément aux règles de procédure provinciales en matière criminelle et à la jurisprudence pertinente » (p. 869).

[110] But once the underlying proceedings are over, the doctrine of functus officio means as a general rule that a final decision cannot be reconsidered by the court that rendered the decision. In R. v. Adams, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 707, Sopinka J. recognized that the application of functus officio is "less formalistic and more flexible" in respect of ancillary orders including publication bans (para. 29). It is therefore imperative to maintain circumscribed avenues through which the media can ask a court to reconsider a publication ban after the underlying proceedings are over.

[111] The rationales underlying the doctrine of functus officio show that it has a role to play in respect of publication ban orders, even when those orders are ancillary to the underlying proceedings. Functus officio is "commonly described as a 'rule about finality'" (A. S. P. Wong, "Doctrine of Functus Officio: The Changing Face of Finality's Old Guard" (2020), 98 Can. Bar Rev. 543, at p. 549, citing Nova Scotia Government and General Employees Union v. Capital District Health Authority (2006), 246 N.S.R. (2d) 104 (C.A.), at para. 36). As Doherty J.A. observed in Tsaoussis (Litigation Guardian of) v. Baetz (1998), 41 O.R. (3d) 257 (C.A.):

Finality is an important feature of our justice system, both to the parties involved in any specific litigation and on an institutional level to the community at large. For the parties, it is an economic and psychological necessity. For the community, it places some limitation on the economic burden each legal dispute imposes on the system and it gives decisions produced by the system an authority which they could not hope to have if they were subject to constant reassessment and variation . . . .

[TRADUCTION] Le caractère définitif d'une décision est une caractéristique importante de notre système de justice, à la fois pour les parties au litige et, au chapitre institutionnel, pour la collectivité en général. Pour les parties, il est nécessaire sur le plan économique et psychologique. Pour la collectivité, il limite en quelque sorte le fardeau économique qu'impose chaque litige au système et confère

The parties and the community require that there be a definite and discernible end to legal disputes. There must be a point at which the parties can proceed on the basis that the matter has been decided and their respective rights and obligations have been finally determined. Without a discernible end point, the parties cannot get on with the rest of their lives secure in the knowledge that the issue has finally been determined, but must suffer the considerable economic and psychological burden of indeterminate proceedings in which their respective rights and obligations are revisited and reviewed as circumstances change. [pp. 264-65]

[112] Finality is important, in part, because it provides a stable basis for an appeal (Doucet-Boudreau v. Nova Scotia (Minister of Education), [2003] 3 S.C.R. 3, at para. 79). But finality is also important because it provides economic and psychological security to parties who are dragged into the justice system, including those impacted by publication ban decisions.

[113] It has been settled since Adams that publication ban orders, which are ancillary to the underlying proceedings, "can be varied or revoked if the circumstances that were present at the time the order was made have materially changed" (para. 30; R. v. Henry (2012), 327 B.C.A.C. 190, at para. 11; British Columbia v. BCTF (2015), 75 B.C.L.R. (5th) 257 (C.A.), at para. 22). The change must "relate to a matter that justified the making of the order in the first place" and the moving party must act "at the earliest opportunity" after the change in circumstances occurs (Adams, at para. 30, citing R. v. Khela, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 201, at pp. 210-11). I agree with the majority that a material change in circumstances cannot be established in this case.

[114] In the absence of a material change, trial and appellate courts have recognized that the media are "affected by" orders relating to court openness, meaning that they can generally apply for aux décisions rendues par le système l'autorité qu'elles ne pourraient espérer détenir si elles étaient assujetties à une réévaluation et à une variation constantes. . .

Les parties et la collectivité ont besoin que les litiges aient un caractère définitif et discernable. Les parties doivent pouvoir, à un certain point, savoir que la question a été tranchée et que leurs droits et obligations respectifs ont fait l'objet d'une décision définitive. En l'absence d'une telle issue discernable, les parties ne peuvent pas avoir la certitude que la question a été tranchée définitivement; elles doivent supporter le fardeau économique et psychologique considérable d'instances de durée indéterminée où leurs droits et obligations respectifs sont réexaminés au fur et à mesure que les circonstances changent. [p. 264-265]

[113] Il est établi depuis l'arrêt Adams que les ordonnances de non-publication, qui sont accessoires à l'instance sous-jacente, « peu[vent] être modifiée[s] ou annulée[s] s'il y a eu changement important des circonstances qui existaient au moment où elle[s] [ont] été rendue[s] » (par. 30; R. c. Henry (2012), 327 B.C.A.C. 190, par. 11; British Columbia c. BCTF (2015), 75 B.C.L.R. (5th) 257 (C.A.), par. 22). Le changement doit « se rapporter à une question qui a justifié, au départ, la délivrance de l'ordonnance » et le requérant doit agir « à la première occasion » après le changement de circonstances (Adams, par. 30, citant R. c. Khela, [1995] 4 R.C.S. 201, p. 210-211). Je suis d'accord avec les juges majoritaires pour dire qu'aucun changement important de circonstances ne peut être établi en l'espèce.

reconsideration when such an order is issued without notice (see e.g. Hollinger Inc. v. The Ravelston Corp. (2008), 89 O.R. (3d) 721 (C.A.), at para. 43, and cases cited therein). As Justice Kasirer confirms, this approach applies if the media can show that their submissions are made with "due dispatch" and "prompt action", could make a material difference to the outcome and that the nature of those submissions was not originally considered by the court that issued the ban. The courts have discretion to decide whether it is in the interests of justice to reopen a publication ban under such circumstances.

publicité des débats judiciaires, ce qui signifie qu'ils peuvent généralement demander le réexamen de ces ordonnances lorsqu'elles sont délivrées sans avis (voir, p. ex., Hollinger Inc. c. The Ravelston Corp. (2008), 89 O.R. (3d) 721 (C.A.), par. 43, et les décisions qui y sont citées). Comme le confirme le juge Kasirer, cette approche s'applique si les médias peuvent démontrer que leurs observations sont présentées « avec célérité », qu'elles pourraient avoir une incidence importante sur le résultat et que la nature de leurs observations n'a pas été examinée au départ par le tribunal qui a imposé l'interdiction de publication. Dans ces circonstances, les tribunaux ont le pouvoir discrétionnaire de décider s'il est dans l'intérêt de la justice de réexaminer une interdiction de publication.

[115] These two avenues for after-the-fact media challenges to publication bans reflect the fact that the media is indispensable to court openness. But the applicable tests also take the concept of finality seriously. At a certain point, the parties are entitled to move on with their lives and to be protected from the psychological and financial costs of being dragged back into the justice system when a case is over.

[116] That is why reconsideration of a publication ban must be sought in a timely manner, and why a publication ban should not generally be reconsidered after the main proceedings have ended unless there is a sound basis for believing the media's application is in the public interest and could reasonably lead to a different result. It is a balancing exercise, not a hierarchical grid, between the interests underlying finality and the interests in support of the open court principle.

[117] In balancing these principles, and with great respect, I come to a different conclusion from the majority on whether to remand the matter to the Manitoba Court of Appeal.

2021 SCC 33 (CanLII)

[118] As noted, the CBC is unable to establish a material change in circumstances under Adams. As a result, the only basis on which it could move for reconsideration once the proceedings are over is by showing that the publication ban was issued without notice, that its submissions could make a material difference to the outcome, and that it moved for reconsideration in a timely manner. None of these conditions has been met in this case.

[118] Comme je l'ai souligné précédemment, la SRC ne peut établir en l'espèce qu'un changement important de circonstances s'est produit au sens de l'arrêt Adams. Par conséquent, la SRC ne peut demander un réexamen après la fin de l'instance que si elle démontre que l'interdiction de publication a été prononcée sans avis, que ses observations peuvent avoir une incidence importante sur le résultat et qu'elle a déposé la motion en réexamen en temps opportun. En l'espèce, aucune de ces conditions n'est remplie.

[119] To start, the CBC's argument that the publication ban was issued without notice is difficult to accept in the circumstances. At the hearing before the Manitoba Court of Appeal, counsel for the CBC candidly admitted that the CBC was reporting on the Ostrowski case throughout the course of the proceedings. And before this Court, counsel confirmed that the CBC had a representative in the courtroom when the publication ban was originally ordered on May 28, 2018. At no point in the intervening period between the original publication ban order and its continuation in the Court of Appeal's reasons of November 27, 2018 did the CBC attempt to assert its interests.

[120] In any event, it is not clear to me what further "notice" would be required in such circumstances. Courts do not issue formal invitations to their hearings — the courtroom is, and should be, open to all, including and especially the media. If the media is present in the courtroom when a publication ban is issued, it follows that it knows of its existence. That is what notice is supposed to be for.

[121] Nor has the CBC discharged its burden of showing that its proposed submissions could make a material difference in the outcome. It is well-established that courts issuing publication bans are expected to consider the importance of the open court principle, even in the absence of a media representative making submissions (R. v. Mentuck, [2001] 3 S.C.R. 442, at para. 38). There is no reason to assume that did not happen in this case. The CBC does not propose to advance a new or unique position or to introduce evidence of which the Court of Appeal was unaware. It simply wishes to argue that the open court principle outweighs the interests supporting the ban, a foundational submission that the Court of Appeal is presumed to have already considered. Furthermore, having heard the CBC's complete argument on the propriety of the publication ban in this Court, I find it difficult to see how its submissions could make a difference in the result.

n'y a aucune raison de supposer que cela ne s'est pas produit en l'espèce. La SRC ne propose pas de faire valoir une position nouvelle ou unique ni de produire des éléments de preuve dont la Cour d'appel ignorait l'existence. Elle souhaite simplement plaider que le principe de la publicité des débats judiciaires l'emporte sur les intérêts qui appuient l'interdiction, une observation de base que la Cour d'appel est présumée avoir déjà examinée. De plus, ayant entendu l'exposé complet des arguments de la SRC sur le bien-fondé de l'interdiction de publication devant notre Cour, j'ai de la difficulté à voir comment ses observations pourraient mener à un résultat différent.

[122] More significantly, and relatedly, the CBC's failure to act in a timely manner is, in my respectful view, determinative. The publication ban was originally ordered on May 28, 2018 and was continued by the Court of Appeal in its reasons for judgment on November 27, 2018. But the CBC did not file its motion for reconsideration until May 10, 2019, over five months later. And it did not file its application to this Court for leave to appeal the original publication ban until January 27, 2020, nearly two years after the ban was first imposed and well over a year after it was continued in the November 2018 reasons for judgment.

[122] Qui plus est, et dans le même ordre d'idées, le fait que la SRC a tardé à agir me paraît déterminant. La Cour d'appel a prononcé l'interdiction de publication le 28 mai 2018 et l'a reconduite dans ses motifs de jugement rendus le 27 novembre 2018. Or, la SRC n'a pas déposé sa motion en réexamen avant le 10 mai 2019, soit plus de cinq mois plus tard. De surcroît, elle n'a pas déposé sa demande d'autorisation d'appel de l'interdiction de publication initiale devant notre Cour avant le 27 janvier 2020, soit près de deux ans après l'imposition de l'interdiction et bien plus d'un an après sa reconduction dans les motifs du jugement rendus en novembre 2018.

[123] The CBC has suggested that its delay can be explained in part by its confusion as to the nature and scope of the publication ban, resulting in communications with the Court of Appeal to determine precisely what was prohibited.

[123] La SRC a laissé entendre que le délai s'expliquait en partie par le fait qu'il régnait une certaine confusion quant à la nature et à la portée de l'interdiction de publication, qui a fait en sorte que la SRC a communiqué avec la Cour d'appel pour obtenir des précisions sur ce qui était interdit.

[124] The correspondence between the CBC and the Manitoba Court of Appeal following the November 27, 2018 reasons demonstrates clearly that this is hardly a robust explanation. On November 30, 2018, the Executive Assistant to the Chief Justices and the Chief Judge informed the CBC that the media was entitled to review the material "protected by the ban on publication", but that the actual fresh evidence affidavit was not available for review because the fresh evidence was not filed with the court after the motion was dismissed. After some further clarifying correspondence, by January 21, 2019, the Registrar had spelled out in unmistakeable terms that "at the outset of proceedings on May 28, 2018, the [c]ourt imposed a publication ban preventing the publication of any of the details of the proposed fresh evidence. In paragraph 82 of the reasons, the [c]ourt ordered that the publication ban would remain in effect". Yet it took the CBC another four months to file a motion for reconsideration.

a énoncé en des termes sans équivoque que, [TRADUCTION] « au début de l'instance le 28 mai 2018, la [c]our a imposé une interdiction de publication pour empêcher la publication de tout renseignement relatif aux nouveaux éléments de preuve proposés. Au paragraphe 82 de ses motifs, la [c]our a ordonné que l'interdiction de publication demeure en vigueur. » Pourtant, il a fallu à la SRC encore quatre mois pour déposer une motion en réexamen.

[125] It is useful to put this delay in perspective by reference to some timelines provided for by Manitoba's Court of Appeal Rules, Man. Reg. 555/88R. If a party to an appeal before the court of appeal wants a rehearing before the certificate of decision has been entered, they presumptively have 30 days to file a motion after reasons for judgment are delivered (r. 46.2(4)). If the appellant fails to file its factum in accordance with the timelines set out in the rules, its appeal will be deemed to be abandoned 30 days after the appellant receives notice from the registrar (r. 33(4)). These timelines are a legislated acknowledgement of the importance of timeliness in the resolution of court cases.

[126] An unexplained six month delay for filing a motion to have a publication ban reconsidered — even a four month delay, on a charitable interpretation of when the CBC had full and complete notice of the nature of the publication ban — is inordinate. Under no definition of "due dispatch" or "prompt action" can this delay be justified, particularly since the CBC was fully aware — and present — from the outset of the proceedings, the ban, and the ban's continuation. On the other hand, the delay in this case causes acute harm to the family, who reasonably expected that their privacy and dignity interests were protected by the finality of the proceedings and that they would not be brought back to court. I see no reason to prolong their distress further.

[126] Un délai non expliqué de six mois pour déposer une motion en réexamen d'une interdiction de publication est excessif. Même un délai de quatre mois, calculé de façon indulgente à partir du moment où la SRC connaissait parfaitement et entièrement la nature de l'interdiction de publication, serait excessif. Peu importe la définition que l'on donne au concept d'agir « avec célérité », le délai ne saurait être justifié, en particulier parce que la SRC était parfaitement au courant du prononcé de l'interdiction et de sa reconduction — et qu'elle était présente — dès le début de l'instance. De plus, le délai en l'espèce cause un préjudice grave aux membres de la famille, qui s'attendaient raisonnablement à ce que leur droit au respect de la vie privée et à la dignité soit protégé par le caractère définitif de l'instance et à ce qu'ils n'aient pas à comparaître de nouveau devant le tribunal. Je ne vois aucune raison de prolonger leur détresse.

[127] While it is true that the CBC's appeal directly from the publication ban technically came to this

[127] Même s'il est vrai que le pourvoi formé par la SRC directement à l'encontre de l'interdiction de

Court on a separate application for leave to appeal from that of its appeal from the Court of Appeal's refusal to reconsider that ban, both appeals ultimately seek the same relief: that the publication ban be set aside. In the unique context of this case, it makes sense that leave was granted concurrently in both appeals since the ultimate relief sought in both was the same. Moreover, the legal question of when the media can reopen a publication ban order after the case is over raised an issue of "public importance" requiring this Court's guidance (Supreme Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. S-26, s. 40(1)).

publication est arrivé techniquement devant notre Cour dans une demande d'autorisation d'appel distincte de celle concernant le refus de la Cour d'appel de réexaminer cette interdiction, les deux pourvois visent en fin de compte à obtenir la même réparation : la levée de l'interdiction de publication. Dans le contexte unique de l'espèce, il est logique que l'autorisation des deux pourvois ait été accordée simultanément puisque la réparation demandée en fin de compte était la même. De plus, la question juridique de savoir dans quels cas les médias peuvent faire réexaminer une ordonnance de non-publication après la conclusion d'une instance revêt une « importance [. . .] pour le public » qui nécessite des directives de la part de notre Cour (Loi sur la Cour suprême, L.R.C. 1985, c. S-26, par. 40(1)).

[128] Since, in my respectful view, the CBC was not entitled to reconsideration of the publication ban as a result of its undue and unjustified delay, it would be incongruous to conclude that the impact of the CBC's delay is different for its appeal from the ban itself and for the appeal from the reconsideration motion. The reconsideration appeal is an appeal of that same ban. It would be the triumph of procedural formalism over substantive reality to pretend that these are two different and unrelated legal issues requiring separate conceptual consideration. An undue delay in one is an undue delay in the other.

[128] Étant donné qu'à mon humble avis, la SRC n'avait pas droit au réexamen de l'interdiction de publication en raison de son retard indu et injustifié à présenter sa motion, il serait incongru de conclure que l'incidence du retard de la SRC est différente dans le pourvoi qu'elle a formé contre l'interdiction en tant que telle que dans le pourvoi à l'encontre du rejet de la motion en réexamen. Le pourvoi en réexamen de l'interdiction porte sur cette même interdiction. Prétendre qu'il s'agit de deux questions juridiques distinctes qui requièrent un examen conceptuel distinct reviendrait à faire triompher le formalisme procédural sur la réalité pratique. Un retard indu dans un cas est un retard indu dans l'autre cas.

[130] This Court retains a narrow discretion to refuse to entertain the merits of an appeal even after leave has been granted. As Laskin C.J. wrote for the Court in Canadian Cablesystems (Ontario) Ltd. v. Consumers' Association of Canada, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 740,

> Although it will be rarely that this Court, leave having been granted, will thereafter refuse to entertain the appeal on the merits, its power to do so is undoubted . . . . [p. 742] party claim dismissed based on doctrine of abuse of process -- Negligence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1.

This is one of those rare cases where the interests of justice warrant a refusal to entertain the appeal on the merits.

In 1993, National Trust retained CB Inc. and L and S ("the Realtors") as its real estate agent to sell a property in Toronto. In marketing the property, the Realtors represented that the property was zoned C-1 Commercial. This representation was false because the property was subject to a site-specific zoning by-law that restricted its uses. Unaware that the representation about zoning was false, Canam Enterprises Inc. ("Canam") entered into an agreement to purchase it for a price of $1,420,000, to be paid, in part, by a mortgage back to National Trust for $1,130,000. Canam retained C as its lawyer, and the transaction closed without Canam being aware that the property was not zoned C-1 Commercial as represented. After the closing, Canam sued National Trust for a declaration that the mortgage was void because of the Realtors' misrepresentation about the zoning. National Trust counterclaimed to enforce its mortgage. In 1998, Day J. granted National Trust's motion for summary judgment dismissing Canam's claim and granting it judgment on the counterclaim. Although Day J. concluded that there had been a false representation, he held that the misrepresentation did not provide grounds to set aside the mortgage because of the doctrine of merger. Canam then sued C for professional negligence, which he denied, pleading that under his retainer Canam was responsible for investigating zoning matters. In addition to defending, C commenced third party proceedings against the Realtors. In the third party proceedings, C did not assert any claim of his own against the Realtors but relied on the provisions of the Negligence Act to plead that the Realtors were liable to Canam. The Realtors defended and also brought fourth party proceedings against National Trust alleging that if they provided false information, it had been obtained from National Trust. The Realtors then moved for a summary judgment dismissing C's third party claim based on the defences of res judicata, issue estoppel and abuse of process because of the judgment of Day J. National Trust also moved for a summary judgment dismissing both the third party claim against the Realtors and the fourth party claim against it on the same grounds. For the purpose of the motion, the parties agreed that the facts pleaded were true and that they gave rise to a cause of action. Nordheimer J. granted both motions and dismissed the third and fourth party claims on the basis that they were barred by issue estoppel or, alternatively, that they constituted an abuse of process. C appealed and sought an order setting aside the dismissal of his third party claim against the Realtors.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Per Finlayson J.A. (Weiler J.A. concurring): The result below was correct, and the appeal should be dismissed based on the doctrine of abuse of process but not based upon the principle of res judicata, of which issue estoppel is one aspect. The requirements of issue estoppel are: (1) that the same question has been previously decided; (2) that the judicial decision which is said to create the estoppel was final; and (3) that the parties to the judicial decision or their privies were the same persons as the parties to the proceedings in which the estoppel is raised or their privies. On this appeal, the key question about issue estoppel was whether the appropriate parties were privies to the proceedings between Canam and National Trust. Someone who is privy in interest to a party in an action is equally bound by the final judgment in those proceedings. Here C claimed contribution under the Negligence Act and sought to add the Realtors as joint tortfeasors for the misrepresentations they made to Canam. In the prior proceeding the parties were Canam and National Trust. The Realtors were privies of National Trust, but an issue estoppel did not arise in the immediate case because it was not necessary in the mortgage action for Day J. to deal with the present assertion that had the Realtors been parties then damages could have been awarded against them. The misrepresentation issue was not disposed of in a manner that was dispositive of a claim now being asserted against the Realtors. It could hardly be said that the parties to the mortgage action had an opportunity to raise the issue of the potential liability of an entity that was not a party to the action at all. However, the court could still utilize the broader doctrine of abuse of process, which is a discretionary principle not limited by any set number of categories. It is an intangible principle that is used to bar proceedings that are inconsistent with the objectives of public policy. The Realtors could have been properly included in the mortgage proceedings. It did not lie in the mouth of a stranger to those proceedings to insist that there now be a trial as to the liability of the Realtors to Canam. To allow the defendant to retry the issue of misrepresentation would be a classic example of abuse of process and a waste of the time and resources of the litigants and the court.

Per Goudge J.A. (dissenting): The third party proceeding ought not to have been dismissed on the basis of either issue estoppel or the doctrine of abuse of process. The same issue requirement of issue estoppel was not met. The issue in the third party proceeding was whether the Realtors owed a duty of care to Canam which was breached by the misrepresentation concerning zoning. That duty was not a part of the proceedings before Day J., which dealt with whether the contractual rights of National Trust were voided by the misrepresentation made on its behalf. Given this finding, it was unnecessary to deal with the same parties requirement of issue estoppel, but if one were to address this requirement, having due regard to the subject matter of the dispute before Day J., it would not appear that one could find the privity of interest between C or Canam or between the Realtors and National Trust. As for the doctrine of abuse of process, it engages the inherent power of the court to prevent the misuse of its procedure, in a way that would be manifestly unfair to a party to the litigation before it or that would in some other way bring the administration of justice into disrepute. One circumstance where the doctrine is applied is where the litigation before the court is found in essence to be an attempt to relitigate a claim that the court has already determined. There was, however, no relitigation in the immediate case. The third party proceeding was the first time that the Realtors would have to respond to the assertion that they breached their duty to Canam. The third party claim raised an issue not previously litigated. It was not manifestly unfair to allow C to bring the claim or to require the Realtors to defend it. There was no abuse of process.

APPEAL from an order of Nordheimer J. (2000), 47 O.R. (3d) 446 (S.C.J.) dismissing a third party and a fourth party claim.

Christine Innes, for respondent.
V.A. Edwards and J. Sebastian Winny, for appellant.
Jeffrey S. Klein, for third parties respondents.
Mark Hartman, for fourth party respondent, National Trust Company of Canada.

[1] FINLAYSON J.A. (WEILER J. concurring): -- The defendant in the main action, Alan H. Coles ("Coles"), appeals from the summary judgment of The Honourable Mr. Justice Nordheimer dated March 2, 2000. The motions judge granted motions by the third parties, CB Commercial Real Estate Group Canada Inc., Kevin W. Leon and Peter D. Senst (the "Realtors") and the fourth party,

2000 CanLII 8514 (ON CA)

National Trust Company of Canada ("National Trust"), and dismissed both the third and fourth party claims on the basis that they were barred by issue estoppel or, alternatively, that they constituted an abuse of process. Coles seeks an order setting aside the dismissal of his third party claim against the Realtors. There is no appeal from the dismissal of the fourth party claim by either Coles or the plaintiff Canam.

Facts

The original real estate transaction

[2] Pursuant to an agreement of purchase and sale dated March 5, 1993, Canam Enterprises Inc. ("Canam") agreed to purchase 200 Finch Avenue West in Toronto ("the property") from National Trust pursuant to a power of sale. The purchase price of the property was $1,420,000. Canam provided a down payment of $290,000, and National Trust agreed to take back a mortgage of $1,130,000 to secure the balance of the purchase price.

[3] The Realtors acted as listing agents for National Trust. They prepared and circulated advertising material which represented the zoning of the property as C-1 Commercial. The advertisement specifically detailed potential retail uses of the property.

[4] The agreement of purchase and sale also stipulated that the zoning of the property was C-1 Commercial. It contained a requisition period that gave Canam the right to make requisitions as to title and other matters. Canam's solicitor on the transaction, Coles, requisitioned evidence that C-1 Commercial use could be lawfully continued. National Trust's solicitors responded with what has been described as "the usual satisfy yourself reply".

[5] When the transaction closed on June 29, 1993, the property was subject to a site-specific zoning by-law which restricted it to "professional office" use. Canam alleges that as a result of these use restrictions, it has suffered significant financial losses, including losses arising from defaulting on the vendor take-back mortgage to National Trust.

The prior proceeding (the "Mortgage Action")

[6] Following Canam's default under the mortgage, National Trust issued a Notice of Sale dated January 14, 1997. On August 22, 1997, Canam commenced a separate action against National Trust seeking a declaration that the mortgage was void and unenforceable because of the false representations made by the Realtors about the zoning. National Trust counter-claimed for the balance owing on its mortgage and for payment on a guarantee. In its defence to Canam's claim, National Trust took the position that the representation concerning zoning merged with the conveyance.

[7] National Trust successfully moved for summary judgment on its counterclaim and for dismissal of Canam's claim before Day J. on April 20, 1998. Summary judgment was granted on that date, with oral reasons released December 23, 1998 [reported 22 R.P.R. (3d) 129]. In his reasons for judgment, Day J. concluded that false representations were made concerning zoning on behalf of National Trust. He then examined the doctrine of merger in the context of the requisition period contained in the agreement of purchase and sale. He concluded [at p. 135]: "From the broad considerations it appears that the defence of Canam as to misrepresentation will not apply so as to set aside the contract."

Nature of the present action

[8] Following receipt of the Notice of Sale, Canam commenced this action against its former solicitor, Coles, by statement of claim issued June 17, 1997. Canam claimed damages for alleged negligence in relation to the zoning restrictions on the property that it purchased. Canam pleaded that Coles failed to warn it of the site-specific by-law restricting the use of the property.

[9] Coles denied any negligence or breach of contract. He pleaded that his retainer with Canam was expressly limited to exclude zoning inquiries, and that Canam was responsible for investigating zoning matters.

[10] Coles commenced a third party claim for contribution or indemnity against the Realtors who listed the property and represented it as being zoned C-1 Commercial. Coles alleged that the Realtors knew or ought to have known of the true zoning of the property, failed to take steps to verify the correct zoning, and breached their professional duty to Canam, including a fiduciary duty to Canam, in failing to ascertain and disclose the restricted zoning by-law. Coles pleads and relies on the provisions of the Negligence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1.

[11] The Realtors have defended both the main action and the third party claim, in part with a defence of res judicata based on the disposition of the Mortgage Action. The Realtors also commenced a fourth party claim for contribution or indemnity against National Trust, for whom they acted as a selling agent and broker. The fourth party claim against National Trust pleads that if the Realtors provided false information to Canam, they obtained it from National Trust, who should accordingly be liable to the Realtors in negligence. The Realtors' allegations against National Trust are not framed as a joint tortfeasor claim.

[12] National Trust has defended the main action, the third party claim and the fourth party claim, and has raised the plea of res judicata and abuse of process based on the disposition of the Mortgage Action. The remaining fourth parties have not defended the proceeding.

Motions before Nordheimer J.

[13] National Trust moved for summary judgment dismissing both the third party claim against the Realtors and the fourth party claim against National Trust based on the defences of issue estoppel and abuse of process. The Realtors also brought a motion for summary judgment dismissing the third party claim based on the defences of issue estoppel and abuse of process.

[14] On the motions for summary judgment before Nordheimer J., the parties agreed that for the purpose of the motions, the facts set out in both the third party and fourth party claims were true and gave rise to a cause of action. The only issue to be determined on the motions was whether, by virtue of the judgment of Day J., the third and fourth party claims should be dismissed on the basis of issue estoppel, res judicata, or abuse of process.

Reasons of the motions judge

[15] Nordheimer J. granted the motions of the third and fourth parties in his reasons reported at 47 O.R. (3d) 446. He dismissed the third and fourth party claims, with costs of both claims payable by Coles.

[16] The motions judge referred to the relevant authorities on the issues of cause of action estoppel, issue estoppel and abuse of process. He found primarily that issue estoppel applied to the third party proceedings and in the alternative that they were an abuse of process.

[17] With respect to the false representations made about the zoning possibilities, the motions judge clarified that Coles was not asserting any independent liability claims. All of the liability alleged in the third and fourth party claims arising from the false representations involved liability to Canam alone. The motions judge went on to find that issue estoppel applied. He found that Day J.'s decision on the matter was final. He also found that the issue regarding the legal consequences of the false representations made to Canam was a fundamental part of Day J.'s decision. The motions judge then concluded at paras. 19 and 20 [p. 453 O.R.]:

> The fundamental issue determined by Mr. Justice Day is whether, in all of the circumstances, the transaction could be rescinded, or liability on the mortgage avoided, by Canam based on the false representations. The source of those representations was not the issue. The fact of the representations being false, and the fact that they were made by others on behalf of National Trust, was accepted by Mr. Justice Day. He concluded, regardless of those facts, that the transaction could not be avoided by Canam. In my view, that is a complete answer to whether Canam could now claim any relief surrounding these representations -- it could not. Put another way, the decision of Mr. Justice Day clearly determined that there was no liability of National Trust to Canam arising from the false representations.

It follows from that conclusion that it is not open to Coles to indirectly advance such a claim on behalf of Canam because, in the end result, it would still involve a re-litigation of the same question -- a situation which the principle of res judicata is designed to prevent. . . .

[18] The motions judge proceeded to the privity of interest requirement for the application of issue estoppel. Here, the motions judge concluded that Coles, as a solicitor, was a privy of his client, Canam.

Analysis

Issue estoppel

[19] The principle of res judicata applies where a judgment rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction provides a conclusive disposition of the merits of the case and acts as an absolute bar to any subsequent proceedings involving the same claim, demand or cause of action. Issue estoppel is one aspect of res judicata. The oft-cited requirements of issue estoppel are attributed to Lord Guest in Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung v. Rayner & Keeler Ltd. (No. 2), [1967] 1 A.C. 853 at p. 935, [1966] 2 All E.R. 536 (H.L.): (1) that the same question has been previously decided; (2) that the judicial decision which is said to create the estoppel was final; and (3) that the parties to the judicial decision or their privies were the same persons as the parties to the proceedings in which the estoppel is raised or their privies.

[20] The key issue raised in this court is whether the appropriate parties were privy to the proceedings between Canam and National Trust so that the doctrine of issue estoppel applies to prevent the third party claim by Coles against the Realtors. I agree with the result arrived at by the motions judge, but for different reasons.

[21] The issues of identity of subject matter and identity of parties had to be resolved by the motions judge. The latter issue, also referred to as privity, is treated identically under the doctrine of res judicata whether the claim is cause of action estoppel or issue estoppel. Someone who is privy in interest to a party in an action is equally bound by the final judgment in those proceedings. Thus, where a party to the prior proceeding is clearly and sufficiently identified with a non-party to the litigation, the doctrine of res judicata may be applied: Gleeson v. J. Wippell & Co. Ltd., [1977] 3 All E.R. 54 at p. 60, [1977] 1 W.L.R. 510 (Ch. D.).

Privity of interest

[22] Privity between an agent and a principal will be based on privity of interest. This matter was considered by Megarry V.-C. in Gleeson at p. 60: "it seems to me that the substratum of the doctrine is that a man ought not to be allowed to litigate a second time what has already been decided between himself and the other party to the litigation. This is in the interest both of the successful party and of the public. . . . It is in that sense that I would regard the phrase 'privity of interest'."

[23] In Carl-Zeiss-Stiftung at p. 566, Lord Guest had this to say of privies: "There is a dearth of authority in England on the question of privies. . . . 'Privies' have been described as those who are 'privy to the party in estate or interest'. . . . Before a person can be privy to a party there must be community or privity of interest between them." Lord Reid made a similar comment in that decision at p. 550: "It has always been said that there must be privity of blood, title or interest: here it would have to be privity of interest. That can arise in many ways, but it seems to me to be essential that [there be] some kind of interest in the previous litigation or its subject-matter." Thus, in the case of an agent and principal, their mutual interest in the outcome of the lawsuit will make the agent a privy to the principal -- a necessary element for the application of issue estoppel.

[24] The motions judge found that Cole was a privy of Canam in the prior proceeding between Canam and National Trust because he was Canam's solicitor. This finding seems to me to illustrate a misconception of the interaction between the various proceedings. Canam responded to the Notice of Sale of National Trust by instituting an action against National Trust for a declaration that the mortgage that authorized the Notice was void and unenforceable by virtue of false representations as to the nature of the zoning emanating from National Trust and conveyed to Canam by the Realtors. Canam did not sue the Realtors, who had acted as the agents of National Trust in conveying these alleged misrepresentations to it, and does not propose to sue them now.

[25] In the present action, Canam is suing Coles for negligence for not advising it of the true nature of the zoning. Coles, for his part, does not say he relied on the representations of National Trust (or the Realtors) in not advising Canam of the state of the zoning. Rather, he states that his retainer did not require him to give such advice. He is not attempting to excuse his tort of negligence by stating that he relied upon the representations of the Realtors. He seeks to add the Realtors as joint tortfeasors for their misrepresentations to Canam and claims contribution under the Negligence Act.

[26] The issue before the motions judge and this court became whether Coles was estopped, or barred by the doctrine of abuse of process, from raising as between Canam and the Realtors the issue of whether Canam was relieved of liability under the mortgage to National Trust because Canam relied on the zoning representations conveyed to it through National Trust's agents, the Realtors. If my assessment of the situation is correct, the issue is not whether Coles was a privy of Canam, but whether the Realtors were privies of National Trust. Instead of looking at the relationship between the solicitor Cole and his client, the plaintiff, Canam, we should look to the relationship between the third party Realtors and the defendant in the Mortgage Action, National Trust. The Realtors should take the position that Canam could have sued them in the Mortgage Action as agents of National Trust for the same misrepresentations that it alleged against National Trust and did not do so. Since the Mortgage Action involving th ese allegations of misrepresentation was resolved adversely to Canam, it follows that the issue of the validity of the real estate transaction is res judicata between Canam and National Trust, and issue estoppel applies as between Canam and the Realtors as privies to National Trust.

[27] I am satisfied that the Realtors are privies of National Trust, but I am having some difficulty in applying issue estoppel in this case. The summary judgment judge in the Mortgage Action found that false representations had been made that were attributable to National Trust but that no remedy was available to Canam because the representations complained of had merged in the closing of the original real estate transaction. Because it was not required of him, he did not deal with the present assertion that had the Realtors been parties to the Mortgage Action, he could have awarded damages against them in favour of National Trust. Accordingly, I am concerned that the misrepresentation issue was disposed of in a manner that may not be dispositive if the action was against the Realtors as well as National Trust.

[28] In deciding the application of issue estoppel, it is necessary to consider the context and rationale behind the doctrine of res judicata. As was stated by Ritchie J. in Fenerty v. Halifax (City) (1920), 53 N.S.R. 457 at p. 463, 50 D.L.R. 435 (S.C.):

> The doctrine of res judicata is founded on public policy so that there may be an end of litigation, and also to prevent the hardship to the individual of being twice vexed for the same cause. The rule which I deduce from the authorities is that a judgment between the same parties is final and conclusive, not only as to the matters dealt with, but also as to questions which the parties had an opportunity of raising. . . .

[29] Additional clarification for the application of "issue estoppel" was provided by Dickson J. in Angle v. Minister of

National Revenue (1974), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 248 at p. 255, 47 D.L.R. (3d) 544 at pp. 555-56: "It will not suffice if the question arose collaterally or incidentally in the earlier proceedings or is one which must be inferred by argument from the judgment. . . . The question out of which the estoppel is said to arise must have been 'fundamental to the decision arrived at' in the earlier proceedings." (Emphasis added)

[30] It can hardly be said in this case that the parties to the Mortgage Action had an opportunity to raise the issue of the potential liability of an entity that was not a party to the action at all. Additionally, while the decision that the misrepresentation merged in the conveyance was fundamental to the decision that it could not affect the validity of the mortgage that was being enforced, I am not altogether sure that merger would be a defence to the agents of the National Trust in an action against them in damages. Certainly, the point was never raised because it was irrelevant to the proceedings as framed.

Abuse of process

[31] However, we are not limited in this case to the application of issue estoppel. The court can still utilize the broader doctrine of abuse of process. Abuse of process is a discretionary principle that is not limited by any set number of categories. It is an intangible principle that is used to bar proceedings that are inconsistent with the objectives of public policy. The doctrine can be relied upon by persons who were not parties to the previous litigation but who claim that if they were going to be sued they should have been sued in the previous litigation. This was the case in M.C.C. Proceeds Inc. v. Lehman Brothers International (Europe), [1998] 4 All E.R. 675 (C.A.), where the second claim was against a wholly owned subsidiary of the defendant in the first claim. Similarly, in Solomon v. Smith (1987), [1988] 1 W.W.R. 410 at pp. 419-20, 45 D.L.R. (4th) 266 (Man. C.A.), the purchaser unsuccessfully sued the vendor and was seeking to sue the vendor's agent. The court found that a llowing the second action to proceed would amount to an abuse of process.

2000 CanLII 8514 (ON CA)

[32] Although there are no cases directly on point in this jurisdiction, the general principles of abuse of process dictate that the agent in this case should not be required to defend a cause of action previously litigated. The safest question to ask is whether the same evidence is needed to support the issues in both cases. It would seem that the evidence would be the same: the same evidence will be presented to show that a negligent representation was made and the same evidence will be used to show that the plaintiff relied upon the representations to his detriment.

[33] Unless there is new evidence, special circumstances or equitable reasons, then Coles should not be entitled to raise a second cause of action, identical in merit, against an agent who was a privy to the initial proceeding. The Realtors could have been properly included in the initial proceeding. There could be any number of reasons why Canam did not do so, but it hardly lies in the mouth of a stranger to those proceedings to insist constructively that there now be a trial as to the liability of the Realtors to Canam.

[34] Maintaining open and ready access to the courts by all legitimate suitors is fundamental to our system of justice. However, to achieve this worthy purpose, the courts must be vigilant to ensure that our system does not become clogged with unnecessary, repetitious litigation. To allow the defendant to retry the issue of misrepresentation would be a classic example of abuse of process and a waste of the time and resources of the litigants and the court. The retrying of the issues in this case would also erode the principle of finality that is crucial to the proper administration of justice. Thus, where agents as third parties must raise a defence to issues that are identical to those in a prior proceeding against their principal, the court is entitled to exercise its discretion and terminate the third party proceedings (and in this case the fourth party) as an abuse of process.

Disposition

[35] Accordingly, for the reasons set out above, I would dismiss the appeal with costs payable by the appellant to the respondents on a party and party basis.

[36] GOUDGE J.A. (dissenting): -- I have had the benefit of reading the reasons for judgment of my colleague Finlayson J.A. I agree with him that Nordheimer J. ought not to have dismissed the third party claim on the basis of issue estoppel. However, I disagree that this conclusion was properly reached on the basis of the doctrine of abuse of process. For the reasons that follow I would allow the appeal and dismiss the motion for summary judgment seeking to dismiss the third party claim.

[37] The facts are well described in my colleague's reasons for judgment. For my purposes I need only highlight a few of them.

[38] The third party claim is brought by the defendant in the main action, Alan H. Coles ("Coles"). It seeks relief against CB Commercial Real Estate Group Canada Inc., Kevin W. Leon and Peter D. Senst (the "Realtors").

[39] Coles acted as the solicitor for the plaintiff Canam Enterprises Inc. ("Canam") when it purchased 200 Finch Avenue West in Toronto from National Trust Company of Canada ("National Trust"). The Realtors acted as real estate agents for National Trust on the transaction.

[40] In the main action, Canam sues Coles for professional negligence, pleading that Coles failed to warn it of the zoning restriction on the use of the property. Those restrictions, which prevented the property from being put to retail use, caused Canam significant harm.

[41] In the third party claim, Coles seeks contribution from the Realtors pursuant to the provisions of the Negligence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. N.1. Coles pleads that the Realtors had a duty of care or even a fiduciary duty to Canam. The Realtors breached this duty by representing to Canam that the property could lawfully be put to retail use when they knew or ought to have known that this representation was false. Coles pleads that Canam relied on this representation in agreeing to purchase the property and that the Realtors are liable in damages to Canam for the harm caused by this misrepresentation.

[42] On the motion for summary judgment to dismiss the third party claim, the parties agreed that for the purposes of the motion the facts pleaded were true and gave rise to a cause of action.

Issue Estoppel

[43] The doctrine of issue estoppel prevents a party from relitigating an issue already decided in an earlier proceeding. The three requirements of the doctrine are well settled. They are (a) that the prior proceeding must have decided the same question as is in issue in the subsequent proceeding; (b) that the decision said to create the estoppel be judicial and final; and (c) that the parties to the earlier decision be either the same as, or the privies of, the parties in the subsequent proceeding.

[44] The question is whether the prior decision of Day J. triggers the application of this doctrine to the third party claim. In the prior proceeding Canam sought a declaration that the mortgage taken back by National Trust when it sold the property to Canam was void because the purchaser was induced to enter the contract by the misrepresentation of the vendor as to the use of the property allowed by its zoning. National Trust counterclaimed for the balance owing on the mortgage.

[45] In his reasons for judgment, Day J. dismissed Canam's claim and allowed National Trust's counterclaim. He found that the representation about zoning was made on behalf of National Trust by the Realtors and that the representation was false. However, he concluded that the misrepresentation did not entitle Canam to set aside the mortgage contract because of the doctrine of merger.

[46] In these circumstances, there is no doubt that the decision of Day J. was judicial and final.

[47] However, like Finlayson J.A., I do not think that the "same issue" requirement of issue estoppel is met. As this court said in Heynen & Frito Lay Canada Ltd. (1999), 45 O.R. (3d) 776, 179 D.L.R. (4th) 317, this determination depends on a careful analysis of both the factual context and the legal question addressed in the earlier proceeding. This allows the specific issue determined in the earlier proceeding to be identified and compared to the issue to be resolved in the subsequent proceeding. This reflects "the fastidious approach" that the courts have taken to the "same question" test that was described by Morden A.C.J.O. in Rasanen v. Rosemount Instruments Ltd. (1994), 17 O.R. (3d) 267 at p. 294, 112 D.L.R. (4th) 683 (C.A.).

[48] The issue in the third party claim is whether the Realtors owed a duty of care to Canam which was breached by the misrepresentation concerning zoning. This duty is separate from and not derived from the contractual relationship between Canam and National Trust. It depends on the nature of the direct relationship between Canam and the Realtors. This duty was not part of the proceedings before Day J., which dealt with whether the contractual rights of National Trust were voided by the misrepresentation made on its behalf.

[49] As Finlayson J.A. writes, it can hardly be said that the parties before Day J. had the opportunity to raise the issue of the potential liability of the Realtors, who were not a party to that action at all. While the legal consequence for National Trust of the false representation made to Canam was fundamental to the decision of Day J., the legal consequence for the Realtors of making that false representation was not before him. In the language of Angle v. Minister of National Revenue (1974), [1975] 2 S.C.R. 248, 47 D.L.R. (3d) 544, quoted by my colleague, the question of whether the Realtors had an independent duty of care to Canam was not "fundamental to the decision arrived at" by Day J. The "same issue" requirement of issue estoppel is therefore not met.

[50] Given this finding, it is unnecessary to deal with "the same parties" requirement of issue estoppel. Indeed where, as here, the question is whether they are "privies", this inquiry may be impossible to answer if the two proceedings do not raise the same question. The measure of whether the parties are the privies of those in the earlier proceeding would seem to require that the same question be involved in both proceedings, that is, that the subject matter of both disputes be the same. This is implicit in Gleeson v. J. Wippell & Co. Ltd., [1977] 3 All E.R. 54 at p. 60, [1977] 1 W.L.R. 510 (Ch. D.), where Vice-Chancellor Megarry said:

> I do not say that one must be the alter ego of the other: but it does seem to me that, having due regard to the subject-matter of the dispute, there must be a sufficient degree of identification between the two to make it just to hold that the decision to which one was party should be binding in proceedings to which the other is party. It is in that sense that I would regard the phrase 'privity of interest.'

[51] Even if one were to address the "same parties" requirement having due regard only to the subject matter of the dispute before Day J., I do not think one could find the privity of interest between Coles and Canam or between the Realtors and National Trust.

[52] The subject matter of the dispute before Day J. was the contractual right of National Trust and the corresponding contractual obligation of Canam under the mortgage. Coles has no identification of interest with Canam having regard to this subject matter. He was simply its lawyer. Canam's contract with National Trust does not reach him.

[53] In the same way, having regard to this subject matter, the Realtors have no identification of interest with National Trust. The contract between Canam and National Trust does not affect them at all. In Solomon v. Smith (1987), 45 D.L.R. (4th) 266, [1988] 1 W.W.R. 410, the Manitoba Court of Appeal reached just such a conclusion. It found that where a purchaser had unsuccessfully sued a vendor seeking to avoid the transaction because of a misrepresentation, the purchaser's subsequent action in tort against the vendor's agent based on the same misrepresentation was not against the same party or its privy.

[54] In summary, therefore, it is my view that the first requirement of issue estoppel is not met in this case, and the third requirement is probably not met as well. I agree with my colleague that the third party claim ought not to have been dismissed on the basis of issue estoppel.

Abuse of Process

[55] The doctrine of abuse of process engages the inherent power of the court to prevent the misuse of its procedure, in a way that would be manifestly unfair to a party to the litigation before it or would in some other way bring the administration of justice into disrepute. It is a flexible doctrine unencumbered by the specific requirements of concepts such as issue estoppel. See House of Spring Gardens Ltd. v. Waite, [1990] 3 W.L.R. 347 at p. 358, [1990] 2 All E.R. 990 (C.A.).

[56] One circumstance in which abuse of process has been applied is where the litigation before the court is found to be in essence an attempt to relitigate a claim which the court has already determined. See Solomon v. Smith, supra. It is on that basis that Nordheimer J. found that this third party claim ought to be terminated as an abuse of process.

[57] I would disagree. As I have attempted to indicate, the issue in the third party claim is different from the issue already determined by Day J. The duty of care owed by the Realtors to Canam was simply not before Day J. This is not the relitigation of an issue already decided by the court. Hence, in my view, Nordheimer J. built his conclusion of an abuse of process on an erroneous foundation.

[58] This issue can be addressed by looking not just at the claim but also at the party bringing it. Here it cannot be said that the third party claim is an attempt by Coles to relitigate a claim which he has previously raised but lost. Coles has not raised this issue before in any legal proceeding. Nor could Coles have forced Canam to raise this issue and sue the Realtors in the action in contrast against National Trust before Day J. Coles has not had his day in court on this issue.

[59] Equally this issue can be examined from the perspective of the party required to defend the claim. Here, it cannot be said that the third party claim forces the Realtors to relitigate a claim which [they have] already successfully resisted. The Realtors have not previously been required to defend this or any other claim by either Canam or Coles.

[60] Although this is the first time that the Realtors have had to respond to the assertion that they breached their duty to Canam by making the negligent misrepresentation, they say it is manifestly unfair to require them to do so because of a prior proceeding in which it was found that on behalf of National Trust they knowingly made this false representation. I do not find this persuasive. The prior proceeding did not vindicate their conduct in the slightest, but rather found that the Realtors had made the false representation. This prior finding hardly makes it unfair that they now must defend the third party claim.

[61] In summary, the third party claim raises an issue not previously litigated. It is not manifestly unfair to allow Coles to bring the claim or to require the Realtors to defend it. In my view, it is not an abuse of process.

[62] I would therefore allow the appeal with costs payable by the third party. I would set aside the order below and order that the motion for summary judgment in the third party claim be dismissed with costs payable by the third party.

Appeal dismissed with costs.

On appeal from the judgment of Justice James A. S. Wilcox of the Superior Court of Justice, dated September 4, 2019, with reasons reported at 2019 ONSC 5143.

Hourigan J.A.:

I. INTRODUCTION

[1] This is an appeal of the dismissal of a medical malpractice claim. The trial's focus was whether the respondent, Ljudmilla Jefremova, breached the standard of care of a reasonable and prudent doctor when she treated Penny-Lee Champoux.

The trial judge found that Dr. Jefremova met that standard of care and dismissed the claim in its entirety.

[2] Two issues are raised on the appeal: (i) whether the trial judge's reasons are insufficient to permit appellate review; and (ii) whether the trial judge erred in his consideration of a Response to Request to Admit filed by counsel for Dr. Jefremova.

[3] As will be explained below, I have concluded that the judgment must be set aside and a new trial ordered. I accept the argument advanced by Ms. Champoux that the trial judge failed in his reasons to analyze essential components of her theory of liability and explain why he found that Dr. Jefremova did not breach the standard of care. Consequently, the trial judge's reasons do not permit appellate review. Regarding the analysis of the Response to Request to Admit, the trial judge issued contradictory reasons about the central issue of whether it constituted an accurate admission. This resulted in an unfair trial for Ms. Champoux and also warrants a new trial.

II. FACTS

[4] Given that I would order a new trial, only a brief recitation of the facts is necessary to put the grounds of appeal in context.

[5] Ms. Champoux attended Kirkland Lake Hospital's emergency department on June 29, 2012, intending to seek treatment for an abscess on her buttocks area and hyperglycemia, as she could not get her high blood sugars under control. She has various underlying health problems, including diabetes, PTSD, and fibromyalgia. At the emergency department, a nurse triaged Ms. Champoux, took her vital signs and did a blood sugar reading.

[6] Dr. Jefremova then examined Ms. Champoux and noted that her heart rate was elevated and that her blood sugar level was 11.6. However, prior hospital records indicated that Ms. Champoux's heart rate was always elevated without cardiac issues and that her normal glucose level was between 8 and 12.5. Dr. Jefremova assessed the abscess, decided it was not yet ready to break, and sent Ms. Champoux home.

[7] Ms. Champoux returned to the emergency department on July 2, 2012, because her abscess had grown rapidly, and her blood sugar was higher. She was admitted for surgery to drain the abscess and discharged on July 13, 2012. Ms. Champoux was re-admitted to the hospital several times afterward to deal with abscess drainage.

[9] In his reasons for decision, the trial judge reviewed the evidence of Ms. Champoux, her mother-in-law, Dr. Jefremova, and two experts (Dr. Fernandes, who testified for Ms. Champoux, and Dr. McMurray, who testified for Dr. Jefremova), and documents related to the medical events. The evidence focused on whether Dr. Jefremova breached the standard of care of a reasonable and prudent doctor in her treatment of Ms. Champoux on June 29, 2012.

[10] The location of the abscess was an important issue because the standard of care differs based on whether the abscess was a simple buttocks abscess, as opposed to a perianal, ischiorectal, or anorectal abscess. On the issue of the location of the abscess, a Request to Admit served by Ms. Champoux's counsel became significant at trial. It was served on Dr. Jefremova's counsel on September 19, 2018. Among other things, Ms. Champoux requested that Dr. Jefremova admit that "[o]n June 29, 2012, Penny Lee Champoux had a perianal abscess."

[11] On October 9, 2018, a Response to Request to Admit was delivered by counsel for Dr. Jefremova. Among other refusals, Dr. Jefremova's counsel refused to admit that "[o]n June 29, 2012, Penny Lee Champoux had a perianal abscess". In the reason for this refusal, Dr. Jefremova's counsel stated that "[o]n June 29, 2012, Penny Lee Champoux presented with a buttock abscess/swollen nodule in the general perianal area."

[12] At trial, Ms. Champoux's counsel closed his case on December 12, 2018, without referring to the Request to Admit. It was entered as exhibit 9 on December 14, 2018, as part of a package that included the Request to Admit, the Response to Request to Admit, and a document entitled "Admissions Made by the Defendant Jefromova" [sic].

[13] Dr. McMurray's evidence in chief was that Ms. Champoux suffered from a simple buttock abscess and that Dr. Jefremova had met the standard of care. In cross-examination, Ms. Champoux's counsel put to Dr. McMurray that Dr. Jefremova had formally admitted that "on June 29 the abscess was in the general perianal area or region". Dr. McMurray opined that if it was clearly a perianal abscess or in the perianal region, Ms. Champoux should not have been sent home and the abscess should have been incised and drained right away by the emergency room physician or a surgeon.

[14] On December 15, 2018, Dr. Jefremova's counsel wrote to Ms. Champoux's counsel to advise that the Response to Request to Admit had left her office through inadvertence and without Dr. Jefremova's instructions, and to request consent to withdrawal of the admission. By email dated December 16, 2018, Ms. Champoux's counsel advised that his client would not consent to the withdrawal of the admission.

[15] Dr. Jefremova brought a motion seeking to clarify or, in the alternative, withdraw the admission contained in the Response to Request to Admit. In written reasons, the trial judge dismissed the motion to withdraw the admission. He also found that it was inappropriate at that point in the proceeding to rule on the interpretation to be given to the Response to Request to Admit. Instead, he held that the interpretation of the admission was best left for consideration after final submissions.

[16] In his reasons for decision, the trial judge considered all of the evidence and found that on June 29, 2012, Ms. Champoux had presented with an abscess located near the middle of the left buttock cheek. He concluded that Dr. Jefremova had met the standard of care based on the location of the abscess. The trial judge did not go on to consider the issues of causation or damages. The action was dismissed.

III. ANALYSIS

[17] As noted, Ms. Champoux makes two arguments on this appeal. The first is that the trial judge provided insufficient reasons. The second is that the trial judge erred in disregarding Dr. Jefremova's formal admission in determining the location of the abscess on June 29, 2012. These arguments will be considered in turn below.

2021 ONCA 92 (CanLII)

(a) Insufficient Reasons

[18] The law regarding insufficient reasons is well established. Reasons serve many functions, they: (i) justify and explain the result; (ii) tell the losing party why they lost; (iii) provide public accountability and satisfy the public that justice has been done and is seen to have been done; and (iv), permit effective appellate review: F.H. v. McDougall, 2008 SCC 53, [2008] 3 S.C.R. 41, at para. 98. Meaningful appellate review is precluded if the decision of the court below does not provide some insight into how the legal conclusion was reached and what facts were relied on in reaching that conclusion: Longo v. MacLaren Art Centre, 2014 ONCA 526, 323 O.A.C. 246, at para. 63.

[19] When reasons do not fulfill one or more of their functions, it may be necessary for the appellate court to send the matter back to the court below for a new hearing. This is hardly a desirable result, given the wasted costs of the first hearing and the delay in having the case determined on the merits. Yet sometimes, this rather drastic result is necessary to protect the judicial system's integrity.

[20] As this court observed in Gendron v. Doug C. Thompson Ltd. (Thompson Fuels), 2019 ONCA 293, 34 C.P.C. (8th) 144, at para. 93, leave to appeal refused, [2019] S.C.C.A. No. 228, the insufficient reasons ground of appeal appears with such frequency in this court that it is fast becoming a boilerplate ground of appeal. The court cautioned that the ground of appeal was being asserted in cases where there was no reasonable basis for arguing that the reasons for decision of the court below were anything other than straightforward. This is not such a case. Instead, this is a situation where the parties and the court are left to speculate on how the trial judge reached his conclusion on critical issues.

[21] The trial judge spent much of his reasons summarizing the evidence of the witnesses who testified at trial. This approach to writing reasons is often problematic. There is nothing impermissible in writing reasons this way, and it is important to capture the evidence adduced at trial. However, it is worth emphasizing that a detailed factual recitation is not a substitute for a considered analysis of the issues. What frequently happens when reasons begin with a very detailed recitation of the evidence is that when it comes time to grapple with the issues in the case, the analysis is largely conclusory. This was what happened in the case at bar.

[22] In his reasons, the trial judge concluded that the abscess was located near the middle of the plaintiff's left buttock cheek. He then went on to comment on the expert evidence at paras. 139-140:

> I was favourably impressed with Dr. McMurray's evidence and prefer it to Dr. Fernandes's. Meaning no disrespect to Dr. Fernandes who has impressive credentials, as noted above, I found Dr. McMurray's experience to be more closely related to the situation in this case. Also, I was impressed with the apparent practicality of his approach to scenarios such as the defendant was confronted with on June 29, 2012, as > compared to what I saw to be the more academic approach of Dr. Fernandes. Furthermore, I find that Dr. McMurray's initial opinion was based on the facts as found, specifically about the location of the abscess when the defendant, Dr. Jefremova, saw it on June 29, 2012.

> Consequently, I am not persuaded that the defendant Dr. Jefremova failed to meet the standard of care on June 29, 2012 and would dismiss the claim against her.

[23] As in most medical malpractice cases, the expert evidence was of significant importance. There were several areas where the experts disagreed. The trial judge was obliged to explain in some level of detail why he preferred the evidence of Dr. McMurray over Dr. Fernandes. Expressing a general preference based on a statement that he found "Dr. McMurray's experience to be more closely related to the situation in this case" does not suffice. Nor does a reference to Dr. McMurray's approach being more practical. The trial judge was obliged to weigh in on important issues, including, but not limited to:

- Was the standard of care breached when Ms. Champoux was sent home without Dr. Jefremova knowing why her heart rate was elevated and her blood sugars uncontrolled?
- Was Dr. Fernandes correct in his criticism of Dr. Jefremova when he said that she failed to undertake appropriate testing of Ms. Champoux?
- Was Dr. Fernandes correct when he opined that the standard for all abscesses is immediate incision or drainage once they are diagnosed?
- Was Dr. McMurray correct when he testified that there were two abscesses, one on the buttocks and an ischiorectal one that was discovered during surgery?

2021 ONCA 92 (CanLII)

- Why was Dr. McMurray's experience considered more applicable to the case at bar when he testified that he had never aspirated an abscess or seen it performed?
- Was the standard of care breached by Dr. Jefremova in delaying treatment?

[24] Given the failure to consider these and other key issues, the trial judge's reasons are not amenable to appellate review. Understandably, Ms. Champoux complains that the trial judge failed to engage with the crux of the case before him and, accordingly, she is unable to understand why her claim was dismissed. As an appellate court, we are also left in the dark about how the trial judge dealt with these critical issues. For this reason, I would order a new trial.

(b) Withdrawal of Admission

[25] I would also order a new trial as a result of the trial judge's treatment of the admission in the Response to Request to Admit. His analysis resulted in an unfair trial for Ms. Champoux.

[26] Before considering the trial judge's analysis, I would reject Dr. Jefremova's argument on appeal that the impugned admission in the Response to Request to Admit was not a formal admission because it was proffered in the context of a refusal. The purpose of request to admit procedures — to save time and costs by narrowing the facts in issue — would be undercut if litigants could deny a fact in a Request to Admit on the basis that an alternative set of facts is accurate, but then treat those proffered alternative facts as non-binding. That approach would obfuscate rather than clarify what facts are in issue. Further, Dr. Jefremova's counsel brought a motion to withdraw the admission after seeking Ms. Champoux's consent to the withdrawal, indicating that all parties viewed the response as a formal admission.

[27] Turning to the trial judge's analysis, in the written reasons on the motion to withdraw the admission, the trial judge stated at para. 26:

> I am not persuaded that it is appropriate at this point in the proceeding to rule on the interpretation to be given to the Response to Request to Admit. Rather, that evidence would be left for consideration after the trial submissions have been heard, if the admission still existed then. Consequently, it is necessary in the circumstances to consider the request to withdraw the admission. For this, I turn to the applicable test.

[28] The trial judge then went on to apply the test from Antipas v. Coroneos (1988), 26 C.P.C. (2d) 63 (Ont. H.C.), as recently endorsed in Liu v. The Personal Insurance Company, 2019 ONCA 104, 89 C.C.L.I. (5th) 195, at para. 13. That test directs courts to first consider whether the admission is one purely of fact, law, or mixed fact and law (since questions of law can be more easily withdrawn than questions of fact), and then apply a three-part conjunctive test regarding when an admission could be withdrawn, being:

(a) Does the proposed amendment raise a triable issue in respect to the truth of the admission?;

(b) Is there a reasonable explanation for the withdrawal, such as inadvertence or wrong instructions?; and,

(c) Has the party wishing to withdraw the admission established that the withdrawal will not result in any prejudice that cannot be compensated for in costs?

[29] The trial judge found that the admission was one of pure fact. His analysis of the triable issue factor was as follows, at para. 29:

> On the second branch, this is a medical malpractice case. The result depends on the standard of care that applies in the circumstances. Insofar as an abscess is concerned, what the standard is depends on its location and its type. The interpretation of the Response to Request to Admit is integral to determining these. The defence submitted that the admission is not incorrect, but is being misinterpreted. As I stated above, the interpretation of the admission is to be left to follow trial submissions. Therefore, I find no triable issue with respect to the truth of the admission, as contrasted with its interpretation.

[30] The trial judge noted that the test for a withdrawal of an admission was conjunctive. Therefore, he found that Dr. Jefremova had not met her onus for the withdrawal of an admission. He dismissed the motion for leave to withdraw the admission.

[31] In his reasons for decision on the trial, the trial judge reviewed the evidence regarding the location of the abscess and concluded, at para. 125, “it is asking too much in seeking to have that imprecise expression [in the Response to Request to Admit] accepted as proof on the balance of probabilities that the plaintiff presented to the ER with anything more serious than an abscess on her buttocks."

[32] I note that nowhere in his reasons on the motion or reasons for judgment does the trial judge consider the document in exhibit 9 wherein the admissions made by Dr. Jefremova are listed. Among those admissions is the following: "On June 29, 2012, Penny Lee Champoux presented with a buttock abscess/swollen nodule in the general perianal area (response to fact 10)."

[33] The problem with the trial judge's analysis is that he dismissed the motion to withdraw the admission on the basis that it was an admission of pure fact and that there was no triable issue with regard to its truth. However, in his analysis of the admission's interpretation, he proceeded to effectively conduct an analysis of the truth of the admission. Thus, the reasons on the motion and the reasons on the trial were contradictory. In the first, he concluded that there was no triable issue regarding the truth of the admission and in the second, he undertook an analysis of whether the admission was true and found that it was not true.

[34] A trial judge has the freedom to interpret what an admission means: Allto Construction Services Ltd. v. Toronto and Region Conservation Authority, 2017 ONCA 488, at para. 11. But that interpretive exercise cannot morph into an analysis of the veracity of the admission. A formal admission is not like other pieces of evidence led at trial that a judge can weigh at their discretion. A formal admission is conclusive of the matter admitted. The court is bound to act on formal admissions before it, even if other evidence contradicts the admission: Serra v. Serra, 2009 ONCA 105, 93 O.R. (3d) 161, at para. 106.

[35] In the case at bar, the trial judge weighed the admission against the other evidence led at trial and proceeded to effectively permit the withdrawal of the admission on the basis that it was not accurate. He did so despite his earlier finding that there was no triable issue in respect of the truth of the admission and his dismissal of the motion to withdraw the admission. In so doing, he ignored the issue of non-compensable prejudice to Ms. Champoux, who clearly based her trial strategy on the fact that she had this admission. In my view, his reasons effectively bypassed the rigorous test for the withdrawal of an admission and resulted in an unfair trial for Ms. Champoux. This trial unfairness requires an order for a new trial.

IV. DISPOSITION

[36] For the foregoing reasons, I would set aside the trial judge's judgment and order a new trial.

[37] Regarding the costs of the first trial and the costs of the appeal, if no agreement can be reached, I would order that: Ms. Champoux serve and file her costs submissions, including a bill of costs, within 14 days of the issuance of these reasons, Dr. Jefremova serve and file her responding costs submissions, including a bill of costs, within 10 days of the receipt of Ms. Champoux's submissions, and any reply submissions be served and filed within 7 days of the receipt of the responding submissions.

architects which went bankrupt and issued a report. Although the hearing was intended to be a practice review, the Board, in its report, made 21 findings of unprofessional conduct against the firm and six of the architects, levied fines, imposed suspensions and ordered them to pay the costs of the hearing. The Court of Queen's Bench allowed appellants' application for certiorari and quashed the Board's findings and orders. The Court of Appeal upheld the decision holding that the Board lacked jurisdiction to make findings or orders relating to disciplinary matters or costs. Under s. 39(3) of the Act, the Board is simply responsible for reporting to the Council of the Alberta Association of Architects and for making appropriate recommendations.

The Board notified the appellants that it intended to continue the original hearing to consider whether a further report should be prepared for consideration by the Council and whether the matter should be referred to the Complaint Review Committee. The Court of Queen's Bench allowed appellants' application to prohibit the Board from proceeding further in the matter. The court found that the Board had completed and fulfilled its function and that it was therefore functus officio. The Court of Appeal vacated the order of prohibition. It held that s. 39(3) of the Act and s. 11(1) of the Regulations require the Board to consider whether or not to make recommendations to the Council or the Complaint Review Committee. The Board did not do so and therefore did not exhaust its jurisdiction.

Held (La Forest and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Dickson C.J. and Wilson and Sopinka JJ.: The Board was not functus officio. As a general rule, once an administrative tribunal has reached a final decision in respect of the matter that is before it in accordance with its enabling statute, that decision cannot be revisited because the tribunal has changed its mind, made an error within jurisdiction or because there has been a change of circumstances. It can only do so if authorized by statute or if there has been a slip in drawing up the decision or there has been an error in expressing the manifest intention of the tribunal. To this extent, the principle of functus officio applies to an administrative tribunal. It is based, however, on the policy ground which favours finality of proceedings rather than on the rule which was developed with respect to formal judgments of a court whose decision was subject to a full appeal. Its application in respect to administrative tri-de réviser les pratiques d'un cabinet d'architectes en faillite et a présenté un rapport. Même si l'audience devait constituer une révision des pratiques, la Commission, dans son rapport, a tiré 21 conclusions de conduite contraire à la profession à l'encontre du cabinet et de six de ses architectes, imposé des amendes et des suspensions et leur a ordonné de payer les frais de l'audience. La Cour du Banc de la Reine a accueilli la demande de certiorari des appelants et a annulé les conclusions et ordonnances de la Commission. La Cour d'appel a confirmé la décision et a conclu que la Commission n'avait pas compétence pour formuler des conclusions ou des ordonnances en matière de discipline ou de frais. En vertu du par. 39(3) de la Loi, la Commission est tenue simplement de rendre compte au Conseil de l'Association des architectes de l'Alberta et de faire les recommandations qui s'imposent.

La Commission a avisé les appelants qu'elle avait l'intention de poursuivre l'audience initiale afin de décider s'il y aurait lieu de rédiger un nouveau rapport à l'intention du Conseil et de renvoyer toute l'affaire au Comité d'examen des plaintes. La Cour du Banc de la Reine a accueilli la demande des appelants visant à interdire à la Commission de poursuivre l'affaire. La cour a conclu que la Commission s'était acquittée de sa fonction et qu'elle était donc functus officio. La Cour d'appel a annulé l'ordonnance de prohibition. Elle a conclu que le par. 39(3) de la Loi et le par. 11(1) du Règlement imposent à la Commission l'obligation d'envisager la possibilité de faire ou non une recommandation au Conseil ou au Comité d'examen des plaintes. La Commission ne l'a pas fait et, par conséquent, elle n'a pas épuisé sa compétence.

Arrêt (les juges La Forest et L'Heureux-Dubé sont dissidents): Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Le juge en chef Dickson et les juges Wilson et Sopinka: La Commission n'est pas functus officio. En règle générale, lorsqu'un tribunal administratif a statué définitivement sur une question dont il est saisi conformément à sa loi habilitante, il ne peut revenir sur sa décision simplement parce qu'il a changé d'avis, parce qu'il a commis une erreur dans le cadre de sa compétence, ou parce que les circonstances ont changé. Il ne peut le faire que si la loi le lui permet ou si un lapsus a été commis en rédigeant la décision ou s'il y a eu une erreur dans l'expression de l'intention manifeste du tribunal. Le principe du functus officio s'applique dans cette mesure à un tribunal administratif. Cependant, il se fonde sur un motif de principe qui favorise le caractère définitif des procédures plutôt que sur la règle énoncée relativement aux jugements officiels d'une cour de justice dont la décision peut faire l'objet d'un appel bunals which are subject to appeal only on a point of law must thus be more flexible and less formalistic.

Here, the Board failed to dispose of the matter before it in a manner permitted by the Act. The Board conducted a hearing into the appellants' practices but issued findings and orders that were ultra vires. The Board erroneously thought it had the power of the Complaint Review Committee and proceeded accordingly. It did not consider making recommendations as required by the Regulations and s. 39(3) of the Act. While the Board intended to make a final disposition of the matter before it, that disposition was a nullity and amounted in law to no disposition at all. In these circumstances, the Board, which conducted a valid hearing until it came to dispose of the matter, should be entitled to continue the original proceedings to consider disposition of the matter on a proper basis. On the continuation of the original proceedings, however, either party should be allowed to supplement the evidence and make further representations which are pertinent to disposition of the matter in accordance with the Act and Regulations.

Per La Forest and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ. (dissenting): When an administrative tribunal has reached its decision, it cannot afterwards, in the absence of statutory authority, after its award except to correct clerical mistakes or errors arising from an accidental slip or omission. In this case, the Board was functus officio when it handed down its decision. Its function was completed when it rendered its final report. The fact that the original decision was wrong or made without jurisdiction is irrelevant to the issue of functus officio.

If the Board had discretion to consider making recommendations, and chose not to do so, it should be the end of the matter. There is no authority in the Act that permits the Board to change its mind on its own initiative. Furthermore, once a board acts outside its jurisdiction it should not be allowed to rectify the infirmities of its disposition according to its own predilections. Standards of consistency and finality must be preserved for the effective development of the complex administrative tribunal system in Canada. Either a board is compelled to act in a prescribed manner, or it is prohibited from so acting. Allowing the Board to reopen the hearing, without an explicit provision in the enabling statute, would create considerable confusion in the law relating to powers of administrative tribunals to rehear or redecide matters. Finally, as a general rule, a tribunal should not en bonne et due forme. Son application doit donc être plus souple et moins formaliste dans le cas des tribunaux administratifs dont les décisions ne peuvent faire l'objet d'un appel que sur une question de droit.

En l'espèce, la Commission n'a pas statué sur la question dont elle était saisie d'une manière permise par la Loi. La Commission a tenu une audience valide au sujet des pratiques des appelants, mais elle a formulé des conclusions et des ordonnances qui étaient ultra vires. Ayant cru erronément qu'elle était investie des pouvoirs du Comité d'examen des plaintes et ayant agi en conséquence, la Commission n'a pas envisagé de faire les recommandations requises par le Règlement et le par. 39(3) de la Loi. La Commission a voulu statuer sur la question de façon définitive, mais sa décision est nulle de nullité absolue, ce qui équivaut en droit à une absence totale de décision. Dans ces circonstances, la Commission, qui a tenu une audience valide jusqu'au moment de statuer sur la question, devrait pouvoir continuer les procédures initiales afin d'examiner la possibilité de trancher la question d'une façon appropriée. Cependant, à la continuation des procédures initiales, chaque partie devrait pouvoir compléter la preuve et présenter d'autres arguments pertinents aux fins de régler l'affaire conformément à la Loi et au Règlement.

Les juges La Forest et L'Heureux-Dubé (dissidents): Sans autorisation de la loi, un tribunal administratif ne peut modifier sa décision après l'avoir rendue, sauf afin de rectifier des fautes matérielles ou des erreurs imputables à un lapsus ou à une omission. En l'espèce, la Commission était functus officio lorsqu'elle a prononcé sa décision. Elle avait complété sa fonction quand elle a rendu son rapport final. Le fait que la décision initiale soit erronée ou que le tribunal ait agi sans compétence ne revêt aucune pertinence en ce qui a trait à la question du functus officio.

Si la Commission pouvait à sa discrétion envisager de faire des recommandations et qu'elle a choisi de s'en abstenir, l'affaire s'arrête là. La Loi n'autorise aucunement la Commission à changer d'avis de sa propre initiative. En outre, une fois qu'une commission excède sa compétence, elle ne devrait pas pouvoir corriger les déficiences de sa décision selon son bon vouloir. Les normes de constance, de certitude et de caractère définitif des décisions doivent être préservées si on veut assurer l'efficacité du système complexe des tribunaux administratifs au Canada. De deux choses l'une: ou bien une commission est tenue d'agir de la manière prescrite ou bien il lui est interdit d'agir. Permettre à la Commission de rouvrir l'audition, sans que la loi habilitante ne le prévoie expressément, serait de nature à créer une confusion considérable dans le droit en ce qui concerne les be allowed to reserve the exercise of its remaining powers for a later date. The Board could not attempt to retain jurisdiction to make recommendations once it had made a final order, as the parties would never have the security of knowing that the decision rendered has finally determined their respective rights in the matter.

If the Board had a duty to consider making recommendations which it failed to fulfill, it could, depending on the circumstances of the case, be directed to review the entire matter afresh, and could be required to conduct a new hearing. Any re-examination, however, should not be construed as a "continuation of the Board's original proceedings". It would set a dangerous precedent in expanding the powers of administrative tribunals beyond the wording or intent of the enabling statute. It would also erode the protection of fairness and natural justice which is expected of administrative tribunals. In the particular circumstances of this case, a rehearing would not be appropriate.

The Court of Appeal erred in applying the principles of mandamus to the present situation.

pouvoirs qu'ont les tribunaux administratifs de réentendre ou de décider à nouveau une affaire. Enfin, en règle générale, il ne devrait pas être loisible à un tribunal de réserver pour une date ultérieure l'exercice de ses autres pouvoirs. Une fois prononcée son ordonnance définitive, la Commission ne pouvait tenter de conserver son pouvoir de faire des recommandations, car les parties n'auraient jamais eu la certitude que la décision rendue avait déterminé leurs droits respectifs de façon définitive.

Si la Commission a omis de remplir une obligation qui lui incombait de faire des recommandations, il peut lui être ordonné, selon les circonstances de l'espèce, de reprendre l'examen de toute l'affaire et elle peut alors être tenue de procéder à une nouvelle audition. Cependant, tout réexamen de l'affaire ne devrait pas être considéré comme «la continuation des procédures initiales par la Commission». Ce serait là créer un précédent dangereux que d'étendre les pouvoirs des tribunaux administratifs au-delà du texte ou de l'intention de leur loi habilitante. De plus, ce serait de nature à éroder la garantie d'équité et de justice naturelle dont on s'attend de la part des tribunaux administratifs. En l'espèce, il ne conviendrait pas d'ordonner la tenue d'une nouvelle audience, vu les circonstances particulières de cette affaire.

La Cour d'appel a commis une erreur en appliquant les principes du mandamus au présent cas.

The judgment of Dickson C.J. and Wilson and Sopinka JJ. was delivered by SOPINKA J.—The issue in this appeal is whether the Practice Review Board of the Alberta Association of Architects was functus officio after delivering a report on the practices leading to the bankruptcy of the Chandler Kennedy Architectural Group. The Alberta Court of Appeal allowed an appeal from the decision of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench granting the appellants' application for an order prohibiting the Practice Review Board from proceeding on the grounds that the Board no longer had jurisdiction to deal with the matter and was functus officio.

Facts

As a result of the Chandler Kennedy Architectural Group filing for voluntary insolvency in June 1984, the Practice Review Board of the Alberta Association of Architects decided on its own initiative pursuant to s. 39(1)(b) of the Architects Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. A-44.1, to undertake a review of the practice of the Group and a number of the individual members of the Group. Hearings were commenced on August 14, 1984 and continued for a total of eighteen days. Final submissions were heard on December 17, 1984 and the report of the Board was issued on March 6, 1985.

The 71-page report made 21 specific findings of unprofessional conduct against the firm and several of the partners. Fines totalling $127,500 were imposed upon six members of the firm. The same six partners were also issued suspensions from practicing architecture for periods from six months to two years. As well, the appellants were required to pay the costs of the hearing, approximating $200,000.

Proceedings in the Courts Below

The appellants filed notice of intention to appeal the decision of the Board to the Council of the Alberta Association of Architects pursuant to s. 55

Version française du jugement du juge en chef Dickson et des juges Wilson et Sopinka rendu par

LE JUGE SOPINKA—Dans ce pourvoi, il s'agit de déterminer si la Practice Review Board (la «Commission de révision des pratiques «) de l'Alberta Association of Architects («l'Association des architectes de l'Alberta») était functus officio après avoir établi un rapport sur les pratiques ayant entraîné la faillite du Chandler Kennedy Architectural Group. La Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a accueilli l'appel interjeté contre la décision de la Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta qui avait accordé l'ordonnance de prohibition, demandée par les appelants, visant à interdire à la Commission de poursuivre l'affaire, pour le motif que la Commission n'avait plus compétence et qu'elle était functus officio.

En juin 1984, le Chandler Kennedy Architectural Group s'est déclaré insolvable. La Commission de révision des pratiques de l'Association des architectes de l'Alberta a alors décidé, de sa propre initiative, de procéder à une révision des pratiques du groupe et d'un certain nombre de ses membres, conformément à l'al. 39(1)b) de l'Architects Act, R.S.A. 1980, chap. A-44.1. Les audiences ont débuté le 14 août 1984 et se sont poursuivies pendant dix-huit jours. Les dernières plaidoiries ont été entendues le 17 décembre 1984 et la Commission a présenté son rapport le 6 mars 1985.

Le rapport de 71 pages comportait 21 conclusions précises de conduite contraire à la profession à l'encontre du cabinet et de plusieurs de ses membres. Des amendes s'élevant à 127 500 $ ont été imposées à six membres du cabinet. Ces mêmes six membres ont également été suspendus de l'exercice de la profession d'architecte pour des périodes de six mois à deux ans. De même, les appelants devaient payer les frais de l'audience, soit environ 200 000 $.

Les tribunaux d'instance inférieure

Les appelants ont déposé un avis d'intention d'interjeter appel contre la décision de la Commission auprès du Council of the Alberta Association of the Architects Act. However, prior to the commencement of the appeal, the appellants brought an application before the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench for an order in the nature of certiorari to quash the findings and order of the Practice Review Board. Kryczka J. granted the order requested and held that the failure to inform the appellants that they were facing any charges or allegations of unprofessional conduct offended the principles of natural justice. Kryczka J. held that the comments of the Chairman of the Board clearly indicated that the hearings were intended to be a practice review rather than an inquiry into allegations of unprofessional conduct.

This decision was appealed by the Alberta Association of Architects to the Alberta Court of Appeal. In the Court of Appeal (1985), 39 Alta. L.R. (2d) 320, Prowse J.A. speaking for the court, upheld the decision of Kryczka J. but on different grounds. Prowse J.A. held that the Practice Review Board lacked jurisdiction to make findings or orders relating to disciplinary matters or costs. Disciplinary powers were said to be reserved for another body within the Alberta Association of Architects, the Complaint Review Committee. Under s. 39(3) of the Architects Act the Board is simply responsible for reporting to the Council and making whatever recommendations it feels are appropriate. Therefore, the Court of Appeal dismissed the appeal on the grounds that the Architects Act did not give to the Board the powers it purported to exercise.

A month after the decision of the Court of Appeal, the Practice Review Board gave notice to the appellants that it intended to continue the original hearing in order that consideration could be given to preparing a further report to the Council of the Alberta Association of Architects and consideration could also be given to referring the matter to the Complaint Review Committee.

L'Association des architectes de l'Alberta a interjeté appel de cette décision devant la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta. Dans l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel (1985), 39 Alta. L.R. (2d) 320, le juge Prowse a maintenu, au nom de la cour, la décision du juge Kryczka, en se fondant toutefois sur des motifs différents. Le juge Prowse a conclu que la Commission de révision des pratiques n'avait pas compétence pour formuler des conclusions ou des ordonnances en matière de discipline ou de frais. Il a estimé que les pouvoirs disciplinaires étaient conférés à un autre organe de l'Association des architectes de l'Alberta, savoir le Comité d'examen des plaintes. En vertu du par. 39(3) de l'Architects Act, la Commission est tenue simplement de rendre compte au Conseil et de faire les recommandations qu'elle juge appropriées. Par conséquent, la Cour d'appel a rejeté l'appel pour le motif que l'Architects Act ne conférait pas à la Commission les pouvoirs qu'elle prétendait exercer.

Un mois après la décision de la Cour d'appel, la Commission de révision des pratiques a avisé les appelants qu'elle avait l'intention de poursuivre l'audience initiale afin d'envisager la possibilité de rédiger un nouveau rapport à l'intention du Conseil de l'Association des architectes de l'Alberta et de renvoyer toute l'affaire au Comité d'examen des plaintes.

The appellants then brought an application before the Court of Queen's Bench to prohibit the Board from proceeding further with the continuation of the matter. Brennan J. held that the Board had completed and fulfilled the function for which it was constituted and it was therefore functus officio and lacked jurisdiction to continue its hearing. This decision was also appealed to the Alberta Court of Appeal.

The Court of Appeal (1985), 67 A.R. 255 allowed the appeal and vacated the order of prohibition. Kerans J.A. for the court held that s. 39(3) of the Architects Act and Regulation 175/83, s. 11(1) impose on the Board the duty to consider whether or not to make a recommendation. Kerans J.A. held that the Board did not consider whether to make a recommendation that the matter be referred to the Complaint Review Committee and therefore it did not exhaust its jurisdiction. Functus officio was held not to apply here as there was a failure to consider matters which were part of the Board's statutory duty. It is from this decision that the present appeal arises.

Statutory Powers of the Board

In order to determine whether the Board was empowered to continue its proceedings against the appellants it is necessary to examine the statutory framework within which it operates. The Act does not purport to confer on the Board the power to rescind, vary, amend or reconsider a final decision that it has made. Such a provision is not uncommon in the enabling statutes of many tribunals. See Labour Relations Code, S.A. 1988, c. L-1.2, s. 11(4); Ontario Municipal Board Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 347, s. 42; and National Telecommunications Powers and Procedures Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. N-20, s. 66 (formerly the National Transportation Act). It is therefore necessary to consider (a) whether it had made a final decision, and (b) whether it was, therefore, functus officio.

Les appelants ont alors soumis une requête à la Cour du Banc de la Reine en vue d'interdire à la Commission de poursuivre l'affaire. Le juge Brennan a conclu que la Commission s'était acquittée de la fonction pour laquelle elle avait été constituée, qu'elle était donc functus officio et n'avait pas compétence pour poursuivre l'audience. Cette décision a également fait l'objet d'un appel à la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta.

La Cour d'appel (1985), 67 A.R. 255 a accueilli l'appel et annulé l'ordonnance de prohibition. Le juge Kerans a conclu, au nom de la cour, que le par. 39(3) de l'Architects Act et le par. 11(1) du règlement 175/83 imposaient à la Commission l'obligation d'envisager la possibilité de faire ou non une recommandation. Le juge a statué que la Commission n'avait pas envisagé de recommander le renvoi de l'affaire devant le Comité d'examen des plaintes et que, par conséquent, elle n'avait pas épuisé sa compétence. On a jugé que le principe du functus officio ne s'appliquait pas dans ce cas puisque la Commission avait omis d'examiner des questions qu'elle avait le devoir d'examiner en vertu de la loi. C'est cette décision qui fait l'objet du présent pourvoi.

Les pouvoirs conférés à la Commission par la Loi

Pour déterminer si la Commission avait le pouvoir de poursuivre les procédures engagées contre les appelants, il est nécessaire d'examiner le contexte légal dans lequel elle fonctionne. La Loi n'a pas pour objet de conférer à la Commission le pouvoir d'abroger, de réviser ou de modifier une décision définitive qu'elle a rendue, ni de revenir sur une telle décision. Une telle disposition est courante dans les lois habilitantes de nombreux tribunaux. Voir le Labour Relations Code, S.A. 1988, chap. L-1.2, par. 11(4), la Loi sur la Commission des affaires municipales de l'Ontario, L.R.O. 1980, chap. 347, art. 42, et la Loi nationale sur les attributions en matière de télécommunications, L.R.C. (1985), chap. N-20, art. 66 (auparavant la Loi nationale sur les transports). Il convient donc de décider a) si elle avait rendu une décision définitive et b) si elle était, par conséquent, functus officio.

1989 CanLII 41 (SCC)

The Board on its own initiative launched an inquiry into the practices of the appellants pursuant to s. 39 of the Act which provides:

39(1) The Board

(a) shall, on its own initiative or at the request of the Council, inquire into and report to and advise the Council in respect of

(i) the assessment of existing and the development of new educational standards and experience requirements that are conditions precedent to obtaining and continuing registration under this Act,

(ii) the evaluation of desirable standards of competence of authorized entities generally,

(iii) any other matter that the Council from time to time considers necessary or appropriate in connection with the exercise of its powers and the performance of its duties in relation to competence in the practice of architecture under this Act and the regulations, and

(iv) the practice of architecture by authorized entities generally,

and

(b) may conduct a review of the practice of an authorized entity in accordance with this Act and the regulations.

(2) A person requested to appear at an inquiry under this section by the Board is entitled to be represented by counsel.

(3) The Board shall after each inquiry under this section make a written report to the Council on the inquiry and may make any recommendations to the Council that the Board considers appropriate in connection with the matter inquired into, with reasons for the recommendations.

(4) If it is in the public interest to do so, the Council may direct that the whole or any portion of any inquiry by the Board under this section shall be held in private.

It is apparent that s. 39 does not deal with discipline but rather with practices in the profession with a view to their improvement. If, however, in the course of the inquiry into practices it appears to the Board that a matter may require investigation by the Complaint Review Committee, provision is made for referral of that matter to that Committee. Section 9(1)(j.1) of the Act empowers the Council to make regulations:

La Commission a entrepris, de sa propre initiative, une enquête sur les pratiques des appelants, conformément à l'art. 39 de la Loi dont voici le texte:

[TRADUCTION] 39(1) La Commission

a) doit, de sa propre initiative ou à la demande du Conseil, enquêter, faire rapport au Conseil et le conseiller au sujet de

(i) l'évaluation des normes actuelles et l'élaboration de nouvelles normes en matière de formation et d'expérience préalablement nécessaires à l'obtention et au maintien de l'enregistrement en vertu de la présente loi,

(ii) l'évaluation des normes de compétence souhaitables pour les entités autorisées en général,

(iii) toute autre question que le Conseil juge nécessaire ou appropriée en rapport avec l'exercice de ses pouvoirs et l'exécution de ses fonctions relativement à la compétence dans l'exercice de la profession d'architecte, en vertu de la présente loi et des règlements, et

(iv) l'exercice de l'architecture par des entités autorisées en général,

b) peut procéder à la révision des pratiques d'une entité autorisée, conformément à la présente loi et aux règlements.

(2) Toute personne citée à témoigner par la Commission, lors d'une enquête tenue en vertu du présent article, peut y être représentée par un avocat.

(3) Après chaque enquête tenue en vertu du présent article, la Commission doit soumettre un rapport écrit au Conseil et peut lui faire les recommandations motivées qu'elle juge appropriées en rapport avec l'affaire en cause.

(4) Le Conseil peut ordonner qu'une enquête tenue par la Commission en vertu du présent article ait lieu à huis clos, en totalité ou en partie, s'il est dans l'intérêt public de le faire.

Il est évident que l'art. 39 porte non pas sur la discipline mais bien sur les pratiques ayant cours au sein de la profession et vise l'amélioration de celles-ci. Toutefois, si dans le cours d'une enquête sur les pratiques, la Commission estime qu'une question devrait être confiée au Comité d'examen des plaintes, la Loi prévoit le renvoi de cette question à ce comité. L'alinéa 9(1)j.1) de la Loi confère au Conseil le pouvoir d'adopter des règlements:

1989 CanLII 41 (SCC)

(j.1) respecting the powers, duties and functions of the Practice Review Board including, but not limited to, the referral of matters by that Board to the Council or the Complaint Review Committee and appeals from decisions of that Board;

[TRADUCTION] j.1) concernant les pouvoirs, obligations et fonctions de la Commission de révision des pratiques, dont le renvoi de questions par la Commission au Conseil ou au Comité d'examen des plaintes, et les appels interjetés à l'encontre de décisions rendues par la Commission;

Section 11 of Regulation 175/83 passed pursuant to s. 9(1)(j.1) provides as follows:

11(1) The Board may shall [sic] make one or more of the following directions or recommendations:

(a) make one or more recommendations to the authorized entity or licensed interior designer, the subject of a practice review, respecting desired improvements in the practice reviewed;

(b) direct that a reviewer conduct a follow-up practice review to determine whether or not the Board's recommendations have been adopted and whether they have resulted in the desired improvements being made in the practice of the entity concerned;

(c) if it considers any one or more of the following matters to be of a sufficiently serious nature to require investigation by the Complaint Review Committee, direct that the matter be referred to the Complaint Review Committee for investigation:

(i) the unco-operative manner of an authorized entity or licensed interior designer in the course of a practice review or a follow up review;

(ii) a failure to comply with the Act, Professional Practice Regulation, Code of Ethics, Interior Design Regulation or General By-laws;

(iii) a failure to adopt and implement the recommendations respecting desired improvements in the practice of the entity concerned;

(iv) any apparent fraud, negligence or misrepresentation, or any disregard of the generally accepted standards of the practice of architecture or practice of licensed interior designers;

(d) if the Board determines in the course of its practice review that the conduct of an authorized entity or licensed interior designer constitutes

(i) unskilled practice of architecture or unprofessional conduct or both, or

(ii) unskilled practice of interior design or unprofessional conduct, or both

L'article 11 du règlement 175/83 adopté en vertu de l'al. 9(1)j.1) prévoit que:

[TRADUCTION] 11(1) La Commission peut doit (sic) formuler une ou plusieurs des directives ou recommandations suivantes:

a) faire une ou plusieurs recommandations à l'entité autorisée ou au dessinateur d'intérieurs agréé dont les pratiques font l'objet d'une révision, au sujet des améliorations qu'il est souhaitable d'apporter à la pratique qui fait l'objet d'une révision;

b) ordonner qu'un réviseur assure le suivi de la révision des pratiques afin de déterminer si les recommandations de la Commission ont été adoptées et si elles ont entraîné les améliorations souhaitées dans les pratiques de l'entité en cause;

c) si, à son avis, l'une des questions suivantes est assez grave pour que le Comité d'examen des plaintes fasse enquête, ordonner que la question soit renvoyée au Comité d'examen des plaintes pour fins d'enquête:

(i) manque de collaboration d'une entité autorisée ou d'un dessinateur d'intérieurs agréé dans le cadre d'une révision des pratiques ou d'un suivi;

(ii) manquement à la Loi, au Règlement sur l'exercice de la profession, au Code de déontologie, au Règlement sur le dessin d'intérieurs ou aux règlements généraux;

(iii) défaut d'adopter et d'appliquer les recommandations relatives à l'amélioration souhaitée des pratiques de l'entité en cause;

(iv) toute apparence de fraude, négligence ou fausses déclarations, ou tout manquement aux normes généralement acceptées pour l'exercice de la profession d'architecte et de la profession de dessinateur d'intérieurs;

d) si, dans le cadre de sa révision des pratiques, la Commission estime que la conduite d'une entité autorisée ou d'un dessinateur d'intérieurs agréé constitue

(i) un manque de compétence dans l'exercice de la profession d'architecte ou une conduite contraire à la profession, ou les deux à la fois,

(ii) un manque de compétence dans l'exercice de la profession de dessinateur d'intérieurs ou une conduite contraire à la profession, ou les deux à la fois, the Board shall deal with the matter in accordance with sections 50 to 53 of the Act;

(e) indicate that it has no recommendations to make or that the practice reviewed is satisfactory;

(f) comment on a practice maintained at a high standard and with the consent of the authorized entity or licensed interior designer concerned, publicize the high standard and the persons concerned;

(g) make recommendations to the Council with a view to the establishment of new standards related to specific or general areas of the practice of architecture.

(2) The Board shall not impose any sanction under subsection (1)(d) unless the authorized entity or professional interior designer concerned

(a) has made representations to the Board, or

(b) after a notice under section 42 of the Act has been given, fails to attend the hearing or does not make representations.

The Board's inquiry proceeded as an inquiry into practices in accordance with the Act. The following statements made by the Chairman during the course of the inquiry aptly describe the nature of the inquiry:

The first thing that I would like to make very clear and I believe that you alluded to this in the beginning, that this is not a complaint review, this is a practice review, and as a result we are not dealing with a specific case of wrongdoing which I think you are alluding to and you are obviously experienced in the court. We are dealing with a review of the practice of the various authorized entities and that means a total review. So, as a result, the entire course of this Hearing has been to review the total practice. It has not been a process of reviewing specific points. The Board has been concerned to develop a full and as broad an understanding of the practice of the various entities as is humanly possible under the circumstances.

As a result of the review of those authorized entities, it is our responsibility and our duty to make recommendations and to make findings and we of course are going to be doing that following this.

Following each and every individual, we have provided an opportunity for questioning. The Board will have to take into consideration all of the evidence that has been put before it and has been spending a great deal of time in making certain it is listening and trying to understand la Commission procédera conformément aux articles 50 à 53 de la Loi;

e) indiquer qu'elle n'a aucune recommandation à faire ou que la pratique faisant l'objet d'une révision s'est avérée satisfaisante;

f) faire des commentaires sur le maintien d'un idéal élevé de pratique et, avec le consentement de l'entité autorisée ou du dessinateur d'intérieurs agréé en cause, faire connaître cet idéal élevé ainsi que le nom des personnes visées;

g) faire au Conseil des recommandations visant l'élaboration de nouvelles normes dans des domaines précis ou généraux de l'architecture.

(2) La Commission ne peut imposer de sanction en vertu de l'alinéa (1)d) que si l'entité autorisée ou le dessinateur d'intérieurs professionnel en cause

a) a présenté ses arguments à la Commission, ou

b) n'a pas assisté à l'audience ni présenté d'arguments, après avoir reçu un préavis donné en vertu de l'article 42 de la Loi.

La Commission a procédé à une enquête sur les pratiques conformément à la Loi. Au cours de l'enquête, le président a fait les observations suivantes qui décrivent bien la nature de l'enquête:

[TRADUCTION] J'aimerais tout d'abord établir très clairement, et je crois que vous y aviez fait allusion au début, qu'il s'agit non pas de l'examen d'une plainte mais bien d'une révision des pratiques et que, par conséquent, nous ne sommes pas saisis d'un cas précis d'actes répréhensibles, ce à quoi vous faites allusion, je crois, et pour lesquels vous avez beaucoup d'expérience devant les tribunaux. Il s'agit de la révision des pratiques des diverses entités autorisées et donc, d'une révision complète. Par conséquent, cette l'audience a uniquement pour but de réviser les pratiques dans leur ensemble. Il ne s'agit pas de réviser des points précis. La Commission a voulu comprendre entièrement et de façon aussi globale que possible, dans les circonstances, les pratiques de ces diverses entités.

À la suite de la révision de ces entités autorisées, il nous incombe de faire des recommandations et de tirer des conclusions, ce que nous allons faire ci-après.

Après chaque témoignage, nous avons permis que le témoin soit questionné. La Commission devra tenir compte de toute la preuve qui lui a été soumise et elle a consacré beaucoup de temps à s'assurer qu'elle écoutait et essayait de comprendre tout ce qui s'était passé. Mais everything that has taken place. But again, as I said to your counsel, a few minutes ago, this is not a complaint review where we are trying to find fault or guilt on specific complaints. This is a practice review, and as a result we are given the responsibility of trying to review and understand at the fullest extent possible what has taken place, and as a result of the fullest extent of which has taken place, make findings and recommendations to the profession. [Emphasis added.]

Nevertheless, when it came to issue directions and recommendations, instead of proceeding under s. 39(3) of the Act as amplified by s. 11(1)(a), (b), (c), (e), (f) or (g) of the Regulation, the Board proceeded under s. 11(1)(d) of the Regulation, a provision that the Court of Appeal in the first appeal held to be ultra vires. The Court of Appeal held that ss. 50 to 53 deal with disciplinary matters which are beyond the competence of the Board. This decision of the Court of Appeal has not been challenged. Accordingly, the result of the decision of the Court of Appeal is that the Board conducted a valid hearing into the appellants' practice but issued findings and orders that were ultra vires and have been quashed.

In view of the fact that the Board erroneously thought it had the power of the Complaint Review Committee and proceeded accordingly, it did not consider recommendations under s. 39(3) of the Act or under s. 11(1)(a), (b), (c), (e), (f) or (g), and in particular (c), of the Regulation.

Kerans J.A. based his conclusion that the Board was not functus officio on the ground that the Board had a duty to consider whether to make a recommendation. He stated, at p. 257:

> While the board has, under s. 39(3) and perhaps also the regulations, a discretion whether to make any recommendation, we think that the section imposes upon the board the duty to consider whether to make a recommendation. The report does not say that the board did so. If the board did not so consider, then, contrary to the finding of the learned Queen's Bench judge, the board has not exhausted its jurisdiction.

In view of the inexplicable use of "may/shall" in Regulation 11(1), it is difficult to determine precisely what the Board was obliged to do. Certainly encore une fois, comme je l'ai dit à votre avocat il y a quelques minutes, il ne s'agit pas d'un examen de plaintes où nous essayons de déterminer la faute ou la culpabilité à l'égard de plaintes précises. Il s'agit d'une révision des pratiques et, en conséquence, il nous incombe de tenter de revoir et de comprendre le mieux possible ce qui s'est passé et, par conséquent, de tirer des conclusions et de faire des recommandations à la profession. [Je souligne.]

Néanmoins, lorsque vint le temps de donner des directives et de faire des recommandations, la Commission a procédé en vertu de l'al. 11(1)d) du Règlement, que la Cour d'appel a jugé ultra vires dans le premier appel, au lieu d'agir sous le régime du par. 39(3) de la Loi, précisé par les al. 11(1)a), b), c), e), f) ou g) du Règlement. La Cour d'appel a statué que les art. 50 à 53 portaient sur des questions disciplinaires qui outrepassent la compétence de la Commission. Cette décision de la Cour d'appel n'a pas été contestée. Par conséquent, il en résulte que la Commission a tenu une audience valide sur les pratiques des appelants, mais qu'elle a formulé des conclusions et des ordonnances qui étaient ultra vires et qui ont été annulées.

Ayant cru erronément qu'elle était investie des pouvoirs du Comité d'examen des plaintes et ayant agi en conséquence, la Commission n'a pas envisagé de faire des recommandations en vertu du par. 39(3) de la Loi ou des al. 11(1)a), b), c), e), f) ou g), et en particulier de l'al. c), du Règlement.

Le juge Kerans a conclu que la Commission n'était pas functus officio parce qu'elle avait l'obligation d'envisager la possibilité de faire une recommandation. Voici ce qu'il a affirmé à la p. 257:

> [TRADUCTION] Même si la commission a, en vertu du par. 39(3) et peut-être également du règlement, le pouvoir discrétionnaire de faire ou non une recommandation, nous estimons que cette disposition impose à la commission l'obligation d'envisager la possibilité de faire une recommandation. Le rapport n'indique pas que la commission l'a fait. Si la commission n'a pas envisagé cette possibilité alors, contrairement à ce que le juge de la Cour du Banc de la Reine a conclu, elle n'a pas épuisé sa compétence.

Étant donné l'emploi inexplicable de l'expression «peut/doit» au par. 11(1) du Règlement, il est difficile de préciser ce que la Commission était it would be strange if the Board were empowered to conduct a lengthy practice review and had no duty to consider making recommendations, either to the parties or to Council, or to consider a referral to the Complaint Review Committee. Therefore, I agree with Kerans J.A. that the Board had the duty to consider making recommendations pursuant to the Regulation and s. 39(3) of the Architects Act.

I am, however, of the opinion that the application of the functus officio principle is more appropriately dealt with in the context of the following characterization of the current state of the Board's proceedings. The Board held a valid hearing into certain practices of the appellants. At the conclusion of the hearing, in lieu of considering recommendations and directions, it made a number of ultra vires findings and orders which were void and have been quashed. In these circumstances, is the decision of the Board final so as to attract the principle of functus officio?

Functus Officio

The general rule that a final decision of a court cannot be reopened derives from the decision of the English Court of Appeal in In re St. Nazaire Co. (1879), 12 Ch. D. 88. The basis for it was that the power to rehear was transferred by the Judicature Acts to the appellate division. The rule applied only after the formal judgment had been drawn up, issued and entered, and was subject to two exceptions:

1. where there had been a slip in drawing it up, and,

2. where there was an error in expressing the manifest intention of the court. See Paper Machinery Ltd. v. J. O. Ross Engineering Corp., [1934] S.C.R. 186.

In Grillas v. Minister of Manpower and Immigration, [1972] S.C.R. 577, Martland J., speaking for himself and Laskin J., opined that the same reasoning did not apply to the Immigration Appeal tenue de faire. Il serait pour le moins étrange que la Commission ait le pouvoir de procéder à une révision détaillée des pratiques sans qu'elle soit tenue d'envisager la possibilité de faire des recommandations, que ce soit aux parties ou au Conseil, ou d'envisager un renvoi au Comité d'examen des plaintes. Par conséquent, je souscris à l'opinion du juge Kerans selon laquelle la Commission était tenue d'envisager la possibilité de faire des recommandations, conformément au Règlement et au par. 39(3) de l'Architects Act.

J'estime cependant qu'il faut plutôt traiter de l'application du principe functus officio dans le contexte de la qualification suivante de l'état actuel des procédures devant la Commission. La Commission a tenu une audience valide au sujet de certaines pratiques des appelants. À la fin de l'audience, au lieu d'envisager de formuler des recommandations et des directives, elle a formulé un certain nombre de conclusions et d'ordonnances ultra vires qui étaient nulles et qui ont été annulées. Dans ces circonstances, la décision de la Commission est-elle définitive, ce qui justifierait l'application du principe du functus officio?

Functus officio

La règle générale portant qu'on ne saurait revenir sur une décision judiciaire définitive découle de la décision de la Court of Appeal d'Angleterre dans In re St. Nazaire Co. (1879), 12 Ch. D. 88. La cour y avait conclu que le pouvoir d'entendre à nouveau une affaire avait été transféré à la division d'appel en vertu des Judicature Acts. La règle ne s'appliquait que si le jugement avait été rédigé, prononcé et inscrit, et elle souffrait deux exceptions:

1. lorsqu'il y avait eu lapsus en la rédigeant ou

2. lorsqu'il y avait une erreur dans l'expression de l'intention manifeste de la cour. Voir Paper Machinery Ltd. v. J. O. Ross Engineering Corp., [1934] R.C.S. 186.

Dans Grillas c. Ministre de la Main-d'Oeuvre et de l'Immigration, [1972] R.C.S. 577, le juge Martland s'exprimant en son propre nom et en celui du juge Laskin, s'est dit d'avis que le même Board from which there was no appeal except on a question of law. Although this was a dissenting judgment, only Pigeon J. of the five judges who heard the case disagreed with this view. At page 589 Martland J. stated:

> The same reasoning does not apply to the decisions of the Board, from which there is no appeal, save on a question of law. There is no appeal by way of a rehearing.
>
> In R. v. Development Appeal Board, Ex p. Canadian Industries Ltd., the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Alberta was of the view that the Alberta Legislature had recognized the application of the restriction stated in the St. Nazaire Company case to administrative boards, in that express provision for rehearing was made in the statutes creating some provincial boards, whereas, in the case of the Development Appeal Board in question, no such provision had been made. The Court goes on to note that one of the purposes in setting up these boards is to provide speedy determination of administrative problems.

He went on to find in the language of the statute an intention to enable the Board to hear further evidence in certain circumstances although a final decision had been made.

I do not understand Martland J. to go so far as to hold that functus officio has no application to administrative tribunals. Apart from the English practice which is based on a reluctance to amend or reopen formal judgments, there is a sound policy reason for recognizing the finality of proceedings before administrative tribunals. As a general rule, once such a tribunal has reached a final decision in respect to the matter that is before it in accordance with its enabling statute, that decision cannot be revisited because the tribunal has changed its mind, made an error within jurisdiction or because there has been a change of circumstances. It can only do so if authorized by statute or if there has been a slip or error within the exceptions enunciated in Paper Machinery Ltd. v. J. O. Ross Engineering Corp., supra.

raisonnement ne s'appliquait pas à la Commission d'appel de l'immigration dont les décisions ne pouvaient faire l'objet d'un appel que sur une question de droit. Même s'il s'agissait d'une opinion dissidente, seul le juge Pigeon, parmi les cinq juges ayant entendu l'affaire, n'y a pas souscrit. Le juge Martland affirme, à la p. 589:

> Le même raisonnement ne s'applique pas aux décisions de la Commission, dont il n'y a pas d'appel, sauf sur une question de droit. Il n'y a pas d'appel par voie de nouvelle audition.
> Dans R. v. Development Appeal Board, Ex p. Canadian Industries Ltd., la Chambre d'appel de la Cour suprême de l'Alberta a exprimé l'avis que la législature albertaine reconnaissait l'application de la restriction énoncée dans l'affaire St. Nazaire Company aux commissions administratives puisque des dispositions expresses prévoyant une nouvelle audition avaient été insérées dans les lois établissant certaines commissions provinciales, tandis que, dans le cas du Development Appeal Board en question, il n'y en avait pas. La Cour a poursuivi en signalant que l'un des buts de la création de ces commissions était d'arriver rapidement au règlement de problèmes administratifs.

Il a ensuite conclu que le texte de la loi exprimait l'intention d'habiliter la Commission à entendre d'autres éléments de preuve, dans certains cas, même si une décision définitive avait été rendue.

Je ne crois pas que le juge Martland ait voulu affirmer que le principe functus officio ne s'applique aucunement aux tribunaux administratifs. Si l'on fait abstraction de la pratique suivie en Angleterre, selon laquelle on doit hésiter à modifier ou à rouvrir des jugements officiels, la reconnaissance du caractère définitif des procédures devant les tribunaux administratifs se justifie par une bonne raison de principe. En règle générale, lorsqu'un tel tribunal a statué définitivement sur une question dont il était saisi conformément à sa loi habilitante, il ne peut revenir sur sa décision simplement parce qu'il a changé d'avis, parce qu'il a commis une erreur dans le cadre de sa compétence, ou parce que les circonstances ont changé. Il ne peut le faire que si la loi le lui permet ou s'il y a eu un lapsus ou une erreur au sens des exceptions énoncées dans l'arrêt Paper Machinery Ltd. v. J. O. Ross Engineering Corp., précité.

To this extent, the principle of functus officio applies. It is based, however, on the policy ground which favours finality of proceedings rather than the rule which was developed with respect to formal judgments of a court whose decision was subject to a full appeal. For this reason I am of the opinion that its application must be more flexible and less formalistic in respect to the decisions of administrative tribunals which are subject to appeal only on a point of law. Justice may require the reopening of administrative proceedings in order to provide relief which would otherwise be available on appeal.

Le principe du functus officio s'applique dans cette mesure. Cependant, il se fonde sur un motif de principe qui favorise le caractère définitif des procédures plutôt que sur la règle énoncée relativement aux jugements officiels d'une cour de justice dont la décision peut faire l'objet d'un appel en bonne et due forme. C'est pourquoi j'estime que son application doit être plus souple et moins formaliste dans le cas de décisions rendues par des tribunaux administratifs qui ne peuvent faire l'objet d'un appel que sur une question de droit. Il est possible que des procédures administratives doivent être rouvertes, dans l'intérêt de la justice, afin d'offrir un redressement qu'il aurait par ailleurs été possible d'obtenir par voie d'appel.

Accordingly, the principle should not be strictly applied where there are indications in the enabling statute that a decision can be reopened in order to enable the tribunal to discharge the function committed to it by enabling legislation. This was the situation in Grillas, supra.

Par conséquent, il ne faudrait pas appliquer le principe de façon stricte lorsque la loi habilitante porte à croire qu'une décision peut être rouverte afin de permettre au tribunal d'exercer la fonction que lui confère sa loi habilitante. C'était le cas dans l'affaire Grillas, précitée.

Furthermore, if the tribunal has failed to dispose of an issue which is fairly raised by the proceedings and of which the tribunal is empowered by its enabling statute to dispose, it ought to be allowed to complete its statutory task. If, however, the administrative entity is empowered to dispose of a matter by one or more specified remedies or by alternative remedies, the fact that one is selected does not entitle it to reopen proceedings to make another or further selection. Nor will reserving the right to do so preserve the continuing jurisdiction of the tribunal unless a power to make provisional or interim orders has been conferred on it by statute. See Huneault v. Central Mortgage and Housing Corp. (1981), 41 N.R. 214 (F.C.A.)

De plus, si le tribunal administratif a omis de trancher une question qui avait été soulevée à bon droit dans les procédures et qu'il a le pouvoir de trancher en vertu de sa loi habilitante, on devrait lui permettre de compléter la tâche que lui confie la loi. Cependant, si l'entité administrative est habilitée à trancher une question d'une ou de plusieurs façons précises ou par des modes subsidiaires de redressement, le fait d'avoir choisi une méthode particulière ne lui permet pas de rouvrir les procédures pour faire un autre choix. Le tribunal ne peut se réserver le droit de le faire afin de maintenir sa compétence pour l'avenir, à moins que la loi ne lui confère le pouvoir de rendre des décisions provisoires ou temporaires. Voir Huneault c. Société centrale d'hypothèques et de logement (1981), 41 N.R. 214 (C.A.F.)

In this appeal we are concerned with the failure of the Board to dispose of the matter before it in a manner permitted by the Architects Act. The Board intended to make a final disposition but that disposition is a nullity. It amounts to no disposition at all in law. Traditionally, a tribunal, which makes a determination which is a nullity, has been permitted to reconsider the matter afresh and render a valid decision. In Re Trizec Equities Ltd.

Dans l'affaire qui nous intéresse, la Commission n'a pas statué sur la question dont elle était saisie d'une manière permise par l'Architects Act. La Commission a voulu rendre une décision définitive, mais cette décision est nulle de nullité absolue, ce qui équivaut en droit à une absence totale de décision. Traditionnellement, le tribunal dont la décision est nulle a été autorisé à réexaminer la question dans son entier et à prononcer une déciand Area Assessor Burnaby-New Westminster (1983), 147 D.L.R. (3d) 637 (B.C.S.C.), McLachlin J. (as she then was) summarized the law in this respect in the following passage, at p. 643:

> I am satisfied both as a matter of logic and on the authorities that a tribunal which makes a decision in the purported exercise of its power which is a nullity, may thereafter enter upon a proper hearing and render a valid decision: Lange v. Board of School Trustees of School District No. 42 (Maple Ridge) (1978), 9 B.C.L.R. 232 (B.C.S.C.); Posluns v. Toronto Stock Exchange et al. (1968), 67 D.L.R. (2d) 165, [1968] S.C.R. 330. In the latter case, the Supreme Court of Canada quoted from Lord Reid's reasons for judgment in Ridge v. Baldwin, [1964] A.C. 40 at p. 79, where he said:
>
> > I do not doubt that if an officer or body realises that it has acted hastily and reconsiders the whole matter afresh, after affording to the person affected a proper opportunity to present its case, then its later decision will be valid.
> There is no complaint made by Trizec Equities Ltd. with respect to the hearing held on March 19th. Accordingly, while the court exceeded its jurisdiction by purporting to increase the assessments on the morning of March 17, 1982, its subsequent decision of March 19, 1982, stands as valid.

If the error which renders the decision a nullity is one that taints the whole proceeding, then the tribunal must start afresh. Cases such as Ridge v. Baldwin, [1964] A.C. 40 (H.L.); Lange v. Board of School Trustees of School District No. 42 (Maple Ridge) (1978), 9 B.C.L.R. 232 (S.C.B.C.) and Posluns v. Toronto Stock Exchange, [1968] S.C.R. 330, referred to above, are in this category. They involve a denial of natural justice which vitiated the whole proceeding. The tribunal was bound to start afresh in order to cure the defect.

In this proceeding the Board conducted a valid hearing until it came to dispose of the matter. It then rendered a decision which is a nullity. It failed to consider disposition on a proper basis and

> [TRADUCTION] Je suis convaincue, tant sur le plan logique que sur celui de la doctrine et de la jurisprudence, que le tribunal qui, dans le cadre présumé de l'exercice de sa compétence, rend une décision annulée par la suite, peut ensuite tenir une audience régulière et rendre une décision valide: Lange v. Board of School Trustees of School District No. 42 (Maple Ridge) (1978), 9 B.C.L.R. 232 (C.S.C.-B.); Posluns v. Toronto Stock Exchange et al. (1968), 67 D.L.R. (2d) 165, [1968] R.C.S. 330. Dans ce dernier arrêt, la Cour suprême du Canada a cité les motifs du jugement prononcé par lord Reid dans Ridge v. Baldwin, [1964] A.C. 40 à la p. 79, où il affirme:
> > Je ne doute point que dans l'éventualité où un fonctionnaire ou un organisme se rend compte qu'il a agi précipitamment et réexamine la question dans son entier, après avoir accordé à la personne intéressée la possibilité suffisante de faire valoir son point de vue, la seconde décision qu'il rendra sera valide.
> Trizec Equities Ltd. n'a formulé aucune plainte à l'égard de l'audience du 19 mars. Par conséquent, même si la cour a outrepassé sa compétence en prétendant augmenter les cotisations le 17 mars 1982 au matin, sa décision subséquente, rendue le 19 mars 1982, demeure valide.

Si l'erreur qui a pour effet de rendre nulle la décision entache la totalité des procédures, le tribunal doit tout recommencer. Les arrêts Ridge v. Baldwin, [1964] A.C. 40 (H.L.), Lange v. Board of School Trustees of School District No. 42 (Maple Ridge) (1978), 9 B.C.L.R. 232 (C.S.C.-B.), et Posluns v. Toronto Stock Exchange, [1968] R.C.S. 330, se situent dans cette catégorie. Dans chaque cas, il s'agissait d'un déni de justice naturelle qui avait pour effet de vicier toute l'instance. Le tribunal était tenu de tout recommencer afin de remédier à ce vice.

En l'espèce, la Commission a tenu une audience valide jusqu'au moment de trancher la question. Elle a alors prononcé une décision qui est nulle de nullité absolue. Elle n'a pas envisagé de régler la should be entitled to do so. The Court of Appeal so held.

On the continuation of the Board's original proceedings, however, either party should be allowed to supplement the evidence and make further representations which are pertinent to disposition of the matter in accordance with the Act and Regulation. This will enable the appellants to address, frontally, the issue as to what recommendations, if any, the Board ought to make.

In the result, the appeal is dismissed, but without costs. The respondents neither appeared on the argument nor filed a factum.

The reasons of La Forest and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ. were delivered by L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ J. (dissenting)—I must respectfully disagree with my colleague Justice Sopinka's disposition of this appeal.

The issues which arise in this appeal are:

(1) Was the Practice Review Board ("Board") of the Alberta Association of Architects functus officio after delivering a report on the practices leading to the bankruptcy of the Chandler Kennedy Architectural Group?

(2) If the Board was not functus officio, does it have the jurisdiction to continue the original hearing against the appellants to consider making recommendations to the Complaint Review Committee?

(3) Did the Court of Appeal err in its consideration and application of the principles relating to mandamus?

The first two, closely related issues, turn on the construction of s. 39 of the Architects Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. A-44.1, and Regulation 175/83 (passed under authority of the Act), which establish the Board and define its powers.

question de façon appropriée, ce qu'elle devrait pouvoir faire maintenant. C'est ainsi qu'en a décidé la Cour d'appel.

Cependant, à la continuation des procédures initiales par la Commission, chaque partie devrait pouvoir compléter la preuve et présenter d'autres arguments pertinents aux fins de régler l'affaire conformément à la Loi et au Règlement. Cela permettra aux appelants d'aborder directement la question des recommandations que la Commission devrait faire, le cas échéant.

En définitive, le pourvoi est rejeté, mais sans dépens. Les intimés n'ont pas présenté de plaidoirie ni déposé de mémoire.

Les motifs des juges La Forest et L'Heureux-Dubé ont été rendus par

LE JUGE L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ (dissidente)—Avec égards, je ne puis souscrire à la conclusion à laquelle en arrive mon collègue le juge Sopinka.

Les questions en litige dans ce pourvoi sont les suivantes:

1) La Practice Review Board («la Commission») de l'Alberta Association of Architects («l'Association des architectes de l'Alberta») était-elle functus officio après avoir établi un rapport sur les pratiques qui ont entraîné la faillite du Chandler Kennedy Architectural Group?

2) Si la Commission n'était pas functus officio, a-t-elle compétence pour poursuivre l'audience initiale, à l'encontre des appelants, afin d'envisager la possibilité de faire des recommandations au Comité d'examen des plaintes?

3) La Cour d'appel a-t-elle commis une erreur en examinant et en appliquant les principes relatifs au mandamus?

Les deux premières questions sont étroitement liées et portent sur l'interprétation de l'art. 39 de l'Architects Act, R.S.A. 1980, chap. A-44.1, et du règlement 175/83 (adopté en vertu de la Loi), qui créent la Commission et en définissent les pouvoirs.

1989 CanLII 41 (SCC)

Section 39(3) of the Architects Act provides:

(3) The Board shall after each inquiry under this section make a written report to the Council on the inquiry and may make any recommendations to the Council that the Board considers appropriate in connection with the matter inquired into, with reasons for the recommendations.

The disputed text is found in Regulation 175/83, s. 11(1):

11(1) The Board may shall [sic] make one or more of the following directions or recommendations:

(c) ... direct that the matter be referred to the Complaint Review Committee for investigation: ...

The confusion emanates from the inclusion of both the permissive, discretionary term "may", and the affirmative, mandatory term "shall", without any indication as to which prevails. However, while I shall discuss the implications of both interpretations, in my view the appeal should be allowed on either construction.

(1) Functus Officio

When the Board first undertook to reopen the hearing, appellants sought an order for prohibition, which was granted by Brennan J. In granting the order, the chambers judge of the Court of Queen's Bench stated:

Unfortunately, the Practice Review Board proceeded to set itself up as having disciplinary functions and made findings and assessed penalties. Mr. Justice Kryczka declared these Findings and Orders a nullity, which decision was upheld by the Alberta Court of Appeal.

In my view, the Practice Review Board has completed and fulfilled the function for which it was appointed and therefore it is functus officio. Such being the case, it had no jurisdiction to continue with any function. Accordingly, the application is granted for an Order to prohibit the Board from proceeding further against these Applicants, and in particular, the Board is hereby prohibited from proceeding with any further hearings on this matter.

This decision was reversed by the Alberta Court of Appeal: (1985), 67 A.R. 255. According to Kerans J.A., for the court, the Board was not

Le paragraphe 39(3) de l'Architects Act dispose:

Le texte contesté en l'espèce figure au par. 11(1) du règlement 175/83:

[TRADUCTION] 11(1) La Commission peut doit (sic) formuler une ou plusieurs des directives ou recommandations suivantes:

c) ... ordonner que la question soit renvoyée au Comité d'examen des plaintes pour fins d'enquête ...

La confusion tient à la juxtaposition des termes facultatif «peut» et impératif «doit», sans priorité apparente. Cependant, même si je me propose d'examiner les conséquences des deux interprétations, j'estime que le pourvoi devrait être accueilli de toute façon.

1) Functus officio

Lorsque la Commission a voulu rouvrir l'enquête pour la première fois, les appelants ont demandé une ordonnance de prohibition qui leur a été accordée par le juge Brennan, juge en chambre de la Cour du Banc de la Reine, qui a affirmé en rendant l'ordonnance:

[TRADUCTION] Malheureusement, la Commission de révision des pratiques a agi comme si elle avait des fonctions disciplinaires, en tirant des conclusions et en imposant des peines. Monsieur le juge Kryczka a jugé que ces conclusions et ordonnances étaient nulles, ce qui a été confirmé par la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta.

À mon avis, la Commission de révision des pratiques s'est acquittée des fonctions pour lesquelles elle a été constituée et elle est donc functus officio. Par conséquent, elle n'avait pas compétence pour poursuivre l'exercice de quelque fonction que ce soit. La demande d'ordonnance de prohibition interdisant à la Commission de poursuivre l'affaire contre les requérants est donc accueillie et il est notamment interdit à la Commission de tenir d'autres audiences sur cette question.

Cette décision a été infirmée par la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta: (1985), 67 A.R. 255. Selon le juge Kerans, s'exprimant au nom de la cour, la Comfunctus officio, and should be allowed to "voluntarily . . . do the right thing" (at p. 257):

> [T]he board, having mistaken[ly] decided that it had itself the power to deal directly and finally with discipline questions, too quickly rejected any consideration of making recommendations to other bodies. We think that the board, persuaded by its mistaken assumption of these other powers, made such an egregious error about the significance of its powers of recommendation that it cannot be said that it has exercised that jurisdiction.

Jowitt's Dictionary of English Law (2nd ed. 1977) defines functus officio as "having discharged his duty"; an expression applied to a judge, magistrate or arbitrator who has given a decision or made an order or award so that his authority is exhausted. The holding of Morton J. in Re V.G.M. Holdings, Ltd., [1941] 3 All E.R. 417 (Ch. D.), is well summarized in the headnote:

> Where a judge has made an order for a stay of execution which has been passed and entered, he is functus officio, and neither he nor any other judge of equal jurisdiction has jurisdiction to vary the terms of such stay. The only means of obtaining any variation is to appeal to a higher tribunal.

An editorial note added that:

> This is a practice point. It is well-settled that the court can vary any order before it is passed and entered. After it has been passed and entered, the court is functus officio, and can make no variation itself. Any variation which may be made must be made by a court of appellate jurisdiction.

Black's Law Dictionary (5th ed. 1979) defines functus officio as "a task performed":

> Having fulfilled the function, discharged the office, or accomplished the purpose, and therefore of no further force or authority. Applied to an officer whose term has expired and who has consequently no further official authority; and also to an instrument, power, agency, etc., which has fulfilled the purpose of its creation, and is therefore of no further virtue or effect.

mission n'était pas functus officio et il devrait lui être loisible de [TRADUCTION] «procéder de la bonne façon [. . .] volontairement» (à la p. 257):

> [TRADUCTION] [A]près avoir décidé erronément qu'elle avait le pouvoir de traiter directement et définitivement de questions disciplinaires, la Commission a rejeté trop hâtivement toute possibilité de faire des recommandations à d'autres organismes. Nous pensons que la Commission, convaincue erronément d'être investie de ces autres pouvoirs, a commis une erreur si énorme quant à la portée de ses pouvoirs de recommandation que l'on ne peut conclure qu'elle a exercé cette compétence.

L'expression functus officio est définie par [TRADUCTION] «qui s'est acquitté de sa fonction» dans le Jowitt's Dictionary of English Law (2e éd. 1977). Cette expression s'applique à un juge, magistrat ou arbitre qui a rendu une décision ou prononcé une ordonnance et a ainsi épuisé sa compétence. La conclusion à laquelle est arrivé le juge Morton, dans Re V.G.M. Holdings, Ltd., [1941] 3 All E.R. 417 (Ch. D.), est bien résumée dans le sommaire:

> [TRADUCTION] Lorsqu'un juge a décrété un sursis d'exécution qui a été prononcé et inscrit, il devient functus officio et ni lui ni aucun autre juge de même juridiction n'a le pouvoir d'en modifier les modalités. L'appel devant une instance supérieure est alors le seul moyen d'obtenir une modification de l'ordonnance.

La mention suivante a été ajoutée par l'arrêtiste:

> [TRADUCTION] C'est une question de pratique. Il est bien établi que la cour peut modifier une ordonnance avant de la prononcer et de l'inscrire. Une fois que l'ordonnance est prononcée et inscrite, la cour est functus officio et ne peut la modifier elle-même. Seule une juridiction d'appel peut procéder à la modification de l'ordonnance.

Dans le Black's Law Dictionary (5e éd. 1979), functus officio est défini ainsi: [TRADUCTION] «une fonction remplie»:

> [TRADUCTION] Ayant rempli sa fonction, s'étant acquitté de sa charge ou ayant réalisé son objectif et n'ayant donc plus aucun pouvoir ni compétence. S'applique à un fonctionnaire dont le mandat est expiré et qui n'a donc plus de pouvoir officiellement; également à un acte, à un pouvoir, à un organisme, etc., qui a atteint l'objectif visé lors de sa constitution et n'a donc plus aucun autre effet.

1989 CanLII 41 (SCC)

The doctrine of functus officio states that an adjudicator, be it an arbitrator, an administrative tribunal, or a court, once it has reached its decision cannot afterwards alter its award except to correct clerical mistakes or errors arising from an accidental slip or omission (Re Nelsons Laundries Ltd. and Laundry, Dry Cleaning and Dye House Workers' International Union, Local No. 292 (1964), 44 D.L.R. (2d) 463 (B.C.S.C.)) "To allow adjudicator to again deal with the matter of its own volition, without hearing the entire matter 'afresh' is contrary to this doctrine" (appellants' factum, at p. 19).

In Re Nelsons Laundries Ltd., Verchere J. cited Lewis v. Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Co. (1913), 13 D.L.R. 152 (B.C.C.A.), at p. 154:

> The question then is, when is an award made? In my opinion, when the arbitrator has done all that he can do, namely, reduce it to writing, and publish it as his award.

In M. Hodge and Sons Ltd. v. Monaghan (1983), 43 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 162 (Nfld. C.A.), Morgan J.A. stated that (at p. 163):

> Whether or not the trial judge was in error in the first instance in declaring the proceedings a nullity, and ordering the Writ of Summons and Statement of Claim to be struck out, is not relevant to the issue now before us. The order given was, by its very nature, final, and even if made in error it could not be amended by the judge who gave it .... Clearly then the learned judge was functus officio and without jurisdiction to hear the matter.

Treatise authors dealing with administrative law issues have been surprisingly frugal in their treatment of the functus officio doctrine. Perhaps the most concise statement of the doctrine can be found in Pépin and Ouellette, Principes de contentieux administratif (2nd ed. 1982), at p. 221:

> [TRANSLATION] In the case of quasi-judicial acts, the courts have held that decisions made in due form are irrevocable. To some extent the approach taken has been that once a government body has granted or recognized the rights of an individual, they cannot be challenged by the power of review: individuals are entitled to legal security in decisions. Once the decision is made, the file

En vertu du principe du functus officio, une instance décisionnelle, qu'il s'agisse d'un arbitre, d'un tribunal administratif ou d'une cour de justice ne peut modifier sa décision après l'avoir rendue, sauf afin de rectifier des fautes matérielles ou des erreurs imputables à un lapsus ou à une omission (Re Nelsons Laundries Ltd. and Laundry, Dry Cleaning and Dye House Workers' International Union, Local No. 292 (1964), 44 D.L.R. (2d) 463 (C.S.C.-B.)) [TRADUCTION] «Permettre à l'instance décisionnelle de se pencher encore sur la question de sa propre initiative, sans réentendre toute l'affaire est contraire à ce principe» (mémoire des appelants, à la p. 19).

Dans la décision Re Nelsons Laundries Ltd., le juge Verchere cite l'arrêt Lewis v. Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Co. (1913), 13 D.L.R. 152 (C.A.C.-B.), à la p. 154:

> [TRADUCTION] Il s'agit donc de déterminer à quel moment la décision a été rendue. À mon avis, c'est lorsque l'arbitre a tout fait ce qu'il pouvait faire, c'est-à-dire lorsqu'il a consigné sa décision par écrit et l'a publiée à ce titre.

Dans l'arrêt M. Hodge and Sons Ltd. v. Monaghan (1983), 43 Nfld. & P.E.I.R. 162 (C.A.T.-N.), le juge Morgan affirme (à la p. 163):

> [TRADUCTION] La question de savoir si le juge de première instance a commis une erreur au départ en déclarant que l'instance était nulle et en ordonnant la radiation du bref d'assignation et de la déclaration n'est pas pertinente en l'espèce. L'ordonnance prononcée était définitive de par sa nature même et, quoiqu'elle fût erronée, le juge qui l'a prononcée ne pouvait la modifier. De toute évidence, le juge était dès lors functus officio et n'avait pas compétence pour entendre l'affaire.

Les auteurs de traités de droit administratif sont étonnamment parcimonieux lorsqu'ils parlent du principe du functus officio. L'ouvrage de Pépin et Ouellette, intitulé Principes de contentieux administratif (2e éd. 1982), contient peut-être l'énoncé le plus concis de ce principe, à la p. 221:

> Dans les cas des actes quasi judiciaires, la jurisprudence considère que les décisions régulièrement rendues sont irrévocables. On veut en quelque sorte que les droits accordés ou reconnus aux administrés par l'Administration ne puissent être remis en cause par le biais d'un pouvoir de reconsidération; les administrés ont droit à la sécurité juridique des décisions. Une fois la décision is closed and the government body is "functus officio". The legislature will often also take the trouble to specify that the decision is "final and not appealable". The rule that quasi-judicial decisions are irrevocable also seems to apply to domestic tribunals. However, there may be exceptions to the rule when the initial decision is vitiated by a serious procedural defect, such as failure to observe the rules of natural justice.

In line with that doctrine, if the Board had discretion to consider making recommendations, and chose not to, that should be the end of the matter. The finality of the Board's decision can be ascertained from its own language when it made its orders. The actual report of the Board reveals that the hearings concluded on December 17, 1984. The Board members signed the report under the heading "Conclusions". Furthermore, given that the Council of the Alberta Association of Architects issued a notice of hearing of an appeal from the decision rendered by the Board, it too must have considered the hearing complete. In the actual findings of the Board, they imposed suspensions, effective immediately. The report is entitled "Report of the Practice Review Board", the rendering of which is the function of that tribunal. All these factors indicate that the Board had completed its function and had rendered its final report.

It seems to me that there is a fundamental flaw in the reasoning of the Alberta Court of Appeal. If the Board was not functus officio after handing down its decision, at what point does it become so? In this case an appeal was filed, though not heard because the original ruling was quashed. If the Board is not functus officio when the decision is handed down, it must certainly be so by the time an appeal is filed. If not, then the logical conclusion would be that the Board could sit again to redetermine a matter even after an appeal had been heard, for there is no principled basis on which to say that at some point after the decision has come down the Board becomes functus officio, and there seems no way to rationally define an exception for the rare circumstance where the Board fails to consider the exercise of a discretionrendue, le dossier est fermé et l'Administration est «functus officio». Souvent d'ailleurs, le législateur prendra la peine de préciser que la décision est «finale et sans appel». La règle de l'irrévocabilité des décisions à caractère quasi judiciaire semble s'appliquer également aux tribunaux domestiques. Cependant, la règle pourra souffrir des exceptions lorsque la décision initiale est entachée d'un vice de procédure grave comme l'inobservance d'un principe de justice naturelle.

Suivant ce principe, si la Commission pouvait à sa discrétion envisager de faire des recommandations et qu'elle a choisi de s'en abstenir, l'affaire s'arrête là. Le caractère définitif de la décision de la Commission peut s'inférer du langage qu'elle emploie dans ses ordonnances. Le rapport de la Commission indique que les audiences ont pris fin le 17 décembre 1984. Les membres de la Commission ont signé le rapport sous la rubrique «Conclusions». De plus, vu que le Conseil de l'Association des architectes de l'Alberta avait déposé un avis d'appel contre la décision rendue par la Commission, lui aussi doit avoir considéré que l'audition était terminée. Dans sa décision, la Commission a imposé des suspensions exécutoires immédiatement. Le rapport est intitulé [TRADUCTION] «Rapport de la Commission de révision des pratiques». Il a été rendu dans l'exercice des fonctions de ce tribunal. Tous ces facteurs révèlent que la Commission avait complété sa fonction et rendu son rapport final.

Le raisonnement de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta me semble entaché d'un vice fondamental. Si la Commission n'est pas functus officio après le prononcé de sa décision, quand le devient-elle? En l'espèce, un appel a été interjeté bien qu'il n'ait jamais été entendu puisque la décision initiale a été annulée. Si la Commission n'est pas functus officio lorsqu'elle prononce sa décision, elle doit certainement l'être au moment où cette dernière est portée en appel. Sinon, il faudrait logiquement conclure que la Commission pourrait siéger de nouveau pour réexaminer une affaire même après l'audition de l'appel. Aucun principe en effet ne permet d'affirmer que la Commission devient functus officio à un certain moment après le prononcé de sa décision, et il semble rationnellement impossible de faire une exception pour le rare cas ary duty. In my view, this point should be fatal to the respondents.

If a tribunal has discretion, i.e., if it may consider making recommendations, and chooses not to, there is no authority in the Architects Act that permits it to change its mind on its own initiative. Furthermore, once a board acts ultra vires, it should not be allowed to rectify the infirmities of its disposition according to its own predilections. Standards of consistency, certainty, and finality must be preserved for the effective development of the complex administrative tribunal system in Canada. Either a board is compelled to act in a prescribed manner, or it is prohibited from so acting. Allowing the Board to reopen the hearing, without an explicit provision in the enabling statute, would create considerable confusion in the law relating to powers of administrative tribunals to rehear or redecide matters.

In most administrative decisions, the tribunal does not address the fact that it has considered all of its discretionary powers but has elected to invoke only a few of those powers. I agree with the holding in Huneault v. Central Mortgage and Housing Corp. (1981), 41 N.R. 214 (F.C.A.), that a tribunal should not be allowed to reserve the exercise of its remaining powers for a later date. The Board could not attempt to retain jurisdiction to make recommendations to Council once it has made a final order, as the parties would never have the security of knowing that the decision rendered has finally determined their respective rights in the matter.

There are, of course, exceptions to the general rule that an arbitrator who has reached a final decision becomes functus officio and cannot afterwards alter his award. For example an adjudicator may correct clerical mistakes or errors arising from an accidental slip or omission (Lodger's International Ltd. v. O'Brien (1983), 45 N.B.R. (2d) 342 (N.B.C.A.); Re Nelsons Laundries Ltd., supra). However, the Board in the present case is où la Commission fait défaut de considérer l'exercice d'un pouvoir discrétionnaire. À mon avis, ce point devrait être fatal aux intimés.

Si un tribunal détient un pouvoir discrétionnaire, c.-à-d. s'il peut envisager de faire des recommandations et s'il choisit de ne pas le faire, l'Architects Act ne l'autorise aucunement à changer d'avis de sa propre initiative. En outre, une fois qu'une commission agit de façon ultra vires, elle ne devrait pas pouvoir corriger les déficiences de sa décision selon son bon vouloir. Les normes de constance, de certitude et de caractère définitif des décisions doivent être préservées si on veut assurer l'efficacité du système complexe des tribunaux administratifs au Canada. De deux choses l'une: ou bien une commission est tenue d'agir de la manière prescrite ou bien il lui est interdit d'agir. Permettre à la Commission de rouvrir l'audition, sans que la loi habilitante ne le prévoie expressément, serait de nature à créer une confusion considérable dans le droit en ce qui concerne les pouvoirs qu'ont les tribunaux administratifs de réentendre ou de décider à nouveau une affaire.

Dans la plupart des décisions administratives, le tribunal ne s'arrête pas à la question de savoir s'il a considéré tous les pouvoirs discrétionnaires dont il est investi, mais a choisi de n'en exercer que quelques-uns. Je suis d'accord avec l'arrêt Huneault c. Société centrale d'hypothèques et de logement (1981), 41 N.R. 214 (C.A.F.), portant qu'il ne devrait pas être loisible à un tribunal de réserver pour une date ultérieure l'exercice de ses autres pouvoirs. Une fois prononcée son ordonnance définitive, la Commission ne pouvait tenter de conserver son pouvoir de faire des recommandations au Conseil, car les parties n'auraient jamais eu la certitude que la décision rendue avait déterminé leurs droits respectifs de façon définitive.

Il y a évidemment des exceptions à la règle générale portant qu'un arbitre ayant prononcé une décision définitive devient functus officio et ne peut modifier cette décision par la suite. Par exemple, une instance décisionnelle peut corriger des erreurs matérielles ou des fautes imputables à un lapsus ou à une omission (Lodger's International Ltd. v. O'Brien (1983), 45 R.N.-B. (2e) 342 (C.A.N.-B.); Re Nelsons Laundries Ltd., précité).

not seeking to correct a slip or clerical error. If it had the option to consider making recommendations, and yet chose not to, that choice does not detract from the finality of the decision.

When a decision is rendered with nothing to be completed, there is no doubt that the adjudicator is functus officio: any further action would be entirely without authority (Slaight Communications Inc. v. Davidson, [1985] 1 F.C. 253 (C.A.), affirmed [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1038). Hence, if the Board is seen as having discretion whether or not to consider making recommendations, and the Alberta Court of Appeal decision is left undisturbed, the doctrine of functus officio would be rendered nugatory.

In Lodger's International Ltd., supra, the New Brunswick Court of Appeal dealt with a series of orders by the New Brunswick Human Rights Commission. The Commission first ordered an employer to compensate two employees. When the employer did not comply, the Commission renewed the order with a time limit for payment. Section 21(2) of the Human Rights Act provided that the orders were "final". The court held that the second order was improper and that the Commission was functus officio after the first order, because s. 21 did not authorize subsequent orders. La Forest J.A. (now of this Court), writing for the court, addressed the issue of whether the Commission was empowered to make such a series of orders and concluded that (at p. 352):

> It would take strong words indeed to convince me that the legislature ever intended to give this kind of power to an administrative body, however lofty its goals and however liberally we are expected to construe the statute to facilitate the achievement of these goals.

Unlike the enabling statute in Grillas v. Minister of Manpower and Immigration, [1972] S.C.R. 577, where the Immigration Appeal Board had statutory jurisdiction to hold a rehearing under En l'espèce, toutefois, la Commission ne tente pas de corriger un lapsus ou une erreur matérielle. Si elle avait la possibilité d'envisager de faire des recommandations et a choisi de ne pas le faire, ce choix n'altère en rien le caractère définitif de la décision.

Lorsqu'une décision est rendue et qu'il ne reste rien à compléter, l'instance décisionnelle est incontestablement functus officio: toute mesure additionnelle serait prise en l'absence de toute compétence (Slaight Communications Inc. c. Davidson, [1985] 1 C.F. 253 (C.A.), confirmé par [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1038). Donc, si la Commission est perçue comme ayant discrétion pour décider de faire ou non des recommandations et si l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta est maintenu, le principe du functus officio serait privé de tout effet.

Dans l'arrêt Lodger's International Ltd., précité, la Cour d'appel du Nouveau-Brunswick était saisie d'une série d'ordonnances prononcées par la Commission des droits de l'homme du Nouveau-Brunswick. La Commission avait d'abord ordonné à un employeur d'indemniser deux employés. L'employeur ne s'étant pas exécuté, la Commission a renouvelé l'ordonnance en l'assortissant d'un délai de paiement. Le paragraphe 21(2) de la Loi sur les droits de l'homme prévoit que les ordonnances sont «définitive[s]». La cour a statué que la seconde ordonnance était irrégulière et que la Commission était functus officio après avoir rendu la première ordonnance, parce que l'art. 21 ne l'autorisait pas à rendre d'autres ordonnances. S'exprimant au nom de la cour, le juge La Forest (maintenant de notre Cour) a abordé la question de savoir si la Commission avait le pouvoir de prononcer une telle série d'ordonnances et a conclu ce qui suit (aux pp. 352 et 353):

> Il faudrait des arguments bien solides pour me convaincre que la Législature a jamais eu l'intention de conférer ce genre de pouvoir à un organisme administratif, si nobles que soient ses objectifs et si libérale que soit l'interprétation escomptée de la loi pour faciliter la réalisation de ces objectifs.

Contrairement à la loi habilitante en cause dans Grillas c. Ministre de la Main-d'Oeuvre et de l'Immigration, [1972] R.C.S. 577, où, en vertu de l'art. 15 sur la Loi sur la Commission d'appel de

s. 15 of the Immigration Appeal Board Act, there is no authority in the Architects Act for the Board to hold a rehearing. Cité de Jonquière v. Munger, [1964] S.C.R. 45, also supported a policy favouring the finality of decisions unless the statute dictates otherwise. Upholding the unanimous decision of the Quebec Court of Appeal, Cartwright J., for the Court, held that (at p. 48):

> I am satisfied that the council had the right to interpret the award but not to amend it. This does not mean, however, that it did not have the right to correct a simple clerical error. Anybody having quasi-judicial powers must have such a right, otherwise the consequences of a simple slip in drafting an award might be disastrous.

Furthermore, I agree with the holding in M. Hodge and Sons Ltd., supra, that the fact that the original decision was wrong or made without jurisdiction is irrelevant to the issue of functus officio (at p. 163):

> The order given was, by its very nature, final, and even if made in error it could not be amended by the judge who gave it.

(2) The Board's Jurisdiction to Rehear

The Alberta Court of Appeal interpreted the Architects Act, and Regulation 175/83, as imposing a duty on the Board to consider whether to make a recommendation to the Governing Council or Complaint Review Committee.

Despite the ambiguous language, my colleague, Sopinka J., concludes that the Act imposes a duty on the basis that "it would be strange if the Board were empowered to conduct a lengthy practice review and had no duty to consider making recommendations" (p. 860). Given that "the Board conducted a valid hearing until it came to dispose of the matter" (p. 863), my colleague suggested that "[o]n the continuation of the Board's original proceedings ... either party should be allowed to supplement the evidence and make further representations which are pertinent to disposition of the matter" (p. 864). Hence, while it would l'immigration, la Commission d'appel de l'immigration avait compétence pour procéder à une nouvelle audition, l'Architects Act n'autorise aucunement la Commission à réentendre ainsi une affaire. L'arrêt Cité de Jonquière v. Munger, [1964] R.C.S. 45, confirme également que les décisions doivent être définitives à moins que la loi ne prévoie le contraire. En confirmant l'arrêt unanime de la Cour d'appel du Québec, le juge Cartwright statue au nom de la Cour (à la p. 48):

> [TRADUCTION] Je suis convaincu que le conseil avait le droit d'interpréter la décision mais non de la modifier. Cela ne signifie pas toutefois qu'il n'avait pas le droit de corriger une simple erreur d'écriture. Toute entité dotée de pouvoirs quasi judiciaires doit avoir ce droit, sinon la moindre petite erreur de rédaction pourrait avoir des conséquences désastreuses.

De plus, je souscris à la conclusion de la cour dans l'arrêt M. Hodge and Sons Ltd., précité, selon laquelle le fait que la décision initiale était erronée ou que la cour a agi sans compétence ne revêt aucune pertinence en ce qui a trait à la question du functus officio (à la p. 163):

> [TRADUCTION] L'ordonnance prononcée était définitive de par sa nature même et, quoiqu'elle fût erronée, le juge qui l'a prononcée ne pouvait la modifier.

2) La compétence de la Commission pour réentendre une affaire

Dans son interprétation de l'Architects Act et du règlement 175/83, la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a conclu que ces textes imposaient à la Commission l'obligation d'envisager si elle devait faire une recommandation au Conseil ou au Comité d'examen des plaintes.

Malgré le langage ambigu de ces textes législatifs, mon collègue le juge Sopinka conclut que la Loi impose une telle obligation parce qu'«[i]l serait pour le moins étrange que la Commission ait le pouvoir de procéder à une révision détaillée des pratiques sans qu'elle soit tenue d'envisager la possibilité de faire des recommandations» (p. 860). Étant donné que «la Commission a tenu une audience valide jusqu'au moment de trancher la question» (p. 863), mon collègue postule qu'«à la continuation des procédures initiales par la Commission, chaque partie devrait pouvoir compléter la preuve et présenter d'autres arguments perti-provide for the presentation of supplementary evidence, the rehearing itself would not be conducted afresh, but rather as a "continuation of the Board's original proceedings".

This analysis does have a certain intuitive appeal: given that a Practice Review Board does exist, and has a certain function to fulfill, it should be allowed, or rather required, to perform that function. However, the issue here is precisely that the Board did exercise that function, albeit illegally.

There is no dispute that when making the final orders it did, the Board clearly exceeded its jurisdiction. The Chairman of the Board himself set out the Board's functions and explicitly recognized that:

> [T]his is not a complaint review where we are trying to find fault or guilt on specific complaints. This is a practice review, and as a result we are given the responsibility of trying to review and understand at the fullest extent possible what has taken place, and as a result if the fullest extent of which has taken place, make findings and recommendations to the profession.

Following this introduction, the Board embarked on an adjudicatory path which the courts found to be wholly ultra vires. If it had a duty to consider whether to make a recommendation to the Complaint Review Committee, it did not do so.

Even though the Board was wrong in its initial decision, the question is whether that precludes the Board from now attempting to correctly carry out its function. According to my colleague, as the Board's disposition was a nullity, it amounts to no disposition at all in law: "a tribunal, which makes a determination which is a nullity, has been permitted to reconsider the matter afresh and render a valid decision" (p. 862) (emphasis added), relying on Re Trizec Equities Ltd. and Area Assessor Burnaby-New Westminster (1983), 147 D.L.R.

nents aux fins de régler l'affaire» (p. 864). Par conséquent, même si la nouvelle audition permettait aux parties de présenter des éléments de preuve additionnels, cette audition ne constituerait pas un réexamen de la question dans son entier mais plutôt la «continuation des procédures initiales par la Commission».

Intuitivement, cette analyse offre un certain attrait: étant donné que la Commission de révision des pratiques existe et qu'elle a une certaine fonction à remplir, elle devrait être autorisée à exercer cette fonction ou plutôt y être tenue. En l'espèce, cependant, le litige porte précisément sur le fait que la Commission a bel et bien exercé cette fonction, même si elle l'a fait dans l'illégalité.

Il est admis que lorsqu'elle a prononcé ses ordonnances définitives, la Commission a clairement outrepassé sa compétence. Le président de la Commission a lui-même décrit les fonctions de la Commission et reconnu explicitement que:

> [TRADUCTION] [I]l ne s'agit pas d'un examen de plaintes où nous essayons de déterminer la faute ou la culpabilité à l'égard de plaintes précises. Il s'agit d'une révision des pratiques et, en conséquence, il nous incombe de tenter de revoir et de comprendre le mieux possible ce qui s'est passé et, par conséquent, de tirer des conclusions et de faire des recommandations à la profession.

Après cette introduction, la Commission s'est engagée dans un processus décisionnel que les tribunaux ont ensuite jugé entièrement ultra vires. Si elle avait l'obligation d'envisager de faire des recommandations au Comité de révision des plaintes, elle ne l'a pas fait.

Même si la Commission a commis une erreur en prononçant sa décision initiale, il s'agit de déterminer si cela l'empêche de tenter cette fois d'exercer correctement sa fonction. Selon mon collègue, comme la décision de la Commission était nulle de nullité absolue, ce qui équivaut en droit à une absence totale de décision: «le tribunal dont la décision est nulle a été autorisé à réexaminer la question dans son entier et à prononcer une décision valide» (pp. 862 et 863) (je souligne), s'appuyant sur la décision Re Trizec Equities Ltd. and Area Assessor Burnaby-New Westminster (1983), 147 D.L.R. (3d) 637 (C.S.C.-B.), où le juge

(3d) 637 (B.C.S.C.), where McLachlin J. (now of this Court) wrote, at p. 643:

> I am satisfied both as a matter of logic and on the authorities that a tribunal which makes a decision in the purported exercise of its power which is a nullity, may thereafter enter upon a proper hearing and render a valid decision: Lange v. Board of School Trustees of School District No. 42 (Maple Ridge) (1978), 9 B.C.L.R. 232 (B.C.S.C.); Posluns v. Toronto Stock Exchange et al. (1968), 67 D.L.R. (2d) 165, [1968] S.C.R. 330. In the latter case, the Supreme Court of Canada quoted from Lord Reid's reasons for judgment in Ridge v. Baldwin, [1964] A.C. 40 at p. 79, where he said:
> > I do not doubt that if an officer or body realises that it has acted hastily and reconsiders the whole matter afresh, after affording to the person affected a proper opportunity to present its case, then its later decision will be valid. [Emphasis added.]

These precedents distinctly indicate that whenever special circumstances do warrant reconsideration by an administrative tribunal, such is to take place "afresh", not merely as a continuation of the tainted process now sought to be corrected.

Furthermore, Re Trizec dealt with a procedural error by the Court of Revision. While acting wholly within the domain of its substantive jurisdiction, the Court of Revision increased an assessment against a taxpayer before allowing the taxpayer to be heard. Two days later, at the request of the taxpayer, the court reconvened and a hearing was conducted. Hence, this case is distinguishable on at least three grounds:

(1) the court in Re Trizec was instructed to consider the matter afresh and conduct a proper hearing; the Alberta Court of Appeal in Chandler allowed the Board to continue its original proceeding;

(2) the court, acting within its jurisdiction, made a procedural error which it subsequently corrected; the Board in Chandler was not

McLachlin (maintenant de notre Cour) écrit à la p. 643:

> [TRADUCTION] Je suis convaincue, tant sur le plan logique que sur celui de la doctrine et de la jurisprudence, que le tribunal qui, dans le cadre présumé de l'exercice de sa compétence, rend une décision annulée par la suite, peut ensuite tenir une audience régulière et rendre une décision valide: Lange v. Board of School Trustees of School District No. 42 (Maple Ridge) (1978), 9 B.C.L.R. 232 (C.S.C.-B.); Posluns v. Toronto Stock Exchange et al. (1968), 67 D.L.R. (2d) 165, [1968] R.C.S. 330. Dans ce dernier arrêt, la Cour suprême du Canada a cité les motifs du jugement prononcé par lord Reid dans Ridge v. Baldwin, [1964] A.C. 40, à la p. 79, où il affirme:
> > Je ne doute point que dans l'éventualité où un fonctionnaire ou un organisme se rend compte qu'il a agi précipitamment et réexamine la question dans son entier, après avoir accordé à la personne intéressée la possibilité suffisante de faire valoir son point de vue, la seconde décision qu'il rendra sera valide. [Je souligne.]

D'après cette jurisprudence, il est clair que lorsqu'en raison de circonstances particulières, un tribunal administratif est justifié de réexaminer une affaire, ce dernier doit procéder à un réexamen de la question dans son entier et non à la simple continuation du processus vicié que l'on tente maintenant de corriger.

En outre, dans la décision Re Trizec, il s'agissait d'une erreur de procédure commise par la Cour de révision. Tout en respectant les limites de sa compétence sur le plan du fond, la Cour de révision avait augmenté une cotisation établie à l'encontre d'un contribuable avant même d'entendre ce dernier. Deux jours plus tard, à la demande du contribuable, la cour a été convoquée de nouveau et a tenu une audition. Cette affaire doit être distinguée sur au moins trois aspects:

(1) dans Re Trizec, on a ordonné à la cour de réexaminer l'affaire et de procéder à une audience régulière; dans Chandler, la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a permis à la Commission de continuer ses procédures initiales;

(2) la cour, agissant dans les limites de sa compétence, a commis une erreur de procédure qu'elle a ensuite corrigée; dans Chandler, la

empowered at the substantive level to make any of the findings it did; and

(3) the taxpayer itself requested a hearing, whereas the Board in Chandler reopened the proceedings on its own initiative.

The issues in Lange v. Board of School Trustees of School District No. 42 (Maple Ridge) (1978), 9 B.C.L.R. 232 (B.C.S.C.), relied upon in Re Trizec, were almost identical. A teacher was dismissed on three grounds of misconduct, yet was heard on only two of those grounds. He was then heard on the third ground and the dismissal was upheld.

The suggestion that the Board's original proceedings be continued is especially disturbing. It would set a dangerous precedent in expanding the powers of administrative tribunals beyond the wording or intent of the enabling statute. Furthermore, it would erode the protection of fairness and natural justice which every citizen of this country has a right to expect from administrative tribunals. The original hearing was conducted under the mistaken belief by the Board that it could make certain orders, despite the Chairman's introductory words. The Chairman's comments, reproduced above, clearly indicated that the hearings were intended to be a practice review rather than an inquiry into allegations of unprofessional conduct.

Kryczka J. of the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench held that, given the failure to inform the appellants that they were facing any such discipline charges or allegations, "it is difficult for me to conceive how the eventual result could be characterized as anything other than a travesty of justice". It might be that the appellants would have entered into a different course or line of defense at the hearing had they suspected that they were being investigated with respect to matters entirely outside the scope of the Board's jurisdiction. Unaware and not informed of the discipline charges that were in fact contemplated by the Board, appellants were not legally in a position

Commission n'avait pas le pouvoir, sur le plan du fond, de formuler les conclusions en cause; et

(3) le contribuable a lui-même demandé une audience alors que dans Chandler, la Commission a rouvert l'instance de sa propre initiative.

Les questions en litige dans l'arrêt Lange v. Board of School Trustees of School District No. 42 (Maple Ridge) (1978), 9 B.C.L.R. 232 (C.S.C.-B.), invoqué dans Re Trizec, étaient presque identiques. Un professeur avait été congédié pour trois motifs d'inconduite mais n'avait pu témoigner qu'à l'égard de deux d'entre eux. Par la suite, il avait pu se faire entendre au sujet du troisième motif et le congédiement avait été confirmé.

La suggestion que les procédures initiales puissent être continuées est particulièrement inquiétante. Ce serait là créer un précédent dangereux que d'étendre les pouvoirs des tribunaux administratifs au-delà du texte ou de l'intention de leur loi habilitante. De plus, cela serait de nature à éroder la garantie d'équité et de justice naturelle à laquelle chaque citoyen de ce pays est en droit de s'attendre de la part des tribunaux administratifs. La Commission a tenu l'audience initiale en croyant à tort qu'elle pouvait prononcer certaines ordonnances, malgré les propos préliminaires tenus par le président. Les commentaires du président que j'ai déjà reproduits indiquent clairement que les audiences devaient constituer une révision des pratiques plutôt qu'un examen des plaintes portant sur la conduite non professionnelle.

En Cour du banc de la Reine de l'Alberta, le juge Kryczka a statué que, compte tenu de ce que les appelants n'ont pas été avisés qu'ils faisaient face à des accusations ou allégations de nature disciplinaire, [TRADUCTION] «il m'est difficile d'imaginer que le résultat éventuel puisse être considéré comme autre chose qu'un simulacre de justice». Les appelants auraient peut-être agi différemment ou présenté un autre genre de défense à l'audience s'ils avaient soupçonné qu'ils faisaient l'objet d'une enquête sur des questions excédant totalement la compétence de la Commission. Puisqu'ils n'étaient pas au courant ni informés des accusations de nature disciplinaire que la Commis-to prepare a full defense to the allegations and orders ultimately made against them.

Appellants further contend that, if upheld, the decision of the Alberta Court of Appeal must be taken as overturning the judgment of the same court in Canadian Industries Ltd. v. Development Appeal Board of Edmonton (1969), 71 W.W.R. 635, cited with approval in Grillas, supra, at pp. 588-89. Canadian Industries dealt with a board that held a hearing without giving notice to the appellant who was entitled to such notice as an interested party. The Board then held a rehearing of which proper notice was given, and decided, after hearing submissions, that its previous order should not be changed. Johnson J.A., for the Court of Appeal held that both orders had to be set aside. The first was a nullity as the appellant was not notified. The second was a nullity as well in the absence of clear statutory authority to conduct a rehearing.

As mentioned previously, there is no clear statutory language enabling the Board to conduct a rehearing. If the Board has a duty which it failed to fulfill, it can, depending on the circumstances of the case, be directed to review the entire matter afresh, and can be required to conduct a new hearing. Re Trizec and Lange, supra. However, if it sets out to do one thing and winds up doing something entirely different, any reexamination should not be construed as a "continuation of the Board's original proceedings".

I would like to briefly address the prima facie apprehension that a direction to the Board to conduct a new hearing is tantamount to "double adjudication". That would be a valid concern if the Board is seen as having discretion. It would then be making orders subsequent to its being rendered functus officio. However, if it has an imposed duty, a rehearing would only be required if the original hearing is determined to be a total nullity, sion envisageait de porter, les appelants n'étaient pas légalement en mesure de préparer une défense pleine et entière à l'égard des allégations et des ordonnances dont ils ont finalement fait l'objet.

Les appelants ajoutent que s'il est confirmé, l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta devra alors être considéré comme renversant l'arrêt de la même cour dans Canadian Industries Ltd. v. Development Appeal Board of Edmonton (1969), 71 W.W.R. 635, qui a été cité avec approbation dans l'arrêt Grillas, précité, aux pp. 588 et 589. L'arrêt Canadian Industries portait sur une audience tenue par une commission sans avis préalable à l'appelant, qui avait droit à un tel préavis en tant que partie intéressée. Après avoir donné les avis appropriés, la Commission a procédé à une nouvelle audition de l'affaire et a décidé, après avoir entendu les arguments, de ne pas modifier son ordonnance antérieure. Le juge Johnson a statué, au nom de la Cour d'appel, que les deux ordonnances devaient être annulées. La première était nulle parce que l'appelant n'avait pas été avisé. La deuxième était tout aussi nulle, parce que la loi n'autorisait pas clairement la tenue d'une nouvelle audition.

Comme nous l'avons déjà mentionné, aucun texte de loi n'habilite clairement la Commission à tenir une nouvelle audition. Si la Commission a omis de remplir une obligation qui lui incombe, il peut lui être ordonné, selon les circonstances de l'espèce, de reprendre l'examen de toute l'affaire et elle peut alors être tenue de procéder à une nouvelle audition. Re Trizec et Lange, précités. Cependant, si elle se propose de faire une chose et qu'en fin de compte elle fait quelque chose de tout à fait différent, tout réexamen de l'affaire ne devrait pas être considéré comme la «continuation des procédures initiales par la Commission».

J'aimerais aborder brièvement la question de la crainte prima facie que le fait d'ordonner à la Commission de tenir une nouvelle audition équivaille à une «double décision». Cette crainte pourrait être justifiée si l'on estimait que la Commission détient un pouvoir discrétionnaire. Elle prononcerait alors des ordonnances après être devenue functus officio. Cependant, si elle était dans l'obligation d'agir, la tenue d'une nouvelle and the case so warrants. In that case, the apprehension of allowing a tribunal to make a series of orders, Lodger's International Ltd., supra, would not arise. In the particular circumstances of this case, a rehearing would not be appropriate in my view.

audition ne s'imposerait que si l'audience initiale était jugée nulle de nullité absolue et si les circonstances le justifiaient. Dans ce cas, il n'y aurait pas lieu de craindre de permettre au tribunal de prononcer une série d'ordonnances, Lodger's International Ltd., précité. À mon avis, en l'espèce il ne conviendrait pas d'ordonner la tenue d'une nouvelle audience, vu les circonstances particulières de cette affaire.

(3) Mandamus

As the Court of Appeal twice referred to the principles of mandamus, I will address them as well. However, I agree with appellants that these principles have nothing to do with this appeal.

3) Mandamus

Puisque la Cour d'appel s'est référée à deux reprises aux principes du mandamus, j'en traiterai également. Je conviens toutefois avec les appelants que ces principes n'ont rien à voir avec le présent pourvoi.

Laidlaw J.A. set out the requirements for mandamus in Karavos v. Toronto, [1948] 3 D.L.R. 294 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 297:

> Before the remedy can be given, the applicant for it must show (1) "a clear, legal right to have the thing sought by it done, and done in the manner and by the person sought to be coerced" . . . ; (2) "The duty whose performance it is sought to coerce by mandamus must be actually due and incumbent upon the officer at the time of seeking the relief . . .»; (3) That duty must be purely ministerial in nature, "plainly incumbent upon an officer by operation of law or by virtue of his office, and concerning which he possesses no discretionary powers"; (4) There must be a demand and refusal to perform the act which it is sought to coerce by legal remedy . . . .

Dans l'arrêt Karavos v. Toronto, [1948] 3 D.L.R. 294 (C.A. Ont.), le juge Laidlaw décrit les conditions applicables à l'obtention d'un mandamus, à la p. 297:

> [TRADUCTION] Pour être en mesure d'obtenir ce redressement, le requérant doit démontrer (1) «qu'il a le droit, clairement prescrit par la loi, d'obtenir que la chose qu'il demande soit faite et ce, de la façon demandée et par la personne en cause» . . . ; (2) «la fonction dont on demande l'exercice par voie de mandamus doit réellement incomber au fonctionnaire en cause, au moment où le redressement est demandé» . . . ; (3) cette fonction doit être de nature purement ministérielle et «incomber directement à un fonctionnaire en vertu de la loi ou de la nature de son poste; il ne doit jouir d'aucun pouvoir discrétionnaire à cet égard»; (4) il doit y avoir eu demande et refus d'accomplir l'acte que l'on veut faire accomplir par voie judiciaire . . .

Hence, mandamus appears to be a remedy that would apply against a tribunal or authority, and not one to be invoked by it. If the Board declined to exercise jurisdiction, then mandamus would lie. However, that is not the case here. Quite the contrary; the Board took it upon itself to exercise more jurisdiction than in fact it had. That alone would undermine the Court of Appeal's application of mandamus to this case. Furthermore, if we are to follow the requirements set out above, none appear to be satisfied by the facts here:

Il appert donc que le mandamus s'applique à l'encontre d'un tribunal ou d'une autorité et qu'il ne peut être invoqué par ceux-ci. Si la Commission avait refusé d'exercer sa compétence, il y aurait lieu de délivrer un mandamus. Toutefois ce n'est pas le cas ici. C'est plutôt le contraire: la Commission a pris sur elle d'exercer des pouvoirs plus étendus que ceux qui lui étaient conférés. Ce seul fait militerait à l'encontre de l'application du mandamus à l'espèce par la Cour d'appel. En outre, si nous respectons les conditions susmentionnées applicables à l'obtention d'un mandamus les faits de l'espèce ne semblent satisfaire à aucune de celles-ci:

(1) There is no clear legal right in issue.

(2) The Board may have had discretion whether or not to make recommendations.

(3) Whether or not the Regulation confers discretion upon the Board is still an open question, and if the Board has a duty to consider making recommendations, it certainly has discretion whether or not to make them, and which ones to make, if any.

(4) There has been no demand by the appellants or refusal by the Board to perform, as is required by mandamus.

(4) Conclusion

On either interpretation of the ambiguous language in the Regulation, I am of the view that the appeal should succeed. If the Board had discretion, and decided to act in a certain manner, it is now functus officio. If it had an imposed duty which it did not perform, it cannot continue with a tainted hearing. For the reasons discussed above, mandamus is not a controlling factor in this appeal.

Therefore, I would allow the appeal, vacate the order of the Court of Appeal and restore the judgment of Brennan J. prohibiting the Board from acting any further in this matter, the whole with costs throughout.

Solicitors for the appellants: Code Hunter, Calgary.

1) Aucun droit clairement prescrit par la loi n'est en cause.

2) La Commission pouvait avoir le pouvoir discrétionnaire de décider de faire ou non des recommandations.

3) La question de savoir si le règlement confère un pouvoir discrétionnaire à la Commission demeure ouverte; si la Commission a le devoir de considérer de faire des recommandations, elle a certainement le pouvoir discrétionnaire de décider de les faire ou non, et de choisir la recommandation appropriée, le cas échéant.

4) Les appelants n'ont pas demandé qu'un acte soit accompli et la Commission n'a pas refusé de le faire, comme le requiert le mandamus.

4) Conclusion

Peu importe la façon dont on interprète le langage ambigu du règlement, j'estime que le pourvoi doit être accueilli. Si la Commission avait le pouvoir discrétionnaire d'agir et a décidé d'agir d'une certaine façon, elle est maintenant functus officio. Si elle avait le devoir d'agir et qu'elle ne l'a pas fait, elle ne peut poursuivre une audience viciée. Pour les motifs qui précèdent, le mandamus n'est pas un facteur déterminant en l'espèce.

Par conséquent, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'annuler l'ordonnance de la Cour d'appel et de rétablir le jugement du juge Brennan interdisant à la Commission de poursuivre l'affaire, le tout avec dépens dans toutes les cours.

Pourvoi rejeté, les juges LA FOREST et L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ sont dissidents.

In 1827, the ancestors of The Chippewas of Sarnia Band ("the Chippewas") lived on the Upper Reserve, an Indian reserve located near the St. Clair River. In November 1839, after negotiations with Head Chief Joshua Wawanosh and Chiefs Chibigun and Corning, Malcolm Cameron, a land speculator, purported to purchase 2,540 acres ("the disputed lands") located at the rear of the Upper Reserve. In 1840, Lieutenant Governor Arthur approved the sale in two orders-in-council of the Province of Upper Canada. The orders incorporated recommendations about the details of the sale made by Samuel P. Jarvis, the Acting Chief Superintendent of Indian Affairs. However, unlike other orders-in-council about land sales by the Chippewas, there was no reference to a surrender of the lands. Because of neglect and a dysfunctional bureaucracy administering Indian land, none of the normal procedures for a lawful surrender of the disputed lands was ever undertaken; however, in 1853, the disputed lands were conveyed to Cameron by Crown patent. The form of the letters patent was consistent with a surrender having been obtained. By 1861, Cameron was no longer on title.

In 1995, the Chippewas brought action, among other things, for a declaration that they retained their interest in the disputed lands because their ancestors had never formally surrendered the lands. By this time, the disputed lands were occupied by more than 2,000 different individuals, organizations and businesses ("the landowners") in the City of Sarnia, who traced their title to the Cameron patent. Until the action was commenced, the landowners had no way of knowing of the Chippewas' claim, having acquired their properties in good faith for good value with no knowledge and no reason to believe that the Chippewas had a claim.

The federal and provincial governments were defendants to the Chippewas' action, as were individual landowners and a class of defendants certified under the Class Proceedings Act, 1992, S.O. 1992, c. 6. The parties brought motions and cross-motions for summary judgment, none of which touched the Chippewas' claim seeking damages against Canada and Ontario. On the motions, the motions judge, Campbell J., among other things, declared that the Cameron patent was void ab initio, but he dismissed the action against the landowners and declared that they held title free and clear of any aboriginal title or treaty right. Campbell J. held that the landowners were entitled to the defence of good faith purchaser for value without notice, but he held that the defence could only operate after the passage of a 60-year limitation period. The result was that he held that the Chippewas' aboriginal and treaty rights were extinguished on August 26, 1921, and they were left with a claim for damages against the Crown. Campbell J.'s decision gave rise to six appeals and cross-appeals.

Held, the appeals and cross-appeals by Canada, Ontario and the landowners should be allowed; the appeal of the Chippewas should be dismissed; the action against the landowners should be dismissed; and the Chippewas' motion for summary judgment in respect of the invalidity of the Cameron patent should be dismissed.

As preliminary issues, the Chippewas' motion to introduce fresh evidence should be dismissed, and Ontario's objection to Campbell J.'s exercise of jurisdiction under the summary judgment rule should be rejected. Given the nature of the record, a trial judge would be in no better position to deal with the issues than the motions judge. Pursuant to s. 134(1)

(c) of the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, it would not be just to accede to Ontario's objection, particularly when Ontario had not raised the issue below.

Despite the many difficult legal issues, this case was first and foremost a factual case, and, in the usual circumstances of the summary judgment proceedings, the motion judge's findings and inferences should be given the deference of findings made at a trial. That said, there were several significant inferences that were unreasonable or that misapprehended or overlooked evidence. The motions judge was correct in concluding that there had been no surrender; however, he was incorrect in characterizing the Cameron transaction as a private sale. The negotiations were conducted with the knowledge and authority of Crown officials. The terms of sale were reviewed and the ultimate terms were dictated by the Crown for the protection of the Chippewas. The motions judge missed the evidentiary significance of the absence of any complaint by the Chippewas to the Cameron transaction. The other chiefs were aware of the transaction, and it could reasonably be inferred that Chief Wawanosh acted with the authority of the affected bands or that they accepted his actions once they became known. The inference of approval or acceptance was strengthened by reference to events that occurred between 1840 and 1855. These events, which included the Chippewas' inaction in the face of a survey of the disputed lands and their insistence on compliance with the terms of the sale agreement, indicated a communal awareness of the transaction and acceptance of it, in part, as a means to advance other community goals.

The motions judge erred by concluding that the surrender provisions set out in the Royal Proclamation had the force of law at the relevant time. He was bound by the decision of Ontario (Attorney General) v. Bear Island Foundation, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 570, which held that the surrender provisions of the Royal Proclamation were revoked by the Quebec Act. However, little turned on this error because surrender was necessary as a result of the protocol between the Crown and First Nations peoples that aboriginal title could be lost only by surrender and that a surrender required a voluntary, informed, communal decision to give up the land. In the immediate case, there was no surrender. The issues then were whether, in the absence of surrender, the Chippewas had a right to relief and whether their claims were barred by the application of a statutory limitation period or equitable doctrine.

The motions judge correctly concluded that the Chippewas' claim was not barred by any statutory limitation period. The applicability of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-50 and the Nullum Tempus Act, 1769 (U.K.), 9 Geo. III, c. 16 would presuppose that the Chippewas' claim was in effect a "proceeding by the Crown", but this was not the case. Insofar as the 1834 and 1859 pre-Confederation statutes were concerned, the motions judge was correct in his conclusion that neither statute evidenced the clear and plain intent necessary to extinguish aboriginal or treaty rights.

The issue then narrowed to whether the Chippewas were entitled to a declaration that the Cameron patent was void and that they were entitled to possession of the disputed lands. In particular, the issue was whether it was appropriate in deciding on a remedy for the court to consider that no claim was asserted for 150 years, and that innocent third parties may have relied on the apparent validity of the Crown patent. The issue of remedies had both a public and private law dimension. The sui generis nature of aboriginal title drew upon public law concepts but had to be understood in relation to traditional common law private property rights. Although it has fallen into disuse, the common law prerogative remedy to challenge the validity of a Crown patent, grant, charter or franchise was the writ of scire facias. Public law remedies are discretionary, and it was well established that public law remedies may be refused when there is delay in asserting a claim combined with reliance by innocen t third parties on the impugned act. The purported exercise of a statutory or prerogative power creates legitimate expectations that the law will protect. The administration of government is a human act and errors are inevitable. The rights of an aggrieved party must be reconciled with the interests of third parties and the interests of orderly administration.

Aboriginal rights, while an integral aspect of the Canadian legal landscape, did not exist in a vacuum. In the Canadian legal tradition, no right is absolute, not even constitutionally protected aboriginal rights, which must be directed towards the reconciliation of the pre-existence of aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown and with the rest of Canadian society. It was a basic principle of the Canadian legal system that the right asserted by the complaining party must be considered in relation to the rights of others. The complaining party cannot claim an automatic entitlement without regard to the consequences to the rights of others that might flow by reason of the complaining party's delay in asserting the claim. In the case of a claim to aboriginal title, a court must approach the issue of delay with extreme caution and with due regard to the historically vulnerable position of aboriginal peoples. In exercising its discretion, the court should have regard to the nature of the disputed act, the nature of the illegality committed, and its consequences. In the immediate case, the transaction did not occur without Crown intervention to ensure that the Chippewas' interests were protected and the failure to obtain a formal surrender was not such an error that the interests of third parties should be ignored. There was every indication that the Crown officials intended to follow the usual practice to obtain a formal surrender. The courts have a discretion to refuse a remedy with respect to the inadvertent error of a dysfunctional bureaucracy that had been relied upon for 150 years by innocent parties. Further, there was no adequate explanation for the delay that would excuse its impact. For almost 150 years, third party purchasers relied on the validity of the Cameron patent. There were exceptional circumstances in the immediate case that justified withholding a remedy that would vindicate aboriginal title.

Approaching the matter from a private law perspective, the issue was whether the remedies claimed by the Chippewas were subject to the discretion traditionally associated with equity. Their submission that equitable principles could have no bearing was unacceptable; their claims for a declaration or for a vesting order were equitable in origin and discretionary in nature. Their submission that a claim to aboriginal title was strictly legal in nature and immune from equitable principles was also unacceptable. The juridical nature of aboriginal title has been influenced and shaped by equitable principles. It was difficult to see why a right drawing so heavily on the principles of equity should from a remedial perspective be immune from the principles of equity. The modern conception of the private law that there has been a fusion of equitable and legal principles added weight to the argument that the discretionary factors associated with equitable remedies may be considered in the present case. As the Chippewas sought remedies that were discretionary in nature to vindicate a sui generis right that drew upon both common law and equitable sources, it was appropriate to consider the effect of their delay in asserting a remedy and the consequent impact upon third parties.

The Chippewas' reliance on the principle of nemo date quod non habet--no one gives what he does not have--did not preclude the consideration of discretionary factors. The principle did not automatically invalidate Crown patents. Where the validity of a patent was impugned, established legal principles required that the interests of third parties be considered. Delay in asserting a right gives rise to the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescence. The facts in the immediate case brought the case within the principles governing laches and acquiescence. Equity's protection of the good faith purchaser for value also was relevant to the claim advanced by the Chippewas. On the findings of the motions judge, all purchasers from Cameron were good faith purchasers for value. The defence was available to them, and the motions judge erred by qualifying the defence with a 60-year "equitable limitation period".

BY THE COURT: --

I. OVERVIEW OF THE PROCEEDINGS

A. The Chippewas' Claim

[1] The Chippewas of Sarnia Band ("the Chippewas") claim ownership of a parcel of land located in and around the City of Sarnia ("the disputed lands"). Prior to 1827, the disputed lands were part of a vast tract of land over which the Chippewa Nation [See Note 1 at end of document] had dominion. By 1827, the Chippewas had surrendered almost all of that territory to the Crown. They had, however, retained four reserves, including one referred to as the Upper Reserve, located on the St. Clair River near present-day Sarnia. The ancestors of the Chippewas of Sarnia lived on the Upper Reserve. The Upper Reserve originally occupied 10,280 acres. The disputed lands are the 2,540 acres located at the rear or back of the reserve furthest from the St. Clair River, and are presently occupied by over 2,000 different individuals, organizations and businesses.

[2] In November 1839, Malcolm Cameron, a politician and land speculator, purported to purchase the disputed lands from the Chippewas. The lands were eventually conveyed to him by Crown patent in 1853 ("the Cameron patent"). The present occupants of the disputed lands trace their title to the Cameron patent. The Chippewas claim that their ancestors never surrendered the disputed lands and that their interest in the land is the same now as it was in 1827.

[3] The Chippewas started this action in 1995. In essence, they seek declaratory relief recognizing their right to the disputed lands and damages for trespass and breach of fiduciary duty. If the Chippewas obtain the declaratory relief claimed, they would be entitled to possession of the land, although they have made it clear that they are ready and willing to negotiate with the federal and provincial governments and do not seek the wholesale eviction of the present occupiers of the property.

[4] The individual defendants, other than the Attorney General of Canada ("Canada") and Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Ontario ("Ontario"), occupy parts of the disputed land. They also represent the defendant class certified by Adams J. in 1996 under the Class Proceedings Act, 1992, S.O. 1992, c. 6. In this decision we refer to them collectively as the landowners.

B. The Motions for Summary Judgment

[5] Canada brought a motion for summary judgment asking that the parts of the Chippewas' claim seeking declaratory relief be dismissed. The landowners also brought a motion for summary judgment seeking the dismissal of the action against them on the grounds advanced by Canada in its motion and on other grounds applicable only to the individual defendants.

[6] Ontario supported both motions.

[7] The Chippewas responded with a cross-motion seeking summary judgment against all defendants on the parts of the claim seeking a declaration as to the Chippewas' rights to the disputed lands.

[8] None of the motions for summary judgment touched the parts of the claim seeking damages against Canada and Ontario. The trial of those claims awaits the result of these proceedings.

[9] The motions judge, Campbell J.:

-- dismissed Canada's motion for summary judgment;

-- allowed in part the landowners' motion for summary judgment, dismissed the action against them and declared that they held title free and clear of any aboriginal title or treaty right; and

-- allowed the Chippewas' motion to the extent that it sought a declaration of invalidity with respect to the letters patent issued to Malcolm Cameron in 1853, but dismissed the Chippewas' motion for a declaration that they continued to enjoy "aboriginal, treaty and constitutional rights" in the disputed lands.

[10] The motions judge's main findings were:

-- There was no evidence that the Chippewas ever surrendered the disputed lands.

-- The sale of the disputed lands by three chiefs of the Chippewas to Malcolm Cameron in 1839 was a private sale without formal surrender and as such was prohibited by common law and by the Royal Proclamation, 1763 (U.K.), R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 1 ("Royal Proclamation").

-- There was no evidence that the Chippewas ever expressed a free, voluntary and fully informed collective intention to release their interest in the lands or to consent to the sale to Cameron.

-- The Governor General, Lord Elgin, had no authority to issue a patent for the disputed lands in 1853. Therefore, the patent issued to Cameron was void ab initio and of no force and effect.

-- The Chippewas' interest in the lands continued to this day, unless extinguished by some constitutionally applicable statute, rule of law or principle of equity.

-- None of the limitations statutes relied upon by the parties operated to extinguish the Chippewas' interests in the lands or to bar the Chippewas' action for recovery of the lands.

-- The doctrines of laches, acquiescence and estoppel by election did not bar the Chippewas' action.

-- The defence of good faith purchaser for value without notice was a fundamental aspect of the applicable real property regime. This defence could, in appropriate cases, bar an aboriginal claim against an innocent third party purchaser.

-- Against ordinary property, the good faith purchaser for value without notice defence operated immediately upon purchase. Such an abrupt application, if applied to land subject to aboriginal title, would ignore the legal priority to be accorded to aboriginal rights and would result in the extinguishment of the Chippewas' title immediately in 1861.

-- The competing interests of the Chippewas and the innocent purchasers without notice would best be balanced by allowing the good faith purchaser without notice defence to operate only after 60 years. A 60-year equitable limitation period would protect aboriginal property interests against immediate extinguishment on sale to a good faith purchaser for value without notice.

-- The 60-year equitable limitation to the claim against the good faith purchaser began on August 26, 1861 and ended on August 26, 1921. As of August 26, 1921, no action had been commenced against any good faith purchaser. Therefore, the defence of good faith purchaser for value without notice operated to extinguish the Chippewas' aboriginal title and treaty rights in the lands on August 26, 1921.

-- The aboriginal rights which were extinguished as of August 26, 1921 have crystallized into a damage claim against the Crown.

[11] Based on his findings, the motions judge directed that the following order should issue:

(a) Canada's motion to dismiss the Chippewas' claim on the basis that the Cameron patent was valid was dismissed.

(b) The landowners' motion in respect of the validity of the 1853 Cameron patent was also dismissed.

(c) The Chippewas' motion in respect of the invalidity of the Cameron patent was allowed. A declaration was issued to the effect that the patent issued to Malcolm Cameron on August 13, 1853 was void ab initio and of no force and effect because there was no lawful surrender. Neither the orders-in-council of March 19, 1840 and June 18, 1840, which approved the sale to Cameron, nor the subsequent letters patent, extinguished the Chippewas' unceded, unsurrendered, common law and aboriginal interests in the lands.

(d) The Chippewas' motion for a declaration that they enjoyed continuing and unextinguished common law, aboriginal, treaty and constitutional rights in the lands was dismissed.

(e) The Chippewas' action for damages against the Crown was permitted to continue.

(f) The motion by the landowners was allowed. The Chippewas' claim against the landowners was dismissed on the basis that the defence of good faith purchaser for value without notice protected the landowners' title and that the application of an equitable limitation period of 60 years worked to extinguish all right, title and interest of the Chippewas in the disputed lands as of August 26, 1921. A declaration was issued to the effect that the present landowners held their title free and clear from any aboriginal title claims.

C. The Appeals and Cross-Appeals

[12] The motions judge's decision gave rise to six appeals and cross-appeals, all of which were argued during the last two weeks of June 2000. In particular:

-- Canada appealed from the dismissal of its motion for summary judgment, the order dismissing in part the landowners' motion for summary judgment, and the order allowing the Chippewas' motion. Canada sought an order dismissing that part of the Chippewas' claim in which the Chippewas asserted that the Crown had no authority, right or jurisdiction to issue the patent to Malcolm Cameron and a further order dismissing that part of the claim which alleged that the patent was void ab initio and unenforceable at law.

-- The Chippewas appealed from the orders allowing the landowners' motion for summary judgment and from the dismissal of the Chippewas' cross-motion for summary judgment. They sought an order declaring that they enjoyed continuing and unextinguished common law, statutory, aboriginal, treaty and constitutional rights in the disputed lands. Canada, Ontario and the landowners are respondents on the Chippewas' appeal.

-- The landowners cross-appealed in the Chippewas' appeal, seeking:

(a) an order declaring that the letters patent issued to Cameron were valid and created a valid interest in the lands in question;

(b) a declaration that the effect of the patent was to extinguish any aboriginal title or treaty rights in the lands; and

(c) a declaration that any right of action that the Chippewas may have had for recovery or enforcement of any interest in the land was barred by the operation of limitations statutes or by various equitable doctrines.

[13] Ontario cross-appealed in the Chippewas' appeal and sought an order granting the landowners' motion for summary judgment and an order dismissing the Chippewas' cross-motion. Ontario contended that the Cameron patent was valid and conveyed the lands to Cameron free of any interest of the Chippewas. Ontario also claimed that the doctrine of good faith purchaser for value without notice extinguished any claim that the Chippewas had from the time of the purchase rather than 60 years after the purchase.

[14] On January 27, 2000, the Chippewas moved to quash Ontario's appeal from the dismissal of Canada's motion for summary judgment and Canada's cross-appeal in the Chippewas' appeal. These motions were dismissed. [See Note 2 at end of document]

[15] The following representatives of First Nations appeared as intervenors on the appeals: Chief Richard K. Miskokomon on behalf of the Chippewas of the Thames, Chief Mary Jane Wardell on behalf of the Ojibways of Thessalon, Martin Bayer on behalf of the United Chiefs and Councils of Manitoulin and Chief Lisa Eshkakogan Ozawanimke on behalf of the Algonquin Nation in Ontario.

[16] The appellate proceedings were case-managed by Goudge J.A. who, among other things, determined the order of, and time allocations for, oral argument after consulting with all counsel. It was agreed by all parties that, given the nature of the judgment appealed from, none of the appeals and cross-appeals related to interlocutory orders and that, consequently, the proceedings were properly before this court. We are grateful to Goudge J.A. for his assistance. We are also grateful to counsel, not only for the quality of their oral arguments, but also for their cooperation in adhering to the times allocated for hearing the appeals.

D. Our Decision in a Nutshell

[17] In our view, these appeals and cross-appeals give rise to two main issues. First, was there a surrender of the disputed lands by the Chippewas to the Crown? Second, if there was no surrender, what remedies, if any, are the Chippewas entitled to?

[18] Although the first issue gave rise to questions that were essentially factual, much of the argument was focussed on whether the surrender provisions in the Royal Proclamation had the force of law at the relevant time and, if so, what effect any failure to comply with these provisions would have on the Cameron transaction. The motions judge held that the surrender procedures in the Royal Proclamation had the force of law at the relevant time, that these procedures were not followed and that the Chippewas never consented to or affirmed the Cameron transaction. Consequently, the following points were argued before us:

1. Did the surrender procedures set out in the Royal Proclamation have the force of law at the time of the sale to Cameron in 1839 and the subsequent letters patent in 1853?

2. Did the Chippewas surrender the disputed lands to the Crown?

3. If the lands were not surrendered, did the Chippewas nonetheless consent to or affirm the sale to Cameron?

[19] The first question has been authoritatively determined by this court in Ontario (Attorney General) v. Bear Island Foundation (1989), 68 O.R. (2d) 394, 32 O.A.C. 66 (C.A.), affd [1991] 2 S.C.R. 570, 4 O.R. (3d) 133n. This court held that the surrender provisions of the Royal Proclamation were revoked by the Quebec Act, 1774 (U.K.), R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 2. The motions judge was bound by this decision and, consequently, he erred in departing from its authority when he determined otherwise. However, we are of the view that, in this case, little turns on whether the surrender provisions of the Royal Proclamation had the force of law at the relevant time. Instead, we adopt the view that surrender was necessary as a result of the established protocol between the Crown and First Nations peoples that aboriginal title could be lost only by surrender to the Crown. The precise legal status of the Royal Proclamation at the time of the Cameron transaction is therefore of no consequence to our decision.

[20] On the second point, we accept the proposition that a surrender required a voluntary, informed, communal decision to give up the land and we agree with the motions judge that the Chippewas never surrendered the disputed lands to the Crown. However, we disagree with a number of the motions judge's findings relating to the Chippewas' participation in the Cameron transaction. This brings us to the third point.

[21] In our view, the evidence leads to the inescapable conclusion that, notwithstanding the absence of a surrender, the Chippewas accepted the sale to Cameron. This finding becomes important in our determination of the appropriate remedies.

[22] The following points were argued with respect to the remedies sought by the Chippewas:

4. Is the Chippewas' claim barred by any statutory limitation periods?

5. In the absence of a surrender, is the Cameron patent void ab initio or is the remedy subject to the exercise of the court's discretion?

6. Do the equitable defences of laches and acquiescence apply to bar the Chippewas' claim to the disputed lands?

7. Does the equitable defence of good faith purchaser for value apply to defeat the Chippewas' claim? If so, was the motions judge correct in finding that the defence of good faith purchaser for value was subject to an equitable 60-year limitation period before it can operate to extinguish the Chippewas' claim to the land?

8. If the Chippewas enjoy continuing and unextinguished rights in the disputed lands, should this court order that the Crown has a duty to negotiate in good faith with the Chippewas?

[23] The motions judge held that the Chippewas' claim was not barred by any statutory limitation period. He held further that in the absence of surrender, the Cameron patent was void ab initio and that the defences of laches and acquiescence could not be relied upon. The motions judge concluded, however, that the present occupiers of the land could rely on the doctrine of good faith purchaser without notice subject to a 60-year

"equitable limitation period" which in effect postponed the application of the doctrine.

[24] We agree with the motions judge that the Chippewas' claim is not barred by any statutory limitation period. However, we do not agree that the Cameron patent was void ab initio. In our view, the patent was valid on its face and continues to have legal effect unless and until a court decides to exercise its discretion to set it aside. We are of the view that the principles governing the availability of the relevant public and private law remedies militate against a court exercising its discretion in this case. Finally, we are of the view that the imposition of a 60-year "equitable limitation period" is not supportable in law. In the result, we are of the view that the Chippewas have no entitlement to the remedies they seek for the return of the disputed lands and that they are left with their claim in damages against Canada and Ontario.

II. PRELIMINARY ISSUES

[25] Two preliminary issues were raised by the parties. First, the Chippewas sought to introduce fresh evidence on their appeal. Second, Ontario challenged the motions judge's authority to decide the case on motions for summary judgment.

A. Chippewas' Motion to Introduce Fresh Evidence

[26] The Chippewas sought to introduce fresh evidence which generally fell into two categories:

(a) new evidence relating to sales of property within the disputed lands that occurred after the decision below; and

(b) further evidence of the circumstances surrounding the sale of Indian lands which was already addressed in the existing record.

[27] It was agreed that we would deal with the fresh evidence issue on the basis of counsel's written material. No oral submissions were made.

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

[28] The test for the admission of fresh evidence on appeal is that set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Public School Boards' Assn. of Alberta v. Alberta (Attorney General), [2000] 1 S.C.R. 44, 182 D.L.R. (4th) 561. See also R. v. Palmer, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 759, 106 D.L.R. (3d) 212. The requirements for the admission of fresh evidence are as follows:

1. The evidence should not generally be admitted if, by due diligence, it could have been adduced at trial.

2. The evidence must be relevant in the sense that it bears upon a decisive or potentially decisive issue in the proceeding.

3. The evidence must be credible in the sense that it is reasonably capable of belief.

4. The evidence must be such that if believed, it could reasonably, when taken with the other evidence adduced, be expected to have affected the result.

[29] In our view, the proposed fresh evidence does not meet these requirements. In particular, it is not evidence that if believed could reasonably, when taken with the other evidence, affect the result.

[30] The motion to admit fresh evidence is therefore dismissed.

B. The Summary Judgment Issue

[31] Ontario submits that the motions judge "significantly overstepped" the narrow role of a motions judge when he dealt with the motions that were brought before him. Ontario asserts that in his 241-page reasons for judgment, the motions judge assessed credibility, weighed evidence, made findings of fact on disputed evidence and generally dealt with the summary judgment motions in such a way as to conduct what was essentially a paper trial.

[32] Ontario accepts that, pursuant to rule 20.04 of the

Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, the motions judge was entitled to determine questions of law and to ". . . grant judgment accordingly". In particular, Ontario accepts that the motions judge could grant judgment on discrete issues of law such as the application of the doctrine of good faith purchaser for value without notice. However, Ontario submits that where the resolution of discrete issues of law required the motions judge to make findings of fact on evidence that was in conflict, the motions judge exceeded the jurisdiction given to him by Rule 20.

[33] We are prepared to accept that in some instances, the motions judge made findings of fact and drew inferences from evidence which was to some degree conflicting. We are, nonetheless, not disposed to give effect to Ontario's submissions on the summary judgment issue for the following reasons.

[34] Ontario participated fully in the summary judgment proceedings. None of the parties, including Ontario, took the position that, having regard to the voluminous evidence placed before the motions judge and the issues of law raised by the material, it was not appropriate to deal with the matter under Rule 20. To the extent that the parties, including Ontario, participated in what Ontario asserts was a paper trial, they got precisely what they agreed to: a resolution of clearly identified issues of fact and law on the basis of a paper record. In addition, Ontario filed no material on the motion that would in any way suggest that this was not an appropriate matter to be decided under Rule 20.

[35] Apart from the expert witnesses, there are no living witnesses who could give relevant evidence. Thus, if the action were to proceed to trial, the trial judge would be in no better position to deal with the issues than the motions judge, unless one were to accept Ontario's late submission that the trial judge would have an advantage from seeing and hearing the expert witnesses testify. In our opinion, absolutely nothing would be gained by sending this matter to trial.

[36] We are authorized by s. 134(1)(c) of the Courts of

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, to make a decision on appeal that ". . . is considered just". It would not, in our view, be "just" to accede to Ontario's position on the summary judgment issue, particularly where Ontario did not see fit to raise the issue below: see National Trust Co. v. Bouckhuyt (1987), 61 O.R. (2d) 640, 23 O.A.C. 40 (C.A.); Scarborough Golf & Country Club v. Scarborough (City) (1988), 66 O.R. (2d) 257, 31 O.A.C. 260 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [1989] 2 S.C.R. vi; Shaver Hospital for Chest Diseases v. Slesar (1979), 27 O.R. (2d) 383, 106 D.L.R. (3d) 377 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [1981] 1 S.C.R. xiii.

[37] We would not give effect to this ground of appeal.

III. THE FACTS

A. Introduction

[38] The summary judgment motions raised complex legal issues, turning in part on the interpretation of old statutes and documents, the nature and scope of arcane remedies, and traditional property law concepts, some of which seem to have more relevance to 17th-century England than to present-day Ontario. Despite the many difficult legal issues raised, however, this case is first and foremost a factual one. The determination of the Chippewas' claim is necessarily site-specific and primarily fact-driven. As the motions judge noted:

> This decision affects these lands only. As noted below in response to the argument in terrorem, this decision turns on the unique story that unfolded around these four square miles and the specific terms of the instruments affecting it; above all, the site-specific provisions of Treaty 29.

[39] The events giving rise to these proceedings spread over more than 200 years and are found in the thousands of historical documents filed by the parties and analyzed in the affidavits and cross-examinations of various experts. There was no viva voce evidence presented on the motions. The motions judge undertook an exhaustive review of the massive record. He told the story underlying this dispute with extraordinary clarity and vitality. We have borrowed liberally from his reasons (which unfortunately are not reported) in setting out the relevant facts.

[40] The motions judge made numerous findings of fact. Many were primary findings of fact based directly on information contained in the historical documents or found in the uncontested parts of the evidence of the various experts. Other findings were in the nature of inferences drawn from one or more of the primary findings of fact. The primary facts as found by the motions judge are not challenged. Some of the inferences he drew from those facts are, however, very much in dispute. In the unusual circumstances of these summary judgment proceedings, justice dictates that we approach the motions judge's findings of fact as though they were made at trial. We defer to the inferences he drew except where we conclude that they are based on a misapprehension of the evidence, a failure to consider material evidence, or where in light of the totality of the undisputed primary facts, we conclude that the inferences the motions judge drew were unreasonable. As will become evident, we do not accept some of the inferences drawn by the motions judge.

B. The Occupants of the Disputed Lands: Then and Now

[41] At the turn of the 18th century, the disputed lands were in Chippewa territory. The Chippewas were established over a vast expanse of land, including present-day southwestern Ontario. The Chippewa Nation consisted of three distinct groups who occupied different territories, but shared a common language and similar customs and traditions. The Mississauga Chippewas occupied southwestern Ontario. By 1760 they had established several seasonal villages in southwestern Ontario, including one on the St. Clair River near present-day Sarnia.

[42] The Chippewas lived in relatively small groups spread out over their vast territory. They survived by hunting, fishing, gathering, growing corn and harvesting maple sugar. To do so they moved from place to place within their lands on a seasonal basis. Groups of families, referred to as bands, shared a territory which supplied them with the necessary food, shelter and clothing. Within these regional bands, there were a number of smaller traditional bands consisting of 30 to 60 people. In the late 1820s, after the Chippewas had given up most of their land and began to settle on reserves, traditional distinctions between various bands became somewhat blurred and those who lived on particular reserves were seen as having a communal interest in that reserve. The evidence indicates that as of 1839 there were approximately six regional bands of Chippewas in southwestern Ontario, each of which had 250 to 350 members. The St. Clair regional band, the ancestors of the Chippewas of Sarnia, included approximately eight to 10 traditional bands.

[43] Each traditional band had a chief. The chief was usually the eldest son of the former chief, however, the band could choose someone else if it decided that the eldest son was not up to the task. The chief acted with the concurrence of the band as expressed at meetings of the principal men in the band, and had little authority to act on his own. The actual power of any particular chief depended in large measure on his own leadership abilities. The regional Chippewa bands came to recognize one chief as the Head Chief. The Head Chief was the primary spokesman in dealings with the Crown, but within the Chippewa community had no more power than the other chiefs.

[44] The traditional bands managed their own local affairs at Local Councils attended by the principal men of the band. Matters of general importance to the region were resolved at General Councils attended by the chiefs and principal men of the traditional bands within the region. Traditional bands within a region would come together on occasion at a principal village within the region, like the one near present-day Sarnia, to engage in various social activities and decide matters of regional importance.

[45] Today, the Chippewas live on what is left of the Upper Reserve. Their reserve occupies some 3,000 acres adjacent to the disputed lands. The disputed lands themselves have been divided into 2,276 properties. The properties are zoned for various uses ranging from agricultural to industrial. There are over 2,000 residences, five schools, five churches and a number of commercial and industrial properties located on the disputed lands. The Canadian National Railway Company's main line between Ontario and western Canada runs through the disputed lands.

[46] The individual defendants and the defendant class are the present occupants of the disputed lands. Until this action was commenced in 1995, they had no way of knowing or discovering the existence of the claim made by the Chippewas of Sarnia. They and their predecessors in title since 1861 are innocent of any illegality or prohibited act. They acquired the land in good faith for good value with no knowledge of and no reason to believe the Chippewas of Sarnia had any claim to the land. The individual defendants and their predecessors in title have developed the property at considerable expense. The motions judge described their investment in the property as being in the "hundreds of millions of dollars". He also observed that those who now live and work on the disputed lands have a "deep connection" with those lands.

C. The Time Line

[47] Before examining the relevant events in some detail, it is helpful to set out a chronology of the central events:

Date	Event
1756-1763	Southwestern Ontario, including the disputed lands, was under the dominion of the Chippewa Nation. Both the French and English, who were at war, claimed the area as part of their North American empires. The white men in the area were primarily involved in military operations or fur trading.
1763	The Treaty of Paris ended the seven-year war between France and England. The French Crown ceded New France to England and also relinquished any other claim to present-day Ontario. Southwestern Ontario, including the disputed lands, became part of British North America and fell under the control of the English Crown.

October 7, 1763 George III, by order-in-council, issued a Royal Proclamation. The Proclamation created four new colonies, including Quebec, from the land ceded to the English Crown by France in the Treaty of Paris, established governments for those colonies, and addressed the status of Indian lands throughout British North America. Southwestern Ontario was not part of any of the established colonies and was instead part of what was referred to in the Proclamation as the "interior" Indian territory.

1764 William Johnson, the Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the northern district, convened a large meeting with the First Nations chiefs at Niagara. Many Chippewa chiefs were present. The English Crown and the chiefs entered into the Treaty of Niagara. William Johnson read the 1763 Proclamation as it related to Indian lands and the regulation of trade. The chiefs promised to keep the peace and deliver up any prisoners taken during the previous hostilities.

1774 The British Parliament passed the Quebec Act. The Act expanded the boundaries of the colony of Quebec to include southwestern Ontario, introduced French civil law into that colony, guaranteed religious freedom and altered the form of colonial government. The effect, if any, of the Quebec Act on the provisions relating to Indian lands in the Royal Proclamation is the subject of dispute in this litigation.

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

1791	By the Constitutional Act, 1791 (U.K.), R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 3, the British Parliament divided Quebec into the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada. Southwestern Ontario was part of Upper Canada.
1818 to 1825	The Chippewas and the Crown conducted a series of negotiations aimed at the surrender of a large part of the Chippewas' territory to the Crown for settlement purposes.
April 1825	The Chippewas and the Crown entered into Provisional Treaty 271/2 whereby the Chippewas gave up their rights to some 2.2 million acres of land referred to as the Huron tract. The Chippewas, however, maintained their rights to four specific areas (reserves), one of which, the Upper Reserve, included the disputed lands.
July 10, 1827	The land surrendered by the Chippewas to the British Crown in provisional Treaty 271/2 and the four reserves were surveyed, and the Chippewas and the British Crown entered into Treaty 29, which finalized the agreement reflected in the provisional Treaty.
August 12, 1839	Malcolm Cameron, a businessman, land speculator and politician, wrote to Lieutenant Governor Arthur proposing that part of Upper Reserve be purchased and opened for settlement.
October 1839	Cameron received permission from Samuel Jarvis, Chief Superintendent of Indian Affairs, to enter into negotiations with the Chippewas for a sale of part of a reserve "subject to the approval of the Lieutenant Governor and the Council".
November 9, 1839	Cameron met with Joshua Wawanash, the Head

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

Chief of the St. Clair Regional Chippewas, and two other chiefs. They reached an agreement whereby Cameron would purchase 2,540 acres at the rear of the Sarnia reserve (the Cameron transaction). These are the disputed lands.

November 9, 1839 — Cameron wrote to Lieutenant Governor Arthur and Jarvis, reporting that he had reached an agreement with "the Indians". He sought approval of the transaction.

November 9, 1839 — William Jones, the resident Superintendent of Indian Affairs at Sarnia, wrote to his superior Samuel Jarvis, telling him that the three chiefs had advised Jones of the agreement with Cameron and had asked that he "propose to the government the sale" of the part of the reserve referred to in the Cameron transaction.

November 16 to 18, 1839 — In correspondence, Jarvis took issue with the terms of payment proposed by Cameron and observed that where similar transactions had been approved, the Crown first took a surrender of the land from the Indians and then made a grant of the land to a stated party.

March 19 and June 18, 1840 — Two orders-in-council were passed, approving the Cameron transaction on terms as modified by the proposal of Jarvis. Neither order-in-council referred to a surrender to the Crown by the Chippewas.

1840 — By the Union Act, 1840 (U.K.), R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 4, the British Parliament unified Upper and Lower Canada to form the province of Canada. The Indian Department was reorganized to reflect the Union.

February 27, 1841	Cameron made the first payment against the purchase price to the Crown.
June 1841 to June 1842	Discussions were ongoing concerning the survey of the land referred to in the Cameron transaction. Jarvis favoured a survey of the entire reserve, however, the Chippewas refused to agree to a survey of any land other than the land encompassed in the Cameron transaction.
June 1842	John O'Mara surveyed the lands referred to in the Cameron transaction. He was on site for about 15 days.
December 1846	Cameron wrote to Resident Superintendent Clench stating that he had "just put sixteen settlers on 1600 acres".
January 1851 to May 1851	A dispute arose as to whether the Cameron transaction included certain road allowances. Eventually, the dispute was resolved in favour of the Chippewas and they surrendered a single road allowance through the reserve.
January to November 1851	Cameron sold off large parts of the disputed lands.
August 11, 1853	Cameron paid the rest of the purchase price. He had not made any payments since the first payment in 1841. [See Note 3 at end of document]
August 13, 1853	Letters patent for the disputed lands were granted by the Crown to Cameron. The letters patent were in the form used when the land referred to in the patent was surrendered land. The validity of this Cameron patent is in dispute.
September 1853	Cameron continued to sell parts of the disputed

to 1861	lands.
August 26, 1861	Cameron sold off all of the disputed lands and was no longer on title.
August 1979	William Plan, an amateur historian and researcher for the Chippewas, wrote to an official in the Indian Affairs Department in connection with an ongoing dispute over a road allowance claim. Mr. Plan contended that the disputed lands were never surrendered to the Crown by the Chippewas and that the Chippewas maintained their original interest in those lands. This was the first indication that the Chippewas asserted a continuing interest in the disputed lands.
October 19, 1995	The Chippewas commenced this action.

D. Crown-First Nations Relations

[48] In the first half of the 18th century, the English Crown showed little interest in the First Nations of North America. Unlike its Catholic counterparts in France and Spain, the English Crown did not pursue active efforts to "civilize" the First Nations peoples and convert them to Christianity. Relationships between the First Nations and English colonies in North America were left primarily to the individual colonies and developed on an ad hoc basis. By the 1750s, however, French imperialist ambitions, aided and abetted by First Nations allies, threatened the security of English interests in North America. Those who shaped imperial policy came to see the military need to develop better relations with First Nations peoples in North America.

[49] An Indian Department under the control of English ministers of the Crown was established in the 1750s. Sir William Johnson was appointed Superintendent of the Northern District. His district encompassed present-day southwestern Ontario. Johnson and members of his family played a key role in the administration of English-First Nations relations in the latter part of the 18th and the early part of the 19th century. All were familiar with First Nation customs and appear to have been well regarded by the First Nations.

[50] At first, the Crown's policy was aimed at gaining the military support, or at least the neutrality, of First Nations in England's ongoing war with the French. When that war ended with an English victory in 1763, English control over the territories it had won from France depended in part on maintaining good relations with the First Nations. The English Crown continued its wartime Indian policy in the hope of forging new military alliances with First Nations who had supported the French (e.g. the Mississauga Chippewas) and avoiding further uprisings like that led by Chief Pontiac of the Odawa in 1763.

[51] The Indian Department underwent many changes between 1750 and 1860. The lines of responsibility and the titles of various officials changed repeatedly. As the bureaucracy grew, responsibility for different aspects of the policy fell to various Crown agencies. Despite these many bureaucratic changes, two fundamental tenets of the Crown's policy towards First Nations remained constant until 1860. [See Note 4 at end of document] First and foremost, dealings between the English Crown and First Nations were viewed as involving relations between sovereign nations to be governed by agreements or treaties made by the English Crown and the First Nations. Relations with the First Nations were an imperial concern to be administered primarily through the exercise of the royal prerogative. Like all imperial policies, Indian policy was formulated in England and those responsible for the implementation of it in North America reported to Crown officials. Indian affairs were no concern of the colonial legislatures.

[52] Second, the English Crown, primarily for military reasons, actively pursued the support of the First Nations. In doing so, it sought to address First Nations' grievances. Those grievances had arisen out of incursions by white settlers onto Indian lands and the dishonest actions of some of those who traded with the First Nations. In an effort to gain First Nations support, the Crown sought to assure the First Nations that they would not be deprived of their lands or cheated in their (trade) dealings with the white man. The Crown pursued these goals by recognizing First Nations' land rights, taking steps to protect those rights against white settlers, and regulating trade between the white man and First Nations.

[53] The Royal Proclamation was an important, albeit not the first, manifestation of Crown imperial policy as it applied to Indian lands. The Royal Proclamation:

-- recognized that First Nations had rights in their lands;

-- established imperial control over settlement on Indian lands whether those lands were within or beyond the boundaries of the established British colonies in North America;

-- prohibited private purchase of Indian lands and required that alienation of Indian rights in their lands be by way of surrender to the Crown; and

-- established a process by which surrenders of Indian land would be made to the Crown. The surrender process accepted that Indian rights in their lands were collective and not individual.

[54] After setting out its policy in the Royal Proclamation, the Crown took extraordinary steps to make the First Nations aware of that policy and to gain their support on the basis that the policy as set down in the Royal Proclamation would govern Crown-First Nations relations. In the summer of 1764, at the request of the Crown, more than 2,000 First Nations chiefs representing some 22 First Nations, including chiefs from the Chippewa Nation, attended a Grand Council at Niagara. Sir William Johnson, the Crown representative, who was well known to many of the chiefs present, read the provisions of the Royal Proclamation respecting Indian lands and committed the Crown to the enforcement of those provisions. The chiefs, in turn, promised to keep the peace and deliver up prisoners taken in recent hostilities. The singular significance of the Royal Proclamation to the First Nations can be traced to this extraordinary assembly and the treaty it produced. [See Note

[55] The First Nations chiefs prepared an elaborate wampum belt to reflect their understanding of the Treaty of Niagara. That belt described the relationship between the Crown and the First Nations as being based on peace, friendship and mutual respect. The belt symbolized the Crown's promise to all of the First Nations who were parties to the Treaty that they would not be molested or disturbed in the possession of their lands unless they first agreed to surrender those lands to the Crown.

[56] The meeting at Niagara and the Treaty of Niagara were watershed events in Crown-First Nations relations. The Treaty established friendly relations with many First Nations who had supported the French in the previous war. It also gave treaty recognition to the nation-to-nation relationship between the First Nations and the British Crown, Indian rights in their lands and the process to be followed when Indian lands were surrendered.

[57] Between 1764 and 1774, the commanders of the British forces in North America who were responsible for Indian relations emphasized the applicability and the importance, not only of the specific terms of the Royal Proclamation, but also of the policies underlying it.

[58] In 1774, the English Parliament passed the Quebec Act. That Act radically changed the government of the province of Quebec and extended the boundaries of that province to include what is now southwestern Quebec. The effect of that Act on the terms of the Royal Proclamation relating to Indian lands will be addressed later in these reasons. It is safe to say, however, that those responsible for First Nations relations after 1776 continued to follow the central policies underlying the Royal Proclamation. The historical record is replete with references to the Royal Proclamation and its policies. For example, in August 1791, Lord Dorchester, the Governor General of Canada, advised a delegation of First Nation chiefs, including Chippewa chiefs, that the King had no right to their lands save where it had been: > fairly ceded by yourself with your consent by public convention and sale . . .

>
> and that further:
> . . . bargains with private individuals were forbidden and considered as void.

[59] Lord Dorchester's comments make it clear that the Crown continued to recognize Indian rights in their lands, continued to require that those rights be surrendered only to the Crown on consent, and continued to regard those rights as communal and capable of surrender only by a public manifestation of the First Nations' consent to the surrender.

[60] The Crown policy towards the First Nations was reflected not only in official documents like the Royal Proclamation, but also in the day-to-day conduct of those relations. People like Sir William Johnson had long-standing connections with First Nations peoples and long-standing associations with them. They were aware of and respected the manner in which First Nations peoples conducted business. Formal meetings between Crown officials and First Nations were held at public Council meetings attended by the chiefs and other members of the First Nations. Certain formalities became an accepted part of these meetings and served to emphasize the nation-to-nation nature of the dealings. Many of those formalities reflected aboriginal customs and usages. The First Nations peoples attached considerable importance to compliance with these formalities and the Crown representatives were aware of the importance of these formalities to the First Nations.

[61] By the turn of the 19th century, the procedures associated with the surrender of land by First Nations to the Crown were well established. Those procedures blended aboriginal and British customs and usages and came to be reflected in various orders issued by responsible Crown officials (e.g., the Dorchester Regulations of 1794). The surrender of First Nations land to the Crown involved the following:

-- All surrenders were made "in public council with great solemnity and ceremony, according to the ancient usages and customs of the Indians".

-- The Crown representatives at the meeting included the Governor or his designate, representatives from the Indian Department, and military officers.

-- An interpreter was present and explained the "nature and extent of the bargain" to the Indians in their language. The consideration for the sale was clearly stated.

-- If a surrender was agreed upon, a deed of conveyance surrendering the land to the Crown was prepared in triplicate and executed at the Council meeting by the Indian chiefs who would place their totems on the deed and by the Superintendent of the Indian Department or his designate.

-- A descriptive plan of the land to be surrendered was attached to the deed and signed and witnessed in the same manner as the deed.

-- The Head Chief received one of the copies of the deed.

[62] These formalities recognized the importance of the surrender of lands by First Nations and the collective nature of the First Nations' interest in the land. The procedures also reflected the common law concern that certainty attach to the transfer of land. Certainty was achieved by requiring that the conveyance of land be fully documented, that the documents be placed in the appropriate records and that they be preserved for future reference.

[63] Surrender was the first step toward making Indian land available for settlement. After the surrender deed was executed, it was submitted to the Governor in Council for approval. If approved, an order-in-council would issue and the surrender deed could be registered in the appropriate colonial land registry record. At this stage, the surrendered land could be granted by the Crown to third parties by way of letters patent. Over time, the patents were standardized and made reference to the fact that the land had been acquired from a First Nations people. Where the First Nations were to be paid from the proceeds of the grant to the third party, the Crown held those proceeds for the benefit of the First Nations.

[64] Although a surrender could only be authorized by a General Council meeting of the First Nations people, Crown Indian policy also depended on the development of strong working relationships between Crown officials and influential chiefs of regional bands. Indian Department officials worked at obtaining the confidence and support of key chiefs. The relationship with these chiefs became even more important as the Indians surrendered much of their lands and took up residence on reserves.

[65] Indian Department officials would meet with key chiefs prior to Council meetings in an effort to gain their support on the matters that were to be considered at the Council meeting. If the Crown official and those chiefs could reach an agreement, the chiefs would become the spokesmen for the proposed agreement at the subsequent Council meeting.

E. The Surrender of Chippewa Lands Before the Sale to Cameron

[66] By 1815, the military importance to the English Crown of alliances with First Nations, including the Chippewas, had diminished significantly. The War of 1812 had ended and there was no real risk of continued hostilities in the British North American colonies with either the United States or any European power. Soldiers returning from the War of 1812 were looking for land and the pressure to open Indian land to settlement increased dramatically.

[67] As the military significance of alliances decreased and demands for settlement increased, the Crown became more receptive to those who petitioned for the opening of Indian land for settlement purposes. Imperial Indian policy also began to reflect objectives other than military ones. The "civilization" of those First Nations whose land stood in the path of white settlement became a priority. The Crown's

"civilization" policy encouraged First Nations to live, farm and worship like the white man, in and around permanent sites located on lands reserved for the First Nations.

[68] Despite the change in focus of the Crown's Indian policy, the Crown continued to control access by settlers to Indian lands by insisting that Indian land could not be sold directly to settlers but had to be surrendered to the Crown first. This policy reflected both the Crown's desire to control settlement and to protect aboriginal people as the harmful effects of contact with the white man became more obvious. [See Note 6 at end of document]

[69] The Crown's continued recognition of Indian rights to their lands, the prohibition against alienation of land to anyone except the Crown by way of surrender and the requirement that the surrender be accompanied by a public manifestation of the First Nations' agreement to surrender are all evident in the extensive land dealings between the Chippewas and the Crown between 1818 and 1827. Those dealings resulted in the surrender of some 2.2 million acres of Chippewa land and the retention by the Chippewas of four reserves within that tract of land.

[70] The possibility of acquiring a large part of the Chippewas' land in southwestern Ontario for settlement purposes was first raised by the Surveyor General of Upper Canada in 1815. In October 1818, an official of the Indian Department met with numerous Chippewa chiefs at Amherstburg to discuss the possibility of a surrender of Chippewa land. The Chippewas advised that they were not opposed to the surrender in return for an annuity but were anxious to retain enough land to permit them to continue to enjoy their traditional lifestyle and maintain their viability as a people. The Chippewas were concerned that they not suffer the fate of their American brothers who had failed to retain sufficient reserves when surrendering their land. In the initial discussion, the Chippewas referred to five possible reserves, including one on the St. Clair River which came to be known as the Upper Reserve, on which the disputed lands are located.

[71] Discussions between the Crown and the Chippewas went on for several years. Progress was slow. The Chippewas' lifestyle was still quite transitory and it was sometimes difficult to arrange for the attendance of the necessary chiefs at Council meetings to discuss the proposed surrender. Various provisional agreements were made and in July 1822, the Crown and the Chippewas concluded their first confirmatory treaty whereby the Chippewas surrendered some 500,000 acres of land along and near the Thames River.

[72] This surrender did not satisfy the ever-increasing needs of the white settlers. In 1824 the Canada Company was formed and received a million-acre grant of land in Upper Canada for settlement purposes. Part of that land was to come from the Chippewas' land. In March 1825, an official of the Indian Department was directed to assemble the chiefs of the Chippewas in Council "with the least possible delay" to finalize the surrender of over 2,000,000 acres of Chippewa land. This land came to be known as the Huron Tract.

[73] A General Council of the Chippewas was held at which the Chippewas and the Indian officials observed the usual formalities. The Crown requested a surrender and the chiefs, "after consultation among themselves", said that they were prepared to make the surrender on behalf of the Chippewas. Provisional Treaty 271/2 was signed by James Givens, Superintendent of Indian Affairs, representing the Crown and 20 named "chiefs and principal men" of the Chippewas. These chiefs represented the various bands who lived on the affected lands.

[74] Under the terms of Provisional Treaty 271/2, the Chippewas agreed to "freely, fully and voluntarily . . . surrender and convey" to the Crown some 2.2 million acres of land in consideration for a perpetual annuity of GBP 1,100. The treaty identified 440 Chippewas who were affected by this surrender and provided for a reduction in the annuity if the population decreased.

[75] Under the terms of the Provisional Treaty, the Chippewas did not surrender all of their lands. They retained four reserves, including the Upper Reserve, for themselves and future Chippewa generations. The Provisional Treaty provided that the reserves were retained by the Chippewas for their "exclusive use and enjoyment".

[76] Upon receipt of the agreement the Lieutenant Governor forwarded it to the Colonial Secretary in London, who in turn advised that the Crown accepted the terms.

[77] The Crown and the Chippewas could not conclude a final agreement in 1825 because there was no descriptive plan of the surrendered lands available. Under established procedures, a surrender could not be made unless a descriptive plan was attached to a deed of surrender. In 1829, after the land had been surveyed, the Crown and Chippewas entered into Treaty 29, which confirmed the terms of the 1825 agreement.

[78] Treaty 29 complied with all the formalities attached to a surrender of Indian land to the Crown. A written document acknowledging the Chippewas' rights in the land and describing the surrender was signed by Superintendent of Indian Affairs George Ironside, for the Crown, and by 18 named chiefs and principal men of the part of the Chippewas inhabiting and claiming the lands affected by the surrender. Those chiefs, on behalf of the bands they represented, surrendered to the King all their rights, title and interest in the land save their rights and title in the four reserves. Their rights in those four reserves were held by them for their exclusive use and enjoyment for all time.

[79] The Chippewas do not question the validity of the surrender made by Treaty 29. As the motions judge observed, it bore all the indicia associated with a valid cession of First Nations land to the Crown. It was the product of direct negotiations between the Crown and the chiefs of the Chippewas. The terms of the surrender, including the annuity to be paid, were put to the Chippewas at a General Council meeting at Amherstburg in July 1827 and approved at that Council. The surrender was formalized in a written document executed by the appropriate officials on both sides. The document recognized pre-existing Chippewa rights in the land and acknowledged that the Chippewas were surrendering those rights to the Crown. The consideration for the surrender was set out in the deed and a descriptive plan attached to it.

[80] By July 1827, the face of the map of what is now southwestern Ontario had changed dramatically. The Chippewas had surrendered 2.2 million acres of land to the Crown. They had retained four reserves, including the Upper Reserve. Those four reserves were protected not only by the Chippewas' pre-existing land rights as acknowledged by the Crown, but also by the solemn promise of the Crown in Treaty 29. The land on the reserves, including the disputed lands, belonged to the Chippewas.

[81] It would appear that Crown officials initially regarded the four reserves set out in Treaty 29 as held in common by all the various bands who were signatories to Treaty 29. By the late 1830s, however, the St. Clair Regional Band, which included the ancestors of the present Chippewas of Sarnia Band, were regarded as the owners of three of the reserves, including the Upper Reserve. The Walpole Indian Regional Band was seen as the owner of the fourth reserve. Best estimates suggest that by 1839 there were as many as eight to 10 chiefs of the St. Clair Regional Band.

[82] One of the chiefs for St. Clair Regional Band was Joshua Wawanosh. Wawanosh had a remarkable and checkered career as a leader of the St. Clair Chippewas. He became a chief shortly after the War of 1812 in part because of his military service on behalf of the Crown in the War of 1812. By the mid-1820s, Crown officials and other Chippewa chiefs recognized Wawanosh as the Head Chief. He was the first to sign Provisional Treaty 271/2 on behalf of the Chippewas, received a copy of the deed and was described by Joseph Clench, a superintendent in the Indian Department, as the "principal chief".

[83] By the 1830s, there was opposition to Wawanosh's leadership on the four reserves. That opposition grew during the 1830s, reaching its zenith in 1844 when Wawanosh was removed as Head Chief after a public inquiry by Indian Department officials. He remained a chief. Within four years, however, Wawanosh had regained the confidence of the other chiefs on the reserves and recovered from the ignominy of his removal. At the suggestion of the man who had replaced him as Head Chief, Wawanosh was restored to the position of Head Chief.

[84] Throughout his long tenure, Wawanosh, who had converted to Christianity, favoured the "civilization" policy. He believed that the Chippewas should establish a permanent farming community on the Upper Reserve and learn the white man's ways. He also had a keen eye for opportunities and sought to increase his influence and personal wealth whenever the opportunity arose.

[85] Wawanosh's position as the spokesman for the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve is evident in discussions between himself and William Jones, the resident Indian Superintendent, in 1830. At the request of the Lieutenant Governor, Jones broached with Wawanosh the possibility of the Chippewas surrendering their land along the river and moving inland to establish permanent farming communities. Wawanosh advised Jones that the Chippewas were firmly against moving from their "present residence on the Upper River", but that they were "pleased with the idea of having their children educated and learning to live like white people . . .".

[86] The Indian Department accepted Wawanosh's position and did not seek a surrender of any part of the reserve, but did step up efforts to establish a permanent village and farming base on the reserve for the Chippewas.

[87] Wawanosh spoke for the bands on the Upper Reserve again in 1834 when Jones was directed to approach the Chippewas for permission to allow the private cutting of timber on part of the Upper Reserve. Jones sought out Wawanosh's view on the matter and reported back to Jarvis.

[88] Wawanosh's discussions with Jones typified the kind of preliminary discussions that Indian Department officials would have with influential chiefs when important matters arose. There is no suggestion that Wawanosh did not speak for the Band on the Upper Reserve in 1830 or 1834, or that he did not accurately convey the collective position of the Chippewas to

Jones.

F. The Cameron Transaction

[89] By 1839, responsibility for Indian matters was divided among various Crown departments. Those departments were under the control of the Lieutenant Governor of Upper Canada. The department was headed by a chief superintendent who had a number of deputy superintendents. Various resident superintendents lived at or near reserves and were responsible for overseeing relations with the First Nations people on those reserves. As the bureaucracy grew, those at the top ceased to have any kind of direct, long-standing relationship with First Nations chiefs. Subsequent inquiries (e.g. the Bagot Inquiry in 1844) also demonstrated that the Department was in many respects dysfunctional by 1839.

[90] The Indian Department was responsible for mediating disputes between white men and aboriginals, keeping the Crown advised of the views and attitudes of the Indians, ensuring that white settlers did not intrude onto Indian lands, supervising the surrender of Indian lands, administering payments due to First Nations under the terms of surrenders, and promoting the "civilization" policy. These responsibilities often brought Indian Department officials into conflict with white settlers. As often as not, those officials found themselves aligned with positions taken by First Nations people and opposed to positions advanced by white settlers.

[91] Samuel P. Jarvis was appointed Acting Chief Superintendent of Indian Affairs in Upper Canada in 1837 and remained in that post until his dismissal in 1845 following the revelations of the Bagot Commission. Jarvis, a Tory and member of the Family Compact, appears to have been an honest and well-intentioned person who had virtually no hands-on experience with the First Nations prior to 1837. He was an abject failure as an administrator.

[92] William Jones was the Resident Superintendent at Port Sarnia from March 1830 until June 1845 when, like Jarvis, he was dismissed as a result of the findings of the Bagot

Commission. Jones' relationship with the principals of the Cameron transaction (Cameron and Wawanosh) was far from friendly as of November 1839.

[93] Resident Superintendent Jones had many dealings with Chief Wawanosh. He recognized Wawanosh's influence and the need to maintain Wawanosh's support. He also came to regard Wawanosh as dishonest, greedy and intent upon advancing his own interests over those of the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve. Jones's mistrust of Wawanosh increased during the rebellion of 1837 when Wawanosh, unlike many Chippewa chiefs, refused to support the Crown but insisted on a position of neutrality. By November 1839, Jones had no reason to favour Wawanosh or to assist him in promoting his personal interests.

[94] The mistrust of Wawanosh did not stop with Jones. Chief Superintendent Jarvis and even the Lieutenant Governor had reason to doubt Wawanosh's honesty and the reliability of statements he purported to make on behalf of the Band.

[95] Malcolm Cameron, a businessman, politician and land speculator from eastern Canada, took up residence in Port Sarnia in the early 1830s. As an accomplished businessman with political connections, he quickly became one of the town's most influential citizens. Cameron was a reformer, a Methodist, and a strong proponent of the "civilization" policy. He took the forefront in attempts to secure parts of the Upper Reserve for white settlement, taking the position that the Chippewas could use the proceeds from the sale of parts of their land to finance the development of the rest.

[96] Wawanosh, like Cameron, was a Methodist and shared Cameron's entrepreneurial spirit. The two developed a close working relationship. Cameron lent money to Wawanosh from time to time. On various occasions, to the consternation of officials in the Indian Department, Cameron assisted Wawanosh in making direct representations to the Lieutenant Governor or, after 1840, the Governor General.

[97] Although Cameron had strong political support in 1839, including that of the reform-minded Lieutenant Governor Arthur,

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

Cameron did not enjoy good working relations with the officials of the Indian Department. As a Methodist reformer, he had nothing in common with High Anglican Tories like Superintendent Jarvis. His support of Wawanosh also brought him into conflict with Jones.

[98] The residents of Port Sarnia had from time to time after 1827 petitioned the government to obtain the surrender of parts of the Upper Reserve. They felt that the reserve was blocking key trade and communication channels along the St. Clair River and inhibiting the development of their town. In the late summer of 1839, Wawanosh, speaking for the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve as he had in 1830 and 1834, made it clear that the Chippewas were not prepared to sell any part of the front part of the Upper Reserve running along the St. Clair River. This was the part of the reserve coveted by the white settlers at Port Sarnia. As in 1830 and 1834, Wawanosh spoke for, and accurately expressed the position of, the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve.

[99] At almost the same time that Wawanosh told Jones that the Chippewas were not prepared to give up any land along the front of the St. Clair River, Wawanosh advised Jarvis that the Chippewas were inclined to sell part of the rear of the Upper Reserve. A document found in the papers of Jarvis and purporting to be a translation and transcription of an address given by Wawanosh in September 1839 reads in part:

> You recommended to us last year to cultivate the soil and proposed that workmen should be hired to put our fields in proper condition for sowing crops. We have thought of this & think the advice good, but are unwilling that the expense should be defrayed from our annuity. We wish your advice on a plan which we think would please us all. We propose to sell a mile in depth off the rear of our Reserve, and with the money produced by this sale to cultivate the front. What is your opinion?

[100] The exact circumstances in which Wawanosh made this purported address have been lost in time. It cannot be said whether he made the address at a Council of the Chippewas, or at some public gathering of the St. Clair Regional Band. It is, however, clear that his proposal was consistent with the ongoing development of a permanent agricultural settlement on the Upper Reserve. Most of the land at the back of the reserve which Wawanosh indicated the Chippewas were prepared to give up was not as well suited for farming as the front of the reserve. Nor, contrary to the finding of the motions judge, was there any inherent contradiction between the Chippewas' refusal to sell off any part of the front of the reserve and Wawanosh's indication that they were prepared to sell off parts of the back of the Upper Reserve. The Chippewas sold off pieces of the Upper Reserve from time to time after 1827.

[101] Cameron advanced his proposal that the Upper Reserve be opened for settlement in a letter to Lieutenant Governor Arthur in August 1839. Cameron argued that the lands within the reserve exceeded those needed by the Chippewas to establish a permanent farming settlement. He suggested that the proceeds of the sale of a considerable part of the reserve could be used to improve the remaining land so that it could be effectively farmed by the Chippewas. Cameron suggested that the money could be realized by either a purchase by the government or a purchase by private individuals with government approval.

[102] In the fall of 1839 Cameron met with Lieutenant Governor Arthur and subsequently with Chief Superintendent Jarvis to promote the acquisition of a large part of the Upper Reserve. Jarvis told Cameron that he, Cameron, could negotiate with the Chippewas and, if possible, strike a bargain, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. Cameron travelled to the Upper Reserve, met first with Jones, and later with Wawanosh and two other chiefs.

[103] Cameron advised both Lieutenant Governor Arthur and Jarvis in letters dated November 9, 1839 that he had met with Wawanosh and "other chiefs". He explained that the chiefs were reluctant to give up any part of the reserve because they feared that their agreement to give up part of the reserve would be seen by land-hungry settlers as an invitation to take more land than the Chippewas had agreed to sell. According to Cameron, he had the "confidence" of the chiefs and was able to convince them that he would adhere to any bargain they made. Cameron advised that he had concluded a bargain for the purchase of four square miles at the rear of the reserve furthest from the St. Clair River. According to Cameron, the Chippewas also agreed to provide four roads running from that block of land through the reserve to the river. Cameron said that he had agreed to pay the Chippewas 10 shillings per acre with an initial payment of GBP 250. The rest of the purchase price (GBP 1,020) was to be paid in nine annual instalments . Cameron observed that the price was two shillings higher than the "government price", but that he had agreed to the higher price in lieu of paying any interest on the unpaid part of the purchase price. Cameron attached a rough map of the land which he said the Chippewas had agreed to give up. The map showed four roads running through the reserve to the river.

[104] In his letter to Lieutenant Governor Arthur, Cameron stressed the "public good" of the transaction and urged Arthur to approve it if he thought it to be a "fair and advantageous bargain for the Indians".

[105] Resident Superintendent Jones also wrote to Jarvis on November 9, 1839. He advised that Cameron had met with the only three chiefs who were on the Upper Reserve (Wawanosh, Chibigun and Corning). [See Note 7 at end of document] Those chiefs had later called on Jones and asked that he propose to the government on their behalf "the sale of one mile in depth by the whole length of the reserve off the rear of the Upper St. Clair Reserve". Jones reported the terms of the agreement as told to him by the chiefs. He also indicated that, under the bargain, a road was to run from each concession line through the reserve to the river. Jones said that the Chippewas expected to be paid for the land used for these roads.

[106] The correspondence outlined above demonstrates that all concerned appreciated that the transaction could not be completed without the approval of the Crown. Cameron and the chiefs both notified the Crown of the bargain and sought Crown approval. Neither believed that they could deal with the disputed lands without the intervention of the Crown.

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

[107] Chief Superintendent Jarvis was asked by the Lieutenant Governor's office to comment on the proposed sale. In correspondence delivered in late November 1839, Jarvis opined that the purchase price appeared to be "fair and reasonable", but went on to observe that Cameron should be required to pay interest on the unpaid balance of the purchase price. [See Note 8 at end of document] Jarvis also noted that there was some suggestion that the purchase price would be paid directly to the Chippewas. He pointed out that this was not Crown policy and that the money should be paid to the Crown to be invested for the benefit of the Chippewas. Jarvis' recommendations were accepted by the Lieutenant Governor and incorporated into two orders-in-council approving the sale.

[108] The first order-in-council, dated March 19, 1840, began with the following:

> The Executive Council are respectfully of the opinion that it would be a great public advantage as well as a benefit to the Indians were the tract of land above mentioned disposed of to white settlers at an adequate price.

It also set out the price, required the payment of interest on the instalments, and provided for an allotment of land for clergy reserves.

[109] Cameron objected to both the payment of interest and the allotment of lands for clergy reserves. Eventually he agreed to pay interest but persisted in his objection to the clergy reserves. In June 1840 a second order-in-council was passed in the same terms as the March order-in-council save that the requirement for clergy reserves was deleted.

[110] Both orders-in-council referred to the proposed purchase by Cameron of the land and neither referred to a surrender or recommended that a surrender of the lands be accepted. In contrast, orders-in-council issued at or about the same time as the Cameron order-in-council and referring to the sale of other parts of the Chippewa reserves made reference to the surrender of the land to the Crown.

[111] It is helpful at this stage to summarize the substance of the Cameron transaction:

-- Cameron had approached Crown officials for permission to negotiate the purchase with the Chippewa chiefs.

-- Negotiations were conducted with the authorization of the senior Crown official responsible for Indian Affairs in Upper Canada.

-- Cameron negotiated through an interpreter with three of the chiefs on the Upper Reserve, including Head Chief Wawanosh. The record is clear that no other chiefs were present but is unclear as to who, if anyone else, was privy to the negotiations.

-- The bargain arrived at by Cameron and the three chiefs was made known to Crown officials by Cameron and the chiefs separately. Both sought government approval for the transaction.

-- The negotiated purchase price was a reasonable one.

-- The appropriate official in the Indian Department considered the proposed bargain, altered two of the terms to add further protection of the Chippewa interests, and recommended the approval of the transaction.

-- The Lieutenant Governor, the representative of the Crown in Upper Canada, approved the transaction as altered by the Indian Department.

-- The land which was the subject of the transaction was not on the part of the Upper Reserve the Chippewas had refused to part with in earlier discussions with the Crown in 1839. Much of it was not ideal for farming. If the proceeds of the sale could be used to improve the rest of the reserve, or to acquire more arable land, the Cameron transaction could be seen as a logical step in furtherance of the civilization policy. That policy had its supporters among the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve and had proceeded with some success by November 1839. [See Note 9 at end of document]

[112] It is equally important to bear in mind, as did the motions judge, what did not occur as part of the Cameron transaction prior to the issuing of the order-in-council:

-- Crown officials were never directly involved in the negotiations with the Chippewas.

-- The transaction was never explained, discussed, or approved at a General Council of the regional bands of the Chippewas affected by the transaction.

-- Although three chiefs approved the transaction, the approval of the other chiefs (possibly five to seven) was neither sought nor obtained.

-- The bargain struck between Cameron and the chiefs was never reduced to writing in a deed, contract or treaty signed by the necessary chiefs and the Crown representative. Consequently, there was no formal document in which the Crown acknowledged the Chippewas' rights in the land and the Chippewas agreed to surrender those rights.

-- There was no descriptive plan of the lands signed by the appropriate Crown officials and chiefs of the Chippewas.

[113] We agree with the motions judge that the exchange of correspondence in November 1839, combined with the meetings involving the Chippewa chiefs, Jones and Cameron, did not amount to a surrender. As the reasons of the motions judge demonstrate, there was in this transaction a failure to follow virtually every established procedure attendant upon the surrender of Indian land. As the motions judge observed, the failure to follow these procedures makes the Cameron transaction unique among the many land dealings between the Chippewas and the Crown in the 19th century.

[114] Although we accept the motions judge's conclusion that there was no surrender in November 1839, we do not agree with his description of the Cameron transaction as a "private sale" between Cameron and three chiefs. The negotiations were conducted with the knowledge of and under the authority of Crown officials in the Indian Department. The terms of the transaction were reviewed and changed by Superintendent Jarvis and only then approved by the Crown. The ultimate terms were dictated by the Crown for the protection of the Chippewas.

[115] The motions judge also repeatedly referred to the meeting between Cameron and the three chiefs as a "private meeting". We can accept this characterization if it means only that the meeting between Cameron and the chiefs was not a General Council meeting as that phrase would be understood in the context of the surrender of Indian lands. We do not, however, accept the characterization if it is meant to suggest that the three chiefs were the only Chippewas who were aware of the negotiations or the bargain reached. Although only three chiefs met with Cameron, nothing in the record suggests that they were the only Chippewas who were privy to the meetings, or that the negotiations or the bargain reached were in any way secret from Chippewas who were on the Upper Reserve. Subsequent events lend no support to either of those suggestions.

[116] It is not surprising, in the context of Indian land negotiations, that there was no actual surrender as of the end of November 1839. As indicated above, discussions between Indian Department officials and individual chiefs in which agreements were worked out subject to approval at a General Council were quite common. It would have been entirely consistent with established practice had the terms of the Cameron transaction, as agreed upon by Cameron and the three chiefs and as modified by Jarvis, been put to a General Council of the Chippewas for approval at some point after November 1839 and before the land was actually granted to Cameron.

[117] There is, however, no evidence that a surrender occurred between November 1839 and the issuing of the orders-in-council in March and June of 1840. The only reference to a surrender in the correspondence preceding the orders-in-council appears in Jarvis' letter to the Lieutenant Governor's office in November 1839. He wrote:

> Should the government think proper to permit the Indians to dispose of a part of their reserve the course heretofore pursued in similar transactions has been to require as a first step a surrender of the land to the Crown after which the Crown will grant the same, on such terms as may be agreed upon, and will take care that the purchase money is safely invested.

[118] No one in the Department followed up on Jarvis' statement. The failure of the Department to obtain a surrender and follow the well-established practices relating to surrenders is not explained by any conspiracy to deprive the Chippewas of their land, or even by a desire within the Indian Department to assist Cameron and allow him to circumvent established procedures and accelerate settlement of the land. Jarvis carried no brief for Cameron and had in no way supported or associated himself with the success of Cameron's negotiations with Wawanosh and the other two chiefs.

[119] Resident Superintendent Jones also had no reason to help Wawanosh or Cameron. By November 1839, Jones and Wawanosh were engaged in a heated vilification of each other involving a series of charges and counter-charges. It is unlikely that Jones would facilitate a fraudulent transaction involving Wawanosh or knowingly turn a blind eye to any legal requirements of that transaction. It is also unlikely that Jones, given his view of Wawanosh, would accept without question whatever Wawanosh told him about the Chippewas' wishes with respect to the sale of their land.

[120] Although neither Jarvis nor Jones acted to secure the appropriate surrender, there is no evidence that they or anyone else in the Indian Department had any reason to believe that a surrender would not be forthcoming if requested.

[121] True, the two orders-in-council do not refer to a surrender of the land. The language of these orders-in-council stands in stark contrast to others pertaining to land transactions involving Chippewa land, including one issued on the same day as the second Cameron order-in-council (June 18, 1840). All other orders-in-council referable to Chippewa land make reference to a surrender. However, the Cameron orders-in-council refer instead to a "proposed" sale, suggesting that the transaction would close at some time in the future, thereby allowing for a surrender before closing. We agree with the motions judge's conclusion that the language of the order-in-council was consistent with the Crown's intention to obtain a surrender at some point in the future.

[122] The Crown had ample opportunity to obtain a surrender. The disputed lands were not granted to Cameron in fee simple by way of letters patent until some 14 years later in August 1853. There were several reasons for the delay, some of which will be examined below. Despite the passage of 14 years, however, the Indian Department did not arrange for surrender of the land. There was no General Council of the Chippewa bands affected by the transaction at which the details of the transaction were explained and approval of the surrender given. [See Note 10 at end of document] There was also no formal surrender document prepared and executed by the appropriate Crown official and the Chippewa chiefs. In short, none of the established procedures were followed.

[123] There were few references to a surrender in the documents touching on the Cameron transaction between 1840 and 1853. By 1851, officials in the Indian Department, none of whom had been involved in the Cameron transaction in 1839 and 1840, had come to believe that a surrender had in fact been made and that a surrender document existed. Although the existence of the document was questioned on one occasion, no one bothered to check the actual records. The form of the letters patent issued in 1853 was consistent with a surrender having been obtained.

[124] The failure to take the steps necessary to obtain a proper surrender prior to the issuing of the letters patent was explained by the motions judge in terms which we adopt:

> There is no evidence that Jarvis' recommendations of November 18, 1839 that there should be as a first step a surrender to the Crown of the disputed land, was deliberately rejected. But it was uncontradicted that it was neglected. While there is no evidence that any particular official was asleep at the switch, it is uncontradicted that Jarvis' surrender recommendation simply fell between the cracks in the general chaos and lack of accountability that prevailed in the five separate bureaucracies that then dealt with Indian land. No one was in charge and no one was accountable.

[125] Cameron did nothing to encourage the Indian Department to obtain the appropriate surrender. The record suggests that he never concerned himself with obtaining a proper surrender. His attention between 1839 and 1853 was directed to several other problems, including difficulties he encountered in raising the funds to pay the purchase price. He made the initial downpayment in February 1841, but did not make the annual payments as he had promised. It was not until August 11, 1853 that he paid the outstanding amount owing on the purchase price. [See Note 11 at end of document]

[126] Cameron's disregard for the legalities associated with the transaction is evident from the fact that he sold large parts of the land and placed settlers on it years before he received the patent and the fee simple. He was a businessman in a hurry.

[127] There is no direct evidence of the Chippewas' reaction to the Cameron transaction, and, in particular, the Chippewas' reaction to the failure of the Indian Department to obtain the necessary surrender. The Chippewas' tradition is an oral one and direct evidence of their response to the Cameron transaction has been lost over the 160 years since the transaction.

[128] The Chippewas' position may, however, be inferred from events which occurred between November 1839 and 1855. After reviewing some of those events, the motions judge concluded that by 1840, the Chippewas were aware that there was an agreement to sell part of their reserve to Cameron. He further concluded, however, that the Chippewas were never made aware of the details of the sale and may well have expected that before the transaction was consummated the Crown would seek a surrender in accord with the established practice.

[129] The motions judge also found that there was no evidence that the Chippewas made any complaint that Wawanosh and the other chiefs had acted without authority in their dealings with Cameron, or that any representative of the Chippewas ever repudiated the transaction. We accept those findings. The motions judge went on, however, to hold that the absence of any complaint, combined with the Chippewas' knowledge of the transaction, did not constitute any evidence that the Chippewas as a community agreed to surrender their lands.

[130] The evidentiary significance of the absence of any complaint about the transaction or any repudiation of it must be assessed in the context of the entire record. There is overwhelming evidence that the Chippewas were an intelligent people who as of 1839 were keenly aware of their land rights and were most diligent in preserving those rights. By 1839, the Chippewas were well accustomed to addressing grievances to the Crown by way of petitions. Those petitions were prepared at General Council meetings and addressed many issues, including complaints with respect to land transactions. On various occasions, the Chippewas' petitions specifically repudiated earlier transactions to which they had allegedly agreed. For example, the strong objection by the Chippewas to the proposed Saugeen surrender in 1836 demonstrates that even where a proposed land transaction was initiated by the Lieutenant Governor himself, the Chippewas could and would voice strong opposition to it if it did not accord with their wishes.

[131] There can also be no doubt but that many chiefs of the St. Clair regional bands, both on and off the Upper Reserve, were not reluctant to complain to the Indian Department and the Lieutenant Governor or Governor General about the conduct of Chief Wawanosh. Complaints about Wawanosh began in the early 1830s, grew more vigorous as time went on and reached a crescendo in early 1844 when Wawanosh was removed as Head Chief following a public inquiry into his conduct. The many complaints against Wawanosh included allegations that he abused his authority as chief, misappropriated band assets, and showed gross favouritism towards friends and allies. There were also allegations that Wawanosh sold, or at least tried to sell,

Chippewa land without authority. For example, in October 1836, a number of Chippewas petitioned the government complaining among other things that Wawanosh was "disposing of land reserved for us, our wives and children without our consent". A similar allegation was made in 1841 when various chiefs complained that Wawanosh was trying to sell land without authority.

[132] In August 1843, a petition signed by about 200 Chippewas was directed to the Governor General. It contended that Wawanosh was not the hereditary chief, took more than his proper share of the annuity, and favoured his friends and relatives, leaving the rest of the band in poverty. The petition concluded with these strong words:

> We are not neither children or foolish. We know perfectly well who either wrongs us or does us good, and we can complain of the former and thank the latter, we therefore beg your Excellency will attend to what comes from ourselves only, and not to the unsolicited and obnoxious interference of white men with whom we neither have nor wish to have any concern; . . .

(Emphasis added)

[133] The Chippewas requested a General Council at Port Sarnia at which their complaints against Wawanosh could be aired. The Governor General decided to hold a formal public inquiry into the charges against Wawanosh. That inquiry was held in late 1843. Witnesses for and against Wawanosh testified and Wawanosh replied in detail to the allegations made against him. Summaries of the testimony have survived and provide a detailed account of the accusations against Wawanosh, and insight into the level of animosity that many of the Chippewa chiefs had developed toward Wawanosh.

[134] Superintendent Clench presided over the inquiry and prepared a report for Jarvis summarizing his findings. According to Clench, the charges against Wawanosh related to mismanagement of his office as chief, the appropriation of more than his share of the annuities due to the Chippewas, gross favouritism, and making a false claim to being an hereditary chief. Clench reported that over 75 per cent of the Chippewas on the four reserves were against Wawanosh.

[135] It was determined that Wawanosh should be removed as Head Chief but should remain as a chief. Despite the efforts of Wawanosh and Cameron to prevent the removal of Wawanosh, he was in fact removed as Head Chief and not restored until 1848.

[136] The complaints made against Wawanosh between 1830 and 1844 are set out in considerable detail in various affidavits filed by the parties. None of the complaints refer to the Cameron transaction, although it occurred and was known to other Chippewas at the very height of their displeasure with Wawanosh (1839-1843). In our view, it is significant that despite the many general and specific complaints directed at Wawanosh's conduct, there was never any suggestion by the other Chippewa chiefs that Wawanosh had acted beyond his authority in reaching a bargain with Cameron, or that the purported sale was contrary to the wishes of the Chippewas.

[137] In assessing the significance of the absence of any reference to the Cameron transaction in the onslaught of complaints made against Wawanosh at the inquiry, we bear in mind that by the fall of 1843, the Chippewas knew the full extent of the lands involved in the Cameron transaction. Those lands had been surveyed into lots in the summer of 1842. The Chippewas knew by the fall of 1843 that the Cameron transaction involved about one-quarter of the land on the Upper Reserve.

[138] The absence of any reference to the Cameron transaction among the litany of complaints made against Wawanosh defies explanation if the other Chippewa chiefs looked on the Cameron transaction as a "private" deal whereby Wawanosh disposed of one-quarter of the Upper Reserve against the wishes of the Chippewas affected by that transaction. The explanation advanced by one witness for the Chippewas that the Chippewas' culture was such that complaints against Wawanosh would be indirect (a contention neither accepted nor rejected by the motions judge), does not hold up. By the fall of 1843, there was a concerted attack underway on Wawanosh's leadership in the years before and following 1839. That attack included specific allegations against him by other Chippewa chiefs. Furthermore, the formal inquiry of 1843 was a trial-like inquiry conducted by Superintendent Clench. The inquiry was directed into any and all allegations that witnesses wished to advance against Wawanosh. Surely, had there been any reason to suspect that Wawanosh had acted improperly in connection with a transaction involving one-quarter of the Upper Reserve, some reference to that transaction would have been made in the many complaints brought forward against Wawanosh.

[139] The motions judge found, however, that the absence of any complaint about the Cameron transaction had no evidentiary value because in his words:

> . . . The first question is when, and exactly of what, the Chippewas should be expected to have complained. Lack of complaint about lack of surrender cannot be expected until lack of surrender becomes apparent. The legal status of the Cameron lands, between November 1839 and August 13, 1853 was unclear. . . . If the Crown officials could not know the status of the disputed lands one would hardly expect the Chippewas to know enough detail to be in a position to complain specifically. . . . Lack of complaint of lack of surrender has no evidentiary significance when future surrender is reasonably to be expected.

(Emphasis added)

[140] The motions judge missed the evidentiary significance of the absence of any complaint about the Cameron transaction by characterizing it as a failure to complain about the lack of a surrender. It is not the Chippewas' failure to complain about the lack of a surrender which is significant. What is significant is that even though the other chiefs were aware that Wawanosh had agreed to sell one-quarter of the Upper Reserve, they made no complaint about that transaction in an inquiry, the purpose of which was to air any and all complaints about Wawanosh's conduct as Head Chief. The failure to complain about Wawanosh's actions in connection with the Cameron transaction, or to repudiate that transaction, constitutes evidence from which it can be reasonably inferred that Wawanosh acted with the authority of the Chippewa bands affected by the transaction, or at least that they accepted his actions, once they became known.

G. Post-Cameron Transaction Events

[141] The inference of approval or at least acceptance of the Cameron transaction by the Chippewas flowing from the absence of any complaint about it in the avalanche of complaints made against Wawanosh is strengthened by the evidence of several events which occurred between 1840 and 1855. These events shed further light on the Chippewas' attitude towards the Cameron transaction.

[142] In reviewing these events, we heed the admonition of the motions judge that direct evidence from the Chippewas is not available. The events are described in documents that were not authored by or even known to the Chippewas, the vast majority of whom did not speak or write English. [See Note 12 at end of document] In assessing this evidence, however, we also bear in mind that, although the authors of the documents shared a common ancestry and cultural background, they did not share the same perspective of the Cameron transaction or the same broad goals or interests. Officials in the Indian Department, and in particular Jarvis and Jones, were hardly in the camp of Cameron and Wawanosh. They had nothing to gain by facilitating the transaction, misrepresenting the Chippewas' position, or ignoring any concerns the Chippewas may have brought to their attention. If anything, circumstances would suggest a bias, especially by Jones, in favour of those who may have voiced any opposition to Wawanosh's actions.

[143] The first reference in the Indian Department correspondence to the Cameron transaction after November 1839 was a letter from Jones to Jarvis in early May 1840. Jones advised Jarvis that the Chippewas wanted approval for the purchase of 300 acres of land in Enniskillen. The Chippewas, including those on the Upper Reserve, had been interested in acquiring Enniskillen land for many years. There were maple groves at Enniskillen which were ideal for sugar-making, a traditional Chippewa activity which had taken on commercial importance as the number of white settlers increased.

[144] Jones advised Jarvis that the Chippewas proposed that the purchase price "be paid out of the money which they are to receive from the tract to be sold to Mr. Cameron and co., or, in the event of much delay, the first instalment to be paid out of their annuity".

[145] The proposal made by the Chippewas through Jones in May 1840 was the latest of several proposals the Chippewas had made concerning the acquisition of Enniskillen land. Some involved the exchange of reserve land (not land on the Upper Reserve) for Enniskillen property, and others involved the outright purchase of Enniskillen property. These proposals were advanced by the chiefs after Council meetings and reflected the consensus of the Chippewa bands. There is no reason to doubt but that the proposal put forward through Jones in May 1840 also represented the community consensus. Jones refers only to "the Indians" in his letter, however, given his relationship with Wawanosh, we think that had the plan been advanced by Wawanosh, Jones would have said so.

[146] The motions judge concluded that the letter from Jones in May 1840 was evidence that the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve had a general awareness of the Cameron transaction as of May 1840 and knew that the land was to be sold to Cameron. We think the letter shows more than that. It indicates a communal awareness of the Cameron transaction as early as May 1840 and a communal acceptance of the transaction. The Chippewas saw the Cameron transaction as providing a source of funds with which they could develop the sugar-making resources on the Enniskillen property. In doing so, they would be pursuing a traditional practice, while at the same time improving their economic base by developing a commercial relationship between themselves and the white settlers. Far from repudiating the Cameron transaction in May 1840, the Chippewas embraced it as a means of acquiring the Enniskillen property, a long-held and actively pursued community goal.

[147] The Enniskillen lands were eventually purchased by the

Chippewas, but not from the proceeds of the Cameron transaction. Those proceeds were not available. The fact that the Cameron transaction did not fund the purchase has no effect on the inference to be drawn from the Chippewas' position as set out in Jones' letter of May 1840.

[148] The events leading up to the survey of the disputed lands in the summer of 1842 also shed light on the Chippewas' attitude towards the Cameron transaction. In June 1841, Cameron complained that he could not commence a settlement of the land until it was surveyed and set out in lots. In October 1841, the Surveyor General suggested that it would be more economical to survey the entire Upper Reserve rather than just the lands affected by the Cameron transaction. Jarvis agreed with his suggestion but observed:

> I entirely concur in your view of the matter but as the Chief of the tribe of Indian[s] who live on the Reserve is not on very good terms with his people I should recommend a reference being first made to them, to ascertain whether they have any objection to the land being laid out into lots.

[149] Jarvis understood that the Chippewas might well be opposed to having the entire Upper Reserve surveyed. From the Chippewas' perspective, a survey setting out lots was a precursor to settlement by the white man. Before taking that provocative step, Jarvis wanted to be sure that the Chippewa community would not oppose it. Given the relationship between Wawanosh and many of the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve by the fall of 1841, Jarvis was not prepared to act on Wawanosh's word alone. [See Note 13 at end of document]

[150] The motions judge contrasted Jarvis' careful approach to obtaining a Chippewa consensus in relation to the survey with the absence of any concern about the existence of a Chippewa consensus in connection with the Cameron transaction. With respect, the two situations were not analogous. Insofar as the survey was concerned, Jarvis had no reason to think that the Chippewas were agreeable to a survey and, given the significance of a survey to the Chippewas, very good reason to think that they would be opposed to the survey. With respect to the Cameron transaction, it was brought to the Indian Department representative, Jones, as a concluded bargain by three chiefs of the Chippewas.

[151] In October 1842, Jones was told of the proposal to survey the entire reserve and was asked to determine the views of the "chiefs of the tribes generally". Two weeks later, Jones wrote back to Jarvis indicating that he had had some difficulties getting the chiefs together and that it had taken them some time to determine whether they were agreeable to a survey of the entire reserve. Jones indicated that the chiefs did not wish to have the entire reserve surveyed.

[152] As the motions judge observed, the Chippewas' consideration of whether to permit a survey of the entire reserve would have necessarily entailed knowledge of the fact of the Cameron transaction and the extent of the land involved in that transaction. The Chippewas' response to the survey request leads to two other conclusions. First, the Chippewas were perfectly capable of resisting attempts to intrude on their land. Second, there was no suggestion that the Crown was not entitled to survey the disputed lands and set out lots on that land. Acceptance of the Crown's right to survey implied recognition of imminent settlement by the white man. Such settlement was inconsistent with any claim by the Chippewas that the Cameron transaction was unauthorized by them, or at least unacceptable to them as of 1842. We infer from the Chippewas' response to the request for a survey of the entire reserve that by the fall of 1842, the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve distinguished between the disputed lands and the rest of the reserve, saw it as their right to prohibit surveys of the latter but not the former, and knew that white settlement of the disputed lands was imminent.

[153] Jarvis was inclined to press for a survey of the entire reserve despite the position of the Chippewas, but in January 1842 it was concluded that the benefits of surveying the entire reserve were not worth the harm that the survey would cause to the relations with the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve. The entire reserve was not surveyed until 1855 when the chiefs consented to the survey.

[154] Even after the proposal to survey the entire reserve was abandoned, there was a further delay in surveying the lands which were subject to the Cameron transaction. The delay was due in part at least to some confusion over road allowances. That confusion resulted from the absence of proper documentation of the transaction.

[155] In May 1842, John O'Mara, a surveyor, went to the Upper Reserve and spent some two weeks doing a detailed survey of the disputed lands. He divided the lands into three blocks [and] set out a road between blocks A and B, a road between blocks B and C and two roads running from the western limit of the disputed lands through the reserve to the St. Clair River. In referring to the actual making of the survey, the motions judge said:

> This is an important piece of evidence because the band was sensitive to the implications of any survey. The open and notorious presence of surveyors on the disputed land and the visible survey monumentation in the form of stakes and blazed trees would bring home to the band very vividly the fact that their land was being prepared for settlement.

[156] We agree with the conclusion of the motions judge. In our view, there were two reasonable inferences to be drawn from the Chippewas' inaction in the face of the survey. Either Wawanosh and the other chiefs acted with the approval of the Chippewas affected by the sale when they made the bargain with Cameron, or even if they did not have their approval, the Chippewas accepted the bargain when it came to their attention, [and] did not seek to repudiate it or otherwise assert any right to the disputed lands.

[157] The failed attempt by residents of Port Sarnia to acquire part of the Upper Reserve in February 1843 was the next event discussed in some detail by the motions judge. He accurately observed that the officials in the Indian Department regarded a surrender of the land as a condition precedent to any acquisition of it by the residents of Port Sarnia. He also suggested that the aborted transaction demonstrated:

> . . . the ease with which enthusiastic purchasers can convince government officials, wrongly, that the Chippewas had agreed to sell part of the reserve.

[158] With respect, the evidence does not support this conclusion. The government officials were not convinced of anything by the residents of Port Sarnia. Rather, Jones was instructed to convene a meeting of the principal men and determine whether a surrender could be agreed upon. Within a month, the Chippewas indicated they were not prepared to surrender the land at that time, and that ended the matter as far as Jarvis was concerned.

[159] The reference to the aborted transaction involving the residents of Port Sarnia provides little insight into the Cameron transaction. Unlike that transaction, there was no bargain presented to the Indian Department in 1843 by chiefs of the Chippewas, but rather a petition to that Department by the land-hungry residents of Port Sarnia asking the Department to obtain a surrender.

[160] The attempts by the residents of Port Sarnia to acquire part of the Upper Reserve in 1843 do, however, provide yet another example where Chief Wawanosh, speaking through his son, conveyed the position of the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve to the Indian Department. As with the earlier occasions set out above, there is no suggestion that Wawanosh inaccurately conveyed the community consensus to the Indian Department.

[161] The incident in 1843 also demonstrates that the Chippewas' objections to intrusions onto their lands were acknowledged and accepted by the Indian Department even over the opposition of settlers.

[162] The Bagot Commission Report in 1844 also deserves brief reference. That Commission examined in detail the affairs of the Indian Department, and was highly critical of the operation of that department. The Commission heard many complaints about unjust land transactions in the 1830s, but recorded no complaints or disputes with respect to the Cameron transaction.

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

The Commission was well aware of the transaction and examined its monetary details at some length. The Commission concluded that Jarvis had placed the initial payment made by Cameron in the wrong bank account and the Commission was highly critical of Jarvis' record-keeping. Nowhere, however, is there any suggestion that the transaction did not have the approval of the Crown and the Chippewas, or that it was regarded by anyone as a "private deal" between Cameron and Wawanosh.

[163] The next reference by the Chippewas to the Cameron transaction appeared in correspondence from Peter McGlashan, the clerk of the Magistrate's Court at Port Sarnia, to resident Superintendent Clench in August 1847. McGlashan, who was involved in yet another attempt by the residents of Port Sarnia to acquire land on the Upper Reserve, wrote to Clench to tell him that the Chippewas were not prepared to give up any of their land. He said:

> . . . To all these arguments the Indians have but one answer viz, that they were induced some eight years ago to consent to the sale of a large part of the reserve to Mr. Cameron of this place, for which he agreed to pay them within five years, in annual instalments but that to this time they have not received any part of the purchase money, and that they will not dispose of any more of their land for fear that they should be served in the same manner in receiving payment for it.

[164] The motions judge found that the letter was further evidence of the Chippewas' knowledge of the transaction albeit that they were mistaken as to the number of annual instalments to be paid. He went on, however, to conclude that McGlashan could not be relied on to accurately convey the Chippewas' attitude towards the transaction, and that it "has little evidentiary weight in determining whether Wawanosh on November 8, 1839 acted with the consent and authority of the band".

[165] While it is not unreasonable to conclude that the letter could not be relied on to show that Wawanosh had the consent of the affected bands when he agreed to the transaction, we see no reason to discount the value of the letter as evidence of the Chippewas' attitude towards the transaction in 1847. Their comments to McGlashan do not suggest a repudiation of the agreement. Quite the contrary, they signal a willingness to comply with the agreement and a complaint that the purchaser was not complying with it. The attitude of the Chippewas, as expressed to McGlashan, is inconsistent with the claim that the Chippewas viewed the disputed lands as having been unilaterally taken from them by Cameron. It is equally inconsistent with the claim that, as of 1847, the Chippewas did not accept that the disputed lands were no longer theirs.

[166] The Chippewas maintained this same position in subsequent communications with the Indian Department. For example, in 1850, a local Indian Department official reported that the chiefs were concerned that Cameron was issuing deeds for parts of the disputed land when they had not yet been fully paid. As in 1847, the Chippewas' complaint was with Cameron's failure to comply with the bargain, not with the bargain itself.

[167] The lengthy dispute over road allowances across the Upper Reserve, between the residents of Port Sarnia and the Chippewas on the Upper Reserve, provides further evidence of the Chippewas' attitude towards the Cameron transaction. In 1849, the residents of Port Sarnia petitioned the government to open a road through the reserve. Some settlers wanted a road through the middle of the reserve, to the river. In August 1849, the provincial land surveyor recommended that a road be built through the reserve. In September 1849, the Chippewas, through their interpreter Henry Chase, responded to the proposed road as follows:

> The chiefs had granted a road should be opened for the use of their white neighbours direct from Sarnia Village, cutting diagonally the northeast corner of the Indian reserve of three quarters of a mile, as the Honourable Malcolm Cameron had proposed to be opened, to his lot of land on the rear of the reserve.

[168] Mr. Chase also reported that the chiefs would not agree to a second road being opened through the reserve. In early

1850, the residents of Port Sarnia filed a further petition with the government complaining that the Chippewas' opposition was due to "a child-like ignorance of what is really for their benefit".

[169] In July 1850, the residents of Port Sarnia changed tactics. They now contended that three roads had been granted to Cameron as part of the 1839 transaction. They petitioned the town Council of Port Sarnia to create a road along those allowances and indicated that the Indian Department should "order the agreement with the Honourable Malcolm Cameron to be fulfilled".

[170] An exchange of correspondence ensued dealing with the road allowances, if any, that had been granted in the Cameron transaction. The lack of proper documentation respecting the transaction fuelled the controversy. It was in the course of this correspondence that an Indian Department official asked whether a surrender of the land had been made at the time of the sale to Cameron. That question went unanswered.

[171] After making inquiries, the Indian Department advised the Port Sarnia municipal Council that:

> On the authority of an existing order of the Governor General in Council that as the land through which you wish the road to pass is an Indian reserve which has never been surrendered to the Crown, no part of it can be considered under the jurisdiction of the municipal Council as a public highway.

[172] The municipal Council was not prepared to accept this position and indicated, relying on the letter of Jones to Jarvis of November 9, 1839, that the municipality would press ahead and "abide the consequences if they overstep their authority".

[173] Clench responded with equal vigour, advising the municipality that if the road concessions were not provided for in the surrender, the letter of Jones would have no value. Clench assumed that a surrender existed. In fact, there was none.

[174] Eventually, the municipality resiled from its threats to proceed with the roads despite the position of the Indian Department. An agreement was reached with the Chippewas whereby the Chippewas agreed to permit a road running diagonally across the corner of the reserve. This was the offer the Chippewas had made in 1849 when they first indicated they were willing to allow their "white neighbours" to run a road through the Upper Reserve from the disputed lands to the river.

[175] The Chippewas' attitude throughout the road dispute was one of acceptance of the fact of the Cameron transaction. The back of the reserve was described as Cameron's lands. The Chippewas were also willing to co-operate with their white neighbours in road construction, but insisted that the co-operation be on their terms if the road was to run over their land. Their position was supported throughout by officials at the Indian Department.

[176] The road allowance dispute is a good example of the tripartite nature of disputes involving Indian lands in southwestern Ontario in the middle of the 19th century. The settlers stood on one side of the dispute and the Chippewas on the other with the Indian Department in the middle. That Department did not see itself as a promoter of the interests of white settlers. Where, as in the case of the road allowance dispute, the Department concluded that the Chippewas were correct, they fully supported the Chippewas' position.

[177] The willingness of the Indian Department to support the Chippewas' position even against the persistent claims of the white settlers in Port Sarnia was not unique and would not have been lost on the Chippewa leadership. Their failure to take issue with the Cameron transaction cannot be explained on the basis that they assumed that such complaints would not receive a fair hearing at the Indian Department. As the road allowance dispute demonstrates, officials in that department were prepared to support the Chippewas in contentious matters involving lands on the Upper Reserve.

[178] The final event which must be examined in considering the Chippewas' attitude towards the Cameron transaction is the General Council meeting of the Chippewa chiefs in March 1855. The chiefs addressed a number of questions to Superintendent Talfourd, Clench's successor. Talfourd's notes indicate that the questions were directed to several transactions involving reserve lands. Talfourd's cryptic notes of the questions put by the Chippewa chiefs included the following reference to the Cameron transaction:

> To what amt. the principal the sale of the parcel of land brought by Mr. Cameron and the amt. of land to have the exclusive use of the money?

[179] Talfourd's report on the General Council meeting included the following:

> . . . I attended a Council . . . of the Chippewas of Sarnia when it was decided that I should communicate to Your Lordship their wants and wishes on the following subjects . . .
>
> (Firstly) the sum that will be realized by the late surrender of land at Sarnia Village, the block sold to Honourable M. Cameron in the rear of the reserve, and one lot in Bosanquet sold to Mr. Kennedy, and at what time they may expect the interest on the payments already made.

[180] After referring to these documents, the motions judge held:

> . . . The documents show that the band knew of the sale to Cameron, did not know the amount of the sale price, did not know the amount of land sold, knew there was some interest owing, and did not know when it would be paid.

[181] We cannot accept some of these conclusions. In our view, it is not reasonable to infer from these notes that the Chippewas were unaware of the purchase price. In his report, Talfourd refers to "the sum that will be realized". This is a very different matter than the purchase price since an interest calculation was involved. Nor is it reasonable to assume that the Chippewas did not know the amount of land that had been sold. As indicated above, a detailed survey of the land had been carried out in 1842. A further more detailed survey was made before 1850. While the Chippewas might not have known how many white man's acres were involved in the transaction, they knew exactly what part of the Upper Reserve had been given up in the Cameron transaction. Lastly, the Chippewas' question concerning when they would pay the accumulated interest does not reflect any ignorance of the terms of the bargain made with Cameron. Actual payment to the Chippewas depended on the Crown, who held the money for the benefit of the Chippewas, and not on the terms of any bargain struck between Cameron and the three chiefs.

[182] We take the queries posed by the chiefs at the General Council in 1855 as strong evidence that the Chippewas accepted the transaction, no longer regarded the disputed land as theirs, were prepared to abide by the terms, but were also determined to get what was due to them under the terms of the transaction. As with the previous events outlined above, the Chippewas did not seek to repudiate the agreement, but rather sought compliance with the terms of the agreement by the purchaser.

[183] By 1861, some 22 years had passed since the Cameron transaction. Cameron was no longer on title and those who had purchased the land had no involvement in the transaction. They could look to an apparently valid Crown patent issued some eight years earlier for the root of their title.

H. Summary of Findings

[184] We summarize our relevant findings with respect to the Cameron transaction and the events in the ensuing 22 years as follows:

-- Crown officials responsible for First Nations relations continued throughout the relevant time to follow the central policies underlying the Royal Proclamation. The Crown continued to recognize Indian rights in their lands, continued to require that those rights be surrendered only to the Crown on consent, and continued to regard those rights as communal and capable of surrender only by a public manifestation of the First Nations' consent to the surrender.

-- Cameron, with the approval of the Crown, negotiated the transaction with three chiefs of the Chippewas, including Head Chief Wawanosh. The chiefs and Cameron reached a bargain, the terms of which were modified by Jarvis and then approved by the Crown. The bargain was consistent with the goals of the "civilization" policy of the Crown.

-- By 1851, the Crown believed that a surrender of the disputed lands had been made and issued a patent on that basis in 1853.

-- There was in fact never a surrender of the disputed lands to the Crown.

-- The Chippewas were never asked by the Indian Department to surrender the disputed lands to the Crown. Consequently, there is no evidence of the existence of a communal intention to surrender the disputed lands to the Crown at any time.

-- The failure to request and obtain the necessary surrender is explained by the dysfunctional state of the Indian Department and the neglect of those charged with the responsibility of obtaining the surrender.

-- It cannot be said whether Head Chief Wawanosh and the two other chiefs negotiated the bargain with Cameron with the authority of those Chippewa bands affected by the transaction. It is, however, clear that those bands knew of the transaction shortly after it was made. They chose not to repudiate the agreement, but rather accepted the transaction, sought to obtain the proceeds from it, and sought to apply those proceeds to other well-established communal interests.

-- In the 20 years following the transaction, those Chippewas affected by it both acknowledged and accepted it. They regarded the disputed lands as no longer part of their Upper Reserve, and insisted that they obtain what was due to them under the terms of the transaction.

-- The Chippewas' repudiation of the Cameron transaction and their claim that they retain their interests and rights in the disputed lands first occurred some 140 years after the Cameron transaction, when it was discovered that there was no documentation evincing the surrender of the lands by the Chippewas to the Crown.

IV. NO SURRENDER OF THE DISPUTED LANDS

[185] It follows from our review of the evidence that we agree with the motions judge's finding that the Chippewas never surrendered the disputed lands to the Crown. As stated earlier, this issue, which is central to this case, is first and foremost a factual one. However, since the arguments of all parties on this issue were essentially focussed on the surrender provisions of the Royal Proclamation and the effect of the Quebec Act on those provisions, we will examine the question of surrender in that light.

A. The Royal Proclamation, 1763

[186] The Royal Proclamation, 1763 was an expression of the royal prerogative. It was used as a mode of imposing the imperial power on conquered colonies in North America, including New France. In accordance with its stated intention to "Establish New Governments in America", it created four new colonies including the province of Quebec, on which it imposed the laws of England until the pre-conquest French Law was restored in Quebec by the Quebec Act, 1774: see P.W. Hogg, Constitutional Law of Canada, 4th ed., looseleaf (Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1997) at pp. 2-7 to 2-8.

[187] Stripped to its essentials, the Royal Proclamation states that the King has acquired territories in America secured by the Treaty of Paris and has seen fit, with the "Advice of Our Privy Council", to grant letters patent under the Great Seal of Great Britain to create within the territories four distinct and separate governments (i.e., Quebec, East Florida, West Florida and Grenada). The territorial boundaries are then set out; they do not include within Quebec the contested Chippewa lands. The letters patent issued pursuant to the Royal Proclamation provide that the Governors of the colonies shall call General Assemblies and that the Governors, with the consent of the assembly, are given the power to make laws for the public welfare and to constitute courts of law. The Governors and councils were also given authority and power to settle and agree with the inhabitants of the New Colonies for such lands, tenements and hereditaments as shall be in "Our Power" to dispose of and to grant certain lands to officers and men of the army and navy who have disbanded in America.

[188] The Indian provisions of the Royal Proclamation begin with the following declaration:

> And whereas it is just and reasonable, and essential to our Interest, and the Security of our Colonies, that the several Nations or Tribes of Indians with whom We are connected, and who live under our Protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the Possession of such parts of Our Dominions and Territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by Us, are reserved to them, or any of them, as their Hunting Grounds. . . .

[189] The Indian provisions of the Royal Proclamation are found in the next five paragraphs of the proclamation and are contained in what the motions judge calls "Part IV" (Reasons of the motions judge, paras. 250-57). Paragraph 1 creates an interior Indian territory beyond the colonies and the western settlement barrier. It prohibits government land grants of any kind in this territory and prohibits government land grants in the colonies of unceded Indian land. Paragraph 2 reserves the interior Indian territory including (until 1774) what is now the disputed land "for the use of the said Indians" and prohibits any settlement or land purchase "without Our especial Leave and Licence for that Purpose first obtained". The leave and licence provisions are of little application and have no significance to this case. Paragraph 3 is a removal provision that required any persons settled in the interior Indian territory or on unceded Indian lands within the colonies to remove themselves immediately.

[190] Paragraph 4 deals with two distinct provisions; the first, part 4a, prohibits private purchases and sets requirements for the surrender to the Crown of Indian lands within colonies open to settlement. The second, part 4b, regulates the fur trade.

[191] The private purchase prohibition and the surrender procedures are introduced with a preamble noting the "great Frauds and Abuses" that have been committed in private purchases from the Indians and the need to prevent such private purchases in order to convince the Indians of the justice of the Crown and to remove sources of discontent. Paragraph 4a provides that, in areas with colonies open to settlement, Indian lands can be acquired only if they are first surrendered to the Crown by the Indians at a public meeting of the nation or tribe held for that specific purpose:

> . . . We do, with the Advice of our Privy Council strictly enjoin and require, that no private Person do presume to make any purchase from the said Indians of any Lands reserved to the said Indians, within those parts of our Colonies where, We have thought proper to allow Settlement; but that, if at any Time any of the Said Indians should be inclined to dispose of the said Lands, the same shall be Purchased only for Us, in our Name, at some public Meeting or Assembly of the said Indians, to be held for that Purpose by the Governor or Commander in Chief of our Colony respectively within which they shall lie; . . .

[192] These are the surrender provisions of the Royal Proclamation. The Chippewas submit that these provisions survived the Quebec Act and had the force of law until replaced in 1860 by the Legislature of the Province of Canada: see An Act respecting the management of the Indian lands and property, S.C. 1860, 23 Vict., c. 151, s. 6. They submit that the Crown could only acquire legal title to Indian lands by following the letter of the surrender provisions in the Royal Proclamation. Otherwise, they say, the transaction was a private sale and void ab initio, leaving the present landowners without title.

[193] The motions judge accepted the Chippewas' position. He found that: (1) there was no formal surrender of the disputed lands; (2) the sale to Cameron was a private sale; (3) the private sale of unsurrendered aboriginal land was prohibited by the Royal Proclamation and by common law; and (4) the letters patent to Cameron were illegal and void ab initio.

[194] The motions judge's reasons, in summary form, for deciding the surrender issue were as follows: the surrender procedures in the Royal Proclamation had the force of law in 1839 and accordingly any sale of Indian lands had to comply with these procedures; the disputed lands had never been surrendered by the Chippewas because the mandatory surrender procedures set out in the Royal Proclamation had not been complied with; absent a formal surrender, the Chippewas did not and could not have consented to or affirmed the sale of the disputed lands. The motions judge therefore decided the surrender issue in the Chippewas' favour and characterized their interest in the disputed lands in the nature of an "unceded unsurrendered common law aboriginal interest and title guaranteed by Treaty 29".

[195] The motions judge held that the Royal Proclamation had the force of law in 1839 and that its full surrender requirements were directly in force in the disputed lands at the material time. He also noted that "[t]he surrender procedures incorporated into the Proclamation, quite apart from the Proclamation itself, reflect fundamental aspects of Indian title at common law" and accordingly that the surrender requirements themselves were "in force in 1774 and thereafter in the area of the disputed lands as fundamental conditions precedent for the valid alienation of Indian land" (para. 286). He concluded that any surrender of Indian lands in 1839 had to comply with the Royal Proclamation and common law surrender requirements.

[196] The motions judge rejected the various defendants' arguments that the surrender provisions of the Royal Proclamation had been repealed by the Quebec Act and thus rendered inoperative. He concluded, as a matter of statutory interpretation, that the Quebec Act was not intended to, and in fact did not, repeal or abrogate the surrender procedures of the Royal Proclamation. He further noted that the Quebec Act, which made no reference to Indians at all, did not evidence the "clear legislative intent" required to derogate from Indian title or treaty rights. Following a chronological review of the relevant case law, he distinguished the Bear Island case [supra, para. 19], in which this court held that "the Quebec Act repealed the surrender procedures of the Royal Proclamation" and that there was no positive law prescribing the manner in which aboriginal rights could be ceded to the Crown (para. 333). He supported his decision not to follow the Bear Island "repeal dictum" on the basis that the case was "fact-driven", that it was overruled by subsequent Court of Appeal authorities, and that although the Supreme Court of Canada upheld this court's decision, the Supreme Court expressly stated that it did not necessarily agree with all the legal findings of this court.

[197] In the submission of the Chippewas, these findings of the motions judge support the legal conclusion that the Crown had acquired no title to the disputed land and could grant no title to Cameron. The Chippewas further submit that because they have a constitutionally entrenched right to the occupation of these lands that continues to this day, the court is not in a position to grant any relief to the present landowners.

[198] In light of our findings on the evidence before us that whatever the formal legal status of the Royal Proclamation subsequent to the passage of the Quebec Act, the Crown continued to recognize Indian rights in their land, continued to require that those rights be surrendered only to the Crown on consent, and continued to regard those rights as communal and surrenderable by a public manifestation of the First Nations consent to surrender (see paras. 57-65 above), little turns in this case on whether the surrender provisions per se of the Royal Proclamation had the force of law in 1839. We have found that those responsible for the First Nations relations after 1776 continued to follow the central policies underlying the Royal Proclamation and developed protocols for the conduct of meetings to which formalities the First Nations and the Crown representative attached considerable importance. We have also found that at the relevant time such surrender procedures were in place, that it was understood by all parties that they were a first step towards making the lands in question available for settlement, that the procedures should have been followed and they were not followed.

[199] As we accept the proposition that aboriginal title could be lost only by surrender to the Crown, and that a surrender required a voluntary, informed, communal decision to give up the land, it is not necessary to our analysis that we determine the precise legal status of the Royal Proclamation at the time of the Cameron transaction.

[200] On the one hand, the record contains evidence that, historically, the Royal Proclamation was intended to be a provisional arrangement which, insofar as Quebec was concerned, was replaced by the Quebec Act and that the temporal limitations of the Royal Proclamation also applied to the Indian provisions. For example, we refer to certain statements to this effect made by the Lords of Trade, [See Note 14 at end of document] the drafting of legislation for Parliament in 1764 entitled "Plan for Future Management of Indian Affairs", and the provisions of the Quebec Act itself. Further, one Crown expert, Dr. Paul Gerald McHugh, posits that the government of the day did not regard the Royal Proclamation as being operative even before the passage of the Quebec Act. According to his evidence, it would appear that instructions as to the treatment of Indians, including the formalities for the surrender of Indian lands, were treated as an ongoing exercise of the royal prerogative. He further asserted that while the spirit of the Royal Proclamation was respected in that all surrender procedures were to be of a public nature, the specific procedure in each case was a matter to be determined on a case-by-case basis by the Governor in Council.

[201] On the other hand, the evidence shows that while the Royal Proclamation was a unilateral declaration of the imperial Crown, historically, it had become a formal part of the treaty relationship with the Indian nations. In reviewing the evidence, we have already alluded to the fact that the Crown took extraordinary steps to make the First Nations aware that the policy set out in the Royal Proclamation would govern Crown-First Nations relations and the importance attached to the Royal Proclamation by First Nations as their Charter. There can be little doubt that from the aboriginal perspective, the Royal Proclamation was perceived as an authoritative and enduring statement of the principles governing their relationship with the Crown. We also note in the record evidence that government officials considered that the Indian land provisions in the Royal Proclamation were still in effect even after the passage of the Quebec Act. Moreover, the Royal Proclamation is expressly referred to in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 25, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act, 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11 (R.S.C. 1985, App. III, No. 44) [See Note 15 at end of document] and it has been consistently cited in the case law from the earliest times as the defining source of the principles governing the Crown in its dealings with the aboriginal people of Canada.

[202] As stated earlier, in view of our findings of fact, we do not find it necessary to make any final determination on the precise legal status of the Royal Proclamation. We note as well that the importance of the Royal Proclamation as the source of aboriginal title has been much diminished by recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada. That court has made clear that, contrary to the suggestion of earlier case law, aboriginal rights, including aboriginal title, are pre-existing rights. As was stated by Dickson J. in Guerin v. R., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 335 at p. 379, 59 B.C.L.R. 301:

> Their [the Indians'] interest in their lands is a pre-existing legal right not created by Royal Proclamation, by s. 18(1) of the Indian Act, or any other executive order or legislative provision.

[203] In Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010 at p. 1082, 66 B.C.L.R. (3d) 285, Lamer C.J.C. stated:

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

> Another dimension of aboriginal title is its source. It had originally been thought that the source of aboriginal title in Canada was the Royal Proclamation, 1763: see St. Catherine's Milling [St. Catherine's Milling and Lumber Co. v. The Queen (1888), 14 A.C. 46]. However, it is now clear that although aboriginal title was recognized by the Proclamation, it arises from the prior occupation of Canada by aboriginal peoples.

And at pp. 1091-92 S.C.R.:

> Aboriginal title at common law is protected by s. 35(1) [of the Constitution Act, 1982]. This conclusion flows from the express language of s. 35(1) itself, which states in full: "[t]he existing aboriginal and treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada are hereby recognized and affirmed" [emphasis added by Lamer C.J.C.]. On a plain reading of the provision, s. 35(1) did not create aboriginal rights; rather, it accorded constitutional status to those rights which were "existing" in 1982. The provision, at the very least, constitutionalized those rights which aboriginal peoples possessed at common law, since those rights existed at the time s. 35(1) came into force. Since aboriginal title was a common law right whose existence was recognized well before 1982 (e.g. Calder [Calder v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1973] S.C.R. 313]), s. 35(1) has constitutionalized it in its full form.

[204] Lamer C.J.C. also stated that "the same legal principles governed the aboriginal interest in reserve lands and lands held pursuant to aboriginal title" (at p. 1085 S.C.R.). He quoted with approval from p. 379 S.C.R. of the reasons of Dickson J. in Guerin:

> It does not matter, in my opinion, that the present case is concerned with the interest of an Indian Band in a reserve rather than with unrecognized aboriginal title in traditional tribal lands. The Indian interest in the land is the same in both cases . . .

(Emphasis added by Lamer C.J.C.)

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

[205] This last statement is important to this case where the Chippewas and the motions judge made much of the language of Treaty 29, consummated at Amherstburg on July 10, 1827, expressly reserving to the Indians from the lands surrendered a reservation covering the disputed lands.

B. The Quebec Act, 1774

[206] In light of these recent pronouncements by the Supreme Court, it would appear that the Quebec Act, 1774 could not and did not effect any change in the nature and extent of aboriginal title to the extent that it did revoke the Royal Proclamation. In any event, we are not concerned so much with the nature and extent of aboriginal rights, as with the question of their surrender. On that subject, we are bound by our own decision that the surrender provisions of the Royal Proclamation were revoked by the Quebec Act: see Ontario (Attorney General) v. Bear Island Foundation, supra, at p. 410 O.R.

[207] In Bear Island, it was argued that the members of the Temagami Band were not bound by the Robinson-Huron Treaty of 1850 because the surrender procedures followed by the Crown were contrary to the Royal Proclamation. As to this argument, this court said at p. 410 O.R.:

> It is at least questionable whether these provisions affected the Temagami lands since they may not have been "within those parts of Our Colonies where We have thought proper to allow Settlement". It is, however, not necessary to resolve this question since the relevant procedural aspects of the Proclamation were repealed by the Quebec Act, 1774 (U.K.), c. 83 [R.S.C. 1970, App. II, No. 2]. Section 3 of the Quebec Act, 1774 makes it clear that it does not make void, vary or alter any right, title or possession. Therefore, whatever right, title or possession the Temagami Band may have had pursuant to the Royal Proclamation was not affected by the Quebec Act, 1774. We think it clear, however, that the procedural requirements for purchase "at some public Meeting or Assembly . . ." was repealed [sic]. Thus, at the > relevant times there was in existence no positive law prescribing the manner in which aboriginal rights could be ceded to the Crown.

(Emphasis added)

[208] It is argued that these remarks were obiter dictum. They were not. The entire thrust of the judgment was that it was not necessary to determine whether that Band had acquired aboriginal rights because any rights they had were extinguished either by being parties to the Robinson-Huron Treaty or because the Band's subsequent conduct amounted to adhesion to the Treaty.

[209] The Supreme Court of Canada dismissed the appeal of the Temagami Band: [1991] 2 S.C.R. 570, 4 O.R. (3d) 133n. The Supreme Court recognized that the case was largely fact-driven and that there were concurrent findings of fact in the two lower courts with which it would not take issue. It then said at p. 575 S.C.R.:

> It does not necessarily follow, however, that we agree with all the legal findings based on those facts. In particular, we find that on the facts found by the trial judge the Indians exercised sufficient occupation of the lands in question throughout the relevant period to establish an aboriginal right; see in this context Simon v. The Queen, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 387; R. v. Sparrow, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075. In our view, the trial judge was misled by the considerations which appear in the passage from his reasons quoted earlier.

[210] This court did not accept this legal conclusion either, and proceeded on the assumption that the Band had established aboriginal rights over the disputed lands. In effectively taking the same approach, the Supreme Court said at p. 575 S.C.R.:

> It is unnecessary, however, to examine the specific nature of the aboriginal right because, in our view, whatever may have been the situation upon the signing of the Robinson-Huron Treaty, that right was in any event surrendered by arrangements subsequent to that treaty by which the Indians adhered to the treaty in exchange for treaty annuities and a reserve.

[211] In our view, these passages cast no doubt on the legal conclusions reached by this court. In particular, the Supreme Court's acceptance of the proposition that "arrangements subsequent to the treaty" amounted to a surrender indicate that it was no longer necessary to follow the letter of the procedure prescribed by the Royal Proclamation.

[212] Nor do we accept the contention that this court "impliedly" reversed Bear Island in Skerryvore Ratepayers' Assn. v. Shawanaga Indian Band (1993), 16 O.R. (3d) 390, 109 D.L.R. (4th) 449 (C.A.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [1994] 2 S.C.R. v, and Chippewas of Kettle and Stony Point v. Canada (Attorney General) (1996), 31 O.R. (3d) 97, 141 D.L.R. (4th) 1 (C.A.), affd [1998] 1 S.C.R. 756, 38 O.R. (3d) 640n. Neither case mentions Bear Island nor the Quebec Act. The only references to the Royal Proclamation were made in an historical context. There was no suggestion that it was still in force as the operative surrender procedure.

[213] In Skerryvore, the Shawanaga Indian Band was the respondent to an action for a declaration that a road which ran through its unsurrendered Indian lands was a public road. The public had used the road from 1850 to 1978, when the Band took the position that it was a private road. The trial judge declared the road to be a public highway by reason of the common law doctrine of dedication and in addition, or in the alternative, by virtue of s. 257 of the Municipal Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 302 [now R.S.O. 1990, c. M.45, s. 261], which provides that "all roads passing through Indian lands . . . are common and public highways". The Band appealed and the trial judgment was set aside.

[214] This court held that the doctrine of dedication is inapplicable to unsurrendered Indian lands because the sui generis nature of Indian title renders impossible an inference of intention to dedicate. This court also held that s. 257 of the Municipal Act cannot mean that [roads] passing through Indian lands become public highways by the simple operation of that section because that would be legislation within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada and, as such, would be ultra vires the province. The section can do no more than declare public, for provincial purposes, those highways that have become public highways pursuant to the provisions of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-5, which provide for the surrender to the Crown and transfer of administration and control of the lands to the provinces.

[215] The only reference to the Royal Proclamation is in the holding by the court that the doctrine of dedication is inapplicable to unsurrendered Indian land. Putting the matter in historical perspective, the court stated at p. 399 O.R.:

> The Royal Proclamation, the Robinson-Huron Treaty and the successive Indian Acts all prohibit the disposition of any part of unsurrendered land except through formal surrender to the Crown.

[216] As we understand this passage, it says no more than that the aboriginal rights of the Band have been recognized by the Crown over time, starting with the Royal Proclamation and continuing with regard to this Band with the Robinson-Huron Treaty and with the Indian Act thereafter. While the court followed with quotes from both the Royal Proclamation and the Robinson-Huron Treaty, in its disposition of this issue, it confined its authorities to those applicable from 1850 to 1978 and relied solely on its interpretation of "treaties and the statutes relating to Indians".

[217] In Chippewas of Kettle and Stony Point Indian Band v. Canada, supra, the Band surrendered reserve land to the Crown in 1927. The Band complained in 1992 that the voluntary surrender provisions of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1906, c. 81 had not been complied with. Laskin J.A., in delivering the judgment of the court, reviewed the history of surrender provisions relating to Indian lands, starting with the Royal Proclamation. He stated that the "underlying rationale" for the Royal Proclamation and the Indian Act was to prevent aboriginal peoples from being exploited. He then held that the mere presence of one of the subsequent purchasers from the Crown at the surrender meetings conducted pursuant to the Indian Act did not violate the language of the Indian Act or the "rationale" of the Royal Proclamation. It has never been suggested that the surrender procedures in the Royal Proclamation survived once they were codified in the Indian Act or its predecessor statutes and that it was necessary for the Crown to comply with both the Indian Act and the Royal Proclamation. As stated, the issue in the case was whether the surrender provisions of the 1906 Indian Act had been complied with.

[218] A further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was dismissed: [1998] 1 S.C.R. 756. Cory J. who, as a matter of interest, had been a member of the panel of this court that decided Bear Island, delivered the court's brief reasons. He said at p. 757:

> On this appeal we are not concerned with the issue of the Crown's fiduciary duty. The sole question before us is the validity of the surrender and on this issue we are in agreement with the reasons of Laskin J.A.

[219] We are not persuaded that this court or the Supreme Court of Canada has overruled Bear Island, implicitly or otherwise. However, we do not regard the fact that Bear Island remains a binding authority as dispositive of the issues raised in this appeal. Simply put, this is not a case where the validity of the surrender turns on whether the appropriate procedures, whatever their source, were followed. Here, there was no surrender at all. Since we accept the proposition that aboriginal title can be lost only by surrender to the Crown, the issues that remain are whether, in the absence of a surrender, the Chippewas have a right to the relief they seek, and whether their claims are barred by the application of any statutory limitation periods or equitable doctrines.

V. STATUTORY LIMITATION PERIODS

[220] Canada and Ontario concede that no limitation period bars the Chippewas' claim against the Crown for breach of fiduciary duty, a cause of action for which there is no statutory limitation period in Ontario. The landowners, however, moved for summary judgment to dismiss the action on the basis, inter alia, that the claims asserted against them by the Chippewas were barred by the provisions of 18 different statutes, as listed at para. 445 of the motions judge's reasons. The motions judge held that none of the statutes in question applied to bar the action, and the landowners and Ontario appeal from this aspect of the decision. For reasons that follow, however, we would not interfere with the motions judge's conclusions on this issue.

A. Issues on Appeal

[221] The motions judge first determined that, for the purpose of any limitation period, the time started to run, subject to any question of capacity and discoverability, from the date of the issuance of the Cameron patent on August 13, 1853. No appeal is taken from this finding.

[222] The motions judge then considered the scope and effect of a multitude of Ontario statutes and concluded that Ontario legislation, because of constitutional restrictions on provincial power, could not of its own force extinguish Indian title. Again, no appeal is taken from this finding.

[223] The motions judge next considered the alternative argument that, if the Ontario statutes did not apply directly of their own force, they applied because they were incorporated in federal law by reference through various provisions. In the first instance, the landowners relied on s. 88 of the Indian Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-5; s. 39(1) of the Federal Court Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. F-7; and s. 22 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-50 (as am. by S.C. 1990, c. 8). The motions judge considered each statutory provision and concluded, for various reasons, that none of them applied. The landowners take issue with this finding but restrict their appeal to the applicability of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act.

[224] Finally, the motions judge considered the effect of a number of pre-Confederation statutes: the English Nullum Tempus

Act of 1769, [See Note 16 at end of document] which applied to the disputed lands by virtue of the statutory reception of English law in 1792; the 1834 Upper Canada limitations statute; [See Note 17 at end of document] and the 1859 Province of Canada (Canada West) limitations statute. [See Note 18 at end of document] Although the motions judge did not deal specifically with the Nullum Tempus Act in his analysis, his reasoning with respect to the other two pre-Confederation statutes would necessarily apply to this statute as well.

[225] The motions judge held that the 1834 and 1859 pre-Confederation statutes were continued as if they were laws of the Parliament of Canada in respect of matters within the constitutional authority of Parliament by virtue of s. 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867 (U.K.), 30 & 31 Vict., c. 3, reprinted in R.S.C. 1985, App. II, No. 5. The question then became whether these statutes effectively extinguished the Chippewas' Indian title to the lands.

[226] The motions judge recognized that Parliament had the power before 1982 to extinguish aboriginal title unilaterally by specific legislation plainly evidencing a clear specific intent to do so, but held that this power did not extend to the extinguishment of treaty rights. Even if Parliament had the power to extinguish both aboriginal and treaty rights unilaterally, the motions judge concluded that the 1834 and the 1859 pre-Confederation statutes did not evidence any specific intent to do so and hence that they were of no effect. He further held that, in any event, the colonial legislatures that enacted these statutes had no power to affect or extinguish either aboriginal or treaty rights as these were matters exclusively within the Imperial authority and beyond the colonial legislative power at the time.

[227] The landowners and Ontario both appeal from the motions judge's finding with respect to pre-Confederation statutes. Canada does not rely on any statutory limitation defence and took no part in the argument of this issue.

[228] The following questions are raised with respect to statutory limitation periods:

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

1. Does s. 22 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act incorporate any Ontario limitations statute in federal law?

2. Does the Nullum Tempus Act of 1769 have any application to this litigation?

3. Were the 1834 and 1859 pre-Confederation statutes continued under s. 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867 as if they were statutes of the Parliament of Canada or as if they were provincial statutes?

4. Did Parliament before 1982 have the power to extinguish treaty rights unilaterally by statute?

5. Do the 1834 and 1859 pre-Confederation statutes evidence the required intention to extinguish the Chippewas' aboriginal or treaty rights?

6. Did the colonial legislatures that enacted the 1834 and 1859 statutes have the power to extinguish aboriginal or treaty rights?

[229] It is only necessary to answer questions 1, 2 and 5 to dispose of the question of statutory limitation periods in this case. Our view, stated succinctly, is as follows. The applicability of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act and the Nullum Tempus Act is dependent upon the argument that the Chippewas' claim against the landowners for the recovery of land is in effect a "proceeding by the Crown" within the meaning of either of these statutes. The simple answer is that it is not. In so far as the 1834 and 1859 limitation statutes are concerned, it is our view, regardless of the answers to the other questions, that the motions judge was correct in his conclusion that neither statute evidences the clear and plain intent necessary to extinguish aboriginal or treaty rights and that, consequently, the statutes do not affect the disputed lands.

B. The Crown Liability and Proceedings Act

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

[230] Section 32 of the Crown Liability and Proceedings Act, first enacted in the Crown Liability Act, S.C. 1952-53, c. 30 in a slightly different form, incorporates by reference the Ontario limitations laws with respect to proceedings by or against the federal Crown. It reads as follows:

> 32. Except as otherwise provided in this Act or in any other Act of Parliament, the laws relating to prescription and the limitation of actions in force in a province between subject and subject apply to any proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of any cause of action arising in that province, and proceedings by or against the Crown in respect of a cause of action arising otherwise than in a province shall be taken within six years after the cause of action arose.

[231] Since this statute only extends to the federal Crown, Ontario does not rely on this provision and, as stated earlier, Canada does not raise any limitations defence. It is therefore not necessary to consider the application of this provision to the Chippewas' action "against the Crown". The landowners, however, argue that the Chippewas' action is, in effect, a claim made on behalf of the federal Crown and hence "a proceeding by the Crown" within the meaning of s. 32. In support of this argument, the landowners rely on the Chippewas' pleadings wherein, amongst other relief, they claim vesting orders in the Crown in trust for the Band.

[232] The motions judge rejected this argument and, in our view, rightly so. The Chippewas' claim for recovery of the land is not "a proceeding by the Crown" regardless of the form of relief sought. Even if the fact that the Crown itself would be barred from claiming the same remedy from the landowners could arguably be relevant to the court's decision whether or not to grant the relief sought by the Chippewas, it does not turn the Chippewas' action into a "proceeding by" or on behalf of the Crown so as to trigger the application of s. 32.

C. The Nullum Tempus Act

[233] The Nullum Tempus Act of 1769 is lengthy and is drafted in the cumbersome legislative language of the time. However, it is not necessary for the purpose of these reasons to reproduce its terms nor to consider any of its precise language because there is no dispute as to what its effect would be if it were applicable. The Nullum Tempus Act barred actions and other proceedings by the Crown with respect to any land claim commenced more than 60 years after the cause of action accrued. If applicable, it would therefore bar any action by the Crown for the recovery of land commenced after 1913, 60 years after the issuance of the Cameron patent.

[234] Ontario and the landowners contend that the Nullum Tempus Act was in force in Upper Canada and Canada West from 1792 to the date of Confederation and that it was continued thereafter by s. 129 of the Constitution Act, 1867. They argue that the Chippewas' action for recovery of land on behalf of the Crown is therefore barred, having been commenced after 1913. The Chippewas do not dispute that the Nullum Tempus Act provides for a 60-year limitation period but they argue that the Act was not in force and that, in any event, it does not apply to their action.

[235] We do not find it necessary to determine whether the Nullum Tempus Act was in force during any part of the relevant period because, in our view, it has no application to the proceeding brought by the Chippewas. As stated earlier, this action is not a proceeding brought by or on behalf of the Crown. It is therefore not affected by the Act's provisions.

D. The 1834 and 1859 Pre-Confederation Limitation Statutes

[236] The 1859 statute re-enacted the earlier 1834 statute and the relevant provisions are identical. It is therefore only necessary to consider the language of the later statute. The relevant sections are 1 and 16, the first barring the remedy and the second extinguishing the right and title of ownership. They read as follows:

s. 1 And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid,

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

That after the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and thirty four, no person shall make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover any land or rent but within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress or to bring such action, shall have first accrued to some person through whom he claims; or if such right shall not have accrued to any person through whom he claims, then within twenty years next after the time at which the right to make such entry or distress, or to bring such action shall have first accrued to the person making or bringing the same.

s. 16 And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That at the determination of the period limited by this Act to any person for making an entry or distress, or bringing an action or suit, the right and title of such person to the Land or Rent, for the recovery whereof such entry, distress, action or suit, respectively, might have been made or brought within such period, shall be extinguished.

[237] Hence, these provisions provide for a 20-year limitation period with respect to actions for the recovery of land. The equivalent sections are found in ss. 4 and 15 of the current Ontario Limitations Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. L.15, except that the period is now 10 years.

[238] It is common ground that, prior to 1982, Parliament could unilaterally extinguish aboriginal title by statute. It is also agreed that Parliament could only do so, however, by the use of clear and plain language. While it would appear from recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada that, contrary to the motions judge's finding, Parliament's power in this regard extended to the extinguishment of treaty rights as well (see R. v. Marshall, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 456 at p. 496, 178 N.S.R. (2d) 201), it is not necessary to decide the matter because there is no dispute that, if Parliament had the power to unilaterally extinguish treaty rights, the legislation would also have to meet the "clear and plain" language test. In our view, it does not.

[239] The jurisprudence has evolved considerably in recent years in the direction of narrowing the concept of extinguishment of aboriginal rights. In Delgamuukw, supra, Lamer C.J.C., in considering whether provincial laws of general application could extinguish aboriginal rights, referred to the "clear and plain" test in these words (at p. 1120 S.C.R.):

> . . . a law of general application cannot, by definition, meet the standard which has been set by this Court for the extinguishment of aboriginal rights without being ultra vires the province. That standard was laid down in Sparrow [[1990] 1 S.C.R. 1075] at p. 1099, as one of "clear and plain" intent. In that decision, the Court drew a distinction between laws which extinguished aboriginal rights, and those which merely regulated them. Although the latter types of laws may have been "necessarily inconsistent" with the continued exercise of aboriginal rights, they could not extinguish those rights. While the requirement of clear and plain intent does not, perhaps, require that the Crown "use language which refers expressly to its extinguishment of aboriginal rights" (Gladstone, [[1996] 2 S.C.R. 723] at para. 34), the standard is still quite high. My concern is that the only laws with the sufficiently clear and plain intention to extinguish aboriginal rights would be laws in relation to Indians and Indian lands. As a result, a provincial law could never, proprio vigore, extinguish aboriginal rights, because the intention to do so would take the law outside provincial jurisdiction.

[240] If the pre-Confederation statutes are considered to be continued as if they were laws of Parliament, of course no issue arises as to the constitutional division of powers. Nonetheless, these comments suggest that a mere inconsistency between a statute and an aboriginal right will not suffice to evidence a clear and plain intention to extinguish the right. McLachlin J.'s comments in R. v. Van der Peet, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 507 at p. 652, 23 B.C.L.R. (3d) 1 (dissenting, but not on this point) are also helpful to understand what is required to meet the "clear and plain" test:

> For legislation or regulation to extinguish an aboriginal right, the intention to extinguish must be "clear and plain":

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

Sparrow, supra, at p. 1099. The Canadian test for extinguishment of aboriginal rights borrows from the American test, enunciated in United States v. Dion, 476 U.S. 734 (1986), at pp. 739-40: "[w]hat is essential [to satisfy the "clear and plain" test] is clear evidence that [the government] actually considered the conflict between its intended action on the one hand and Indian treaty rights on the other, and chose to resolve that conflict by abrogating the treaty" or right.

[241] While in an appropriate case a general limitations statute can bar a claim for damages arising from the loss of aboriginal or treaty rights (see e.g., Blueberry River Indian Band v. Canada [Apsassin v. Canada (Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development)], [1995] 4 S.C.R. 344, 130 D.L.R. (4th) 193), different considerations apply where it is contended that the statute itself extinguished the aboriginal or treaty right. In this case, we agree with the motions judge's conclusion (at paras. 595-96) that the 1834 and 1859 pre-Confederation limitations statutes did not evidence any intent to affect or to extinguish the aboriginal title or treaty rights of the Chippewas in the disputed land. Consequently, we would not interfere with the motions judges' conclusions.

[242] To summarize, we agree with the motions judge that there are no statutory limitations to bar the Chippewas' claims in this case.

VI. REMEDIES AND EQUITABLE DEFENCES

A. Introduction

[243] As we have concluded that there was no proper surrender and that the Chippewas' actions are not barred by any statutory limitation periods, the issue becomes whether, on the facts of this case, the Chippewas are entitled to the remedies they seek, namely, a declaration that the Cameron patent is void and a declaration that they are entitled to possession of the disputed lands. In particular, the issue is whether it is appropriate, in deciding whether or not to accord the Chippewas a remedy, for the court to consider that no claim was asserted for 150 years, and that innocent third parties may have relied on the apparent validity of the Cameron patent.

[244] The issue of remedies and equitable defences, like the other issues in this case, has both public and private law dimensions. The aboriginal right asserted by the Chippewas has been described as sui generis in nature. The sui generis nature of aboriginal title reflects the interaction between traditional aboriginal values and those of European settlers and, consequently, aboriginal title is not readily classified in the conventional categories of the English common law tradition. In some respects, aboriginal title draws upon the concepts of public law. The rights it embraces are communal in nature and can only be understood in the context of the unique relationship between the Crown and the aboriginal community asserting the right. At the same time, aboriginal title has been held on the highest authority to be a right of property and it cannot be described or understood except in relation to the concepts of traditional common law private property rights.

[245] The remedies claimed by the Chippewas reflect the dual public and private law dimensions of aboriginal title. As against the Crown, the Chippewas impugn the validity of the exercise of the Crown prerogative, invoking the principles of public law and the remedies available to challenge the legality of governmental action. At the same time, the Chippewas assert a claim to a property right against the private citizens who are the present occupiers of the property, invoking the legal principles governing the reconciliation of competing claims to private property. It follows that defences bearing upon the availability of remedies in both the public and private law settings must be considered.

[246] As we have already noted, the issue of the Chippewas' right to damages against the Crown for breach of its aboriginal rights is not before us. The damages claim was not the subject of the motions for summary judgment and it was common ground that it would proceed to trial. Accordingly, we confine our attention to the Chippewas' claim for a remedy related to the return of the lands themselves and we do so on the basis that the Chippewas have a right of action against the Crown for damages.

B. Public Law Remedies

[247] The Cameron patent was in the usual form and, on its face, was apparently valid. As is apparent from the record before us, it required extensive archival research to determine that there was any reason to suspect that there had not been a proper surrender of the lands covered by the patent. For well over 100 years, no one could have had any reason to doubt its validity.

[248] The patent was issued as an exercise of Crown prerogative. The issuance of Crown patents to land was a routine governmental act. A Crown patent has been accepted from the earliest days of European settlement until the present as the foundation for title to land. For almost 150 years, successive purchasers have bought lands that were included in the Cameron patent without having any reason to suspect that the patent, and consequently their root of title, was in any way defective.

[249] Public law remedies are derived from both common law and equitable sources. The common law remedies were the prerogative writs. While the prerogative writs have now been replaced by the statutory application for judicial review, the principles governing their availability continue to apply by analogy. Since the early years of the 20th century, the equitable remedy of the declaratory judgment has been an accepted public law remedy. Whatever their origin, public law remedies are discretionary in nature. As will be explained in greater detail below, delay in asserting a claim to a public law remedy, combined with reliance by innocent third parties on the impugned act or decision, is a well-established basis for refusing a remedy.

1. The prerogative writ of scire facias

[250] The common law prerogative writ to challenge the validity of a Crown patent, grant, charter or franchise was the prerogative writ of scire facias: See Evans, de Smith's Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 4th ed. (London: Stevens, 1980) at p. 585; Wade and Forsyth, Administrative Law, 7th ed. (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994) at p. 615; 1(1) Halsbury's Laws of England (4th ed.) at para. 279. While today in Canada, the writ of scire facias is an unfamiliar relic of the common law's past, it was an accepted and recognized remedy in the 19th century. It was described in the following terms by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in The Queen v. Hughes (1865), 1 L.R. (P.C.) 81 at pp. 87-88 per Lord Chelmsford:

> The writ of Scire facias to repeal or revoke grants or charters of the Crown is a prerogative judicial writ which, according to all the authorities, must be founded upon a Record. . . . All Charters or grants of the Crown may be repealed or revoked when they are contrary to law, or uncertain, or injurious to the rights and interests of third persons, and the appropriate process for the purpose is by writ of Scire facias. And if the grant or Charter is to the prejudice of any person, he is entitled as of right to the protection of this prerogative remedy. For as was said by Chief Justice Jervis, in the case of The Eastern Archipelago Company v. The Queen [2 E. & B. 94] "To every Crown grant there is annexed by the common law an implied condition that it may be repealed by Scire facias by the Crown, or by a subject grieved using the prerogative of the Crown upon the fiat of the Attorney-General.

[251] The writ of scire facias has fallen into disuse, but it is mentioned in de Smith and Wade, supra, as falling in the same category as the more familiar prerogative writs of certiorari, mandamus, prohibition and habeas corpus.

[252] In modern times, in the domain of administrative law, the prerogative writs have been replaced by statutory remedies for judicial review, yet the principles they embrace continue to apply. A party may no longer seek a prerogative writ to challenge the validity of official or governmental acts, but the availability of the modern remedy of judicial review will be determined by reference to the foundational principles developed under the earlier regime of the prerogative writs.

[253] One of those foundational principles is the discretionary nature of the inherent power of the superior courts to grant the prerogative writs. The fact that the writ of scire facias, like the other prerogative writs, were said to issue "as of right" did not detract from the court's discretion to grant relief to the party invoking its jurisdiction. There is a distinction between the right of every person to have his or her claim considered by the court and the discretion of the court to grant or withhold relief upon full consideration of the case. A person aggrieved is entitled "as of right" to invoke the writ to bring the matter before the court. It remains for the court to decide how to dispose of the complaint, and in deciding the matter, the court does have a discretion to exercise. This point is explained by Wade, supra, at p. 718: "the fact that a person aggrieved is entitled to certiorari ex debito justitiae does not alter the fact that the court has power to exercise its discretion against him, as it may in the case of any discretionary remedy." Similarly, Beetz J. observed in Harelkin v. University of Regina, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 561 at pp. 575-76, 96 D.L.R. (3d) 14:

> The use of the expression ex debito justitiae in conjunction with the discretionary remedies of certiorari and mandamus is unfortunate. It is based on a contradiction and imports a great deal of confusion into the law.
> Ex debito justitiae literally means "as of right", by opposition to "as of grace" (P.G. Osborne, A Concise Law Dictionary, 5th ed.; Black's Law Dictionary, 4th ed.); a writ cannot at once be a writ of grace and a writ of right. To say in a case that the writ should issue ex debito justitiae simply means that the circumstances militate strongly in favour of the issuance of the writ rather than for refusal. But the expression, albeit Latin, has no magic virtue and cannot change a writ of grace into a writ of right nor destroy the discretion even in cases involving lack of jurisdiction.

[254] The statement in Hughes, supra, that the writ of scire facias issues "as of right" must be read together with the statement that the purpose of the remedy of scire facias is that grants of letters patent "may be repealed or revoked when they are contrary to law, or uncertain, or injurious to the rights and interests of third persons." If the patent may be repealed on scire facias, it must equally be the case that it may not be repealed or revoked even "when contrary to law".

2. The discretionary nature of public law remedies

[255] From the discretionary nature of the prerogative remedies, there has developed and ripened a general principle of Canadian public and administrative law. That principle received clear expression in Immeubles Port Louis Lte v. Lafontaine (Village), [1991] 1 S.C.R. 326, 78 D.L.R. (4th) 175. The case involved an action in nullity under the Code of Civil Procedure, R.S.Q., c. C-25, art. 33, to quash municipal by-laws that had adopted a loan scheme that also imposed a tax on property owners. The by-laws were attacked on the ground that the municipality had failed to give affected landowners the notice required by statute. It was argued that since the statutory procedure had not been followed, and the landowners had been denied the fundamental right to be heard, the by-laws had not been properly enacted and that they should be declared a nullity. The action was brought five years after the by-laws were enacted, after the municipal bonds had been issued and the improvements had bee n made. Writing for a unanimous court, Gonthier J. accepted the submission that the municipality's failure to give the required notice violated the audi alteram partem rule, and thereby rendered the by-laws vulnerable to review, but he held that the court had a residual discretion to refuse the remedy of a declaration of nullity. While the case involved detailed considerations of the principles developed under the Quebec Code of Civil Procedure, Gonthier J. made it clear that the direct action in nullity derived from the same inherent power exercised by the superior courts to supervise the legality of the acts of all public authorities. At p. 360 S.C.R., he described this inherent power of judicial review as "the cornerstone of the Canadian and Quebec system of administrative law" and as a "necessary consequence of the rule of law". At the same time, Gonthier J. emphasized that the power of judicial review was "essentially discretionary" in nature.

[256] As Gonthier J. noted, the same point had been made in earlier decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada. In Harelkin v. University of Regina, supra, the court upheld the discretion of the superior courts to refuse certiorari on grounds of delay. See also Homex Realty and Development Co. v. Wyoming (Village), [1980] 2 S.C.R. 1011 at pp. 1034-35, 116 D.L.R. (3d) 1. In Friends of Oldman River Society v. Canada (Minister of Transport), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 3 at p. 77, 48 F.T.R. 160n, La Forest J. put it as follows:

> There is no question that unreasonable delay may bar an applicant from obtaining a discretionary remedy, particularly where that delay would result in prejudice to other parties who have relied on the challenged decision to their detriment, and the question of unreasonableness will turn on the facts of each case . . .

[257] The underlying rationale for the discretionary nature of public and administrative law remedies in general, and the consideration of delay and its consequences for third parties in particular, reflects the polycentric nature of the rights and interests implicated. There is more at stake than the rights of the individual or group asserting the claim and the applicable legal principles must reflect that element. As explained by D.J.M. Brown and J.M. Evans, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada, looseleaf (Toronto: Canvasback Publishing, 1998) at para. 3:1100:

> . . . the discretionary nature of the courts' supervisory jurisdiction reflects the fact that unlike private law, its orientation is not, and never has been, directed exclusively to vindicating the rights of individuals. The public interest in good government, including the principle that it should be conducted according to law, has always been an equally important factor in the development of the law of judicial review.

[258] Apparently valid acts of public officials are relied upon by the members of the public at large in planning their affairs. Official documents are taken at face value. The purported exercise of a statutory or prerogative power creates legitimate expectations that the law will protect. The administration of government is a human act and errors are inevitable. The rights of a party aggrieved by the error must be reconciled with the interests of third parties and the interests of orderly administration. Accordingly, as explained by the Immeubles Port Louis case and by the leading texts, (see Brown and Evans, supra, at para. 3:5100; de Smith, supra, at p. 579; D.P. Jones and A.S. de Villars, Principles of Administrative Law, 3d ed. (Scarborough, Ont.: Carswell, 1999) at p. 583), a remedy may be refused where delay by the aggrieved party in asserting the claim would result in hardship or prejudice to the public interest or to third parties who have acted in good faith upon the impugned act or decision.

[259] A Crown patent, apparently granting the fee simple in land, provides a classic example of an official act that will be relied on by innocent third parties. A Crown patent is accepted by all as the basis for rights to real property and no purchaser would consider it necessary to go behind the patent to determine whether or not it had been validly granted. It is for this reason that the courts have for [so] long hesitated to invalidate patents that have created third party reliance. See, for example, Bailey v. Du Cailland, [1905] 6 O.W.R. 506 (Div. Ct.) at p. 508 per Falconbridge J.:

> It was held in McIntyre v. Attorney-General, 14 Gr. 86, that where a bill is filed by a private individual to repeal letters patent on the ground of error, the onus of proof is on the plaintiff, although it may to some extent involve proof of a negative. 'Patents are not to be lightly disturbed. They lie at the foundation of every man's title to his property.'

> It is difficult indeed to conceive a more prolific source of > litigation than would be opened in this Province, if the patentees of the Crown were exposed to be attacked upon supposed equities acquired by other parties, while the estate was vested in the Crown, when no fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment is imputed to the patentee, and when the Crown, at the time of making the grant, has exercised its discretion on a view of all the circumstances. Just such a patent as this lies at the root of every man's title.

[261] The motions judge analyzed this aspect of the case in terms of whether the Cameron patent was "void". He held that the Cameron patent was "void". A "void" patent is said to be one that has no legal effect whatsoever, while a "voidable" patent is one that does have effect unless and until it is set aside. Whatever its merits for other purposes, the language of "void" and "voidable" seems to us to be not a particularly apt or helpful analytic tool in the present context. From a remedial perspective, the inherent discretion of the court is always in play. As Wade has explained, supra, at pp. 343-44, the term "void" is "meaningless in any absolute sense. Its meaning is relative, depending upon the court's willingness to grant relief in any particular situation." Wade adds, at p. 718, in relation to the discretionary nature of judicial review, "a void act is in effect a valid act if the court will not grant relief against it." See also Jones and de Villars, supra, at p. 404. Accordingly, for practical purposes, a patent that suffers from a defect that renders it subject to attack will continue to exist and to have legal effect unless and until a court decides to set it aside. In our view, the issue is more clearly put and understood in terms of the discretion to grant or withhold a remedy and the factors that must be considered in relation to the exercise of that discretion. In fairness to the motions judge, it should be mentioned here that the arguments regarding the discretionary nature of public law remedies do not appear to have been presented to him with the same force and clarity as they were in this court.

3. Discretion and aboriginal rights

[262] The Chippewas submit that there is no place for the exercise of discretion in the present case. Aboriginal property rights are fundamental constitutionally protected rights. We fully accept that courts do not have an open-ended discretion to enforce or deny aboriginal property rights as seems to suit the convenience of the case. In particular, it would plainly be wrong to deny a remedy to vindicate a valid claim to aboriginal title purely on the grounds that recognition of the claim would be troublesome to others: see R. v. Marshall, [1999] 3 S.C.R. 533 at p. 565, 179 N.S.R. (2d) 1.

[263] On the other hand, aboriginal rights are an integral aspect of the Canadian legal landscape. Their shape, definition and enforcement do not and cannot exist in a vacuum. In the Canadian legal tradition, no right is absolute, not even constitutionally protected aboriginal rights: see R. v. Nikal, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 1013 at pp. 1057-58, 19 B.C.L.R. (3d) 201; R. v. Agawa (1988), 65 O.R. (2d) 505 at p. 524, 28 O.A.C. 201 (C.A.). As the Supreme Court of Canada has made clear, aboriginal rights "must be directed towards the reconciliation of the pre-existence of aboriginal societies with the sovereignty of the Crown" (R. v. Van der Peet, supra, at p. 539 S.C.R.) and "with the rest of Canadian society" (R. v. Gladstone, [1996] 2 S.C.R. 723 at p. 775, 23 B.C.L.R. (3d) 155). See also Delgamuukw, supra, at pp. 1065-66, 1096, 1100, and 1107-08 S.C.R. The same need for reconciliation between the aboriginal rights and the rights of the Crown and third parties is applicable in the case of treaty rights: R. v. Sioui, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 1025 at pp. 1070-72, 30 Q.A.C. 280. In aboriginal title cases, the rules of the common law tradition must be adapted and applied by analogy. Accordingly, as explained by Lamer C.J.C. in Van der Peet, supra, at pp. 550-51 S.C.R., "a court must take into account the perspective of the aboriginal people claiming the right . . . while at the same time taking into account the perspective of the common law" such that "[t]rue reconciliation will, equally, place weight on each". The accommodation is to be done in a manner that does not strain "the Canadian legal and constitutional structure".

[264] Is it possible to reconcile the fundamental nature of aboriginal rights, and the overarching importance of according due recognition to those rights, on the one hand, with the discretionary nature of public law remedies, on the other? The answer lies in the nature of the discretion that is involved. Simply put, the discretion is narrowly circumscribed, only to be exercised on the basis of established legal principles. As explained by Wade, supra, the "discretionary power may make inroads upon the rule of law, and must therefore be exercised with the greatest care." The discretion to grant or withhold a public law remedy does not mean that the court is free to do as it pleases with the case, without regard to the governing legal principles. The principle of legality and the rule of law require that a priori consideration be given to the party whose rights have been taken, especially where the rights at issue are as fundamental in nature as the right of aboriginal title. However, it is a basic principle of our legal system that the right asserted by the complaining party must be considered in relation to the rights of others. The complaining party cannot claim entitlement to the mechanical grant of an automatic remedy without regard to the consequences to the rights of others that might flow by reason of the complaining party's own conduct, including any delay in asserting the claim. It is for this reason that the established principles governing the availability of public law remedies require that, before a remedy is granted, consideration be accorded to the rights and interests of others who may have had every reason to rely upon the apparent validity of the impugned act.

[265] In Immeubles Port Louis, supra, at p. 370 S.C.R., Gonthier J. provided the following helpful analysis of this point:

> I would point out that discretion and arbitrary action should not be confused. While arbitrary action means power exercised at will, just as the person likes, discretion, though it removes the strict duty to act, is subject to certain rules. A judge hearing a direct action in nullity does not decide to do what he feels like doing, but must exercise his power of review in a judicial manner, direct himself correctly in law and observe the applicable principles.

[266] Gonthier J. went on, at p. 372 S.C.R., to explain the manner in which the discretion should be exercised:

First, the judge must take into account the nature of the disputed act, the nature of the illegality committed and its consequences, and second, the causes of the delay between the disputed act and the bringing of the action. The nature of the right relied on is a factor relevant to the exercise of the discretion, but it is not the only one. The court must also consider the plaintiff's behaviour.

[267] In the case of a claim to aboriginal title, a court must approach the issue of delay with extreme caution and with due regard to the nature of the right at issue. Aboriginal claims often arise from historical grievances. These claims reflect the disadvantages long suffered by aboriginal communities and the failure of our society and our legal system to provide adequate responses. There is a significant risk that denial of claims on grounds of delay will only add insult to injury. It is plainly not the law that aboriginal claims will be defeated on grounds of delay alone. The reason and any explanation for the delay must be carefully considered with due regard to the historically vulnerable position of aboriginal peoples.

4. Application of discretionary factors

[268] The first factor to consider is "the nature of the disputed act, the nature of the illegality committed and its consequences". See Immeubles Port Louis, supra, at p. 372 S.C.R. As our review of the facts demonstrates, the circumstances both before and after the grant of the Cameron patent plainly demonstrate acceptance and acquiescence on the part of the Chippewas. The facts are flatly inconsistent with any suggestion that the lands were taken, either by Cameron or by the Crown, without the acquiescence of the Band members. While the Chippewas' acceptance of the Cameron transaction does not amount to a formal surrender, it is a fact that may be considered in the exercise of the court's discretion to grant or withhold a remedy.

[269] In Immeubles Port Louis, supra, at p. 372 S.C.R., Gonthier J. indicated that the discretion to refuse a remedy could be exercised "apart from situations where there is a total absence of jurisdiction". We do not accept the submission that the nature of the illegality committed here fell into that category or that it was sufficient to require a court to set aside the Cameron patent without taking into account third party interests. The Governor in Council had jurisdiction to grant patents and there was not "a total absence of jurisdiction". The error in failing to obtain a formal surrender was, in our view, akin to the failure of the municipality to provide its municipal electors with the required statutory notice. If anything, the error in the present case was less significant.

[270] While we do not doubt the importance of a proper formal surrender, as appears from our review of the facts, from a purposive perspective, many elements of a formal surrender were in fact accomplished. Although there was no formal meeting to consider a surrender, the transaction was discussed on more than one occasion at Band meetings.

[271] The transaction did not occur without the interposition of the Crown between the Chippewas and Cameron to ensure that the Chippewas' interests were protected. The terms Cameron first negotiated with the Chippewas were not acceptable to Crown officials, who insisted that provision be made for the payment of interest on the unpaid portion of the purchase price. The transaction was approved by the Governor in Council. The consideration did not flow between Cameron and the Chippewas, but rather the proceeds were paid by Cameron to the Crown, held in trust for the Chippewas, and Cameron acquired his title by way of Crown patent.

[272] There is every indication that the Crown officials intended to follow the usual practice and obtain a formal surrender. As the motions judge found, the failure to obtain a proper surrender did not result from any fraud or advantage taken of the Chippewas or from any attempt to deny or override their rights: "It appears that the officials of the day thought the price was fair, thought they were getting a good enough deal for the Chippewas, and simply neglected to secure a surrender because it fell through the cracks in a dysfunctional bureaucracy" (para. 752) (emphasis added). In our view, the courts have a discretion to refuse a remedy with respect to the inadvertent error of a dysfunctional bureaucracy that has been relied on for 150 years by innocent third parties.

[273] The second factor is the nature of the delay and its consequences for third parties. We are not satisfied that there has been any adequate explanation for the delay that should lead us to excuse its impact. In assessing the delay, due consideration must be given to the motions judge's findings of the historically vulnerable situation of the Chippewas, their lack of formal legal capacity for approximately 100 of the 150 years and their dependence on the Department of Indian Affairs with respect to legal claims until the late 1970s or early 1980s. However, the delay here went well beyond failure to take legal proceedings. The motions judge found that as early as 1851, the Chippewas knew that their lands had been taken without a formal surrender. The Chippewas knew that the lands had been sold, as confirmed by their inquiries about payment of the price. Despite the obvious fact that settlers were on what had formerly been reserve lands, there was not a whisper of complaint from the Chippewas. Moreover, w ith respect to other matters affecting their interests, the Chippewas demonstrated both the ability and the willingness to bring grievances to the attention of the appropriate officials. A court cannot ignore the fact that for more than 150 years, the Chippewas made no complaint whatsoever of the evident possession by others of lands formerly within their reserve. The Chippewas gave no indication of any dissatisfaction with that state of affairs and gave every indication that they fully accepted and acquiesced in the transfer of their lands. A delay of this nature and length brings the Chippewas' situation squarely within the category of case where, on established legal principles, the court will refuse to grant a remedy.

[274] The failure to obtain a formal surrender renders the Cameron patent subject to judicial review, but the fact that it appears not to have been the perceived source of any mischief or prejudice at the time the Chippewas gave up their land in exchange for a monetary payment and was not the source of complaint for over 150 years is relevant to the question of remedy. For almost 150 years, third party purchasers have relied on the Cameron patent as a valid source of title to the lands. Property has been bought and sold and millions of dollars have been spent on improvements. It is difficult to imagine a stronger case of innocent third party reliance than that presented by the landowners.

[275] We have found that there was no proper surrender of the aboriginal title to the lands. As already mentioned, aboriginal title is a fundamental and constitutionally protected right. It will require exceptional circumstances for a court to withhold a remedy to protect or vindicate aboriginal title. For the foregoing reasons, we are persuaded that exceptional circumstances exist in the present case. The interests of innocent third parties who have relied upon the apparent validity of the Cameron patent must prevail to the extent that the Chippewas assert a remedy that either directly or by necessary implication would set aside the Cameron patent. In so holding, we repeat here that we do not intend to preclude or limit the right of the Chippewas to proceed with their claim for damages against the Crowns.

C. Private Law Remedies

[276] From the perspective of the private law of property, discretionary factors are traditionally associated with the determination of equitable claims and the availability of equitable remedies. Until the fusion of law and equity in the mid-19th century, a rigid line was drawn between law and equity, and discretion was associated with claims arising from equity as distinct from purely legal claims. That rigid dichotomy has since broken down, but historical factors continue to influence the applicability of equitable principles to claims traditionally associated with the common law. The issue to be addressed here is whether, from the private law perspective, the remedies claimed by the Chippewas are subject to the discretion traditionally associated with equity.

[277] The Chippewas submit that a finding that there was no surrender of the lands covered by the Cameron patent must inevitably lead to the conclusion that their aboriginal title to the lands remains unextinguished and that they have a present entitlement to possession of the lands. The Chippewas rely on the nemo dat quod non habet principle--no one gives what he does not have. The Chippewas submit that as there was no surrender, the Crown had nothing to grant and that the Cameron patent did not and could not convey the fee simple to the lands unencumbered by the aboriginal title. The Chippewas contend that given the nature of aboriginal title, it is not subject to the discretionary factors governing the availability of equitable relief. There are two aspects to this submission. First, the Chippewas submit that aboriginal title is strictly legal rather than equitable in nature. Second, it is submitted that application of equitable doctrines to preclude the Chippewas' claim to the lands would constitute an unauthorized extinguishment of aboriginal title in favour of private interests, contrary to the fundamental rule that aboriginal title can only be surrendered to the Crown.

1. Equitable nature of remedies sought

[278] In our view, the Chippewas' position that equitable principles have no bearing upon their claim cannot be accepted. To the extent that the Chippewas claim the lands as distinct from damages, they assert a claim for an equitable remedy. Before the motions judge, the Chippewas asserted a claim for declaratory relief. In the factum filed on this appeal, the Chippewas reiterated that claim and sought as well an order requiring the Crown in right of both Canada and Ontario to enter negotiations with a view to resolving the Chippewas' claim. In oral argument before this court, Mr. Cherniak on behalf of the Chippewas maintained the position that the primary relief sought by the appellants was for a declaratory judgment, accompanied by a claim for an order directing the negotiations. However, Mr. Cherniak also pointed out that the statement of claim contained a claim for an immediate vesting order, and on behalf of his clients, he asserted that claim should this court consider that a declaratory order should not be granted on discretionary grounds.

[279] It is well established, and not disputed before us, that the remedy of a declaratory judgment is equitable in origin and that its award is subject to the discretion of the court: see Hong Kong Bank of Canada v. Wheeler Holdings Ltd., [1993] 1 S.C.R. 167 at pp. 189-92, 6 Alta. L.R. (3d) 337; L. Sarna, The Law of Declaratory Judgments, 2d ed. (Toronto: Carswell, 1988), in particular at pp. 17-19; I. Zamir, The Declaratory Judgment (London: Stevens, 1962) at pp. 7-9; Russian Commercial & Industrial Bank v. British Bank for Foreign Trade Ltd., [1921] 2 A.C. 438, [1921] All E.R. Rep. 329 (H.L.); Operation Dismantle Inc. v. R., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441 at pp. 481-82, 18 D.L.R. (4th) 481; Dyson v. Attorney General, [1911] 1 K.B. 410, 81 L.J.K.B. 217 (C.A.).

[280] The power to grant a vesting order is conferred by the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, s. 100, which provides as follows:

> 100. A court may by order vest in any person an interest in real or personal property that the court has authority to order be disposed of, encumbered or conveyed.

(Emphasis added)

[281] Vesting orders are equitable in origin and discretionary in nature. The Court of Chancery made in personam orders, directing parties to deal with property in accordance with the judgment of the court. Judgments of the Court of Chancery were enforced on proceedings for contempt, followed by imprisonment or sequestration. The statutory power to make a vesting order supplemented the contempt power by allowing the court to effect the change of title directly: see McGhee, Snell's Equity, 30th ed. (London: Sweet and Maxwell, 2000) at pp. 41-42. As explained by Proudfoot V.C. in Robertson v. Robertson (1875), 22 Gr. Ch. 449 at p. 456, the statute gives the court the power "to make a vesting order whenever it might have ordered a conveyance to be executed". Quite apart from its equitable origins, by the very terms of s. 100, the power to grant a vesting order lies in the discretion of the court. Cases decided under s. 100 explicitly refer to the power to grant a vesting order in discretionary terms: see Ontario Housing Corp. v. Ong (1988), 63 O.R. (2d) 799, 26 C.P.C. (2d) 139 (C.A.); Holmsten v. Karson Kartage Konstruction Ltd.

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

(1997), 33 O.R. (3d) 54 (Gen. Div.).

[282] Assuming, without deciding, that such an order could be made, an order requiring the Crown to enter negotiations with the Chippewas would be a novel remedy, not readily classified in conventional terms. Such an order would have a mandatory aspect and would require the ongoing involvement and supervision of the court. An order having these features plainly could not be available as of right. However, such a remedy should be classified in the traditional terms of law and equity; its award must therefore necessarily be subject to the discretion of the court.

[283] In our view, the Chippewas cannot escape the fact that, from a private law perspective, they are claiming remedies that are discretionary in nature and subject to equitable defences.

2. Aboriginal title and equitable principles

[284] Nor do we accept the submission that a claim to aboriginal title is strictly legal in nature and immune from the overriding principles of equity, particularly where equitable remedies are being claimed.

[285] The Chippewas rely on recent decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada elaborating the nature of aboriginal title as a sui generis legal property right: see for example Guerin, supra, at p. 382 S.C.R.; Delgamuukw, supra, at pp. 1081-97 S.C.R. These statements must not be taken out of context. They reflect the repudiation by the Supreme Court of Canada of the view that aboriginal title is a mere interest, held by grace and at the pleasure of the Crown. The important recognition of the legally enforceable nature of aboriginal title does not, however, reflect a rigid classification of aboriginal title as strictly legal in nature, immune from the principles of equity. Rights of equitable origin are every bit as legally enforceable as rights of a common law origin. By insisting that aboriginal title is legally enforceable, the Supreme Court of Canada did not, in our view, intend to classify aboriginal title in terms more relevant to the 19th century, pre-Judicature Act, pre-fusion of law and equity phase of our legal development.

[286] The submission that aboriginal title is a strictly legal interest, untouched and untouchable by equitable considerations, ignores several important factors. As stated above, the Supreme Court of Canada has insisted that aboriginal title must not be considered in the strictly formal and traditional terms of the common law tradition, but rather that it must be seen as sui generis in nature. The Supreme Court has also held that in aboriginal title cases there is a "necessity for getting rid of the assumption that the ownership of land naturally breaks itself up into estates, conceived as creatures of inherent legal principle" (Guerin, supra, at p. 380 S.C.R.). The court has also stated that "native land rights are in a category of their own, and as such, traditional real property rules do not aid" and that courts "do not approach [a case involving assertion of aboriginal title] as would an ordinary common law judge, by strict reference to intractable real property rules" (St. Mary's Indian Band v. Cranbrook (City), [1997] 2 S.C.R. 657 at p. 667, 35 B.C.L.R. (3d) 218). Moreover, in this area, courts "must ensure that form [does] not trump substance" [p. 668 S.C.R.].

[287] There can be no doubt that the juridical character of aboriginal title has been influenced and shaped by equitable principles. The very nature of aboriginal title, in particular the core concept that aboriginal lands are inalienable except to the Crown, gives rise to a fiduciary duty. The fiduciary relationship imposed upon the Crown to deal with surrendered Indian lands for the benefit of the Indians is a central and fundamental aspect of aboriginal title. In Guerin, the case that identified and imposed the fiduciary duty upon the Crown, Dickson J. stated at p. 376 S.C.R. that "[t]he fiduciary relationship between the Crown and the Indians has its roots in the concept of aboriginal, native or Indian title."

[288] It is difficult to see why a right having these characteristics and drawing so heavily upon the principles of equity for its shape and definition should be entirely immune from the principles of equity from a remedial perspective. Surely, a sui generis right should draw freely upon all otherwise relevant principles of our law, whatever their historic origin. An analogy may be drawn from Cadbury Schweppes

Inc. v. FBI Foods Ltd., [1999] 1 S.C.R. 142 at p. 179, 59 B.C.L.R. (3d) 1, where the sui generis nature of breach of confidence was found to support the argument for modifying the remedial strictures of the categories of common law and equity. Referring to the line of authority, discussed in the next paragraph, to the effect that "[e]quity, like the common law, is capable of ongoing growth and development," Binnie J. held that the authority to award damages is "inherent in the exercise of general equitable jurisdiction" and is no longer dependent upon the "niceties" of specific statutory authority to award damages in lieu of an injunction. He added, at pp. 179-80 S.C.R.:

> This conclusion is fed, as well, by the sui generis nature of the action. The objective in a breach of confidence case is to put the confider in as good a position as it would have been in but for the breach. To that end, the Court has ample jurisdiction to fashion appropriate relief out of the full gamut of available remedies, including appropriate financial compensation.

[289] To hold that aboriginal rights are immune from the principles of equity would be inconsistent with the repudiation of the traditional dichotomy between law and equity by this court, [by] the Supreme Court of Canada and by the House of Lords, particularly in relation to remedial issues. As Grange J.A. stated in LeMesurier v. Andrus (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 1 at p. 9, 12 O.A.C. 299 (C.A.), with reference to the legislative direction that the courts "shall administer concurrently all rules of equity and the common law" (now found in the Courts of Justice Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.43, s. 96(1)), "the fusion of law and equity is now real and total." In Canson Enterprises Ltd. v. Boughton & Co., [1991] 3 S.C.R. 534 at p. 582, 61 B.C.L.R. (2d) 1, La Forest J. adopted Lord Diplock's assertion in United Scientific Holdings Ltd. v. Burnley Borough Council, [1977] 2 All E.R. 62, [1978] A.C. 904 at pp. 924-25 (H.L.) that the merger of law and equity is complete and that "the waters of the confluent streams of law and equity have surely mingled now."

[290] While no doubt the categories that were shaped by the historical influences of common law and equity of law remain relevant for certain purposes, the spirit of the fusion of the two streams is the dominant theme and influence in the modern era. In our view, the modern conception of our private law as a fusion of equitable and legal principles provides added weight to the argument that the discretionary factors associated with equitable remedies may be considered in the present case. For these reasons, we reject the contention that the sui generis right of aboriginal title should be rigidly classified as falling exclusively into one of the historic streams of our legal history, completely immune from the influence of the other. Accordingly, as the Chippewas seek remedies that are discretionary in nature to vindicate a sui generis right that draws upon both common law and equitable sources, we conclude that it is appropriate to consider the effect of the Chippewas' 150-year delay in asserting a remedy and the consequent impact upon third parties of granting the Chippewas the remedies they seek.

[291] On the facts of this case, we do not accept the submission that holding the Chippewas bound by the rules that govern the availability of equitable remedies constitutes an unauthorized extinguishment of aboriginal title. First of all, it is the Chippewas who invoke the principles of equity by their claim for the remedies described above. It is difficult to see a case for granting those remedies other than on the well-established principles governing their availability. Second, as indicated in our analysis of public law remedies, we are satisfied that although formal surrender procedures were not followed, the purpose of the surrender procedure--to protect the aboriginal interest--was fully met by the interposition of the Crown in the Cameron transaction.

3. The nemo dat principle

[292] The Chippewas submit that as there was no surrender of aboriginal title to the Crown, the Crown had nothing it could grant to Cameron by way of patent. It follows, in the submission of the Chippewas, that the Cameron patent was void and that nothing was conveyed. We have already dealt with the submission that the patent was "void" and concluded that established legal principles require the court to take into account the interests of innocent third parties before declaring a patent "void". In our view, the nemo dat principle, as it was applied to Crown patents, is entirely consistent with that view.

[293] An early Canadian case, Doe d. Malloch v. Principal Officers of Her Majesty's Ordinance (1847), 3 U.C.Q.B. 387 at p. 394 dealt with a patent of land already set aside for another purpose. The judgment of Robinson C.J. was to the effect that at common law, the question whether such a patent was void or voidable was unsettled, although he was inclined to the view that it was merely voidable.

[294] Other cases show that the nemo dat principle did not render void all Crown patents of lands to which the Crown lacked title. Alcock v. Cooke (1829), 130 E.R. 1092, 5 Bing. 340 (C.P.) states that in the case of the Crown, the nemo dat rule was based on the notion that in making a subsequent grant of lands the Crown had already conveyed to another, the Crown must have been deceived. As Crown grants were "enrolled", in other words, officially recorded, the subject had the means of determining what grants had been made and was under a duty to inform the King of the existence of the prior grant before accepting a subsequent grant. It followed that the recipient of the grant previously made to another could assert no claim under the subsequent grant. However, where the Crown granted lands that were not subject to an "enrolled" grant, the court stated that the doctrine had no application. The following example was given by Best C.J. at p. 349 Bing.:

> The attention of the court has been called to the circumstance of this being a lease from the king, which must be enrolled; and the doctrine which I am now laying down is applicable only to grants so enrolled: because, if an individual grants a lease, and the estate of which that individual grants a lease afterwards comes to the king, if the king regrants that, as the subject could not know with certainty that there was a previously existing lease, the position I have been laying down would not apply. The doctrine that I am delivering is applicable to a case where the subject cannot be deceived, and he must be deceiving the king; for if the king's prior lease be enrolled, the subject has the means of knowing of the existence of that lease, and it is his duty to inform the king of its existence.

[295] These authorities show that competing claims between subjects were reconciled according to concepts akin to modern registry systems and equitable doctrines of constructive notice. The nemo dat principle did not automatically invalidate Crown patents. As we have already explained, where the validity of a patent is impugned, established legal principles require that the interests of innocent third parties must be considered.

4. Nature of discretion to be exercised

[296] Accordingly, it is our view that whether the case is considered from the perspective of public law principles or from the perspective of private law, the discretion of the court is engaged. The discretionary factors bearing upon the availability of public law remedies is closely paralleled by equitable considerations applicable as between private parties in respect of proprietary claims. As with public law remedies, the discretion to grant or withhold an equitable remedy is constrained and is closely defined by established principles. Although the tradition of equity requires that the decision-making process be described as discretionary, upon analysis, it is apparent that there are well-defined rules and doctrines that shape the decision and control the result. Discretion is, as Lord Mansfield explained in R. v. Wilkes (1770), 4 Burr. 2527 at p. 2539, [1558-1774] All E.R. Rep. 570, a "sound discretion guided by law. It must be governed by rule not by humour; it must not be arbitrary, vague and fanciful but legal and regular." Birks, "Rights, Wrongs and Remedies" (2000) 20 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 1 at p. 16 aptly describes the orders rooted in the Court of Chancery as "weakly discretionary" in that the court acts upon firm discretionary rules that have "been settled over the centuries".

5. Laches and acquiescence

2000 CanLII 16991 (ON CA)

[297] Delay in asserting a right gives rise to the equitable doctrines of laches and acquiescence. The test for these defences was explained in the following terms by La Forest J. in M. (K.) v. M. (H.), [1992] 3 S.C.R. 6 at pp. 77-78, 96 D.L.R. (4th) 289:

> A good discussion of the rule and of laches in general is found in Meagher, Gummow and Lehane, [Equitable Doctrines and Remedies (Butterworths, 1984)] at pp. 755-65, where the authors distill the doctrine in this manner, at p. 755:
>
> > It is a defence which requires that a defendant can successfully resist an equitable (although not a legal) claim made against him if he can demonstrate that the plaintiff, by delaying the institution or prosecution of his case, has either (a) acquiesced in the defendant's conduct or (b) caused the defendant to alter his position in reasonable reliance on the plaintiff's acceptance of the status quo, or otherwise permitted a situation to arise which it would be unjust to disturb. . . .
> Thus there are two distinct branches to the laches doctrine, and either will suffice as a defence to a claim in equity. What is immediately obvious from all of the authorities is that mere delay is insufficient to trigger laches under either of its two branches. Rather, the doctrine considers whether the delay of the plaintiff constitutes acquiescence or results in circumstances that make the prosecution of the action unreasonable. Ultimately, laches must be resolved as a matter of justice as between the parties, as in the case with any equitable doctrine.

[298] The doctrine of laches has been applied to bar the claims of an Indian band asserting aboriginal land rights: Ontario (Attorney General) v. Bear Island Foundation (1984), 49 O.R. (2d) 353 at p. 447, 15 D.L.R. (4th) 321 (H.C.J.) (affd on other grounds (1989), 68 O.R. (2d) 394, 32 O.A.C. 66 (C.A.), affd [1991] 2 S.C.R. 570, 46 O.A.C. 396); Wewayakum Indian Band v. Canada (1995), 99 F.T.R. 1 at pp. 77 and 79 [affd (1999), 171 F.T.R. 320n]. There are also dicta in two decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada considering, without rejecting, arguments that laches may bar claims to aboriginal title: Smith v. R., [1983] 1 S.C.R. 554 at p. 570, 147 D.L.R. (3d) 237; Guerin, supra, at p. 390 S.C.R.

[299] The facts relevant to the defences of laches and acquiescence have already been discussed with respect to the consideration of delay in relation to public law remedies and it is unnecessary to repeat them here. In our view, those facts bring this case squarely within the principles governing laches set out in M. (K.) v. M. (H.), supra. The Chippewas accepted the transfer of their lands and acquiesced in the Cameron transaction. The landowners altered their position by investing in and improving the lands in reasonable reliance on the Chippewas' acquiescence in the status quo. This is a situation that would be unjust to disturb.

[300] The motions judge refused to apply the defence of laches on the ground that there was no evidence that the Chippewas had knowledge of the actual terms of the Cameron transaction and that "[i]t is clear from Guerin that laches cannot bar an aboriginal claim unless the claimant has knowledge of the actual terms of the disputed transaction." The relevant passage from Dickson J.'s judgment in Guerin appears at p. 390 S.C.R.:

> Little need be said about the Crown's alternative contention that the Band's claim is barred by laches. Since the conduct of the Indian Affairs Branch personnel amounted to equitable fraud; since the Band did not have actual or constructive knowledge of the actual terms of the golf club lease until March 1970; and since the Crown was not prejudiced by reason of the delay between March 1970 until suit was filed in December 1975, there is no ground for application of the equitable doctrine of laches.

[301] On the facts of Guerin, the terms of the transaction were essential elements of the claim and without knowing the specific terms, which had been concealed by the Crown, the Band would not know it had a claim. The specific terms of the Cameron transaction are not an integral element of the Chippewas' claim in the present case. The claim is not based on the terms of the transaction, but on the assertion that the lands were transferred without a proper surrender. At para. 653, the motions judge found that the Chippewas had full knowledge of the facts essential to their claim in the 1850s:

> The Chippewas knew by 1851 that their unsurrendered land was occupied openly and notoriously by disagreeable settlers. They confirmed this knowledge, and more, in 1855 by their inquiries about the price and terms of payment. About the actual loss of their land, as opposed to the particulars of the Cameron transaction, there was nothing hidden or unknown. By January 9, 1851 at the latest their loss was clear and obvious. They knew with certainty that the disputed lands had been taken from them without a surrender. There is no evidence as to the point in time that this knowledge was lost to the plaintiffs.

[302] In our view, this amounts to a finding that the Chippewas had knowledge of the facts necessary to assert a claim, and in view of that knowledge, Guerin is distinguishable. As we have already noted in the discussion of delay in relation to public law remedies, we are of the view that the Chippewas not only knew that the lands had been given up but actively acquiesced in the transfer by seeking and receiving payment of the proceeds. On these facts, we can see no reason why the equitable defences of laches and acquiescence should not apply.

6. Good faith purchaser for value

[303] The second equitable doctrine that bears upon the claim advanced by the Chippewas is the protection accorded a good faith purchaser for value. As the motions judge held: "the defence of good faith purchaser for value without notice is a fundamental aspect of our real property regime designed to protect the truly innocent purchaser who buys land without any notice of a potential claim by a previous owner." The motions judge described the defence in the following way (at paras. 686-87):

> The defence of good faith purchaser for value without notice has been a fundamental element of our law for centuries. It protects the security of title to land acquired without notice of claim. It reflects a basic social value that protects the rights of innocent parties. Based in simple fairness, it provides a strong defence for the truly innocent purchaser. As Lord Justice James said over a hundred years ago in the case of Pilcher v. Rawlins [(1872), L.R. 7 Ch. App. 259 per Sir W. M. James, L.J. at p. 268]:

> . . . according to my view of the established law of this Court, such a purchaser's plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice is an absolute, unqualified, unanswerable defence, and an unanswerable plea to the jurisdiction of this Court. Such a purchaser, when he has once put in his plea, may be interrogated and tested to any extent as to the valuable consideration which he has given in order to show the bona fides or mala fides of his purchase, and also the presence of the absence of notice; but when once he has gone through that ordeal, and has satisfied the terms of the plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice then, according to my judgment, this Court has no jurisdiction whatever to do anything more than to let him depart in possession of that legal estate, that legal right, that legal advantage which he has obtained, whatever it may be. In such a case a purchaser is entitled to hold that which, without breach of duty, he has had conveyed to him.

[304] Mellish L.J. in the same case said [at p. 273]:

The general rule seems to be laid down in the clearest terms by all the great authorities in equity, and has been acted on for a great number of years, namely that this Court will not take an estate from a purchaser who has bought for valuable consideration without notice. . . .

[305] The motions judge found that while it was arguable that Cameron had knowledge of the failure of the Crown to secure a proper surrender of the lands, there was no evidence to suggest that any subsequent owner knew or ought to have known that the Cameron lands were unsurrendered Indian lands. Moreover, the motions judge found that there was no evidence of equitable fraud on the part of Cameron that would defeat the operation of the defence in favour of those who acquired title from Cameron. He found that a prudent purchaser and conveyancer would consider that the Cameron patent, regular on its face, was a good root of title and would make no further inquiry.

[306] The good faith purchaser defence is an equitable doctrine and the Chippewas assert that their interest in the lands is a purely legal one not caught by purely equitable defences. For reasons already given, we do not accept this argument. To the extent that the Chippewas assert a claim for the return of the lands, they assert a claim to an equitable remedy that is subject to equitable defences.

[307] The good faith purchaser for value defence applies to the benefit of any purchaser who satisfies its requirements. On the findings of the motions judge, all purchasers from Cameron, the last of whom acquired lands in 1861, were good faith purchasers for value. However, the motions judge held that a rigid and unqualified application of the defence to cut off the Chippewas' claims in 1861 was too drastic given the nature of the aboriginal claim that was being asserted. He concluded that the need to reconcile the aboriginal and treaty rights with the rights of the landowners precluded the immediate application of the defence as of 1861, and, relying on M. (K.) v. M. (H.), supra, he imposed an "equitable limitation period" of 60 years, during which the aboriginal right would survive. The practical implication of this finding was that the Chippewas' damages claim against the Crown would have crystallized in 1921 rather than in 1861.

[308] In our view, the imposition of a strict 60-year "equitable limitation period", extending the time within which the Chippewas could assert their claim to the lands unaffected by the operation of the good faith purchaser for value defence, is not supportable in law. A limitation period prescribes the time within which a claim must be brought. M. (K.) v. M. (H.) goes no further than affirming that, in some circumstances, to prescribe a claim that was concurrently legal and equitable, a court of equity would apply by analogy a legal limitation period. Properly understood, the 60-year period created by the motions judge is not a limitation period at all. On the findings of the motions judge, the good faith purchaser defence would have defeated the Chippewas' claim in 1861. The 60-year period he imposed was an "extension period", suspending the operation of a valid defence, and allowing a claim to be asserted after the point at which, by operation of ordinary legal principles, it would have been d efeated. There is nothing in M. (K.) v. M. (H.), supra, that would support this.

[309] On the other hand, we accept that the factors that motivated the creation of the 60-year "equitable limitation period", namely, the need to reconcile aboriginal title and treaty claims with the rights of innocent purchasers, are factors that should be considered on a case-by-case basis. It may well be that where the denial of the aboriginal right is substantial or egregious, a rigid application of the good faith purchaser for value defence would constitute an unwarranted denial of a fundamental right. It is unnecessary to consider that possibility on the facts of the case before us. As we have concluded that the Chippewas accepted the terms of the Cameron transaction at the time it was entered, we can see no reason why the good faith purchaser for value defence should not be applied to preclude the Chippewas from asserting their claim against the landowners.

D. Conclusion on Remedies

[310] For these reasons, we conclude that established rules governing the availability of public and private law remedies require the court to take into consideration the Chippewas' delay in asserting [their] claim and the reliance of innocent third parties on the apparent validity of the Cameron patent. On the facts of this case, it is our view that the Chippewas' delay, combined with the reliance of the landowners, is fatal to the claims asserted by the Chippewas.

VII. DISPOSITION

[311] For these reasons, we would allow the appeals and cross-appeals by Canada, Ontario and the landowners and we would dismiss the appeal by the Chippewas. Consequently, paras. 1, 2, 5 and 6 of the motions judge's order dated April 30, 1999 are set aside, and in substitution therefor, this court orders that:

1. The landowners' motion for summary judgment dismissing the Chippewas' claim in respect of the invalidity of the Cameron patent is allowed.

2. The Chippewas' motion for summary judgment in respect of the invalidity of the Cameron patent is dismissed.

[312] In all other respects, the judgment of the motions judge is confirmed. The parties can submit written submissions on costs and they are directed to confer with Goudge J.A. to make the necessary arrangements.

Order accordingly.

Notes

Note 1: The white man had various names for the Chippewas (Ojibway, Saulteux). In their own language, the Nation is referred to as Anishnabek. We will use the name Chippewas as it appears to be the appellation most commonly used in the record. We also use the words Indian, aboriginal and First Nations people interchangeably, as did the parties to the appeal.

Note 2: Chippewas of Sarnia Band v. Canada (Attorney General), [2000] O.J. No. 138 (C.A.).

Note 3: There is a dispute over whether Cameron paid the full amount of the principal owed and whether he paid all of the interest owed. The affidavit of James Wells traces the documentary record of the payments. This dispute will figure in the outstanding damages claim advanced by the Chippewas against the federal and provincial Crowns.

Note 4: In 1860, the imperial government approved provincial legislation transferring control over the Indian Department to the provincial government: An Act respecting the management of the Indian lands and property, S.C. 1860, 23 Vict., c. 151.

Note 5: Some 80 years later in the Bagot Report ("Report on the Affairs of the Indians in Canada", Province of Canada, Journals of the Legislative Assembly of Canada, 1844-1845, Appendix eee), it was observed that the First Nations had kept a copy of the Proclamation and described it as their "Charter".

Note 6: The continued Crown policy against sale of Indian land to individuals is exemplified by Superintendent Jarvis' refusal to sanction a private sale of 100 acres of the Upper Reserve in 1841 despite the fact that the chiefs supported the sale.

Note 7: It appears that these two chiefs were allies of Wawanosh in November 1839, although at other times they were opposed in interest to Wawanosh.

Note 8: Jarvis also overstated the amount of land involved, indicating that Cameron had agreed to buy some 4,000 acres. In fact he had agreed to buy 2,540 acres. There is no explanation for the mistake.

Note 9: There is evidence that the policy of establishing permanent farming settlements on the reserves had the support of some 39 Chippewa chiefs in 1840. The Chippewas on the Upper Reserves had cleared some 100 acres for farming by 1841.

Note 10: There is a reference in a letter written by Cameron in February 1850 to a Council having been held. The motions judge dismissed this letter as a self-serving characterization of events some 11 years after the fact. That finding is not unreasonable.

Note 11: See supra, n. 3.

Note 12: The only document authored by a Chippewa was an August 22, 1840 letter from David Wawanosh, the teenage son of Chief Wawanosh. He went to school at Upper Canada College and spoke and wrote English. The letter expressed regret that the Chippewas had sold so much of their land to the white man, but also affirmed commitment to the "civilization" policy.

Note 13: There is no indication in the evidence that Wawanosh favoured a survey of the entire reserve or would have agreed to the request that the entire reserve be surveyed.

Note 14: The Lords of Trade formed the committee of the Privy Council responsible for the conception, drafting and making of the Royal Proclamation.

Note 15: Section 25 provides in part:

> 25. The guarantee in this Charter of certain rights and freedoms shall not be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any aboriginal, treaty or other rights or freedoms that pertain to the aboriginal peoples of Canada including (a) any rights or freedoms that have been recognized by the Royal Proclamation of October 7, 1963 ...

ENDORSEMENT

[1] The appellants Dr. Sylvester Chuang and several related companies seek to re-open their appeal to this court of the decision of Spence J. of the Superior Court of Justice. The trial judge interpreted a commercial contract between the Chuang plaintiffs and the corporate defendant Toyota Canada Inc. ("Toyota").

Based on his interpretation of the contract, the trial judge dismissed the Chuang action: Chuang v. Toyota Canada Inc., 2015 ONSC 885.

[2] The central issue at trial was whether Toyota's termination of the contract was reasonable. The trial judge held that it was not, but went on to hold that an exclusion clause referring to Toyota's exercise of its termination rights protected Toyota from any obligation to pay damages or other losses caused to Dr. Chuang by termination of the agreement.

[3] This court dismissed the appeal: Chuang v. Toyota Canada Inc., 2016 ONCA 584.

[4] Now the appellants, with different counsel than trial and appeal counsel, seek to re-open the appeal on an entirely different ground not argued in the trial court or this court. The appellants say that Toyota did not terminate the contract; rather it repudiated it and a proper legal analysis relating to the law of repudiation of a contract would lead to a different result.

[5] The motion to re-open the appeal in this case must fail. The legal theory relating to repudiation was not raised at trial; indeed the word 'repudiation' is not employed in the Statement of Claim. Nor was it advanced as a legal argument. In his opening argument, the plaintiffs' trial counsel said:

> It's the plaintiffs' position, Your Honour that Toyota's conduct was tantamount to a breach of contract; that it

> acted unreasonably and in bad faith in terminating the amended LOC and that they breached the very terms of the LOC by failing to give appropriate notice; and in any event they can't rely on their own conduct in misleading the Plaintiffs, and that as a result of their wrongful termination the Plaintiffs are entitled to damages. [Emphasis added.]

[6] The same point applies on the appeal. In both written and oral argument, the 'repudiation' argument was entirely absent. As explained by L'Heureux-Dubé J. in R. v. Brown, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 918, at p. 923:

> Courts have long frowned on the practice of raising new arguments on appeal. The concerns are two-fold: first, prejudice to the other side caused by the lack of opportunity to respond and adduce evidence at trial and second, the lack of a sufficient record upon which to make the findings of fact necessary to properly rule on the new issue. [Citations omitted.]

While L'Heureux-Dubé J. was writing in dissent, the majority did not take issue with this part of her judgment. See also: College of Optometrists of Ontario v. SHS Optical Ltd. (c.o.b. Great Glasses), 2008 ONCA 685, 93 O.R. (3d) 139, at para. 90 and Kaiman v. Graham, 2009 ONCA 77, 245 O.A.C. 130, at para. 18.

[7] A party seeking to re-open an appeal after the appeal decision has been rendered faces a high hurdle. After more than 10 years of litigation, it would be unfair to permit the appellants to re-open their appeal on a different legal issue. In Mujagic v. Kamps, 2015 ONCA 360, 125 O.R. (3d) 715, at para. 12, this court said that the power to re-open an appeal "will be exercised sparingly and only where it is clearly in the interests of justice" (citation omitted). It is not in the interests of justice that this appeal be re-opened.

[8] The motion is dismissed with costs to the respondent.

COCK v. LABOUR RELATIONS BOARD

British Columbia Court of Appeal, O'Halloran, Smith and Davey, JJ.A. November 7, 1960.*

1960 CanLII 293 (BC CA)

A. W. Mercer, for appellant.

C. G. Robson, and C. M. Jeffrey, for respondent.

O'HALLORAN, J.A.:—I would allow the appeal and dismiss the motion for the reasons given by my brother Davey with whose reasons for judgment I am in entire agreement.

DAVEY, J.A.:—This is the judgment of the Court delivered pursuant to s. 26(2) of the Court of Appeal Act, R.S.B.C. 1948, c. 74, and amending Acts, Sidney Smith, J.A., having died after the hearing of the appeal and before the judgment of the Court was delivered.

The Canadian Brotherhood of Railway, Transport and General Workers, Local 400, applied to the Labour Relations Board to be certified under s. 10(1) and 12 of the Labour Relations Act, 1954, (B.C.), c. 17, as representative for a unit of employees of Black Ball Ferries Ltd., then represented by the Seafarers' International Union of North America, Canadian District. The application was based on the claim of the local that the majority of the employees in the unit, namely 90 out of 135, belonged to it and were members in good standing.

Section 8 of the Regulations passed under the Act provides that for this purpose a member in good standing is a person who has at the date of the application for certification signed an application for membership and has himself paid the specified union dues.

On the formal hearing before the Board the local led evidence under oath that some 85 employees out of the 90 had signed application cards for membership in the local and had themselves paid the dues required by Reg. 8. Specifically, it was testified that six Chinese, included in the 85 members, had themselves paid the necessary dues, and their signed applications and the receipts issued to them for the dues were filed with the Board. The Seafarers' Union, in its turn, called the six Chinese and each swore that he had not paid those dues. None of the other 79 employees were called to give similar testimony, although the Seafarers' Union claims that others were there if the Board wanted to hear them. The Board had also the information elicited by its own investigation of the application.

The Board formally rejected the application for certification on the ground, sufficiently supported by the evidence before it, that:

> The Board is satisfied that membership in good standing has been falsely represented by the applicant as, contrary to the evidence submitted by the applicant, in the opinion of the Board the necessary dues or initiation fees had not in fact been paid on their own behalf before the date of application by all who were claimed as members in good standing [of the applicant].

The local, and Cock acting on behalf of its officers and members pursuant to its authority, then moved for writs of certiorari and mandamus to quash the decision of the Board and to require it to certify the local as the representative of the unit, or alternatively to order a representation vote by the employees in the unit, or, in the further alternative, to direct the Board to hear and determine the application according to law.

The substantial grounds for the motion were that even if the six Chinese had not themselves paid the necessary dues and so were not members in good standing of the local, it still had as members in good standing the majority of the employees in the unit, which entitled it to certification; also, that s. 12(3), (4) and (5), requires the Board to dispose of the application for certification in one of three ways: in the case of doubt by directing that a representation vote be taken; by certifying the applicant if satisfied that the majority of the employees are members in good standing; or, by refusing certification if satisfied the majority are not members in good standing. It is submitted that the Board did none of those things and so did not discharge its statutory duty, but rendered a decision which it could not lawfully make.

The learned Judge below upheld those objections, quashed the decision and directed the Board to hear and determine the application according to law.

The Labour Relations Board appeals.

I find it unnecessary to consider the reasons upon which the learned Judge proceeded. While the point was not taken below, in my respectful opinion, these writs should not be granted, even upon grounds otherwise legally sufficient, to applicants who in the matters before the Board have committed the fraud, trickery, and apparently perjury, found against the respondents here.

I would allow the appeal and dismiss the motion.

Appeal allowed.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA
ORAL REASONS FOR JUDGMENT
Before:
The Honourable Madam Justice Newbury February 20, 2002
The Honourable Mr. Justice Hall
The Honourable Madam Justice Levine
Vancouver, B.C.

BETWEEN:
MOIRA ANN DEFEHR
also known as MOIRA ANN HUBBARD PLAINTIFF
(RESPONDENT)
AND:
CURTIS WADE DEFEHR
DEFENDANT
(APPELLANT)

C.W. DeFehr	Appellant appearing on his own behalf
F. Nudel	appearing for the Respondent
T. Mason	appearing for the Attorney General of British Columbia

[1] LEVINE, J.A.: This application is for review of an order made by Lambert J.A. on December 4, 2001, dismissing the appellant, Curtis Wade de Fehr's, application for funding for counsel to assist with his appeal and the cost of transcripts. The appeal is from orders for custody and access of the four children of him and the respondent, Moira Ann Hubbard (also known as Moira Ann DeFehr), made by Loo J. in March and June, 2001.

[2] The appellant was granted indigent status by Rowles J.A. on August 14, 2001. He then brought an application for funding for counsel and the cost of transcripts for the appeal. On October 25, 2001, Mackenzie J.A. ordered that the Attorney General provide funding for counsel designated by the Legal Services Society to argue the application, and set the matter to be heard peremptorily for December 4, 2001.

[3] On December 4, the appellant appeared without counsel. He claimed that the Attorney General's department delayed the process and did not produce the required certificate on time. Lambert J.A. said that "on balance it was Mr. DeFehr who made it difficult to get counsel appointed." When asked whether he wanted to proceed with the application for counsel, the appellant responded that because of the interests of the children he did not wish to delay and wished to proceed with the argument. Counsel for the Attorney General and the respondent provided some information and outlined the basic nature of the case.

[4] Lambert J.A. said (at para. 6):

> Mr. DeFehr's argument did not seek to make the very difficult points in relation to s. 7 and s. 11 of the Charter of Rights. I would not be quick to assume that any rights could be established and, indeed, Ms. Mason has said that the Attorney General very much opposes the argument that there are any rights to public funding in this kind of matter, or that there is any basis in the Charter for supporting such rights.

[5] He continued (at para. 7):

> Balancing the interests of justice and bearing in mind the particular interests of the children, and the uncertainty caused by this appeal to them, and having regard to the fact that the points in the appeal are entirely different from the points on this application...it is my opinion that the application for funding of the legal services of the appellant in the appeal itself should be dismissed, and I so order.

[6] A review of the decision of a chambers judge by a panel of this Court is not a rehearing of the original application. The test for review is: was the chambers judge wrong in law, or wrong in principle, or did the chambers judge misconceive the facts. If the chambers judge did not commit any of those errors, then the division of the court in review should not change the order of the chambers judge: Ward v. Clark, [2001] B.C.J. No. 901 (C.A.)(QL), 2001 BCCA 264 (Donald J.A.); Haldorson v. Coquitlam (City) (2000), 3 C.P.C. (5th) 225, [2000] B.C.J. No. 2532 (C.A.)(QL) (Lambert J.A.).

[7] The appellant claimed, in oral submissions on this review, that he has been "wronged by the state" in the course of the litigation between him and the respondent concerning the custody and access of the children. He alleges that Loo J. and other judges and masters were biased and denied him fundamental justice, including the right to call witnesses and make his arguments in interlocutory applications and at trial. None of these allegations are set out in affidavit form, and many of them were not before Lambert J.A.

[8] The appellant provided a number of authorities in support of his application for funding for counsel to argue his appeal, but the only one really on point is New Brunswick (Minister of Health and Community Services) v. G.(J.), [1999] 3 S.C.R. 46. In that case, the Supreme Court held that an application by a government for custody of children threatens the parent's right to security of the person, protected by s. 7 of the Charter, and in the circumstances of that case, would not be in accordance with fundamental justice if the parent was unrepresented at the hearing. The Court is clear that the threat to security derives from state action: "direct state interference with the parent-child relationship, through a procedure in which the relationship is subject to state inspection and review, is a gross intrusion into a private and intimate sphere" (para. 61 per Lamer C.J.). Whether the parent's right to a fair hearing is compromised by not having counsel to represent him or her must be determined in the circumstances of the particular case, taking into account: the seriousness of the interests at stake, the complexity of the proceedings, and the capacities of the appellant (para. 75 per Lamer C.J.).

[9] Thus, following G.(J.), the appellant in this case has two hurdles to establish a constitutional right to counsel. First, he must establish, which he cannot, that this case involves state action that interfered with his relationship with his children. This case is a private dispute between two parents as to which of them will have custody and the terms of access. The G.(J.) case is not authority for the proposition that one parent has a constitutional right to parent in relation to the other. The question is which of them can best provide for the best interests of the children, taking into account all of the relevant factors, which are set out in the applicable statutes, the Divorce Act and the Family Relations Act. Allegations that the actions of the judiciary violated his constitutional rights do not provide a basis for claiming a right to state funding of counsel.

[10] Furthermore, this Court made it clear in British Columbia (Minister of Forests) v. Okanagan Indian Band, [2001] B.C.J. No. 2279 (C.A.)(QL), 2001 BCCA 647, that there is no "constitutional right to provincially-funded legal fees and the courts do not have jurisdiction to order same" (at para. 36).

[11] Second, even if the appellant could show that his constitutional rights were violated in any way, the evidence before this panel does not establish that, taking into account the seriousness of the interests at stake concerning the appellant's relationship with his children, the complexity of the proceedings and the capacity of the appellant, his right to a fair hearing on his appeal would not be met if counsel were not appointed to represent him.

[12] In my view, there is no basis to interfere with Lambert J.A.'s decision to dismiss the appellant's application for funding for counsel.

[13] The appellant's application for funding for transcripts is similarly without merit. The Court of Appeal Rules make it clear that an appellant must provide copies of a transcript of any oral evidence that is required for the appeal (Rule 6). Rule 40(5) of the Supreme Court Rules, which provides that "in an action", the court may order that a transcript be prepared at the expense of the Crown where the cost would be a hardship on a party, does not apply to an appeal. In any event, any such order would be discretionary and not reviewable by this Court unless the discretion were not properly exercised. There is no basis for review of Lambert J.A.'s decision to dismiss the appellant's application for funding for transcripts in this case.

[14] I would dismiss the application for review and confirm the order of Lambert J.A. that the appeal should proceed on the merits in strict compliance with the Rules without further delay.

[15] NEWBURY, J.A.: I agree.

[16] HALL, J.A.: I agree.

[17] NEWBURY, J.A.: The application is dismissed.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Tysoe:

Introduction

[1] The defendants appeal an order of a chambers judge striking out a paragraph of their statement of defence and denying the defendants leave to amend their statement of defence to include certain proposed amendments.

[2] The judge made his ruling under Rule 9-5(1)(a) of the Supreme Court Civil Rules on the basis that the proposed defences were bound to fail.

[3] For the reasons that follow, I agree with the conclusions of the judge and would dismiss the appeal.

Background

[4] The pleadings in this action are complex but, as I understand it, the main thrust of the claim is that the defendants wrongfully appropriated a corporate opportunity of the plaintiff, First Silver Reserve Inc. ("First Silver"), when, in August 2007, the defendant, Minera Arroyo Del Agua S.A. de C.V. ("Minera Arroyo"), acquired a silver mine and mill in Mexico known as the Bolaños property. The claims pleaded by the plaintiffs include breach of fiduciary duty, breach of trust, breach of statutory duties, fraud, interference with economic interests, conspiracy and misrepresentation.

[5] The defendant, Hector Davila Santos, had been the majority shareholder and a director and officer of First Silver. In 2004, Mr. Davila Santos learned that the owner of the Bolaños property was interested in selling it and there were negotiations between him and the owner. The plaintiffs plead that Mr. Davila Santos conducted the negotiations on behalf of First Silver and its wholly owned subsidiary, the plaintiff, Minera el Pilon, S.A. de C.V. The defendants plead that these negotiations were conducted on the understanding of First Silver's directors that, if

First Silver was not willing or did not have sufficient funds to purchase the Bolaños property, Mr. Davila Santos was free to purchase it for his own account.

[6] In April 2006, the plaintiff, First Majestic Silver Corp. ("First Majestic"), entered into a share purchase agreement with Mr. Davila Santos for the purchase of all of his shares in First Silver. Half of the purchase price was payable on the closing of the transaction with the other half of the purchase price payable in equal instalments on the first and second anniversaries of the closing. The plaintiffs plead that Mr. Davila Santos misrepresented to First Majestic that he was personally entitled to acquire the Bolaños property, in order to induce it to agree to a clause in the share purchase agreement stating that he had an interest in the Bolaños property (and giving First Majestic a right of first refusal in respect of the negotiation and purchase of the property). The share transaction closed on May 30, 2006, and Mr. Davila Santos ceased to be an officer and director of First Silver shortly thereafter.

[7] The plaintiffs plead that First Majestic came to understand in July 2006 that Mr. Davila Santos did not have a personal right to acquire the Bolaños property and that it was a corporate opportunity of First Silver.

[8] The Bolaños property was acquired by Minera Arroyo under an agreement entered into in August 2007. The defendants admit that Minera Arroyo is owned by Mr. Davila Santos and members of his family.

[9] After First Majestic became the majority owner of First Silver, it did two things that are relevant to the proposed defences in question. First, it raised funds through public offerings in order to make payments due under the share purchase agreement and, in that regard, it issued prospectuses in July 2006 and May 2007. Secondly, it acquired the shares of the minority shareholders of First Silver by way of a plan of arrangement approved by the Supreme Court of British Columbia on September 8, 2006. The minority shareholders exchanged their shares in First Silver for shares in First Majestic on a two-for-one basis, and First Silver became a wholly owned subsidiary of First Majestic.

2012 BCCA 5 (CanLII)

[10] Neither the prospectuses nor the documents relating to the plan of arrangement made reference to First Silver having an interest in, or a cause of action relating to, the Bolaños property. First Silver provided a letter dated August 2, 2006 to the firm preparing the fairness opinion in respect of the plan of arrangement stating that there had been no irregularities involving First Silver, its directors or management.

[11] In their statement of claim, the plaintiffs plead that First Majestic and First Silver should be regarded as "one business enterprise" and that Mr. Davila Santos' violations of fiduciary duties to First Silver should be regarded as violations of fiduciary duties owed to First Majestic.

The Proposed Defences

[12] The following is the paragraph in the statement of defence struck by the chambers judge:

> 41A. In order to make the May 30, 2007 payment, First Majestic was required to go into the public markets to borrow funds. Despite intending to assert that Davila Santos had acted "fraudulently", First Majestic, through its senior representatives, including Neumeyer, failed to disclose this information to First Majestic's potential shareholders in its Prospectus, despite, a statutory obligation that it make full, true and plain disclosure, therein.

[13] The following are the proposed paragraphs that the chambers judge did not allow to be included in the amendments sought by the defendants:

> 39A. As a result of FSR's conduct set out in paragraphs 38 to 39 herein, while in possession of the knowledge identified in paragraphs 24D, 28, 31A, 31E, 31G, 31I and 31J herein, the Plaintiffs can not bring or maintain the claims made in the Second Further Amended Statement of Claim, for the following reasons:
>
> a. FSR brought a proceeding in the Supreme Court of British Columbia and obtained an order which approved the Plan of Arrangement as being fair to the shareholders of FSR and binding on FSR and its shareholders. The evidence and other materials put forward by FSR in support of the relief sought on that proceeding, explicitly or implicitly, included statements to the effect that (1) there had been no material wrongdoing by the past directors of FSR, and (2) that a claim to or in relation to the Bolanos Property was not an asset of FSR. In the > circumstances, these issues are res judicata, and it is an abuse of process for FSR to make the claims that it is now making in the within proceeding against the Defendants. Furthermore, FSR is estopped from now making such claims against the Defendants.

>
> b. by taking the steps necessary to conclude the Plan of Arrangement, including by seeking and obtaining the approval of its shareholders – including Davila Santos, who remained a shareholder of FSR – for the Plan of Arrangement without stating that (1) there had been material wrongdoing by Davila Santos against FSR, and (2) that a claim to or in relation to the Bolanos Property was an asset of FSR, FSR has acquiesced in and/or waived and/or ratified the conduct that forms the basis for its claims against the Defendants in this action, thereby precluding FSR from making such claims. Furthermore, FSR is estopped from making such claims in this proceeding; and > c. in the circumstances pleaded above, the Plaintiffs lack clean hands to seek equitable relief in relation to claims of wrong-doing by the Defendants in relation to the Bolanos Property.
>
> 41.1 In order to have sufficient funds to pay to Davila Santos the full amount due to him on closing of the Share Purchase Agreement, First Majestic was required to go into the public markets to raise funds. First Majestic issued its final prospectus for this financing on or about July 19, 2006. Despite intending to assert that Davila Santos had acted "fraudulently", First Majestic, through its senior representatives including Neumeyer, failed to disclose this information to First Majestic's potential investors in its prospectus, despite a statutory obligation that it make full, true and plain disclosure therein.

[14] In addition, the chambers judge did not allow amendments to para. 70 of the statement of defence to the extent that it relied on the facts pleaded in the proposed para. 41.1 to support defences of waiver, acquiescence, estoppel and lack of clean hands.

[15] The defendants also sought to add paras. 41B and 41C to their statement of defence. These paragraphs related to lack of disclosure to stock exchanges. The defendants are not appealing from the judge's order to the extent that he refused to allow these paragraphs to be added to the statement of defence.

[16] The defendants are also not appealing from the judge's order to the extent that he found the proposed defences of res judicata, estoppel and acquiescence alleged in proposed para. 39A were bound to fail. The appeal is restricted to the proposed defences of abuse of process, waiver, lack of clean hands and ratification.

Discussion

[17] I wish to make two observations before considering the proposed defences in detail. In proposing the defences, the defendants are relying on non-disclosure in the two prospectuses in question and in the proceeding in which the plan of arrangement was approved (the "plan approval proceeding"). This does not involve a consideration of whether the non-disclosure gives rise to claims in favour of investors who participated in the two First Majestic financings or the minority shareholders of First Silver. Whether the non-disclosures could give rise to such claims is irrelevant to the question of whether the defendants should be allowed to put forward these defences.

[18] The second observation is that none of the proposed defences goes to the merits of the allegations made by the plaintiffs. The position of the defendants is that the proposed defences give them defences to the plaintiffs' claims or the relief sought, in whole or in part, even if the plaintiffs' allegations are true.

[19] In striking paragraph 41A and refusing the application of the defendants to add paragraphs 39A and 41.1, the chambers judge applied the well-known test articulated in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959 at 980, 74 D.L.R. (4th) 321; namely, "assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, is it 'plain and obvious' that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action?" Of course, this test was expressed in the context of a claim being struck from a statement of claim. In the context of a possible defence being struck from a statement of defence, the test is whether it is plain and obvious that the pleading does not disclose a reasonable defence.

[20] The Supreme Court of Canada recently had occasion to comment on motions to strike in R. v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd. (sub. nom. British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd.; Knight v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd.), 2011 SCC

42, 335 D.L.R. (4th) 513. Chief Justice McLachlin made, among others, the following comments:

> [17] ... A claim will only be struck if it is plain and obvious, assuming the facts pleaded to be true, that the pleading discloses no reasonable cause of action: Odhavji Estate v. Woodhouse, 2003 SCC 69, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 263, at para. 15, 233 D.L.R. (4th) 193; Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959, at p. 980, 74 D.L.R. (4th) 321. Another way of putting the test is that the claim has no reasonable prospect of success.
>
>
> [21] Valuable as it is, the motion to strike is a tool that must be used with care. The law is not static and unchanging ... Therefore, on a motion to strike, it is not determinative that the law has not yet recognized the particular claim. The court must rather ask whether, assuming the facts pleaded are true, there is a reasonable prospect that the claim will succeed. The approach must be generous and err on the side of permitting a novel but arguable claim to proceed to trial.
>
> [22] A motion to strike for failure to disclose a reasonable cause of action proceeds on the basis that the facts pleaded are true, unless they are manifestly incapable of being proven: Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, at p. 455, 18 D.L.R. (4th) 481. No evidence is admissible on such a motion: r. 19(27) of the Supreme Court Rules (now r. 9-5(2) of the Supreme Court Civil Rules).
>
> [25] ... The judge on a motion to strike asks if the claim has any reasonable prospect of success. In the world of abstract speculation, there is a mathematical chance that any number of things might happen. That is not what the test on a motion to strike seeks to determine. Rather, it operates on the assumption that the claim will proceed through the court system in the usual way — in an adversarial system where judges are under a duty to apply the law as set out in (and as it may develop from) statutes and precedent. The question is whether, considered in the context of the law and the litigation process, the claim has no reasonable chance of succeeding.

Again, of course, these comments were made in the context of a motion to strike a claim and must be adapted to the present situation where it is a pleaded defence and a proposed defence that are under consideration.

[21] With these principles in mind, I will now consider whether it is plain and obvious that the potential defences of abuse of process, waiver, lack of clean hands and ratification have no reasonable prospect of success on the basis of the pleaded facts in relation to the plan approval proceeding and the two prospectuses in question.

2012 BCCA 5 (CanLII)

(a) Abuse of Process

[22] The doctrine of abuse of process is a very broad and flexible mechanism to enable judges to prevent abuses of the court's process. In Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, 2003 SCC 63, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, at para. 35, the Supreme Court of Canada adopted descriptions of the concept of abuse of process as proceedings "unfair to the point that they are contrary to the interest of justice" and "oppressive treatment".

[23] The concept of abuse of process is used in a variety of contexts. For example, in Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, it was used to prevent an attempt to relitigate an issue which had already been adjudicated upon in circumstances where the requirements of the doctrine of issue estoppel had not been met. In the present case, the defendants say the doctrine of abuse of process should be used to prevent the plaintiffs from bringing a subsequent action based upon allegations that are inconsistent with allegations made in support of a previous action (being the plan approval proceeding).

[24] The defendants submit the chambers judge erred in focusing on the concept of an election between inconsistent rights rather than on the type of mischief prevented in the case of Vanmills Establishment v. Coles (1992), 8 C.P.C. (3d) 178 (B.C.S.C. Chambers). In that case, a former shareholder of a bankrupt company had sued the trustee in bankruptcy, alleging that his negligence and wrongdoing had caused loss to the former shareholder when he sold his legal and beneficial interest in his shares to Mr. Coles. The former shareholder then sued Mr. Coles alleging that he held the beneficial interest in the shares in trust for the former shareholder. In dismissing the second action, Mr. Justice Cohen said the following:

> [10] This is not a matter of a litigant pursuing inconsistent remedies, where no election is necessary until judgment. There can be no doubt that in the instant action Crux is attempting to pursue inconsistent rights. Crux elected in his action against Sigurdson to claim that he had disposed of his legal and beneficial interest in the C.I.S. shares to Coles. Having elected to sue Sigurdson on that basis, I find that Crux cannot now sue Coles in the instant action on the basis that he retained a beneficial interest in the C.I.S. shares. In my opinion, his election in his action against Sigurdson is binding upon him. The principle that, in the case of inconsistent rights, a plaintiff's > irrevocable and unequivocal election is deemed to be made by the commencement of an initial action is established in Scarf v. Jardine (1882), 7 App. Cas. 345, 30 W.R. 893 (H.L.) and Ashmore v. Bank of British North America (1913), 4 W.W.R. 1014, 18 B.C.R. 257, 13 D.L.R. 73 (C.A.).

[25] In Vanmills Establishment, Cohen J. made reference to an election having been made, and there is jurisprudence that supports the notion that the doctrine of election governs this type of situation: see, for example, Commonwealth Investors Syndicate Ltd. v. Laxton (1992), 15 B.C.A.C. 282, 68 B.C.L.R. (2d) 145, and Allnorth Consultants Limited v. Tercon Construction Ltd., 2010 BCCA 570, 79 B.L.R. (4th) 238, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused, [2011] S.C.C.A. No. 78. However, there is support for the defendants' position that this type of defence falls under the rubric of abuse of process. In Mystar Holdings Ltd. v. 247037 Alberta Ltd., 2009 ABQB 480, 10 Alta. L.R. (5th) 260, Mr. Justice Brooker considered the existence of inconsistent allegations within the context of the court's inherent jurisdiction to prevent abuses of the court's process. He expressed the principle in the following terms:

> [49] In general, I am persuaded that a party is not free to deliberately argue diametrically inconsistent facts in various actions, thus knowingly advancing irreconcilable positions which are not articulated as alternative claims.

[26] The flaw in the defendants' position is that there were no statements made in the plan approval proceeding that are inconsistent with the allegations in this action. There was simply no mention in the plan approval proceeding of the Bolaños property or a possible claim against the defendants. Silence does not equate to a representation or an allegation that First Silver did not have any interest in the Bolaños property or that First Silver did not have a cause of action against the defendants. None of the allegations made in this action is inconsistent with any statement in the materials filed in the plan approval proceeding.

[27] The defendants rely on the fact that First Silver provided to the firm which prepared the fairness opinion on the plan of arrangement a letter stating that there had been no irregularities involving First Silver, its directors or management. Mr. Davila Santos was no longer a director of First Silver at the time of the plan of arrangement, and this letter cannot reasonably be construed as a comment on the actions of past directors.

[28] The chambers judge commented that the "plan of arrangement and the lawsuit can quite easily stand together without clashing" (para. 37). So too can the materials filed in the plan approval proceeding and the allegations in this lawsuit quite easily stand together without clashing. This is not a situation of diametrically inconsistent facts or irreconcilable positions. In my view, the defence of abuse of process has no reasonable chance of succeeding in these circumstances, and it is plain and obvious that it is bound to fail.

(b) Waiver

[29] The defendants wish to rely on the defence of waiver in relation to both the plan of arrangement and the prospectuses.

[30] The availability of the defence of waiver was described by the Supreme Court of Canada in Saskatchewan River Bungalows Ltd. v. Maritime Life Assurance Co., [1994] 2 S.C.R. 490 at 500, 115 D.L.R. (4th) 478:

> Waiver will be found only where the evidence demonstrates that the party waiving had (1) a full knowledge of rights; and (2) an unequivocal and conscious intention to abandon them.

Mr. Justice Major, for the Court, also commented at 501 that, while hard and fast rules for what constitutes waiver should not be proposed, the "overriding consideration in each case is whether one party communicated a clear intention to waive a right to the other party".

[31] Here, there is no pleading that the plaintiffs communicated to the defendants an intention to waive their causes of action against the defendants. There cannot be waiver in the air.

[32] In addition, simple non-disclosure of potential causes of action in the prospectuses and the materials filed in the plan approval proceeding does not evince an unequivocal intention to abandon those causes of action. While the unequivocal intention to relinquish a right may be inferred from the conduct of a party, it cannot reasonably be inferred from silence, without something more. The defendants do not propose to plead anything more than simple non-disclosure.

[33] In my opinion, the facts pleaded in para. 41A of the statement of defence and proposed paras. 39A and 41.1 cannot give rise to a defence of waiver.

(c) Lack of Clean Hands

[34] The plaintiffs are seeking, among others, equitable remedies such as equitable tracing, constructive trust and disgorgement of profits. The defendants wish to plead that the plaintiffs are not entitled to equitable remedies on the basis that they lack clean hands.

[35] In dealing with this potential defence in connection with the non-disclosure in the prospectuses, the chambers judge referred at para. 26 to the following passage from I.C.F. Spry, The Principles of Equitable Remedies, 6th ed. (UK: Sweet & Maxwell, 2001) at 169-170, quoted with approval and applied by this Court in DeJesus v. Sharif, 2010 BCCA 121, 71 B.L.R. (4th) 159 at para. 86:

> ...it must be shown, in order to justify a refusal of relief, that there is such an "immediate and necessary relation" between the relief sought and the delinquent behaviour in question that it would be unjust to grant that particular relief. ... So it was once emphasised "that general fraudulent conduct signifies nothing; that general dishonesty of purpose signifies nothing; that attempts to overreach go for nothing; that an intention and design to deceive may go for nothing, unless all this dishonesty of purpose, all this fraud, all this intention and design, can be connected with the particular transaction, and not only connected with the particular transaction, but must be made to be the very ground upon which the transaction took place, and must have given rise to this contract".

[36] The chambers judge then reasoned that the defence of lack of clean hands with respect to the prospectuses was bound to fail:

> [27] Applying that analysis, the purchase of Mr. Davila's shares had no direct relationship to First Majestic's prospectuses. The plaintiffs do not have to rely on the prospectuses to found their claim. The fact that the plaintiffs may have issued shares in order to fund the transaction has no direct nexus with the transaction with Mr. Davila and does not affect him; in fact, the > prospectuses were issued after the share purchase transaction between him and First Majestic was concluded.

I agree with this reasoning. In addition, there is no direct relationship between the prospectuses and the Bolaños property.

[37] The chambers judge did not specifically deal with the potential defence of lack of clean hands in connection with the approval of the plan of arrangement, but the same reasoning applies. There is no direct relationship between any non-disclosure in the plan approval proceeding and the purchase of Mr. Davila Santos' shares or the Bolaños property.

[38] The defendants say there is an "immediate and necessary relation" between the approval of the plan of arrangement and the plaintiffs' pleading that First Majestic and First Silver should be regarded as "one business enterprise" so that any violations of fiduciary duties owed to First Silver are regarded as violations of fiduciary duties owed to First Majestic. The plaintiffs make this plea in an attempt to take advantage of the holding in Manley Inc. v. Fallis (1977), 2 B.L.R. 277, 38 C.P.R. (2d) 74 (Ont. C.A.), that a breach of duty owed to a subsidiary can lead to a finding of a breach in favour of its parent company.

[39] In my view, there is insufficient nexus between the approval of the plan of arrangement and this plea of the plaintiffs. While it is true that First Silver became a subsidiary of First Majestic as a result of the plan of arrangement, there is no direct relationship between the plan of arrangement and the allegation of breach of fiduciary duty. Although some of the activities of Mr. Davila Santos pre-date the plan of arrangement, the consummation of the alleged breach of fiduciary duty occurred when Minera Arroyo acquired the Bolaños property in August 2007, almost a year after the plan of arrangement was approved. Also, I am unable to see how improper non-disclosure in connection with First Silver becoming a wholly-owned subsidiary of First Majestic would have a bearing in deciding whether a breach of duty owed to First Silver should also be regarded as a breach in favour of First Majestic.

[40] In addition to the lack of sufficient nexus between the plea of lack of clean hands and the equitable remedies sought by the plaintiffs, there is no proposed plea demonstrating why the non-disclosure would constitute a lack of clean hands. For example, there is no proposed plea of a requirement on the plaintiffs to disclose what the defendants say should have been disclosed. Nor is there a proposed plea that the plan of arrangement would not have been approved or that the financings would not have been successful had the disclosure been made. By itself, non-disclosure does not equate to a lack of clean hands.

[41] In my view, the proposed plea of lack of clean hands to defeat the plaintiffs' requests for equitable relief has no reasonable prospect of success, and it is plain and obvious that the plea is bound to fail.

(d) Ratification

[42] The defendants argue that the plaintiffs effectively ratified the alleged wrongdoings of Mr. Davila Santos by failing to disclose the opportunity to purchase the Bolaños property in the plan approval proceeding and by providing the letter for the purpose of the fairness opinion that there had been no irregularities involving First Silver, its directors or management. The defendants cite no authority for this proposition and do not address the holding of the chambers judge that the concept of ratification only applies in the context of an agency relationship in situations where the principal ratifies actions of his or her agent. There is no allegation of agency in the pleadings.

[43] Outside the context of an agency relationship, the effect of an assertion that the plaintiffs ratified the alleged wrongdoings of Mr. Davila Santos is very similar, if not identical, to an assertion that the plaintiffs waived their rights with respect to those wrongdoings. To say that a person has ratified a wrongdoing seems equivalent to saying that the person has waived their rights with respect to the wrongdoing.

[44] When discussing the potential defence of waiver, I concluded that silence, without something more, does not evince an unequivocal intention to abandon causes of action. Similarly, mere silence does not amount to ratification. In an agency situation, silence is not ratification: see Community Savings Credit Union v. United Assoc. of Journeymen, Local 324, 2002 BCCA 214, 22 B.L.R. (3d) 313 at para. 36. The same principle would apply if a defence of ratification existed outside an agency relationship.

[45] Hence, it is my view that a defence of ratification, if known to law outside an agency relationship, has no reasonable prospect of success in these circumstances, and that it is plain and obvious that the proposed defence is bound to fail.

Conclusion

[46] It is for these reasons that I would dismiss the appeal.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice Bennett:

I. NATURE OF THE APPLICATION

[1] West Coast Women's Legal Education and Action Fund ("West Coast LEAF") applies for intervenor status in this appeal from Mr. Justice Bernard's August 24, 2011 order allowing Mr. Friedmann's petition for judicial review and remitting the matter to the Human Rights Tribunal for rehearing.

[2] Ms. MacGarvie consents to the relief sought. The British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal (the "Tribunal") is not participating in the application.

[3] Mr. Friedmann is self-represented on the appeal. I adjourned this application twice, giving Mr. Friedmann four weeks to retain counsel and file written material. He has been unable to do either. His unfocused oral submissions at the hearing of this application pertained only to the merits of the appeal proper. I informed him that it is in his best interests to retain counsel for the appeal. He expressed his intention to continue efforts to do so. It is clear that he opposes the application.

II. BACKGROUND FACTS

[4] Ms. MacGarvie was a student at all times material to her complaint. In February 2004, she became a tenant in an apartment building owned by Mr. Friedmann after signing a one-year lease. She moved out of the apartment on February 1, 2005. She testified at the Tribunal hearing to many episodes of inappropriate comments and behaviour Mr. Friedmann directed towards her throughout her tenancy. She also testified that Mr. Friedmann's inappropriate comments and behaviour continued after her tenancy and throughout the Tribunal proceedings, although his conduct during this time period is not material to this appeal.

[5] The comments that Ms. MacGarvie testified Mr. Friedmann made to her include remarks about her physical appearance, references to himself as a "sexy, 40's, hardworking man" searching for a wife, questions about her relationship status and sex life, and questions and complaints about her male friend visiting from Australia. Mr. Friedmann's inappropriate behaviour to which Ms. MacGarvie testified included pointedly pruning bushes outside her apartment window while shirtless, offering her numerous unwanted gifts, and, on one occasion, placing his hand on Ms. MacGarvie's buttocks while she sat on a bicycle.

[6] When Ms. MacGarvie rejected Mr. Friedmann's advances, and particularly after she gave him one month's notice of her intention to move out, she testified that he became more aggressive and verbally abusive toward her, causing her to ask friends to be present during planned apartment showings and other of Mr. Friedmann's visits of which she had advance notice. On one occasion, the police attended at Ms. MacGarvie's request when Mr. Friedmann refused to leave after entering her apartment uninvited and unannounced.

[7] The Tribunal heard from several witnesses who were Mr. Friedmann's current or former tenants. All of the witnesses' testimony tended to corroborate Ms. MacGarvie's evidence, through either accounts of their own unpleasant experiences with Mr. Friedmann or their descriptions of the same incidents to which Ms. MacGarvie testified.

[8] Mr. Friedmann attended the hearing but did not testify.

III. PROCEEDINGS BELOW AND ERRORS ALLEGED

A. The Tribunal (2009 BCHRT 47)

[9] The Tribunal member found that Ms. MacGarvie had not proven discrimination on the basis of sex but went on to consider sexual harassment as an independent basis for an award in the residential tenancy context. She drew upon the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Janzen v. Platy Enterprises Ltd., [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1252, which held that workplace sexual harassment constitutes sex discrimination. On the basis that Ms. MacGarvie had suffered sexual harassment, the Tribunal ordered, among other relief, a $10,000 monetary award for injury to dignity, feelings, and self-respect.

2012 BCCA 109 (CanLII)

B. BC Supreme Court (2011 BCSC 1147)

[10] The chambers judge identified the ground of appeal as a question of law alone and applied the standard of correctness. He noted that Mr. Friedmann did not challenge the Tribunal member's finding of sexual harassment or any other findings of fact.

[11] The chambers judge held that the Tribunal erred in its application of Janzen, namely by treating sexual harassment in the landlord-tenant context as a sufficient basis, on its own, for a monetary award based on sexual discrimination. The chambers judge also identified a question as to whether the general principle in Janzen is applicable to the residential tenancy context, finding it unnecessary to address this question and declining to do so.

IV. THE LAW

[12] In Gehring v. Chevron Canada Limited., 2007 BCCA 557 (Chambers), Rowles J.A. outlined this Court's general approach to intervenor applications:

> [6] In EGALE Canada Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 BCCA 396, 170 B.C.A.C. 2004, I gave a brief summary of the principles that are generally considered on an application for leave to intervene:
>
> >
> > [7] Generally speaking, before an applicant will be allowed to intervene, the court should consider whether the applicant has a direct interest in the litigation or whether the applicant can make a valuable contribution or bring a different perspective to a consideration of the issues that differs from those of the parties. When an application for intervention is made on a public law issue, the application may be allowed even though the applicant does not have a direct interest in the appeal.

[13] In Bazley v. Children's Foundation et al. (1996), 75 B.C.A.C. 177 (Chambers) at 180, Goldie J.A. enumerated the relevant criteria as follows:

> 1. the nature of the group seeking the intervener status;
> 2. the directness of the group's interest in the matter;
> 3. the suitability of the issue of the case at bar.

2012 BCCA 109 (CanLII)

2012 BCCA 109 (CanLII)

A. Nature of the applicant

[14] Although an applicant for intervenor status need not have a formal structure or form, it must have a broad representative base: Guadagni v. British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Board) (1988), 30 B.C.L.R. (2d) 259 (C.A. Chambers) at 262.

B. Directness of the applicant's interest in the matter

[15] An intervenor applicant's interest will be direct when "legal rights of the proposed intervenor will be affected or when any additional legal obligations would be imposed on the proposed intervenor resulting in a direct prejudicial effect": R. v. N.T.C. Smokehouse, [1991] B.C.J. No. 2082 (C.A. Chambers); Faculty Association of the University of British Columbia v. University of British Columbia, 2008 BCCA 376 (Chambers) at para. 7. A direct interest does not materialize from a mere precedential concern: North Pender Island Local Trust Committee v. Conconi, 2010 BCCA 405 (Chambers) at paras. 6-7.

[16] An intervenor application will not necessarily be defeated because the applicant has no direct interest in the outcome. In R. v. Watson, 2006 BCCA 234 (Chambers), Newbury J.A. stated at para. 3 (applied in Gehring at para. 7 and Kwicksutaineuk/Ah-Kwa-Mish First Nation v. British Columbia (Agriculture and Lands), 2011 BCCA 294 (Chambers) at para. 19):

> [3] … where the applicant does not have a "direct" interest in the litigation, the court must consider the nature of the issue before the court (particularly whether it is a 'public' law issue); whether the case has a dimension that legitimately engages the interests of the would-be intervenor; the representativeness of the applicant of a particular point of view or "perspective" that may be of assistance to the court; and whether that viewpoint will assist the court in the resolution of the issues or whether… the proposed intervenor is likely to "take the litigation away from those directly affected by it". …

C. Suitability of the issue in the case at bar

[17] This criterion involves consideration of whether the applicant will bring something new to the issues on appeal. In U.T.U., Locals 1778 & 1923 v. B.C. Rail

Ltd. (1990), 45 C.P.C. (2d) 33 (B.C.C.A. Chambers), Proudfoot J.A. stated at para. 6:

> [6] Intervener status may also be granted if there is no direct interest in the issues between the parties but the applicant has an interest in the "public law issues". The Court will then consider the issues in that particular case and will consider whether the intervener will bring a new or different perspective to the consideration of the issues, or will make a useful contribution towards resolving the issues, always bearing in mind that the intervention will not be permitted if it would result in injustice to the parties.

[18] Other justices of this Court have echoed this proposition in R. v. Kapp, 2005 BCCA 247 (Chambers) at para. 11, Gateway Casinos LP v. BCGEU, 2007 BCCA 48 (Chambers) at para. 8, and PHS Community Services Society v. Canada (Attorney General), 2008 BCCA 441 (Chambers) at para. 13.

[19] The potential concern at this stage is whether the proposed intervenor would change the issues or expand the scope of the litigation, thereby commandeering the proceedings and placing an undue burden on the parties to respond to arguments and issues immaterial to their private action: Ward v. Clark, 2001 BCCA 264 at paras. 6-11; applied in FortisBC Inc. v. Shaw Cablesystems Limited, 2010 BCCA 606 (Chambers) at para. 17. In Canadian Broadcasting Corporation v. Luo, 2008 BCCA 335 (Chambers) at para. 18, for example, Rowles J.A. noted in dismissing the application for intervenor status that the applicant wished to present arguments on the constitutional division of powers, whereas the appeal likely came down to an issue of statutory interpretation.

V. DISCUSSION

[20] Considerations under each of the three Bazley criteria overlap to some degree. I frame my analysis under the following five subheadings: the applicant, the applicant's interest in the appeal, the issue under appeal, the applicant's proposed contribution to the appeal, and factors weighing against granting intervenor status.

A. The applicant

[21] West Coast LEAF is a non-profit organization and registered charity dedicated to achieving women's equality through equality rights litigation, law reform and public legal education. As is clear from its stated mandate, West Coast LEAF is an organization with a broad representative base. Together with its national affiliate, it has intervened in numerous cases before this Court and the Supreme Court of Canada. I am satisfied that the considerations under the traditional "nature of the applicant" criterion support granting West Coast LEAF intervenor status in this appeal.

B. The applicant's interest in the appeal

[22] West Coast LEAF does not claim to have a direct interest in the outcome of this appeal. Rather, it submits that it has a substantial indirect interest in the outcome.

C. The issue under appeal

[23] Given that West Coast LEAF does not have a direct interest in the outcome of this appeal, it is necessary to examine whether the issue is of public interest and legitimately engages the applicant's interests.

[24] As counsel for the applicant has submitted, the issue under appeal concerns a question of law alone: whether the Tribunal member erred by misapplying Janzen in interpreting s. 10 of the Human Rights Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 210 [the Code]. Section 10 of the Code prohibits discrimination against prospective or current tenants on such bases as sex, sexual orientation, and marital or family status.

[25] I note that, at paras. 45-46 of her factum, Ms. MacGarvie cites Janzen and contends that the landlord-tenant relationship is similar to the employer-employee relationship in that both involve a power imbalance. At para. 25 of his reasons, the chambers judge stated:

> [25] This case also raises the interesting question of whether the general principle in Janzen is equally applicable to the landlord/tenant relationship in British Columbia; particularly in light of the wording of s. 10 of the Code. As it has been determined that the case must be remitted for rehearing on the principal ground raised by the petition, I am of the view that it is neither necessary nor appropriate to resolve this question within the context of this judicial review.

2012 BCCA 109 (CanLII)

In my view, in light of West Coast LEAF's stated mandate, both the narrow issue under appeal and the broader issue to which the chambers judge referred are of public interest and legitimately engage West Coast LEAF's interests.

D. The applicant's proposed contribution to the appeal

[26] West Coast LEAF's counsel submitted that, while Ms. MacGarvie is poised to argue the appeal within the context of her particular landlord-tenant experience, West Coast LEAF is in a position to assist this Court by providing a broader, systemic perspective of gender equality, sexual harassment, and the power dynamic of the landlord-tenant relationship, all of which intersect and permeate the legal issues underlying this appeal. She noted that her client has recently undertaken an analysis of the residential tenancy legislation in British Columbia to identify its actual and potential impacts upon female tenants. I am satisfied that the applicant's proposed contribution to the appeal would provide this Court with a new and useful perspective that is different from the parties' perspectives.

E. Factors weighing against granting intervenor status

[27] Under this heading, I consider whether the proposed intervention would take the litigation away from the parties or otherwise result in an injustice. In my view, neither deleterious result would ensue from granting West Coast LEAF intervenor status in this appeal. This application is distinguishable from those made in Ward v. Clark and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation v. Luo, cited above; West Coast LEAF is seeking not to raise new issues, but rather to provide insight and analysis on the particular questions of law the chambers judge and the parties to this litigation have identified.

[28] The role of an intervenor is not to support the position of one party or the other, but rather to make principled submissions on points of law pertinent to the appeal. Such submissions may well tend to support one party's position, but that is not their purpose. I am satisfied that West Coast LEAF understands this distinction and would conduct its intervention in this appeal accordingly. Thus, no injustice to either party would result from granting intervenor status to West Coast LEAF.

VI. DISPOSITION

[29] Although West Coast LEAF does not have a direct interest in the outcome of this litigation, other considerations relevant to the analysis favour granting it intervenor status in this appeal.

[30] The application is granted on the following terms:

a) West Coast LEAF is permitted to file a factum not exceeding 20 pages in length by March 19, 2012; and

b) West Coast LEAF will not seek costs.

[31] I defer to the division of the Court hearing this appeal whether and to what extent they wish to hear oral submissions from West Coast LEAF. I also defer the question of whether West Coast LEAF should pay the parties for additional costs or disbursements arising from its intervention.

[32] Each party will bear its own costs of this application.

2016 BCSC 1624 (CanLII)

Introduction

[1] This accident concerned a motor vehicle accident on January 3, 2012 where the plaintiff Diana Glover was a backseat passenger in the 1998 Subaru Legacy which she co-owned with the her husband, the defendant Kenneth Roger Leakey. Kenneth Leakey was the driver of the Subaru. The Subaru struck the back of a snowplow on Highway 97 near Bear Lake, B.C. The plaintiff suffered significant injuries in the accident.

[2] I heard this action with a jury from June 28 to July 15, 2016. Both liability and damages were in dispute. The parties requested that I instruct the jury on both liability and damages and direct them to make a decision on both issues, whether or not they found the defendant liable for the accident.

[3] The jury found that Mr. Leakey was not liable for the accident. They provided answers to the questions related to damages.

[4] The defendant applied for judgment immediately after the jury's verdict. I did not enter judgment.

[5] Three issues arise from the jury trial:

1. the plaintiff applies for a mistrial on the issue of liability;
2. the plaintiff alleges that the defendant engaged in an abuse of process;
3. the plaintiff seeks to set aside portions of the jury's verdict in respect of damages.

[6] For the reasons that follow, I declare a mistrial, grant judgment to the plaintiff on the issue of liability because the defendant engaged in an abuse of process and decline to set aside portions of the jury's verdict on damages.

2016 BCSC 1624 (CanLII)

Mistrial

Background

[7] As noted, Ms. Glover was a backseat passenger in the vehicle that her husband was driving on January 3, 2012. Penny Yeomans was also a passenger in the front seat of the defendant's vehicle at the time of the accident and she also suffered personal injuries. She commenced a separate action (the "Yeomans Action").

[8] In this trial, the defendant denied liability and challenged the damages sought by Ms. Glover.

[9] On July 4, 2016, while the jury trial was underway, the plaintiff brought an application to have the defendant's position on liability dismissed on the basis of an abuse of process. The application was brought under Rule 9–5(1)(d) of the Supreme Court Civil Rules which provides:

> (1) At any stage of a proceeding, the court may order to be struck out or amended the whole or any part of a pleading, petition or other document on the ground that
>
> (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, > and the court may pronounce judgment or order the proceeding to be stayed or dismissed and may order the costs of the application to be paid as special costs.

[10] The application was based upon an inconsistent pleading filed by Mr. Leakey in the Yeomans Action and that filed by him in this action. The plaintiff also sought special costs.

[11] The facts upon which the plaintiff relied in bringing her application were these:

> The Within Action
>
> 6. On December 11, 2013, Glover filed a notice of civil claim in the within action. Glover alleged that Leakey was solely at fault for the Accident. In Part 3, paragraph 1, Glover particularized the negligence of Leakey which caused the Accident.
> 7. On June 26, 2014, Leakey filed a response to civil claim. Paragraph 1 of division 2 of part 1 reads as follows:

> The Defendant denies the particulars of negligence as alleged in Part 3, paragraphs 1(a) to (j) of the Notice of Civil Claim.
>
> The "Liability Denial"

8. On May 14, 2015, Leakey filed an amended response to civil claim. The Liability Denial was not amended. Additional facts were added raising the defence of no negligence, inevitable accident, the "agony of the moment" and the "agony of the collision".

9. At no time has Leakey claimed that any other party may be responsible for the Accident.

10. A jury trial began on June 27, 2016 and is scheduled to conclude on July 15, 2016. To date, Leakey has maintained a denial of liability.

The Yeomans Action

11. On June 29, 2012, Yeomans filed a notice of civil claim commencing Action no. 947417 in the Supreme Court of British Columbia (Kamloops Registry) (the "Yeomans Action"). Yeomans named Glover, Leakey, Yellowhead Road & Bridge (Fort George) Ltd. and Raymond Warren as defendants. Paragraph 10 of the notice of civil claim reads as follows:

> The plaintiff was injured in a motor vehicle accident that occurred on or about January 3, 2012 on Highway 87 near Bear Lake, British Columbia and at that time, the plaintiff was a seat belted passenger in the Subaru when it rear ended the Western Star that was stopped on the highway.

12. On September 5, 2012, a response to civil claim was filed on behalf of Glover and Leakey. Paragraph 1 of division 2 of part 1 reads as follows:

> The accident particularized in paragraph 10 of the Notice of Civil Claim occurred as a result of the negligence of the Defendant, Kenneth Roger Leakey, while driving a motor vehicle owned by the Defendants, Glover and Leakey.
>
> [Underlining added by counsel for the plaintiff]

13. It is believed that the Yeomans Action has now been settled.

Discovery of the Inconsistent Pleadings

14. On June 28, 2016, counsel for the plaintiff discovered the admission of liability in the Yeomans Action. Counsel for the plaintiff contacted counsel for Leakey and requested that liability be admitted. To date, Leakey has maintained the denial of liability.

[12] The defendant opposed the plaintiff's application on various bases including that the application was brought too late; the plaintiff had not met the heavy onus on her to prove that there were inconsistent pleadings; that any alleged inconsistent pleadings did not lead to a finding of abuse of process; and, for reasons of public policy each claim by a plaintiff needs to be handled individually.

Hearing of July 8, 2016

[13] The application was heard on July 8, 2016. The defendant was represented by J. Derek James, rather than trial counsel, David Yerema.

[14] At the hearing, Michael Yawney, counsel for the plaintiff, suggested that because the jury trial was underway, the timing of the application was problematic. Mr. Yawney suggested that the decision on the abuse of process application wait until the jury had reached a verdict on liability, reasoning that if the Court found that there was an abuse of process the jury may perceive, having sat on the case for two weeks of evidence, declaring the defence of liability to be an abuse of process might harm their view of the integrity of the administration of justice. Mr. Yawney suggested that in the circumstances, I should defer judgment on the issue until the conclusion of the jury trial but before the final order for judgment is entered. Mr. Yawney acknowledged that that gave the Court time to consider the matter thoughtfully and let the jury finish their work. In that regard, Mr. Yawney said the jury did not have to see how the system had failed in some respects, and there would be no urgency in terms of the timeline for a decision.

[15] Mr. Yawney submitted that it was within the Court's discretion to fashion a remedy in the circumstances because it involved the integrity of the administration of justice. He referred to his suggestion to delay the decision on the application as a concession on the part of the plaintiff “recognizing the bigger picture”.

[16] At the end of the hearing I had a discussion with counsel about delaying the judgment and whether or not it may become moot if the jury decided that Mr. Leakey was liable. I asked Mr. James if he had anything that he wished to say, to which he responded:

> Well, there was one item, but I'm not sure that it's . . .
>
> Actually there's nothing. It just occurred to me though that the -- the issue of what to -- what is to be done if the remedy is to wait until the jury > decides, and I must admit I'm not entirely clear what my friend is proposing in that regard, so the jury would give its verdict, of course a verdict is not an order of the court, at that time defence counsel, who will be Mr. Yerema, will move the court for -- for an order for judgment on the jury's verdict, and I suppose, is it that stage that there would be a further consideration of this issue?

[17] I then stated: “Yes, the jury -- the judgment wouldn’t be entered”, to which Mr. James responded “Okay”.

> And having heard my friend's further submissions, I see the merit in his argument to let the jury do its job, let the jury reach its verdict, and then deal -- deal with the issue as far as the remedy is concerned. I see what he's saying.

[19] It was my understanding that Mr. James agreed to the process that Mr. Yawney suggested: proceed with the jury trial and await their verdict. The judgment would not be entered pending my decision on the abuse of process application.

[20] When the hearing concluded on July 8, I had the option of delivering a decision the following Monday, July 11 or accepting Mr. Yawney's proposal to postpone the decision on the abuse of process matter until after the jury had heard the evidence and reached its verdict on both liability and damages.

Continuation of Trial on July 11, 2016

[21] I chose the latter course, and on July 11, 2016 made the following statement to Mr. Irving, who was Mr. Yawney's co-counsel, and to Mr. Yerema who acted for the defendant in the jury trial but not in respect of the abuse of process matter. Mr. Yerema asked about the ruling of the court on the application, to which I responded:

> THE COURT: Yes, the application --
>
> MR. YEREMA: On the application.
>
> THE COURT: -- to find -- the application to find ICBC in having abuse of process. And I have -- have a seat, thank you. I've considered the -- the matter and I agree with both counsel, that it -- a more -- the most practical > course is to proceed and in the event that the jury -- well, when the jury comes in, if they make a finding of -- if there is no liability, that I postpone entering judgment until I make a decision. If they find that the defendant is liable, then we'll address it then and -- as it was suggested by counsel for the plaintiff and counsel for the defendant agreed to it. So I think that's the most practical course.

[22] Mr. Yerema did not object to the course that I proposed. The trial proceeded.

[23] The parties agreed that I would charge the jury on both liability and damages which I did on July 14, 2015.

Proceedings on July 15, 2016

[24] While the jury was deliberating, Mr. Yerema raised a concern about my postponing my judgment on the abuse of process application until after the verdict was rendered. He advised that Mr. James, counsel on the application, did not agree that judgment would not be entered on the jury's verdict until I ruled on the abuse of process application. Mr. James was not in the courtroom at that time. I explained my understanding to Mr. Yerema, that is, that if the jury found no liability that the judgment would not be entered pending my decision on abuse of process. I did not know what Mr. James' understanding was.

[25] On July 15, 2016, the jury reached its verdict after deliberating for approximately 9 1/2 hours.

[26] In respect of their verdict, the jury advised they were unanimous. In response to Question 1: "Was there any negligence on the part of the defendant that caused or contributed to the harm or damage suffered by the plaintiff?", the jury answered "No".

[27] The jury was asked to consider the remaining questions concerning the quantum of damages and did so.

[28] A signed copy of the jury foreperson's verdict sheet was entered as an exhibit. Mr. Yerema on behalf of the defendant asked to have the verdict entered as an order of the Court. I declined to make that order at the time because of my understanding of how the abuse of process application would be addressed. The plaintiff also asserted that there was no reasonable evidence to support the jury's verdict on liability and past wage loss.

Hearing of July 28, 2016

[29] On July 28, 2016, I heard Mr. Yawney and Mr. James on the procedure to be adopted in respect of reasons on the abuse of process application. Mr. James advised that he did not agree to postpone the delivery of reasons on the application on the condition that the jury verdict not be entered. Instead, he asserted that the plaintiff waived her claim for the relief involving striking of the paragraphs of the pleadings denying liability and was content to pursue her claim for relief in costs.

[30] Mr. James referred to various excerpts from the transcript of the proceedings of July 8, 2016 where he says that Mr. Yawney, on behalf of the plaintiff, referred to the plaintiff conceding to have the jury proceed to address liability and thus waived her remedy of striking the pleadings.

[31] Mr. James took the position that judgment ought to be entered as that was the agreement that was made by the parties.

[32] Mr. James says that Mr. Yerema did not agree to the approach that I outlined on July 11, 2016. Mr. Yerema did not argue the abuse of process issue and was not present during the hearing.

Decision

[33] At the conclusion of the July 28, 2016 hearing, it was clear to all that there had been a misunderstanding between counsel in respect of how the matter would proceed before the jury and whether the jury's verdict would be entered as a judgment of this court. I was clearly of the view that Mr. Yawney was not conceding the liability issue, but suggesting that the decision on abuse of process be postponed pending the jury's verdict. I also understood that if the jury found that there was no liability, judgment would not be entered pending my decision on abuse of process.

2016 BCSC 1624 (CanLII)

[34] Mr. James says he made no such agreement. His understanding of the agreement is not reflected in the transcripts of the proceedings, nor is it likely that it was what Mr. Yawney proposed. Would plaintiff's counsel bring the application and then abandon the relief of having the defendant's position on liability dismissed on the basis of an abuse of process and only proceed with costs? I think not.

[35] The matter proceeded as it did based on a misunderstanding. The plaintiff proceeded, I find, to her detriment, because of her reliance on an agreement between counsel, where none existed.

[36] The plaintiff proceeded with her case before the jury; she chose not to cross-examine Mr. Leakey about his inconsistent pleadings; she left the matter of liability with the jury. In all, I find that the misunderstanding between counsel caused both parties to proceed on a basis that was not clearly understood. Further, had I understood that Mr. James did not agree to Mr. Yawney's proposal to reserve the decision on the abuse of process matter, I would have provided a decision before the jury proceeded on July 11, 2016. It is regrettable that Mr. James did not express his position to the Court about the agreement between counsel before the trial concluded and the jury verdict was announced.

[37] A trial judge does not have jurisdiction and is functus officio to hear an application after a jury has rendered its verdict, except an application that goes to an issue of trial fairness.

[38] This was confirmed by the Court in Leslie v. Parmar, 2006 BCCA 256, where the appellant, the defendant in the personal injury action, sought a mistrial three months after the jury's verdict was rendered to set aside a jury verdict based on a witness who gave evidence and later advised counsel for the plaintiff that her evidence may not have been accurate. The witness was not recalled. The trial judge dealt with the matter in her charge to the jury. The verdict was not entered as a court order.

[39] On the application the trial judge concluded that the jury must have acted on evidence that was false and misleading, although she did not identify any such evidence. She determined the trial should continue without a jury for the assessment of damages.

[40] The Court of Appeal found that the trial judge had no jurisdiction to consider the plaintiff's application and ought to have dismissed it as unfounded in law. The Court considered that the judgment should have been entered pursuant to the jury's verdict and counsel could then consider whether they ought to appeal (at paras. 23 and 25).

[41] Leslie was considered in Oberreiter v. Akmali, 2009 BCCA 557, where the defendants sought to appeal a decision of the trial judge declaring a mistrial after the delivery of the verdict by a civil jury before the judgment in the action was entered.

[42] In that case, counsel for the plaintiff learned after the jury's verdict that an exhibit, a DVD compilation of surveillance evidence on the plaintiff, contained 10 additional minutes of footage that had not been shown to the jury during the trial but was with the jury during its deliberations.

[43] The trial judge did not enter the judgment and approximately one month later heard the plaintiff’s application for a mistrial. He declared a mistrial, relying on de Araujo v. Read, 2004 BCCA 267, where Mr. Justice Thackray observed at para. 68: “a new trial may be ordered where the trial irregularities may have influenced the verdict or award of the jury…” (at para 13).

[44] The Court of Appeal reviewed the jurisprudence relating to whether the trial judge had jurisdiction to rectify an irregularity in a jury trial before judgment was entered.

[45] At para. 10 of the decision the Court referred to the decision of R v. Burke, 2002 SCC 55, where the Court confirmed that the court maintains jurisdiction to declare a mistrial after the jury was discharged as part of its remedial jurisdiction, and delineated circumstances where that might occur including, a reasonable apprehension of bias: at paras. 70 to 74.

[46] After citing the authorities that confirmed that a trial judge has no jurisdiction to hear an application after the jury has rendered its verdict, including Leslie v. Parmar, the Court stated at paras. 23 and 24:

> [23] …In this case, the respondent's application for a mistrial was not based on an improper verdict but was made pursuant to the court's inherent jurisdiction to rectify an irregularity that went to the issue of trial fairness. This is an issue of law that is addressed pursuant to the court's remedial jurisdiction.
>
> [24] It is settled law that until a judgment or order has been entered, a trial judge continues to be seized of the matter before him or her. In Clayton v. British American Securities, [1935] 1 D.L.R. 432 at para. 83, [1934] 3 W.W.R. 257 (B.C.C.A.), the court noted that this was recognized as an "unquestioned practice" and "one of very long standing". Similarly in Burke, the court concluded that, as a principle of law, a trial judge retains the remedial jurisdiction to declare a mistrial on an issue that goes to trial fairness (in that case it was whether there existed a reasonable apprehension of bias) after a jury verdict has been rendered and the jury discharged.
> [Underlining added.]

[47] I have already determined that due to the misunderstanding between counsel and the court the plaintiff proceeded with the trial and, in so doing, compromised her position. In other words, she did not have a fair trial.

[48] It is obvious (based upon my decision on the abuse of process matter, below) that had I rendered a decision on the abuse of process before the trial proceeded and before the jury reached a verdict, the result in this case would have been different.

[49] The plaintiff asserts that I ought to declare a mistrial in respect of the liability portion of the verdict only. No authority was provided and I have not found any authority where a mistrial can be declared for only a portion of the jury's verdict.

[50] While the argument has a certain attraction because of the obvious judicial efficiency, I find it would be unfair and contrary to the principle in Oberreiter. If a mistrial is granted to remedy an issue of trial fairness that may have impacted the verdict, it is likely that the apparent unfairness tainted the entire proceeding. If not, it would be very challenging to sever a part that was not impacted by the irregularity. It is difficult to know to what extent the plaintiff's compromise impacted the entirety of the trial. While not directly the subject of the mistrial application, the defendant's position on liability and comments made to the jury minimizing the accident likely impacted the assessment of damages. There could also be a concern about litigating in slices. It would be an effective severing of issues in the trial that has already been conducted.

[51] A mistrial is appropriate where necessary to ensure that justice is done between the parties: see de Araujo v. Read. The plaintiff's application for a mistrial is allowed.

Abuse of Process

[52] I have already referred to the facts upon which the plaintiff asserts an abuse of process by the defendant. It is based on the inconsistent pleadings by the same defendant, Mr. Leakey in this action and the Yeomans Action. Ms. Glover and Ms. Yeomans were both passengers in the defendant's vehicle. Neither of them was contributorily negligent. They were in the exact same situation in relation to whether the defendant was negligent.

Legal Framework

[53] The court has inherent power to prevent its procedure from being used in a manner that brings the administration of justice into disrepute: Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, 2003 SCC 63 at para. 37. The doctrine of abuse of process is a broad and flexible mechanism; its purpose is to enable the court to prevent misuse of its own process: First Majestic Silver Corp. v. Davila Santos, 2012 BCCA 5 at para. 22.

[54] In Jensen v. Ross, 2014 BCCA 173, Mr. Justice Goepel referred to the following passage from Babavic v. Babowech (1993), 42 A.C.W.S. (3d) 447 (S.C.):

> [17] ... The principle of abuse of process is somewhat amorphous. The discretion afforded courts to dismiss actions on the ground of abuse of process extends to any circumstance in which the court process is used for an improper purpose. …
> [18] The categories of abuse of process are open. Abuse of process may be found where proceedings involve a deception on the court or constitute a mere sham; where the process of the court is not being fairly or honestly used, or is employed for some ulterior or improper purpose; proceedings which are without foundation or serve no useful purpose and multiple or successive proceedings which cause or are likely to cause vexation or oppression. ...

[55] Canadian courts have invoked the doctrine of abuse of process in circumstances where, while issue estoppel may not be made out, permitting the litigation to proceed would violate principles such as judicial economy, consistency, finality and the integrity of the administration of justice: Toronto (City) at para. 37.

[56] In First Majestic, Mr. Justice Tysoe considered whether the concept of abuse of process could extend to inconsistent factual positions rather than just an inconsistent election of rights. Tysoe J.A. concluded that the plaintiffs had not made inconsistent allegations in a previous action as the defendants argued. His reasons make reference to a number of cases supporting the proposition that inconsistent positions in prior proceedings can constitute an abuse of process. Mystar Holdings Ltd. v. 247037 Alberta Ltd., 2009 ABQB 480 was cited with approval.

[57] In Mystar, the applicants argued that the respondent had made an inconsistent claim and that their action should be dismissed as abuse of process. The relevant Alberta rule is nearly identical to the B.C. rule:

> 129(1) The court may at any stage of the proceedings order to be struck out or amended any pleading in the action, on the ground that ... (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, and may order the action to be stayed or dismissed or judgment to be entered accordingly.

[58] The alleged inconsistent claim in Mystar was that in a previous action against a different defendant, the respondent claimed they lost half interest in a particular property. Then in a later action the respondent claimed to have lost 100% interest in the same property. While considering the applicable principles, Mr. Justice Brooker held at para. 49:

> In general, I am persuaded that a party is not free to deliberately argue diametrically inconsistent facts in various actions, thus knowingly advancing irreconcilable positions which are not articulated as alternative claims.
> [Emphasis in original.]

[59] In the result, Brooker J. found that it was not plain and obvious that the action in that case was an abuse of process as he "[did] not read the current Amended Statement of Claim as asserting that [the respondent] never lost a 50% interest in the property" (at para. 71). The case is instructive as it recognizes that advancing irreconcilable positions in various actions is impermissible. This is adopted in First Majestic.

[60] The decision of Pepper's Produce Ltd. v. Medallion Realty Ltd., 2012 BCCA 247 is also informative. In that case the appellant, Pepper's Produce entered into a contract to buy a business that failed to complete. Two parties filed a small claims action against Pepper's Produce. The president of Pepper's Produce deposed that these individuals were not parties to a contract and they had never met. Pepper later brought its own action, stemming from the same transaction after the small claims action was dismissed and sought to add the individuals that they had denied knowing as parties to the new action.

[61] Madam Justice Levine upheld the decision of the chambers judge refusing to add those defendants. She held, in part relying on First Majestic:

> [28] … These positions are diametrically inconsistent within the same action, and the claims against Gao and Tan are diametrically inconsistent with the appellant's response to the Small Claims action. These proceedings cannot, as a matter of protecting the integrity of the court's process, stand together.

[62] Whether taking contrary positions on the same issues in separate proceedings, i.e. inconsistent pleadings, constitutes an abuse of process depends on the context and circumstances of each case: Mystar at para. 53; Stewart v. Clark, 2013 BCCA 359 at para. 51.

[63] In Halagan v. Reifel, 1997 CarswellBC 4040, Madam Justice Satanove considered an application to amend pleadings. She refused to do so and dismissed the application because the proposed amendments were inconsistent. She found they constituted approbation and reprobation. At para. 8 she stated:

> … [N]either pleadings nor any other of the court processes are a game to be played according to what appears to be a strategic advantage of the time. The court expects a party to take a position which is consistent with its evidence and to maintain that position in its dealings with the court. In other words, saying something to one judge and saying the opposite to another will not be countenanced.

[64] The test in the context of Rule 9–5(1)(d) is a high one: it must be plain and obvious that a pleading is an abuse of process.

Position of the Parties

Plaintiff

[65] The plaintiff submits that Mr. Leakey's position in the Glover and Yeomans actions are diametrically opposed. Liability was not pleaded in the alternative in either action. The defendant was aware of his role in the accident from the outset and cannot claim that his knowledge of the accident was somehow incomplete or imperfect. The plaintiff says that in allowing Mr. Leakey to maintain a denial of liability in the Glover action is an affront to the court's process and brings the administration of justice into disrepute; it is a clear abuse of process and ought to be struck, and seeks judgment in favour of the plaintiff on the issue of liability.

Defendant

[66] The defendant's position is that his differing positions on liability for the accident are not inconsistent pleadings, irreconcilable positions or an abuse of process. He claims it is permissible to have inconsistent defences to an action. Further, if inconsistent pleadings are found, the defendant argues that it is not an improper use of the court's process; the court must consider the context and circumstances of each case and the two actions must be treated individually. He says that it has been recognized that inconsistent pleadings are permissible in the context of an insurer-insuree relationship. The defendant submits that he did not knowingly advance irreconcilable positions which he submits is an essential element of an abuse of process. Prior admissions of liability should be dealt with as an admissibility issue. Finally, the defendant's position is that to find Mr. Leakey's denial of liability as an abuse of process would have an effect of discouraging admissions.

Decision

[67] In considering my analysis of this application, I must note that the Insurance Corporation of British Columbia (ICBC), the Province's public mandatory motor vehicle insurer had conduct of both the Glover and the Yeomans actions. The evidence provided is sparse, but it is clear that the adjuster in the Yeomans Action determined that liability would be admitted on behalf of Mr. Leakey whereas the adjuster in the Glover action determined that liability would be denied. I expressly find that ICBC knew of the inconsistent pleadings and that the insured, Kenneth Leakey knew or ought to have known of the inconsistent positions.

Whether the inconsistent positions are an abuse of process

[68] Courts retain jurisdiction to dismiss actions that are an abuse of process where the principles such as judicial economy, consistency, finality and the integrity of the administration of justice will be violated. This doctrine is flexible and the categories of abuse of process are open. In my view, the defendant's inconsistent positions on liability offend all these principles which are fundamental to our system of law.

[69] Before this action was filed the defendant admitted liability for the subject accident in the Yeomans Action. He obtained the benefit of settlement with that defendant. It cannot be open to him to re-litigate something that he already conceded in the Yeomans Action. That offends the principle of judicial economy, unnecessarily expending the resources of the justice system and in this particular instance it is more egregious as the case called upon the wisdom of the community in the form of jurors. It is also contrary to the principle of finality to permit something that has been admitted to be re-litigated.

[70] Consistency is also compromised. A position that Mr. Leakey is on one hand negligent but on the other not negligent cannot be anything but irreconcilable and inconsistent. The only distinction in the pleadings is that in the Yeomans Action the defendant asserted that Ms. Yeomans failed to properly adjust and securely fasten her seatbelt. That does not alter the bare fact of the defendant's negligence.

[71] It is not relevant that Ms. Glover was a co-owner of the vehicle. The defendant has not explained how that distinction makes a difference. The same conduct of the defendant was involved in both the Yeomans and the Glover actions. To take different positions is inconsistent and provides unpredictability in the law.

[72] I am also of the view that the administration of justice is compromised by the defendant's conflicting positions that it was his fault and then it was not his fault. Neither position was advanced in the alternative. As Levine J.A. stated in Pepper's Produce: "these proceedings cannot, as a matter of protecting the integrity of the court's process, stand together."

Whether the claim was brought too late

[73] The defendant claims that bringing this application in the middle of the trial of an action is too late. This is also a surprising position for the defendant to take. Clearly the defendant and his insurer were aware of the inconsistent pleadings; but that was not shared with the plaintiff or her counsel. Counsel for the plaintiff says that he discovered the pleading in the Yeomans Action after this jury trial was underway.

[74] Further, the defendant has not referred to any authorities to support its submission in this regard. I find the language in Rule 9–5 as a full answer to this point as it permits an application to be brought "at any stage of the proceeding."

Whether inconsistent defences are permissible

[75] The defendant also submits that the denial/acceptance of liability in the two actions should be characterized as inconsistent defences rather than inconsistent "positive averments". The defence argues that it is permissible to have inconsistent defences and they should be treated differently. In that regard the defendant relies on National Bank Financial Ltd. v. Potter, 2005 NSCA 139. In that case the appellant, Mahoney, appealed from an order of the Nova Scotia Supreme Court dismissing the application to strike portions of the defence of the respondent National Bank as inconsistent between the actions. National Bank had pleaded in one action that there was no stock manipulation scheme and in the other that there was a stock manipulation scheme. The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal upheld the dismissal and held that the relevant Rules of Court in Nova Scotia (excerpted below) applied because the pleadings were in separate actions. The rule relied on was Rule 14.11 which provides:

> Unless a party amends his pleading, he shall not in any pleading make any allegation of fact or raise any new ground or claim, inconsistent with a previous pleading of his.

[76] The Court of Appeal held that the pleadings were not inconsistent but rather alternative pleadings. It also considered that the reasoning of the chambers judge that whether or not there was a stock manipulation was not yet fully within the knowledge of the parties; it was a complex trial where that very issue remained to be determined. At that point in the proceedings, the Court found it would be unfair make a party choose between two sets of alleged circumstances that they did not yet have full knowledge of.

[77] I do not find the National Bank case to stand for the proposition that defences in various actions stemming from the same facts may be inconsistent and should be treated differently from positive averments. The Nova Scotia decision applies when there is an application to “strike portions of the defence”.

[78] In any event, the primary holding of National Bank was that Rule 14.11 had no application where the alleged inconsistent pleadings were in separate actions. The Court went on to hold that the pleading could not be said to be inconsistent but rather alternative pleading because the party did not yet have full knowledge of the facts. In British Columbia, the courts have clearly recognized that inconsistent pleadings in different actions can be an abuse of process (First Majestic). The court's interpretation of the Nova Scotia rule is unhelpful.

Whether the pleadings may be inconsistent where ICBC involved.

[79] The defendant claims that under the ICBC insurance scheme, courts have recognized that there will be inconsistent pleadings referring to the decision of Mara v. Blake (1996), 23 B.C.L.R. (3d) 225 (C.A.). In that case, there were four separate motor vehicle accidents involving the same plaintiff and four separate defendants. All four defendants were insured by ICBC and represented by the same counsel. Three of the defendants admitted liability but pleaded contributory negligence. The fourth defendant denied liability. The Court was asked to consider whether it was a conflict of interest for ICBC to have one counsel acting for all four defendants.

[80] I find this case to be distinguishable. In Mara there were multiple accidents with different facts in each. In this case, there is one vehicle and one accident. It would have been open to the different defendants in Mara to have divergent positions as they were based on different accidents. It is not analogous to this case where the defendant has taken two divergent positions on liability arising from the same accident. The Court of Appeal was not considering the issue of inconsistent pleadings but rather whether it was a conflict of interest for ICBC to have one counsel acting for all defendants.

Whether knowingly advancing an inconsistent position

[81] I have already noted, I find that ICBC knowingly advanced an inconsistent position and I accept that as the defendant's representative the diametrically opposed pleadings were knowingly advanced. They were not articulated as alternate claims.

[82] A pleading that is an abuse of process is not the same as the tort of abuse of process which requires “a wilful misuse or perversion of the court’s process for extraneous or ulterior purpose”: Border Enterprises Ltd. v. Beazer East Inc., 2002 BCCA 449 at para. 51. A pleading is distinct from an intentional tort.

Whether issue should be determined on the basis of admissibility

[83] The defendant claims that the courts in British Columbia have determined that situations such as the present must be addressed on the basis of whether the pleading is admissible in the subsequent action. While prior proceedings can be admissible in subsequent actions and there is a body of case law addressing that point, I find that the defendant has overlooked the point that the matter before me is not admissibility but rather whether inconsistent pleadings are an abuse of process.

[85] Neither of these decisions address abuse of process.

[86] In Caviglia the plaintiff's car slid and stalled with its fender extending into traffic. The defendant's vehicle struck the rear end of the plaintiff's vehicle as she attempted to drive around it but hit a patch of ice. A third party hit the two vehicles after the plaintiff, the defendant and the defendant's passenger had left the vehicle. The ensuing circumstances were described by Madam Justice Allan at para. 10:

> An unusual issue arises in this case. The writ was issued on July 18, 1989 and the statement of defence, in which Ceoalia Tenorio denied liability, was filed on December 19, 1989. In a separate action, commenced in the New Westminster Registry on September 21, 1990 [the Second Action], Marlene Tenorio, who was a passenger in Ceoalia Tenorio's vehicle, sued her sister Ceoalia for damages suffered as a result of this accident. Marlene Tenorio also sued Mr. Caviglia in the Second Action but discontinued her claims against him in February 1991.

[87] The relevant issue in that case was whether the admission of liability made in one action was admissible and, if so, whether it is conclusive of liability or evidence to be given weight in the circumstances. The Court concluded that the prior admission was not conclusive and should go to weight at para. 26:

> The plaintiff submits that Ms. Tenorio's admission of liability in the Second Action should be admitted as conclusive evidence of her liability in this case for the following reasons: the factual foundation, i.e., the circumstances of the accident are the same; the legal issue, i.e., the liability for the collision > between the Tenorio and Caviglia vehicles, is the same; the defences in both action are conducted by a common insurer.

[88] Caviglia possesses some factual similarities to the present case: the defendant admitted she was liable to her passenger but denied she was liable to the car she struck. Clearly, the passenger in the defendant's vehicle was not negligent and the actions of the defendant did not affect the passenger's right to claim fully for her injuries. Those circumstances are not the circumstances here. Similar circumstances would be if the defendant has had two passengers and admitted liability in respect of one passenger but not the other.

[89] Madam Justice Allan declined to view the admission is conclusive of liability and held that it goes to weight that should be determined in the particular circumstances of each case.

[90] That is the same analysis that I must undertake in these circumstances. Recalling the holding in Mystar and Stewart that whether inconsistent pleadings constitute an abuse of process depends on the context and circumstances of this case. That is to say an abuse of process will not always be made out when litigation positions are inconsistent.

[91] I do not find Theriault informative as it is an application to withdraw an admission of liability in a circumstance where new information came to light regarding liability.

[92] I note that the defendant says that if the pleadings are inconsistent, the defence asks for the admission in the Yeomans Action to be withdrawn and undertakes to do so. This is an empty suggestion. The Yeomans Action has been settled and no longer exists. Withdrawal of the admission in Yeomans Action has absolutely no practical effect and nor is it an answer to the allegation of abuse of process.

2016 BCSC 1624 (CanLII)

Whether contrary to public policy

[93] The defendant claims that to find these pleadings as inconsistent and an abuse of process will discourage admissions, contrary to public policy. I find that there is much larger public policy at stake. It is an abuse of process to allow a defendant to admit liability in respect of one passenger and deny liability in respect of the other where there are no facts to distinguish the two. Requiring a party, even ICBC, to file consistent pleadings is not onerous and, with respect, is a principled way to proceed. The pleading of inconsistent positions in this case cannot be condoned.

[94] I have declared a mistrial in this case. It may appear that my decision on the abuse of process application is moot. It is not for three reasons:

1. A declaration of mistrial means that the matter will proceed to a new trial.

2. I grant judgment on the liability issue in favour of the plaintiff.

3. The plaintiff seeks special costs related to the abuse of process and has asked for leave to provide further submissions in that regard.

[95] Both parties may seek to appear to address the issue of special costs based on my finding of an abuse of process.

Set aside the Jury Verdict

[96] Having declared a mistrial, I find that that the plaintiff's application to set aside the jury verdict on any basis is truly moot. I decline to rule on the plaintiff's application to set aside portions of the jury verdict.

Costs

[97] The parties have leave to address costs.

[1] D. SMITH J.A.: There are three applications to intervene in this appeal by the Province of British Columbia (the "Province") from the July 13, 2011 order of Madam Justice Wedge. Justice Wedge found that the appellant Province had not engaged in adequate consultation with the respondent Halalt First Nation in regard to a groundwater extraction project, and that its accommodation of the Halalt's interests did not fall within the range of reasonable alternatives. A related appeal from the same order has been brought by the District of North Cowichan (the "District"). On September 14, 2011, an order was made that the two appeals be heard together. The applicants, however, only seek intervenor status for the Province's appeal.

[2] The proceedings arose after the Province granted the District an environmental assessment certificate for a project involving the construction and operation of a well field to extract groundwater from the Chemainus Aquifer (the "Project"). The proposed well field is on fee simple land owned by the District adjacent to the Halalt Reserve (the "Reserve"). The aquifer extends beneath the Reserve and is connected to the Chemainus River, which flows through the Reserve.

[3] The three applicants for intervener status are:

i. the First Nations Summit (the "Summit");
ii. Chief Harvey Alphonse, aka Swalethull't'hw, and the Cowichan Tribes, (the "Cowichan"); and
iii. Ermineskin Cree Nation, Samson Cree Nation, Tsuu T'ina Nation, and Fort McMurray #468 First Nation (collectively the "Alberta Nations").

The test for granting intervention

[4] Section 10(2) of the Court of Appeal Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 77, provides that a justice may make an order granting leave to intervene as an order incidental to an appeal. Rule 36(1) of the Court of Appeal Rules provides that, "[a]ny person interested in an appeal may apply to a justice for leave to intervene on any terms and conditions that the justice may determine."

2012 BCCA 191 (CanLII)

[5] The granting of intervenor status is a discretionary order that is subject to the following principles:

a) the applicant must have a direct interest in the matter; or

b) the applicant must have a public interest in a public law issue in question, and

c) the applicant can make a valuable contribution or bring a different perspective to a consideration of the issues on appeal that differs from that advanced by the parties.

See EGALE Canada Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2002 BCCA 396 at para. 7.

[6] A direct interest in the proceeding requires that an applicant's own legal rights or legal obligations be affected by the proceedings: Guadagni v. British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Board) (1988), 30 B.C.L.R. (2d) 259 (Chambers) at para. 12. Typically, a direct interest requires more than a concern about how the precedential value of a decision might affect an applicant or bear upon an applicant's own circumstances or case: Susan Heyes Inc. v. South Coast B.C. Transportation Society, 2010 BCCA 113, at para. 12; Faculty Association of the University of British Columbia v. University of British Columbia, 2008 BCCA 376 at para. 9.

[7] Where applicants do not have a direct interest in the litigation, intervenor status may be granted where they represent a public interest on a public law issue and can make a valuable contribution or bring a unique perspective to the issues that is distinct from that of the parties. This requirement was canvassed by Madam Justice Rowles in Gehring v. Chevron Canada Ltd., 2007 BCCA 557, 75 B.C.L.R. (4th) 36 at para. 7, quoting from R. v. Watson, 2006 BCCA 234 at para. 3:

> [W]here the applicant does not have a 'direct' interest in the litigation, the court must consider the nature of the issue before the court (particularly whether it is a 'public' law issue); whether the case has a dimension that legitimately engages the interests of the would-be intervenor; the representativeness of the applicant of a particular point of view or 'perspective' that may be of assistance to the court; and whether that viewpoint will assist the court in the resolution of the issues or whether, as noted in Ward v. Clark [2001 BCCA 264] the proposed intervenor is likely to 'take the litigation away from those directly affected by it'.

2012 BCCA 191 (CanLII)

1. Application to intervene by the First Nations Summit

[8] The Summit is a group representing those First Nations in British Columbia who are participating in the British Columbia Treaty Commission process. Its mandate is to facilitate reconciliation by supporting and representing the interests of First Nations who are negotiating treaties and to address issues of common concern throughout the Province. It submits that through this mandate it represents a public interest on the pubic law issues engaged in these appeals and that its perspective and experience would be valuable in the resolution of those issues.

[9] The Summit seeks leave to intervene in order to make submissions on the relationship-building and reconciliation purposes of the duty to consult. It proposes to argue the duty to consult and accommodate must be shaped by the objective of reconciliation and the goal of achieving just settlements through treaty-making. It says the duty to consult is about more than merely preventing irreparable harm to Aboriginal rights and title or minimizing the effects of infringement. It says consultation must be aimed at finding interim solutions in order to achieve reconciliation. The Summit would propose a framework for assessing meaningful consultation and accommodation which is informed by an assessment of the strength of aboriginal title and rights claims. It says the duty to consult must include timely disclosure of all relevant documents, including a strength-of-claim assessment, and greater integration of First Nations into the environmental assessment process. It also submits that the duty to accommodate should require engagement by the Province in strategic level planning about land and resource use and the development of accommodation measures that directly address title and proprietary issues. This is all in the context of the consultation process for aboriginal claims to water rights and title identified at the treaty table.

[10] The Summit says its arguments would offer a broader perspective than that of the respondent, because the Halalt's submissions focus primarily on the narrow issue of whether the Crown acted honourably in this case. The Summit says its extensive experience in engaging the Crown on duty to consult issues, and with the relationship between First Nations and the Crown prior to the conclusion of treaties, would be valuable.

Position of the appellants Province and District

[11] The Province does not oppose the Summit being granted leave to intervene and file to a written factum, but does oppose the summit being permitted to make arguments which may expand the scope of the litigation between the parties. The District takes the same position. Specifically, they object to the Summit advancing arguments that may be aimed either directly or indirectly at the constitutional applicability or validity of the environmental assessment process. They also object to the Summit making submissions with regards to the 2005 New Relationship Agreement with the Province and to Summit making any submissions that merely support the position of the Halalt. They oppose the summit being permitted to make argument.

Discussion

[12] I agree, and this is by consent, that the Summit should be granted intervenor status. The Summit is an organization with a broad representative base and offers a unique perspective on the issues from the perspective of First Nations in British Columbia who are engaged in the B.C. Treaty process. The Summit agrees to confine its submissions to the scope of the duty to consult and accommodate. This may include the proper role of consultation and accommodation as interim measures within a broader treaty negotiation process where the management of water resources are incidental to claims of Aboriginal rights and/or title and consideration of how the strength of rights and title claims inform the scope of consultation and, where necessary, accommodation. It shall not include, and they agree that it shall not include, submissions that challenge, either directly or indirectly, the constitutional validity of the regulatory regime, the applicability of the 2005 New Relationship Agreement, or arguments directly on the strength of the Haltat's rights and title claims.

2012 BCCA 191 (CanLII)

2. Application to intervene by the Alberta Nations

[13] The four Alberta Nations apply collectively to intervene in the appeal in order to address the specific issue of the rights of First Nations communities to groundwater resources and the duty of provincial governments to consult in relation to those resources. Each of the four nations holds reserve lands in Alberta that were set aside by Canada pursuant to treaties. Each nation relies heavily (or exclusively) on groundwater resources beneath its reserve lands and asserts rights to the water resources beneath its reserve lands. Three of the four have filed actions seeking confirmation of their water rights or damages for failure to protect water resources.

[14] The Alberta Nations face significant issues of water shortages and the connection between on-reserve groundwater resources and the use of ground and surface water by other parties off-reserve. Those issues, they argue, are similar to the issues that arise for the Halalt regarding the connection between the on-reserve aquifer and the Chemainus River. The province of Alberta has not engaged in any discussions regarding the rights to water of the various First Nations and has taken the position that the province owns the surface and groundwater on the lands that it owns, and has sole jurisdiction over the use of the water resources in the province.

[15] The Alberta Nations submit that they have a direct interest in this appeal because they each assert water rights in relation to their reserve lands that are similar or identical to the rights asserted by the Halalt in this case. They also submit that they have a broad representative base, as indicated by the support in this application of the Assembly of First Nations, which views these appeals as cases of national importance to First Nations' water rights and the Crown's duty to consult and accommodate, and by the support of the Treaty 8 First Nations of Alberta.

[16] They say that their significant experience engaging with governments around the issue of water rights and supply, and with water management issues in the context of the acute water scarcity in Alberta, gives them a unique perspective on this case. They say that each of the nations has had extensive involvement in legal and regulatory proceedings around the issue of on-reserve water rights and the duty to consult. If leave to intervene is granted, they propose to make submissions regarding the application of existing jurisprudence to the issue of water rights on reserve lands and whether those rights have been extinguished. They also seek to make submissions regarding the scope of the duty to consult and, in particular, whether the Crown can refuse to consult on the issue of water rights and defend itself by pointing to consultation on other issues, such as fishing rights. Finally, they will submit that the duty to consult requires an assessment of the strength of the first nation's claim to water rights, particularly in relation to reserve lands.

Position of the appellant Province

[17] The Province opposes granting leave to intervene to the Alberta Nations. They say the Alberta Nations do not have a direct interest in the litigation and do not have a sufficiently broad base to qualify as public interest intervenors. They also say that there are significant differences between the interests of the Alberta Nations in the groundwater, under their reserves and the interest of the Halalt in its own groundwater as the reserves of the Alberta Nations were created by historical treaties, while the B.C. reserves were created though much different mechanisms. As such, they say the legal position of B.C. and Alberta bands in respect of water rights is significantly different. The Province says this eliminates any genuine interest the Alberta Nations can have in this appeal.

[18] The Province further submits that the arguments of the Alberta Nations would improperly expand the scope of the appeal. In particular, they point to submissions the Alberta Nations would make regarding the correctness of the chambers judge's findings that the Halalt has a strong prima facie title claim and an arguable case to a proprietary interest in the groundwater. The Province says it is not appealing those findings. It says the appeal is limited to the issue of whether the actions of the Province met the standard for deep consultation in this case and the appeal should not be allowed to stray into the merits of the Halalt's aboriginal rights and title claims.

2012 BCCA 191 (CanLII)

Discussion

[19] I am not persuaded the Alberta Nations have a direct interest in this appeal. However, while they may not have an extremely broad representative base, they do represent four bands in Alberta and have the support of the Assembly of First Nations and the Treaty 8 First Nations of Alberta. I am satisfied, in these circumstances, they meet the requirement for a public interest intervenor.

[20] I am also of the view that they can offer a distinct perspective on this appeal in light of their extensive experience in negotiating with governments around water rights issues. Even with the historical differences in how their reserves were created, I am satisfied they could provide some assistance to the Court in defining the scope of consultation in the circumstances of this case and, in particular, offer broad submissions on the strength of claim assessment during the consultation process. I agree, however, with the Province that they should not be permitted to make submissions on the merits of the Halalt's claims to aboriginal rights and title, including submissions in support of the findings of the chambers judge in regard to the prima facie strength of those claims. Again, those findings are not under appeal and therefore are not in issue.

[21] I would therefore grant leave to intervene to the Alberta Nations but limit their submissions to the issues of the nature and scope of consultation required where First Nations' water rights are at issue. They may not address the merits of Halalt's claim to water rights or any issues regarding the legal basis for First Nations' water rights, but may make submissions regarding the nature of the assessments which are required during the consultation process (i.e. strength-of-claim assessments).

3. Application to intervene by the Cowichan Tribes

[22] The Cowichan Tribes are an Indian band neighbouring the respondent Halalt. The Cowichan is the largest community in the Hul'qumi'num Treaty Group (the "HTG") of which the Halalt is also a member. The Cowichan asserts aboriginal rights in, and title to, the area in which the Project is proposed to operate. Its holds reserve lands on the Cowichan River and Cowichan Bay and its members obtain drinking water from wells which tap into aquifers of the Cowichan River watershed. That watershed is adjacent to the Chemainus watershed, where the Project that is at issue in these appeals is situated.

[23] The Cowichan elected to forgo involvement in these proceedings when it, along with other members of the HTG, authorized Halalt to bring this petition on its behalf. It is, however, engaged in similar proceedings by way of judicial review against the Province, in which it alleges a failure to consult and accommodate in relation to the Province's approvals of groundwater extraction from an aquifer connected to the Cowichan River, although apparently those proceedings have become stalled for a variety of reasons.

[24] The Cowichan submits that it has a direct interest in the appeal because it asserts claims to aboriginal rights and title over the same lands as the Halalt, based on a shared exclusive occupancy with the Halalt and others. It says the decision in this appeal will likely have a significant impact on its judicial review proceedings, and on the consultation and accommodation process that it is seeking in relation to the current environmental assessment of a proposed jet fuel delivery project. The Province has agreed to "deep" consultation with the Cowichan on that project and the decision in this appeal will provide guidance on the scope of the Province's duty to consult and accommodate in that case. Finally, the Cowichan expressly relies on the lower court decision in this case in its ongoing consultation with the Provincial Ministry of Transportation and Infrastructure regarding a proposed long-term lease of riverbed lands for which the Cowichan has advanced an aboriginal title claim.

[25] If the Cowichan is granted leave to intervene it would submit that the strength-of-claim assessment required by the duty to consult must include consideration of which present-day aboriginal community is likely the proper rights holder. It says if that issue had been considered in this case, the Province would not have erred in concluding that the Halalt's aboriginal title claim to the well sites was weak. It submits that the Province should have recognised that the HTG member communities as a group are the likely proper rights holders of a strong claim to aboriginal title. The Cowichan would also make arguments regarding the form of financial compensation the Crown ought to make available during the consultation and accommodation process. Finally, it would make submissions regarding the requirements of the duty to consult and accommodate in circumstances where aboriginal rights claims may be uncertain at law.

[26] The Cowichan says it offers a useful perspective to the Court because it is the largest community in the HTG area and is engaged in various consultations with the Province in the area. It says its submissions will supplement those provided by the respondent Halalt and will offer a different perspective.

Position of the appellant Province

[27] The Province says the Cowichan should not be granted leave to intervene because it does not have a direct interest in the discrete issues raised in the appeal regarding the adequacy of the consultation process with the Halalt prior to granting an environmental assessment certificate. It says the Cowichan's arguments are duplicative of the arguments that will, or could, be made by the Halalt. It says the Cowichan's claims to aboriginal rights and title in the affected area, and the precedential value or impact of the decision in this appeal on its litigation, do not give it a direct interest in the appeal.

[28] The Province also submits that the Cowichan does not meet the criteria for a public interest intervenor. It says the Cowichan does not have a broad representative base and does not bring a distinctive perspective. Further, it says certain of the proposed submissions of the Cowichan would expand the scope of the litigation, which is limited to the specific issue of whether the Province met its duty to consult with Halalt. In particular, it points to the Cowichan's submission regarding monetary compensation as a form of accommodation, which it says was discussed by the chambers judge in obiter only in light of her decision that there was not adequate consultation, and in any event, is not challenged on appeal.

2012 BCCA 191 (CanLII)

Discussion

[29] The arguments of the Province that the Cowichan does not have a direct interest in the litigation and does not have a sufficiently broad base to be properly considered as a public interest intervenor are persuasive. More importantly, many of the submissions it wishes to make do not bring any unique perspective to the appeal and are merely duplicative of those that could and will undoubtedly be made by the Halalt. This is reflective of the fact that the Cowichan is in an almost identical position to the Halalt in regard to the issues it wishes to have addressed in its litigation.

[30] The Province correctly points out that the submissions by the Cowichan in regard to a monetary award as a form of accommodation would expand the scope of the litigation. The only other submission which the Cowichan proposes would provide a distinctive perspective is its argument that a strength-of-claim assessment should include an opinion as to who the likely proper rights holder is. This issue is being proposed for the first time on appeal and, in any event, could be advanced by Halalt if it so wishes. I would not accede to the Cowichan's application.

Conclusion

[31] In the result, the Summit and the Alberta Nations shall be granted intervenor status. The hearing of the appeals is scheduled for three days from May 23-25, 2012. There shall be an order extending the time for the filing of their factums to May 4, 2012. The length of the factums shall be no more than 15 pages.

[32] The applicants also seek to make oral arguments at the hearing of the appeals. The Halalt has stated that it does not oppose the intervenors' application in that regard and is prepared to accede to them part of its allotted time to permit them to make oral submissions. It seems to me that the Halalt's concession on this aspect of the intervenors' applications goes some distance to alleviating any concerns the Court might have, however, this is an issue that in my view must be left to the division hearing the appeals to decide.

(discussions with counsel re. reply dates)

[33] D. SMITH J.A.: There shall be a further order that any reply by the Province to the intervenors' factums shall be filed no later than May 16, 2012.

2000 BCCA 672 (CanLII)

[1] LAMBERT, J.A.: This is an application to review a decision of a single judge of the court sitting in chambers. The decision was a decision of Madam Justice Southin made on 25 August 2000.

[2] The issue that was before Madam Justice Southin was whether to reinstate an appeal under the powers of a single judge under ss. 25(2) of the Court of Appeal Act. The application was brought in the last few days of the six month period that follows the initial one year period and, if those few days had expired, the appeal would have stood dismissed and could only have been revitalized by an order of the chambers judge.

[3] I have no doubt that the proper principles to apply in reactivating an appeal under ss. 25(2) are not the same as the proper principles to apply in bringing an appeal that has been dismissed back into existence under ss. 25(5). In this case, in spite of the lateness of the application, the principles applicable are those that relate to s. 25(2) of the Act.

[4] Madam Justice Southin described the action, which was an application for an order that a Community Plan Amendment Bylaw of Coquitlam be set aside for illegality, and that a zoning bylaw related to it also be set aside for illegality. The applications were based on what was said to be an invalid public hearing because of failure to disclose material and to give proper notice and, consequently, an invalid rezoning because there had been no valid public hearing. All the matters relate to a change in zoning which, if it had been effective, would have permitted the building of some form of community housing on the site in question.

[5] Madam Justice Southin then set out the provisions of s. 25 and she set out a number of cases, some decided by a division of the court and some decided by single chambers judges. Madam Justice Southin referred to the fundamental legal principle which urges that a finish be brought to litigation; then Madam Justice Southin set out the relationship between this action and the action which I will call the "Loewen" action; and finally, Madam Justice Southin referred to the balancing of the interests of justice, including both the interests of justice as they affect the respective parties to the litigation, but also the broader interests of the public generally in the administration of justice which may also be a relevant concern in assessing the interests of justice.

[6] The test that ought to be applied by a reviewing court on an application to review an order of a chambers judge is set out in the reasons of Chief Justice McEachern in Frew v. Roberts (1990), 29 B.C.L.R. (3d) 34 (B.C.C.A.). At p. 36, Chief Justice McEachern, in a majority judgment, said this:

> In my view, the determination whether an appeal should be dismissed in such circumstances is not truly a matter of discretion. It was a matter of judgment to be applied to the circumstance of the case. The learned Chambers Judge who heard the matter, in his judgment, thought that the appeal should be dismissed and that is the order he made.
>
> It is my view that we should not interfere with that decision unless we are satisfied that the Chambers Judge was wrong in the legal sense and not merely that he exercised a discretion incorrectly. I am not persuaded that he erred in his disposition of the matter. ...
> (my emphasis)

[7] It comes to this: that the review hearing is not a hearing of the original application as if it were a new application brought to a division of the court rather than to a chambers judge, but is instead a review of what the chambers judge did against the test encompassed by asking: was the chambers judge wrong in law, or wrong in principle, or did the chambers judge misconceive the facts. If the chambers judge did not commit any of those errors, then the division of the court in review should not change the order of the chambers judge.

2000 BCCA 672 (CanLII)

[8] I now turn to the principles that the chambers judge was required to apply. It is not necessary for me to repeat the cases that the chambers judge referred to though I think that perhaps I could mention two decisions of a division of the court: Stasiuk v. Szabo (1997), 29 B.C.L.R. (3d) 49 and Boaler v. Brar (1997), 9 C.P.C. (4th) 48. Perhaps most important are the decisions of single judges in chambers in Galiano Conservancy Assn. v. British Columbia (Ministry of Transportation & Highways) (1997), 40 B.C.L.R. (3d) 171 and Rowan v. Dunwoody & Co. (c.o.b. "BDO Dunwoody"), [1999] B.C.J. No. 2856 (Q.L.). In the Rowan case, Chief Justice McEachern said this in relation to the scope of the consideration by a chambers judge asked to reactivate an appeal, at para. 19:

> I am not satisfied that it is wise to attempt to establish a test in this or any one case that would apply fairly in all subsequent cases. It seems to me, however, that a timely intention to appeal is important. After that, the three-part test in Frew v. Roberts should be considered. But after considering those matters, I think it is necessary to go beyond the answers reached on that test, and decide whether, considering the merits of the case and all other relevant matters, it is in the interests of justice that the appeal be reinstated or left dismissed. The onus on all these matters, of course, rests upon the applicant.
> (my emphasis)

Again, in para. 20, Chief Justice McEachern concluded that paragraph by saying this:

2000 BCCA 672 (CanLII)

> ... Adopting the fifth rule in Davies v. C.I.B.C., I prefer to leave the assessment of the merits to the good judgment of the Chambers judges who will consider all these matters in light of the particular circumstances of each case.
>
> (my emphasis)

[9] The fifth rule, of course, in Davies v. C.I.B.C. (1987), 15 B.C.L.R. (2d) 256 is that in deciding whether to extend time to someone who files a notice of appeal late, the overriding rule, called the fifth rule, is that there must be a balancing of the interests of justice as they affect both parties and in reaching a decision the interests of justice will prevail. The first four rules cannot be used to defeat the interests of justice but are themselves guides to the application of the interests of justice.

[10] Now that is the principle that was applied in this case by Madam Justice Southin, as I read her reasons. In the end, Madam Justice Southin specifically discusses the interests of justice and mentions that the motives lying behind this appeal are to seek a declaration by this Court that the actions of the City of Coquitlam and the Greater Vancouver Regional District were not in accordance with law. It is, presumably, hoped by the petitioners that after such a declaration the defendants would not make the same mistake, assuming it is a mistake, again.

[11] The housing building has now been built and it is not going to be torn down under any circumstance. The most, then, that could come out of saying that the rezoning was invalid would be that the zoning would revert to what it was before and this housing would be a non-conforming use. But Mr. Howarth very fairly said that the purpose of this appeal is not to create a non-conforming use but to have a declaration by this court that the breaches that are alleged of proper practice and procedure under the Municipal Act occurred. In my opinion, that is really asking this court to give legal advice on a moot question.

[12] There are some situations discussed in the Borowski decision of the Supreme Court of Canada [1989], 1 S.C.R. 342 which indicate that it will in rare circumstances be possible and proper to consider questions which are in the particular case academic but which may have a wide-reaching effect. In my opinion, having regard to the nature of the issue in this case and the fact that it is being exposed in other similar cases, the Borowski exception is inapplicable. In my opinion, no error of principle or of law, and no misunderstanding of the facts has been demonstrated on the part of the chambers judge. In those circumstances, it would not be proper to reconsider the matter afresh with the possibility of substituting our view for the view of the chambers judge.

[13] Accordingly, I would dismiss this application for review.

[14] DONALD, J.A.: I agree.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice MacKenzie:

Introduction

[1] In 2006, two brothers, Greg and Robert Neeld, incorporated two related companies to carry out hydroelectric energy projects: Hawkeye Power Corporation ("Power") and Hawkeye Energy Corporation ("Energy"). Power and Energy entered into an asset purchase agreement (the "APA") which governs the ownership of 36 water licence and land tenure applications (the "River Applications"). Under the APA, Power agreed to transfer beneficial and legal ownership of the River Applications to Energy in exchange for shares in Energy and certain payments and reimbursements. The APA contained an expiry clause which allowed Power to regain ownership of the River Applications if Energy did not fulfill certain obligations.

[2] The dispute is between Power and Energy's creditor, Sigma Engineering Ltd. ("Sigma"). Energy was placed into receivership on September 1, 2009, and the receiver attempted to sell the River Applications to Sigma. Power opposed the sale on the grounds that it was the legal and beneficial owner of the River Applications by operation of the expiry clause in the APA. On May 31, 2010, the Supreme Court approved the sale of the River Applications by Energy's receiver to Sigma, subject to Power's claim of ownership interest in the River Applications (2010 BCSC 1977). Power's ownership claim was tried in the Supreme Court in July 2011.

[3] In careful and thorough reasons indexed as 2011 BCSC 1578, the trial judge held Power and Energy had, by their conduct, modified the terms of the APA. As a result of this modification, the judge interpreted the APA's expiry clause to impose an additional obligation on Power in order to give effect to the expiry clause and regain ownership of the River Applications. As Power did not fulfill this additional obligation when the APA expired, the expiry clause failed to operate so as to transfer the River Applications to Power. Notably, the question of contract modification and this interpretation of the expiry clause were neither pleaded nor argued by the parties at trial.

[4] The judge concluded Energy is the legal and beneficial owner of the River Applications and dismissed Power's claim for a declaration of ownership in the River Applications. She also dismissed Sigma's counterclaim that the APA was a fraudulent conveyance or fraudulent preference.

[5] Power appeals from the order on the basis the trial judge erred in finding Power and Energy had modified the APA so as to impose an extra obligation on Power under the expiry clause and the trial judge erred in finding the modification of the APA binding on Power and Energy, despite a lack of consideration.

[6] Alternatively, Power submits the trial judge erred in basing her decision on an analysis that was neither pleaded nor argued by the parties. Power submits the outcome was therefore unfair.

[7] Sigma cross appeals on the ground that if Power's appeal is allowed, this Court must consider Sigma's cross appeal that the conveyance was fraudulent.

[8] For the reasons that follow, I conclude the trial judge made a procedural error in resolving this case based on an interpretation of the expiry clause that was neither pleaded nor argued by the parties. Neither party had the opportunity, in its pleadings or in submissions, to address the basis for the judge's decision. This resulted in prejudice to Power and constitutes reversible error. In light of this conclusion, it is unnecessary to address the other two grounds of appeal. It is also unnecessary to address Sigma's cross appeal that the APA was a fraudulent conveyance or preference.

[9] Accordingly, I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the trial judge and order a new trial.

Background

[10] The facts are set out comprehensively in the reasons of the trial judge so I will only summarize them here.

2012 BCCA 414 (CanLII)

[11] Two brothers, Greg and Robert Neeld, had a history of working together in the mining industry. In an effort to venture into the development of hydroelectric power claims, the brothers incorporated two companies: the appellant Power, and its associated company, Energy. The principal and directing mind of both companies is Greg Neeld, assisted by Robert Neeld.

[12] Using the business framework from their mining experience, the brothers decided to use Power as the "prospect generator" to obtain the River Applications. Energy would act as the "operating company" and raise five million dollars in financing to develop the claims, obtain ownership of the River Applications upon making certain payments to Power, and eventually become a public company. To this end, Power and Energy entered into the APA, which governs the ownership of the River Applications.

[13] Power and Energy retained Sigma for advice and engineering services. Sigma investigated and filed a total of 36 River Applications for the Neeld brothers, all of which were filed in Energy's name.

The Asset Purchase Agreement

[14] Power and Energy entered into the APA in July 2007 as Vendor and Purchaser respectively in order to transfer the beneficial ownership of the River Applications from Power to Energy.

[15] At that time, the River Applications were registered under Energy's name in order to maintain the highest priority position in the River Applications. Although Energy was always the legal owner of the River Applications, the trial judge found that Power retained beneficial ownership of the River Applications and both Power and Energy expected the future ownership of the River Applications to be governed by the terms of the APA.

[16] The APA contemplated two sets of purchases and three potential closing dates. On the First Closing Date, July 25, 2007, the beneficial ownership of three of the River Applications was to be conveyed from Power to Energy in exchange for 7,900,000 of Energy's shares. The Second Closing Date was to be the 60th day after Power notified Energy of Power's ability to convey the remaining River Applications to Energy. If by that date Energy had financed at least $5 million, it would pay Power $895,000 plus an amount equal to the Integrated Land Management Bureau ("ILMB") costs incurred by Power, in exchange for beneficial and legal title to the remaining River Applications. If Energy had not obtained an investment of at least $5 million by this date, it would issue two promissory notes, one in the amount of $895,000 and a separate one in an amount equal to the ILMB Costs incurred by Power, in exchange for beneficial and legal title of the remaining River Applications. These promissory notes were to be payable on or before the Third Closing Date, being the 15th business day after the day on which Energy completed the $5 million minimum financing.

[17] Clause 4.6 (the "Termination Clause") provided that if Energy did not pay $895,000 plus the ILMB Costs within twelve months after the Second Closing, Power, upon notice to Energy, would have the right to terminate the APA, with the option of returning Energy's shares and promissory notes in exchange for the original three River Applications.

[18] Clause 4.7 (the "Expiry Clause") specified that if the Third Closing did not occur by the Expiry Date of July 1, 2009, then Energy would be deemed to have quitclaimed all the River Applications to Power in exchange for the surrender of the 7,900,000 Energy shares and the promissory notes.

[19] The Termination Clause and the Expiry Clause are as follows:

> 4.6 Failure of Purchaser to Pay Additional Projects Purchase Price If the Purchaser [Energy] does not pay the Additional Projects Purchase Price payable for the Additional Projects and related Assets within 12 months next following the Second Closing, the Vendor [Power] will thereafter (until the earlier of the Expiry Date and that date, if any, on which the Purchaser gives written notice to the Vendor to the effect that the Purchaser has received the Minimum Financing and has deposited into trust with its solicitors an amount sufficient to pay the Additional Projects Purchase Price together with irrevocable instructions to pay the Additional Projects Purchase Price to the Vendor in satisfaction of the Purchaser's Third Closing obligations) have, in addition to all other rights and remedies available to it at law and in equity:

(a) the exclusive right and option, exercisable by notice in writing to the Purchaser, to terminate this Agreement in respect of the Additional Projects and related Assets, in which event neither party will have any further obligation to the other in respect of the Additional Projects and related Assets; and

(b) the additional exclusive right and option, in addition to and separate from the option provided for in clause 4.6(a), and exercisable by notice in writing to the Purchaser, to transfer and surrender the Vendor's 7,900,000 Purchaser Shares to the Purchaser in exchange for the Original Projects and related Assets; and upon the exercise of such option, beneficial title (and legal title, if applicable) to the Original Projects and related Assets will be and be deemed for all purposes to be transferred to the Vendor without the need for any further action or documentation, and neither party will have any further obligation to the other hereunder except an obligation on the part of the Purchaser to transfer registered title to the Original Projects and related Assets to the Vendor, if required to vest good and marketable title in the Vendor.

4.7 Expiry Date Notwithstanding any other provision of this Agreement, if the Third Closing does not occur before the Expiry Date, then in the absence of a written agreement to extend the time for performance of this Agreement executed and delivered by both parties hereto, the Purchaser will be and be deemed for all purposes to have quitclaimed and surrendered the Original Projects and the Additional Projects and all related Assets to the Vendor in exchange for the transfer and surrender by the Vendor of its 7,900,000 Purchaser Shares and the promissory notes described in section 4.2 of this Agreement to the Purchaser, without the need for any further action, and neither party will have any further obligation to the other hereunder.

The Conduct of the Parties to the APA

[20] On July 25, 2007, Power and Energy completed the First Closing under the APA. Energy issued 7,900,000 shares to Power and Power conveyed beneficial and legal ownership of the first three River Applications to Energy.

[21] Energy also made payments to Power for the ILMB Costs, totalling approximately $705,000, despite the fact the repayment of the ILMB Costs was not due until the Second Closing under the APA.

[22] In July 2008, Power gave notice to Energy of its ability to convey the remaining River Applications to Energy. Under the APA, the Second Closing was to occur 60 days after this notice. Energy did not raise the minimum financing required by the Second Closing Date and did not provide any promissory notes to Power. Despite this omission, the trial judge found that the Second Closing had occurred, as the parties' conduct indicated they considered the Second Closing to be completed. As a result of the Second Closing, Energy obtained both beneficial and legal title to the remaining River Applications. Thus, by September 2008, Energy was the beneficial and legal owner of all the River Applications and Power no longer had any property interest in the River Applications. However, Power maintained a contractual right to regain ownership of the River Applications if certain requirements were fulfilled.

[23] The Third Closing was to occur on the 15th business day after Energy raised the $5 million minimum financing. It required Energy to pay Power $895,000 and the amount of the ILMB Costs before the automatic expiry of the APA on July 1, 2009. Although Energy paid the ILMB Costs before the Second Closing Date, it never raised the minimum financing required for the Third Closing, nor did it pay $895,000 to Power before July 1, 2009. Thus, the Third Closing did not occur.

[24] Under the APA's Termination Clause, Power had the right to terminate the APA before the Expiry Date and regain ownership of the first three River Applications if Energy did not pay $895,000 plus the ILMB Costs within 12 months of the Second Closing. Pursuant to this clause, Power sent Energy a notice of termination dated August 21, 2009, and delivered August 25, 2009. However, the trial judge found the notice of termination ineffective, as Power sent it after the APA Expiry Date of July 1, 2009.

[25] Pursuant to the APA's Expiry Clause, Power had the right to regain ownership of all the River Applications after July 1, 2009, in exchange for the transfer of the 7,900,000 shares and the promissory notes to Energy. Power returned the Energy shares with the notice of termination on August 25, 2009. As they had not been issued, Power did not return any promissory notes, nor did Power return any other payments made by Energy.

The Dispute Between Power and Sigma

[26] In 2008 and 2009, Power and Energy fell behind in paying for Sigma's engineering services. Sigma settled its debt claim against Power, but Energy's financial problems led Sigma to give notice to Energy in April 2009 of its intention to have Energy placed into receivership.

[27] Energy went into receivership in September 2009. The Receiver offered the River Applications for sale and Sigma made the favoured bid. The Receiver applied for court approval of the sale of the River Applications and Power opposed the application on the ground that by operation of the APA it was the legal and beneficial owner of the River Applications. The British Columbia Supreme Court approved the sale, subject to Power's claim to an ownership interest in the River Applications.

[28] Power's claim for a declaration that the River Applications are the legal and beneficial property of Power and for an order that the Receiver, Energy and Sigma transfer the River Applications to Power, was tried and dismissed in the Supreme Court.

The Parties' Positions at Trial

[29] At trial, Power's position was the APA is a valid and enforceable contract that governs the ownership of the River Applications. Power maintained that the written terms continued to apply, despite some conduct of Power and Energy that was inconsistent with its terms. Power argued that, pursuant to the original, written terms of the APA, Power is the legal and beneficial owner of the River Applications as the Second Closing did not occur and any River Applications that were transferred to Energy returned to Power upon expiry or, alternatively, termination of the APA.

[30] Sigma's position was the APA does not govern the ownership of the River Applications, as it is not a valid and binding agreement. Sigma argued the APA was essentially a sham, there was no consideration for the agreement, and the conduct of the parties was inconsistent with the terms of the APA. Sigma also advanced an alternative counterclaim that asserted the APA was formed in furtherance of a fraudulent conveyance or fraudulent preference and is therefore null and void under the Fraudulent Conveyance Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 163, or the Fraudulent Preference Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 164. Thus, Energy owns the River Applications.

2012 BCCA 414 (CanLII)

The Trial Judgment

[31] The trial judge rejected the arguments of both parties. First, she held the APA between Energy and Power was valid and binding, contrary to Sigma's position that it was an invalid sham. The judge found that although Energy and Power did not strictly adhere to the provisions of the APA, this did not invalidate the agreement. Rather, the inconsistencies between the parties' conduct and the terms of the APA amounted to a modification of the APA.

[32] In particular, the trial judge found the parties' conduct modified clause 4.2(b) of the APA, which required Energy to reimburse Power for all ILMB Costs by cash or promissory note at the time of the Second Closing. However, Energy made payments to Power for the ILMB Costs before the Second Closing. The judge held this inconsistent conduct modified clause 4.2(b) of the APA to allow Energy to pay the ILMB Costs as Power incurred those costs, instead of reimbursing Power for all ILMB Costs at the time of the Second Closing. To this effect, the judge said:

> [175] The effect of the Neeld brothers' evidence was that while repayment of the ILMB Costs was not due until the Second Closing, because both companies intended and treated the Second Closing as occurring, Energy simply paid Power along the way instead of waiting for the Second Closing.
> [176] The implication of the Neeld brothers' evidence, therefore, was that by their conduct and intentions, Energy and Power had simply modified the APA in respect of the timing of Energy's payment to Power for ILMB Costs. The Neeld brothers clearly did not consider this to be a material variation of the APA. If this was so, then by necessary implication all other material terms of the APA must have been intended to continue to apply.

[33] Contrary to the positions of both Sigma and Power, the trial judge went on to hold the Second Closing under the APA had occurred, even though Energy did not provide a promissory note to Power for $895,000. As a result of this finding, the judge concluded legal and beneficial title to the River Applications had been transferred to Energy:

> [200] My finding that the Second Closing occurred under the APA has significant implications for Power's position in this proceeding. Under the APA, the effect of the Second Closing was to transfer all beneficial title to the River Applications subject to that closing, from Power to Energy, as well as any legal title not already transferred. Legal title was already in Energy's name.
>
> [201] Thus, as of September 2008, Energy had both beneficial and legal title to all of the River Applications subject to this proceeding. The remaining question is whether ownership subsequently changed, either based on Power's right to terminate the APA under clause 4.6, or the expiry of the APA under clause 4.7, both of which I will address shortly.

[34] The judge then went on to consider whether the Termination Clause or the Expiry Clause operated to transfer beneficial ownership of the River Applications back to Power.

[35] The judge held Power did not regain ownership of the River Applications through the operation of the Termination Clause, as the notice of termination was sent by Power after the APA had expired on July 1, 2009.

[36] The judge also held Power did not regain ownership of the River Applications through the operation of the Expiry Clause. The relevant portion of the Expiry Clause states:

> ... if the Third Closing does not occur before the Expiry Date [July 1, 2009] ... the Purchaser [Energy] will be and be deemed for all purposes to have quitclaimed and surrendered the Original Projects and the Additional Projects and all related Assets to the Vendor [Power] in exchange for the transfer and surrender by the Vendor of its 7,900,000 Purchaser Shares and the promissory notes ... without the need for any further action, and neither party will have any further obligation to the other hereunder.

[37] The judge found the Third Closing had not occurred, and therefore the Expiry Clause applied as of July 1, 2009, giving Power the right to regain ownership of the River Applications from Energy in exchange for the shares in Energy and the promissory notes for $895,000 and for the ILMB Costs. Power returned the Energy shares on August 25, 2009, and as Energy had failed to give Power any promissory notes, the trial judge held, at para. 229, "Power cannot be faulted for not returning a non-existent note." The judge then questioned what Power should do about the pre-paid ILMB Costs.

[38] The judge went on to reason that although the written terms of the APA did not specifically require Power to repay any pre-paid ILMB Costs under the Expiry Clause, the parties' modification to the APA to provide for the pre-payment of the ILMB Costs by Energy required an interpretation of the Expiry Clause to include such a requirement. Thus, in order to give effect to the Expiry Clause and regain ownership of the River Applications, Power was required to return the shares in Energy and repay the pre-paid ILMB Costs of approximately $705,000. The judge held this interpretation of the Expiry Clause was necessary to make the Expiry Clause consistent with the parties' earlier modification of the APA and with the structure of the APA as a whole.

[39] Based on this interpretation of the Expiry Clause, the judge concluded Power did not regain ownership of the River Applications upon the expiry of the APA, as Power did not repay the pre-Second Closing ILMB Costs. Accordingly, the judge found Energy owned the River Applications and dismissed Power's claim for a declaration of ownership of the River Applications.

[40] The judge also dismissed Sigma's counterclaim that the APA was a fraudulent conveyance or fraudulent preference.

The Issues on Appeal

[41] Power and Sigma do not dispute the trial judge's finding that the Second Closing under the APA occurred and, in turn, that Energy had both beneficial and legal ownership of the River Applications at the time the APA expired on July 1, 2009.

2012 BCCA 414 (CanLII)

[42] The dispute is over the trial judge's finding that Power and Energy, by their conduct, modified the terms of the APA to allow Energy to reimburse Power for the ILMB Costs as incurred, rather than by cash or promissory note at the Second Closing, and the effect of that modification on the APA's Expiry Clause.

[43] Power advances three grounds of appeal, alleging the trial judge erred:

1. In finding Power and Energy modified the APA as to the timing of the payment of the ILMB Costs and, in turn, interpreting the Expiry Clause to require Power to repay the ILMB Costs to Energy as a condition precedent to Power's contractual right to regain title to the River Applications, when there was no evidence to support this finding;
2. In finding the aforementioned modification of the APA was binding on Power and Energy, despite a lack of consideration; and
3. In the alternative, in basing her decision on an interpretation of the APA that neither party had pleaded or raised in submissions, denying the parties the opportunity to lead evidence or make submissions on the point.

[44] Sigma cross appeals on the ground that, if Power's appeal of the main action is allowed and Power is found to be the beneficial and legal owner of the River Applications, this Court should assess Sigma's counterclaim that the APA was a fraudulent conveyance or fraudulent preference on its merits or, in the alternative, remit this matter to the trial judge.

Analysis

[45] I will address Power's third ground of appeal first.

Did the trial judge make a procedural error in basing her decision on an interpretation of the APA that was neither pleaded nor argued by the parties at trial?

[46] As discussed above, the trial judge found Energy and Power had modified the APA to allow Energy to pay the ILMB Costs in advance. The trial judge also found the intent of the APA was that Energy and Power would be returned to their original positions if the APA expired and Power sought to regain the River Applications. Thus, the trial judge interpreted the Expiry Clause to require Power to repay the pre-paid ILMB Costs to Energy as a condition precedent to Power's contractual right to regain title to the River Applications upon expiry of the APA. This requirement was not specifically included in the original, written Expiry Clause, but the trial judge found it was "the only sensible commercial interpretation" of the Expiry Clause.

[47] The trial judge interpreted the Expiry Clause as follows:

> [234] The expiry clause was only to come into play if a Third Closing was necessary because Energy had not raised the Minimum Financing by the time of the Second Closing. The structure of the APA assumed that until the Minimum Financing was raised, Energy would not pay the pre-Second Closing ILMB Costs. The expiry clause envisioned that if Energy had not raised the Minimum Financing by the Expiry Date that the earlier transactions between Power and Energy could be reversed: Energy would get back from Power the shares it had issued and the promissory notes for the $895,000 and the pre-Second Closing ILMB Costs, and Power would get back the ownership of the River Applications.
>
> [235] Given that the thrust of the Neeld brothers' evidence was that they continued to follow the intentions of the APA throughout, their modification to the APA that allowed Energy to pay the pre-Second Closing ILMB Costs upfront must have been on the same basis as the intended provision of the promissory notes: that these payments would have to be returned by Power if Power ever sought to rely on the expiry clause. Any other interpretation would be inconsistent with the structure of the APA.
>
> [236] I find that if the parties by their conduct modified the APA to allow Energy to pay the ILMB Costs before the Second Closing, they must have intended that if Power sought to exercise its rights under clause 4.7 Power would be required to reimburse Energy for the pre-Second Closing ILMB Costs as a condition of Power receiving back the full ownership in the Original Projects and the Additional Projects. This is the only sensible commercial interpretation, and it is in keeping with the original structure of the APA.
>
> [237] I find that by well before the expiry date of July 1, 2009, Energy held both beneficial and legal title to the River Applications at issue in this proceeding. The APA expired on July 1, 2009 as Energy was unable to meet its obligations for the Third Closing. However, Power did not meet the conditions for exercising its contractual rights to obtain a surrendering of the River Applications pursuant to clause 4.7 of the APA, as Power did not repay Energy all of the pre-Second Closing ILMB Costs that Energy had paid Power.

2012 BCCA 414 (CanLII)

> [238] Thus, Energy remains both the beneficial and legal owner of the River Applications registered in its name.

[48] Power argues the trial judge's finding of contract modification and her resulting interpretation of the APA's Expiry Clause were neither pleaded nor argued at trial. Instead, the judge developed this interpretation on her own; it appeared for the first time in her reasons for judgment.

[49] While agreeing at trial that some of its conduct was inconsistent with some of the terms of the APA, Power did not plead or argue the APA had been modified, either in the manner found by the trial judge, or at all. Similarly, Sigma did not plead or argue the APA was valid, but had been modified by the conduct of Energy and Power.

[50] At the hearing of this appeal, Sigma initially contended, on a strained examination of its pleadings, that its defence at trial could be viewed as including an argument based on modification of the contract. To its credit, Sigma abandoned that argument and fairly conceded the trial judge's finding of a modification of the APA and her interpretation of the Expiry Clause were never pleaded, did not arise in submissions and were not raised by the court at trial.

[51] Power says the parties were thus denied the opportunity to lead evidence or make submissions on the question of modification of the APA and, in particular, the specific modification to the APA found by the trial judge and the resulting effect on the Expiry Clause. Power argues the modification issue was clearly pivotal, as the trial judge's interpretation of the Expiry Clause and ultimate conclusion about the ownership of the River Applications hinged on her finding that the APA had been modified. Neither party was given a meaningful opportunity to address this important point and fully make their cases at trial.

[52] Sigma submits that even if the judge erred in deciding the case on an issue neither pleaded nor argued at trial, Power was not prejudiced. Sigma says it was open to the trial judge to find the APA had been modified by the conduct of Power and Energy, as Power was aware of, and did not challenge, the evidence that Power and Energy's conduct was inconsistent with the written terms of the APA.

[53] Sigma says in its factum that Power's approach to its inconsistent conduct was to try to "explain it away", while still maintaining that the written terms of the APA governed ownership of the River Applications. In doing so, Sigma contends Power raised the prospect that either the inconsistent conduct was a modification of one or more terms of the APA, as the trial judge found, or there was no effective agreement in the first place or, if there was, it was an entirely different and unknown agreement. Sigma contends that Power's position on this appeal is actually premised on an acceptance of the trial judge's finding that the APA was valid and binding, but modified by the parties' conduct. Thus, it cannot be said that Power has suffered any fundamental unfairness in the way the trial judge approached Energy's advance payments of the ILMB Costs.

[54] Sigma further argues Power was not prejudiced because the evidence at trial would not have been different, nor had any different effect, had either party explicitly raised the issue of contract modification.

[55] I agree with Power that conduct inconsistent with the written terms of the APA can give rise to a number of legal conclusions, including waiver, modification, or a finding that the APA is not binding on the parties. Sigma only argued the latter possibility at trial, and Power successfully addressed this argument.

[56] It is also correct, in my opinion, that had the issue of contract modification and the effect on the Expiry Clause been identified in the pleadings, different documentary and testamentary evidence may have been adduced, or at a minimum, the evidence may have been subject to different emphasis or argument. The parties' submissions might have affected the judge's view of the case, her findings of credibility or her disposition of the case.

[57] Natural justice requires that parties have notice of the case they are required to meet and the opportunity to adduce evidence and make submissions on that case. Power cannot be taken to have abandoned these rights.

[58] In Lore Krill Housing Co-operative v. Ramirez, 2012 BCCA 223, Madam Justice Neilson, for the Court, said at para. 17:

> Fairness requires that judges should not on their own initiative determine a matter on a pivotal point not raised by the parties without drawing their attention to it, and giving them an opportunity to address it: R. v. Whincup, 2011 BCCA 520 at para. 11, 314 B.C.A.C. 75; Canada Trustco Mortgage Co. v. Renard, 2008 BCCA 343 at para. 42, 298 D.L.R. (4th) 216.

[59] Madam Justice Neilson went on to say that while this Court may be in a position in some cases to address a question of law that was not addressed in the court below, that was not so in the case before her. The chambers judge determined the case on the basis of waiver, despite the fact that waiver was not pleaded or argued at the hearing. The appellant wished to lead evidence on the issue of waiver, and the trial court was the only venue that would give the appellant an opportunity to fully address the issue on both a factual and legal basis.

[60] In Canada Trustco Mortgage Co. v. Renard, 2008 BCCA 343, 83 B.C.L.R. (4th) 267, Mr. Justice Frankel, for the Court, said:

> [38] Fairness requires that a trial judge not bring issues into litigation without giving the parties an opportunity to address them. This is also reflected in Walker v. Blades, 2007 BCCA 436, 70 B.C.L.R. (4th) 226 at para. 16, and Rodaro v. Royal Bank of Canada (2002), 59 O.R. (3d) 74 (C.A.) at paras. 60 - 62. In Walker, the trial judge erred in dismissing an action on the basis that the plaintiff had repudiated the contract in issue, when repudiation had not been pleaded or argued. In Rodaro, the trial judge's error was in granting judgment in favour of the plaintiff on a theory of liability that had not been pleaded or argued.

[61] Mr. Justice Frankel noted, at para. 39, the common thread in the authorities is that a party is entitled to know and respond to the case against it, whether by the calling of evidence, or through submissions.

2012 BCCA 414 (CanLII)

[62] In Rodaro v. Royal Bank of Canada (2002), 59 O.R. (3d) 74 (C.A.), Mr. Justice Doherty, for the Court, described the fairness and reliability concerns associated with deciding a case on an issue neither pleaded nor argued:

> [61] By stepping outside of the pleadings and the case as developed by the parties to find liability, Spence J. denied RBC and Barbican the right to know the case they had to meet and the right to a fair opportunity to meet that case. The injection of a novel theory of liability into the case via the reasons for judgment was fundamentally unfair to RBC and Barbican.
> [62] In addition to fairness concerns which standing alone would warrant appellate intervention, the introduction of a new theory of liability in the reasons for judgment also raises concerns about the reliability of that theory. We rely on the adversarial process to get at the truth. That process assumes that the truth best emerges after a full and vigorous competition amongst the various opposing parties. A theory of liability that emerges for the first time in the reasons for judgment is never tested in the crucible of the adversarial process. We simply do not know how Spence J.'s lost opportunity theory would have held up had it been subject to the rigours of the adversarial process. We do know, however, that all arguments that were in fact advanced by Mr. Rodaro and were therefore subject to the adversarial process were found wanting by Spence J.

[63] I agree with Power that it was prejudiced by the analytical route taken by the trial judge. The judge found the APA had been modified by the conduct of Power and Energy to allow Energy to pay the ILMB Costs in advance, despite the fact that neither party pleaded or argued the issue of contract modification at trial. This finding led the trial judge to conclude, at para. 236, that an interpretation of the Expiry Clause requiring Power to reimburse Energy for the pre-paid ILMB Costs was "the only sensible commercial interpretation". Neither party at trial made submissions on this interpretation.

[64] If the judge had raised the issue of contract modification at trial, Power could have made arguments about whether Power and Energy, by their conduct, modified the APA with respect to the timing of Energy's payment of the ILMB Costs.

[65] I am also not persuaded that the judge's interpretation of the Expiry Clause was "the only sensible commercial interpretation". Notice of the trial judge's analysis of the Expiry Clause would have allowed Power to make submissions on how the Expiry Clause should be interpreted in light of a finding that the APA was modified and perhaps raise other sensible interpretations. For example, even if the APA was modified with respect to the timing of the ILMB payments, another arguably reasonable interpretation of the Expiry Clause might be that upon expiry, Power had incurred a debt to Energy for the pre-paid ILMB Costs. This debt could be interpreted as an obligation that arose on expiry, rather than a "further obligation" under the Expiry Clause.

[66] In my view, the procedural error of failing to provide the parties an opportunity to address the question of whether Power and Energy modified the APA and whether Power was required, under the Expiry Clause, to repay Energy the approximately $705,000 in ILMB Costs, breached Power's right to know and respond to the case against it: Canada Trustco, supra, citing A.(L.L.) v. B.(A.), [1995] 4 S.C.R. 536 at para. 27.

[67] Both parties in their factums submit this Court is well positioned to determine these issues by considering the evidentiary record from the trial, the primary facts found by the trial judge, the wording of the APA itself and the arguments before this Court on appeal.

[68] Power says the evidentiary record from the trial, together with the wording of the APA itself, do not reveal a sufficient evidentiary basis for the trial judge's finding that the APA was modified to allow Energy to pay the ILMB Costs in advance, the determination that the modification was supported by good and valuable consideration, or her interpretation of the Expiry Clause.

[69] However, at the hearing of this appeal, counsel for Power said it is unclear what other evidence his client may have wished to adduce had these issues been raised at trial. Document discovery was based on the pleadings, and as these issues were not in the pleadings, some relevant documents may not have been disclosed or may have been subject to different emphasis.

[70] Sigma, on the other hand, says if the judge erred in her finding that Power and Energy modified the APA with respect to the ILMB payments and in her resulting interpretation of the Expiry Clause, the necessary result is not a judgment in favour of Power. Instead, it submits that given the nature and extent of the parties' inconsistent conduct, the only other conclusion that can be drawn from the primary facts found by the judge is the APA did not become effective. Alternatively, if it did, the parties, by their conduct, disclaimed or rescinded the APA shortly after July 1, 2007, before it affected any rights to the River Applications. Sigma argues that if the APA never became effective or ceased to be effective, the evidence supports the conclusion that Energy owns the River Applications.

[71] I cannot agree that this Court is well positioned to determine the result had the parties pleaded or at least made submissions on the trial judge's reasoning. If the question of contract modification and the judge's interpretation of the Expiry Clause had been raised at trial, the evidentiary record might have been different. The trial strategy of the parties may have also been different. They may have pointed to, or emphasized, quite different evidence. In turn, the trial judge may have been persuaded by those submissions to reach different conclusions.

[72] As in Rodaro at para. 63, the judge based her finding on an interpretation "never pleaded and with respect to which battle was never joined at trial". Instead, as Doherty J.A. wrote in Rodaro at para. 62, the trial judge's interpretation of the APA must be tested in the "crucible of the adversarial process" and "subject to the rigours of the adversarial process". Otherwise, the trial judge's interpretation of the APA, even if compelling, is unreliable. If the Court were to undertake such an analysis at this point, it would fail to remedy any prejudice. The trial court is the proper forum for the parties to test the analysis.

Conclusion

[73] For the above reasons, I conclude the trial judge made a procedural error by deciding this case based on a finding that the APA was modified with respect to the timing of ILMB payments and an interpretation of the Expiry Clause that required Power to repay the pre-paid ILMB Costs when these issues were not pleaded or argued by the parties at trial. The trial judge's interpretation of the APA is careful and well reasoned, but she came to conclusions not advocated by either party.

[74] Accordingly, I would allow the appeal, set aside the order of the trial judge and order a new trial. If the parties wish to amend their pleadings, the appropriate forum in which to do so is the trial court.

[75] In order to preserve the River Applications, I would also order that the Receiver shall not deliver to Sigma the River Applications until further order of the Supreme Court or until Power provides its agreement in writing to the Receiver.

[76] This result makes it unnecessary to consider the two remaining grounds of appeal. It is also unnecessary to address Sigma's cross appeal.

Summary:

The Battered Women's Support Services Association (BWSS) and the Independent Criminal Defence Advocacy Society (CDAS) each seek leave to intervene in this appeal, which concerns the civil liability of the appellant for multiple counts of sexual assault after he was found wrongfully convicted of those offences in criminal proceedings and acquitted. One of the grounds of appeal contends the trial judge erred in refusing to apply the abuse of process doctrine in relation to the relitigation of findings of fact in prior criminal proceedings that resulted in acquittal. Both applicants seek to intervene on a matter of public interest to make submissions on this issue, each to provide a broader perspective.

Held: Applications allowed. This appeal engages the interests of the respective representative groups of each applicant: sexual assault complainants and defence lawyers and their clients. Both BWSS and CDAS can provide a unique perspective that will assist the Court on this issue and neither seek to expand the scope of the appeal.

[1] FISHER J.A.: The applicants, the Battered Women's Support Services Association (BWSS) and the Independent Criminal Defence Advocacy Society (CDAS), each seek leave to intervene in this appeal. The appeal concerns the civil liability of the appellant, Ivan Henry, for sexual assault after he was acquitted of these offences in the criminal context.

[2] The appellant takes no position on these applications, submitting only that the factums should be in accordance with the limits in the Court of Appeal Rules and not duplicate submissions made by either the appellant or the respondents, and leave to make oral submissions should be determined by the division hearing the appeal. The respondents take no position provided the interventions do not jeopardise the currently scheduled hearing dates. I am satisfied that they do not. I am prepared to grant the applications for these reasons.

Background

[3] In 1983, Mr. Henry was convicted of ten counts of sexual offences by a jury. The only issue at trial was the identification of the offender. He was subsequently sentenced as a dangerous offender and was imprisoned for almost 27 years. In 2010, this Court found that Mr. Henry had been wrongfully convicted and he was acquitted of the offences. The reasons are indexed as 2010 BCCA 462.

[4] After his acquittal, Mr. Henry commenced a civil action himself against the Province of BC, the City of Vancouver and the Attorney General of Canada, alleging violations of his Charter rights due to non-disclosure of information by Crown counsel in the course of his prosecution. He was successful in that action. Those reasons are indexed as 2016 BCSC 1038.

[5] On October 13, 2017, the respondents, five complainants from the original criminal allegations, commenced a civil action against Mr. Henry, alleging he had sexually assaulted each of them. In reasons for judgment released January 29, 2025, the trial judge found Mr. Henry liable and awarded general and aggravated damages in the amount of $375,000 to each complainant. The reasons are indexed as A.B. v. Henry, 2025 BCSC 137. It is this decision that is under appeal.

Issues on appeal

[6] The issues on appeal are numerous. I take these from a brief review of the appellant's factum.

[7] The appellant asserts the trial judge erred in: applying the law regarding the frailties of identification evidence; admitting as similar fact evidence statements in respect of offences for which the appellant had been convicted in Winnipeg in the 1970s; relying on similar facts as between the respondents; admitting hearsay; permitting the respondents to relitigate prior judicial findings and failing to give weight to those findings; failing to admit statements of complainants from an investigation known as "Smallman"; failing to grapple with expert evidence; and drawing an adverse finding of credibility against the applicant on the basis of a misapprehension of and a failure to grapple with evidence.

[8] Most relevant to these applications is the issue of relitigation of prior judicial findings. The relitigation of such findings, in some cases, can constitute an abuse of process: British Columbia (Workers' Compensation Board) v. Figliola, 2011 SCC 52 at paras. 33–34 and Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, 2003 SCC 63 at paras. 51–52.

[9] During the civil trial, the appellant twice brought applications for a ruling that the relitigation of certain factual findings on identification from the criminal trial and the acquittal would be an abuse of process. He sought to bar the relitigation of certain findings and argued, in the alternative, that such findings should be accorded significant weight. The judge dismissed both applications, finding there was no abuse of process. She held that the respondents in the civil trial were not parties in the criminal context, and the evidence from the criminal context had not been tested on the civil standard. The judge also found there were issues with the identification evidence provided by the respondents at the criminal trial.

[10] The appellant will say the judge's reasoning on this point, both on the pre-trial applications and in the reasons, reflects numerous errors. He will argue that the judge applied the wrong legal test for the abuse of process by relitigation, including the mutuality requirement. He will submit that the judge impermissibly speculated on Crown diligence relating to the identification evidence it led at the criminal trial. He will also say that the judge misapprehended the "new" evidence before her and also misapprehended the standard of proof for findings of fact in prior decisions.

The proposed interveners

[11] BWSS is a non-profit organization that works with women survivors and victims of sexual violence in BC. It runs a crisis-intervention call line, a legal advocacy clinic, and is also engaged in policy work. It regularly assists women navigating the aftermath of sexual violence, including the decision of whether to pursue a legal remedy. It has intervened on issues related to sexual and domestic violence in the past.

[12] CDAS is an incorporated non-profit society engaged in advocacy, law reform and education relating to criminal defence and the administration of justice. It has approximately 300 members, composed of lawyers and law students. Its mandate includes intervening in court proceedings involving issues relevant to criminal justice and issues that impact defence counsel and their clients.

The test for granting intervention

[13] Section 30(f) of the Court of Appeal Act, S.B.C. 2021, c. 6, and R. 61 of the Court of Appeal Rules, B.C. Reg. 120/2022, govern applications for intervener status and allow a justice to grant leave to intervene in an appeal before the Court.

[14] An order granting leave is discretionary and may be made on any terms the Court considers appropriate: Carter v. Canada (Attorney General), 2012 BCCA 502 at para. 11 (Chambers). A justice's discretion to grant intervener status is governed by the following principles, set out in Halalt First Nation v. British Columbia (Environment), 2012 BCCA 191 at para. 5 (Chambers):

> a) the applicant must have a direct interest in the matter; or
> b) the applicant must have a public interest in a public law issue in question; and
> c) the applicant can make a valuable contribution or bring a different perspective to a consideration of the issues on appeal that differs from that advanced by the parties.

[15] Both applicants seek to intervene on a matter of public interest.

[16] A central concern on a public interest intervention application is to ensure important legal perspectives on an issue are not overlooked. Public interest interveners must therefore show that it is in the Court's interest, or broadly, in the public interest, to grant leave for them to be heard. The scope of their intervention is limited because they must not expand the litigation by raising matters that are not already part of it: Equustek Solutions Inc. v. Google Inc., 2014 BCCA 448 at para. 8 (Chambers); Beaudoin v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2022 BCCA 66 at para. 12 (Chambers).

[17] The Court will consider the following factors to determine intervener applications advanced on a public interest basis:

a) whether the proposed intervener has a broad representative base;

b) whether the case legitimately engages the interests of the proposed intervener in the public law issue raised on appeal;

2026 BCCA 207 (CanLII)

c) whether the proposed intervener has a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court in the resolution of the issues; and,

d) whether the proposed intervener seeks to expand the scope of the appeal by raising issues not raised by the parties.

British Columbia Civil Liberties Association v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 BCCA 282 at para. 14 (Chambers).

Discussion

[18] Both applicants seek to intervene on the issue of abuse of process as it relates to relitigation of findings of fact from prior criminal proceedings, each from a different perspective.

BWSS

[19] BWSS seeks to make submissions on the connection between abuse of process and access to justice for sexual assault complainants. Its interest in this appeal is limited to the issue of the relitigation of findings of fact from prior criminal proceedings only. Its approach to the issue is from the perspective of a “front-line service provider” for victims of sexual violence.

[20] If granted leave, its submissions will focus on the impact of the abuse of process doctrine on contemporary victims of sexual violence and their ability to access a remedy in the civil process. In particular, it will submit that:

1) There are systemic and individual barriers in access to justice for sexual assault complainants, such as the mental, emotional, and financial toll of pursuing subsequent or parallel civil proceedings;

2) Existing principles in Canadian jurisprudence are aimed at safeguarding access to justice for sexual assault complainants, including the principles that a criminal acquittal does not bar civil liability and an acquittal based on a wrongful conviction establishes legal but not factual innocence; and

3) The doctrine of abuse of process should develop in a manner that preserves rather than diminishes access to justice for sexual assault complainants. The criminal justice system affords these complainants little voice and input, and by contrast, the civil process gives them both the burden and opportunity to present their own evidence. When a civil trial is bound to follow prior criminal findings concerning the complainant's evidence, that outcome restricts a complainant's opportunity to present her own evidence.

[21] I am satisfied that the relevant factors weigh in favour of granting intervener status to BWSS on these submissions. BWSS clearly has a broad representative base of victims of sexual violence. It frequently sees such victims make the difficult decision whether to pursue civil remedies following criminal proceedings. This appeal engages their interests in the abuse of process issue as it relates to relitigation. BWSS can provide a unique perspective that will assist the Court and it does not seek to expand the scope of the appeal.

CDAS

[22] CDAS says this appeal raises issues relevant to the duty of defence lawyers, its representative base, to advise clients on various collateral matters to a criminal proceeding. It emphasizes that each client faces a prospect of civil liability after a criminal verdict. It says a civil action subsequent to a criminal prosecution is increasingly common, especially in the context of sexual offences.

[23] If granted leave, CDAS will argue that the underlying principles regarding the abuse of process doctrine in the administrative law context, as stated in Figliola at para. 34 and C.U.P.E at para. 51, should be extended to the context of criminal legal proceedings specifically where a person has been acquitted of a criminal offence prior to a civil action. In particular, CDAS will argue that, where there has been an acquittal, the following factors are important in deciding whether to permit a party to relitigate findings and conclusions from the criminal context:

1) There is significant societal interest in recognizing and in some cases preserving acquittals and their underlying findings. In some cases, judicial findings are so significant that allowing for relitigation would serve only to undermine the public's confidence in the administration of justice, and some findings (such as witness credibility and reliability) do not engage with the criminal standard of proof;

2) There are social costs (such as stigmatization, loss of privacy, family disruption and uncertainty of outcome and sanction) that come with criminal proceedings, such that allowing liberal relitigation of acquittals will undermine the "stigma-reducing" effect of a not-guilty finding; and

3) Miscarriages of justice prevent an accused person from conclusively proving their innocence, leaving an acquittal as their only recourse before the courts. In some cases, this should be considered in deciding whether to allow for relitigation.

[24] CDAS proposes to focus on the unique challenges criminal accused must deal with when faced with an attempt to relitigate aspects of their acquittals and why this should be considered when addressing the abuse of process doctrine.

[25] Based on these submissions, the factors weigh in favour of granting CDAS leave to intervene. How findings of fact and legal conclusions from a criminal proceeding can be used in a subsequent civil action engages the interests of both defence lawyers and their clients. It impacts the advice that defence lawyers will give to their clients. Defence lawyers are uniquely positioned to advise an accused person of the significant decisions that they will face in a criminal proceeding. I am satisfied that it is appropriate to grant leave, as well, to CDAS.

Conclusion

[26] The applications of BWSS and CDAS for leave to intervene are granted on the following terms:

1. The style of cause will be amended to include the interveners;

2026 BCCA 207 (CanLII)

2. Each applicant may file a factum of not more than 10 pages as required by the Court of Appeal Rules;

3. Each applicant must file its factum by May 22, 2026;

4. The appellant and respondents have leave, if the choose, to file replies to the interveners' factums by June 2, 2026; and

5. No costs will be awarded for or against BWSS or CDAS in respect of this application or the appeal itself.

[27] It will be for the division hearing this appeal to determine if oral submissions will be permitted and, if so, for what duration.

The appellant disputed an order of the Ontario Court of Appeal upholding two by-laws of the respondent municipality. The issues turned on the interpretation of s. 29 of The Planning Act and the jurisdiction or authority of the courts under The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971.

As a condition of registration of a plan of subdivision in the Village of Wyoming, Atkinson, the owner and subdivider of the parcel of land, entered into an agreement with the Village for the installation of municipal services in the subdivision. This agreement, dated January 22, 1968, and registered September 26, 1975, provided in a general way for the owner's providing "all the requirements financial and otherwise, of the Corporation re surfacing of roads, installation of services and drainage". The agreement also prevented the sale of the lands in question until the agreement had been fully carried out, except with the consent of the Village, but the provision did not provide that consent would operate to release Atkinson from his obligation to the Village. Before any services were installed, Homex bought the great majority of the lots on the subdivision with the Village's consent. There was some question as to wheth-

Droit municipal — Règlements — Législation sur l'urbanisme — Contrôle des lotissements — Refus du propriétaire subséquent de la majeure partie des lots d'exécuter la convention de lotissement — Aux termes du règlement, les lots de l'appelante ne sont pas réputés un plan de lotissement — Règlement adopté sans avis — Raccordement de la conduite d'eau principale au réseau municipal interdit par un règlement distinct jusqu'à ce que les conditions soient remplies — Règlements annulables ou non — Nature discrétionnaire de l'examen judiciaire — The Planning Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 349, art. 29 — The Interpretation Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 225, art. 17 — The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971, 1971 (Ont.), chap. 48 — The Registry Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 409 — The Municipal Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 248, art. 283, 284, 285.

L'appelante conteste un ordre de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario qui a confirmé la validité de deux règlements de la municipalité intimée. Le litige porte sur l'interprétation de l'art. 29 de The Planning Act et sur la compétence ou le pouvoir des tribunaux en vertu de The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971.

Conformément à une condition de l'enregistrement d'un plan de lotissement dans le village de Wyoming, Atkinson, propriétaire et lotisseur du terrain, a conclu une convention avec le Village pour l'installation de services d'utilité publique sur ce lotissement. Cette convention datée du 22 janvier 1968 et enregistrée le 26 septembre 1975, prévoyait en termes généraux que le propriétaire s'acquitterait de «toutes les exigences, financières ou autres, de la Municipalité relativement au revêtement des routes, à l'installation des services d'utilité publique et au drainage». Cette convention interdisait aussi la vente des terrains en question avant que la convention ait été entièrement exécutée, sauf approbation du Village, mais cette disposition ne prévoyait pas que le consentement libérerait Atkinson de son obligation envers le Village. Avant même l'installation d'un de ces services, Homex a acheté la grande majorité des lots er or not Homex had undertaken to assume the obligations of the original subdivider. Nevertheless, when protracted negotiations between the Village and Homex concerning the installation of services proved fruitless, the Village, in April 1976, pursuant to s. 29(3) of The Planning Act and without notice to Homex, enacted by-law 7 deeming the lots purchased by Homex not to be a registered plan of subdivision. Homex, in September 1976, made application for judicial review for an order quashing by-law 7 and, while the application was pending, checkerboarded its lots.

In November 1975, Homex and the Village negotiated the installation of services along the only street requiring them. By-law 6, enacted in December 1975, provided that it was the policy of the Village that it would neither assume responsibility for a water pipeline constructed by Homex nor permit its connection to the municipal water supply system. Homex coupled an application in judicial review to quash by-law 6 with the application for an order to quash by-law 7.

Held (Ritchie and Dickson JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Laskin C.J. and Martland, Beetz, Estey and Chouinard JJ.: Homex, through its president, undertook to assume the obligations undertaken by the first subdivider under the subdivision agreement. Further, Homex intended to convey the lots as purchased on this subdivision without the installation of any services leaving the expense to the Village and other inhabitants.

Wherever a statute authorized the interference with property or other rights and was silent as to whether or not the agency in question was required to give notice prior to the intervention in such rights, the courts would "supply the omission of the legislature" and require the agency in question to afford the subject an opportunity of being heard before it proceeded. The application by the courts of this old principle depended on the nature of the action being undertaken by a body, such as a municipal council.

The statutory framework, the nature of the action being taken by the Village Council, and the general circumstances prevailing at the time had to be taken into account in determining the appropriate interpretation applicable to s. 29(3) of The Planning Act. The statute did not expressly require notice to the affected landowners; nevertheless, Council was aware that Homex would oppose by-law 7. The by-law had some characteristics of a community interest by-law and also du lotissement avec l'accord du Village. Il y a eu des divergences d'opinion à savoir si Homex avait ou non assumé les obligations du lotisseur original. Les négociations prolongées entre le Village et Homex relativement à l'installation des services ont échoué. Sans donner d'avis à Homex, le Village a adopté en avril 1976, en vertu du par. 29(3) de The Planning Act, le règlement 7 en vertu duquel les terrains achetés par Homex ne sont pas réputés être des plans de lotissement enregistrés. En septembre 1976, Homex a présenté une demande d'examen judiciaire pour faire annuler le règlement 7 et alors que cette demande était pendante, elle a morcelé les lots en damier.

En novembre 1975, Homex et le Village avaient négocié l'installation des services sur la seule rue du lotissement à viabiliser. Le règlement 6 adopté en décembre 1975 dispose que, selon sa politique, le Village n'assumerait aucune responsabilité pour l'aqueduc construit par Homex ni n'en autoriserait le raccordement à la conduite d'eau du réseau municipal. Homex a présenté une demande d'examen judiciaire pour faire annuler le règlement 6 en même temps que la demande visant à obtenir l'annulation du règlement 7.

Arrêt (les juges Ritchie et Dickson sont dissidents): Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Le juge en chef Laskin et les juges Martland, Beetz, Estey et Chouinard: Par l'intermédiaire de son président, Homex a accepté d'assumer l'obligation du premier lotisseur en vertu de la convention de lotissement. De plus, Homex avait l'intention de transférer les lots du lotissement sans les viabiliser, frais que le Village et les autres habitants devraient assumer.

Lorsqu'une loi permet de toucher aux droits de propriété ou autres droits et ne dit pas si l'organisme en question doit donner un avis avant d'agir, les tribunaux «remédieront à l'omission du législateur» et exigeront que l'organisme en question accorde au citoyen la possibilité de se faire entendre avant d'agir. L'application de ce vieux principe par les tribunaux dépend de la nature de l'action entreprise par un organisme, tel un conseil municipal.

Il faut tenir compte du cadre législatif, de la nature de l'action entreprise par le Conseil du village et des circonstances particulières du moment pour déterminer l'interprétation à donner au par. 29(3) de The Planning Act. La Loi n'exige pas expressément qu'un avis soit donné aux propriétaires visés; néanmoins le Conseil savait qu'Homex s'opposerait au règlement 7. Ce règlement présente certaines caractéristiques d'un règlement adopté dans l'intérêt de la collectivité, mais il est égale-represented the purported culmination of an inter partes dispute conducted on adversarial lines between Homex and the Council. Council's action was not in substance legislative but rather quasi-judicial in character so as to attract the principle of notice and the consequential doctrine of audi alteram partem. The statute did not displace the rule of audi alteram partem and the resultant duty in Council to hear first and decide later. There was no hearing in the formal and ordinary sense by the Council and, while each side was fully aware of the other's position, Homex did not receive an opportunity to make known its position once fully aware of the Council's final position.

The order of judicial review, sought with reference to by-law 7, was in the nature of certiorari. The discretionary nature of this remedy is undoubted, and a party may by his conduct disentitle himself to relief. The remedy was denied in the special circumstances of the case: the attempts by Homex to avoid the burden of the Atkinson agreement; the avoidance, through checkerboarding, of Village regulation should the by-laws be invalid; and the fact that the Village's action, made even more urgent by the litigation possible, was the only course open to it.

There was no basis for quashing by-law 6. The by-law simply recorded an agreement between the Village and the landowner, and announced the Village's policy with reference to the pipeline. Passage of by-law 6 was not tied to Homex's disposition of its lands in plan 567 and was not tainted by bad faith.

The form of proceedings taken was free from any deficiency in its statutory base. Either The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971 or the quashing provisions of The Municipal Act were open and appropriate.

Per Dickson and Ritchie JJ., dissenting: Where the by-laws in question affected the land or property of specified individuals, the courts implied a common law duty to be heard. This duty was not precluded by implication by the requirement of notification after passage of the by-law.

There was no reason why the Wiswell principle should have been applied restrictively, or why it should not have been applied in this case. The entitlement to notice and a hearing did not depend on there being a conflict between two private owners, which the municipality had to resolve. The right to a hearing did not spring from the ment le point culminant d'un conflit inter partes opposant les intérêts contradictoires d'Homex et du Conseil. L'action du Conseil n'était pas en substance législative, mais plutôt de type quasi judiciaire de manière à faire jouer le principe de l'avis et la doctrine conséquente de la règle audi alteram partem. La Loi n'écarte pas la règle audi alteram partem et l'obligation qui en résulte pour le Conseil de tenir une audition avant de prendre une décision. Le Conseil n'a pas tenu une audition au sens formel et ordinaire et quoique les deux parties aient été tout à fait conscientes de leur position mutuelle, Homex n'a pas eu la possibilité de faire connaître sa position lorsqu'elle a clairement su quelle était la position finale du Conseil.

L'ordonnance d'examen judiciaire demandée relativement au règlement 7 est de la nature d'un certiorari. Le caractère discrétionnaire de ce recours ne fait aucun doute, et un requérant peut par sa conduite perdre son droit au redressement. Le redressement peut être refusé compte tenu des circonstances spéciales d'une affaire: la tentative d'Homex de se soustraire aux obligations de la convention Atkinson; le fait de contourner, par le morcellement en damier, le règlement du Village si les règlements s'avéraient invalides; et le fait que le seul recours du Village était les mesures qu'il a prises, que le litige possible rendait d'autant plus urgentes.

Rien ne justifie l'annulation du règlement 6. Ce règlement ne fait que rapporter une entente intervenue entre le Village et le propriétaire et formule la politique du Village relativement à la conduite d'eau. L'adoption du règlement 6 n'a aucun lien avec l'aliénation des terrains d'Homex compris dans le plan 567 et n'est pas entachée de mauvaise foi.

La forme des procédures prise n'est pas viciée dans son fondement juridique. Il était possible et approprié de recourir à The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971 ou aux dispositions d'annulation de The Municipal Act.

Les juges Dickson et Ritchie, dissidents: Lorsque les règlements en question nuisent directement aux biens-fonds ou à la propriété de personnes en particulier, les tribunaux ont reconnu implicitement l'existence du droit d'être entendu en common law. Ce droit n'est pas écarté implicitement par l'exigence d'un préavis après l'adoption du règlement.

Il n'y a aucune raison pour que le principe Wiswell s'applique restrictivement ou qu'il ne s'applique pas en l'espèce. Le droit à un avis et à une audition ne devrait pas dépendre de l'existence d'un conflit entre deux propriétaires privés, que la municipalité doit résoudre. Le droit à une audition ne découle pas du fait qu'il y a des fact that there were competing groups or individuals, some opposed to the by-law but from the fact that the by-law interfered, in particular, with the private property rights of this one owner.

The public interest was best served by affording the private interest full disclosure and a fair opportunity to be heard. There was no a priori reason why the private interest should yield abjectly to the public interest. The Village could undoubtedly pass the by-law if it were in the public interest, but, prior to deciding in favour of the public interest, the Council should have heard the landowner's submissions. An act could not be labelled "legislative" for the purpose of dispensing with fairness. Although a sophisticated owner, given prior notice, could "checkerboard" and defeat the intent of the section, it was for the legislature to decide that prior notice was not necessary. Further, the requirement of both prior and subsequent notice was not redundant: the earlier notice permitted representations from those who wished to protest and the subsequent notice informed all concerned of the action taken.

The right to procedural fairness no longer demanded an a priori classification of a process as judicial or quasi-judicial. It was not particularly important that the function of the municipality was classified as "legislative" or "quasi-judicial". Rather, it was necessary to look at the nature of the function and to the facts of each case. The by-law in question was not of wide and general application, but was rather aimed at deliberately limiting the rights of the appellant, entitling it to some procedural safeguards—at a minimum, notice of the proposed by-law and the opportunity to be heard. The prolonged negotiations between the Village and Homex did not satisfy the onus placed on the Village and did not result in waiver of notice for Homex had been given no indication of the Village's intention to enact the impugned by-laws.

personnes ou des groupes de personnes en conflit dont certaines sont opposées au règlement, mais du fait que le règlement porte atteinte de façon particulière aux droits de propriété appartenant à ce propriétaire.

L'intérêt public est mieux servi si les intérêts privés bénéficient d'une divulgation complète et d'une possibilité raisonnable d'être entendus. Il n'y a aucune raison a priori pour que l'intérêt privé cède servilement à l'intérêt public. Le Village pouvait sans aucun doute adopter un règlement dans l'intérêt public, mais avant d'opter en faveur de l'intérêt public, le Conseil devait entendre les arguments du propriétaire. On ne peut qualifier un acte de «législatif» pour se dispenser d'agir équitablement. Même si un propriétaire rusé qui reçoit un préavis pouvait morceler en damier et faire ainsi échec à l'intention de l'article, il incomberait au législateur de décider qu'un préavis n'était pas nécessaire. De plus, l'exigence d'un préavis et d'un avis subséquent n'introduit rien de répétitif: le préavis permettrait aux personnes qui désirent s'opposer de se faire entendre et l'avis subséquent informerait tous les intéressés des mesures prises.

Le droit à une procédure équitable ne dépend plus de la répartition préalable des fonctions dans les catégories judiciaires ou quasi judiciaires. Il n'est pas particulièrement important de savoir si la fonction de la municipalité doit être qualifiée de «législative» ou «quasi judiciaire», mais il est plutôt nécessaire de considérer la nature de la fonction et les faits de chaque cas. Le règlement en question n'était pas un règlement général devant s'appliquer à tous les citoyens, mais il visait plutôt délibérément à limiter les droits de l'appelante par lesquels elle pouvait bénéficier de la protection qu'offre la procédure, à tout le moins, un avis du règlement envisagé et la possibilité de se faire entendre. Les longues négociations entre le Village et Homex n'ont pas satisfait à l'obligation de ce dernier et n'ont pas entraîné une renonciation à l'avis parce que le Village n'avait pas donné à Homex d'indications de son intention d'adopter les règlements contestés.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal for Ontario[1], allowing an appeal from a judgment of the Divisional Court quashing the municipal by-laws in question on an application for judicial review.

ESTEY J.—The appellant disputes an order of the Ontario Court of Appeal upholding two by-laws of the respondent municipality being by-laws nos. 6 and 7, passed by the Village Council in 1975 and 1976. The issue turns on the interpretation of s. 29 of The Planning Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 349, and the jurisdiction or authority of the courts under The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971, 1971 (Ont.), c. 48. In relating the essentials of the history of this matter, the appellant is referred to as Homex and the respondent municipality as the Village or the Council.

One Atkinson owned a parcel of land in the Village of Wyoming, County of Lambton, consisting of about 25 acres and in March of 1968 registered a plan of subdivision of that parcel as no. 567 in the Registry Division of Lambton. As a condition of such registration Atkinson entered into an agreement with the Village for the installation of municipal services on the land comprised in POURVOI à l'encontre d'un arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario[1], qui a accueilli un appel d'un jugement de la Cour divisionnaire qui avait annulé les règlements municipaux en question sur une demande d'examen judiciaire.

J. Edgar Sexton, c.r., et Brian Morgan, pour l'appelante.

Lyle F. Curran, c.r., pour l'intimée.

Version française du jugement du juge en chef Laskin et des juges Martland, Beetz, Estey et Chouinard rendu par

LE JUGE ESTEY—L'appelante conteste un ordre de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario qui a confirmé la validité de deux règlements de la municipalité intimée, les règlements n°s 6 et 7, adoptés par le Conseil du village en 1975 et 1976. Le litige porte sur l'interprétation de l'art. 29 de The Planning Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 349, et sur la compétence ou le pouvoir des tribunaux en vertu de The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971, 1971 (Ont.), chap. 48. Dans le récit des faits essentiels de ce litige, l'appelante sera appelée Homex et la municipalité intimée le Village ou le Conseil.

Un nommé Atkinson était propriétaire d'un terrain d'une superficie d'environ 25 acres dans le village de Wyoming, comté de Lambton; en mars 1968 il a enregistré un plan de lotissement de ce terrain sous le numéro 567 de la Division d'enregistrement de Lambton. Conformément à une condition de cet enregistrement, Atkinson a conclu une convention avec le Village pour l'installation this subdivision. This agreement was dated January 22, 1968 but was not registered until September 26, 1975 perhaps because it was not until sometime in 1973 that The Planning Act, supra, was amended to provide for the registration of such subdivision agreements and for their enforceability against subsequent owners of the land. This agreement provided in a general way for the provision by Atkinson, the owner, of "all the requirements, financial and otherwise, of the Corporation re surfacing of roads, installation of services and drainage".

Before any services were installed on this subdivision, Homex entered into an agreement with Atkinson for the purchase of 25 lots on the subdivision and this agreement was performed by the delivery by Atkinson to Homex of a deed to which, pursuant to the subdivision agreement, the Village consented. This deed was registered in May 1973. Atkinson, the vendor, retained three lots on the subdivision. Some time prior to the sale by Atkinson to Homex, Atkinson had conveyed to the Village two lots pursuant to the subdivision agreement. There are two lots on the subdivision owned by third parties not involved in this litigation. There is some dispute as to whether Homex was to be bound by and to perform the subdivision agreement on behalf of Atkinson. In the original documentation filed in the Supreme Court of Ontario there is to be found an affidavit completed by Norman Redick, the president of Homex, and sworn on July 28, 1976 and which affidavit is referred to in the notice of motion for judicial review. In the record filed before this Court, such an affidavit appears and paragraph 4 thereof states in part as follows:

> No mention was made in this deed [from Atkinson to Homex] of the assumption by Homex of any of the obligations of Atkinson under the subdivision agreement made by him with the Village nor did Homex assent to any such assumption at such time.

However, in Appendix A of the respondent's factum, there is set forth a page 2 of an affidavit sworn by the president of Homex and filed before the Divisional Court and the Court of Appeal which states in part as follows:

des services d'utilité publique sur ce lotissement. Cette convention était datée du 22 janvier 1968 mais n'a pas été enregistrée avant le 26 septembre 1975, peut-être parce que ce n'est qu'au cours de 1973 que The Planning Act, précitée, a été modifiée pour imposer l'enregistrement des conventions de lotissement de cette nature et leur opposabilité aux propriétaires du terrain. Cette convention prévoyait en termes généraux qu'Atkinson, le propriétaire, s'acquitterait de [TRADUCTION] «toutes les exigences, financières ou autres, de la Municipalité relativement au revêtement des routes, à l'installation des services d'utilité et au drainage».

Avant même l'installation d'un de ces services sur ce lotissement, Homex a obtenu d'Atkinson une promesse de vente de 25 lots du lotissement à laquelle Atkinson a donné suite en délivrant à Homex un acte de vente auquel le Village a donné son approbation conformément à la convention de lotissement. Le contrat a été enregistré en mai 1973. Atkinson, le vendeur, demeurait propriétaire de trois lots de ce lotissement. Quelque temps avant la vente intervenue entre Atkinson et Homex, Atkinson avait cédé deux lots au Village conformément à la convention de lotissement. Deux lots de ce lotissement appartiennent à des tiers qui ne sont pas parties à ce litige. Il y a divergence d'opinions sur la question de savoir si Homex est liée par la convention de lotissement conclue par Atkinson et doit s'y conformer. Dans la documentation originale déposée devant la Cour suprême de l'Ontario, il y a un affidavit de Norman Redick, président d'Homex, fait sous serment le 28 juillet 1976, lequel est mentionné dans l'avis de demande d'examen judiciaire. Cet affidavit fait partie du dossier déposé devant cette Cour et voici le texte de son paragraphe 4:

Cependant, à l'annexe A du mémoire de l'intimée, se trouve la page 2 d'un affidavit du président d'Homex déposé devant la Cour divisionnaire et la Cour d'appel où il déclare notamment:

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

4. That by this agreement Homex agreed to assume the obligation of Atkinson under a subdivision agreement made by him with the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming regarding park allowance. A copy of this subdivision agreement was registered against the lands of Homex by the Town Solicitor, William M'Clean Dawson, on September 25, 1975, with registration number 375351.

An examination of the original documentation filed on this appeal in this Court reveals that the affidavit, completed by Redick as president, was filed in support of the application for judicial review in the Divisional Court and forwarded to the Court of Appeal for the hearing of the appeal in the Divisional Court. It sets out as page 2 thereof the excerpt of the affidavit I have copied above from the respondent's factum. In what appears to be an explanation for this discrepancy, counsel for the respondent in his factum states:

> That affidavit [being the excerpt copied above in which Homex agreed to assume at least some of the obligations of the subdivision agreement] was filed by the Appellant's then solicitor by mistake; however, it is submitted that it is an accurate statement as to Homex's agreement with Atkinson.

It is strange indeed that what purports to be the original affidavit appended to the originating notice of motion has a retyped page 2 setting forth the affidavit which appears in the record filed in this Court. This page 2 has obviously been typed on a different typewriter, appears in double space as compared to the single spacing of the balance of the affidavit, and the insert alone has been initialled only by the person (signature illegible) who took the affidavit of Mr. Redick. The mystery is deepened by the fact that the jurat does not reveal any date of re-execution of the affidavit. I have no hesitation in finding for the purposes of disposing of this appeal that the affidavit in support of the application for judicial review was as filed in its original form and, should it become important to the disposition of this appeal, I would without hesitation find that on the record the president of Homex indeed had knowledge of the existence and the content of the subdivision agreement between Atkinson and the Village dated January 26, 1970 and that Homex, through its president, undertook to assume the obligations of Atkinson thereunder.

L'examen de la documentation originale déposée en vue du pourvoi devant cette Cour révèle que l'affidavit, signé par Redick en sa qualité de président, a été déposé à l'appui de la demande d'examen judiciaire devant la Cour divisionnaire et acheminé à la Cour d'appel pour l'audition de l'appel. Elle reproduit la page 2 de l'affidavit précité tiré du mémoire de l'intimée. Dans ce qui paraît être une explication à cette contradiction, l'avocat de l'intimée déclare dans son mémoire:

> [TRADUCTION] Cet affidavit [soit l'extrait déjà cité par lequel Homex accepte d'assumer au moins certaines des obligations de la convention de lotissement] a été déposé par erreur par le procureur de l'appelante à l'époque; toutefois, nous soutenons que c'est là une affirmation exacte quant à la convention entre Homex et Atkinson.

Il est étrange en réalité que le document qui se veut l'affidavit original annexé à l'avis de requête introductif d'instance comprenne une page 2 retapée qui correspond à l'affidavit versé au dossier déposé devant cette Cour. Cette page 2 a manifestement été dactylographiée sur une machine à écrire différente, à interligne double contrairement à l'interligne simple utilisé dans le reste de l'affidavit, et seule l'insertion porte les initiales de la personne (dont la signature est illisible) qui a reçu l'affidavit de M. Redick. Le mystère devient encore plus profond du fait que la formule d'authentification ne révèle aucune date de nouvelle signature de l'affidavit. Je n'ai aucune hésitation à conclure aux fins de ce pourvoi que l'affidavit à l'appui de la demande d'examen judiciaire est celui qui a été déposé dans sa forme originale et, si cela devenait important pour trancher ce pourvoi, je concluerais sans hésiter que, selon la preuve au dossier, le président d'Homex connaissait effectivement l'existence et le contenu de la convention de lotissement intervenue le 26 janvier 1970 entre Atkinson et le Village et que, par l'intermédiaire

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

I come to this conclusion as regards the entire contents of the agreement notwithstanding the limitation in the offer to purchase of the incorporated terms of the agreement to those regarding the "park allowance". This handwritten excerpt seems to me to read as follows:

> present. subdivision agreement with the Village. regards. park allowance to be accepted by the purchaser. Wire[?] fence to be erected jointly with the purchaser and vendor.

As to the agreement itself, it was signed on behalf of Homex by Redick who then witnessed his own signature, and finally witnessed the execution of the agreement by the vendor. After the agreement was executed, Homex obtained the consent of the Village on March 23, 1970 to the conveyance of these lands from Atkinson to Homex. In his affidavit of uncertain date, the president of Homex says that "no reference is made in the deed" to the subdivision agreement. However, it hardly can be said that Homex in these circumstances was unaware of the existence of such an agreement. If one need further support for such a conclusion, it is to be found in the affidavit of the vendor, Atkinson, where he says in part that Redick was "well acquainted with the requirements and details" of the agreement before the contract was entered into between Homex and Atkinson; and that it was "clearly understood between him and me before the said contract was made that Homex would be responsible for satisfying the requirements of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming . . .". The affidavit went on to state that for so undertaking the obligations of Atkinson, Homex was accorded a reduction in price of $5,000. This affidavit was not answered by Homex nor was Atkinson cross-examined upon it. The Court of Appeal concluded (and with respect I agree) that Homex knew of the services agreement at the time of the conveyance of the land to Homex. The Divisional Court made no finding on this matter.

The subdivision agreement between Atkinson and the Village entered into prior to the registration of plan of subdivision 567 provided in part:

de son président, Homex a assumé les obligations qu'avait Atkinson aux termes de cette convention. Je parviens à cette conclusion sur le contenu intégral de la convention bien que, dans l'offre d'achat, on se soit limité à incorporer les dispositions de la convention relatives à la «réserve pour un parc». L'extrait manuscrit me semble se lire comme suit:

> [TRADUCTION] présente. convention de lotissement avec le Village. concerne. réserve pour un parc devant être acceptée par l'acheteur. clôture en fil métallique[?] devant être installée conjointement par l'acheteur et le vendeur.

Quant à la convention elle-même, elle a été signée au nom d'Homex par Redick qui a ensuite apposé sa propre signature et a finalement servi de témoin à la signature de l'acte par le vendeur. Après la signature, Homex a obtenu le 23 mars 1970 que le Village approuve le transfert des terrains d'Atkinson à Homex. Dans son affidavit dont la date n'est pas déterminée, le président d'Homex déclare qu' [TRADUCTION] «aucune mention n'est faite dans l'acte de vente» de la convention de lotissement. Cependant, on peut difficilement dire que dans ces circonstances Homex ignorait l'existence d'une telle convention. Si une preuve supplémentaire à l'appui de cette conclusion est nécessaire, on la trouve dans l'affidavit du vendeur, Atkinson, où il dit notamment que Redick était [TRADUCTION] «bien au courant des exigences et des détails» de la convention avant la signature du contrat entre Homex et Atkinson; et qu'il était [TRADUCTION] «clairement entendu entre nous avant la signature du contrat qu'Homex devrait satisfaire aux exigences de la municipalité du village de Wyoming . . .». Plus loin l'affidavit relate qu'un rabais de $5,000 a été accordé à Homex puisqu'elle assumait les obligations d'Atkinson. Homex n'a pas répondu à cet affidavit et Atkinson n'a pas été contre-interrogé à ce sujet. La Cour d'appel a conclu (et, avec égards je souscris à cette opinion) qu'Homex était au courant de la convention relative à l'installation des services au moment où les terrains lui ont été transférés. La Cour divisionnaire ne s'est pas prononcée sur cette question.

La convention de lotissement intervenue entre Atkinson et le Village avant l'enregistrement du plan de lotissement 567 prévoit en partie:

619

The Owner hereby covenants and agrees with the Corporation to satisfy all the requirements, financial and otherwise, of the Corporation re surfacing of roads, installation of services and drainage.

There is no specific reference to the engineering specifications for the work to be done in connection with the installation of roads and services, nor is there any reference to the requirements for park allowances which were referred to in the agreement of sale to Homex. The contract prohibits the sale of any of the lands in question by Atkinson until the agreement has been fully carried out except on the consent of the Village, but such provision does not provide that the consent will operate to release Atkinson from his obligation to the Village.

Before proceeding further with the narrative, it is important to pause and observe that at this stage of events Homex was the owner of all the lots in the subdivision fronting on Norman Street, except two lots which had been conveyed by Atkinson to the Village and two other lots owned by third parties which fronted on another street which had already been serviced, and no issue arises herein with respect to those two lots. The lots retained by the vendor, Atkinson, do not front on Norman Street. The waterline was installed by Homex on Norman Street and the other services and installations mentioned in the subdivision agreement were to be installed on that street but in fact were not so installed.

After the sale to Homex by Atkinson was completed negotiations ensued between the Village and Homex for the installation of services on this plan of subdivision.

These negotiations between Homex and the Village proved abortive although numerous documents were proffered by the Village. In his cross-examination on his affidavit, Redick perhaps reveals the reason why these protracted negotiations came to nought when he stated:

Q. That's what you really want. Everything to be done on local improvement?

A. I think it should be done that way in this case.

[TRADUCTION] Le propriétaire s'engage par les présentes envers la Municipalité à satisfaire à toutes les exigences, financières ou autres, de la Municipalité relativement au revêtement des routes, à l'installation des services d'utilité publique et au drainage.

Il n'y a pas de mention particulière des spécifications de construction pour les travaux à effectuer relativement à l'installation des routes et des services d'utilité publique, ni aucune mention des exigences relatives à la réserve pour un parc dont il est question dans la promesse de vente à Homex. Le contrat interdit à Atkinson de vendre les terrains en question avant que la convention ait été entièrement exécutée, sauf avec l'approbation du Village, mais cette disposition ne prévoit pas que le consentement libérera Atkinson de son obligation envers le Village.

Avant de poursuivre cette narration, il est important de s'arrêter pour remarquer qu'à ce stade des événements, Homex était propriétaire de tous les lots donnant sur la rue Norman, à l'exception de deux lots qu'Atkinson avait cédés au Village et de deux autres terrains appartenant à des tiers et qui donnaient sur une autre rue déjà viabilisée; ces deux derniers ne sont pas en litige ici. Les terrains conservés par le vendeur Atkinson ne donnent pas sur la rue Norman. La conduite d'eau a été installée par Homex rue Norman et les autres services et installations mentionnés dans la convention de lotissement devaient y être installés, mais ils ne l'ont pas été.

Après la vente par Atkinson à Homex, les négociations se sont poursuivies entre le Village et Homex pour l'installation des services d'utilité publique sur ce lotissement.

Ces négociations n'ont pas abouti bien que le Village ait soumis de nombreux documents. Lorsqu'il a été contre-interrogé sur son affidavit, Redick a peut-être révélé la raison de l'échec de ces négociations lorsqu'il dit:

[TRADUCTION] Q. C'est ce que vous désirez vraiment. Tout devrait être fait à titre d'amélioration de quartier?

R. Je crois que c'est ainsi qu'il aurait fallu le faire en l'espèce.

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

Q. Yes. That's your proposal?

A. I think it should be done that way.

If it be relevant to the outcome of these proceedings, the conclusion must be reached from an examination of the record, and particularly the cross-examination of the president of Homex, that Homex had indeed purchased these lands from Atkinson with the intention at the time, or thereafter acquired, of conveying the lots on this subdivision without the installation of any services so as to leave to the Village and the other inhabitants thereof the cost of providing these services on some basis or other, but not at the expense of Homex.

After the negotiations between the parties (which spread over a period of a year and a half) with respect to the installation of services had proved fruitless, the Village, without any notice to Homex, enacted by-law no. 7 on April 1, 1976 pursuant to s. 29(3) of The Planning Act, supra, whereby the parts of registered plan no. 567 indicated in the by-law (and being those lots purchased by Homex) are hereby designated as parts which shall be deemed not to be a registered plan of subdivision for the purposes of subsection (2) of Section 29 of The Planning Act.

In September 1976 Homex made application by way of judicial review for an order quashing by-law 7. While this application was pending before the Divisional Court, Homex checkerboarded the lots received by it from Atkinson on plan 567. By checkerboarding, reference is made to the procedure discussed in detail in Re Herman et al. and Kalbfleisch et al.[2] and Reference re Certain Titles to Land in Ontario[3] and adopted by conveyancers on occasion in the Province of Ontario to escape the strictures of The Planning Act, supra. By this technique, Homex conveyed to a series of third parties, including Robert C. Redick, Norman C. Redick, Orville A. Redick, Daniel J. Redick, and others, so many lots as were necessary to produce a situation in which neither Homex nor any other single registered owner, other than the vendor Atkinson and the Village, held contiguous

[2] [1972] 2 O.R. 720.

[3] [1973] 2 O.R. 613 (C.A.)

Q. Oui. C'est là votre proposition?

R. Je crois que cela pourrait être fait ainsi.

Si cela est pertinent à l'issue de cette affaire, il faut conclure d'après l'examen de la preuve, et en particulier du contre-interrogatoire du président d'Homex, qu'Homex avait effectivement acheté ces terrains à Atkinson dans l'intention à l'époque, ou après l'achat, de vendre les lots du lotissement sans les viabiliser de sorte que le Village et les autres habitants aient à assumer le coût de l'installation de ces services d'une façon ou d'une autre, sans que ce soit aux frais d'Homex.

Après l'échec des négociations entre les parties relativement à l'installation des services (elles se sont poursuivies pendant une année et demie), le Village, sans donner d'avis à Homex, a adopté le règlement nº 7 le 1er avril 1976 en vertu du par. 29(3) de The Planning Act, précitée, aux termes duquel les parties du plan enregistré nº 567 désignées dans le règlement (soit les terrains achetés par Homex) [TRADUCTION] sont par les présentes désignées comme des parties qui ne sont pas réputées un plan de lotissement enregistré aux fins du par. 29(2) de The Planning Act.

En septembre 1976 Homex a présenté une demande d'examen judiciaire pour faire annuler le règlement 7. Alors que cette demande était pendante devant la Cour divisionnaire, Homex a morcelé en damier les lots du plan 567 qu'elle avait achetés à Atkinson. Par ce morcellement, on désigne la procédure analysée en détail dans Re Herman et al. and Kalbfleisch et al.[2] et Reference re Certain Titles to Land in Ontario[3] et adoptée à l'occasion par des experts en transfert de propriété en Ontario pour échapper aux rigueurs de The Planning Act, précitée. Par cette technique, Homex a transféré à plusieurs tiers, dont Robert C. Redick, Norman C. Redick, Orville A. Redick, Daniel J. Redick et à d'autres, le nombre de lots nécessaires pour que, mis à part le vendeur Atkinson et le Village, ni Homex ni aucun autre propriétaire enregistré ne soient propriétaires de deux lots lots on this plan of subdivision. Thus if by-law 7 be ineffective so that plan of subdivision 567 remains fully registered under The Planning Act, supra, and The Registry Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 409, then Homex has apparently so arranged its land holdings as to make it immune from further regulations which may be adopted by the Village under The Municipal Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 284, with regard to the lots held by and for it on plan 567. On the other hand, if by-law 7 is effective, then the attempt to checkerboard has failed and Homex will be unable to convey, without further permission from the Village, any of its holdings on plan 567. I pause to point out that this rather unusual record is silent as to what declarations of trust, if any, are extant between the registered owners of some of the lots on 567 and Homex. The affidavit of one Catherine Clark Dawson simply sets out the state of the abstract of title as it existed on some date prior to the date her affidavit was taken, being September 6, 1977. The statement is made by the respondent in its factum that the lands were checkerboarded by Homex prior to the hearing of the application by the Divisional Court. This statement remains unanswered by the appellant and I take it, for the purposes of disposing of this appeal, that these lands were indeed so checkerboarded.

Almost as a sidelight to this main activity, Homex and the Village, in November 1975, entered into discussions concerning the installation of a water line on Norman Street which, as already stated, is the only street on the subdivision requiring services, and on which front the lots checkerboarded by Homex. The record contains a letter dated November 7, 1975 from the Village to Norman Redick, presumably in his capacity as president of Homex, answering a letter from him which is not in the record, and advising Redick of a decision reached by the Council of the Village:

> in regards to the installation of the 6″ water line and fire Hydrant [sic].

Their decision as follows: "That council reply to the letter from N. Redick, giving him the privelege [sic] of installing a watermain on Norman Street, providing he assures council in writing that no further services are contigus de ce lotissement. Ainsi, si le règlement 7 est invalide de sorte que le plan 567 demeure entièrement enregistré aux termes de The Planning Act, précitée, et The Registry Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 409, alors Homex a apparemment manipulé de telle façon ses droits de propriété qu'elle ne peut être visée par d'autres règlements que le Village peut adopter sous le régime de The Municipal Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 284 relativement aux lots du plan 567 qu'elle détient ou qu'on détient en son nom. Par ailleurs, si le règlement 7 est valide, alors la tentative de morcellement en damier a échoué et Homex sera incapable de transférer ses lots du plan 567 sans y être à nouveau autorisée par le Village. Je m'arrête pour faire remarquer que ce dossier plutôt inhabituel ne fournit aucun renseignement sur les déclarations de fiducie qui peuvent exister entre les propriétaires enregistrés de certains des lots du plan 567 et Homex. L'affidavit de Catherine Clark Dawson ne fait que reproduire l'extrait du registre tel qu'il existait avant la date de son affidavit, soit le 6 septembre 1977. L'intimée déclare dans son mémoire qu'Homex a morcelé les lots en damier avant l'audition de la demande par la Cour divisionnaire. L'appelante n'a pas répondu à cette déclaration et je considère, aux fins de ce pourvoi, que ces lots ont effectivement été morcelés en damier.

Presque accessoirement à cette activité principale, Homex et le Village ont engagé des pourparlers en novembre 1975, concernant l'installation d'une conduite d'eau rue Norman qui, je l'ai déjà dit, est la seule rue du lotissement à viabiliser, et c'est sur cette rue que donnent les lots morcelés en damier par Homex. Le dossier contient une lettre datée du 7 novembre 1975 adressée par le Village à Norman Redick, présumément en sa qualité de président d'Homex, en réponse à une lettre de ce dernier qui n'est pas au dossier, l'informant d'une décision prise par le Conseil du village:

> [TRADUCTION] relativement à l'installation de la conduite d'eau de 6 pouces de diamètre et des bornes d'incendie.

Voici leur décision: «Que le conseil réponde à la lettre de N. Redick, lui donnant le privilège d'installer une conduite d'eau principale rue Norman à la condition qu'il garantisse par écrit au conseil que nul autre service installed without signing an agreement with the village; the granting of such privelege [sic] shall in no way constitute a complete subdivision agreement, nor shall it inhibit the reopening of negotiations with Mr. Redick".

Thereafter the Village Council enacted by-law no. 6 on December 29, 1975 without any further notice to or dealings with Homex in the matter. After a recital of a request by Homex for permission to install a water pipeline on Norman Street, paragraph 2 of by-law no. 6 provides:

2. It is the policy of the Council of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming that the said water pipe line in Norman Street from Superior Street to approximately the north limit of Lot 7 according to said Plan 567 shall not be assumed or taken over by the Corporation and no connection shall be permitted to be made to the said water pipe line and no water shall be supplied through the said water pipe line and the said water pipe line shall not form part of the municipal water supply system of the Village of Wyoming until authorized by a futher [sic] by-law of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming.

Homex coupled an application in judicial review to quash this by-law with the application already mentioned for an order quashing by-law no. 7.

Although some of the issues herein raised are common to both by-laws 6 and 7, the larger question arises concerning the latter by-law and I therefore first deal with the validity of by-law no. 7.

The provisions in The Planning Act, supra, relating to the conveyance of land are found in s. 29, of which subss. (2) and (3) are here relevant:

(2) No person shall convey land by way of a deed or transfer, or grant, assign or exercise a power of appointment with respect to land, or mortgage or charge land, or enter into an agreement of sale and purchase of land or enter into any agreement that has the effect of granting the use of or right in land directly or by entitlement to renewal for a period of twenty-one years or more unless,

(a) the land is described in accordance with and is within a registered plan of subdivision; or d'utilité publique ne sera installé tant qu'une convention ne sera pas signée avec le Village; l'octroi de ce privilège [sic] ne doit en aucune façon constituer une convention complète de lotissement ni ne doit empêcher la reprise des négociations avec M. Redick».

Par la suite le Conseil du village a adopté le règlement nº 6 le 29 décembre 1975 sans donner de préavis à Homex ni discuter avec elle de la question. Après avoir énoncé la demande de permission présentée par Homex, pour installer une conduite d'eau rue Norman, le paragraphe 2 du règlement nº 6 dispose:

[TRADUCTION] 2. C'est la politique du Conseil de la municipalité du village de Wyoming que la conduite d'eau rue Norman, depuis la rue Superior jusqu'aux abords de la limite nord du lot 7, suivant le plan 567, ne soit pas prise en charge par la Municipalité et qu'aucun raccordement à la conduite d'eau ne soit autorisé, que cette conduite d'eau ne puisse servir à l'aqueduc et qu'elle ne fasse pas partie du réseau municipal d'aqueduc du village de Wyoming avant qu'un autre règlement de la municipalité du village de Wyoming ne l'autorise.

Homex a présenté une demande d'examen judiciaire pour faire annuler ce règlement en même temps que la demande déjà mentionnée visant à obtenir l'annulation du règlement nº 7.

Bien que certaines des questions soulevées ici soient communes aux règlements 6 et 7, la question la plus importante concerne ce dernier règlement; par conséquent, j'examinerai d'abord la validité du règlement 7.

Les dispositions pertinentes en l'espèce de The Planning Act, précitée, sont les par. 29(2) et (3) concernant le transfert de terrains:

[TRADUCTION] Nul ne doit céder un bien-fonds par acte ou transfert, ni accorder, assigner ou exercer un mandat de désignation relativement à un bien-fonds, ni hypothéquer ou grever un bien-fonds, ni conclure une promesse de vente d'un bien-fonds ou une entente dont l'effet est d'accorder un droit d'usage ou autre sur un bien-fonds, que cela soit fait directement ou par clause de renouvellement pour une période de vingt et un ans ou plus, à moins que

a) le bien-fonds ne soit décrit conformément à un plan de lotissement enregistré dont il fait partie; ou

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

(b) the grantor by deed or transfer, the person granting, assigning or exercising a power of appointment, the mortgagor or chargor, the vendor under an agreement of purchase and sale or the grantor of a use of or right in land, as the case may be, does not retain the fee or the equity of redemption in, or a power or right to grant, assign or exercise a power of appointment with respect to, any land abutting the land that is being conveyed or otherwise dealt with; or

(c) and (d)—not here applicable

(e) a consent is given to convey, mortgage or charge the land, or grant, assign or exercise a power of appointment with respect to the land or enter into an agreement with respect to the land.

(3) The council of a municipality may by by-law designate any plan of subdivision, or part thereof, that has been registered for eight years or more, which shall be deemed not to be a registered plan of subdivision for the purposes of subsection 2.

Subsection (3) does not expressly require notice before the passage of any by-law authorized by the subsection, nor does the terminology of the subsection raise any necessary implication of a requirement of notice. Subsections (8), (9), (10) and (11) may be of some assistance in construing subs. (3), particularly as to whether it requires the giving of notice prior to the passage of a by-law such as by-law no. 7.

(8) A certified copy or duplicate of every by-law passed under subsection 3 shall be lodged by the clerk of the municipality in the office of the Minister.

(9) A by-law passed under subsection 3 is not effective until the requirements of subsections 10 and 11 have been complied with.

(10) A certified copy or duplicate of every by-law passed under this section shall be registered by the clerk of the municipality in the proper registry or land titles office.

(11) The clerk of the municipality shall send by registered mail notice of the passing of a by-law under subsection 3 to each person appearing by the last revised assessment roll to be the owner of land to which the by-law applies, which notice shall be sent to the last known address of each such person.

b) le cédant par acte ou transfert, la personne qui accorde, assigne ou exerce un mandat de désignation, le débiteur hypothécaire ou la personne qui a grevé le bien-fonds, le vendeur aux termes d'une promesse de vente ou le cédant d'un droit d'usage ou autre sur un bien-fonds, suivant le cas, ne retienne pas le droit de propriété ou le droit de rachat, ou un pouvoir ou droit d'accorder, d'assigner ou d'exercer un mandat de désignation relativement à un bien-fonds adjacent au bien-fonds qui est ainsi cédé ou qui est autrement visé; ou

c) et d)—non applicables en l'espèce.

e) un consentement ne soit donné pour céder, hypothéquer ou grever le bien-fonds, ou pour accorder, assigner ou exercer un mandat de désignation relativement au bien-fonds ou pour conclure une entente relative au bien-fonds.

(3) Le conseil d'une municipalité peut, par règlement, désigner un plan de lotissement, ou une partie de celui-ci, qui est enregistré depuis au moins huit ans, de façon qu'il soit réputé ne pas être un plan enregistré de lotissement aux fins du paragraphe (2).

Le paragraphe (3) n'exige pas expressément un avis avant l'adoption d'un règlement qu'il autorise et le texte du paragraphe ne permet pas de conclure à l'exigence implicite d'un avis. Les paragraphes (8), (9), (10) et (11) peuvent être utiles à l'interprétation du par. (3), surtout pour déterminer si un avis est nécessaire avant l'adoption d'un règlement tel le règlement n° 7.

[TRADUCTION] (8) Le secrétaire de la municipalité doit déposer au bureau du Ministre une copie ou un double certifié de chaque règlement adopté en vertu du paragraphe 3.

(9) Un règlement adopté en vertu du paragraphe 3 n'entre pas en vigueur avant que les exigences des paragraphes 10 et 11 aient été remplies.

(10) Le secrétaire de la municipalité doit porter au registre approprié ou déposer au bureau d'enregistrement des titres de biens-fonds une copie ou un double certifié de chaque règlement adopté en vertu du présent article.

(11) Le secrétaire de la municipalité doit envoyer par courrier recommandé avis de l'adoption d'un règlement en vertu du paragraphe 3 à chaque personne que le dernier rôle révisé d'évaluation désigne comme propriétaire du biens-fonds auquel s'applique le règlement, et ce à la dernière adresse connue de chacune de ces personnes.

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

Subsection (11) would indicate that the question of notice was of concern to the legislators and perhaps might be construed as indicating that, having expressly considered the question, the only notice prescribed is a notice after the passage of the by-law which, by subs. (9), is a condition precedent to the effectiveness of the by-law.

It should be noted that by an amendment to The Planning Act, supra, brought into effect by 1978 (Ont.), c. 93, s. 2(4), subss. 9 and 11 were repealed and the substituted sections deliberately and expressly provide that a notice is not a condition precedent to the effectiveness of a by-law passed under subs. (3); and a further procedure is prescribed for the hearing of persons who complain within a prescribed time after receipt of notice under subs. (11). Section 17 of The Interpretation Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 225, provides:

> The repeal or amendment of an Act shall be deemed not to be or to involve any declaration as to the previous state of the law.

The courts of course are concerned only with the state of the rights of the parties under the statute as it existed at the time of the passage of the by-law, and accordingly the interpretation of s. 29(3) as it then stood is not affected by subsequent legislative action.

The courts long ago developed the general proposition that wherever a statute authorizes the interference with property or other rights and is silent as to whether or not the agency in question is required to give notice prior to the intervention in such rights, the courts will "supply the omission of the legislature" and require the agency in question to afford the subject an opportunity of being heard before it proceeds: Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works[4]; S.A. de Smith, Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 4th ed., at p. 161. Whether or not the courts today will invoke this principle of interpretation may depend upon the nature of the action being undertaken by a body such as a municipal council. There are instances where the omission of the prerequisite notice is not supplied

[4] (1863), 14 C.B. (N.S.) 180.

Le paragraphe (11) semble indiquer que le législateur s'est préoccupé de la question de l'avis et une interprétation possible de ce paragraphe serait que, après avoir expressément considéré la question, seul est prescrit un avis postérieur à l'adoption du règlement, lequel avis est, aux termes du par. (9), une condition de son entrée en vigueur.

Il faudrait remarquer que par une modification à The Planning Act, précitée, apportée par 1978 (Ont.), chap. 93, par. 2(4), les par. (9) et (11) ont été abrogés et que les dispositions qui les remplacent prévoient précisément et expressément qu'un avis n'est pas une condition de l'entrée en vigueur d'un règlement adopté en vertu du par. (3); une autre procédure est prévue pour que soient entendues les personnes qui portent plainte dans un délai prescrit après la réception de l'avis visé au par. (11). L'article 17 de The Interpretation Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 225 prévoit:

> [TRADUCTION] L'abrogation ou la modification d'une loi n'est pas réputée constituer ni impliquer une déclaration quelconque sur l'état antérieur du droit.

Bien sûr les tribunaux ne sont concernés que par l'état des droits des parties en vertu de la loi telle qu'elle existait au moment de l'adoption du règlement et, par conséquent, l'interprétation du par. 29(3) tel qu'il existait alors, n'est pas touchée par une mesure législative subséquente.

Les tribunaux ont formulé il y a longtemps la proposition générale que lorsqu'une loi permet de toucher les droits de propriété ou autres droits et ne dit pas si l'organisme en question doit donner un avis avant d'agir, ils [TRADUCTION] «remédieront à l'omission du législateur» et exigeront que l'organisme en question accorde au citoyen la possibilité de se faire entendre avant d'agir: Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works[4]; S.A. de Smith, Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 4e éd., à la p. 161. La question de savoir si les tribunaux invoqueront ce principe d'interprétation aujourd'hui peut dépendre de la nature de l'action entreprise par un organisme tel un conseil municipal. Dans certains cas, les tribunaux ne remédieront pas à l'absence de préavis, par exemple lorsqu'on by the courts, as, for example, where the statute in question, by its very nature and by the legislative framework there adopted by the Legislature, must be read as precluding the requirement of prior notice. The Ontario Court of Appeal, for example, in Bishop v. Ontario Securities Commission[5], so construed s. 19 of The Securities Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 363. Roach J.A., in speaking for the Court, stated:

> The whole purpose of the Act might be defeated if the chairman could make an order or ruling under that section only on notice to the person or company affected and after a hearing. Many days might elapse between the giving of the notice to the persons or company sought to be affected and the conclusion of the hearing during which time those persons or that company if dishonest and disreputable could continue to prey upon the public and plunder and fleece many people. For that reason it was essential to the purpose of the Act that the chairman should be empowered to act promptly and without notice to the person or company sought to be affected. The chairman's first duty is to the public and in empowering him to discharge that duty the Legislature has by appropriate legislation at the same time protected the person or company affected by the order by giving to him on it at their election the right to have the order reviewed by the Commission. (at p. 23)

The Planning Act of Manitoba (1975 (Man.), c. 29) contained at the time in question a provision identical to s. 29 (11). Subsequently, the Manitoba statute was amended (1977 (Man.), c. 35, s. 34) to prescribe a notice to affected parties as a condition precedential to the validity of a by-law enacted pursuant to a provision comparable to s. 29(3) of the Ontario statute. The effect of this amendment is precisely the opposite to that of the 1978 Ontario amendment. Prior to the adoption by the Manitoba Legislature of the 1977 amendment, the Court of Appeal in Re Buhler and Rural Municipality of Stanley[6] found that a by-law passed without notice was invalid and therefore quashed, not, however, by reason of the lack of notice but rather on the basis of bad faith in which the courts found the council to have acted.

doit interpréter la loi en question, par sa nature même et dans le cadre législatif adopté par le législateur, de façon à écarter l'exigence d'un préavis. C'est ainsi par exemple que la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a interprété l'art. 19 de The Securities Act, R.S.O. 1960, chap. 363, dans l'arrêt Bishop v. Ontario Securities Commission[5]. Le juge Roach qui exprimait l'opinion de la Cour, a dit:

> [TRADUCTION] On pourrait mettre en échec l'économie générale de la Loi si le président pouvait rendre une ordonnance ou une décision en vertu de cet article seulement après avoir donné un avis à la personne ou à la compagnie touchée et après audition. Plusieurs jours pourraient s'écouler entre la signification de l'avis aux personnes ou à la compagnie visées et la fin de l'audition et, pendant ce temps, les personnes ou la compagnie, si elles sont malhonnêtes et louches, pourraient continuer de s'attaquer au public, de voler et de dépouiller les gens. Pour cette raison, il est essentiel aux fins de la Loi que le président puisse agir promptement et sans devoir donner d'avis à la personne ou à la compagnie visée. Le président a au premier chef une obligation envers le public et, en lui permettant de s'en acquitter, le législateur a, par la même occasion au moyen d'une loi appropriée, protégé la personne ou la compagnie visée par l'ordonnance en lui permettant d'en appeler devant la Commission. (à la p. 23)

A l'époque qui nous intéresse ici, The Planning Act du Manitoba (1975 (Man.), chap. 29) contenait une disposition identique au par. 29(11). Par la suite, la loi manitobaine a été modifiée (1977 (Man.), chap. 35, art. 34) pour imposer un avis aux personnes visées comme condition préalable à la validité du règlement adopté en vertu d'une disposition comparable au par. 29(3) de la loi ontarienne. L'effet de cette modification est tout à fait opposé à celui de la modification adoptée en Ontario en 1978. Avant l'adoption de la modification de 1977 par la législature du Manitoba, la Cour d'appel dans Re Buhler and Rural Municipality of Stanley[6], a jugé qu'un règlement adopté sans avis était invalide et l'a donc annulé, non pas cependant en raison de l'absence d'avis mais plutôt en raison de la conclusion de mauvaise foi du conseil à laquelle les tribunaux sont parvenus.

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

In determining the appropriate interpretation applicable to s. 29(3) of The Planning Act, supra, the statutory framework, the nature of the action being undertaken by the Village Council, and the general circumstances prevailing at the time of the action by the Village Council must be taken into account.

The Village Council is, of course, entirely a creature of statute. It derives all its power, its status, its rights as well as its limitations from various provincial legislation of which The Municipal Act, supra, may be said to represent the core. This legislation has assigned a wide range of activities and responsibilities to the municipal council which have been variously categorized by the courts through the years. In some instances the council acts purely as a sub-legislature enacting legislation within the ambit of the authorizing statute for the general governance of the region in respect of which the council is given its statutory authority. In other instances, as for example in the granting or withholding of individual licences pursuant to applications, the courts have classified the municipal activity as "judicial": R. v. Brighton Corporation; Thomas Tilling, Lim., Ex parte[7], and in so exercising their judicial function

> . . . they are bound to act judicially. It is their duty to hear and determine according to law, and they must bring to that task a fair and unbiased mind. (per Sankey J. at p. 1555)

More recently, in R. v. Liverpool Corporation, Ex parte Liverpool Taxi Fleet Operators' Association[8], Lord Denning has stated:

> It is perhaps putting it a little high to say they are exercising judicial functions. They may be said to be exercising an administrative function. But even so, in our modern approach, they must act fairly: and the court will see that they do so. (at p. 308)

This aspect of municipal law is addressed by Laskin J. (as he then was) in Welbridge Holdings Ltd. v. Greater Winnipeg[9], at pp. 968-969:

[7] (1916), 85 L.J.K.B. 1552.
[8] [1972] 2 Q.B. 299.
[9] [1971] S.C.R. 957.

Pour déterminer l'interprétation qu'il faut donner au par. 29(3) de The Planning Act, précitée, il faut tenir compte du cadre législatif, de la nature de l'action entreprise par le Conseil du village et des circonstances particulières qui prévalaient au moment où le Conseil du village a agi.

Bien sûr, le Conseil du village est entièrement une création législative. Tous ses pouvoirs, son statut, ses droits et ses incapacités découlent de diverses lois provinciales dont The Municipal Act, précitée, peut être considérée comme le pivot. Cette loi a confié une grande variété d'activités et de responsabilités à un conseil municipal que les tribunaux ont quatifiées de façon diverse au cours des années. Dans certains cas le conseil agit simplement comme une sous-législature, qui légifère dans le cadre de la loi habilitante pour l'administration générale de la région qui relève de sa compétence. Dans d'autres cas, par exemple lorsqu'il s'agit d'accorder ou de refuser des permis particuliers suite à des demandes, les tribunaux ont qualifié l'activité municipale de «judiciaire»: R. v. Brighton Corporation; Thomas Tilling Lim., Ex parte[7], et dans l'exercice de leurs fonctions judiciaires.

> [TRADUCTION] . . . ils doivent agir judiciairement. Ils ont l'obligation de tenir des auditions et de rendre une décision conformément à la loi et ils doivent agir impartialement. (Le juge Sankey à la p. 1555)

Plus récemment, dans R. v. Liverpool Corporation, Ex parte Liverpool Taxi Fleet Operators' Association[8], lord Denning a dit:

> [TRADUCTION] Il est peut-être un peu exagéré de dire qu'ils exercent des fonctions judiciaires. On peut dire qu'ils exercent une fonction administrative. Mais même là, selon notre façon moderne de voir, ils doivent agir équitablement: et les tribunaux s'assureront qu'il en est ainsi. (à la p. 308)

Le juge Laskin (maintenant Juge en chef) s'est penché sur cet aspect du droit municipal dans l'arrêt Welbridge Holdings Ltd. c. Greater Winnipeg[9], aux pp. 968 et 969:

[7] (1916), 85 L.J.K.B. 1552.

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

The defendant is a municipal corporation with a variety of functions, some legislative, some with also a quasi-judicial component (as the Wiswell case determined) and some administrative or ministerial, or perhaps better categorized as business powers.

A municipality at what may be called the operating level is different in kind from the same municipality at the legislative or quasi-judicial level where it is exercising discretionary statutory authority.

The act of passing by-law 7 is an exercise of the Council's legislative function. En route to that exercise there may have been a decisional process but that factor does not, in my view, alter the characterization at law of the Council's action, or append thereto other consequences at law. This problem was examined in Welbridge, supra, at p. 969 where Laskin J. (as he then was) stated:

> A narrower basis of liability is, however, proposed in the present case, one founded only on the failure to carry out the anterior procedural requirements for the enactment of By-law No. 177. Although those requirements were held in the Wiswell case to be expressions of a quasi-judicial function, this did not mean that the hearing to which they were relevant was a step unrelated to the legislative exercise in which the defendant was engaged.

It is clear that the passage of the by-law, if effective, has stripped Homex of its freedom to exercise the right of conveyance given by the provincial planning statute. On the other hand, it is equally clear that the balance of the township, that is to say the local ratepayers, may well be seriously affected by the action of Homex if the latter is successful in avoiding the consequences of the deregistration of plan 567. One effect would appear to be that the other inhabitants would be obligated in theory, or in fact, or both, to service the lots of subdivision 567 as and when they may be occupied by residences. It was submitted by the respondent that the argument of a notice requirement in these circumstances answers itself. The power granted the Village under s. 29(3) would be defeated by the response in fact taken by Homex in checkerboarding its lands prior to hearing of the application to quash. Thus we have the opposing

La défenderesse est une municipalité ayant des fonctions diverses, certaines législatives, certaines qui comportent aussi un élément quasi judiciaire (comme on l'a statué dans l'affaire Wiswell) et certaines administratives ou ministérielles, auxquelles la désignation de pouvoirs relatifs aux affaires convient peut-être mieux.

Au niveau qu'on pourrait appeler celui des opérations, une municipalité n'est pas la même qu'au niveau législatif ou quasi judiciaire où elle exerce un pouvoir discrétionnaire conféré par la loi.

L'adoption du règlement 7 est un exercice de la fonction législative du Conseil. Il se peut que l'exercice de cette fonction ait exigé une prise de décision mais, à mon avis, ce facteur ne modifie pas la qualification juridique de l'action du Conseil, pas plus qu'il n'y attache d'autres conséquences juridiques. Ce problème a été examiné dans l'affaire Welbridge, précitée, à la p. 969 où le juge Laskin (alors juge puîné) dit:

> Toutefois, en l'espèce, on propose en ce qui concerne la responsabilité une base plus restreinte, le simple défaut de se conformer aux règles de procédure pour l'adoption du règlement municipal n° 177. Même si dans l'arrêt Wiswell, il a été décidé que ces règles se rattachaient à l'exercice d'une fonction quasi judiciaire, cela ne voulait pas dire que l'audition à laquelle elles se rapportaient était indépendante du pouvoir législatif que la demanderesse exerçait.

Il est clair que si le règlement est valide, son adoption a privé Homex de la liberté d'exercer le droit de transfert que lui accorde la loi provinciale d'urbanisme. Par ailleurs, il est tout aussi certain que le reste du canton, c'est-à-dire les contribuables de la localité, pourrait être sérieusement touché par l'action d'Homex si cette dernière réussissait à éviter les conséquences de la cessation de l'enregistrement du plan 567. Ainsi, un des effets serait d'imposer aux autres habitants en théorie, ou en fait, ou selon les deux, de viabiliser les lots du lotissement 567 lors de la construction des habitations. L'intimée a prétendu que dans ces circonstances, l'exigence d'un avis s'explique par elle-même. Si Homex décidait de morceler ses terrains avant l'audition de la demande d'annulation, elle mettrait en échec le pouvoir accordé au Village par le par. 29(3). Ainsi il s'agit des considérations opposées à celles énoncées dans Wands- considerations of Wandsworth, supra, and Bishop, supra.

The Ontario Court of Appeal in Re Zadrevec et al. and Town of Brampton[10] was concerned with the action of a municipal council which, as here, had failed to give notice to affected parties of proposed by-laws rezoning their lands. Such by-laws, before they could become effective in law, required the approval of the Ontario Municipal Board. Prior to that approval an action was taken under The Municipal Act, supra, to have the by-laws in question declared void. The Court found that the Legislature, by imposing the approval of the Board as a condition precedent to the validity of the by-laws, had removed from the Municipal Council and transferred to the Board

> . . . the judicial process which the council in the absence of such transfer would have been required to discharge. (per Kelly J.A. at p. 504);

and continuing at p. 507:

> It is my opinion that the Legislature has indicated its intention that the other provisions it has made relieve the Council of the obligation to act judicially in adopting the amendment to the official plan and that Council, being aware that the procedure it was following would result in an opportunity for all parties to be heard by the Board and of the Board to exercise its judgment, was relieved of the obligation to act judicially as it would have been required to do if the Legislature had not made such other provisions. Consequently, there was no denial of natural justice in the action of Council and the by-law adopting the amendment is not liable to be declared void on that account.

In somewhat similar circumstances a municipality was required by the courts to give notice prior to the enactment of a by-law which rendered forfeit the right of redemption by the payment of arrears of taxes: Re Hershoran and City of Windsor et al.[11] The statute was silent as to notice but the Divisional Court found that the city council lost jurisdiction on failing to notify the landowner of its impending action by by-law and hence the by-law was quashed. It is interesting to note that the by-law in question was subject to confirmation worth et Bishop, précités.

Dans Re Zadrevec et al. and Town of Brampton[10], la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario devait examiner l'action d'un conseil municipal qui, comme en l'espèce, n'avait pas donné aux parties visées avis de projets de règlements modifiant le zonage de leurs biens-fonds. Avant d'entrer en vigueur, ces règlements devaient être approuvés par la Commission municipale de l'Ontario. Avant que cette approbation ne soit donnée, une action a été introduite en vertu de The Municipal Act, précitée, pour faire déclarer nuls les règlements en question. La Cour a conclu qu'en exigeant l'approbation de la Commission comme condition préalable à la validité des règlements, le législateur avait enlevé au conseil municipal et confié à la Commission et a poursuivi à la p. 507:

> [TRADUCTION] A mon avis, le législateur a manifesté son intention que les autres dispositions qu'il a adoptées libèrent le conseil de l'obligation d'agir judiciairement lorsqu'il adopte la modification au plan officiel et que, conscient que la procédure qu'il suivait permettrait à toutes les parties d'être entendues par la Commission et permettrait à celle-ci de prendre une décision, le conseil était libéré de l'obligation d'agir judiciairement comme il aurait été requis de le faire si le législateur n'avait pas adopté les autres dispositions. Par conséquent, l'action du conseil ne constitue pas un déni de justice naturelle et le règlement modificatif ne peut être déclaré nul de ce chef.

Dans des circonstances assez semblables, les tribunaux ont exigé qu'une municipalité donne un préavis de l'adoption d'un règlement qui annulait le droit de rachat par le paiement des arrérages de taxes: Re Hershoran and City of Windsor et al.[11] La Loi ne prévoyait pas d'avis, mais la Cour divisionnaire a jugé que le conseil municipal avait perdu sa compétence en n'informant pas le propriétaire de l'adoption imminente du règlement envisagé et, par conséquent, le règlement a été annulé. Il est intéressant de remarquer qu'avant prior to its effectiveness by the Minister of Municipal Affairs and the Court likewise quashed the Minister's purported approval of the by-law on the grounds that the Minister had failed to take into account the position of the landowner in the circumstances there prevailing. The Court, speaking through Hughes J., appears to have found that the council, in the exercise of its discretion in electing to designate the lands in question as park lands with the inevitable extinction of the rights of the owner in those lands, was acting in a quasi-judicial manner within the contemplation of the judgment of this Court in Alliance des Professeurs catholiques de Montréal v. Commission des Relations ouvrières de la province de Québec et al.[12], rather than in an administrative capacity as that function was determined to be in law by this Court in Calgary Power Ltd. v. Copithorne[13]. The opposite result to that in the Zadrevec case, supra, was reached by the same court in Orangeville Highlands Ltd. et al. v. Attorney General of Ontario and Township of Mono et al.[14], but presumably on the basis that the ministerial order therein under review was final and not subject to Ontario Municipal Board approval. The Court there found that a zoning order affecting the property rights of the applicant and issued without notice to it was without effect in law. In the result, in was held that the ministerial order imposing provincial zoning was the exercise of a power comparable to that of a municipal council and that the order, not being subject to review elsewhere, must be taken to the exercise of a judicial or quasi-judicial function and consequently was invalid on the absence of notice to the affected owners. Superficially there may appear to be a conflict between this decision and that of the Ontario Divisional Court in Re Braeside Farms Ltd. et al. and Treasurer of Ontario et al.[15] where no notice was required on the part of the Minister when promulgating regulations under The Niagara Escarpment Planning and Development Act, 1973, 1973 (Ont.), c. 52. The Court there, however, found that the Minister, by adopting a regulation affecting a wide area comprising d'entrer en vigueur le règlement devait être approuvé par le ministre des Affaires municipales et que la Cour a également annulé l'approbation présumée du règlement par le Ministre pour le motif que ce dernier n'avait pas tenu compte de la situation particulière du propriétaire. Par l'intermédiaire du juge Hughes, la cour a apparemment conclu que, dans l'exercice de son pouvoir discrétionnaire de désigner les terrains en question comme parc, ce qui entraîne inévitablement l'extinction des droits du propriétaire, le conseil exerçait une fonction quasi judiciaire au sens de l'arrêt de cette Cour Alliance des Professeurs catholiques de Montréal c. Commission des Relations ouvrières de la province de Québec et autre[12], plutôt qu'une fonction administrative suivant la définition juridique qu'en a donnée cette Cour dans Calgary Power Ltd. c. Copithorne[13]. La Cour même qui avait rendu l'arrêt Zadrevec, précité, est parvenue à un résultat différent dans Re Orangeville Highlands Ltd. et al. v. Attorney General of Ontario and Township of Mono et al.[14], mais présumément parce que l'ordonnance ministérielle y attaquée était finale et non assujettie à l'approbation de la Commission municipale de l'Ontario. La Cour a conclu qu'une ordonnance de zonage touchant les droits de propriété de la requérante et rendue sans avis n'avait aucune valeur juridique. Finalement, elle a jugé l'ordonnance ministérielle qui imposait un zonage provincial constituait l'exercice d'un pouvoir comparable à celui du conseil municipal et que l'ordonnance, qui n'était pas susceptible d'un autre contrôle, devait être considérée comme l'exercice d'une fonction judiciaire ou quasi judiciaire et que, par conséquent, elle était invalide vu l'absence d'avis aux propriétaires visés. De prime abord il peut sembler y avoir un conflit entre cette décision et celle de la Cour divisionnaire de l'Ontario dans Re Braeside Farms Ltd. et al. and Treasurer of Ontario et al.[15] où l'on n'a pas exigé que le Ministre donne avis de l'adoption de règlements en vertu de The Niagara Escarpment Planning and Development Act, 1973, 1973 (Ont.), chap. 52. Cependant, dans cette many different owners of land, was acting in a purely legislative capacity. The British Columbia Court of Appeal in Re McMartin and City of Vancouver[16] classified the action of city council as being legislative where that council was adopting a general zoning by-law applicable to a wide region of the municipality. The statute prescribed a public hearing precedent to the adoption of such a by-law, and after the public hearing was held, the city council received additional representations from individual owners. The majority of the Court, by classifying the general zoning by-law as legislative rather than judicial or quasi-judicial, found no duty in council to do more than conduct the first general hearing, which it did, and no right arose in any affected landowners by reason of the reception by council thereafter of additional representations.

This Court, in Wiswell et al. v. Greater Winnipeg[17], was required to classify the action taken by the Council of the City of Winnipeg when adopting a by-law rezoning a specific piece of property. The Court found the action by the municipal council to be quasi-judicial in nature and hence were required to give notice to those property owners affected by the proposed action. The statute prescribed certain forms of notice which were not followed. This Court quoted with approval the remarks by Freedman J.A. (as he then was) in the Court of Appeal:

> In proceeding to enact By-law No. 177 Metro was essentially dealing with a dispute between Dr. Ginsburg, who wanted the zoning requirements to be altered for his benefit, and those other residents of the district who wanted the zoning restrictions to continue as they were. That Metro resolved the dispute by the device of an amending by-law did indeed give to its proceedings an appearance of a legislative character. But in truth the process in which it was engaged was quasi-judicial in nature; and I feel I must so treat it. (at p. 520) affaire, la Cour a jugé que par l'adoption d'un règlement qui touchait une grande région comprenant de nombreux propriétaires fonciers, le Ministre exerçait une fonction purement législative. Dans Re McMartin and City of Vancouver[16], la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a qualifié de législative l'action du conseil municipal qui adopte un règlement de zonage général applicable à une grande partie de la municipalité. La Loi prévoyait une audition publique préalable à l'adoption d'un tel règlement, et, après la tenue de l'audition publique, le conseil municipal a permis à certains propriétaires de présenter des observations supplémentaires. En qualifiant le règlement de zonage de législatif plutôt que de judiciaire ou quasi judiciaire, la majorité de la cour a conclu que l'obligation du conseil se limitait à la tenue de la première audition générale, ce qu'il avait fait, et que les observations supplémentaires recueillies ultérieurement par le conseil n'avait créé aucun droit en faveur des propriétaires touchés.

Dans l'affaire Wiswell et autres c. Greater Winnipeg[17], cette Cour était appelée à qualifier l'adoption par le conseil municipal de Winnipeg lorsqu'il a adopté un nouveau règlement de zonage visant un bien-fonds déterminé. La Cour a jugé qu'il s'agissait d'une mesure de nature quasi judiciaire et qu'il fallait donc donner un avis aux propriétaires ainsi visés. La Loi prévoyait certains types d'avis lesquels n'avaient pas été donnés. La Cour a cité en les approuvant les remarques du juge Freedman (tel était alors son titre) en Cour d'appel:

> [TRADUCTION] Lorsqu'elle a décidé d'adopter le règlement n° 177, la municipalité voulait essentiellement régler un litige entre le Dr Ginsburg, qui désirait voir le zonage modifié en sa faveur, et d'autres habitants du quartier qui ne voulaient pas de changement. En résolvant le litige au moyen d'un règlement modificatif, la municipalité a effectivement donné à ses procédures l'apparence d'un acte législatif. Mais en réalité, elle exerçait des fonctions de nature quasi judiciaire; et, à mon avis, c'est ainsi que je dois les envisager. (à la p. 520)

Later in his judgment, Hall J., at p. 522, adopted the observations of Masten J.A. in Re Howard and City of Toronto[18] at p. 576:

> In dealing with a proposed by-law which involves a conflict of interests between private individuals who are affected, the council, while exercising a discretion vested in it by statute, acts in a quasi-judicial capacity . . . and its preliminary investigations and all subsequent proceedings ought to be conducted in a judicial manner, with fairness to all parties concerned.

In the end Hall J. concluded (at p. 523):

> It was not merely the failure to post the placards but the manifest ignoring of the fact known to it that the Association would oppose the by-law . . .

Here we have the circumstance that the statute does not expressly require notice to the affected landowners. Council, of course, was aware that Homex would oppose such a by-law as no. 7. The by-law had some characteristics of a community interest by-law, as in the Hershoran case, supra, but it also represented the purported culmination of an inter partes dispute conducted on adversarial lines between Homex and the Council. As in Hershoran and in Wiswell, supra, I would conclude that the action taken by the Council was not in substance legislative but rather quasi-judicial in character so as to attract the principle of notice and the consequential doctrine of audi alteram partem, as laid down by the courts as long ago as in Wandsworth, supra. On this branch of the case all that remains is to determine whether the statutory pattern leaves this judicial principle available or is it an instance for the adoption of the principles applied in Bishop, supra, by Roach J.A. The statute requires the filing of a copy of such a by-law as by-law no. 7 with the Minister and, in order to be effective, the by-law must be registered in the Registry Office and mailed to the registered owner of the lands affected. I draw no inference from such provisions that no prior notice may be required where the action in question is essentially inter partes and quasi-judicial in nature. Thus the statute does not displace, in my view, the very old rule of audi alteram partem and the resultant duty

Plus loin dans son jugement, à la p. 522, le juge Hall a fait siennes les remarques du juge Masten de la Cour d'appel dans l'arrêt Re Howard and City of Toronto[18] à la p. 576:

> [TRADUCTION] Quand il prépare un projet de règlement qui porte sur un conflit d'intérêts entre des individus, le conseil, bien qu'il exerce un pouvoir discrétionnaire que lui accorde la loi, exerce une fonction quasi judiciaire . . . et ses premières enquêtes et toutes les procédures subséquentes devraient être menées de façon judiciaire, avec équité pour toutes les parties en cause.

A la fin, le juge Hall a conclu (à la p. 523):

> [TRADUCTION] Ce n'était pas simplement l'omission d'apposer les affiches, mais l'ignorance manifeste du fait qu'il savait que l'association s'opposerait au règlement . . .

Ici, la Loi n'exige pas expressément qu'un avis soit donné aux propriétaires visés. Bien sûr, le Conseil savait qu'Homex s'opposerait à un règlement de la nature du règlement n° 7. Ce règlement présente certaines caractéristiques d'un règlement adopté dans l'intérêt de la collectivité, comme dans l'affaire Hershoran, précitée, mais il est également le point culminant d'un conflit inter partes opposant les intérêts contradictoires d'Homex et du Conseil. Comme dans les affaires Hershoran et Wiswell, précitées, je suis d'avis de conclure que l'action du Conseil n'était pas en substance législative mais plutôt de type quasi judiciaire de manière à faire entrer en jeu le principe de l'avis et la doctrine conséquente de la règle audi alteram partem, comme l'énoncent les tribunaux depuis des décisions aussi anciennes que Wandsworth, précitée. Sur cet aspect de l'affaire, il ne reste qu'à décider si l'économie de la Loi permet de recourir à ce principe judiciaire ou s'il faut en l'espèce adopter les principes appliqués dans l'arrêt Bishop, précité, par le juge Roach en Cour d'appel. La Loi exige qu'une copie d'un règlement tel le règlement n° 7 soit déposée auprès du Ministre et, pour devenir exécutoire, le règlement doit être enregistré au Bureau d'enregistrement et expédié au propriétaire enregistré des biens-fonds visés. Je ne déduis pas de ces dispositions qu'aucun avis ne peut être requis si l'action en question est essentiellement inter partes et de nature quasi judiciaire.

in Council to hear first and decide later. Such a conclusion is facilitated by the further feature in this case that Council has acted as the judge of its own actions in determining the outcome of the dispute between itself and Homex with reference to the provision of services to subdivision 567.

But that is only part of the journey. Next it must be determined whether in fact Homex was "heard" by the Council. There was of course no 'hearing' in the formal and ordinary sense by the Village of the position of Homex. There had, however, been a full awareness by both sides of the position of the other in this dispute. There had been detailed negotiations and an exchange of correspondence on the subject of the subdivision agreement and the installation of services on the lands included in the subdivision. The last letter was sent by the Village to Homex on March 23, 1976 and which letter stated in part:

> If you wish to proceed, please advise us and arrange for your Professional Engineers to submit their proposals for the development to the Village's Engineers for their examination and their report to the Council.
> Any such agreement would of course also require that the present action against the Village of Wyoming be dismissed and that the Village be reimbursed for its expenses in connection with that action.

The by-law was passed on April 1, 1976. One can hold no reasonable doubt that Homex had had every opportunity to explain its refusal to install services on the subdivision. The Village had made known to Homex its requirements for servicing. Homex held the view, however, that services should be paid for by the ratepayers in the Village generally and not by the owner of lands remaining to be serviced in this subdivision. Homex, however, did not receive an opportunity to assess its final position on this matter in the face of any action such as that taken by the Village in the passage of by-law no. 7. In the full and final sense Homex did not receive an opportunity to make known its position once fully aware of the Village's final position. In the light of the conduct of Homex and the attitude of its principal officer, one reaches this Ainsi la Loi n'écarte pas, à mon avis, la très ancienne règle audi alteram partem et l'obligation qui en résulte pour le Conseil de tenir une audition avant de prendre une décision. Le fait qu'en l'espèce le Conseil a agi comme juge de ses propres actions en décidant de l'issue du conflit avec Homex, relativement à l'obligation de viabiliser le lotissement 567, facilite une telle conclusion.

Mais cela n'est qu'une étape. Il faut ensuite décider si le Conseil a effectivement permis à Homex «de se faire entendre». Bien sûr, le Village n'a pas tenu une «audition» au sens formel et ordinaire pour entendre Homex. Toutefois, les deux parties étaient tout à fait conscientes de leur position mutuelle. Il y a eu des négociations poussées et un échange de correspondance au sujet de la convention de lotissement et de l'installation de services d'utilité publique sur les terrains du lotissement. La dernière lettre a été envoyée par le Village à Homex le 23 mars 1976; en voici un extrait:

> Pareille convention exigerait bien sûr que la présente action contre le village de Wyoming soit rejetée et que le Village soit remboursé de ses frais y afférents.

Le règlement a été adopté le 1er avril 1976. On ne peut raisonnablement douter qu'Homex a eu amplement l'occasion d'expliquer son refus de viabiliser le lotissement. Le Village l'avait informée de ses exigences à cet égard. Cependant Homex était d'avis qu'il appartenait aux contribuables du Village d'assumer les frais d'installation et non pas au propriétaire des terrains du lotissement non encore viabilisés. Toutefois Homex n'a pas eu la possibilité d'établir sa position finale sur cette question face à l'adoption du règlement nº 7 par le Village. En somme, Homex n'a pas eu la possibilité de faire connaître sa position lorsqu'elle a clairement su quelle était la position finale du Village. Compte tenu de la conduite d'Homex et de l'attitude de son dirigeant principal, on parvient à cette conclusion avec regret et en s'appuyant conclusion with reluctance and only on the most narrow and technical grounds.

We come then to the last substantive test. Having thus determined that Homex had the right to an opportunity to be heard and that Homex did not receive such an opportunity before the passage by the Village of by-law no. 7, is Homex in all these circumstances entitled to the remedy sought, that is the quashing of the by-law on judicial review? These proceedings are brought under The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971, supra. The procedure on this application is that formerly available under the Rules of Court where an application was made for an order in lieu of certiorari. The statute in s. 2(5) preserves the discretion of the Court under the former procedure:

> Where, in any of the proceedings enumerated in subsection 1, the court had before the coming into force of this Act a discretion to refuse to grant relief on any grounds, the court has a like discretion on like grounds to refuse to grant any relief on an application for judicial review.

The discretionary nature of the remedy is undoubted: vide Laskin C.J. in P.P.G. Industries Canada Ltd. v. Attorney General of Canada[19], at p. 749, where the Court exercised its discretion to deny certiorari to an applicant otherwise in law entitled. The matter was again examined in this Court in Harelkin v. University of Regina[20], per Beetz J. at pp. 575-6:

> The use of the expression ex debito justitiae in conjunction with the discretionary remedies of certiorari and mandamus is unfortunate. It is based on a contradiction and imports a great deal of confusion into the law.
>
> Ex debito justitiae literally means "as of right", by opposition to "as of grace" (P. G. Osborne, A Concise Law Dictionary, 5th ed.; Black's Law Dictionary, 4th ed.); a writ cannot at once be a writ of grace and a writ of right. To say in a case that the writ should issue ex debito justitiae simply means that the circumstances militate strongly in favour of the issuance of the writ rather than for refusal. But the expression, albeit Latin, has no magic virtue and cannot change a writ of grace seulement sur les moyens les plus procéduraux et étroits.

Nous en venons maintenant à l'examen du dernier critère de fond. Ayant donc déterminé qu'Homex avait le droit d'être entendue et qu'elle n'a pas eu cette possibilité avant l'adoption du règlement n° 7 par le Village, a-t-elle droit, compte tenu de toutes ces circonstances, au redressement demandé, soit la cassation du règlement par examen judiciaire? Ces procédures ont été introduites en vertu de The Judicial Review Procedure Act, 1971, précitée. La procédure propre à cette demande est celle qui s'appliquait antérieurement en vertu des règles de la cour sur une demande d'ordonnance tenant lieu de certiorari. Le paragraphe 2(5) de la Loi maintient le pouvoir discrétionnaire dont jouissait la cour selon l'ancienne procédure:

> [TRADUCTION] Lorsque, dans le cadre d'une des procédures énumérées au paragraphe (1), la cour avait avant l'adoption de la présente loi le pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser un redressement pour quelque motif, elle le conserve pour les mêmes motifs sur une demande d'examen judiciaire.

Le caractère discrétionnaire du redressement ne fait aucun doute: voir le juge en chef Laskin dans P.P.G. Industries Canada Ltd. c. Procureur général du Canada[19], à la p. 749, où la Cour a exercé son pouvoir discrétionnaire pour refuser un certiorari à un requérant qui autrement y aurait eu droit. La question a été réexaminée par cette Cour dans l'arrêt Harelkin c. Université de Regina[20], par le juge Beetz aux pp. 575 et 576:

> Associer l'expression ex debito justitiae aux recours discrétionnaires du certiorari et du mandamus n'est pas heureux. Cette association est fondée sur une contradiction et crée beaucoup de confusion dans notre droit.
> Littéralement, ex debito justitiae signifie [TRADUCTION] «de plein droit», par opposition à [TRADUCTION] «de complaisance» (P.G. Osborne, A Concise Law Dictionary, 5e éd.; Black's Law Dictionary, 4e éd.); un bref ne peut être à la fois un bref de complaisance et un bref de plein droit. Dire qu'un bref doit être émis ex debito justitiae signifie simplement que les circonstances militent en faveur de l'émission du bref plutôt que du refus. Mais l'expression, bien que latine, n'a aucun pouvoir into a writ of right nor destroy the discretion even in cases involving lack of jurisdiction.

Certiorari was there refused because other remedies had been available but not pursued by the applicant. The principles governing the exercise of discretion to decline the grant of the extraordinary remedy of certiorari are gathered in Halsbury, 4th ed., vol. 1, at p. 157, para. 162: including, from the point of view of this appeal, "... if the conduct of the party applying has not been such as to disentitle him to relief ...". Examples of such conduct are found (in addition to those already enumerated above) in F. Hoffman-LaRoche & Co. A.G. and others v. Secretary of State for Trade and Industry[21]; Watson v. Northern School Board et al.[22], where the applicant had breached a contract and then sought to quash an award by a board established to determine the financial entitlements of the applicant as a result of such breach; Re Falconbridge Nickel Mines Ltd. and United Steelworkers of America[23], where the judge of first instance refused certiorari because the applicant had acted unconscionably during the proceedings before the administrative tribunal. The Court of Appeal, adopting the same general principles of law, found that on the facts the applicant was not guilty of disentitling conduct[24].

I recognize that there has been some criticism of this exercise of judicial discretion to deny the remedy, which criticism has generally viewed the discretion as an attempt by a court to apply or impose its own code of morality. This observation, however, denies or overlooks the very history of certiorari, an extraordinary and discretionary remedy coming down to present day courts from ancient times. To say that the writ is universally available where the rights of an individual are adversely affected by action of some public authorities taken in excess of jurisdiction or in some circumstances where an error of law has been committed in the course of the exercise of its magique et ne peut faire d'un bref de complaisance un bref de plein droit, ni détruire le pouvoir discrétionnaire, même dans les cas d'absence de compétence.

Le certiorari a été refusé dans cette affaire parce que le requérant ne s'était pas prévalu des autres recours possibles. Les principes régissant l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser d'accorder le redressement extraordinaire que constitue le certiorari, sont réunis à Halsbury, 4e éd., vol. 1, à la p. 157, par. 162: soit, du point de vue de ce pourvoi, [TRADUCTION] « ... Si le requérant ne s'est pas conduit de façon à perdre son droit au redressement ...». On trouve des exemples de ce genre de conduite (en plus de ceux énumérés précédemment) dans F. Hoffman-LaRoche & Co., A.G. and others v. Secretary of State for Trade and Industry[21]; Watson v. Northern School Board et al.[22], où le requérant avait violé un contrat et ensuite cherché à faire annuler une indemnité accordée par une commission établie pour déterminer les droits pécuniers du requérant par suite de cette violation; Re Falconbridge Nickel Mines Ltd. and United Steelworkers of America[23], où le juge de première instance a refusé le certiorari parce que la requérante avait agi de façon déraisonnable au cours des procédures devant le tribunal administratif. Adoptant les mêmes principes juridiques généraux, la Cour d'appel a conclu que, selon les faits, la conduite de la requérante ne l'a pas privée de ce recours[24].

Je reconnais que l'exercice de ce pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser le redressement a été critiqué, mais cette critique envisage généralement ce pouvoir comme une tentative des tribunaux d'appliquer ou d'imposer leur propre code de moralité. Toutefois, cette remarque nie ou refuse de reconnaître l'histoire même du certiorari, un redressement extraordinaire et discrétionnaire dont les tribunaux contemporains ont hérité des tribunaux anciens. Dire que ce bref est un recours universel lorsqu'un organisme public porte atteinte aux droits d'une personne par une mesure qui dépasse sa compétence ou dans des circonstances où il a commis une erreur de droit dans l'exercice de cette jurisdiction, is not to say that the reviewing tribunal must slavishly apply the rules surrounding the issuance of certiorari and automatically respond to the application of the person affected without any further scrutiny. The principles upon which certiorari, and now the modern order in judicial review, have been issued have long included the principle of disentitlement where a court, because of the conduct of the applicant, will decline the grant of the discretionary remedy.

Certiorari is, of course a prerogative writ originating in the earliest times as a discretionary power of the royal courts in the control of lesser tribunals in the jurisdictional sense. As said by the learned author of S. A. de Smith, Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 4th ed., 1980, at p. 587:

> Certiorari was essentially a royal demand for information . . .

From the dawn of its use, which is said to be in the mid-1200's, the courts have been concerned with:

> . . . maintaining the principle that writs closely associated with the rights of the Crown should not issue out of the Chancery to the subject as of course. (de Smith, supra, at p. 586)

The learned author of Wade, Administrative Law, 4th ed., 1977, in referring to certiorari and other prerogative remedies, described them as:

> . . . discretionary and the court may therefore withhold them if it thinks fit. [at p. 560];

and later in the discussion stated:

> The discretion to withhold remedies against unlawful action may make inroads upon the rule of law, and must therefore by exercised with the greatest care. In any normal case the remedy accompanies the right. But the fact that a person aggrieved is entitled to certiorari ex debito justitiae does not alter the fact that the court has power to exercise its discretion against him, as it may in the case of any discretionary remedy. This means that he may have to submit to some unlawful administrative act which is ex hypothesi ultra vires. For, as has been observed earlier, a void act is in effect a valid act if the court will not grant relief against it.

compétence, n'équivaut pas à dire que le tribunal d'appel doit appliquer servilement les règles relatives à la délivrance d'un certiorari et répondre automatiquement à la demande de la personne touchée sans autre examen. Les principes en vertu desquels le certiorari et maintenant l'ordonnance moderne d'examen judiciaire sont accordés, comprennent depuis longtemps celui de la perte du droit au redressement lorsqu'à cause de la conduite du requérant, un tribunal refuse d'accorder le redressement discrétionnaire.

Bien sûr, le certiorari est un bref de prérogative qui à l'origine était un pouvoir discrétionnaire des cours royales servant à contrôler les abus de pouvoir des tribunaux d'instance inférieure. Comme l'a dit le savant auteur S.A. de Smith dans Judicial Review of Administrative Action, 4e éd., 1980, à la p. 587:

> [TRADUCTION] Le certiorari était essentiellement une demande royale d'information . . .

Depuis que l'on se prévaut de ce recours, soit vers le milieu du douzième siècle, les tribunaux ont cherché à:

> [TRADUCTION] . . . maintenir le principe que les brefs intimement liés aux droits de la Couronne ne devraient pas être délivrés d'office au requérant par la chancellerie. (de Smith, précité, à la p. 586)

Lorsque Wade, savant auteur de Administrative Law, 4e éd., 1977, parle du certiorari et des autres brefs de prérogative, il dit qu'ils sont:

> [TRADUCTION] . . . discrétionnaires et la cour peut donc refuser de les accorder si elle le juge à-propos. (à la p. 560);

et il ajoute plus loin dans l'exposé:

> [TRADUCTION]Le pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser un redressement contre une action illégale peut constituer un empiétement sur la règle de droit et il faut donc l'exercer avec la plus grande prudence. Normalement, le redressement accompagne le droit. Mais le fait qu'une personne lésée ait droit au certiorari ex debito justitiae ne change rien au fait que le tribunal peut exercer son pouvoir discrétionnaire contre elle comme il peut le faire pour tout redressement discrétionnaire. Cela signifie qu'elle peut devoir se soumettre à un acte administratif illégal qui, par hypothèse, constitue un excès de pouvoir. Car, comme on l'a déjà fait remarquer, un acte nul est en réalité un acte valide si le tribunal refuse d'intervenir.

While the writ of certiorari has been replaced by statute in the United Kingdom in 1938 by an order in the nature of certiorari and in some provinces in the Rules of Court for orders in lieu of certiorari; and in other provinces by the statutory procedures sometimes described as judicial review, the courts have continued to apply the principles of the ancient prerogative writ to the newer forms of the same remedy. There are many examples to which one can turn. The British Columbia Court of Appeal in Cock v. Labour Relations Board[25] reversed an order of the court below quashing, by certiorari, an award by a labour relations board, and in doing so stated through Davey J.A., at p. 129:

> While the point was not taken below, in my respectful opinion, these writs should not be granted, even upon grounds otherwise legally sufficient, to applicants who in the matters before the Board have committed the fraud, trickery, and apparently perjury, found against the respondents here.

It is to be noted that the Court there regarded the discretion to be one springing not from the adversarial position of the parties but from the reponsibility of the Court in the administration of superior court review to match the application of the extraordinary remedy to the circumstances of each case. Other authorities to the same point are Ex parte Fry[26], at p. 737; The King v. General Commissioners for the Purposes of the Income Tax Acts[27], at p. 519; The King v. Williams[28], at p. 614, as to the exercise of discretion in the first instance. Thus it will be seen that the governing principles surrounding the issuance or withholding of the extraordinary remedy of certiorari in old or modern form operate up through the levels of the superior courts. Indeed, it is incumbent upon all courts to apply those principles where the circumstances so require whether or not the parties

Bien que, par une loi adoptée en 1938, le bref de certiorari ait été remplacé au Royaume-Uni par une ordonnance de la nature d'un certiorari et, dans certaines provinces, par des dispositions des règles de pratique prévoyant une ordonnance tenant lieu de certiorari, et dans d'autres provinces par des procédures établies par la loi parfois appelées examen judiciaire, les tribunaux ont continué d'appliquer les principes de l'ancien bref de prérogative aux nouvelles formes de ce même redressement. Plusieurs exemples s'offrent à nous. Dans l'arrêt Cock v. Labour Relations Board[25], la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a infirmé l'ordonnance de la cour d'instance inférieure qui annulait par certiorari la décision d'une commission des relations de travail et, ce faisant, elle a déclaré par l'intermédiaire du juge Davey, à la p. 129:

> [TRADUCTION] Bien que la question n'ait pas été examinée par les cours d'instance inférieure, je suis respectueusement d'avis que ces brefs ne devraient pas être accordés, même lorsqu'ils sont par ailleurs légalement fondés, à des requérants qui, dans les affaires soumises à la Commission, se sont, comme les intimés en l'espèce, rendus coupables de fraude, de supercherie et, semble-t-il de parjure.

Il faut remarquer que, dans cette affaire-là, la cour a considéré que le pouvoir discrétionnaire ne découlait pas de la situation conflictuelle des parties, mais de la responsabilité de la cour qui, dans l'administration du pouvoir de contrôle des cours supérieures, doit adapter le recours extraordinaire aux circonstances de chaque espèce. On trouve d'autres décisions sur le même point telles Ex parte Fry[26], à la p. 737; The King v. General Commissioners for the Purposes of the Income Tax Acts[27], à la p. 519; The King v. Williams[28] à la p. 614, quant à l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire en première instance. Ainsi on voit que les principes qui régissent la délivrance du redressement extraordinaire que constitue le certiorari, sous sa forme ancienne ou contemporaine, ou le refus de l'accorder filtrent jusqu'au niveau des cours supérieures. En fait, toutes les cours doivent address themselves to the latter.

Turning now to the application of this principle to the circumstances of this appeal, I do not propose to repeat but merely refer back to the history of the dealings by Homex with its predecessor in title Atkinson, and with the Village. Homex has sought throughout all these proceedings to avoid the burden associated with the subdivision of the lands comprised in plan 567. In the preliminary stages of this application for judicial review, Homex has taken inconsistent and even contradictory positions. Examinations on affidavits were protracted because of a lack of simple frankness on the part of its president. Homex has sought, after its application to this Court to set aside the by-law, to put its lands beyond the reach of municipal regulations by means of checkerboarding. This it apparently is entitled to do at law but it does not follow that the exercise of such a legal right may not be a factor for assessment by a court which Homex invites to exercise a discretion in its favour in connection with certiorari or now judicial review concerning by-law 7. Of primary concern in my view is the attempt by Homex to avoid the burden of the "Atkinson" agreement to service these lands by shifting that burden to the ratepayers in the Village by the undoing of the municipal action taken in the form of by-law 7. There is nothing in the Council's conduct of negotiations to indicate the presence of any motive in Council other than its desire to protect its constituents from an expense which had been undertaken by the owners of plan 567 when seeking the right to subdivide their land. This objective the Village had facilitated first by entering into a subdivision agreement with the then owner Atkinson, and thereafter by consenting to a conveyance of the subdivided lands to the applicant Homex. Furthermore, Homex appears to be secure against other forms of action for the recovery of the cost of services by the Village. It is not a party to the Atkinson-Village agreement and the agreement could not be registered and did not therefore run with the land at the time of the Homex acquisition. It might be that the Village could prove prior notice and somehow overcome want of privity in an action on the agreement. But Homex erected appliquer ces principes lorsque les circonstances l'exigent, que les parties les invoquent ou non.

Pour appliquer ce principe aux circonstances de ce pourvoi, je n'ai pas l'intention de répéter mais tout simplement de mentionner l'historique des pourparlers entre Homex et son prédécesseur en titre Atkinson, et le Village. Tout au long de ces procédures, Homex a cherché à éviter les obligations qui se rattachent au lotissement des terrains du plan 567. Dès le début de cette demande d'examen judiciaire, Homex a adopté des positions incompatibles et mêmes contradictoires. Les interrogatoires sur les affidavits se sont prolongés en raison du manque de franchise du président. Après avoir présenté à cette Cour une demande visant l'annulation du règlement, Homex a cherché à soustraire ses terrains à l'application des règlements municipaux au moyen du morcellement en damier. Elle a apparemment légalement le droit de recourir à cette technique, mais il ne s'ensuit pas que l'exercice de ce droit ne peut être un facteur dont tiendra compte un tribunal auquel Homex demande d'exercer un pouvoir discrétionnaire en sa faveur relativement au certiorari ou à la demande d'examen judiciaire concernant le règlement 7. A mon avis, le point d'importance capitale est la tentative d'Homex de se soustraire aux obligations de la convention «Atkinson» de viabiliser ces terrains et de les faire assumer par les contribuables du Village en attaquant la mesure prise par la municipalité sous la forme du règlement 7. Rien dans les négociations n'indique que le Conseil poursuivait d'autres buts que celui d'éviter à ses contribuables une dépense que les propriétaires du plan 567 avaient assumée lorsqu'ils voulaient obtenir le droit de lotir leur terrain. Le Village avait facilité les choses d'abord en signant une convention de lotissement avec le propriétaire de l'époque, Atkinson, puis en consentant à un transfert des terrains lotis à la requérante Homex. De plus Homex paraît être protégée contre d'autres formes d'actions pour le recouvrement des frais d'installation des services par le Village. Elle n'est pas partie à la convention entre Atkinson et le Village, la convention n'a pas pu être enregistrée et ne grevait pas le terrain au moment où Homex en a fait l'acquisition. Il se pourrait que dans une action fondée sur la convention, le Village puisse another obstacle in the path of the Village by resorting to checkerboarding in December 1976. Such litigation by the Village would be difficult, no doubt protracted as were these proceedings, expensive, and of doubtful outcome. In any case, Homex and its "nominees" on title might, in the meantime, have disposed of the land and the Village would be left submerged in litigation with the new owners over the cost of services. Indeed, there is presently at least one outstanding action brought against Homex by a purchaser in which the Village is a third party.

I would, by reason of these special circumstances, deny the issuance of the order of judicial review with reference to by-law no. 7. In doing so it is reassuring to note that a like conclusion was reached by the Ontario Divisional Court in similar circumstances in Re Bergin et al. and Township of King[29], citing in its reasons the judgment of Anglin J. (as he then was) in Rodd v. County of Essex[30], at p. 143. While these authorities concern the discretion to withhold the writ on a mandamus application, the same sort of circumstances were examined as here.

I return now to by-law no. 6 being the by-law passed in December 1975 relating to the installation of a water main on Norman Street. The applicant seeks the quashing of by-law 6 on the grounds "that the by-law was passed in bad faith and for the purpose of preventing the applicant from proceeding with the development and sale of its lands in the said registered plan". The following is the by-law in its entirety:

> A by-law concerning a water pipeline on Norman Street.
>
> WHEREAS the Council of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming was requested by Norman C. Redick to give him permission to install a water pipe line on Norman Street according to Registered Plan Number 567 in the Village of Wyoming from Superior Street to approximately the north limit of Lot 7 according to said Plan 567.

[29] [1973] 3 O.R. 174.
[30] (1910), 44 S.C.R. 137.

prouver un préavis et ainsi suppléer de quelque façon à l'absence de lien de droit. Mais Homex a opposé un autre obstacle au Village en recourant au morcellement en damier en décembre 1976. Pareille action par le Village serait difficile, sans doute longue comme les présentes procédures, coûteuse et son issue incertaine. Quoi qu'il en soit, Homex et ses «personnes interposées» risqueraient, dans l'intervalle, de disposer des terrains et le Village serait donc enlisé dans des litiges avec les nouveaux propriétaires quant aux frais d'installation des services. Il y a effectivement au moins une action pendante intentée contre Homex par un acquéreur, qui met en cause le Village.

Compte tenu de ces circonstances spéciales, je suis d'avis de refuser de rendre une ordonnance d'examen judiciaire relativement au règlement n° 7. Il est rassurant de remarquer que la Cour divisionnaire de l'Ontario est parvenue à une conclusion semblable dans des circonstances analogues dans Re Bergin et al. and Township of King[29], citant dans ses motifs le jugement du juge Anglin (alors juge puîné) dans l'arrêt Rodd c. County of Essex[30], à la p. 143. Bien que ces décisions portent sur le pouvoir discrétionnaire de refuser le bref de mandamus, l'examen portait sur le même genre de circonstances.

Je reviens maintenant au règlement n° 6, soit le règlement adopté en décembre 1975 concernant l'installation d'une conduite d'eau principale rue Norman. La requérante demande l'annulation du règlement n° 6 [TRADUCTION] «parce que le règlement a été adopté de mauvaise foi et dans le but d'empêcher la requérante de procéder à la mise en valeur et à la vente de ses terrains compris dans le plan enregistré». Voici le règlement intégral:

> [TRADUCTION] Règlement concernant une conduite d'eau rue Norman
>
> ATTENDU QUE Norman C. Redick a demandé au Conseil de la municipalité du village de Wyoming la permission d'installer une conduite d'eau rue Norman, suivant le plan enregistré numéro 567 dans le village de Wyoming depuis la rue Superior jusqu'aux abords de la limite nord du lot 7 conformément au plan n° 567.

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

AND WHEREAS Norman C. Redick represented to the Council that the immediate installation of the said water pipe line by him would save him money in connection with the development of the land owned by Homex Realty and Development Company Limited in the said Plan of Subdivision and as a courtesy to him but without making any other commitments, the Council by resolution consented to the installation of the said pipe line but made no commitment as to when the said pipe line might be assumed or taken over by the Corporation or when it could be used for the supply of water.

NOW THEREFORE the Council of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming enacts as follows:

1. The lands affected by this by-law are Lots 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30 and Norman Street according to Registered Plan 567 in the said Village of Wyoming.

2. It is the policy of the Council of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming that the said water pipe line in Norman Street from Superior Street to approximately the north limit of Lot 7 according to said Plan 567 shall not be assumed or taken over by the Corporation and no connection shall be permitted to be made to the said water pipe line and no water shall be supplied through the said water pipe line and the said water pipe line shall not form part of the municipal water supply system of the Village of Wyoming until authorized by a futher [sic] by-law of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming.

By-law 6 is of much less importance to the parties because whether or not there be a by-law concerning this pipeline, there is in the circumstances disclosed a contract between Homex and the Village in which the terms on which the water line was installed are set out in correspondence between the parties. It is trite law that a municipality may act only by by-law and in any case only within its statutory jurisdiction. By-law 6 does not purport to make a general rule applicable to the municipality as a whole, nor does it purport to grant or withhold any rights or privileges in respect of the municipality or its inhabitants. It simply records an agreement between the Village and the landowner and announces the policy of the Village with reference to the pipe line, namely that without further by-law action, the water main shall not form a part of the municipal water supply system.

ET ATTENDU QUE Norman C. Redick a fait valoir devant le Conseil que l'installation immédiate de la conduite d'eau lui permettrait de faire des économies sur la mise en valeur des terrains appartenant à Homex Realty and Development Company Limited dans le plan de lotissement et que, par mesure de courtoisie envers lui mais sans prendre d'autres engagements, le Conseil a consenti par résolution à l'installation de la conduite d'eau mais n'a pas dit à quel moment elle serait prise en charge par la municipalité ni à quel moment elle pourrait servir à l'aqueduc.

A CES CAUSES, le conseil de la Municipalité du village de Wyoming décrète ce qui suit:

1. Les terrains visés par le présent règlement sont les lots 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, et la rue Norman, conformément au plan enregistré n° 567 dans le village de Wyoming.

2. C'est la politique du Conseil de la municipalité du village de Wyoming que la conduite d'eau rue Norman, depuis la rue Superior jusqu'aux abords de la limite nord du lot 7, suivant le plan 567, ne soit pas prise en charge par la Municipalité et qu'aucun raccordement à la conduite d'eau ne soit autorisé, que cette conduite d'eau ne puisse servir à l'aqueduc et qu'elle ne fasse pas partie du réseau municipal d'aqueduc du village de Wyoming avant qu'un autre règlement de la municipalité du village de Wyoming ne l'autorise.

Le règlement 6 est beaucoup moins important pour les parties puisque, qu'il y ait ou non un règlement concernant cette conduite d'eau, les faits montrent qu'il existe un contrat entre Homex et le Village dont les termes qui ont régi l'installation de la conduite d'eau, se retrouvent dans la correspondance échangée par les parties. Il est de droit constant qu'une municipalité ne peut agir que par règlement et sans outrepasser la compétence que lui accorde la loi. Le règlement 6 ne vise pas à énoncer une règle générale applicable à l'ensemble de la municipalité, il ne vise pas non plus à accorder ou à refuser des droits ou des privilèges relativement à la municipalité ou à ses habitants. Il ne fait que rapporter une entente intervenue entre le Village et le propriétaire et formule la politique du Village relativement à la conduite d'eau, savoir qu'en l'absence d'un autre règlement la conduite d'eau ne fera pas partie du réseau municipal d'aqueduc.

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

The applicant alleges bad faith. There is no finding of bad faith in either court below and nothing in the record would support any such finding. The second ground alleged by the applicant Homex is that by-law 6 was enacted "for the purposes of preventing the applicant from proceeding with the development and sale of its lands in the said registered plan". There is, of course, nothing in the by-law, including its recitals, which would indicate any such purpose. There is no finding in either court below of any such purpose and again nothing in the record ties the action of the Village in the passage of by-law no. 6 to the disposition by Homex of its lands in plan 567.

The Divisional Court, speaking through Anderson J., stated:

> . . . it is not entirely clear to me what, if any, is its legal effect. Indeed, since it lacks any enacting language, it is questionable whether it can be said to be a by-law at all.

The Court then went on to quash by-law 6 "simply because it is not a by-law".

The Court of Appeal, after pointing out that s. 15 of The Public Utilities Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 390, authorized a council on the application of a property owner to provide for the construction of water mains and to provide for the payment of the cost thereof, found that the by-law was a proper exercise by Council of one of its functions. The Court, speaking through Weatherston J.A., stated:

> It is apparent from the recitals in By-law No. 6 that the consent of council to the installation by Homex of a water line on Norman Street was given by Resolution only. I see nothing wrong in that Resolution being confirmed by the by-law to conform with the statute and, by registration of the by-law, to give notice to subsequent owner of the lots in the subdivision of the terms on which the consent of council was given. This is not a case of a mere assertion of facts, as was the case in Rogers and Pyke v. The Township of North York et al., [1951] O.R. 79. Its real purpose is clear, and it ought not to be quashed merely because of imperfections in its form.

La requérante invoque la mauvaise foi. Ni l'une ni l'autre des cours d'instance inférieure n'a conclu à la mauvaise foi et rien au dossier n'appuie une telle conclusion. La requérante fait également valoir que le règlement 6 a été adopté [TRADUCTION] «dans le but d'empêcher la requérante de procéder à la mise en valeur et à la vente de ses terrains compris dans le plan enregistré». Bien sûr, rien dans le règlement, y compris son préambule, n'indique un tel but. Ni l'une ni l'autre des cours d'instance inférieure n'a conclu à l'existence d'un tel but et, encore une fois, rien au dossier ne rattache la mesure qu'a prise le Village en adoptant le règlement nº 6 à l'aliénation des terrains d'Homex compris dans le plan 567.

Par l'intermédiaire du juge Anderson, la Cour divisionnaire a dit:

> [TRADUCTION] . . . je ne vois pas clairement quel est, le cas échéant, son effet juridique. En fait, puisqu'il ne comprend pas de dispositif on peut se demander s'il s'agit vraiment d'un règlement.

La Cour a ensuite annulé le règlement 6 [TRADUCTION] «tout simplement parce que ce n'est pas un règlement».

Après avoir fait remarquer que l'art. 15 de The Public Utilities Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 390, permettait au conseil, à la demande d'un propriétaire, de stipuler les conditions de construction de conduites d'eau principales et celles du paiement des coûts, la Cour d'appel a jugé que le règlement constituait l'exercice approprié d'une des fonctions du Conseil. Par l'intermédiaire du juge Weatherston, la Cour a dit:

> [TRADUCTION] Il se dégage du texte du règlement nº 6 que c'est par résolution seulement que le Conseil a consenti à l'installation par Homex d'une conduite d'eau principale rue Norman. Je ne vois rien de répréhensible à ce que, pour se conformer à la Loi, on confirme cette résolution par règlement ni à ce qu'en procédant à son enregistrement, on informe les propriétaires subséquents des lots de ce lotissement des conditions auxquelles le consentement du Conseil a été donné. Il ne s'agit pas d'un simple exposé de faits, comme dans l'affaire Rogers and Pyke v. The Township of North York et al., [1951] O.R. 79. Son but réel est clair et il ne doit pas être annulé pour simples vices de forme.

I am in respectful agreement with the conclusion reached by the Court of Appeal, namely that there was no basis for the quashing of by-law 6. This result happens to coincide with the practice of the courts of Ontario where they have refrained from quashing by-laws which do no more than announce policy: vide Re de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Ltd. and City of Toronto[31].

One last point is raised regarding the form of this proceeding brought, as has been said, under The Judicial Review Procedure Act, supra. It was alleged that such relief as that sought here should be pursued under the quashing provisions found in ss. 283-5 of The Municipal Act, supra. The courts of Ontario have frequently considered this matter as for example In Re Maurice Rollins Construction Ltd. and South Fredericksburg[32]; Serre et al. v. Town of Rayside-Balfour[33]; Re Holmes et al. and Regional Municipality of Halton[34]; Rose v. Township of West Wawanosh et al.[35]; Re Clements & Toronto[36] and Sutherland v. Municipal Council of The Township of East Nissouri[37].

I am in respectful agreement with Cory J. in Holmes, supra, that both avenues, that is The Municipal Act, supra, and The Judicial Review Procedure Act, supra, are open and appropriate. In any case, there is nothing in The Judicial Review Procedure Act, supra, to indicate a legislative intent that it supercede or be subservient to The Municipal Act, supra. Therefore, the form of proceedings here is free from any deficiency in its statutory base.

I therefore would dismiss the appeal with costs.

The reasons of Ritchie and Dickson JJ. were delivered by

DICKSON J.—Two by-laws were passed by the respondent municipality which directly and adversely affected lands owned by the appellant, Avec égards, je souscris à la conclusion de la Cour d'appel, savoir que rien ne justifie l'annulation du règlement 6. Ce résultat correspond à la pratique des tribunaux ontariens qui s'abstiennent d'annuler des règlements qui ne constituent qu'un simple énoncé de politique: voir Re de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Ltd. and City of Toronto[31].

Il reste une dernière question relative à la forme de cette procédure introduite, je l'ai déjà dit, en vertu de The Judicial Review Procedure Act, précitée. On a prétendu que le redressement demandé en l'espèce aurait dû être fondé sur les dispositions d'annulation que l'on trouve aux art. 283 à 285 de The Municipal Act, précitée. Les tribunaux ontariens se sont souvent penchés sur cette question, par exemple dans In Re Maurice Rollins Construction Ltd. and South Fredericksburg[32]; Serre et al. v. Town of Rayside-Balfour[33]; Re Holmes et al. and Regional Municipality of Halton[34]; Rose v. Township of West Wawanosh et al[35]; Re Clements & Toronto[36] et Sutherland v. Municipal Council of The Township of East Nissouri[37].

Avec égards, je souscris à l'opinion exprimée par le juge Cory dans l'arrêt Holmes, précité, que ces deux voies de recours, soit The Municipal Act et The Judicial Review Procedure Act, précitées, sont possibles et appropriées. Quoi qu'il en soit, rien dans The Judicial Review Procedure Act, précitée, n'indique que le législateur ait voulu que cette loi prévale ou qu'elle soit subordonnée à The Municipal Act, précitée. Donc, la forme des procédures en l'espèce n'est pas viciée dans son fondement juridique.

Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi avec dépens.

Homex Realty and Development Company Limited. The by-laws were passed without prior notice and without affording Homex an opportunity to be heard. The question in this case is whether the by-laws are valid.

I

The controversy has its genesis in a fundamental disagreement between the respondent Village of Wyoming and Homex, a land developer, as to who will bear the cost of servicing a subdivision of some twenty-two acres of land.

On January 22, 1968, a subdivision agreement was entered into between the Village and one Atkinson, under the terms of which Atkinson was required to satisfy all the requirements of the Village, financial and otherwise, with respect to surfacing of roads, installation of services, and drainage. The subdivision agreement was not registered until some years later, on September 26, 1975. A plan of subdivision, however, was registered as plan No. 567 on March 26, 1968.

In January 1970, the appellant, Homex, acquired from Atkinson the lands included in plan No. 567. As required by the terms of the subdivision agreement, the consent of the Village was asked for, and given. Unfortunately for the Village, the form of consent did not embody therein an undertaking on the part of Homex to carry out the obligations of Atkinson, nor was Homex a party to the consent. Homex claims that all services necessary to develop the lots in the plan of subdivision were to be handled by Atkinson. Atkinson denies this. Though it is far from clear, resolution of this question is not here in issue. Nor is it necessary for this Court to decide whether Homex did, or did not, have notice of the existence or terms of the subdivision agreement at the time it purchased. Vis à vis the Village, Homex has taken the position that, as a stranger to the Village-Atkinson agreement, it is not bound thereby. The Village, on the other hand, is most unwilling to leave its ratepayers out of pocket for the substantial costs of servicing it feels Homex should bear. Protracted negotiations ensued between the Realty and Development Company Limited. Les règlements ont été adoptés sans préavis et sans qu'on ait permis à Homex de se faire entendre. Il s'agit en l'espèce de décider si les règlements sont valides.

I

Le litige tire son origine d'un désaccord fondamental entre le village de Wyoming intimé et Homex, un promoteur immobilier, sur le point de savoir qui assumera les frais de l'installation des services d'utilité publique dans un lotissement d'environ vingt-deux acres.

Le 22 janvier 1968, une convention de lotissement a été signée entre le Village et un nommé Atkinson, aux termes de laquelle Atkinson devait satisfaire à toutes les exigences du Village, financières ou autres, relativement au revêtement des routes, à l'installation des services d'utilité publique et au drainage. La convention de lotissement n'a été enregistrée que quelques années plus tard, le 26 septembre 1975. Cependant, un plan de lotissement a été enregistré sous le nº 567 le 26 mars 1968.

En janvier 1970, l'appelante Homex a acheté à Atkinson les terrains faisant partie du plan nº 567. Conformément aux conditions de la convention de lotissement, les parties ont dû obtenir le consentement du Village. Malheureusement pour le Village, le texte du consentement ne comprend pas l'engagement d'Homex d'assumer les obligations d'Atkinson, et Homex n'était pas partie au consentement. Homex prétend que l'installation de tous les services nécessaires pour aménager les terrains du plan de lotissement devait être assurée par Atkinson. Atkinson le nie. Bien que ce soit loin d'être clair, cette question n'est pas en litige ici. Cette Cour n'a pas non plus à décider si Homex connaissait ou non l'existence ou les conditions de la convention de lotissement lorsqu'elle s'est portée acquéreur. Vis-à-vis du Village, Homex a adopté la position qu'étant étrangère à la convention intervenue entre le Village et Atkinson, elle n'est pas liée par celle-ci. Par ailleurs, le Village ne veut vraiment pas faire supporter par ses contribuables les lourds frais d'installation des services d'utilité publique qui devraient, à son avis, être assumés Village and Homex in an attempt to reach agreement on the servicing but no accord was reached. The president of Homex, Norman C. Redick, has been somewhat intransigent throughout.

A draft plan of work prepared for Homex by a land surveyor was rejected by the Village in early 1975. A schedule of work prepared for Homex by professional engineers was later rejected. A draft servicing agreement, acceptable to the Village, was repudiated by Homex. In late 1975, Homex, with the permission of the Village, installed a water main to service some of the lots, but the Village shortly thereafter sought an injunction to halt work at the site claiming Homex had commenced construction of a road not authorized by the Village. The injunction application did not proceed. Nor did the road.

Without notice to or knowledge of Homex, the Village on December 29, 1975 passed by-law no. 6, which reads:

WHEREAS the Council of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming was requested by Norman C. Redick to give him permission to install a water pipe line on Norman Street according to Registered Plan Number 567 in the Village of Wyoming from Superior Street to approximately the north limit of Lot 7 according to said Plan 567.

AND WHEREAS Norman C. Redick represented to the Council that the immediate installation of the said water pipe line by him would save him money in connection with the development of the land owned by Homex Realty and Development Company Limited in the said Plan of Subdivision and as a courtesy to him but without making any other commitments, the Council by resolution consented to the installation of the said pipe line but made no commitment as to when the said pipe line might be assumed or taken over by the Corporation or when it could be used for the supply of water.

NOW THEREFORE the Council of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming enacts as follows:

1. The lands affected by this by-law are Lots 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, and Norman Street according to Registered Plan 567 in the said Village of Wyoming.

par Homex. Il s'en est suivi de longues négociations entre le Village et Homex afin de parvenir à une entente sur l'installation des services d'utilité publique, sans qu'ils parviennent à un accord. Le président d'Homex, Norman C. Redick, a été quelque peu intransigeant au cours de ces négociations.

Vers le début de 1975, le Village a rejeté un plan de travail préparé pour Homex par un arpenteur-géomètre. Plus tard, un programme des travaux préparé pour Homex par des ingénieurs a été rejeté. Un projet de convention sur l'installation des services d'utilité publique, auquel le Village aurait donné son approbation, a été répudié par Homex, Vers la fin de 1975, avec la permission du Village, Homex a installé une conduite d'eau principale pour desservir certains des lots mais, peu après, le Village a demandé une injonction pour faire cesser les travaux sur les lieux, prétendant qu'Homex avait commencé la construction d'une route sans son autorisation. On n'a pas donné suite à la demande d'injonction. La construction de la route a également été arrêtée.

A l'insu d'Homex et sans que celle-ci en reçoive avis, le Village a adopté le 29 décembre 1975 le règlement municipal n° 6 dont voici le texte:

[TRADUCTION]ATTENDU QUE Norman C. Redick a demandé au Conseil de la municipalité du village de Wyoming la permission d'installer une conduite d'eau rue Norman, suivant le plan enregistré numéro 567 dans le village de Wyoming depuis la rue Superior jusqu'aux abords de la limite nord du lot 7 conformément au plan n° 567.

ET ATTENDU QUE Norman C. Redick a fait valoir devant le Conseil que l'installation immédiate de la conduite d'eau lui permettrait de faire des économies sur la mise en valeur des terrains appartenant à Homex Realty and Development Company Limited dans le plan de lotissement et que, par mesure de courtoisie envers lui mais sans prendre d'autres engagements, le Conseil a consenti par résolution à l'installation de la conduite d'eau mais n'a pas dit à quel moment elle serait prise en charge par la municipalité ni à quel moment elle pourrait servir à l'aqueduc.

A CES CAUSES, le Conseil de la municipalité du village de Wyoming décrète ce qui suit:

1. Les terrains visés par le présent règlement sont les lots 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, et la rue Norman, conformément au plan enregistré n° 567 dans le village de Wyoming.

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

2. It is the policy of the Council of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming that the said water pipe line in Norman Street from Superior Street to approximately the north limit of Lot 7 according to said Plan 567 shall not be assumed or taken over by the Corporation and no connection shall be permitted to be made to the said water pipe line and no water shall be supplied through the said water pipe line and the said water pipe line shall not form part of the municipal water supply system of the Village of Wyoming until authorized by a futher [sic] by-law of the Corporation of the Village of Wyoming.

2. C'est la politique du Conseil de la municipalité du village de Wyoming que la conduite d'eau rue Norman, depuis la rue Superior, jusqu'aux abords de la limite nord du lot 7, suivant le plan 567, ne soit pas prise en charge par la Municipalité et qu'aucun raccordement à la conduite d'eau ne soit autorisé, que cette conduite d'eau ne puisse servir à l'adduction d'eau et qu'elle ne fasse pas partie du réseau municipal d'aqueduc du village de Wyoming avant qu'un autre règlement de la municipalité du village de Wyoming ne l'autorise.

All of the lots affected by the by-law and mentioned in paragraph 1 are owned by Homex, with the exception of lots 19 and 20.

Homex est propriétaire de tous les lots visés par le règlement et mentionnés au paragraphe 1, à l'exception des lots 19 et 20.

On March 3, 1976 Homex wrote to the Village outlining the services Homex was willing to provide.

Le 3 mars 1976, Homex a écrit au Village pour décrire brièvement les services d'utilité publique qu'elle était prête à installer.

On March 23, 1976 the Village wrote Homex advising that the Village had always been and continued to be prepared to enter into an agreement with Homex concerning services. The letter outlined the requirements of the Village and concluded:

> If you wish to proceed, please advise us and arrange for your Professional Engineers to submit their proposals for the development to the Village's Engineers for their examination and their report to the Council.

Le 23 mars 1976, le Village a écrit à Homex l'informant qu'il avait toujours été et qu'il demeurait disposé à conclure une convention avec Homex concernant l'installation des services d'utilité publique. La lettre exposait les principales exigences du Village et concluait:

> [TRADUCTION] Si vous désirez donner suite à vos projets, nous vous prions de nous en informer et de bien vouloir demander à vos ingénieurs de soumettre leurs propositions d'aménagement aux ingénieurs du Village afin qu'ils les étudient et fassent rapport au Conseil.

Without awaiting a response to the invitation to continue negotiations, the Village, on April 1, 1976, again without notice to Homex, passed by-law No. 7. The by-law was given three readings in one evening. It reads in part:

> 1. The parts of Registered Plan No. 567 for the County of Lambton in the Village of Wyoming described in Section 2 of this By-Law are hereby designated as parts which shall be deemed not to be a registered plan of subdivision for the purposes of sub-section 2 of Section 29 of The Planning Act.

Le 1er avril 1976, sans attendre une réponse à l'invitation de poursuivre les négociations et sans donner d'avis à Homex, le Village a adopté le règlement nº 7. Le règlement a reçu trois lectures au cours de la même soirée. En voici un extrait:

> [TRADUCTION] 1. Les parties du plan enregistré nº 567 pour le comté de Lambton dans le village de Wyoming décrites à l'article 2 du présent règlement sont par les présentes désignées comme des parties qui ne sont pas réputées un plan de lotissement enregistré aux fins du par. 29(2) de The Planning Act.

The lots affected by-law No. 7 were the same as those affected by by-law No. 6. By-law No. 7 refers to, and was stated to be passed pursuant to, s. 29(3) of The Planning Act, R.S.O. 1970, c. 349, which provides that the council of a municipality may by by-law designate any plan of subdivision, or part thereof, that has been registered for eight

Les lots visés par le règlement nº 7 sont les mêmes que ceux visés par le règlement nº 6. Le règlement nº 7 renvoie au par. 29(3) de The Planning Act, R.S.O. 1970, chap. 349, lequel prévoit que le conseil d'une municipalité peut, par règlement, désigner un plan de lotissement ou une partie de celui-ci, qui est enregistré depuis au moins huit years or more, which shall be deemed not to be a registered plan of subdivision for the purposes of s.29(2) of The Planning Act.

It will be recalled that the plan of subdivision had been registered on March 26, 1968. Thus, one week after the expiry of the eight years the Village moved, without notice to Homex, to deem the plan not to be a registered plan. The practical effect is to deny Homex the right to sell any of its lands unless a new plan is registered or a consent of the Committee of Adjustment of the municipality obtained for each conveyance. As no doubt intended, the Village has effectively frozen the property of Homex by passing the impugned by-laws. The lands have been seriously and adversely affected, both as to disposal and as to value. The hurried actions on the part of the Village, behind the back of Homex, taken with a view to providing the Village with a weapon with which to strike Homex in the servicing negotiations, could well be characterized as "shabby".

Homex commenced proceedings for judicial review. The Divisional Court quashed the by-laws. By-law No. 6 was invalid on the ground that it was not a by-law at all. Though there had been no bad faith giving rise to the enactment of by-law No. 7 it had been passed for an indirect or improper purpose. "Its purpose had nothing to do with planning which was the legislative area in which council purported to find its jurisdiction."

The Court of Appeal reversed. With respect to by-law No. 6, the Court found that the by-law was not merely a recitation of facts, as in Rogers and Pyke v. The Township of North York et al.[38] Its purpose was clear and it ought not to be quashed for imperfections in form. With respect to by-law No. 7, the Court found it was passed for a perfectly valid planning purpose, namely, to ensure that the costs of installing municipal services would be borne by the owners of the lots in the subdivision and not by the ratepayers in the municipality. The ans, de façon qu'il soit réputé ne pas être un plan enregistré de lotissement aux fins du par. 29(2) de The Planning Act, et c'est en vertu de ce paragraphe qu'il a été adopté.

Il faut se rappeler que le plan de lotissement avait été enregistré le 26 mars 1968. Ainsi, une semaine après l'expiration du délai de huit ans le Village a adopté un règlement, sans donner d'avis à Homex, pour que le plan soit réputé ne pas être un plan enregistré. Cela a eu comme effet pratique d'enlever à Homex le droit de vendre ses terrains à moins qu'un nouveau plan soit enregistré ou qu'elle obtienne le consentement du comité d'ajustement de la municipalité pour chaque aliénation. Tel qu'il l'a manifestement voulu, le Village a en fait gelé les terrains d'Homex en adoptant les règlements municipaux contestés. Cela a nui sérieusement à la vente des terrains et à leur valeur. Ces mesures prises par le Village à l'insu d'Homex et visant à lui fournir une arme contre cette dernière dans les négociations sur l'installation des services d'utilité publique, pourraient bien être qualifiées de «mesquines».

Homex a introduit une demande d'examen judiciaire. La Cour divisionnaire a annulé les règlements. Le règlement n° 6 a été jugé invalide pour le motif qu'il ne constituait pas du tout un règlement municipal. Malgré l'absence de mauvaise foi dans l'adoption du règlement n° 7, il a été adopté dans un but indirect ou inapproprié. [TRADUCTION] «Son but était tout à fait étranger à l'urbanisme, soit le domaine législatif sur lequel le Conseil prétend fonder son pouvoir.»

La Cour d'appel a infirmé ce jugement. Relativement au règlement n° 6, la Cour a jugé que le règlement n'était pas un simple énoncé de faits comme dans Rogers and Pyke v. The Township of North York et al.[38] Son but était clair et il ne devait pas être annulé pour vices de forme. Relativement au règlement n° 7, la Cour a jugé qu'il avait été adopté dans un but tout à fait valide d'urbanisme savoir, s'assurer que les frais d'installation des services municipaux seraient supportés par les propriétaires des lots du lotissement et non

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

Court held that the Village had no duty to give prior notice to Homex before passing the by-law; the Council was exercising a legislative function when it enacted the by-law, and the over-riding consideration was the public interest of the citizens of Wyoming. This was not a case such as Wiswell v. Greater Winnipeg[39] in which a municipal council was merely adjudicating on the merits of competing private interests.

In the result, the Court of Appeal upheld the validity of the by-laws and set aside the order of the Divisional Court.

II

There is, of course, a long line of authority which establishes that before a public body can limit or abrogate the property rights of citizens, it must first give the individuals concerned an opportunity to be heard. This principle, of universal application, was established in the case of Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works[40]. Nor is it necessary for the legislature to provide explicitly for a hearing for a court to imply such right. On the contrary, where statutory bodies seek to limit property rights, the courts will imply a right to be heard unless there is an express declaration to the contrary: Alliance des Professeurs catholiques de Montréal c. Commission des Relations ouvrières de la province de Québec et al.[41] at p. 154. As Kerwin J., as he then was, noted in that case, the legislature must be presumed to know that notice is required by the general rule. And it is therefore necessary for it to use explicit terms in order to absolve from the necessity of giving notice. See also Re Watt and Registrar of Motor Vehicles[42].

Courts have on numerous occasions applied these principles to the case of a municipal corporation. See In Re Maurice Rollins Construction Ltd.

par les contribuables de la municipalité. La Cour a jugé que le Village n'avait aucune obligation de donner un préavis à Homex avant d'adopter le règlement; le Conseil exerçait une fonction législative lorsqu'il l'a adopté et la considération dominante était l'intérêt public des citoyens de Wyoming. Ceci distingue cette affaire de l'affaire Wiswell c. Greater Winnipeg[39], où le conseil municipal ne faisait que décider sur le fond d'intérêts privés opposés.

Finalement, la Cour d'appel a maintenu la validité des règlements et a annulé l'ordonnance de la Cour divisionnaire.

II

Bien sûr, une longue tradition jurisprudentielle établit qu'avant qu'un organisme public puisse limiter ou révoquer les droits de propriété des citoyens, il doit d'abord donner aux personnes concernées la possibilité de se faire entendre. Ce principe, d'application universelle, a été établi dans l'arrêt Cooper v. Wandsworth Board of Works[40]. Il n'est pas non plus nécessaire que le législateur prévoie expressément une audition pour qu'un tribunal reconnaisse implicitement ce droit. Au contraire, lorsque des organismes créés par la loi cherchent à limiter des droits de propriété, les tribunaux reconnaîtront le droit d'être entendu à moins d'une déclaration expresse en sens contraire: Alliance des Professeurs catholiques de Montréal c. Commission des Relations ouvrières de la province de Québec et al.[41] à la p. 154. Comme le juge Kerwin, alors juge puîné, l'a fait remarquer dans cet arrêt, il faut présumer que le législateur sait qu'en règle générale un avis est requis. Il devient donc nécessaire d'employer des mots explicites pour écarter la nécessité de donner un avis. Voir également Re Watt and Registrar of Motor Vehicles[42].

Les tribunaux ont appliqué à maintes reprises ces principes à une municipalité. Voir In Re Maurice Rollins Construction Ltd. and Township of

Where the by-laws in question directly affect the land or property of specified individuals, the courts have implied a common law right to be heard. In the present case, the Village passed two by-laws which directly and detrimentally affected the lands of Homex and, virtually, only the lands of Homex. It did so without serving any notice of its intentions. One would have thought, on the basis of the authorities, that this was a classical case in which to import rules of natural justice.

The Village advances several arguments in justification of its failure to give notice and to grant a hearing. These include: (i) the common law right to be heard, if it exists, has been statutorily excluded by s. 29(11) of The Planning Act; (ii) in passing the by-laws, the municipality was exercising a legislative function, to which no common law right to be heard applied; and (iii) even if a common law right of fairness does apply here, the municipality has statisfied the onus placed upon it.

Statutory Exclusion of a Hearing

The combined effect of s. 29(9) and s. 29(11) of The Planning Act is that a by-law passed under s. 29(3) of the Act is not effective until notice of the by-law has been sent to each owner of land to which the by-law applies. Section 29(11) reads:

> (11) The clerk of the municipality shall send by registered mail notice of the passing of a by-law under subsection 3 to each person appearing . . . to be the owner of land to which the by-law applies . . .

Lorsque les règlements en question nuisent directement aux biens-fonds ou à la propriété de personnes en particulier, les tribunaux ont reconnu implicitement l'existence du droit d'être entendu en common law. En l'espèce, le Village a adopté deux règlements qui nuisent directement aux terrains d'Homex et ne visent pratiquement que ses terrains. Il a agi ainsi sans signifier d'avis de son intention. Compte tenu de la jurisprudence, on aurait cru qu'il s'agissait là d'un exemple typique où il faut appliquer les règles de justice naturelle.

Le Village avance plusieurs arguments à l'appui de son défaut de donner un avis et d'accorder une audition dont les suivants: (i) si le droit d'être entendu reconnu par la common law existe, il a été exclu par le par. 29(11) de The Planning Act; (ii) en adoptant des règlements, la municipalité exerçait une fonction législative à laquelle le droit d'être entendu reconnu par la common law ne s'applique pas; et (iii) même si le droit à l'impartialité reconnu par la common law s'applique ici, la municipalité s'est bien acquittée de l'obligation qui lui incombait.

L'exclusion de l'audition prévue par la Loi

La combinaison des par. 29(9) et 29(11) de The Planning Act a pour effet qu'un règlement adopté en vertu du par. 29(3) de la Loi n'est pas en vigueur tant qu'un avis du règlement n'a pas été envoyé à chaque propriétaire de bien-fonds auquel s'applique le règlement. Voici le texte du par. 29(11):

> [TRADUCTION] (11) Le secrétaire de la municipalité doit envoyer par courrier recommandé avis de l'adoption d'un règlement en vertu du paragraphe (3) à chaque personne que le dernier rôle . . . désigne comme propriétaire du bien-fonds auquel s'applique le règlement . . .

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

It is contended by the Village that the legislature considered and rejected, impliedly, a requirement of prior notice. The argument is that the requirement of notification after passage of the by-law precludes by implication, any further requirement of prior notice. This argument was accepted by the Court of Appeal. With great respect, I cannot accept it, in light of the consistent line of high authority which holds that an express statutory statement is required before a common law right to a hearing can be excluded. Much more explicit language than that contained in s. 29(11) would be required before the Court could negate the right to a hearing. Section 29(11) does not provide for a hearing, it is merely ex post facto advice as to action taken.

The view that s. 29(11) does not exclude prior notice and a hearing was adopted by Thompson J. in the Rollins case and I am content to repeat what was said in that case:

> It is contended . . . that because s-s. (11) of s. 29 . . . provides that notice of the passing of the by-law must subsequently be given to all owners of land . . . that the intent of the statute is that prior notice need not be given. I am unable to accede to that contention. That is an entirely different notice which can in no way affect or alter the finality of the by-law as passed. The subsequent notice . . . was given . . . It was then too late for it to make representations or to be heard as the by-law had then become effective. (at p. 431)

The section 29(11) argument is not persuasive.

A "Legislative" Function?

In the Court of Appeal, emphasis was placed on the 'legislative' character of the acts performed by the Village of Wyoming in this case. It was on this basis that the present facts were distinguished from the case of Wiswell, supra. In Wiswell, the municipality was essentially dealing with a dispute between one Ginsburg, who wanted certain zoning requirements altered for his benefit, and those other residents of the district who wanted the zoning restrictions to continue unchanged. As such, the municipality in Wiswell was said to be acting in a judicial or quasi-judicial capacity. The Court of Appeal held that in the present case, the Le Village prétend que le législateur a envisagé et implicitement rejeté l'exigence d'un préavis. Il fait valoir que l'exigence d'un avis après l'adoption du règlement écarte implicitement toute autre exigence d'un préavis. La Cour d'appel a accepté cet argument. Avec égards, je ne peux l'accepter compte tenu de la jurisprudence uniforme et importante selon laquelle une déclaration expresse de la loi est nécessaire avant qu'un droit d'audition reconnu par la common law puisse être exclu. Il faudrait un texte beaucoup plus précis que celui du par. 29(11) pour que la Cour puisse nier le droit à une audition. Le paragraphe 29(11) ne prévoit pas une audition, mais seulement un avis ex post facto de la mesure prise.

L'opinion que le par. 29(11) n'exclut pas un préavis et une audition a été adoptée par le juge Thompson dans l'affaire Rollins et il me suffit de répéter ce qu'il y dit:

> [TRADUCTION] On prétend . . . que l'intention de la loi est qu'il n'est pas nécessaire de donner avis puisque le par. 29(11) prévoit que l'avis de l'adoption d'un règlement doit être subséquemment donné à tous les propriétaires de bien-fonds. Je ne peux accepter cette prétention. Il s'agit là d'un avis tout à fait différent qui ne peut en aucune façon modifier la finalité du règlement adopté. L'avis subséquent .. a été donné . . . Il était alors trop tard pour présenter des observations ou être entendu puisque le règlement était entré en vigueur. (à la p. 431)

L'argument fondé sur le par. 29(11) n'est pas convaincant.

Une fonction «législative»?

En Cour d'appel, on a insisté sur le caractère «législatif» des actes accomplis par le village de Wyoming en l'espèce. C'est sur ce fondement qu'on a distingué les faits de l'espèce de ceux de l'affaire Wiswell, précitée. Dans cette affaire-là, la municipalité voulait principalement régler un litige opposant un nommé Ginsburg, qui désirait faire modifier à son avantage certaines exigences de zonage, et certains autres habitants du district qui désiraient leur maintien. Ainsi, dans l'affaire Wiswell, on a déclaré que la municipalité exerçait des fonctions judiciaires ou quasi judiciaires. La Cour d'appel a jugé qu'en l'espèce le litige est de nature nature of the dispute is different; the municipality is dealing with a matter of public interest—namely, who would bear the cost of servicing; the function is legislative in nature and no right to a hearing can be implied.

I find myself unable to accept the Court's exegesis.

First, the distinction sought to be made here is that there is no conflict between the competing interests of private individuals, but a question of public interest, pure and simple. That being so, the Village exercised a legislative function in passing by-laws No. 6 and 7. A sale of unserviced lands puts the burden of development on the municipality, which is entitled to prevent that result by enactment of a s. 29(3) by-law.

As counsel for the appellant correctly points out, this reasoning leads to anomalous results. Thus if there were two identical by-laws, each affecting only one particular piece of property, and one by-law was opposed by other private individuals or groups but the other was not, only one of the two owners would be entitled to a hearing.

The right to a hearing does not spring from the fact that there are competing groups or individuals, some of whom happen to be opposed to the by-law. It results from the fact that the by-law interferes, in particular, with the private property rights of this one owner.

Counsel for Homex stresses, rightly in my view, the thrust of the Wiswell decision, which is that those potentially affected in their property rights by a proposed by-law concerning particular property, are entitled to notice of the hearing. If in Wiswell, ratepayers opposing the re-zoning were to be given notice and a hearing, a fortiori property owners should not have their rights tampered with, with no notice given, whether or not there is another private interest in opposition to the by-law.

différente; la municipalité doit se pencher sur une question d'intérêt public—savoir, qui supportera les frais d'installation de services d'utilité publique; il s'agit d'une fonction de nature législative et on ne peut reconnaître l'existence d'un droit implicite à une audition.

Je suis incapable d'accepter l'exégèse de la Cour.

Tout d'abord, la distinction que l'on a voulu faire ici est qu'en l'espèce aucun conflit n'oppose des intérêts privés, mais qu'il s'agit d'une question pure et simple d'intérêt public. Ceci étant, le Village a exercé une fonction législative en adoptant les règlements n°s 6 et 7. La vente de terrains non viabilisés impose le fardeau de l'installation des services à la municipalité qui est en droit d'éviter cette charge en adoptant un règlement aux termes du par. 29(3).

Comme l'avocat de l'appelante l'a correctement fait remarquer, ce raisonnement amène des résultats étranges. Ainsi, s'il y avait deux règlements identiques, chacun ne visant qu'un terrain particulier, et que l'un de ces règlements soit contesté par une personne ou un groupe de personnes alors que l'autre ne le soit pas, un seul des deux propriétaires aurait droit à une audition.

Le droit à une audition ne découle pas du fait qu'il y a des personnes ou des groupes de personnes opposés dont certains contestent le règlement. Il découle du fait que le règlement porte atteinte de façon particulière aux droits de propriété appartenant à ce propriétaire.

L'avocat d'Homex souligne, correctement à mon avis, l'effet de l'arrêt Wiswell, savoir que les personnes dont les droits de propriété peuvent être atteints par un règlement envisagé visant des biens en particulier ont le droit de recevoir un avis d'audition. Si dans l'affaire Wiswell les contribuables qui s'opposaient au nouveau zonage avaient droit à un avis et à une audition, a fortiori les propriétaires de biens-fonds ne devraient pas voir leurs droits amoindris sans recevoir d'avis, qu'il y ait ou non d'autres intérêts privés qui contestent le règlement.

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

For my own part, I see no reason why the Wiswell principle should be restrictively interpreted, or why it should not be applied in this case. The entitlement to notice and a hearing should not depend on there being a conflict between two private owners, which the municipality has to resolve. There were no competing interests in Ridge v. Baldwin and others[48]. The question was whether a policeman should be dismissed. See also Nicholson v. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police et al.[49]

Second, the presence of a compelling public interest does not alone abrogate or diminish a citizen's right to procedural protection. The private property interests of Homex were here at stake. The public interest, it seems to me, is best served by affording the private interest full disclosure and a fair opportunity to be heard. There is no a priori reason why the private interest should yield abjectly to the public interest. The Village could undoubtedly pass a by-law such as No. 7 if it is in the public interest but, prior to deciding in favour of the public interest, the Council should hear the landowner's submissions. One cannot label an act "legislative" for the purpose of dispensing with fairness. A by-law may, in the public interest, operate to the detriment of particular individuals but not without giving those individuals a right of hearing.

It was contended that if prior notice is required a sophisticated owner receiving such notice would immediately "checkerboard" and thereby defeat the intent of the section. That may be true but, if so, it is an argument which should be addressed to the legislature accompanied by a request for an amendment which would specifically state that prior notice is not necessary.

Finally on this point, a requirement of both prior notice and subsequent notice does not introduce an element of redundancy. The earlier notice would permit representations by those affected and wishing to protest; the later notice would acquaint those who did not make represen-

[49] [1979] 1 S.C.R. 311.

Personnellement, je ne vois pas pourquoi le principe énoncé dans l'arrêt Wiswell devrait être interprété restrictivement, ou pourquoi il ne s'appliquerait pas en l'espèce. Le droit à un avis et à une audition ne devrait pas dépendre de l'existence d'un conflit entre deux propriétaires privés, que la municipalité doit résoudre. Il n'y avait pas d'intérêts opposés dans l'arrêt Ridge v. Baldwin and others[48]. Il s'agissait de savoir si un policier devait être congédié. Voir également l'arrêt Nicholson c. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police et autre[49].

Deuxièmement, la présence d'un intérêt public impérieux n'abroge ni ne diminue en lui-même le droit d'un citoyen à la protection qu'offre la procédure. Les intérêts privés d'Homex sur ses propriétés étaient en jeu. Il me semble que l'intérêt public est mieux servi si les intérêts privés bénéficient d'une divulgation complète et d'une possibilité raisonnable d'être entendus. Il n'y a aucune raison a priori pour que l'intérêt privé cède servilement à l'intérêt public. Le Village pouvait sans aucun doute adopter un règlement tel le règlement n° 7 dans l'intérêt public, mais avant d'opter en faveur de l'intérêt public, le Conseil devait entendre les arguments du propriétaire des biens-fonds. On ne peut qualifier un acte de «législatif» pour se dispenser d'agir équitablement. Un règlement peut, dans l'intérêt public, s'appliquer au détriment de personnes en particulier, mais non sans leur avoir accordé la possibilité de se faire entendre.

On a prétendu que si un préavis était nécessaire, un propriétaire rusé qui reçoit un tel avis pourrait immédiatement «morceler en damier» et faire ainsi échec à l'intention de l'article. Cela peut être vrai mais, si c'est le cas, c'est un argument qu'il faudrait présenter au législateur accompagné d'une demande de modification qui disposerait avec précision qu'un préavis n'est pas nécessaire.

Finalement sur cette question, l'exigence d'un préavis et d'un avis subséquent n'introduit rien de répétitif. Le préavis permettrait aux personnes visées qui désirent s'opposer, de se faire entendre; l'avis subséquent informerait celles qui ne se sont pas opposées, de même que celles qui se sont tations, as well as those who did, with the fact that action had been taken affecting their lands.

Third, the question of the proper classification of a statutory power was, for a time, believed to be crucial in the determination of whether a right to a hearing could be implied. It was suggested that a right to a hearing only existed in circumstances where the process was judicial or quasi-judicial in nature: Nakkuda Ali v. Jayaratne[50]. But this line of authority was rejected in England in Ridge v. Baldwin, supra, and, more recently, by this Court in Nicholson v. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police et al., supra, and in Martineau v. Matsqui Institution Disciplinary Board[51]. The latter two cases clearly establish that a right to procedural 'fairness' no longer demands an a priori classification of a process as judicial or quasi-judicial. As the Chief Justice stated in Nicholson:

> What rightly lies behind this emergence is the realization that the classification of statutory functions as judicial, quasi-judicial or administrative is often very difficult, to say the least; and to endow some with procedural protection while denying others any at all would work injustice when the results of statutory decisions raise the same serious consequences for those adversely affected, regardless of the classification of the function in question: see, generally, Mullan, Fairness: The New Natural Justice (1975), 25 Univ. of Tor. L.J. 281. (at p. 325).

In Martineau, it was said that review by certiorari was available whenever a public body has power to decide "any matter affecting the rights, interests, property, privileges, or liberties of any person" (at p. 628). Once it is clear that rights are being affected, it is necessary to determine the appropriate procedural standard that must be met by the statutory body. Above all, flexibility is required in this analysis. There is, as it were, a spectrum. A purely ministerial decision, on broad grounds of public policy, will typically afford the individual little or no procedural protection. See Re Braeside Farms Ltd. et al. and Treasurer of opposées, du fait qu'une mesure a été prise concernant leurs biens-fonds.

Troisièmement, on a cru un certain temps que la question de la classification appropriée d'un pouvoir accordé par la Loi était cruciale pour déterminer s'il y avait un droit implicite à une audition. On a prétendu que le droit à une audition n'existait que dans des circonstances où les fonctions étaient de nature judiciaire ou quasi judiciaire: Nakkuda Ali v. Jayaratne[50]. Mais cette tendance jurisprudentielle a été rejetée en Angleterre dans l'arrêt Ridge v. Baldwin, précité, et, plus récemment, par cette Cour dans les arrêts Nicholson c. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police et autre, précité, et Martineau c. Comité de discipline de l'Institution de Matsqui[51]. Les deux derniers arrêts établissent clairement que le droit à une procédure «équitable» ne dépend plus de la répartition préalable des fonctions dans les catégories judiciaires ou quasi judiciaires. Comme l'a déclaré le Juge en chef dans l'arrêt Nicholson:

> L'apparition de cette notion résulte de la constatation qu'il est souvent très difficile, sinon impossible, de répartir les fonctions créées par la loi dans les catégories judiciaire, quasi judiciaire ou administrative; de plus il serait injuste de protéger certains au moyen de la procédure tout en la refusant complètement à d'autres lorsque l'application des décisions prises en vertu de la loi entraînent les mêmes conséquences graves pour les personnes visées, quelle que soit la catégorie de la fonction en question. Voir Mullan, Fairness: The New Natural Justice (1975), 25 Univ. of Tor. L. J. 281. (à la p. 325)

Dans l'arrêt Martineau, cette Cour a conclu qu'un examen par certiorari peut être demandé lorsqu'un organisme public a le pouvoir de décider «une question qui touche les droits, intérêts, biens, privilèges ou liberté d'une personne» (à la p. 628). Dès qu'il est évident qu'il y a atteinte aux droits, il devient nécessaire d'établir la norme de procédure appropriée que doit respecter l'organisme créé par la Loi. Il faut avant tout faire preuve de souplesse dans cette analyse. Il y a, comme toujours, tout un éventail. Classiquement, une décision purement ministérielle fondée sur l'intérêt public n'assurera au particulier qu'une faible protection au moyen

Ontario et al.[52] On the other hand, a function that approaches the judicial end of the spectrum will entail substantial procedural safeguards, particularly when personal or property rights are targetted, directly, adversely and specifically.

It seems to me that a similar analysis should be employed in the present case. That is, it is not particularly important whether the function of the municipality be classified as "legislative" or as "quasi-judicial". Such an approach would only return us to the conundrums of an earlier era. One must look to the nature of the function and to the facts of each case. I would adopt what was said by Judson J. in the Wiswell case. Although Judson J. dissented in Wiswell, being of opinion that adequate notice had been given, he did say:

> I do not think that it helps one towards a solution of this case to put a label on the form of activity in which the Metropolitan Council was engaged when it passed this amending by-law. Counsel for the municipality wants to call it legislative and from that he argues that they could act without notice. The majority of the judges prefer the term quasi-judicial. However one may characterize the function, it was one which involved private rights in addition to those of the applicant and I prefer to say that the municipality could not act without notice to those affected. (My emphasis.) (at p. 526)

The Court of Appeal noted that the municipality was acting out of what it conceived to be the public interest. I have no doubt this is true. Council was seeking to protect members of the public from potential injury in the purchase of unserviced land and to protect its ratepayers from paying the costs of servicing. But that is no answer to the case made by the appellant. What we have here is not a by-law of wide and general application which was to apply to all citizens of the municipality equally. Rather, it was a by-law aimed deliberately at limiting the rights of one individual, the appellant Homex. In these circumstances, I would hold that Homex was entitled to some procedural safeguards. This does not mean that the municipality de la procédure sinon aucune. Voir Re Braeside Farms Ltd. et al. and Treasurer of Ontario et al.[52] Par ailleurs, une fonction qui s'approche de l'extrémité judiciaire de l'éventail comportera une protection importante au moyen de la procédure, en particulier lorsque des droits personnels ou des droits de propriété sont visés de façon directe, défavorable et précise.

Il me semble qu'il faut recourir à une analyse analogue en l'espèce. C'est-à-dire qu'il n'est pas particulièrement important de savoir si les fonctions de la municipalité doivent être qualifiées de «législatives» ou «quasi judiciaires». Une telle méthode nous reporterait simplement aux énigmes passées. Il faut considérer la nature de la fonction et les faits de chaque cas. Je suis d'avis d'adopter l'opinion du juge Judson dans Wiswell. Malgré sa dissidence dans cette affaire, puisqu'il était d'opinion qu'un avis suffisant avait été donné, le juge Judson a dit:

> [TRADUCTION] Je ne pense pas que l'on fasse un pas vers la solution de ce litige en étiquetant la forme d'activité à laquelle se livrait le conseil municipal lorsqu'il a adopté ce règlement modificatif. L'avocat de la municipalité déclare qu'il s'agit d'une fonction législative et qu'il n'était donc pas nécessaire de donner un avis pour agir. La majorité des juges préfère l'expression quasi judiciaire. Quelle que soit la qualification de la fonction, elle mettait en jeu des droits privés en plus de ceux du requérant et je préfère dire que la municipalité ne pouvait agir sans donner d'avis aux personnes touchées. (C'est moi qui souligne.) (à la p. 526)

La Cour d'appel a fait remarquer que la municipalité agissait dans un but qu'elle estimait d'intérêt public. Je n'ai aucun doute que cela soit vrai. Le Conseil essayait de protéger des membres du public d'un préjudice possible lors de l'achat d'un terrain non viabilisé et de protéger ses contribuables des frais d'installation des services d'utilité publique. Mais cela ne répond pas aux arguments présentés par l'appelante. Il ne s'agit pas d'un règlement général devant s'appliquer à tous les citoyens de la municipalité au même titre. Il s'agit plutôt d'un règlement visant délibérément à limiter les droits d'une seule personne, l'appelante Homex. Dans ces circonstances, je suis d'avis qu'Homex avait le droit de bénéficier de la protection qu'offre was under a duty to observe the procedures appropriate to a court of law. But, at a minimum, it was under a duty to give Homex notice of the proposed by-law and the opportunity to be heard. The 'fundamental rule', formulated by Lord Denning in Selvarajan v. Race Relations Board[53], and quoted by the Chief Justice in Nicholson, supra, applies.

[52] (1978), 20 O.R. (2d) 541 (C. Div. Ont.)

> ... that, if a person may be subjected to pains or penalties, or be exposed to prosecution or proceedings, or deprived of remedies or redress, or in some way adversely affected by the investigation and report, then he should be told the case made against him and be afforded a fair opportunity of answering it. (at p. 19).

Has the Onus Been Satisfied?

Counsel for the Village argued that, even assuming Homex to be entitled to some procedural safeguards, the Village had not violated these safeguards. It is contended that the two parties had conducted extensive negotiations on the issue over a period of years; that the Village was well aware of the position of Homex and there was no suggestion that Homex would have any further representations to make had it received notice. The key passage in the judgment of the Court of Appeal reads:

> But even though By-Law No. 7 operated to the special detriment of Homex, it was not unfair of the council to enact it without first giving notice and hearing what Homex had to say. From the negotiations which had taken place, the council already knew of the position being taken by Homex, and Homex knew of the attitude of the council. The intervention of the Court ought not to be called on to quash the by-law on this ground. The public interest, on the facts of this case, very obviously called for its enactment.

With all respect, I disagree.

There were indeed prolonged negotiations but at no time during the course of these negotiations did the Village ever indicate to Homex its intention to enact the impugned by-laws. Homex had no notice whatever of the by-laws. I fail to see how the negotiations can be said to have satisfied the onus placed on the Village. The prior negotiations did not result in waiver of notice.

[53] [1976] 1 All E.R. 12 (C.A.)

la procédure. Cela ne signifie pas que la municipalité avait l'obligation de respecter la procédure d'un tribunal. Mais, à tout le moins, elle avait l'obligation de donner à Homex un avis du règlement envisagé et de lui accorder la possibilité de se faire entendre. La «règle fondamentale» formulée par lord Denning dans l'arrêt Selvarajan v. Race Relations Board[53], et citée par le Juge en chef dans l'arrêt Nicholson, précité, s'applique:

> [TRADUCTION] ... dès qu'on peut infliger des peines ou sanctions à une personne ou qu'on peut la poursuivre ou la priver de recours, de redressement ou lui faire subir de toute autre manière un préjudice en raison de l'enquête et du rapport, il faut l'informer de la nature de la plainte et lui permettre d'y répondre. (à la p. 19)

L'obligation a-t-elle été respectée?

L'avocat du Village prétend que même si l'on tient pour acquis qu'Homex avait le droit de bénéficier de la protection qu'offre la procédure, le Village ne l'en a pas privée. Il allègue que les deux parties ont mené de longues négociations sur cette question pendant plusieurs années; que le Village était bien conscient de la position d'Homex et que rien ne laissait croire qu'Homex aurait eu d'autres observations à faire si elle avait reçu un avis. Le passage-clé de l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel se lit comme suit:

> [TRADUCTION] Même si le règlement n° 7 était particulièrement défavorable à Homex, le conseil n'a pas été injuste en l'adoptant sans lui donner de préavis ni lui accorder la possibilité de se faire entendre. Suite aux négociations, le Conseil connaissait déjà la position d'Homex et Homex connaissait l'attitude du conseil. On ne devrait pas faire intervenir la Cour pour casser le règlement sur ce moyen. Selon les faits de l'espèce, l'intérêt public exigeait manifestement son adoption.

Avec égards, je ne peux partager cette opinion.

Il y a effectivement eu de longues négociations mais jamais pendant leur déroulement le Village n'a laissé entendre à Homex qu'il avait l'intention d'adopter les règlements contestés. Homex n'a reçu aucun avis des règlements. Je ne vois pas comment l'on peut dire que les négociations ont permis au Village de satisfaire à son obligation. Les négociations antérieures n'ont pas entraîné une renonciation à l'avis.

[53] [1976] 1 All E.R. 12 (C.A.)

1980 CanLII 55 (SCC)

Moreover, the argument that Homex would have had no further representations to make is pure speculation. The Court should not be put in the position of having to speculate as to the possible success a person might have enjoyed had he or she, in fact, received notice.

In my view, in fine, the Village was under a common law duty to give notice to Homex before passing by-laws aimed directly at the land of Homex. The common law duty has not been explicitly excluded by The Planning Act and I would hold that the respondent has not satisfied the notice requirement through prior negotiations. Accordingly, I would hold that the by-laws are void.

In light of the foregoing, it is not necessary to pronounce on the other grounds of appeal raised by Homex. In particular, it is not necessary to decide whether by-law No. 7 was invalid as having been passed for an indirect or improper purpose, as the Divisional Court held, or to decide whether by-law No. 6 was invalid due to an alleged lack of enacting language.

Two points in closing. First, the question of whether Mr. Redick knew of the terms of the Atkinson agreement at the time of purchase was not the subject of argument in this Court. Neither factum saw this question as being relevant to the issues at bar. In the Divisional Court only passing reference was made to the agreement. Anderson J., for the Court, said:

> There appears to be some dispute as to whether the applicant did or did not have notice of the existence and terms of the subdivision agreement at the time it purchased. There is reference to it in the offer to purchase. In my view nothing turns on this in any event.

Second, the respondent did not in this Court, nor, apparently, in the Court of Appeal, take the technical point that the conduct of the appellant was such as to disentitle the appellant to relief by way of certiorari. The appellant was not called upon to face this issue in either Court. I would not deny relief on a ground not raised nor argued.

De plus, l'argument selon lequel Homex n'aurait eu aucune autre observation à faire n'est que pure spéculation. La Cour ne devrait pas avoir à se prononcer sur les chances de succès possible qu'une personne aurait pu avoir si elle avait effectivement reçu un avis.

Enfin il incombait au Village de par la common law de donner un avis à Homex avant d'adopter des règlements qui visaient directement les terrains en cause. L'obligation de common law n'a pas été expressément exclue par The Planning Act et je suis d'avis que l'intimée n'a pas satisfait à l'obligation de donner un préavis par les négociations antérieures. Par conséquent je suis d'avis que les règlements sont nuls.

Compte tenu de ce qui précède, il n'est pas nécessaire de se prononcer sur les autres moyens invoqués par Homex. En particulier, il n'est pas nécessaire de décider si le règlement n° 7 est invalide parce qu'il aurait été adopté dans un but indirect ou irrégulier, comme l'a jugé la Cour divisionnaire, ni de décider si le règlement n° 6 était invalide puisqu'il ne comportait pas de dispositif.

Mentionnons deux points avant de terminer. Tout d'abord, la question de savoir si M. Redick connaissait les dispositions de la convention Atkinson au moment de l'achat n'a pas été plaidée devant cette Cour. Aucun des mémoires ne fait valoir que cette question est pertinente aux points en litige. Devant la Cour divisionnaire on a simplement mentionné la convention. Le juge Anderson, qui a exprimé l'opinion de la Cour, a dit:

> [TRADUCTION] Il paraît y avoir conflit quant à savoir si le requérant connaissait l'existence de la convention de lotissement au moment de l'achat et sa teneur. Elle est mentionnée dans l'offre d'achat. A mon avis, quoi qu'il en soit, rien ne dépend de cette question.

Deuxièmement, ni devant cette Cour ni apparemment devant la Cour d'appel, l'intimée n'a fait valoir la question procédurale de savoir si la conduite de l'appelante l'empêchait de demander un redressement par certiorari. L'appelante n'a eu à plaider cette question dans aucune de ces cours. Je ne refuserais pas un redressement sur un moyen qui n'a été ni soulevé ni plaidé.

failed to negotiate a sharp curve on the road and lost control of his vehicle. The appellant was rendered a quadriplegic as a result of the injuries he sustained in the accident. Damages were agreed upon prior to trial in the amount of $2.5 million, but at issue were the respective liabilities, if any, of the municipality, N and the appellant. On the day before the accident, N had attended a party at the T residence not far from the scene of the accident. He continued drinking through the night at another party where he met up with the appellant. The two men drove back to the T residence in the morning where N continued drinking until a couple of hours before he and the appellant drove off in N's truck. N was unfamiliar with the road, but had travelled on it three times in the 24 hours preceding the accident, on his way to and from the T residence. Visibility approaching the area of the accident was limited due to the radius of the curve and the uncleared brush growing up to the edge of the road. A light rain was falling as N turned onto the road from the T property. The truck fishtailed a few times before approaching the sharp curve where the accident occurred. Expert testimony revealed that N was travelling at a speed of between 53 and 65 km/hr when the vehicle entered the curved portion of the road, slightly above the speed at which the curve could be safely negotiated under the conditions prevalent at the time of the accident.

The road was maintained by the municipality and was categorized as a non-designated local access road. On such non-designated roads, the municipality makes the decision to post signs if it becomes aware of a hazard, or if there are several accidents at one spot. The municipality had not posted signs on any portion of the road. Between 1978 and 1987, three other accidents were reported in the area to the east of the site of the appellant's accident. The trial judge held that the appellant was 15 percent contributorily negligent in failing to take reasonable precautions for his own safety in accepting a ride from N, and apportioned the remaining joint and several liability 50 percent to N and 35 percent to the municipality. The Court of Appeal overturned the trial judge's finding that the municipality was negligent.

Held (Gonthier, Bastarache, Binnie and LeBel JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the judgment of the trial judge restored.

municipalité intimée. N a été incapable de prendre un virage serré et il a perdu la maîtrise de son véhicule. L'appelant est devenu quadriplégique à la suite des blessures subies dans l'accident. Les parties ont convenu avant le procès du montant des dommages-intérêts, qui ont été fixés à 2,5 millions de dollars. La question en litige était celle de savoir si la municipalité, N et l'appelant étaient responsables et, dans l'affirmative, dans quelles proportions. Le jour qui a précédé l'accident, N avait assisté à une fête à la résidence des T, non loin de la scène de l'accident. Durant la nuit, il a continué de boire à une autre fête, où il a rencontré l'appelant. Le matin, les deux hommes sont retournés en automobile à la résidence des T, où N a continué de boire, cessant de le faire quelques heures avant de prendre la route dans sa camionnette en compagnie de l'appelant. N n'était pas familier avec le chemin en question, mais il l'avait emprunté à trois reprises au cours des 24 heures qui avaient précédé l'accident pour aller et venir de la résidence des T. À l'approche de l'endroit de l'accident, la distance de visibilité était réduite en raison du rayon de courbure du virage et de la présence de broussailles poussant jusqu'au bord du chemin Une faible pluie tombait lorsque N s'est engagé sur le chemin en quittant la résidence des T. L'arrière de la camionnette a zigzagué à plusieurs reprises avant que le véhicule n'arrive aux abords du virage serré où l'accident est survenu. Selon le témoignage d'un expert, N roulait à une vitesse se situant entre 53 et 65 km/h lorsque le véhicule s'est engagé dans la courbe, soit une vitesse légèrement supérieure à celle à laquelle le virage pouvait être pris en sécurité eu égard aux conditions qui existaient au moment de l'accident.

Le chemin, qui était entretenu par la municipalité, appartenait à la catégorie des voies d'accès locales non désignées. La municipalité installe des panneaux de signalisation sur ces chemins si elle constate l'existence d'un danger ou si plusieurs accidents se produisent au même endroit. Elle n'avait installé aucune signalisation le long de cette portion du chemin. On a signalé trois autres accidents survenus de 1978 à 1987 à l'est du lieu de l'accident dont a été victime l'appelant. La juge de première instance a estimé que l'appelant était responsable de négligence concourante dans une proportion de 15 p. 100, du fait qu'il avait omis de prendre des précautions raisonnables pour assurer sa propre sécurité en acceptant de monter à bord du véhicule de N, et elle a réparti le reste de la responsabilité solidairement entre N (50 p. 100) et la municipalité (35 p. 100). La Cour d'appel a infirmé la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle la municipalité avait été négligente.

Arrêt (les juges Gonthier, Bastarache, Binnie et LeBel sont dissidents) : Le pourvoi est accueilli et la décision de la juge de première instance est rétablie.

2002 SCC 33 (CanLII)

Per McLachlin C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Iacobucci, Major and Arbour JJ.: Since an appeal is not a re-trial of a case, consideration must be given to the standard of review applicable to questions that arise on appeal. The standard of review on pure questions of law is one of correctness, and an appellate court is thus free to replace the opinion of the trial judge with its own. Appellate courts require a broad scope of review with respect to matters of law because their primary role is to delineate and refine legal rules and ensure their universal application.

The standard of review for findings of fact is such that they cannot be reversed unless the trial judge has made a "palpable and overriding error". A palpable error is one that is plainly seen. The reasons for deferring to a trial judge's findings of fact can be grouped into three basic principles. First, given the scarcity of judicial resources, setting limits on the scope of judicial review in turn limits the number, length and cost of appeals. Secondly, the principle of deference promotes the autonomy and integrity of the trial proceedings. Finally, this principle recognizes the expertise of trial judges and their advantageous position to make factual findings, owing to their extensive exposure to the evidence and the benefit of hearing the testimony viva voce. The same degree of deference must be paid to inferences of fact, since many of the reasons for showing deference to the factual findings of the trial judge apply equally to all factual conclusions. The standard of review for inferences of fact is not to verify that the inference can reasonably be supported by the findings of fact of the trial judge, but whether the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in coming to a factual conclusion based on accepted facts, a stricter standard. Making a factual conclusion of any kind is inextricably linked with assigning weight to evidence, and thus attracts a deferential standard of review. If there is no palpable and overriding error with respect to the underlying facts that the trial judge relies on to draw the inference, then it is only where the inference-drawing process itself is palpably in error that an appellate court can interfere with the factual conclusion.

Le juge en chef McLachlin et les juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Iacobucci, Major et Arbour : Étant donné que l'appel ne constitue pas un nouveau procès, il faut se demander quelle est la norme de contrôle applicable en appel à l'égard des diverses questions que soulève le pourvoi. La norme de contrôle applicable aux pures questions de droit est celle de la décision correcte et, en conséquence, il est loisible aux cours d'appel de substituer leur opinion à celle des juges de première instance. Les cours d'appel ont besoin d'un large pouvoir de contrôle à l'égard des questions de droit pour être en mesure de s'acquitter de leur rôle premier, qui consiste à préciser et à raffiner les règles de droit et à veiller à leur application universelle.

Suivant la norme de contrôle applicable aux conclusions de fait, ces conclusions ne peuvent être infirmées que s'il est établi que le juge de première instance a commis une « erreur manifeste et dominante ». Une erreur manifeste est une erreur qui est évidente. Les diverses raisons justifiant la retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait du juge de première instance peuvent être regroupées sous trois principes de base. Premièrement, vu la rareté des ressources dont disposent les tribunaux, le fait de limiter la portée du contrôle judiciaire a pour effet de réduire le nombre, la durée et le coût des appels. Deuxièmement, le respect du principe de la retenue envers les conclusions favorise l'autonomie et l'intégrité du procès. Enfin, ce principe permet de reconnaître l'expertise du juge de première instance et la position avantageuse dans laquelle il se trouve pour tirer des conclusions de fait, étant donné qu'il a l'occasion d'examiner la preuve en profondeur et d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix. Il faut faire preuve du même degré de retenue envers les inférences de fait, car nombre de raisons justifiant de faire preuve de retenue à l'égard des constatations de fait du juge de première instance valent autant pour toutes ses conclusions factuelles. La norme de contrôle ne consiste pas à vérifier si l'inférence peut être raisonnablement étayée par les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance, mais plutôt si ce dernier a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante en tirant une conclusion factuelle sur la base de faits admis, ce qui suppose l'application d'une norme plus stricte. Une conclusion factuelle — quelle que soit sa nature — exige nécessairement qu'on attribue un certain poids à un élément de preuve et, de ce fait, commande l'application d'une norme de contrôle empreinte de retenue. Si aucune erreur manifeste et dominante n'est décelée en ce qui concerne les faits sur lesquels repose l'inférence du juge de première instance, ce n'est que lorsque le processus inférentiel lui-même est manifestement erroné que la cour d'appel peut modifier la conclusion factuelle.

Questions of mixed fact and law involve the application of a legal standard to a set of facts. Where the question of mixed fact and law at issue is a finding of negligence, it should be deferred to by appellate courts, in the absence of a legal or palpable and overriding error. Requiring a standard of "palpable and overriding error" for findings of negligence made by either a trial judge or a jury reinforces the proper relationship between the appellate and trial court levels and accords with the established standard of review applicable to a finding of negligence by a jury. Where the issue on appeal involves the trial judge's interpretation of the evidence as a whole, it should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error. A determination of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant involves the application of a legal standard to a set of facts, a question of mixed fact and law, and is thus subject to a standard of palpable and overriding error, unless it is clear that the trial judge made some extricable error in principle with respect to the characterization of the standard or its application, in which case the error may amount to an error of law, subject to a standard of correctness.

Les questions mixtes de fait et de droit supposent l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits. Lorsque la question mixte de fait et de droit en litige est une conclusion de négligence, il y a lieu de faire preuve de retenue à l'égard de cette conclusion en l'absence d'erreur de droit ou d'erreur manifeste et dominante. Le fait d'exiger l'application de la norme de l'« erreur manifeste et dominante » aux fins de contrôle d'une conclusion de négligence tirée par un juge ou un jury consolide les rapports qui doivent exister entre les juridictions d'appel et celles de première instance et respecte la norme de contrôle bien établie qui s'applique aux conclusions de négligence tirées par les jurys. Si la question litigieuse en appel soulève l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve par le juge de première instance, cette interprétation ne doit pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante. La question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté la norme de diligence suppose l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits, ce qui en fait une question mixte de fait et de droit. Cette question est alors assujettie à la norme de l'erreur manifeste et dominante, à moins que le juge de première instance n'ait clairement commis une erreur de principe en déterminant la norme applicable ou en appliquant cette norme, auquel cas l'erreur peut constituer une erreur de droit, qui est assujettie à la norme de la décision correcte.

Here, the municipality's standard of care was to maintain the road in such a reasonable state of repair that those requiring to use it could, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety. The trial judge applied the correct test in determining that the municipality did not meet this standard of care, and her decision should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error. The trial judge kept the conduct of the ordinary motorist in mind because she stated the correct test at the outset, and discussed implicitly and explicitly the conduct of a reasonable motorist approaching the curve. Further, her apportionment of negligence indicates that she assessed N's conduct against the standard of the ordinary driver as does her use of the term "hidden hazard" and her consideration of the speed at which motorists should have approached the curve.

En l'espèce, la norme de diligence à laquelle devait se conformer la municipalité consistait à tenir le chemin dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, de façon que ceux qui devaient l'emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité. La juge de première instance a appliqué le bon critère juridique en concluant que la municipalité n'avait pas respecté cette norme et sa décision ne devrait pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante. La juge de première instance a eu à l'esprit la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen puisqu'elle a commencé son examen de la norme de diligence en formulant dès le départ le critère approprié, puis elle s'est interrogée, tant explicitement qu'implicitement, sur la façon dont conduirait l'automobiliste raisonnable en s'approchant du virage. De plus, le fait qu'elle a imputé une partie de la responsabilité à N indique qu'elle a évalué sa conduite au regard du critère du conducteur moyen, tout comme l'indique le fait qu'elle a utilisé l'expression « danger caché » et qu'elle s'est demandé à quelle vitesse les automobilistes auraient dû approcher du virage.

The Court of Appeal's finding of a palpable and overriding error by the trial judge was based on the erroneous presumption that she accepted 80km/h as the speed at which an ordinary motorist would approach the curve, when in fact she found that a motorist exercising

La conclusion de la Cour d'appel portant que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur manifeste et dominante reposait sur la présomption erronée selon laquelle la juge aurait accepté que l'automobiliste moyen approcherait du virage à 80 km/h, alors que dans les faits ordinary care could approach the curve at greater than the speed at which it would be safe to negotiate it. This finding was based on the trial judge's reasonable and practical assessment of the evidence as a whole, and is far from reaching the level of palpable and overriding error.

elle a estimé qu'il était possible qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales s'approche du virage à une vitesse supérieure à la vitesse sécuritaire pour effectuer la manœuvre. Loin de constituer une erreur manifeste et dominante, cette conclusion découlait d'une évaluation raisonnable et réaliste de l'ensemble de la preuve par la juge de première instance.

The trial judge did not err in finding that the municipality knew or ought to have known of the disrepair of the road. Because the hazard in this case was a permanent feature of the road, it was open to the trial judge to draw the inference that a prudent municipal councillor ought to be aware of it. Once this inference has been drawn, then unless the municipality can rebut the inference by showing that it took reasonable steps to prevent such a hazard from continuing, the inference will be left undisturbed. Prior accidents on the road do not provide a direct basis for finding that the municipality had knowledge of the particular hazard, but this factor, together with knowledge of the type of drivers using this road, should have caused the municipality to investigate the road which would have resulted in actual knowledge. To require the plaintiff to provide concrete proof of the municipality's knowledge of the state of disrepair of its roads is to set an impossibly high burden on the plaintiff. Such information was within the particular sphere of knowledge of the municipality, and it was reasonable for the trial judge to draw an inference of knowledge from her finding that there was an ongoing state of disrepair.

La juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur en concluant que la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin. Étant donné que, en l'espèce, le danger était une caractéristique permanente du chemin, il était loisible à la juge de première instance d'inférer que le conseiller municipal prudent aurait dû être au fait du danger. Dès l'instant où une telle inférence est tirée, elle demeure inchangée à moins que la municipalité ne puisse la réfuter en démontrant qu'elle a pris des mesures raisonnables pour faire cesser le danger. Les accidents survenus antérieurement sur le chemin ne constituent pas une preuve directe permettant de conclure que la municipalité connaissait l'existence du danger particulier en cause, mais ce facteur, conjugué à la connaissance du type de conducteurs utilisant le chemin, aurait dû inciter la municipalité à faire enquête à l'égard du chemin en question, ce qui lui aurait permis de prendre connaissance concrètement de l'existence du danger. Exiger du demandeur qu'il apporte la preuve concrète de la connaissance par la municipalité du mauvais état d'entretien de ses chemins revient à imposer à ce dernier un fardeau inacceptablement lourd. Il s'agit d'information relevant du domaine de connaissance de la municipalité et, selon nous, il était raisonnable que la juge de première instance infère de sa conclusion relative au mauvais état d'entretien persistant du chemin que la municipalité possédait la connaissance requise.

The trial judge's conclusion on the cause of the accident was a finding of fact subject to the palpable and overriding error standard of review. The abstract nature of the inquiry as to whether N would have seen a sign had one been posted before the curve supports deference to the factual findings of the trial judge. The trial judge's factual findings on causation were reasonable and thus should not have been interfered with by the Court of Appeal.

La conclusion de la juge de première instance quant à la cause de l'accident était une conclusion de fait assujettie à la norme de contrôle de l'« erreur manifeste et dominante ». Le caractère théorique de l'analyse de la question de savoir si N aurait aperçu un panneau de signalisation installé avant la courbe justifie de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des conclusions factuelles de la juge de première instance. Les constatations factuelles de cette dernière relativement à la causalité étaient raisonnables et la Cour d'appel n'aurait donc pas dû les modifier.

Per Gonthier, Bastarache, Binnie and LeBel JJ. (dissenting): A trial judge's findings of fact will not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error principally in recognition that only the trial judge observes witnesses and hears testimony first hand and is therefore better able to choose between competing versions of events. The process of fact-finding involves not only the determination of the factual nexus of the case but also requires the judge to draw inferences from facts. Although the standard of review is identical for both findings of fact and inferences of fact, an analytical distinction must be drawn between the two. Inferences can be rejected for reasons other than that the inference-drawing process is deficient. An inference can be clearly wrong where the factual basis upon which it relies is deficient or where the legal standard to which the facts are applied is misconstrued. The question of whether the conduct of the defendant has met the appropriate standard of care in the law of negligence is a question of mixed fact and law. Once the facts have been established, the determination of whether or not the standard of care was met will in most cases be reviewable on a standard of correctness since the trial judge must appreciate the facts within the context of the appropriate standard of care, a question of law within the purview of both the trial and appellate courts.

Les juges Gonthier, Bastarache, Binnie et LeBel (dissidents) : Les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance ne sont pas modifiées en l'absence d'erreur manifeste ou dominante, principalement parce qu'il est le seul à avoir l'occasion d'observer les témoins et d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix, et qu'il est, de ce fait, plus à même de choisir entre deux versions

divergentes d'un même événement. Le processus de constatation des faits exige non seulement du juge qu'il dégage le nœud factuel de l'affaire, mais également qu'il tire des inférences des faits. Bien que la norme de contrôle soit la même et pour les conclusions de fait et pour les inférences de fait, il importe néanmoins de faire une distinction analytique entre les deux. Des inférences peuvent être rejetées pour d'autres raisons que le fait que le processus qui les a produites est lui-même déficient. Une inférence peut être manifestement erronée si ses assises factuelles présentent des lacunes ou si la norme juridique appliquée aux faits est mal interprétée. Dans le contexte du droit relatif à la négligence, la question de savoir si la conduite du défendeur est conforme à la norme de diligence appropriée est une question mixte de fait et de droit. Une fois les faits établis, la décision touchant la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté ou non la norme de diligence est, dans la plupart des cas, contrôlable selon la norme de la décision correcte, puisque le juge de première instance doit apprécier les faits au regard de la norme de diligence appropriée, question de droit qui relève autant des cours de première instance que des cours d'appel.

A question of mixed fact and law in this case was whether the municipality knew or should have known of the alleged danger. The trial judge must approach this question having regard to the duties of the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor. Even if the trial judge correctly identifies this as the applicable legal standard, he or she may still err in assessing the facts through the lens of that legal standard, a process which invokes a policy-making component. For example, the trial judge must consider whether the fact that accidents had previously occurred on different portions of the road would alert the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor to the existence of a hazard. The trial judge must also consider whether the councillor would have been alerted to the previous accident by an accident-reporting system, a normative issue reviewable on a standard of correctness. Not all matters of mixed fact and law are reviewable according to the standard of correctness, but neither should they be accorded deference in every case.

En l'espèce, la question de savoir si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le danger dont on alléguait l'existence était une question mixte de fait et de droit. Le juge de première instance doit examiner cette question eu égard aux obligations qui incombent au conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent. Même en supposant que le juge de première instance détermine correctement la norme juridique applicable, il lui est encore possible de commettre une erreur lorsqu'il apprécie les faits à la lumière de cette norme juridique, processus qui implique notamment l'établissement de politiques d'intérêt général. Par exemple, il doit se demander si le fait que des accidents se soient déjà produits à d'autres endroits du chemin alerterait le conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent de l'existence d'un danger. Il doit également se demander si ce conseiller aurait appris l'existence de l'accident antérieur par un système d'information sur les accidents, question normative qui est contrôlable selon la norme de la décision correcte. Les questions mixtes de fait et de droit ne sont pas toutes contrôlables suivant cette norme, mais elles ne commandent pas systématiquement une attitude empreinte de retenue.

Section 192 of the Rural Municipality Act, 1989, requires the trial judge to examine whether the portion of the road on which the accident occurred posed a hazard to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. Here, the trial judge failed to ask whether a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have been able to safely drive the portion of the road on which the accident

Suivant la norme de diligence énoncée à l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, la juge de première instance devait se demander si le tronçon du chemin sur lequel s'est produit l'accident constituait un danger pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. En l'espèce, la juge de première instance a omis de se demander si un tel conducteur aurait pu rouler occurred. This amounted to an error of law. The duty of the municipality is to keep the road in such a reasonable state of repair that those required to use it may, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety. The duty is a limited one as the municipality is not an insurer of travellers using its streets. Although the trial judge found that the portion of the road where the accident occurred presented drivers with a hidden hazard, there is nothing to indicate that she considered whether or not that portion of the road would pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. Where an error of law has been found, the appellate court has jurisdiction to take the factual findings of the trial judge as they are and to reassess these findings in the context of the appropriate legal test. Here, the portion of the road on which the accident occurred did not pose a risk to a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care because the condition of the road in general signalled to the reasonable driver that caution was needed.

The trial judge made both errors of law and palpable and overriding errors of fact in determining that the municipality should have known of the alleged state of disrepair. She made no finding that the municipality had actual knowledge of the alleged state of disrepair, but rather imputed knowledge to it on the basis that it should have known of the danger. As a matter of law, the trial judge must approach the question of whether knowledge should be imputed to the municipality with regard to the duties of the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor. The question is then answered through the trial judge's assessment of the facts of the case. The trial judge erred in law by approaching the question of knowledge from the perspective of an expert rather than from that of a prudent municipal councillor and by failing to appreciate that the onus of proving that the municipality knew or should have known of the disrepair remained on the plaintiff throughout. She made palpable and overriding errors in fact by drawing the unreasonable inference that the municipality should have known that the portion of the road on which the accident occurred was dangerous from evidence that accidents had occurred on other parts of the road. As the municipality had not received any complaints from motorists respecting the absence of signs on the road, the lack of super-elevation on the curves, or the presence of vegetation along the sides of the road, it had no particular reason to inspect that segment of the road for the presence of hazards. The question of the municipality's knowledge is inextricably linked to the standard of care. A municipality can only be expected to have knowledge of those hazards which pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care, since these are the only hazards for which there is en sécurité sur le tronçon en question. Il s'agissait d'une erreur de droit. Les municipalités ont l'obligation de tenir les chemins dans un état raisonnable d'entretien de façon que ceux qui doivent les emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité. Il s'agit d'une obligation de portée limitée, car les municipalités ne sont pas les assureurs des automobilistes qui roulent dans leurs rues. Bien que la juge de première instance ait conclu que la portion du chemin où s'est produit l'accident exposait les conducteurs à un danger caché, il n'y a rien qui indique qu'elle s'est demandé si cette portion du chemin présentait un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. La cour d'appel qui décèle une erreur de droit a compétence pour reprendre telles quelles les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance et les réévaluer au regard du critère juridique approprié. En l'espèce, la portion du chemin où s'est produit l'accident ne présentait pas de risque pour un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales, car l'état de ce chemin en général avertissait l'automobiliste raisonnable que la prudence s'imposait.

La juge de première instance a commis et des erreurs de droit et des erreurs de fait manifestes et dominantes en statuant que la municipalité intimée aurait dû connaître le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétendait-on, le chemin. La juge de première instance n'a pas conclu que la municipalité intimée connaissait concrètement le prétendu mauvais état du chemin, mais elle lui a plutôt prêté cette connaissance pour le motif qu'elle aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. Sur le plan juridique, le juge de première instance doit se demander s'il y a lieu de présumer que la municipalité connaissait ce fait, eu égard aux obligations qui incombent au conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent. Il répond ensuite à cette question en appréciant les faits de l'espèce dont il est saisi. Dans la présente affaire, la juge de première instance a fait erreur en droit en examinant la question de la connaissance requise du point de vue du spécialiste plutôt que du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent et en ne reconnaissant pas que le fardeau de prouver que la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin ne cessait jamais d'incomber au demandeur. La juge de première instance a commis une erreur de fait manifeste et dominante en inférant déraisonnablement que la municipalité intimée aurait dû savoir que la partie du chemin où l'accident s'est produit était dangereuse, compte tenu de la preuve que des accidents avaient eu lieu ailleurs sur ce chemin. La municipalité n'avait aucune raison particulière d'aller inspecter cette portion du chemin pour voir s'il y existait des dangers, puisqu'elle n'avait reçu aucune plainte d'automobilistes relativement à l'absence de signalisation, à l'absence de surélévation des courbes ou à la présence d'arbres et de végétation en bordure du a duty to repair. Here, the municipality cannot have been expected to have knowledge of the hazard that existed at the site of the accident, since the hazard did not pose a risk to the reasonable driver. Implicit in the trial judge's reasons was the expectation that the municipality should have known about the accidents through an accident reporting system, a palpable error, absent any evidence of what might have been a reasonable system.

chemin. La question de la connaissance de l'intimée est intimement liée à celle de la norme de diligence. Une municipalité est uniquement censée avoir connaissance des dangers qui présentent un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales, puisqu'il s'agit des seuls dangers à l'égard desquels existe une obligation d'entretien. En l'espèce, on ne pouvait attendre de l'intimée qu'elle connaisse le danger qui existait à l'endroit où l'accident est survenu, puisque ce danger ne présentait tout simplement pas de risque pour le conducteur raisonnable. Il ressort implicitement des motifs de la juge de première instance que la municipalité aurait censément dû connaître l'existence des accidents grâce à un système d'information en la matière, erreur manifeste en l'absence de quelque élément de preuve indiquant ce qui aurait pu constituer un système raisonnable.

With respect to her conclusions on causation, which are conclusions on matters of fact, the trial judge ignored evidence that N had swerved on the first curve he negotiated prior to the accident, and that he had driven on the road three times in the 18 to 20 hours preceding the accident. She further ignored the significance of the testimony of the forensic alcohol specialist which pointed overwhelmingly to alcohol as the causal factor which led to the accident, and erroneously relied on one statement by him to support her conclusion that a driver at N's level of impairment would have reacted to a warning sign. The finding that the outcome would have been different had N been forewarned of the curve ignores the fact that he already knew the curve was there. The fact that the trial judge referred to some evidence to support her findings on causation does not insulate them from review by this Court. An appellate court is entitled to assess whether or not it was clearly wrong for the trial judge to rely on some evidence when other evidence points overwhelmingly to the opposite conclusion.

Relativement aux conclusions de la juge de première instance sur le lien de causalité, qui sont des conclusions de fait, celle-ci a fait abstraction de la preuve que le véhicule de N avait fait une embardée dans la première courbe et que ce dernier avait roulé à trois reprises sur le chemin en question au cours des 18 à 20 heures ayant précédé l'accident. La juge de première instance a également omis de tenir compte de l'importance du témoignage du spécialiste judiciaire en matière d'alcool, qui menait irrésistiblement à la conclusion que l'alcool avait été le facteur causal de l'accident, et elle a erronément invoqué une déclaration de celui-ci au soutien de sa conclusion que N aurait réagi à un panneau de signalisation. La conclusion que le résultat aurait été différent si N avait été prévenu de l'existence de la courbe ne tient pas compte du fait qu'il savait déjà qu'elle existait. Le fait que la juge de première instance ait mentionné certains éléments de preuve au soutien de ses conclusions sur le lien de causalité n'a pas pour effet de soustraire ces conclusions au pouvoir de contrôle de notre Cour. Le tribunal d'appel est habilité à se demander si le juge de première instance a clairement fait erreur en décidant comme il l'a fait sur le fondement de certains éléments de preuve alors que d'autres éléments mènent irrésistiblement à la conclusion inverse.

Whatever the approach to the issue of the duty of care, it is only reasonable to expect a municipality to foresee accidents which occur as a result of the conditions of the road, and not, as in this case, as a result of the condition of the driver. To expand the repair obligation of municipalities to require them to take into account the actions of unreasonable or careless drivers when discharging this duty would signify a drastic and unworkable change to the current standard.

Indépendamment de l'approche choisie à l'égard de la question de l'obligation de diligence, il n'est que raisonnable d'attendre d'une municipalité qu'elle prévoit les accidents qui surviennent en raison de l'état du chemin, et non, comme en l'espèce, ceux qui résultent de l'état du conducteur. Élargir l'obligation d'entretien des municipalités en exigeant qu'elles tiennent compte, dans l'exécution de cette obligation, des actes des conducteurs déraisonnables ou imprudents, entraînerait une modification radicale et irréalisable de la norme actuelle.

IACOBUCCI AND MAJOR JJ. —

I. Introduction

A proposition that should be unnecessary to state is that a court of appeal should not interfere with a trial judge's reasons unless there is a palpable and overriding error. The same proposition is sometimes stated as prohibiting an appellate court from reviewing a trial judge's decision if there was some evidence upon which he or she could have relied to reach that conclusion.

Authority for this abounds particularly in appellate courts in Canada and abroad (see Gottardo Properties (Dome) Inc. v. Toronto (City) (1998), 162 D.L.R. (4th) 574 (Ont. C.A.); Schwartz v. Canada, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 254; Toneguzzo-Norvell (Guardian ad litem of) v. Burnaby Hospital, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 114; Van de Perre v. Edwards, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 1014, 2001 SCC 60). In addition scholars, national and international, endorse it (see C. A. Wright in "The Doubtful Omniscience of Appellate Courts" (1957), 41 Minn. L. Rev. 751, at p. 780; and the Honourable R. P. Kerans in Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994); and American Bar Association, Judicial Administration Division, Standards Relating to Appellate Courts (1995), at pp. 24-25).

The role of the appellate court was aptly defined in Underwood v. Ocean City Realty Ltd. (1987), 12 B.C.L.R. (2d) 199 (C.A.), at p. 204, where it was stated:

> The appellate court must not retry a case and must not substitute its views for the views of the trial judge according to what the appellate court thinks the evidence establishes on its view of the balance of probabilities.

Version française du jugement du juge en chef McLachlin et des juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Iacobucci, Major et Arbour rendu par

LES JUGES IACOBUCCI ET MAJOR —

I. Introduction

1 Il va sans dire qu'une cour d'appel ne devrait modifier les conclusions d'un juge de première instance qu'en cas d'erreur manifeste et dominante. On reformule parfois cette proposition en disant qu'une cour d'appel ne peut réviser la décision du juge de première instance dans les cas où il existait des éléments de preuve qui pouvaient étayer cette décision.

2 Il existe une abondante jurisprudence étayant cette proposition, particulièrement des décisions émanant de cours d'appel, tant au Canada qu'à l'étranger (voir Gottardo Properties (Dome) Inc. c. Toronto (City) (1998), 162 D.L.R. (4th) 574 (C.A. Ont.); Schwartz c. Canada, [1996] 1 R.C.S. 254; Toneguzzo-Norvell (Tutrice à l'instance de) c. Burnaby Hospital, [1994] 1 R.C.S. 114; Van de Perre c. Edwards, [2001] 2 R.C.S. 1014, 2001 CSC 60). En outre, des auteurs, tant à l'échelle nationale qu'internationale, y souscrivent (voir C. A. Wright, « The Doubtful Omniscience of Appellate Courts » (1957), 41 Minn. L. Rev. 751, p. 780; l'honorable R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994); et American Bar Association, Judicial Administration Division, Standards Relating to Appellate Courts (1995), p. 24-25).

3 Le rôle des tribunaux d'appel a été défini de manière judicieuse dans l'arrêt Underwood c. Ocean City Realty Ltd. (1987), 12 B.C.L.R. (2d) 199 (C.A.), p. 204, où la cour a dit ceci :

> [TRADUCTION] La cour d'appel ne doit pas juger l'affaire de nouveau, ni substituer son opinion à celle du juge de première instance en fonction de ce qu'elle pense que la preuve démontre, selon son opinion de la prépondérance des probabilités.

2002 SCC 33 (CanLII)

4 While the theory has acceptance, consistency in its application is missing. The foundation of the principle is as sound today as 100 years ago. It is premised on the notion that finality is an important aim of litigation. There is no suggestion that appellate court judges are somehow smarter and thus capable of reaching a better result. Their role is not to write better judgments but to review the reasons in light of the arguments of the parties and the relevant evidence, and then to uphold the decision unless a palpable error leading to a wrong result has been made by the trial judge.

Quoique cette théorie soit généralement acceptée, elle n'est pas appliquée de manière systématique. Le fondement de cette théorie est aussi valide aujourd'hui qu'il l'était il y a 100 ans. Cette théorie repose sur l'idée que le caractère définitif des décisions est un aspect important du processus judiciaire. Personne ne prétend que les juges des cours d'appel seraient, d'une manière ou d'une autre, plus intelligents que les autres et donc capables d'arriver à un meilleur résultat. Leur rôle n'est pas de rédiger de meilleurs jugements, mais de contrôler les motifs à la lumière des arguments des parties et de la preuve pertinente, puis de confirmer la décision à moins que le juge de première instance n'ait commis une erreur manifeste ayant conduit à un résultat erroné.

5 What is palpable error? The New Oxford Dictionary of English (1998) defines "palpable" as "clear to the mind or plain to see" (p. 1337). The Cambridge International Dictionary of English (1996) describes it as "so obvious that it can easily be seen or known" (p. 1020). The Random House Dictionary of the English Language (2nd ed. 1987) defines it as "readily or plainly seen" (p. 1399).

Qu'est-ce qu'une erreur manifeste? Le Trésor de la langue française (1985) définit ainsi le mot « manifeste » : « . . . Qui est tout à fait évident, qui ne peut être contesté dans sa nature ou son existence. [. . .] erreur manifeste » (p. 317). Le Grand Robert de la langue française (2e éd. 2001) définit ce mot ainsi : « Dont l'existence ou la nature est évidente. [. . .] Qui est clairement, évidemment tel. [. . .] Erreur, injustice manifeste » (p. 1139). Enfin, le Grand Larousse de la langue française (1975) donne la définition suivante de « manifeste » : « . . . Se dit d'une chose que l'on ne peut contester, qui est tout à fait évidente : Une erreur manifeste » (p. 3213).

6 The common element in each of these definitions is that palpable is plainly seen. Applying that to this appeal, in order for the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal to reverse the trial judge the "palpable and overriding" error of fact found by Cameron J.A. must be plainly seen. As we will discuss, we do not think that test has been met.

L'élément commun de ces définitions est qu'une chose « manifeste » est une chose qui est « évidente ». Si l'on applique ce critère au présent pourvoi, il faut que l'« erreur manifeste et dominante » décelée par le juge Cameron soit évidente pour que la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan puisse infirmer la décision de la juge de première instance. Comme nous le verrons plus loin, nous ne croyons pas qu'on a satisfait à ce critère en l'espèce.

II. The Role of the Appellate Court in the Case at Bar

II. Le rôle de la Cour d'appel en l'espèce

7 Given that an appeal is not a retrial of a case, consideration must be given to the applicable standard of review of an appellate court on the various issues which arise on this appeal. We therefore find it helpful to discuss briefly the standards of review relevant

Étant donné que l'appel ne constitue pas un nouveau procès, il faut se demander quelle est la norme de contrôle applicable en appel à l'égard des diverses questions que soulève le présent pourvoi. Nous estimons donc utile d'examiner brièvement to the following types of questions: (1) questions of law; (2) questions of fact; (3) inferences of fact; and (4) questions of mixed fact and law.

A. Standard of Review for Questions of Law

On a pure question of law, the basic rule with respect to the review of a trial judge's findings is that an appellate court is free to replace the opinion of the trial judge with its own. Thus the standard of review on a question of law is that of correctness: Kerans, supra, at p. 90.

There are at least two underlying reasons for employing a correctness standard to matters of law. First, the principle of universality requires appellate courts to ensure that the same legal rules are applied in similar situations. The importance of this principle was recognized by this Court in Woods Manufacturing Co. v. The King, [1951] S.C.R. 504, at p. 515:

> It is fundamental to the due administration of justice that the authority of decisions be scrupulously respected by all courts upon which they are binding. Without this uniform and consistent adherence the administration of justice becomes disordered, the law becomes uncertain, and the confidence of the public in it undermined. Nothing is more important than that the law as pronounced . . . should be accepted and applied as our tradition requires; and even at the risk of that fallibility to which all judges are liable, we must maintain the complete integrity of relationship between the courts.

A second and related reason for applying a correctness standard to matters of law is the recognized law-making role of appellate courts which is pointed out by Kerans, supra, at p. 5:

> The call for universality, and the law-settling role it imposes, makes a considerable demand on a reviewing court. It expects from that authority a measure of expertise about the art of just and practical rule-making, an expertise that is not so critical for the first court. Reviewing courts, in cases where the law requires settlement, make law for future cases as well as the case under review.

les normes de contrôle se rapportant à chacune des catégories de questions suivantes : (1) les questions de droit; (2) les questions de fait; (3) les inférences de fait; (4) les questions mixtes de fait et de droit.

A. La norme de contrôle applicable aux questions de droit

8 Dans le cas des pures questions de droit, la règle fondamentale applicable en matière de contrôle des conclusions du juge de première instance est que les cours d'appel ont toute latitude pour substituer leur opinion à celle des juges de première instance. La norme de contrôle applicable à une question de droit est donc celle de la décision correcte : Kerans, op. cit., p. 90.

9 Au moins deux raisons justifient l'application de la norme de la décision correcte aux questions de droit. Premièrement, le principe de l'universalité impose aux cours d'appel le devoir de veiller à ce que les mêmes règles de droit soient appliquées dans des situations similaires. Notre Cour a reconnu l'importance de ce principe dans Woods Manufacturing Co. c. The King, [1951] R.C.S. 504, p. 515 :

> [TRADUCTION] Il est fondamental, pour assurer la bonne administration de la justice, que l'autorité des décisions soit scrupuleusement respectée par tous les tribunaux qui sont liées par elles. Sans cette adhésion générale et constante, l'administration de la justice sera désordonnée, le droit deviendra incertain et la confiance dans celui-ci sera ébranlée. Il importe plus que tout que le droit, tel qu'il a été énoncé, [. . .] soit accepté et appliqué comme l'exige notre tradition; et même au risque de nous tromper, tous les juges étant faillibles, nous devons préserver totalement l'intégrité des rapports entre les tribunaux.

Une deuxième raison, connexe, d'appliquer la norme de la décision correcte aux questions de droit tient au rôle qu'on reconnaît aux cours d'appel en matière de création du droit et qu'a souligné Kerans, op. cit., p. 5 :

> [TRADUCTION] Le principe de l'universalité — et le rôle de création du droit qu'il emporte — exige beaucoup du tribunal de révision. Il exige de ce tribunal qu'il fasse preuve d'un certain degré d'expertise dans l'art d'élaborer une règle de droit juste et pratique, expertise qui ne revêt pas une importance aussi cruciale pour le premier tribunal. Dans les affaires où le droit n'est pas fixé, le tribunal de révision élabore des règles de droit applicables tout autant à d'éventuelles affaires qu'à celle dont il est saisi.

Thus, while the primary role of trial courts is to resolve individual disputes based on the facts before them and settled law, the primary role of appellate courts is to delineate and refine legal rules and ensure their universal application. In order to fulfill the above functions, appellate courts require a broad scope of review with respect to matters of law.

Ainsi, alors que le rôle premier des tribunaux de première instance consiste à résoudre des litiges sur la base des faits dont ils disposent et du droit établi, celui des cours d'appel est de préciser et de raffiner les règles de droit et de veiller à leur application universelle. Pour s'acquitter de ces rôles, les cours d'appel ont besoin d'un large pouvoir de contrôle à l'égard des questions de droit.

B. Standard of Review for Findings of Fact

B. La norme de contrôle applicable aux questions de fait

10 The standard of review for findings of fact is that such findings are not to be reversed unless it can be established that the trial judge made a "palpable and overriding error": Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K", [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802, at p. 808; Ingles v. Tutkaluk Construction Ltd., [2000] 1 S.C.R. 298, 2000 SCC 12, at para. 42; Ryan v. Victoria (City), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 201, at para. 57. While this standard is often cited, the principles underlying this high degree of deference rarely receive mention. We find it useful, for the purposes of this appeal, to review briefly the various policy reasons for employing a high level of appellate deference to findings of fact.

Suivant la norme de contrôle applicable aux conclusions de fait, ces conclusions ne peuvent être infirmées que s'il est établi que le juge de première instance a commis une « erreur manifeste et dominante » : Stein c. Le navire « Kathy K », [1976] 2 R.C.S. 802, p. 808; Ingles c. Tutkaluk Construction Ltd., [2000] 1 R.C.S. 298, 2000 CSC 12, par. 42; Ryan c. Victoria (Ville), [1999] 1 R.C.S. 201, par. 57. On cite souvent cette norme, mais rarement les principes justifiant ce degré élevé de retenue. Pour les besoins du présent pourvoi, nous estimons qu'il est utile d'examiner brièvement les diverses considérations de principe qui incitent les cours d'appel à faire preuve d'un degré élevé de retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait.

11 A fundamental reason for general deference to the trial judge is the presumption of fitness — a presumption that trial judges are just as competent as appellate judges to ensure that disputes are resolved justly. Kerans, supra, at pp. 10-11, states that:

> If we have confidence in these systems for the resolution of disputes, we should assume that those decisions are just. The appeal process is part of the decisional process, then, only because we recognize that, despite all effort, errors occur. An appeal should be the exception rather than the rule, as indeed it is in Canada.

L'une des raisons fondamentales de cette retenue générale à l'égard des conclusions des juges de première instance tient à la présomption d'aptitude à juger — présomption selon laquelle les juges de première instance sont tout aussi aptes que les juges d'appel à apporter des solutions justes aux litiges. Kerans, op. cit., dit ceci aux p. 10-11 :

> [TRADUCTION] Si nous nous fions à ces systèmes pour régler les différends, il nous faut présumer que les décisions qu'ils produisent sont justes. La procédure d'appel ne fait en conséquence partie du processus décisionnel que parce que nous reconnaissons que, malgré tous les efforts déployés, des erreurs se produisent. L'appel devrait être l'exception plutôt que la règle, ce qui est d'ailleurs le cas au Canada.

12 With respect to findings of fact in particular, in Gottardo Properties, supra, Laskin J.A. summarized the purposes underlying a deferential stance as follows (at para. 48):

Pour ce qui est des conclusions de fait en particulier, dans Gottardo Properties, précité, le juge Laskin de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a résumé ainsi les objectifs qui sous-tendent le principe de la retenue judiciaire (au par. 48) :

Deference is desirable for several reasons: to limit the number and length of appeals, to promote the autonomy and integrity of the trial or motion court proceedings on which substantial resources have been expended, to preserve the confidence of litigants in those proceedings, to recognize the competence of the trial judge or motion judge and to reduce needless duplication of judicial effort with no corresponding improvement in the quality of justice.

[TRADUCTION] La retenue est souhaitable pour diverses raisons : pour limiter le nombre et la durée des appels, pour promouvoir l'autonomie et l'intégrité des procédures devant le tribunal de première instance ou la cour des requêtes auxquelles de nombreuses ressources ont été consacrées, pour maintenir la confiance des plaideurs, pour reconnaître la compétence du juge de première instance ou du juge des requêtes, et pour réduire la multiplication inutile des procédures qui n'entraînent aucune amélioration correspondante de la qualité de la justice.

Similar concerns were expressed by La Forest J. in Schwartz, supra, at para. 32:

It has long been settled that appellate courts must treat a trial judge's findings of fact with great deference. The rule is principally based on the assumption that the trier of fact is in a privileged position to assess the credibility of witnesses' testimony at trial. . . . Others have also pointed out additional judicial policy concerns to justify the rule. Unlimited intervention by appellate courts would greatly increase the number and the length of appeals generally. Substantial resources are allocated to trial courts to go through the process of assessing facts. The autonomy and integrity of the trial process must be preserved by exercising deference towards the trial courts' findings of fact; see R. D. Gibbens, "Appellate Review of Findings of Fact" (1992), 13 Adv. Q. 445, at pp. 445-48; Fletcher v. Manitoba Public Insurance Co., [1990] 3 S.C.R. 191, at p. 204.

Le juge La Forest a exprimé des préoccupations semblables dans l'arrêt Schwartz, précité, par. 32 :

Il est établi depuis longtemps que les cours d'appel doivent faire preuve d'une grande retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait d'un juge de première instance. La règle se justifie principalement par la situation avantageuse dont bénéficie le juge des faits pour ce qui est d'évaluer la crédibilité des témoignages entendus au procès. [. . .] D'autres préoccupations liées à la politique judiciaire ont par ailleurs été invoquées pour justifier la règle. Une intervention illimitée des cours d'appel ferait augmenter considérablement le nombre et la durée des appels en général. D'importantes ressources sont mises à la disposition des tribunaux de première instance pour qu'ils puissent évaluer les faits. Il faut préserver l'autonomie et l'intégrité du procès en faisant preuve de retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait des tribunaux de première instance; voir R. D. Gibbens, « Appellate Review of Findings of Fact » (1992), 13 Adv. Q. 445, aux pp. 445 à 448; Fletcher c. Société d'assurance publique du Manitoba, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 191, à la p. 204.

In Anderson v. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564 (1985), at pp. 574-75, the United States Supreme Court also listed numerous reasons for deferring to the factual findings of the trial judge:

Dans Anderson c. Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564 (1985), p. 574-575, la Cour suprême des États-Unis a aussi dressé une liste de raisons qui justifient de faire preuve de retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait des juges de première instance :

The rationale for deference to the original finder of fact is not limited to the superiority of the trial judge's position to make determinations of credibility. The trial judge's major role is the determination of fact, and with experience in fulfilling that role comes expertise. Duplication of the trial judge's efforts in the court of appeals would very likely contribute only negligibly to the accuracy of fact determination at a huge cost in diversion of judicial resources. In addition, the parties to a case on appeal have already been forced to concentrate [TRADUCTION] La raison d'être de la retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait du juge de première instance ne se limite pas au fait que ce dernier est mieux placé pour statuer sur la crédibilité. Le rôle principal du juge de première instance est de constater les faits, et l'expérience qu'il acquiert en s'acquittant de ce rôle lui confère son expertise à cet égard. Si les cours d'appel refaisaient le travail du juge de première instance, il est fort possible que ces efforts n'amélioreraient que marginalement l'exactitude des conclusions de fait, malgré their energies and resources on persuading the trial judge that their account of the facts is the correct one; requiring them to persuade three more judges at the appellate level is requiring too much. As the Court has stated in a different context, the trial on the merits should be "the 'main event' . . . rather than a 'tryout on the road.'" . . . For these reasons, review of factual findings under the clearly-erroneous standard — with its deference to the trier of fact — is the rule, not the exception.

les ressources judiciaires considérables qui devraient être réaffectées à cette fin. En outre, les parties à un appel ont déjà dû consacrer énergies et ressources à convaincre le juge de première instance de la justesse de leur version des faits; ce serait abuser que de leur demander de convaincre trois autres juges en appel. Comme l'a dit notre Cour dans un contexte différent, le procès sur le fond devrait être considéré comme « "l'épreuve principale" [. . .] plutôt que comme un "banc d'essai" ». [. . .] Pour ces motifs, le contrôle des décisions de fait selon la norme de la décision manifestement erronée — et la retenue envers le juge de première instance qu'elle suppose — est la règle, et non l'exception.

14 Further comments regarding the advantages possessed by the trial judge have been made by R. D. Gibbens in "Appellate Review of Findings of Fact" (1991-92), 13 Advocates' Q. 445, at p. 446:

D'autres observations sur les avantages dont disposent le juge de première instance ont été formulées par R. D. Gibbens dans « Appellate Review of Findings of Fact » (1991-92), 13 Advocates' Q. 445, p. 446 :

The trial judge is said to have an expertise in assessing and weighing the facts developed at trial. Similarly, the trial judge has also been exposed to the entire case. The trial judge has sat through the entire case and his ultimate judgment reflects this total familiarity with the evidence. The insight gained by the trial judge who has lived with the case for several days, weeks or even months may be far deeper than that of the Court of Appeal whose view of the case is much more limited and narrow, often being shaped and distorted by the various orders or rulings being challenged.

[TRADUCTION] On dit que le juge de première instance possède de l'expertise dans l'évaluation et l'appréciation des faits présentés au procès. Il a également entendu l'affaire au complet. Il a assisté à toute la cause et son jugement final reflète cette connaissance intime de la preuve. Cette connaissance, acquise par le juge au fil des jours, des semaines voire des mois qu'a durés l'affaire, peut se révéler beaucoup plus profonde que celle de la cour d'appel, dont la perception est beaucoup plus limitée et étroite, et souvent déterminée et déformée par les diverses ordonnances et décisions qui sont contestées.

The corollary to this recognized advantage of trial courts and judges is that appellate courts are not in a favourable position to assess and determine factual matters. Appellate court judges are restricted to reviewing written transcripts of testimony. As well, appeals are unsuited to reviewing voluminous amounts of evidence. Finally, appeals are telescopic in nature, focussing narrowly on particular issues as opposed to viewing the case as a whole.

Cet avantage reconnu des tribunaux et des juges de première instance a pour corollaire que les cours d'appel ne sont pas dans une position favorable pour évaluer et apprécier les questions de fait. Les juges des cours d'appel n'examinent que la transcription des témoignages. De plus, les appels ne se prêtent pas à l'examen de dossiers volumineux. Enfin, les appels ont un caractère « focalisateur », en ce qu'ils s'attachent à des questions particulières plutôt qu'à l'ensemble de l'affaire.

15 In our view, the numerous bases for deferring to the findings of fact of the trial judge which are discussed in the above authorities can be grouped into the following three basic principles.

À notre avis, ces diverses raisons justifiant la retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait du juge de première instance peuvent être regroupées sous les trois principes de base suivants.

(1) Limiting the Number, Length and Cost of Appeals

(1) Réduire le nombre, la durée et le coût des appels

16 Given the scarcity of judicial resources, setting limits on the scope of judicial review is to be

Vu la rareté des ressources dont disposent les tribunaux, il faut encourager l'établissement encouraged. Deferring to a trial judge's findings of fact not only serves this end, but does so on a principled basis. Substantial resources are allocated to trial courts for the purpose of assessing facts. To allow for wide-ranging review of the trial judge's factual findings results in needless duplication of judicial proceedings with little, if any improvement in the result. In addition, lengthy appeals prejudice litigants with fewer resources, and frustrate the goal of providing an efficient and effective remedy for the parties.

de limites à la portée du contrôle judiciaire. La retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait du juge de première instance sert cet objectif d'une manière rationnelle. D'importantes ressources sont allouées aux tribunaux de première instance aux fins d'évaluation des faits. Permettre un large contrôle des conclusions factuelles des juges de première instance entraîne une inutile répétition de procédures judiciaires, tout en n'améliorant que peu ou pas le résultat. En outre, de longs appels causent préjudice aux plaideurs moins bien nantis et compromettent l'objectif qui consiste à mettre à leur disposition des recours efficients et efficaces.

(2) Promoting the Autonomy and Integrity of Trial Proceedings

(2) Favoriser l'autonomie du procès et son intégrité

17 The presumption underlying the structure of our court system is that a trial judge is competent to decide the case before him or her, and that a just and fair outcome will result from the trial process. Frequent and unlimited appeals would undermine this presumption and weaken public confidence in the trial process. An appeal is the exception rather than the rule.

17 L'organisation de notre système judiciaire repose sur la présomption que le juge de première instance est qualifié pour trancher l'affaire dont il est saisi et qu'une solution juste et équitable résultera du procès. Des appels fréquents et illimités affaibliraient cette présomption et saperait la confiance du public dans le processus judiciaire. L'appel est l'exception, non la règle.

(3) Recognizing the Expertise of the Trial Judge and His or Her Advantageous Position

(3) Reconnaître l'expertise du juge de première instance et sa position avantageuse

18 The trial judge is better situated to make factual findings owing to his or her extensive exposure to the evidence, the advantage of hearing testimony viva voce, and the judge's familiarity with the case as a whole. Because the primary role of the trial judge is to weigh and assess voluminous quantities of evidence, the expertise and insight of the trial judge in this area should be respected.

18 Le juge de première instance est celui qui est le mieux placé pour tirer des conclusions de fait, parce qu'il a l'occasion d'examiner la preuve en profondeur, d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix et de se familiariser avec l'affaire dans son ensemble. Étant donné que le rôle principal du juge de première instance est d'apprécier et de soupeser d'abondantes quantités d'éléments de preuve, son expertise dans ce domaine et sa connaissance intime du dossier doivent être respectées.

C. Standard of Review for Inferences of Fact

C. La norme de contrôle applicable aux inférences de fait

19 We find it necessary to address the appropriate standard of review for factual inferences because the reasons of our colleague suggest that a lower standard of review may be applied to the inferences of fact drawn by a trial judge. With respect, it is our

19 Nous estimons nécessaire de nous pencher sur la question de la norme de contrôle appropriée quant aux inférences de fait des juges de première instance, parce que les motifs de notre collègue suggèrent qu'une norme de contrôle moins exigeante peut view, that to apply a lower standard of review to inferences of fact would be to depart from established jurisprudence of this Court, and would be contrary to the principles supporting a deferential stance to matters of fact.

être appliquée à cet égard. En toute déférence, nous sommes d'avis que l'application d'une telle norme de contrôle romprait avec la jurisprudence établie de notre Cour en la matière et serait contraire aux principes justifiant le respect d'une attitude empreinte de retenue à l'égard des constatations de fait.

20 Our colleague acknowledges that, in Geffen v. Goodman Estate, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 353, this Court determined that a trial judge's inferences of fact and findings of fact should be accorded a similar degree of deference. The relevant passage from Geffen is the following (per Wilson J., at pp. 388-89):

Notre collègue reconnaît que dans l'arrêt Geffen c. Succession Goodman, [1991] 2 R.C.S. 353, notre Cour a jugé qu'il fallait faire preuve du même degré de retenue à l'égard des inférences de fait du juge de première instance qu'à l'égard de ses constatations de fait. Voici le passage pertinent des motifs de madame le juge Wilson (aux p. 388-389) :

> It is by now well established that findings of fact made at trial based on the credibility of witnesses are not to be reversed on appeal unless it is established that the trial judge made some palpable and overriding error which affected his assessment of the facts . . . . Even where a finding of fact is not contingent upon credibility, this Court has maintained a non-interventionist approach to the review of trial court findings. . . .
> And even in those cases where a finding of fact is neither inextricably linked to the credibility of the testifying witness nor based on a misapprehension of the evidence, the rule remains that appellate review should be limited to those instances where a manifest error has been made. Hence, in Schreiber Brothers Ltd. v. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 S.C.R. 78, this Court refused to overturn a trial judge's finding that certain goods were defective, stating at pp. 84-85 that it is wrong for an appellate court to set aside a trial judgment where the only point at issue is the interpretation of the evidence as a whole (citing Métivier v. Cadorette, [1977] 1 S.C.R. 371).

> C'est maintenant un principe bien établi que les constatations de fait d'un juge de première instance, fondées sur la crédibilité des témoins, ne doivent pas être infirmées en appel à moins qu'il ne soit prouvé que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante qui a faussé son appréciation des faits [. . .] Même si une constatation de fait ne dépend pas de la crédibilité, notre Cour a pour principe de ne pas intervenir pour réviser les constatations des tribunaux de première instance . . .
> Et même dans les cas où une constatation de fait n'est ni liée inextricablement à la crédibilité du témoin ni fondée sur une mauvaise compréhension de la preuve, la règle reste la même : l'examen en appel devrait se limiter aux cas où une erreur manifeste a été commise. C'est pourquoi, dans l'arrêt Schreiber Brothers Ltd. c. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 R.C.S. 78, notre Cour a refusé d'infirmer la conclusion du juge de première instance que certaines marchandises étaient défectueuses, disant, aux pp. 84 et 85, qu'une cour d'appel ne peut à bon droit infirmer une décision de première instance lorsque la seule question en litige porte sur l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve (citant Métivier c. Cadorette, [1977] 1 R.C.S. 371).

This view has been reiterated by this Court on numerous occasions: see Palsky v. Humphrey, [1964] S.C.R. 580, at p. 583; Schwartz, supra, at para. 32; Hodgkinson v. Simms, [1994] 3 S.C.R. 377, at p. 426, per La Forest J.; Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra. The United States Supreme Court has taken a similar position: see Anderson, supra, at p. 577.

Notre Cour a réitéré cette opinion à maintes reprises : voir Palsky c. Humphrey, [1964] R.C.S. 580, p. 583; Schwartz, précité, par. 32; Hodgkinson c. Simms, [1994] 3 R.C.S. 377, p. 426, le juge La Forest; Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité. La Cour suprême des États-Unis a adopté une position semblable : voir Anderson, précité, p. 577.

21 In discussing the standard of review of the trial judge's inferences of fact, our colleague states, at para. 103, that:

Dans son examen de la norme de contrôle applicable aux inférences de fait du juge de première instance, notre collègue dit ce qui suit, au par. 103 :

2002 SCC 33 (CanLII)

In reviewing the making of an inference, the appeal court will verify whether it can reasonably be supported by the findings of fact that the trial judge reached and whether the judge proceeded on proper legal principles. . . . While the standard of review is identical for both findings of fact and inferences of fact, it is nonetheless important to draw an analytical distinction between the two. If the reviewing court were to review only for errors of fact, then the decision of the trial judge would necessarily be upheld in every case where evidence existed to support his or her factual findings. In my view, this Court is entitled to conclude that inferences made by the trial judge were clearly wrong, just as it is entitled to reach this conclusion in respect to findings of fact. [Emphasis added.]

La cour d'appel qui contrôle la validité d'une inférence se demande si celle-ci peut raisonnablement être étayée par les conclusions de fait tirées par le juge de première instance et si celui-ci a appliqué les principes juridiques appropriés. [. . .] Bien que la norme de contrôle soit la même et pour les conclusions de fait et pour les inférences de fait, il importe néanmoins de faire une distinction analytique entre les deux. Si le tribunal de révision ne faisait que vérifier s'il y a des erreurs de fait, la décision du juge de première instance serait alors nécessairement confirmée dans tous les cas où il existe des éléments de preuve étayant les conclusions de fait de ce dernier. Selon moi, notre Cour a le droit de conclure que les inférences du juge de première instance étaient manifestement erronées, tout comme elle peut le faire à l'égard des conclusions de fait. [Nous soulignons.]

With respect, we find two problems with this passage. First, in our view, the standard of review is not to verify that the inference can be reasonably supported by the findings of fact of the trial judge, but whether the trial judge made a palpable and overriding error in coming to a factual conclusion based on accepted facts, which implies a stricter standard.

En toute déférence, nous estimons que ce passage comporte deux erreurs. Premièrement, selon nous, la norme de contrôle ne consiste pas à vérifier si l'inférence peut être raisonnablement étayée par les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance, mais plutôt si ce dernier a commis une erreur manifeste et dominante en tirant une conclusion factuelle sur la base de faits admis, ce qui suppose l'application d'une norme plus stricte.

Second, with respect, we find that by drawing an analytical distinction between factual findings and factual inferences, the above passage may lead appellate courts to involve themselves in an unjustified reweighing of the evidence. Although we agree that it is open to an appellate court to find that an inference of fact made by the trial judge is clearly wrong, we would add the caution that where evidence exists to support this inference, an appellate court will be hard pressed to find a palpable and overriding error. As stated above, trial courts are in an advantageous position when it comes to assessing and weighing vast quantities of evidence. In making a factual inference, the trial judge must sift through the relevant facts, decide on their weight, and draw a factual conclusion. Thus, where evidence exists which supports this conclusion, interference with this conclusion entails interference with the weight assigned by the trial judge to the pieces of evidence.

Deuxièmement, nous croyons en toute déférence qu'en faisant une distinction analytique entre les conclusions factuelles et les inférences factuelles, le passage précité pourrait amener les cours d'appel à soupeser la preuve à nouveau et sans raison. Bien que nous partagions l'opinion selon laquelle il est loisible à une cour d'appel de conclure qu'une inférence de fait tirée par le juge de première instance est manifestement erronée, nous tenons toutefois à faire la mise en garde suivante : lorsque des éléments de preuve étayent cette inférence, il sera difficile à une cour d'appel de conclure à l'existence d'une erreur manifeste et dominante. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, les tribunaux de première instance sont dans une position avantageuse pour apprécier et soupeser de vastes quantités d'éléments de preuve. Pour tirer une inférence factuelle, le juge de première instance doit passer les faits pertinents au crible, en apprécier la valeur probante et tirer une conclusion factuelle. En conséquence, lorsque cette conclusion est étayée par des éléments de preuve, modifier cette conclusion équivaut à modifier le poids accordé à ces éléments par le juge de première instance.

23 We reiterate that it is not the role of appellate courts to second-guess the weight to be assigned to the various items of evidence. If there is no palpable and overriding error with respect to the underlying facts that the trial judge relies on to draw the inference, then it is only where the inference-drawing process itself is palpably in error that an appellate court can interfere with the factual conclusion. The appellate court is not free to interfere with a factual conclusion that it disagrees with where such disagreement stems from a difference of opinion over the weight to be assigned to the underlying facts. As we discuss below, it is our respectful view that our colleague's finding that the trial judge erred by imputing knowledge of the hazard to the municipality in this case is an example of this type of impermissible interference with the factual inference drawn by the trial judge.

Nous rappelons qu'il n'appartient pas aux cours d'appel de remettre en question le poids attribué aux différents éléments de preuve. Si aucune erreur manifeste et dominante n'est décelée en ce qui concerne les faits sur lesquels repose l'inférence du juge de première instance, ce n'est que lorsque le processus inférentiel lui-même est manifestement erroné que la cour d'appel peut modifier la conclusion factuelle. La cour d'appel n'est pas habilitée à modifier une conclusion factuelle avec laquelle elle n'est pas d'accord, lorsque ce désaccord résulte d'une divergence d'opinion sur le poids à attribuer aux faits à la base de la conclusion. Comme nous le verrons plus loin, nous estimons en toute déférence que constitue un exemple de ce genre d'intervention inadmissible à l'égard d'une inférence de fait la conclusion de notre collègue selon laquelle la juge de première instance a commis une erreur en prêtant à la municipalité la connaissance du danger dans la présente affaire.

24 In addition, in distinguishing inferences of fact from findings of fact, our colleague states, at para. 102, that deference to findings of fact is "principally grounded in the recognition that only the trial judge enjoys the opportunity to observe witnesses and to hear testimony first-hand", a rationale which does not bear on factual inferences. With respect, we disagree with this view. As we state above, there are numerous reasons for showing deference to the factual findings of a trial judge, many of which are equally applicable to all factual conclusions of the trial judge. This was pointed out in Schwartz, supra. After listing numerous policy concerns justifying a deferential approach to findings of fact, at para. 32 La Forest J. goes on to state:

> This explains why the rule [that appellate courts must treat a trial judge's findings of fact with great deference] applies not only when the credibility of witnesses is at issue, although in such a case it may be more strictly applied, but also to all conclusions of fact made by the trial judge. [Emphasis added.]

De plus, en établissant une distinction entre les inférences de fait et les conclusions de fait, notre collègue dit, au par. 102, que la retenue à l'égard des secondes « repose principalement sur le fait que, puisqu'il [le juge de première instance] est le seul à avoir l'occasion d'observer les témoins et d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix », justification non pertinente dans le cas des inférences de fait. En toute déférence, nous ne partageons pas cette opinion. Comme nous l'avons dit plus tôt, il existe de nombreuses raisons de faire preuve de retenue à l'égard des constatations de fait du juge de première instance, dont plusieurs valent autant pour toutes ses conclusions factuelles. Cette observation a été faite dans l'arrêt Schwartz, précité. Après avoir énuméré les nombreuses considérations de politique judiciaire invoquées pour justifier la règle de la retenue à l'égard des constatations de fait, le juge La Forest, au par. 32, ajoute :

> Cela explique pourquoi la règle [selon laquelle les cours d'appel doivent faire preuve d'une grande retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait des juges de première instance] s'applique non seulement lorsque la crédibilité des témoins est en cause, quoiqu'elle puisse alors s'appliquer plus strictement, mais également à toutes les conclusions de fait tirées par le juge de première instance. [Nous soulignons.]

Recent support for deferring to all factual conclusions of the trial judge is found in Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra. McLachlin J. (as she then was) for a unanimous Court stated, at pp. 121-22:

A Court of Appeal is clearly not entitled to interfere merely because it takes a different view of the evidence. The finding of facts and the drawing of evidentiary conclusions from facts is the province of the trial judge, not the Court of Appeal.

I agree that the principle of non-intervention of a Court of Appeal in a trial judge's findings of facts does not apply with the same force to inferences drawn from conflicting testimony of expert witnesses where the credibility of these witnesses is not in issue. This does not however change the fact that the weight to be assigned to the various pieces of evidence is under our trial system essentially the province of the trier of fact, in this case the trial judge. [Emphasis added.]

We take the above comments of McLachlin J. to mean that, although the same high standard of deference applies to the entire range of factual determinations made by the trial judge, where a factual finding is grounded in an assessment of credibility of a witness, the overwhelming advantage of the trial judge in this area must be acknowledged. This does not, however, imply that there is a lower standard of review where witness credibility is not in issue, or that there are not numerous policy reasons supporting deference to all factual conclusions of the trial judge. In our view, this is made clear by the underlined portion of the above passage. The essential point is that making a factual conclusion, of any kind, is inextricably linked with assigning weight to evidence, and thus attracts a deferential standard of review.

Although the trial judge will always be in a distinctly privileged position when it comes to

Notre Cour a récemment donné son appui à la règle de la retenue judiciaire à l'égard de l'ensemble des conclusions factuelles du juge de première instance dans l'arrêt Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité. Madame le juge McLachlin (maintenant Juge en chef), qui a rédigé le jugement unanime de notre Cour, a dit ceci, aux p. 121-122 :

Une cour d'appel n'est manifestement pas autorisée à intervenir pour le simple motif qu'elle perçoit la preuve différemment. Il appartient au juge de première instance, et non à la cour d'appel, de tirer des conclusions de fait en matière de preuve.

Je reconnais que le principe de non-intervention d'une cour d'appel dans les conclusions de fait d'un juge de première instance ne s'applique pas avec la même vigueur aux conclusions tirées de témoignages d'expert contradictoires lorsque la crédibilité de ces derniers n'est pas en cause. Il n'en demeure pas moins que, selon notre système de procès, il appartient essentiellement au juge des faits, en l'espèce le juge de première instance, d'attribuer un poids aux différents éléments de preuve. [Nous soulignons.]

Nous considérons que ces propos du juge McLachlin signifient que, bien que le même degré élevé de retenue s'applique à l'ensemble des décisions factuelles du juge de première instance, lorsqu'une telle conclusion factuelle repose sur l'appréciation de la crédibilité d'un témoin, il faut reconnaître l'énorme avantage dont jouit le juge de première instance à cet égard. Cela ne veut toutefois pas dire qu'une norme de contrôle moins rigoureuse s'applique lorsque la question en jeu ne porte pas sur la crédibilité d'un témoin, ni qu'il n'existe pas de nombreuses considérations de principe justifiant de faire montre de retenue à l'égard de toutes les conclusions factuelles. À notre avis, cela ressort clairement du passage souligné dans l'extrait précité. Le point essentiel est qu'une conclusion factuelle — quelle que soit sa nature — exige nécessairement qu'on attribue un certain poids à un élément de preuve et, de ce fait, commande l'application d'une norme de contrôle empreinte de retenue.

Bien que le juge de première instance soit toujours dans une position privilégiée pour apprécier assessing the credibility of witnesses, this is not the only area where the trial judge has an advantage over appellate judges. Advantages enjoyed by the trial judge with respect to the drawing of factual inferences include the trial judge's relative expertise with respect to the weighing and assessing of evidence, and the trial judge's inimitable familiarity with the often vast quantities of evidence. This extensive exposure to the entire factual nexus of a case will be of invaluable assistance when it comes to drawing factual conclusions. In addition, concerns with respect to cost, number and length of appeals apply equally to inferences of fact and findings of fact, and support a deferential approach towards both. As such, we respectfully disagree with our colleague's view that the principal rationale for showing deference to findings of fact is the opportunity to observe witnesses first-hand. It is our view that the trial judge enjoys numerous advantages over appellate judges which bear on all conclusions of fact, and, even in the absence of these advantages, there are other compelling policy reasons supporting a deferential approach to inferences of fact. We conclude, therefore, by emphasizing that there is one, and only one, standard of review applicable to all factual conclusions made by the trial judge — that of palpable and overriding error.

la crédibilité des témoins, ce n'est pas là le seul domaine où il bénéficie d'un avantage sur les juges des cours d'appel. Parmi les avantages dont jouit le juge de première instance sur le plan des inférences factuelles, mentionnons son expertise relative en matière d'appréciation et d'évaluation de la preuve, de même que la connaissance unique qu'il possède de la preuve souvent abondante produite par les parties. Cette familiarité avec toute la trame factuelle lui est d'une grande utilité lorsque vient le moment de tirer des conclusions de fait. En outre, les considérations relatives au coût, au nombre et à la durée des appels sont tout aussi pertinentes pour ce qui est des inférences de fait que pour ce qui est des conclusions de fait, et justifient l'application aux unes comme aux autres d'une norme empreinte de retenue. En conséquence, nous ne partageons pas l'opinion de notre collègue selon laquelle la raison principale justifiant de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des conclusions de fait est la possibilité qu'a le juge de première instance d'observer les témoins directement. Nous sommes d'avis que le juge de première instance jouit, par rapport aux juges d'appel, de nombreux avantages qui influent sur toutes les conclusions de fait et que, même si ces avantages n'existaient pas, d'autres considérations impérieuses justifient de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des inférences de fait. Par conséquent, nous concluons en soulignant qu'il n'y a qu'une seule et unique norme de contrôle applicable à toutes les conclusions factuelles tirées par le juge de première instance, soit celle de l'erreur manifeste et dominante.

D. Standard of Review for Questions of Mixed Fact and Law

26 At the outset, it is important to distinguish questions of mixed fact and law from factual findings (whether direct findings or inferences). Questions of mixed fact and law involve applying a legal standard to a set of facts: Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748, at para. 35. On the other hand, factual findings or inferences require making a conclusion of fact based on a set of facts. Both mixed fact and law and fact findings often involve drawing inferences; the difference lies in whether the inference drawn is legal

D. La norme de contrôle applicable aux questions mixtes de fait et de droit

D'entrée de jeu, il importe de distinguer les questions mixtes de fait et de droit des conclusions factuelles (qu'il s'agisse de conclusions directes ou d'inférences). Les questions mixtes de fait et de droit supposent l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits : Canada (Directeur des enquêtes et des recherches) c. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 R.C.S. 748, par. 35. Par contre, les conclusions ou les inférences de fait exigent que soit tirée une conclusion factuelle d'un ensemble de faits. Tant les questions mixtes de fait et de droit que les questions or factual. Because of this similarity, the two types of questions are sometimes confounded. This confusion was pointed out by A. L. Goodhart in "Appeals on Questions of Fact" (1955), 71 L.Q.R. 402, at p. 405:

> The distinction between [the perception of facts and the evaluation of facts] tends to be obfuscated because we use such a phrase as "the judge found as a fact that the defendant had been negligent," when what we mean to say is that "the judge found as a fact that the defendant had done acts A and B, and as a matter of opinion he reached the conclusion that it was not reasonable for the defendant to have acted in that way."

In the case at bar, there are examples of both types of questions. The issue of whether the municipality ought to have known of the hazard in the road involves weighing the underlying facts and making factual findings as to the knowledge of the municipality. It also involves applying a legal standard, which in this case is provided by s. 192(3) of the Rural Municipality Act, 1989, S.S. 1989-90, c. R-26.1, to these factual findings. Similarly, the finding of negligence involves weighing the underlying facts, making factual conclusions therefrom, and drawing an inference as to whether or not the municipality failed to exercise the legal standard of reasonable care and therefore was negligent.

Once it has been determined that a matter being reviewed involves the application of a legal standard to a set of facts, and is thus a question of mixed fact and law, then the appropriate standard of review must be determined and applied. Given the different standards of review applicable to questions of law and questions of fact, it is often difficult to determine what the applicable standard of review is. In Southam, supra, at para. 39, this Court illustrated how an error on a question of mixed fact and law can amount to a pure error of law subject to the correctness standard:

> . . . if a decision-maker says that the correct test requires him or her to consider A, B, C, and D, but in fact the de fait exigent souvent du tribunal qu'il tire des inférences; la différence réside dans le caractère — juridique ou factuel — de ces inférences. En raison de cette similitude, on confond parfois les deux catégories de questions. Cette confusion a été soulignée par A. L. Goodhart dans « Appeals on Questions of Fact » (1955), 71 L.Q.R. 402, p. 405 :

> [TRADUCTION] La distinction entre [la perception des faits et l'appréciation de ceux-ci] a tendance à être embrouillée parce que nous utilisons la formule « le juge a conclu au fait que le défendeur avait été négligent », alors que ce que nous voulons dire, c'est que « le juge a constaté le fait que le défendeur a commis les actes A et B et, suivant son opinion, il a conclu qu'il n'était pas raisonnable pour ce dernier d'avoir agi ainsi ».

L'affaire qui nous occupe présente des exemples des deux catégories de questions. Pour répondre à la question de savoir si la municipalité aurait dû connaître le danger présenté par le chemin, il faut apprécier les faits à l'origine de l'affaire et tirer des conclusions factuelles relativement à la connaissance de la municipalité. Il faut appliquer à ces conclusions factuelles une norme juridique qui, en l'occurrence, est énoncée au par. 192(3) de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, S.S. 1989-90, ch. R-26.1. De même, pour pouvoir conclure à la négligence, il faut apprécier les faits essentiels, en tirer des conclusions factuelles puis en dégager une inférence, c'est-à-dire se demander si la municipalité a oui ou non omis de respecter la norme de diligence raisonnable et si elle a, par conséquent, été négligente ou non.

Une fois établi que la question examinée exige l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits et qu'il s'agit donc d'une question mixte de fait et de droit, il faut alors déterminer quelle est la norme de contrôle appropriée et l'appliquer. Vu les diverses normes de contrôle qui s'appliquent aux questions de droit et aux questions de fait, il est souvent difficile de déterminer celle qui s'applique. Dans l'arrêt Southam, précité, par. 39, notre Cour a expliqué comment une erreur touchant une question mixte de fait et de droit peut constituer une pure erreur de droit, assujettie à la norme de la décision correcte :

> . . . si un décideur dit que, en vertu du critère applicable, il lui faut tenir compte de A, B, C et D, mais que, dans les decision-maker considers only A, B, and C, then the outcome is as if he or she had applied a law that required consideration of only A, B, and C. If the correct test requires him or her to consider D as well, then the decision-maker has in effect applied the wrong law, and so has made an error of law.

faits, il ne prend en considération que A, B, et C, alors le résultat est le même que s'il avait appliqué une règle de droit lui dictant de ne tenir compte que de A, B et C. Si le bon critère lui commandait de tenir compte aussi de D, il a en fait appliqué la mauvaise règle de droit et commis, de ce fait, une erreur de droit.

Therefore, what appears to be a question of mixed fact and law, upon further reflection, can actually be an error of pure law.

Par conséquent, ce qui peut paraître une question mixte de fait et de droit peut, après plus ample examen, se révéler en réalité une pure erreur de droit.

28 However, where the error does not amount to an error of law, a higher standard is mandated. Where the trier of fact has considered all the evidence that the law requires him or her to consider and still comes to the wrong conclusion, then this amounts to an error of mixed law and fact and is subject to a more stringent standard of review: Southam, supra, at paras. 41 and 45. While easy to state, this distinction can be difficult in practice because matters of mixed law and fact fall along a spectrum of particularity. This difficulty was pointed out in Southam, at para. 37:

Cependant, lorsque l'erreur ne constitue pas une erreur de droit, une norme de contrôle plus exigeante s'impose. Dans les cas où le juge des faits examine tous les éléments de preuve que le droit lui commande de prendre en considération mais en tire néanmoins une conclusion erronée, il commet alors une erreur mixte de fait et de droit, qui est assujettie à une norme de contrôle plus rigoureuse : Southam, précité, par. 41 et 45. Bien que facile à énoncer, cette distinction peut s'avérer difficile à établir en pratique parce que les questions mixtes de fait et de droit s'étalent le long d'un spectre comportant des degrés variables de particularité. Cette difficulté a été soulignée dans l'arrêt Southam, par. 37 :

> . . . the matrices of facts at issue in some cases are so particular, indeed so unique, that decisions about whether they satisfy legal tests do not have any great precedential value. If a court were to decide that driving at a certain speed on a certain road under certain conditions was negligent, its decision would not have any great value as a precedent. In short, as the level of generality of the challenged proposition approaches utter particularity, the matter approaches pure application, and hence draws nigh to being an unqualified question of mixed law and fact. See R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994), at pp. 103-108. Of course, it is not easy to say precisely where the line should be drawn; though in most cases it should be sufficiently clear whether the dispute is over a general proposition that might qualify as a principle of law or over a very particular set of circumstances that is not apt to be of much interest to judges and lawyers in the future.

> . . . il arrive que les faits dans certaines affaires soient si particuliers, de fait qu'ils soient si uniques, que les décisions concernant la question de savoir s'ils satisfont aux critères juridiques n'ont pas une grande valeur comme précédents. Si une cour décidait que le fait d'avoir conduit à une certaine vitesse, sur une route donnée et dans des conditions particulières constituait de la négligence, sa décision aurait peu de valeur comme précédent. Bref, plus le niveau de généralité de la proposition contestée se rapproche de la particularité absolue, plus l'affaire prend le caractère d'une question d'application pure, et s'approche donc d'une question de droit et de fait parfaite. Voir R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994), aux pp. 103 à 108. Il va de soi qu'il n'est pas facile de dire avec précision où doit être tracée la ligne de démarcation; quoique, dans la plupart des cas, la situation soit suffisamment claire pour permettre de déterminer si le litige porte sur une proposition générale qui peut être qualifiée de principe de droit ou sur un ensemble très particulier de circonstances qui n'est pas susceptible de présenter beaucoup d'intérêt pour les juges et les avocats dans l'avenir.

29 When the question of mixed fact and law at issue is a finding of negligence, this Court has held that a finding of negligence by the trial judge should be deferred to by appellate courts. In Jaegli Enterprises Ltd. v. Taylor, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 2, at p. 4, Dickson J. (as he then was) set aside the holding of the British Columbia Court of Appeal that the trial judge had erred in his finding of negligence on the basis that "it is wrong for an appellate court to set aside a trial judgment where there is not palpable and overriding error, and the only point at issue is the interpretation of the evidence as a whole" (see also Schreiber Brothers Ltd. v. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 S.C.R. 78, at p. 84).

Lorsque la question mixte de fait et de droit en litige est une conclusion de négligence, notre

Cour a jugé que les cours d'appel devaient faire preuve de retenue à l'égard de la conclusion du juge de première instance. Dans l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises Ltd. c. Taylor, [1981] 2 R.C.S. 2, p. 4, le juge Dickson (plus tard Juge en chef) a infirmé la décision de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique portant que le juge de première instance avait erronément conclu à la négligence, pour le motif qu'« une cour d'appel commet une erreur lorsqu'elle infirme un jugement de première instance s'il n'y a pas une erreur manifeste et dominante, et si l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve est le seul point en litige » (voir aussi l'arrêt Schreiber Brothers Ltd. c. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 R.C.S. 78, p. 84).

This more stringent standard of review for findings of negligence is appropriate, given that findings of negligence at the trial level can also be made by juries. If the standard were instead correctness, this would result in the appellate court assessing even jury findings of negligence on a correctness standard. At present, absent misdirection on law by the trial judge, such review is not available. The general rule is that courts accord great deference to a jury's findings in civil negligence proceedings:

> The principle has been laid down in many judgments of this Court to this effect, that the verdict of a jury will not be set aside as against the weight of evidence unless it is so plainly unreasonable and unjust as to satisfy the Court that no jury reviewing the evidence as a whole and acting judicially could have reached it.

(McCannell v. McLean, [1937] S.C.R. 341, at p. 343)

See also Dube v. Labar, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 649, at p. 662, and C.N.R. v. Muller, [1934] 1 D.L.R. 768 (S.C.C.). To adopt a correctness standard would change the law and undermine the traditional function of the jury. Therefore, requiring a standard of "palpable and overriding error" for findings of negligence made by either a trial judge or a jury rein-

Il convient d'appliquer cette norme de contrôle plus exigeante aux conclusions de négligence, étant donné que de telles conclusions peuvent également être tirées par des jurys en première instance. Si la norme applicable était celle de la décision correcte, il s'ensuivrait que les cours d'appel appliqueraient cette norme pour contrôler même des conclusions de négligence tirées par jurys. Actuellement, il n'y a ouverture à un tel contrôle que si le juge du procès a donné des directives erronées au jury sur le droit applicable. Suivant la règle générale, les tribunaux font montre d'une grande retenue envers les conclusions des jurys dans les procès civils pour négligence :

> [TRADUCTION] Le principe pertinent a été énoncé dans bon nombre d'arrêts de notre Cour, à savoir qu'il n'y a pas lieu d'écarter le verdict d'un jury parce qu'il va à l'encontre du poids de la preuve, à moins que le verdict en question ne soit nettement déraisonnable et injuste au point de convaincre le tribunal qu'aucun jury examinant la preuve dans son ensemble et agissant de façon judiciaire n'aurait pu le prononcer.

Voir également Dube c. Labar, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 649, p. 662, et C.N.R. c. Muller, [1934] 1 D.L.R. 768 (C.S.C.). Adopter la norme de la décision correcte aurait pour effet de modifier le droit et de porter atteinte au rôle traditionnel du jury. Par conséquent, le fait d'exiger l'application de la norme de l'« erreur manifeste et dominante » aux forces the proper relationship between the appellate and trial court levels and accords with the established standard of review applicable to a finding of negligence by a jury.

fins de contrôle d'une conclusion de négligence tirée par un juge ou un jury consolide les rapports qui doivent exister entre les juridictions d'appel et celles de première instance et respecte la norme de contrôle bien établie qui s'applique aux conclusions de négligence tirées par les jurys.

31 Where, however, the erroneous finding of negligence of the trial judge rests on an incorrect statement of the legal standard, this can amount to an error of law. This distinction was pointed out by Cory J. in Galaske v. O'Donnell, [1994] 1 S.C.R 670, at pp. 690-91:

> The definition of the standard of care is a mixed question of law and fact. It will usually be for the trial judge to determine, in light of the circumstances of the case, what would constitute reasonable conduct on the part of the legendary reasonable man placed in the same circumstances. In some situations a simple reminder may suffice while in others, for example when a very young child is the passenger, the driver may have to put the seat belt on the child himself. In this case, however, the driver took no steps whatsoever to ensure that the child passenger wore a seat belt. It follows that the trial judge's decision on the issue amounted to a finding that there was no duty at all resting upon the driver. This was an error of law.

Toutefois, lorsque le juge du procès conclut erronément à la négligence par suite d'une formulation incorrecte de la norme juridique, cela peut constituer une erreur de droit. Cette distinction a été faite par le juge Cory dans l'arrêt Galaske c. O'Donnell, [1994] 1 R.C.S. 670, p. 690-691 :

> La définition de la norme de diligence est une question mixte de droit et de fait. Il incombera habituellement au juge du procès de déterminer, compte tenu des circonstances de l'espèce, ce qui constituerait une conduite raisonnable de la part de la personne raisonnable légendaire placée dans la même situation. Dans certains cas, un simple rappel suffira, tandis que dans d'autres, par exemple lorsqu'un très jeune enfant est passager, le conducteur peut avoir à attacher lui-même la ceinture de sécurité de l'enfant. Cependant, en l'espèce, le conducteur n'a pris aucune mesure pour veiller à ce que l'enfant porte sa ceinture de sécurité. Il s'ensuit que la décision du juge du procès sur la question équivalait à une conclusion qu'aucune obligation n'incombait au conducteur, ce qui constituait une erreur de droit.

Galaske, supra, is an illustration of the point made in Southam, supra, of the potential to extricate a purely legal question from what appears to be a question of mixed fact and law. However, in the absence of a legal error or a palpable and overriding error, a finding of negligence by a trial judge should not be interfered with.

L'arrêt Galaske, précité, illustre bien l'idée exposée dans l'arrêt Southam, précité, selon laquelle il est possible de dégager une pure question de droit de ce qui paraît être une question mixte de fait et de droit. Toutefois, en l'absence d'erreur de droit ou d'une erreur manifeste et dominante, la conclusion de négligence tirée par un juge de première instance ne doit pas être modifiée.

32 We are supported in our conclusion by the analogy which can be drawn between inferences of fact and questions of mixed fact and law. As stated above, both involve drawing inferences from underlying facts. The difference lies in whether the inference drawn relates to a legal standard or not. Because both processes are intertwined with the weight assigned to the evidence, the numerous policy reasons which support a deferential stance to the trial judge's inferences of fact, also, to a certain extent, support showing L'analogie qui peut être établie entre les inférences de fait et les questions mixtes de fait et de droit étaye notre conclusion. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, dans les deux cas des inférences doivent être tirées des faits à l'origine de l'affaire. La différence dépend de la question de savoir si l'inférence se rapporte à une norme juridique ou non. Parce que le résultat des deux processus est tributaire du poids accordé à la preuve, les diverses considérations de principe justifiant de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des inférences de deference to the trial judge's inferences of mixed fact and law.

Where, however, an erroneous finding of the trial judge can be traced to an error in his or her characterization of the legal standard, then this encroaches on the law-making role of an appellate court, and less deference is required, consistent with a "correctness" standard of review. This nuance was recognized by this Court in St-Jean v. Mercier, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 491, 2002 SCC 15, at paras. 48-49:

> A question "about whether the facts satisfy the legal tests" is one of mixed law and fact. Stated differently, "whether the defendant satisfied the appropriate standard of care is a question of mixed law and fact" (Southam, at para. 35).
> Generally, such a question, once the facts have been established without overriding and palpable error, is to be reviewed on a standard of correctness since the standard of care is normative and is a question of law within the normal purview of both the trial and appellate courts. [Emphasis added.]

A good example of this subtle principle can be found in Rhône (The) v. Peter A.B. Widener (The), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 497, at pp. 515-16. In that case the issue was the identification of certain individuals within a corporate structure as directing minds. This is a mixed question of law and fact. However, the erroneous finding of the courts below was easily traceable to an error of law which could be extricated from the mixed question of law and fact. The extricable question of law was the issue of the functions which are required in order to be properly identified as a "directing mind" within a corporate structure (pp. 515-16). In the opinion of Iacobucci J. for the majority of the Court (at p. 526):

> With respect, I think that the courts below overemphasized the significance of sub-delegation in this case. The key factor which distinguishes directing minds from normal employees is the capacity to exercise decision-making authority on matters of corporate policy, rather than merely to give effect to such policy on an fait du juge de première instance justifient également, dans une certaine mesure, de faire de même à l'égard de ses inférences mixtes de fait et de droit.

33 Par contre, lorsqu'il peut être établi que la conclusion erronée du juge de première instance découle d'une erreur quant à la norme juridique à appliquer, ce facteur touche au rôle de création du droit de la cour d'appel, et une retenue moins élevée s'impose, conformément à la norme de la décision « correcte ». Notre Cour a apporté cette nuance dans l'arrêt St-Jean c. Mercier, [2002] 1 R.C.S. 491, 2002 CSC 15, par. 48-49 :

> La question qui consiste « à déterminer si les faits satisfont au critère juridique » est une question mixte de droit et de fait ou, en d'autres termes, « la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté la norme de diligence appropriée est une question de droit et de fait » (Southam, par. 35).
> Une fois les faits établis sans erreur manifeste et dominante, cette question doit généralement être révisée suivant la norme de la décision correcte puisque la norme de diligence est normative et constitue une question de droit qui relève de la compétence habituelle des tribunaux de première instance et d'appel. [Nous soulignons.]

34 Un bon exemple de ce principe subtil est l'arrêt Rhône (Le) c. Peter A.B. Widener (Le), [1993] 1 R.C.S. 497, p. 515-516. La question en litige dans cette affaire consistait à déterminer si certaines personnes faisaient partie des âmes dirigeantes d'une société. Il s'agit d'une question mixte de droit et de fait. Toutefois, la conclusion erronée des juridictions inférieures était facilement imputable à une erreur de droit qui pouvait être dégagée de la question mixte de droit et de fait. La question de droit ainsi isolable était celle des fonctions que devait remplir une personne pour qu'on puisse à bon droit la considérer comme une « âme dirigeante » de la société (p. 515-516). Le juge Iacobucci s'est exprimé ainsi au nom des juges de la majorité, à la p. 526 :

> En toute déférence, je crois que les juridictions inférieures ont trop insisté sur l'importance de la subdélégation en l'espèce. Le facteur clé qui permet de distinguer les âmes dirigeantes des employés ordinaires est la capacité d'exercer un pouvoir décisionnel sur les questions de politique générale de la personne morale, plutôt que operational basis, whether at head office or across the sea.

35 Stated differently, the lower courts committed an error in law by finding that sub-delegation was a factor identifying a person who is part of the "directing mind" of a company, when the correct legal factor characterizing a "directing mind" is in fact "the capacity to exercise decision-making authority on matters of corporate policy". This mischaracterization of the proper legal test (the legal requirements to be a "directing mind") infected or tainted the lower courts' factual conclusion that Captain Kelch was part of the directing mind. As this erroneous finding can be traced to an error in law, less deference was required and the applicable standard was one of correctness.

36 To summarize, a finding of negligence by a trial judge involves applying a legal standard to a set of facts, and thus is a question of mixed fact and law. Matters of mixed fact and law lie along a spectrum. Where, for instance, an error with respect to a finding of negligence can be attributed to the application of an incorrect standard, a failure to consider a required element of a legal test, or similar error in principle, such an error can be characterized as an error of law, subject to a standard of correctness. Appellate courts must be cautious, however, in finding that a trial judge erred in law in his or her determination of negligence, as it is often difficult to extricate the legal questions from the factual. It is for this reason that these matters are referred to as questions of "mixed law and fact". Where the legal principle is not readily extricable, then the matter is one of "mixed law and fact" and is subject to a more stringent standard. The general rule, as stated in Jaegli Enterprises, supra, is that, where the issue on appeal involves the trial judge's interpretation of the evidence as a whole, it should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error.

le simple fait de mettre en œuvre ces politiques dans un cadre opérationnel, que ce soit au siège social ou en mer.

En d'autres termes, les juridictions inférieures ont commis une erreur de droit en concluant que la subdélégation était un facteur permettant de qualifier une personne d'« âme dirigeante » d'une société, alors que le facteur juridique applicable à cet égard est en fait « la capacité d'exercer un pouvoir décisionnel sur les questions de politique générale de la personne morale ». Cette formulation erronée du critère juridique approprié (les conditions juridiques requises pour être une « âme dirigeante ») a entaché ou vicié la conclusion factuelle des juridictions inférieures selon laquelle le capitaine Kelch était une âme dirigeante de la société. Comme cette conclusion erronée était imputable à une erreur de droit, un degré moindre de retenue s'imposait et la norme applicable était celle de la décision correcte.

En résumé, la conclusion de négligence que tire le juge de première instance suppose l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits et constitue donc une question mixte de fait et de droit. Les questions mixtes de fait et de droit s'étalent le long d'un spectre. Lorsque, par exemple, la conclusion de négligence est entachée d'une erreur imputable à l'application d'une norme incorrecte, à l'omission de tenir compte d'un élément essentiel d'un critère juridique ou à une autre erreur de principe semblable, une telle erreur peut être qualifiée d'erreur de droit et elle est contrôlée suivant la norme de la décision correcte. Les cours d'appel doivent cependant faire preuve de prudence avant de juger que le juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit lorsqu'il a conclu à la négligence, puisqu'il est souvent difficile de départager les questions de droit et les questions de fait. Voilà pourquoi on appelle certaines questions des questions « mixtes de fait et de droit ». Si le principe juridique n'est pas facilement isolable, il s'agit alors d'une « question mixte de fait et de droit », assujettie à une norme de contrôle plus rigoureuse. Selon la règle générale énoncée dans l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises, précité, si la question litigieuse en appel soulève l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve par le juge de première instance, cette interprétation ne doit pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante.

In this regard, we respectfully disagree with our colleague when he states at para. 106 that "[o]nce the facts have been established, the determination of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant will in most cases be reviewable on a standard of correctness since the trial judge must appreciate the facts within the context of the appropriate standard of care. In many cases, viewing the facts through the legal lens of the standard of care gives rise to a policy-making or law-setting function that is the purview of both the trial and appellate courts". In our view, it is settled law that the determination of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant involves the application of a legal standard to a set of facts, a question of mixed fact and law. This question is subject to a standard of palpable and overriding error unless it is clear that the trial judge made some extricable error in principle with respect to the characterization of the standard or its application, in which case the error may amount to an error of law.

À cet égard, nous ne pouvons en toute déférence pas souscrire à l'opinion de notre collègue lorsqu'il affirme, au par. 106, qu'« [u]ne fois les faits établis, la décision touchant la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté ou non la norme de diligence est, dans la plupart des cas, contrôlable selon la norme de la décision correcte, puisque le juge de première instance doit apprécier les faits au regard de la norme de diligence appropriée. Dans bien des cas, l'examen des faits à travers le prisme juridique de la norme de diligence implique l'établissement de politiques d'intérêt général ou la création de règles de droit, rôle qui relève autant des cours de première instance que des cours d'appel ». À notre avis, il est bien établi en droit que la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté la norme de diligence suppose l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble de faits, ce qui en fait une question mixte de fait et de droit. Cette question est assujettie à la norme de l'erreur manifeste et dominante, à moins que le juge de première instance n'ait clairement commis une erreur de principe isolable en déterminant la norme applicable ou en appliquant cette norme, auquel cas l'erreur peut constituer une erreur de droit.

III. Application of the Foregoing Principles to this Case: Standard of Care of the Municipality

III. Application des principes qui précèdent à l'espèce : la norme de diligence applicable à la municipalité

A. The Appropriate Standard of Review

A. La norme de contrôle appropriée

38

We agree with our colleague that the correct statement of the municipality's standard of care is that found in Partridge v. Rural Municipality of Langenburg, [1929] 3 W.W.R. 555 (Sask. C.A.), per Martin J.A., at pp. 558-59:

> The extent of the statutory obligation placed upon municipal corporations to keep in repair the highways under their jurisdiction, has been variously stated in numerous reported cases. There is, however, a general rule which may be gathered from the decisions, and that is, that the road must be kept in such a reasonable state of repair that those requiring to use it may, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety. What is a reasonable state of repair is a question of fact, depending upon all the surrounding circumstances; "repair" is a relative term, and hence the facts in one case afford no fixed rule

À l'instar de notre collègue, nous sommes d'avis que la norme de diligence applicable à la municipalité a été convenablement énoncée par le juge Martin dans l'arrêt Partridge c. Rural Municipality of Langenburg, [1929] 3 W.W.R. 555 (C.A. Sask.), p. 558-559 :

> [TRADUCTION] L'étendue de l'obligation légale d'entretien qui incombe aux corporations municipales à l'égard des routes qui se trouvent sur leur territoire a été énoncée de diverses façons dans nombre de décisions publiées. Il est toutefois possible de dégager la règle générale suivante de ces décisions : le chemin doit être tenu dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, de façon que ceux qui doivent l'emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité. La question de savoir en quoi consiste un état raisonnable d'entretien est une question de fait, qui est fonction de toutes by which to determine another case where the facts are different . . . .

les circonstances de l'espèce; le terme « entretien » est une notion relative et, par conséquent, les faits propres à une affaire donnée ne permettent pas de dégager de règle déterminée permettant de trancher une autre affaire présentant des circonstances différentes . . .

However, we differ from the views of our colleague in that we find that the trial judge applied the correct test in determining that the municipality did not meet its standard of care, and thus did not commit an error of law of the type mentioned in Southam, supra. The trial judge applied all the elements of the Partridge standard to the facts, and her conclusion that the respondent municipality failed to meet this standard should not be overturned absent palpable and overriding error.

Toutefois, contrairement à notre collègue, nous estimons que la juge de première instance a appliqué le bon critère juridique en concluant que la municipalité n'avait pas respecté la norme de diligence à laquelle elle était tenue, et que la juge n'a donc pas commis une erreur de droit du genre de celle décrite dans l'arrêt Southam, précité. La juge de première instance a appliqué aux faits de l'espèce tous les éléments du critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Partridge, et sa conclusion que la municipalité défenderesse n'a pas respecté ce critère ne devrait pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante.

B. The Trial Judge Did Not Commit an Error of Law

B. La juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur de droit

39 We note that our colleague bases his conclusion that the municipality met its standard of care on his finding that the trial judge neglected to consider the conduct of the ordinary motorist, and thus failed to apply the correct standard of care, an error of law, which justifies his reconsideration of the evidence (para. 114). As a starting point to the discussion of the ordinary or reasonable motorist, we emphasize that the failure to discuss a relevant factor in depth, or even at all, is not itself a sufficient basis for an appellate court to reconsider the evidence. This was made clear by the recent decision of Van de Perre, supra, where Bastarache J. says, at para. 15:

Nous soulignons que notre collègue fonde sa décision que la municipalité a respecté la norme de diligence sur sa conclusion que la juge de première instance a négligé de prendre en compte le comportement de l'automobiliste moyen et n'a donc pas appliqué la bonne norme de diligence, commettant ainsi une erreur de droit le justifiant de réexaminer la preuve (par. 114). Pour les besoins de l'analyse du critère de l'automobiliste moyen ou raisonnable, nous tenons au départ à signaler que l'omission d'examiner en profondeur un facteur pertinent, voire de ne pas l'examiner du tout, n'est pas en soi un fondement suffisant pour justifier une cour d'appel de réexaminer la preuve. Ce principe a été clairement énoncé dans l'arrêt récent Van de Perre, précité, où le juge Bastarache a dit ceci, au par. 15 :

. . . omissions in the reasons will not necessarily mean that the appellate court has jurisdiction to review the evidence heard at trial. As stated in Van Mol (Guardian ad Litem of) v. Ashmore (1999), 168 D.L.R. (4th) 637 (B.C.C.A.), leave to appeal refused [2000] 1 S.C.R. vi, an omission is only a material error if it gives rise to the reasoned belief that the trial judge must have forgotten, ignored or misconceived the evidence in a way that affected his conclusion. Without this reasoned belief, the appellate court cannot reconsider the evidence.

. . . des omissions dans les motifs ne signifieront pas nécessairement que la cour d'appel a compétence pour examiner la preuve entendue au procès. Comme le dit l'arrêt Van Mol (Guardian ad Litem of) c. Ashmore (1999), 168 D.L.R. (4th) 637 (C.A.C.-B.), autorisation d'appel refusée [2000] 1 R.C.S. vi, une omission ne constitue une erreur importante que si elle donne lieu à la conviction rationnelle que le juge de première instance doit avoir oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété la preuve de telle manière que sa conclusion en a été affectée. Faute d'une telle conviction rationnelle, la cour d'appel ne peut pas réexaminer la preuve.

In our view, as we will now discuss, there can be no reasoned belief in this case that the trial judge forgot, ignored, or misconceived the question of the ordinary driver. It would thus be an error to engage in a re-assessment of the evidence on this issue.

À notre avis, comme nous allons le voir, la présente espèce ne peut faire naître la conviction rationnelle que la juge de première instance a oublié d'examiner la question du conducteur moyen, en a fait abstraction ou l'a mal interprétée. Il serait donc erroné de réexaminer la preuve relative à cette question.

40 The fact that the conduct of the ordinary motorist was in the mind of the trial judge from the outset is clear from the fact that she began her standard of care discussion by stating the correct test, quoting the above passage from Partridge, supra. Absent some clear sign that she subsequently varied her approach, this initial acknowledgment of the correct legal standard is a strong indication that this was the standard she applied. Not only is there no indication that she departed from the stated test, but there are further signs which support the conclusion that the trial judge applied the Partridge standard. The first such indication is that the trial judge did discuss, both explicitly and implicitly, the conduct of an ordinary or reasonable motorist approaching the curve. The second indication is that she referred to the evidence of the experts, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, both of whom discussed the conduct of an ordinary motorist in this situation. Finally, the fact that the trial judge apportioned negligence to Mr. Nikolaisen indicates that she assessed his conduct against the standard of the ordinary driver, and thus considered the conduct of the latter.

Le fait que, dès le départ, la juge de première instance a eu à l'esprit la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen ressort clairement du fait qu'elle a commencé son examen de la norme de diligence en formulant le critère approprié, c'est-à-dire en citant le passage susmentionné de l'arrêt Partridge, précité. En l'absence d'indications claires qu'elle a subséquemment modifié sa méthode d'analyse, cette mention initiale de la norme juridique appropriée constitue un indice solide qu'il s'agit bien de la norme qu'elle a appliquée. Non seulement rien n'indique qu'elle s'est écartée du critère énoncé, mais d'autres indices étayent la conclusion qu'elle a appliqué le critère de l'arrêt Partridge. Le premier de ces indices est que la juge s'est bel et bien interrogée, tant explicitement qu'implicitement, sur la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen ou raisonnable s'approchant du virage. Le deuxième indice est qu'elle a fait état des témoignages des experts, MM. Anderson et Werner, qui ont tous deux analysé le comportement de l'automobiliste moyen se trouvant dans cette situation. Enfin, le fait que la juge de première instance ait imputé une partie de la responsabilité à M. Nikolaisen indique qu'elle a évalué sa conduite eu égard au critère du conducteur moyen, et qu'elle a donc pris en compte la conduite de ce dernier.

41 The discussion of the ordinary motorist is found in the passage from the trial judgment immediately following the statement of the requisite standard of care:

On trouve l'analyse relative à l'automobiliste moyen dans cet extrait du jugement de première instance qui suit immédiatement l'énoncé de la norme de diligence requise :

> Snake Hill Road is a low traffic road. It is however maintained by the R.M. so that it is passable year round. There are permanent residences on the road. It is used by farmers for access to their fields and cattle. Young people frequent Snake Hill Road for parties and as such the road is used by those who may not have the same degree of familiarity with it as do residents.

> [TRADUCTION] Le chemin Snake Hill est un chemin à faible débit de circulation. Il est néanmoins entretenu par la M.R. à longueur d'année afin de le garder carrossable. Des résidences permanentes sont situées en bordure de celui-ci. Les fermiers l'utilisent pour accéder à leurs champs et à leur bétail. Des jeunes gens empruntent le chemin Snake Hill pour se rendre à des fêtes, de sorte qu'il est utilisé par des conducteurs qui ne le connaissent pas toujours aussi bien que les résidents de l'endroit.

There is a portion of Snake Hill Road that is a hazard to the public. In this regard I accept the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner. Further, it is a hazard that is not readily apparent to users of the road. It is a hidden hazard. The location of the Nikolaisen rollover is the most dangerous segment of Snake Hill Road. Approaching the location of the Nikolaisen rollover, limited sight distance, created by uncleared bush, precludes a motorist from being forewarned of an impending sharp right turn immediately followed by a left turn. While there were differing opinions on the maximum speed at which this curve can be negotiated, I am satisfied that when limited sight distance is combined with the tight radius of the curve and lack of superelevation, this curve cannot be safely negotiated at speeds greater than 60 kilometres per hour when conditions are favourable, or 50 kilometres per hour when wet.

. . . where the existence of that bush obstructs the ability of a motorist to be forewarned of a hazard such as that on Snake Hill Road, it is reasonable to expect the R.M. to erect and maintain a warning or regulatory sign so that a motorist, using ordinary care, may be forewarned, adjust speed and take corrective action in advance of entering a dangerous situation. [Underlining added; italics in original.]

([1998] 5 W.W.R. 523, at paras. 84-86)

42 In our view, this passage indicates that the trial judge did consider how a motorist exercising ordinary care would approach the curve in question. The implication of labelling the curve a "hidden hazard" which is "not readily apparent to users of the road", is that the danger is of the type that cannot be anticipated. This in turn implies that, even if the motorist exercises ordinary care, he or she will not be able to react to the curve. As well, the trial judge referred explicitly to the conduct of a motorist exercising ordinary care: "it is reasonable to expect the R.M. to erect and maintain a warning or regulatory sign so that a motorist, using ordinary care, may be forewarned, adjust speed and take corrective action in advance of entering a dangerous situation" (para. 86 (emphasis added)).

Il y a, sur le chemin Snake Hill, un tronçon qui présente un danger pour le public. À cet égard, je retiens les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner. En outre, il s'agit d'un danger qui n'est pas facilement décelable par les usagers du chemin. Il s'agit d'un danger caché. L'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau est situé sur le tronçon le plus dangereux du chemin Snake Hill. À l'approche de cet endroit, des broussailles réduisent la distance de visibilité de l'automobiliste et l'empêchent de voir l'imminence d'un virage à droite serré, qui est immédiatement suivi d'un virage à gauche. Bien que des opinions divergentes aient été émises quant à la vitesse maximale à laquelle ce virage peut être pris, je suis d'avis que, vu la distance de visibilité réduite, l'existence d'une courbe serrée et l'absence de surélévation du chemin, ce virage ne peut être pris en sécurité à une vitesse supérieure à 60 kilomètres à l'heure dans des conditions favorables, ou 50 kilomètres à l'heure sur chaussée humide.

. . . à l'endroit où la présence des broussailles empêche les automobilistes de voir venir un danger comme celui qui existe sur le chemin Snake Hill, il est raisonnable de s'attendre à ce que la M.R. installe et maintienne un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation afin qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales soit prévenu et puisse réduire sa vitesse et prendre des mesures correctives avant d'arriver à l'endroit dangereux. [Nous soulignons; en italique dans l'original.]

([1998] 5 W.W.R. 523, par. 84-86)

À notre avis, cet extrait indique que la juge de première instance a effectivement pris en compte la façon dont l'automobiliste prenant des précautions normales s'approcherait du virage en question. Qualifier le virage de [TRADUCTION] « danger caché », danger qui « n'est pas facilement décelable par les usagers du chemin », implique que le danger en est un qu'il est impossible de prévoir. Il s'ensuit que, même si l'automobiliste prend des précautions normales, il ne pourra pas réagir à la présence du virage. Par ailleurs, la juge de première instance a explicitement fait état de la conduite de l'automobiliste prenant des précautions normales : [TRADUCTION] « [I]l est raisonnable de s'attendre à ce que la M.R. installe et maintienne un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation afin qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales soit prévenu et puisse réduire sa vitesse et prendre des mesures correctives avant d'arriver à l'endroit dangereux » (par. 86 (nous soulignons)).

With respect to the speed of a motorist approaching the curve, there is also an indication that the trial judge considered the conduct of an ordinary motorist. First, she stated that she accepted the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner with respect to the finding that the curve constituted a hazard to the public. The evidence given by these experts suggests that between 60 and 80 km/h is a reasonable speed to drive parts of this road, and at that speed, the curve presents a hazard. Their evidence also indicates their general opinion that the curve was a hazardous one. Mr. Anderson refers to the curve being difficult to negotiate at "normal speeds". Also, Mr. Anderson states that "if you're not aware that this curve is there, the sharp course of the curve, and you enter too far into it before you realize that the curve is there, then you have to do a tighter radius than 118 metres in order to get back on track to be able to negotiate the second curve". He also states that "you could be lulled into thinking you've got an 80 kilometres an hour road until you are too far into the tight curve to be able to respond".

43 Relativement à la vitesse à laquelle les automobilistes s'approchent du virage, il existe également un indice confirmant que la juge de première instance a pris en compte la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen. Premièrement, elle a dit qu'elle acceptait les témoignages de MM. Anderson et de Werner en ce qui concerne la conclusion que la courbe constituait un danger pour le public. Leurs témoignages suggèrent qu'une vitesse de 60 à 80 km/h est une vitesse raisonnable à certains endroits de ce chemin et que, à cette vitesse, la courbe constitue un danger. Leurs témoignages indiquent également qu'ils estiment de façon générale que la courbe est dangereuse. De dire M. Anderson, le virage est difficile à prendre à des [TRADUCTION] « vitesses normales ». Il ajoute que, [TRADUCTION] « si on ne connaît pas la présence de ce virage à cet endroit, le caractère prononcé du virage, et qu'on ne s'aperçoit pas qu'il y a un virage avant de s'être déjà engagé trop loin dans celui-ci, il faut tourner dans un rayon inférieur à 118 mètres pour corriger sa trajectoire afin d'être en mesure de prendre le deuxième virage ». Il affirme également qu' [TRADUCTION] « on peut être amené à croire qu'on se trouve sur une route où il est possible de rouler à 80 km/h, jusqu'à ce qu'on soit engagé trop loin dans le virage serré pour être capable de réagir ».

The Court of Appeal found that, given the nature and condition of Snake Hill Road, the contention that this rural road would be taken at 80 km/h by the ordinary motorist was untenable. However, it is clear from the trial judge's reasons that she did not take 80 km/h as the speed at which the ordinary motorist would approach the curve. Instead she found, based on expert evidence, that "this curve cannot be safely negotiated at speeds greater than 60 kilometres per hour when conditions are favourable, or 50 kilometres per hour when wet" (para. 85 (emphasis in original)). From this finding, coupled with the finding that the curve was hidden and unexpected, the logical conclusion is that the trial judge found that a motorist exercising ordinary care could easily be deceived into approaching the curve at speeds in excess of the safe speed for the curve, and subsequently be taken by surprise. Therefore, the trial judge found that the curve was hazardous to the ordinary

44 La Cour d'appel a jugé que, vu la nature et l'état du chemin Snake Hill, la prétention selon laquelle l'automobiliste moyen roulerait sur cette route rurale à 80 km/h était insoutenable. Toutefois, il ressort clairement des motifs de la juge de première instance qu'elle ne considérait pas que l'automobiliste moyen s'approcherait du virage à 80 km/h. Elle a plutôt conclu, à partir des témoignages des experts, que [TRADUCTION] « ce virage ne peut être pris en sécurité à une vitesse supérieure à 60 kilomètres à l'heure dans des conditions favorables, ou 50 kilomètres à l'heure sur chaussée humide » (par. 85 (en italique dans l'original)). De cette constatation, conjuguée à celle que le virage était caché et imprévu, il est logique de conclure que la juge de première instance a estimé que l'automobiliste prenant des précautions normales pouvait aisément être amené à s'approcher du virage à des vitesses supérieures à la vitesse sécuritaire pour le prendre, et se retrouver ensuite pris au dépourvu. La juge de première motorist and it follows that she applied the correct standard of care.

instance a donc conclu que le virage était dangereux pour l'automobiliste moyen et il s'ensuit qu'elle a appliqué la norme de diligence appropriée.

45 In our respectful view, our colleague errs in agreeing with the Court of Appeal's finding that the trial judge should have addressed the conduct of the ordinary motorist more fully (para. 124). At para. 119, he writes:

> A proper application of the test demands that the trial judge ask the question: "How would a reasonable driver have driven on this road?" Whether or not a hazard is "hidden" or a curve is "inherently" dangerous does not dispose of the question.

En toute déférence, notre collègue commet une erreur en souscrivant à la conclusion de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle la juge de première instance aurait dû examiner de manière plus approfondie la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen (par. 124). Il écrit ceci, au par. 119 :

> Pour bien appliquer le critère juridique, le juge de première instance doit se poser la question suivante : « Comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait-il roulé sur ce chemin? » Le fait de conclure qu'il existe ou non un danger « caché » ou qu'une courbe est quelque chose d'« intrinsèquement » dangereux ne vide pas la question.

And later, he states, "In my view, the question of how the reasonable driver would have negotiated Snake Hill Road necessitated a somewhat more in-depth analysis of the character of the road" (para. 125). With respect, requiring the trial judge to have made this specific inquiry in her reasons is inconsistent with Van de Perre, supra, which makes it clear that an omission or a failure to discuss a factor in depth is not, in and of itself, a basis for interfering with the findings of the trial judge and reweighing the evidence. As we note above, it is clear that although the trial judge may not have conducted an extensive review of this element of the Partridge test, she did indeed consider this factor by stating the correct test, then applying this test to the facts.

Plus loin, il dit : « À mon avis, la question de savoir comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait roulé sur le chemin Snake Hill nécessitait un examen un peu plus approfondi de la nature du chemin » (par. 125). En toute déférence, considérer que la juge de première instance aurait dû faire cette analyse particulière dans ses motifs est incompatible avec l'arrêt Van de Perre, précité, lequel établit clairement que l'omission ou le défaut d'analyser un facteur en profondeur ne constitue pas, en soi, une raison justifiant de modifier les conclusions du juge de première instance et de réexaminer la preuve. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, il est clair que, quoique la juge de première instance n'ait peut-être pas fait une analyse approfondie de ce volet du critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Partridge, elle a effectivement tenu compte de ce facteur en formulant le critère approprié puis en l'appliquant aux faits de l'espèce.

46 We note that in relying on the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, the trial judge chose not to base her decision on the conflicting evidence of other witnesses. However, her reliance on the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner is insufficient proof that she "forgot, ignored, or misconceived" the evidence. The full record was before the trial judge and we can presume that she reviewed all of it, absent further proof that the trial judge forgot, ignored or misapprehended the evidence, leading to an error in law. It is open to a trial judge to prefer the evidence of some witnesses over others:

Nous tenons à souligner que, en s'appuyant sur les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner, la juge de première instance a choisi de ne pas fonder sa décision sur les témoignages contradictoires rendus par d'autres témoins. Toutefois, cela ne suffit pas pour établir qu'elle a « oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété » la preuve. La juge de première instance disposait de l'ensemble du dossier et on peut présumer qu'elle l'a étudié d'un bout à l'autre, en l'absence d'autre indication qu'elle a oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété la preuve, commettant ainsi une erreur de droit. Le juge de première instance peut retenir la déposition de certains témoins de préférence à d'autres : Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité, p. 123. Le fait pour le juge de première instance de s'appuyer sur certains témoignages plutôt que sur d'autres ne peut à lui seul fournir l'assise d'une « conviction rationnelle que le juge de première instance doit avoir oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété la preuve de telle manière que sa conclusion en a été affectée » (Van de Perre, précité, par. 15). Cette conclusion est compatible avec la portée restreinte de l'examen qu'il convient de faire en appel dans la présente affaire.

Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra, at p. 123. Mere reliance by the trial judge on the evidence of some witnesses over others cannot on its own form the basis of a "reasoned belief that the trial judge must have forgotten, ignored or misconceived the evidence in a way that affected his conclusion" (Van de Perre, supra, at para. 15). This is in keeping with the narrow scope of review by an appellate court applicable in this case.

A further indication that the trial judge considered the conduct of an ordinary motorist on Snake Hill Road is her finding that both Mr. Nikolaisen and the municipality breached their duty of care to Mr. Housen, and that the defendant Nikolaisen was 50 percent contributorily negligent. Since a finding of negligence implies a failure to meet the ordinary standard of care, and since Mr. Nikolaisen's negligence related to his driving on the curve, to find that Mr. Nikolaisen's conduct on the curve failed to meet the standard of the ordinary driver implies a consideration of that ordinary driver on the curve. The fact that the trial judge distinguished the conduct of Mr. Nikolaisen in driving negligently on the road from the conduct of the municipality in negligently failing to erect a warning sign is evidence that the trial judge kept the municipality's legal standard clearly in mind in its application to the facts, and that she applied this standard to the ordinary driver, not the negligent driver.

47 Une autre indication que la juge de première instance s'est interrogée sur la façon dont conduit l'automobiliste moyen sur le chemin Snake Hill est sa conclusion que M. Nikolaisen et la municipalité ont tous deux manqué à leur obligation de diligence envers M. Housen, et que le défendeur Nikolaisen était responsable de négligence concourante dans une proportion de 50 p. 100. Comme une conclusion de négligence implique un manquement à la norme de diligence habituelle, et comme la négligence de M. Nikolaisen était liée à sa manière de conduire dans le virage, la conclusion que sa conduite à cet endroit ne respectait pas le critère du conducteur moyen suppose qu'on s'est demandé comment ce conducteur s'approcherait du virage. La distinction qu'a établie la juge de première instance entre la négligence dont a fait preuve M. Nikolaisen lorsqu'il roulait sur le chemin et celle dont la municipalité a fait montre en omettant d'installer un panneau d'avertissement prouve qu'elle n'a pas perdu de vue la norme juridique régissant la municipalité et l'application de cette norme aux faits, et que la juge a appliqué cette norme au conducteur moyen, et non au conducteur négligent.

To summarize, in the course of her reasons, the trial judge first stated the requisite standard of care from Partridge, supra, relating to the conduct of the ordinary driver. She then applied that standard to the facts referring again to the conduct of the ordinary driver. Finally, in light of her finding that the municipality breached this standard, she apportioned negligence between the driver and the municipality in a way which again entailed a consideration of the 48 En résumé, dans ses motifs la juge de première instance a d'abord énoncé la norme de diligence requise par l'arrêt Partridge, précité, relativement à la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen. Elle a ensuite appliqué cette norme aux faits, se reportant encore une fois à la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen. Enfin, vu sa conclusion que la municipalité avait manqué à cette norme de diligence, elle a réparti la responsabilité entre le conducteur ordinary driver. As such, we are overwhelmingly drawn to the conclusion that the conduct of the ordinary driver was both considered and applied by the trial judge.

et la municipalité d'une manière qui, une fois de plus, atteste la prise en compte du critère du conducteur moyen. En conséquence, nous en venons irrésistiblement à la conclusion que la juge de première instance a pris en compte et appliqué ce critère.

49 Thus, we conclude that the trial judge did not commit an error of law with respect to the municipality's standard of care. On this matter, we disagree with the basis for the re-assessment of the evidence undertaken by our colleague (paras. 122-42) and regard this re-assessment to be an unjustified intrusion into the finding of the trial judge that the municipality breached its standard of care. This finding is a question of mixed law and fact which should not be overturned absent a palpable and overriding error. As discussed below, it is our view that no such error exists, as the trial judge conducted a reasonable assessment based on her view of the evidence.

Par conséquent, nous estimons que la juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur de droit en ce qui concerne la norme de diligence à laquelle était tenue la municipalité. Sur ce point, nous ne souscrivons pas aux raisons sur lesquelles se fondent notre collègue pour réexaminer la preuve (aux par. 122 à 142) et nous considérons ce réexamen comme une intervention injustifiée relativement à la conclusion de la juge de première instance portant que la municipalité a manqué à la norme de diligence à laquelle elle était tenue. Cette conclusion porte sur une question mixte de droit et de fait et elle ne peut pas être infirmée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante. Comme nous le verrons plus loin, nous sommes d'avis qu'aucune erreur de cette nature n'a été commise, car la juge de première instance a fait une analyse raisonnable, fondée sur son appréciation de la preuve.

C. The Trial Judge Did Not Commit A Palpable or Overriding Error

C. La juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur manifeste ou dominante

50 Despite this high standard of review, the Court of Appeal found that a palpable and overriding error was made by the trial judge ([2000] 4 W.W.R. 173, 2000 SKCA 12, at para. 84). With respect, this finding was based on the erroneous presumption that the trial judge accepted 80 km/h as the speed at which an ordinary motorist would approach the curve, a presumption which our colleague also adopts in his reasons (para. 133).

Malgré cette norme de contrôle sévère, la Cour d'appel a jugé que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur manifeste et dominante ([2000] 4 W.W.R. 173, 2000 SKCA 12, par. 84). En toute déférence, cette conclusion repose sur la présomption erronée selon laquelle la juge aurait accepté que l'automobiliste moyen approcherait du virage à 80 km/h, présomption qu'adopte également notre collègue dans ses motifs (par. 133).

51 As discussed above, the trial judge's finding was that an ordinary motorist could approach the curve in excess of 60 km/h in dry conditions, and 50 km/h in wet conditions, and that at such speeds the curve was hazardous. The trial judge's finding was not based on a particular speed at which the curve would be approached by the ordinary motorist. Instead, she found that, because the curve was hidden and sharper than would be anticipated, a motorist exercising ordinary care could approach it at greater than

Comme nous l'avons vu plus tôt, la conclusion de la juge de première instance était que l'automobiliste moyen pourrait s'approcher du virage à une vitesse supérieure à 60 km/h sur chaussée sèche, et 50 km/h sur chaussée humide, mais qu'à ces vitesses le virage était dangereux. Cette conclusion n'était pas fondée sur une vitesse précise à laquelle l'automobiliste moyen s'approcherait du virage. La juge de première instance a plutôt estimé que, parce que le virage est caché et plus serré que ce à quoi on the speed at which it would be safe to negotiate the curve.

s'attend normalement, il était possible qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales s'en approche à une vitesse supérieure à la vitesse sécuritaire pour prendre le virage.

52 As we explain in greater detail below, in our opinion, not only is this assessment far from reaching the level of a palpable and overriding error, in our view, it is a sensible and logical way to deal with large quantities of conflicting evidence. It would be unrealistic to focus on some exact speed at which the curve would likely be approached by the ordinary motorist. The findings of the trial judge in this regard were the result of a reasonable and practical assessment of the evidence as a whole.

52 Comme nous allons le préciser plus loin, nous sommes d'avis que non seulement cette appréciation est-elle loin de constituer une erreur manifeste et dominante, mais elle est une réponse judicieuse et logique eu égard à l'abondance d'éléments de preuve contradictoires. Il serait irréaliste de fixer une quelconque vitesse à laquelle l'automobiliste moyen s'approcherait vraisemblablement du virage. Les conclusions de la juge de première instance à cet égard découlent d'une évaluation raisonnable et réaliste de l'ensemble de la preuve.

53 In finding a palpable and overriding error, Cameron J.A. relied on the fact that the trial judge adopted the expert evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner which was premised on a de facto speed limit of 80 km/h taken from The Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986, c. H-3.1. However, whether or not the experts based their testimony on this limit, the trial judge did not adopt that limit as the speed of the ordinary motorist approaching the curve. Again, the trial judge found that the curve could not be taken safely at greater than 60 km/h dry and 50 km/h wet, and there is evidence in the record to support this finding. For example, Mr. Anderson states:

53 En concluant à l'existence d'une erreur manifeste et dominante, le juge Cameron de la Cour d'appel s'est appuyé sur le fait que la juge de première instance avait retenu les témoignages d'expert de MM. Anderson et Werner, lesquels étaient fondés sur la vitesse limite de facto de 80 km/h prévue par la Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986, ch. H-3.1. Toutefois, que le témoignage des experts ait été ou non fondé sur cette limite, la juge de première instance n'a pas retenu cette vitesse comme étant celle à laquelle l'automobiliste moyen s'approche du virage. Rappelons que la juge de première instance a estimé qu'il n'était pas possible d'aborder le virage en sécurité à une vitesse supérieure à 60 km/h sur chaussée sèche et 50 km/h sur chaussée humide, et il existe au dossier des éléments étayant cette conclusion. Par exemple, M. Anderson a dit ceci :

> If you don't anticipate the curve and you get too far into it before you start to do your correction then you can get into trouble even at, probably at 60. Fifty you'd have to be a long ways into it, but certainly at 60 you could.

> [TRADUCTION] Si vous ne prévoyez pas l'arrivée du virage et que vous vous engagez trop loin dans celui-ci avant d'amorcer votre manœuvre correctrice, vous risquez d'avoir des ennuis même à, probablement à 60. À cinquante il faudrait que vous soyez engagé assez loin, mais à 60 vous pourriez certainement en avoir.

It is notable too that both Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner would have recommended installing a sign, warning motorists of the curve, with a posted limit of 50 km/h.

Il convient également de signaler que MM. Anderson et Werner auraient tous deux recommandé l'installation d'un panneau avertissant les automobilistes de l'imminence du virage et fixé la vitesse maximale permise à 50 km/h.

54 Although clearly the curve could not be negotiated safely at 80 km/h, it could also not be

54 Le virage ne pouvait manifestement pas être pris en sécurité à 80 km/h, mais il ne pouvait l'être non negotiated safely at much slower speeds. It should also be noted that the trial judge did not adopt the expert testimony of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner in its entirety. She stated: "There is a portion of Snake Hill Road that is a hazard to the public. In this regard I accept the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner" (para. 85 (emphasis added)). It cannot be assumed from this that she accepted a de facto speed limit of 80 km/h especially when one bears in mind (1) the trial judge's statement of the safe speeds of 50 and 60 km/h, and (2) the fact that both these experts found the road to be unsafe at much lower speeds than 80 km/h.

plus à des vitesses beaucoup plus réduites. Il convient également de souligner que la juge de première instance n'a pas retenu intégralement les témoignages d'expert de MM. Anderson et Werner. Elle a dit : [TRADUCTION] « Il y a, sur le chemin Snake Hill, un tronçon qui présente un danger pour le public. À cet égard, je retiens les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner » (par. 85 (nous soulignons)). Ces propos ne permettent pas de présumer qu'elle acceptait une vitesse limite de facto de 80 km/h, particulièrement si l'on se rappelle (1) qu'elle a dit qu'on pouvait rouler en sécurité à des vitesses de 50 et de 60 km/h, et (2) que ces deux experts ont considéré que le chemin n'était pas sûr même à des vitesses bien inférieures à 80 km/h.

55 Given that the trial judge did not base her standard of care analysis on a de facto speed limit of 80 km/h, it then follows that the Court of Appeal's finding of a palpable and overriding error cannot stand.

Puisque la juge de première instance n'a pas fondé son analyse de la norme de diligence sur une vitesse limite de facto de 80 km/h, il s'ensuit que la conclusion de la Cour d'appel relativement à l'existence d'une erreur manifeste et dominante ne saurait être confirmée.

56 Furthermore, the narrowly defined scope of appellate review dictates that a trial judge should not be found to have misapprehended or ignored evidence, or come to the wrong conclusions merely because the appellate court diverges in the inferences it draws from the evidence and chooses to emphasize some portions of the evidence over others. As we are of the view that the trial judge committed no error of law in finding that the municipality breached its standard of care, we are also respectfully of the view that our colleague's re-assessment of the evidence on this issue (paras. 129-42) is an unjustified interference with the findings of the trial judge, based on a difference of opinion concerning the inferences to be drawn from the evidence and the proper weight to be placed on different portions of the evidence. For instance, in the opinion of our colleague, based on some portions of the expert evidence, a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would approach a rural road at 50 km/h or less, because a reasonable driver would have difficulty seeing the sharp radius of the curve and oncoming traffic (para. 129). However, the trial judge, basing her assessment on other portions of the expert evidence, found that the nature of the road was such that a motorist could be

En outre, vu la portée restreinte de la révision en appel, on ne saurait conclure qu'un juge de première instance a négligé d'examiner la preuve, l'a mal interprétée ou est arrivé à des conclusions erronées, simplement parce que le tribunal d'appel tire des inférences divergentes de la preuve et décide d'accorder plus d'importance à certains éléments qu'à d'autres. Étant d'avis que la juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur de droit en concluant que la municipalité avait violé la norme de diligence à laquelle elle était tenue, nous estimons aussi, en toute déférence, que le réexamen de la preuve auquel procède notre collègue sur cette question (aux par. 129 à 142) constitue une intervention injustifiée relativement aux conclusions de la juge de première instance, fondée sur une divergence d'opinions quant aux inférences devant être tirées de la preuve et au poids qu'il convient d'accorder à divers éléments. Par exemple, notre collègue est d'avis, sur la foi de certaines parties des témoignages d'expert, qu'un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales roulerait sur une route rurale à une vitesse maximale de 50 km/h, parce qu'il aurait de la difficulté à voir que le virage est serré et s'il vient des véhicules en sens inverse (par. 129). Or, se deceived into believing that the road did not contain a sharp curve and thus would approach the road normally, unaware of the hidden danger.

fondant sur d'autres parties des témoignages d'expert, la juge de première instance a estimé que la nature du chemin était telle qu'un automobiliste pourrait être amené à croire que le chemin ne comporte pas de virage serré et, de ce fait, à y rouler normalement, sans soupçonner l'existence du danger caché.

We are faced in this case with conflicting expert evidence on the issue of the correct speed at which an ordinary motorist would approach the curve on Snake Hill Road. The differing inferences from the evidence drawn by the trial judge and the Court of Appeal amount to a divergence on what weight should be placed on various pieces of conflicting evidence. As noted by our colleague, Mr. Sparks was of the opinion that "[if] you can't see around the corner, then, you know, drivers would have a fairly strong signal . . . that due care and caution would be required". Similar evidence of this nature was given by Mr. Nikolaisen, and indeed even by Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner. This is contrasted with evidence such as that given by Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner that a reasonable driver would be "lulled" into thinking that there is an 80 km/h road ahead of him or her.

57 En l'espèce, nous sommes en présence de témoignages d'expert contradictoires sur la question de la vitesse à laquelle l'automobiliste moyen s'approcherait du virage du chemin Snake Hill. Les inférences différentes que la juge de première instance et la Cour d'appel tirent de la preuve équivalent à une divergence d'opinion quant au poids à accorder à divers éléments de preuve contradictoires. Le témoin Sparks a émis l'opinion suivante, que cite également notre collègue : [TRADUCTION] « [Si] vous ne pouvez voir, de l'autre côté du virage, alors, vous savez, cela devrait envoyer un message clair aux conducteurs [. . .] que l'attention et la prudence s'imposent ». M. Nikolaisen, et même MM. Anderson et Werner ont d'ailleurs témoigné au même effet. Cela contraste avec l'affirmation de MM. Anderson et Werner selon laquelle un conducteur raisonnable serait [TRADUCTION] « amené » à croire qu'il se trouve sur un chemin où l'on peut rouler à 80 km/h.

As noted by McLachlin J. in Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra, at p. 122 and mentioned above, "the weight to be assigned to the various pieces of evidence is under our trial system essentially the province of the trier of fact". In that case, a unanimous Court found that the Court of Appeal erred in interfering with the trial judge's factual findings, on the basis that it was open to the trial judge to place less weight on certain evidence and accept other, conflicting evidence which the trial judge found to be more convincing (Toneguzzo-Norvell, at pp. 122-23). Similarly, in this case, the trial judge's factual findings concerning the proper speed to be used on approaching the curve should not be interfered with. It was open to her to choose to place more weight on certain portions of the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, where the evidence was conflicting. Her assessment of the proper speed was a reasonable inference based on the evidence and does not reach

58 Comme l'a souligné madame le juge McLachlin, à la p. 122 de l'arrêt Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité, « selon notre système de procès, il appartient essentiellement au juge des faits [. . .] d'attribuer un poids aux différents éléments de preuve ». Dans cette affaire, notre Cour a conclu à l'unanimité que la Cour d'appel avait commis une erreur en modifiant les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance, au motif qu'il était loisible à celui-ci d'accorder un poids moins grand à certains éléments de preuve et à accepter d'autres éléments contradictoires, qu'il considérait plus convaincants. (Toneguzzo-Norvell, p. 122-123). De même, en l'espèce, il n'y a pas lieu de modifier les conclusions de fait de la juge de première instance au sujet de la vitesse à laquelle il faudrait approcher du virage. Il lui était loisible d'accorder plus de poids à certaines parties des témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner, dans les cas où la preuve était contradictoire. Son the level of a palpable and overriding error. As such, the trial judge's findings with respect to the standard of care should not be overturned.

appréciation de la vitesse appropriée constituait une inférence raisonnable, fondée sur la preuve, et elle ne constitue pas une erreur manifeste et dominante. Dans ce contexte, il n'y a pas lieu d'écarter ses conclusions concernant la norme de diligence.

IV. Knowledge of the Municipality

IV. Connaissance de la municipalité

59 We agree with our colleague that s. 192(3) of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, requires the plaintiff to show that the municipality knew or should have known of the disrepair of Snake Hill Road before the municipality can be found to have breached its duty of care under s. 192. We also agree that the evidence of the prior accidents, in and of itself, is insufficient to impute such knowledge to the municipality. However, we find that the trial judge did not err in her finding that the municipality knew or ought to have known of the disrepair.

À l'instar de notre collègue, nous estimons que le par. 192(3) de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, oblige le demandeur à démontrer que la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill pour qu'il soit possible de conclure qu'elle a manqué à l'obligation de diligence qui lui incombe en vertu de l'art. 192. Nous sommes nous aussi d'avis que la preuve des accidents antérieurs n'est pas, en soi, suffisante pour prêter cette connaissance à la municipalité. Cependant, nous arrivons à la conclusion que la juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur lorsqu'elle a conclu que la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin.

60 As discussed, the question of whether the municipality knew or should have known of the disrepair of Snake Hill Road is a question of mixed fact and law. The issue is legal in the sense that the municipality is held to a legal standard of knowledge of the nature of the road, and factual in the sense of whether it had the requisite knowledge on the facts of this case. As we state above, absent an isolated error in law or principle, such a finding is subject to the "palpable and overriding" standard of review. In this case, our colleague concludes that the trial judge erred in law by failing to approach the question of knowledge from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor, and holds that a prudent municipal councillor could not be expected to become aware of the risk posed to the ordinary driver by the hazard in question. He also finds that the trial judge erred in law by failing to recognize that the burden of proving knowledge rested with the plaintiff. With respect, we disagree with these conclusions.

Comme nous l'avons vu, la question de savoir si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill est une question mixte de droit et de fait. Il s'agit, d'une part, d'une question de droit en ce que la municipalité est tenue à une norme juridique qui lui impose de connaître la nature du chemin, et, d'autre part, d'une question de fait en ce qu'il faut déterminer si, eu égard aux faits de l'espèce, elle avait la connaissance requise. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, en l'absence d'erreur de droit ou de principe isolable, une telle conclusion est assujettie à la norme de contrôle de l'erreur « manifeste et dominante ». En l'espèce, notre collègue conclut que la juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit en ne considérant pas la question de la connaissance du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent, et il estime qu'on ne pouvait s'attendre à ce qu'un conseiller municipal prudent s'aperçoive du risque que le danger en question faisait courir au conducteur moyen. Il est également d'avis que la juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit en ne reconnaissant pas que la charge de prouver la connaissance incombait au demandeur. En toute déférence, nous ne pouvons souscrire à ces conclusions.

The hazard in question is an unsigned and unexpected sharp curve. In our view, when a hazard is, like this one, a permanent feature of the road which has been found to present a risk to the ordinary driver, it is open to the trial judge to draw an inference, on this basis alone, that a prudent municipal councillor ought to be aware of the hazard. In support of his conclusion on the issue of knowledge, our colleague states that the municipality's knowledge is inextricably linked to the standard of care, and ties his finding on the question of knowledge to his finding that the curve did not present a hazard to the ordinary motorist (para. 149). We agree that the question of knowledge is closely linked to the standard of care, and since we find that the trial judge was correct in holding that the curve presented a hazard to the ordinary motorist, from there it was open to the trial judge to find that the municipality ought to have been aware of this hazard. We further note that as a question of mixed fact and law this finding is subject to the "palpable and overriding" standard of review. On this point, however, we restrict ourselves to situations such as the one at bar where the hazard in question is a permanent feature of the road, as opposed to a temporary hazard which reasonably may not come to the attention of the municipality in time to prevent an accident from occurring.

Le danger en question est une courbe serrée et soudaine, qui n'est annoncée par aucune signalisation. À notre avis, lorsqu'un danger constitue, comme celui-ci qui nous intéresse, une caractéristique permanente qui, a-t-on jugé, présente un risque pour le conducteur moyen, le juge de première instance peut, pour ce seul motif, inférer qu'un conseiller municipal prudent aurait dû connaître l'existence d'un danger. Pour étayer sa conclusion sur la question de la connaissance, notre collègue affirme que la connaissance de la municipalité est intimement liée à celle de la norme de diligence, et il lie sa conclusion sur la connaissance à sa conclusion selon laquelle la courbe ne constituait pas un danger pour l'automobiliste moyen (par. 149). Nous reconnaissons que la question de la connaissance est étroitement liée à celle de la norme de diligence, et, comme nous estimons que la juge de première instance a eu raison de conclure que la courbe présentait un danger pour l'automobiliste moyen, elle pouvait dès lors juger que la municipalité aurait dû connaître ce danger. Soulignons également que cette conclusion visant une question mixte de fait et de droit est assujettie à la norme de contrôle de l'erreur « manifeste et dominante ». Sur ce point, toutefois, nous limitons la portée de notre opinion aux situations analogues à celle qui nous occupe, où le danger constitue une caractéristique permanente du chemin, par opposition à un danger temporaire dont une municipalité pourrait raisonnablement ne pas être informée en temps utile pour empêcher un accident de survenir.

In addition, our colleague relies on the evidence of the lay witnesses, Craig and Toby Thiel, who lived on Snake Hill Road, and who testified that they had not experienced any difficulties with it (para. 149). With respect, we find three problems with this reliance. First, since the curve was found to be a hazard based on its hidden and unexpected nature, relying on the evidence of those who drive the road on a daily basis does not, in our view, assist in determining whether the curve presented a hazard to the ordinary motorist, or whether the municipality ought to have been aware of the hazard. In addition, in finding that the municipality ought to have known of the disrepair, the trial judge clearly chose not to rely on the above evidence. As we state above,

Par ailleurs, notre collègue se fonde sur les dépositions de témoins ordinaires, Craig et Toby Thiel, qui habitaient sur le chemin Snake Hill et qui ont témoigné n'avoir jamais éprouvé de difficulté à conduire à cet endroit (par. 149). En toute déférence, nous estimons que le fait de se fonder sur ces témoignages pose trois problèmes. D'abord, vu la conclusion que la courbe constituait un danger à cause de sa nature cachée et imprévue, ce n'est pas en se basant sur le témoignage de ceux qui empruntent quotidiennement le chemin qu'il est possible, à notre avis, de déterminer si cette courbe présentait un danger pour l'automobiliste moyen, ou si la municipalité aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. De plus, en concluant que la municipalité it is open for a trial judge to prefer some parts of the evidence over others, and to re-assess the trial judge's weighing of the evidence, is, with respect, not within the province of an appellate court.

aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin, la juge de première instance a clairement choisi de ne pas se fonder sur les témoignages susmentionnés. Comme nous l'avons dit précédemment, le juge de première instance peut préférer certaines parties de la preuve à d'autres, et, en toute déférence, il n'appartient pas au tribunal d'appel de procéder à nouveau à l'appréciation de la preuve, tâche déjà accomplie par le juge du procès.

63 As well, since the question of knowledge is to be approached from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor, we find the evidence of lay witnesses to be of little assistance. In Ryan, supra, at para. 28, Major J. stated that the applicable standard of care is that which "would be expected of an ordinary, reasonable and prudent person in the same circumstances" (emphasis added). Municipal councillors are elected for the purpose of managing the affairs of the municipality. This requires some degree of study and of information gathering, above that of the average citizen of the municipality. Indeed, it may in fact require consultation with experts to properly meet the obligation to be informed. Although municipal councillors are not experts, to equate the "prudent municipal councillor" with the opinion of lay witnesses who live on the road is incorrect in our opinion.

Qui plus est, étant donné que la question de la connaissance doit être considérée du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent, nous estimons que le témoignage des témoins ordinaires est peu utile. Dans l'arrêt Ryan, précité, par. 28, le juge Major a dit que la norme de diligence qui s'applique est celle de la personne agissant aussi diligemment que « le ferait une personne ordinaire, raisonnable et prudente placée dans la même situation » (nous soulignons). Les conseillers municipaux sont élus pour gérer les affaires de la municipalité. Pour s'acquitter de cette tâche, il leur faut, dans un cas donné, examiner la situation et recueillir de l'information, faire davantage que ce que fait le simple citoyen de la municipalité. De fait, ils peuvent avoir à consulter des experts pour respecter leur obligation d'être informés. Bien que les conseillers municipaux ne soient pas des experts, il est à notre avis erroné d'assimiler le point de vue du « conseiller municipal prudent » à l'opinion de témoins ordinaires qui habitent sur le chemin.

64 It is in this context that we view the following comments of the trial judge, at para. 90:

> If the R.M. did not have actual knowledge of the danger inherent in this portion of Snake Hill Road, it should have known. While four accidents in 12 years may not in itself be significant, it takes on more significance given the close proximity of three of these accidents, the relatively low volume of traffic, the fact that there are permanent residences on the road and the fact that the road is frequented by young and perhaps less experienced drivers. I am not satisfied that the R.M. has established that in these circumstances it took reasonable steps to prevent this state of disrepair on Snake Hill Road from continuing.

C'est à la lumière de ce contexte que nous interprétons les commentaires suivants de la juge de première instance (au par. 90) :

> [TRADUCTION] Si la M.R. ne connaissait pas concrètement le danger intrinsèque que comporte cette portion du chemin Snake Hill, elle aurait dû le connaître. Le fait que quatre accidents se soient produits en 12 ans n'est peut-être pas significatif en soi, mais il le devient si l'on considère que trois de ces accidents sont survenus à proximité, qu'il s'agit d'une route à débit de circulation relativement faible, que des résidences permanentes sont situées en bordure de celle-ci et que le chemin est fréquenté par des conducteurs jeunes et peut-être moins expérimentés. Je ne suis pas convaincue que la M.R. a établi avoir, dans ces circonstances, pris des mesures raisonnables pour remédier au mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill.

2002 SCC 33 (CanLII)

From this statement, we take the trial judge to have meant that, given the occurrence of prior accidents on this low-traffic road, the existence of permanent residents, and the type of drivers on the road, the municipality did not take the reasonable steps it should have taken in order to ensure that Snake Hill Road did not contain a hazard such as the one in question. Based on these factors, the trial judge drew the inference that the municipality should have been put on notice and investigated Snake Hill Road, in which case it would have become aware of the hazard in question. This factual inference, grounded as it was on the trial judge's assessment of the evidence, was in our view, far from reaching the requisite standard of palpable and overriding error, proper.

Selon notre interprétation, la juge de première instance a voulu dire que, compte tenu des accidents antérieurs sur ce chemin à faible débit de circulation, de la présence de résidents permanents et du type de conducteurs qui empruntent le chemin, la municipalité n'a pas pris les mesures raisonnables qu'elle aurait dû prendre pour faire en sorte que le chemin Snake Hill ne comporte pas de danger comme celui en cause. À partir de ces éléments, la juge de première instance a inféré que la municipalité aurait dû être informée de la situation sur le chemin Snake Hill et aurait dû faire enquête à cet égard, ce qui lui aurait permis de prendre connaissance de l'existence du danger. Cette inférence factuelle, qui repose sur l'appréciation de la preuve faite par la juge de première instance, était selon nous fondée et loin de constituer l'erreur manifeste et dominante requise par la norme pertinente.

65 Although we agree with our colleague that the circumstances of the prior accidents in this case do not provide a direct basis for the municipality to have had knowledge of the particular hazard in question, in the view of the trial judge, they should have caused the municipality to investigate Snake Hill Road, which in turn would have resulted in actual knowledge. In this case, far from causing the municipality to investigate, the evidence of Mr. Danger, who had been the municipal administrator for 20 years, was that, until the time of the trial, he was not even aware of the three accidents which had occurred between 1978 and 1987 on Snake Hill Road. As such, we do not find that the trial judge based her conclusion on any perspective other than that of a prudent municipal councillor, and therefore that she did not commit an error of law in this respect. Moreover, we do not find that she imputed knowledge to the municipality on the basis of the occurrence of prior accidents on Snake Hill Road. The existence of the prior accidents was simply a factor which caused the trial judge to find that the municipality should have been put on notice with respect to the condition of Snake Hill Road (para. 90).

À l'instar de notre collègue, nous estimons que les circonstances des accidents survenus antérieurement, en l'espèce, ne constituent pas une preuve directe que la municipalité aurait dû avoir connaissance du danger particulier en cause, mais, selon la juge de première instance, ces circonstances auraient dû inciter la municipalité à faire enquête à l'égard du chemin Snake Hill, ce qui lui aurait permis de prendre connaissance concrètement du danger. Dans la présente affaire, les accidents antérieurs sont loin d'avoir incité la municipalité à faire enquête. D'ailleurs, M. Danger, administrateur de la municipalité pendant 20 ans, a témoigné que, jusqu'au procès, il n'était même pas au fait des trois accidents survenus entre 1978 et 1987 sur le chemin Snake Hill. En conséquence, nous n'estimons pas que la juge de première instance a fondé sa conclusion sur quelque autre point de vue autre que celui du conseiller municipal prudent, et elle n'a donc pas commis d'erreur de droit à cet égard. De plus, nous sommes d'avis qu'elle n'a pas prêté à la municipalité la connaissance requise sur la base des accidents antérieurs. L'existence de ces accidents ne constituait rien de plus qu'un des éléments qui l'ont amenée à conclure que la municipalité aurait dû être au fait de l'état du chemin Snake Hill (par. 90).

66 We emphasize that, in our view, the trial judge did not shift the burden of proof to the municipality

Nous tenons à souligner que la juge de première instance n'a pas, à notre avis, transféré le fardeau de on this issue. Once the trial judge found that there was a permanent feature of Snake Hill Road which presented a hazard to the ordinary motorist, it was open to her to draw an inference that the municipality ought to have been aware of the danger. Once such an inference is drawn, then, unless the municipality can rebut the inference by showing that it took reasonable steps to prevent such a hazard from continuing, the inference will be left undisturbed. In our view, this is what the trial judge did in the above passage when she states: "I am not satisfied that the R.M. has established that in these circumstances it took reasonable steps to prevent this state of disrepair on Snake Hill Road from continuing" (para. 90 (emphasis added)). The fact that she drew such an inference is clear from the fact that this statement appears directly after her finding that the municipality ought to have known of the hazard based on the listed factors. Thus, it is our view that the trial judge did not improperly shift the burden of proof onto the municipality in this case.

la preuve à la municipalité sur cette question. Dès lors qu'elle a conclu qu'il existait sur le chemin Snake Hill une caractéristique permanente présentant un danger pour l'automobiliste moyen, il lui était loisible d'inférer que la municipalité aurait dû être au fait du danger. Dès l'instant où une telle inférence est tirée, elle demeure inchangée à moins que la municipalité ne puisse la réfuter en démontrant qu'elle a pris des mesures raisonnables pour faire cesser le danger. Selon nous, c'est ce que la juge de première instance a fait dans l'extrait précité lorsqu'elle dit : [TRADUCTION] « Je ne suis pas convaincue que la M.R. a établi avoir, dans ces circonstances, pris des mesures raisonnables pour remédier au mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill » (par. 90 (nous soulignons)). L'existence de cette inférence ressort clairement du fait que le passage précité suit immédiatement la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle, pour les raisons qu'elle énumère, la municipalité aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. Par conséquent, nous sommes d'avis que la juge de première instance n'a pas fait erreur et transféré le fardeau de la preuve à la municipalité en l'espèce.

67 As well, although the circumstances of the prior accidents in this case do not provide strong evidence that the municipality ought to have known of the hazard, proof of prior accidents is not a necessary condition to a finding of breach of the duty of care under s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989. If this were so, the first victim of an accident on a negligently maintained road would not be able to recover, whereas subsequent victims in identical circumstances would. Although under s. 192(3) the municipality cannot be held responsible for disrepair of which it could not have known, it is not sufficient for the municipality to wait for an accident to occur before remedying the disrepair, and, in the absence of proof by the plaintiff of prior accidents, claim that it could not have known of the hazard. If this were the case, not only would the first victim of an accident suffer a disproportionate evidentiary burden, but municipalities would also be encouraged not to collect information pertaining to accidents on its roads, as this would make it more difficult for the plaintiff in a motor vehicle accident to prove that the De même, bien que les accidents survenus antérieurement en l'espèce ne constituent pas une preuve solide que la municipalité aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger, la preuve d'accidents antérieurs n'est pas une condition nécessaire pour qu'un tribunal puisse conclure à la violation de l'obligation de diligence prévue par l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989. Si c'était le cas, la première victime d'un accident sur une route négligemment entretenue ne pourrait obtenir réparation, alors que les victimes subséquentes d'accidents survenant dans des circonstances identiques le pourraient. Bien que, au regard du par. 192(3), la municipalité ne puisse être tenue responsable du mauvais état d'une route dont elle n'aurait pu avoir connaissance, elle ne saurait se contenter d'attendre qu'un accident se produise avant de remédier au mauvais état de la route et, si un demandeur n'apporte pas la preuve de l'existence d'accidents antérieurs, soutenir qu'elle n'aurait pu connaître l'existence du danger. Dans cette hypothèse, non seulement imposerait-on à la première victime d'un accident un fardeau de preuve disproportionné, mais on encouragerait aussi municipality knew or ought to have known of the disrepair.

les municipalités à ne pas recueillir d'informations concernant les accidents survenant sur leurs routes, puisqu'il serait en conséquence plus difficile à la victime d'un accident d'automobile qui intente des poursuites de prouver que la municipalité visée connaissait le mauvais état de la route ou aurait dû le connaître.

68 Although in this case the trial judge emphasized the prior accidents that the plaintiff did manage to prove, in our view, it is not necessary to rely on these accidents in order to satisfy s. 192(3). For the plaintiff to provide substantial and concrete proof of the municipality's knowledge of the state of disrepair of its roads, is to set an impossibly high burden on the plaintiff. Such information was within the particular sphere of knowledge of the municipality, and in our view, it was reasonable for the trial judge to draw an inference of knowledge from her finding that there was an ongoing state of disrepair.

68 Bien que, en l'espèce, la juge de première instance ait souligné les accidents antérieurs dont le demandeur a effectivement prouvé l'existence, nous sommes d'avis qu'il n'est pas nécessaire de s'appuyer sur ces accidents pour satisfaire aux exigences du par. 192(3). Exiger du demandeur qu'il fournisse une preuve substantielle et tangible de la connaissance par la municipalité du mauvais état de ses routes revient à lui imposer un fardeau inacceptablement lourd. Il s'agit d'information relevant du domaine de connaissance de la municipalité et, selon nous, il était raisonnable que la juge de première instance infère de sa conclusion relative au mauvais état d'entretien persistant du chemin que la municipalité possédait la connaissance requise.

69 To summarize our position on this issue, we do not find that the trial judge erred in law either by failing to approach the question from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor, or by improperly shifting the burden of proof onto the defendant. As such, it would require a palpable and overriding error in order to overturn her finding that the municipality knew or ought to have known of the hazard, and, in our view, no such error was made.

69 Pour résumer notre position sur cette question, nous ne pouvons conclure que la juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit soit parce qu'elle aurait omis d'examiner la question du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent, soit parce qu'elle aurait à tort transféré le fardeau de la preuve à la défenderesse. Par conséquent, il faudrait une erreur manifeste et dominante pour écarter sa conclusion que la municipalité connaissait le danger ou aurait dû le connaître et, selon nous, aucune erreur de cette nature n'a été commise.

V. Causation

V. Lien de causalité

70 We agree with our colleague's statement at para. 159 that the trial judge's conclusions on the cause of the accident was a finding of fact: Cork v. Kirby MacLean, Ltd., [1952] 2 All E.R. 402 (C.A.), at p. 407, quoted with approval in Matthews v. MacLaren (1969), 4 D.L.R. (3d) 557 (Ont. H.C.), at p. 566. Thus, this finding should not be interfered with absent palpable and overriding error.

70 Nous faisons nôtres les propos énoncés par notre collègue, au par. 159, selon lesquels la conclusion de la juge de première instance quant à la cause de l'accident était une conclusion de fait : Cork c. Kirby MacLean, Ltd., [1952] 2 All E.R. 402 (C.A.), p. 407; cité et approuvé dans Matthews c. MacLaren (1969), 4 D.L.R. (3d) 557 (H.C. Ont.), p. 566. En conséquence, cette conclusion ne doit pas être modifiée en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante.

71 The trial judge based her findings on causation on three points (at para. 101):

> (1) the accident occurred at a dangerous part of the road where a sign warning motorists of the hidden hazard should have been erected;
>
> (2) even if there had been a sign, Mr. Nikolaisen's degree of impairment did increase his risk of not reacting, or reacting inappropriately, to a sign;
> (3) even so, Mr. Nikolaisen was not driving recklessly such that one would have expected him to have missed or ignored a warning sign. Moments before, on departing the Thiel residence, he had successfully negotiated a sharp curve which he could see and which was apparent to him.

The trial judge concluded that, on a balance of probabilities, Mr. Nikolaisen would have reacted and possibly avoided an accident, if he had been given advance warning of the curve. However she also found that the accident was partially caused by the conduct of Mr. Nikolaisen, and apportioned fault accordingly, with 50 percent to Mr. Nikolaisen and 35 percent to the Rural Municipality (para. 102).

72 As noted above, this Court has previously held that "an omission is only a material error if it gives rise to the reasoned belief that the trial judge must have forgotten, ignored or misconceived the evidence in a way that affected his conclusion" (Van de Perre, supra, at para.15). In the present case, it is not clear from the trial judge's reasons which portions of the evidence of Mr. Laughlin, Craig and Toby Thiel and Paul Housen she relied upon, or to what extent. However, as we have already stated, the full evidentiary record was before the trial judge and, absent further proof that the omission in her reasons was due to her misapprehension or neglect, of the evidence, we can presume that she reviewed the evidence in its entirety and based her factual findings

La juge de première instance a fondé ses conclusions au sujet du lien de causalité sur trois éléments (au par. 101) :

> (1) l'accident est survenu à un endroit dangereux du chemin, où un panneau de signalisation aurait dû être installé pour avertir les automobilistes du danger caché;
>
> (2) même s'il y avait eu un panneau de signalisation, le degré d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen avait accru chez lui le risque qu'il ne réagisse pas du tout ou de façon inappropriée à une signalisation;
> (3) malgré cela, M. Nikolaisen ne conduisait pas de façon si téméraire qu'il était à prévoir qu'il ne voit pas un panneau de signalisation ou n'en tienne pas compte. Quelques instants plus tôt, à son départ de la résidence des Thiel, il avait pris avec succès un virage serré qu'il pouvait clairement voir.

La juge de première instance a estimé que, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, M. Nikolaisen aurait réagi et peut-être évité l'accident si on lui avait signalé à l'avance la présence de la courbe. Toutefois, elle a également conclu que l'accident avait été causé en partie par la conduite de M. Nikolaisen, et elle a réparti la responsabilité en conséquence, soit dans une proportion de 50 p. 100 à M. Nikolaisen et de 35 p. 100 à la municipalité rurale (par. 102).

Comme nous l'avons indiqué précédemment, notre Cour a jugé, dans une autre affaire, qu'« une omission ne constitue une erreur importante que si elle donne lieu à la conviction rationnelle que le juge de première instance doit avoir oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété la preuve de telle manière que sa conclusion en a été affectée » (Van de Perre, précité, par. 15). En l'espèce, les motifs de la juge de première instance n'indiquent pas clairement sur quelles parties des témoignages de M. Laughlin, de Craig et Toby Thiel et de Paul Housen elle s'est appuyée, ni dans quelle mesure elle l'a fait. Cependant, comme nous l'avons dit plus tôt, la juge de première instance disposait de l'ensemble de la preuve et, en l'absence d'autre élément on this review. This presumption, absent sufficient evidence of misapprehension or neglect, is consistent with the high level of error required by the test of "palpable and overriding" error. We reiterate that it is open to the trial judge to prefer the testimony of certain witnesses over others and to place more weight on some parts of the evidence than others, particularly where there is conflicting evidence: Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra, at pp. 122-23. The mere fact that the trial judge did not discuss a certain point or certain evidence in depth is not sufficient grounds for appellate interference: Van de Perre, supra, at para. 15.

indiquant que cette omission dans ses motifs résulte du fait qu'elle aurait mal interprété des éléments de la preuve ou négligé d'en examiner certains, nous pouvons présumer qu'elle a examiné l'ensemble de la preuve et que ses conclusions de fait reposaient sur cet examen. En l'absence de preuve établissant de façon suffisante qu'il y a eu mauvaise interprétation d'éléments de preuve ou négligence d'examiner certains de ceux-ci, cette présomption permet de conclure à l'absence d'erreur importante du type de celle requise pour satisfaire au critère de l'erreur « manifeste et dominante ». Nous tenons à rappeler que le juge de première instance peut préférer le témoignage de certains témoins et accorder plus de poids à certaines parties de la preuve qu'à d'autres, particulièrement en présence de preuves contradictoires : Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité, p. 122-123. Le simple fait que la juge de première instance n'a pas analysé en profondeur un point donné ou un élément de preuve particulier ne constitue pas un motif suffisant pour justifier l'intervention des tribunaux d'appel : Van de Perre, précité, par. 15.

For these reasons, we do not feel it appropriate to review the evidence of Mr. Laughlin and the lay witnesses de novo. As we concluded earlier, the trial judge's finding of fact that a hidden hazard existed at the curve should not be interfered with. The finding of a hidden hazard that requires a sign formed part of the basis of her findings concerning causation. As her conclusions on the existence of a hidden hazard had a basis in the evidence, her conclusions on causation grounded in part on the hidden hazard finding also had a basis in the evidence.

73 Pour ces motifs, nous n'estimons pas opportun d'examiner à nouveau les dépositions de M. Laughlin et des témoins ordinaires. Comme nous l'avons affirmé précédemment, il n'y a pas lieu de modifier la conclusion de fait de la juge de première instance selon laquelle la courbe présentait un danger caché. Ses conclusions touchant le lien de causalité reposent en partie sur cette conclusion relative à l'existence d'un danger caché nécessitant l'installation d'un panneau d'avertissement. Tout comme ses conclusions relatives à l'existence d'un danger caché, celles touchant le lien de causalité — fondées en partie sur le danger caché — avaient elles aussi des assises dans la preuve.

As for the silence of the trial judge on the evidence of Mr. Laughlin, we observe only that the evidence of Mr. Laughlin appears to be general in nature and thus of limited utility. Mr. Laughlin admitted that he could only provide general comments on the effects of alcohol on motorists, but could not provide specific expertise on the actual effect of alcohol on an individual driver. This is significant, as the level of tolerance of an individual driver plays a key role in determining the actual effect of alcohol on the 74 Pour ce qui est du silence de la juge de première instance concernant le témoignage de M. Laughlin, signalons simplement que ce témoignage paraît être de nature générale et, partant, d'une utilité limitée. M. Laughlin a reconnu qu'il ne pouvait faire que des observations générales quant aux effets de l'alcool sur les automobilistes, et non apporter une expertise particulière sur l'effet concret de l'alcool sur un conducteur donné. Il s'agit d'un point important, puisque le seuil de tolérance d'un conducteur donné motorist; an experienced drinker, although dangerous, will probably perform better on the road than an inexperienced drinker. It is noteworthy that the trial judge believed the evidence of Mr. Anderson that Mr. Nikolaisen's vehicle was travelling at the relatively slow speed of between 53 to 65 km/h at the time of impact with the embankment. It was also permissible for the trial judge to rely on the evidence of lay witnesses that Mr. Nikolaisen had successfully negotiated an apparently sharp curve moments before the accident, rather than relying on the evidence of Mr. Laughlin, which was of a hypothetical and unspecific nature. Indeed, the hypothetical nature of Mr. Laughlin's evidence reflects the entire inquiry into whether Mr. Nikolaisen would have seen a sign and reacted, or the precise speed that would be taken by a reasonable driver upon approaching the curve. The abstract nature of such inquiries supports deference to the factual findings of the trial judge, and is consistent with the stringent standard imposed by the phrase "palpable and overriding error".

joue un rôle essentiel dans la détermination de l'effet concret de l'alcool sur cet automobiliste; bien que dangereuse, la personne qui a l'habitude de boire se débrouillera probablement mieux sur la route qu'une personne qui n'en a pas l'habitude. Il convient de souligner que la juge de première instance a cru le témoignage de M. Anderson selon lequel le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen roulait à une vitesse relativement faible, soit entre 53 et 65 km/h, au moment de l'impact avec le remblai. Il lui était également permis de retenir les dépositions des témoins ordinaires selon lesquelles M. Nikolaisen avait réussi à prendre un virage apparemment serré quelques instants avant l'accident, plutôt que le témoignage de M. Laughlin, lequel était de nature hypothétique et générale. De fait, la nature hypothétique du témoignage de M. Laughlin est représentative de toute l'analyse de la question de savoir si M. Nikolaisen aurait aperçu un panneau de signalisation et aurait réagi en conséquence, ou à quelle vitesse précise un conducteur raisonnable s'approcherait du virage. Le caractère théorique de ces analyses justifie de faire montre de retenue à l'égard des conclusions factuelles de la juge de première instance et permet d'affirmer qu'on n'a pas satisfait à la norme rigoureuse imposée par l'expression « erreur manifeste et dominante ».

75 Therefore we conclude that the trial judge's factual findings on causation were reasonable and thus do not reach the level of a palpable and overriding error, and therefore should not have been interfered with by the Court of Appeal.

Par conséquent, nous estimons que les constatations factuelles de la juge de première instance concernant la causalité étaient raisonnables, qu'elles ne constituent donc pas une erreur manifeste et dominante et, partant, que la Cour d'appel n'aurait pas dû les modifier.

I. Introduction

This appeal arises out of a single-vehicle accident which occurred on July 18, 1992, on Snake Hill Road, a rural road located in the Municipality of Shellbrook, Saskatchewan. The appellant, Paul Housen, a passenger in the vehicle, was rendered a quadriplegic by the accident. At trial, the judge found that the driver of the vehicle, Douglas Nikolaisen, was negligent in travelling Snake Hill Road at an excessive rate of speed and in operating his vehicle while impaired. The trial judge also found the respondent, the Municipality of Shellbrook, to be at fault for breaching its duty to keep the road in a reasonable state of repair as required by s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, S.S. 1989-90, c. R-26.1. The Court of Appeal overturned the trial judge's finding that the respondent municipality was negligent. At issue in this appeal is whether the Court of Appeal had sufficient grounds to intervene in the decision of the lower court. The respondent has also asked this Court to overturn the trial judge's finding that the respondent knew or ought to have known of the alleged disrepair of Snake Hill Road and that the accident was caused in part by the negligence of the respondent. An incidental question is whether a common law duty of care exists alongside the statutory duty imposed on the respondent by s. 192.

les décisions des tribunaux de première instance. Appliquant ces raisons et principes à la présente espèce, nous sommes d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'infirmer le jugement de la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan et de rétablir la décision de la juge de première instance, avec dépens devant toutes les cours.

Version française des motifs des juges Gonthier, Bastarache, Binnie et LeBel rendus par

LE JUGE BASTARACHE (dissident) —

I. Introduction

78 Le présent pourvoi découle d'un accident impliquant un seul véhicule survenu le 18 juillet 1992 sur le chemin Snake Hill, route rurale située dans la municipalité de Shellbrook, en Saskatchewan. L'appelant, Paul Housen, qui était passager dans le véhicule, est devenu quadriplégique à la suite de cet accident. Au procès, la juge a conclu que le conducteur du véhicule, Douglas Nikolaisen, avait fait preuve de négligence en roulant à une vitesse excessive sur le chemin Snake Hill et en conduisant son véhicule pendant que ses facultés étaient affaiblies. La juge de première instance a également estimé que l'intimée, la municipalité de Shellbrook, avait commis une faute en manquant à l'obligation de tenir le chemin dans un état raisonnable d'entretien comme le lui impose l'art. 192 de la loi intitulée la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, S.S. 1989-90, ch. R-26.1. La Cour d'appel a infirmé la décision de la juge de première instance concluant à la négligence de la municipalité intimée. La question en litige dans le présent pourvoi consiste à déterminer si la Cour d'appel avait des motifs suffisants pour modifier la décision du tribunal de première instance. L'intimée demande également à notre Cour d'infirmer les conclusions de la juge de première instance portant que l'intimée connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétend-on, le chemin Snake Hill, et que l'accident a été causé en partie par sa négligence. Il faut également répondre à la question incidente de savoir si une obligation de diligence de common law coexiste avec l'obligation légale imposée à l'intimée par l'art. 192.

2002 SCC 33 (CanLII)

79 I conclude that the Court of Appeal was correct to overturn the trial judge's finding that the respondent was negligent. Though I would not interfere with the trial judge's factual findings on this issue, I find that she erred in law by failing to apply the correct standard of care. I would also overturn the trial judge's conclusions with regard to knowledge and causation. In coming to the conclusion that the respondent knew or should have known of the alleged disrepair of Snake Hill Road, the trial judge erred in law by failing to consider the knowledge requirement from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor and by failing to be attentive to the fact that the onus of proof was on the appellant. In addition, the trial judge drew an unreasonable inference by imputing knowledge to the respondent on the basis of accidents that occurred on other segments of the road while motorists were travelling in the opposite direction. The trial judge also erred with respect to causation. She misapprehended the evidence before her, drew erroneous conclusions from that evidence and ignored relevant evidence. Finally, I would not interfere with the decision of the courts below to reject the appellant's argument that a common law duty existed. It is unnecessary to impose a common law duty of care where a statutory duty exists. Moreover, the application of common law negligence principles would not affect the outcome in these proceedings.

J'estime que la Cour d'appel a eu raison d'infirmer la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle la municipalité intimée a été négligente. Je ne modifierais pas les conclusions de fait de la juge de première instance sur cette question, mais je suis d'avis qu'elle a commis une erreur de droit en n'appliquant pas la norme de diligence appropriée. J'infirmerais également ses conclusions en ce qui concerne la question de la connaissance et le lien de causalité. En concluant que l'intimée connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétend-on, le chemin Snake Hill, la juge de première instance a commis une erreur de droit en n'appréciant pas l'exigence relative à la connaissance du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent et en ne tenant pas compte du fait que le fardeau de la preuve incombait à l'appelant. De plus, la juge de première instance a tiré une inférence déraisonnable en prêtant à l'intimée la connaissance requise, en raison d'accidents survenus sur d'autres tronçons du chemin alors que des automobilistes circulaient en sens inverse. La juge de première instance a également commis une erreur relativement au lien de causalité. Elle a mal interprété la preuve qui lui était soumise, elle en a tiré des conclusions erronées et elle n'a pas tenu compte d'éléments de preuve pertinents. Enfin, je ne modifierais pas la décision des juridictions inférieures ayant rejeté l'argument de l'appelant selon lequel il existait une obligation de diligence de common law. Il est inutile d'imposer une obligation de common law lorsqu'il existe une obligation légale. Qui plus est, l'application des principes de la common law en matière de négligence n'aurait aucune incidence sur l'issue de la présente instance.

II. Factual Background

80 The sequence of` events which culminated in this tragic accident began to unfold some 19 hours before its occurrence on the afternoon of July 18, 1992. On July 17, Mr. Nikolaisen attended a barbeque at the residence of Craig and Toby Thiel, located on Snake Hill Road. He arrived in the late afternoon and had his first drink of the day at approximately 6:00 p.m. He consumed four or five drinks before leaving the Thiel residence at approximately

II. Les faits

La suite d'événements ayant abouti au tragique accident a commencé quelque 19 heures avant l'accident lui-même, dans l'après-midi du 18 juillet 1992. Le 17 juillet, M. Nikolaisen a participé à un barbecue à la résidence de Craig et Toby Thiel, sur le chemin Snake Hill. Arrivé en fin d'après-midi, il a pris son premier verre de la journée vers 18 h. Il en a pris quatre ou cinq avant de quitter la résidence des Thiel vers 22 h ou 22 h 30. Après avoir passé

2002 SCC 33 (CanLII)

10:00 or 10:30 p.m. After returning home for a few hours, Mr. Nikolaisen proceeded to the Sturgeon Lake Jamboree, where he met up with the appellant. At the jamboree, Mr. Nikolaisen consumed eight or nine double rye drinks and several beers. The appellant was also drinking during this event. The appellant and Mr. Nikolaisen partied on the grounds of the jamboree for several hours. At approximately 4:30 a.m., the appellant left the jamboree with Mr. Nikolaisen. After travelling around the back roads for a period of time, they returned to the Thiel residence. It was approximately 8:00 a.m. The appellant and Mr. Nikolaisen had several more drinks over the course of the morning. Mr. Nikolaisen stopped drinking two or three hours before leaving the Thiel residence with the appellant at approximately 2:00 p.m.

A light rain was falling when the appellant and Mr. Nikolaisen left the Thiel residence, travelling eastbound with Mr. Nikolaisen behind the wheel of a Ford pickup truck. The truck swerved or "fish-tailed" as it turned the corner from the Thiel driveway onto Snake Hill Road. As Mr. Nikolaisen continued on his way over the course of a gentle bend some 300 metres in length, gaining speed to an estimated 65 km/h, the truck again fish-tailed several times. The truck went into a skid as Mr. Nikolaisen approached and entered a sharper right turn. Mr. Nikolaisen steered into the skid but was unable to negotiate the curve. The left rear wheel of the truck contacted an embankment on the left side of the road. The vehicle travelled on the road for approximately 30 metres when the left front wheel contacted and climbed an 18-inch embankment on the left side of the road. This second contact with the embankment caused the truck to enter a 360-degree roll with the passenger side of the roof contacting the ground first.

When the vehicle came to rest, the appellant was unable to feel any sensation. Mr. Nikolaisen climbed out the back window of the vehicle and ran to the Thiel residence for assistance. Police later accompanied Mr. Nikolaisen to the Shellbrook Hospital where a blood sample was taken. Expert testimony estimated Mr. Nikolaisen's blood alcohol level to be quelques heures chez lui, M. Nikolaisen s'est rendu au jamboree de Sturgeon Lake, où il a rencontré l'appelant. Sur les lieux du jamboree, M. Nikolaisen a consommé huit ou neuf ryes doubles et plusieurs bières. L'appelant buvait lui aussi. L'appelant et M. Nikolaisen ont fait la fête sur les lieux du jamboree pendant plusieurs heures. Vers 4 h 30, l'appelant a quitté le jamboree en compagnie de M. Nikolaisen. Après avoir roulé sur des routes de campagne pendant un certain temps, ils sont retournés à la résidence des Thiel. Il était environ 8 h. L'appelant et M. Nikolaisen ont pris plusieurs autres verres au cours de la matinée. M. Nikolaisen a cessé de boire deux ou trois heures avant de quitter la résidence des Thiel en compagnie de l'appelant vers 14 h.

81 Une faible pluie tombait lorsque l'appelant et M. Nikolaisen ont quitté la résidence des Thiel et pris la route, en direction est, à bord d'une camionnette Ford conduite par M. Nikolaisen. L'arrière de la camionnette a zigzagué lorsque le véhicule a tourné à l'intersection de l'entrée de la résidence des Thiel et du chemin Snake Hill. Alors que M. Nikolaisen prenait un léger virage d'une longueur de quelque 300 mètres, tout en accélérant à 65 km/h environ, l'arrière de sa camionnette a zigzagué à nouveau à plusieurs reprises. La camionnette s'est mise à déraper lorsque M. Nikolaisen a amorcé un virage plus serré vers la droite. Il a donné un coup de volant, mais n'a pas réussi à prendre le virage. La roue arrière gauche de la camionnette a heurté un remblai situé du côté gauche du chemin. Le véhicule a continué sa course sur une distance d'environ 30 mètres, puis sa roue avant gauche est montée sur un remblai de 18 pouces du côté gauche du chemin, après l'avoir heurté. Sous la force du second impact, la camionnette a fait un tonneau complet, le toit du côté du passager touchant le sol en premier.

82 Lorsque le véhicule s'est immobilisé, l'appelant n'éprouvait plus aucune sensation. M. Nikolaisen s'est hissé hors du véhicule par la fenêtre arrière et a couru chez les Thiel pour demander de l'aide. Plus tard, la police a accompagné M. Nikolaisen à l'hôpital de Shellbrook, où un échantillon de sang a été prélevé. Le témoignage d'expert a révélé between 180 and 210 milligrams in 100 millilitres of blood at the time of the accident, well over the legal limits prescribed in The Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986, c. H-3.1, and the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46.

que, au moment de l'accident, l'alcoolémie de M. Nikolaisen se situait entre 180 et 210 milligrammes par 100 milligrammes, taux largement supérieur à la limite permise par la loi intitulée la Highway Traffic Act, S.S. 1986 ch. H-3.1, et par le Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-46.

83 Mr. Nikolaisen had travelled on Snake Hill Road three times in the 24 hours preceding the accident, but had not driven it on any earlier occasions. The road was about a mile and three quarters in length and was flanked by highways to the north and to the east. Starting at the north end, it ran south for a short distance, dipped between open fields, then curved to the southeast and descended in a southerly loop down and around Snake Hill, past trees, bush and pasture, to the bottom of the valley. There it curved sharply to the southeast as it passed the Thiels' driveway. Once it passed the driveway, it curved gently to the south east for about 300 metres, then curved more distinctly to the south. It was on this stretch that the accident occurred. From that point on, the road crossed a creek, took another curve, then ascended a steep hill to the east, straightened out, and continued east for just over half a mile, past tree-lined fields and another farm site, to an approach to the highway.

M. Nikolaisen avait emprunté le chemin Snake Hill à trois reprises au cours des 24 heures ayant précédé l'accident, mais il n'y avait jamais circulé auparavant. Ce chemin, flanqué de routes au nord et à l'est, fait environ un mille et trois quarts de longueur. À partir de son extrémité nord, il franchit une courte distance en direction sud, traverse des champs, puis tourne vers le sud-est pour ensuite descendre en lacet vers le sud autour du mont Snake Hill, passant devant des arbres, buissons et pâturages, jusqu'au fond de la vallée. De là, il tourne brusquement vers le sud-est devant l'entrée de la résidence des Thiel. Tout de suite après, il tourne doucement vers le sud-est sur une distance d'environ 300 mètres, puis décrit une courbe plus prononcée vers le sud. C'est à cet endroit que l'accident s'est produit. De là, le chemin traverse un ruisseau, tourne encore, puis monte une pente raide vers l'est, se redresse et continue vers l'est sur une distance d'un peu plus d'un demi mille et passe devant des champs bordés d'arbres et une autre ferme, jusqu'à une voie d'accès à la route.

84 Snake Hill Road was established in 1923 and was maintained by the respondent municipality for the primary purpose of providing local farmers access to their fields and pastures. It also served as an access road for the two permanent residences and one veterinary clinic located on it. The road at its northernmost end, coming off the highway, is characterized as a "Type C" local access road under the provincial government's scheme of road classification. This means that it is graded, gravelled and elevated above the surrounding land. The portion of the road east of the Thiel residence, on which the accident occurred, is characterized as "Type B" bladed trail, essentially a prairie trail that has been bladed to remove the ruts and to allow it to be driven on. Bladed trails follow the path of least resistance through the surrounding land and are not elevated or gravelled. The Construit en 1923, le chemin Snake Hill est entretenu par la municipalité intimée dans le but premier de permettre aux fermiers de la région d'accéder à leurs champs et pâturages. Il sert également de voie d'accès à deux résidences permanentes et à une clinique vétérinaire. Le tronçon nord du chemin, dont l'extrémité part de la route, est considéré comme un chemin d'accès local de « type C » selon le système provincial de classification des routes. Cela signifie qu'il est nivelé, gravelé et possède une chaussée surélevée. Le tronçon du chemin situé à l'est de la résidence des Thiel et sur lequel l'accident s'est produit est considéré comme un chemin nivelé de « type B », c'est-à-dire essentiellement un chemin dont les ornières ont été remplies pour le rendre carrossable. Les chemins nivelés suivent le tracé qui présente le moins d'obstacle à travers le terrain environnant et ne sont ni surélevés ni gravelés. La province of Saskatchewan has some 45,000 kilometres of bladed trails.

According to the provincial scheme of road classification, both bladed trails and local access roads are "non-designated", meaning that they are not subject to the Saskatchewan Rural Development Sign Policy and Standards. On such roads, the council of the rural municipality makes a decision to post signs if it becomes aware of a hazard or if there are several accidents at one specific spot. Three accidents had occurred on Snake Hill Road between 1978 and 1987. All three accidents occurred to the east of the site of the Nikolaisen rollover, with drivers travelling westbound. A fourth accident occurred on Snake Hill Road in 1990 but there was no evidence as to where it occurred. There was no evidence that topography was a factor in any of these accidents. The respondent municipality had not posted signs on any portion of Snake Hill Road.

province de Saskatchewan compte quelque 45 000 kilomètres de chemins nivelés.

85 Selon le système de classification des routes, tant les chemins nivelés que les chemins d'accès local sont [TRADUCTION] « non désignés », c'est-à-dire qu'ils ne sont pas visés par le document intitulé Saskatchewan Rural Development Sign Policy and Standards (« Politique et normes de signalisation routière en milieu rural en Saskatchewan »). Le conseil de la municipalité rurale installe des panneaux de signalisation sur ces chemins s'il constate l'existence d'un danger ou si plusieurs accidents se produisent au même endroit. Trois accidents sont survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill de 1978 à 1987. Tous ces accidents se sont produits à l'est de l'endroit où la camionnette de Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau et les véhicules concernés circulaient en direction ouest. Un quatrième accident s'est produit sur le chemin Snake Hill en 1990, mais aucune preuve indiquant l'endroit exact de l'accident n'a été présentée. Rien ne permettait de conclure que la topographie des lieux était à l'origine de l'un ou l'autre de ces accidents. La municipalité intimée n'avait installé aucun panneau signalisateur le long du chemin Snake Hill.

IV. Judicial History

A. Saskatchewan Court of Queen's Bench, [1998] 5 W.W.R. 523

87 Wright J. found the respondent negligent in failing to erect a sign to warn motorists of the sharp right curve on Snake Hill Road, which she characterized as a "hidden hazard". She also found Mr. Nikolaisen negligent in travelling Snake Hill Road at an excessive speed and in operating his vehicle while impaired. The appellant was held to be contributorily negligent in accepting a ride with Mr. Nikolaisen. Fifteen percent of the fault was apportioned to the appellant, and the remainder was apportioned jointly and severally 50 percent to Mr. Nikolaisen and 35 percent to the respondent.

88 Wright J. found that s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989 imposed a statutory duty of care on the respondent toward persons travelling on Snake Hill Road. She then considered whether the respondent met the standard of care as delineated in

IV. L'historique des procédures judiciaires

A. Cour du Banc de la Reine de la Saskatchewan, [1998] 5 W.W.R. 523

La juge Wright a conclu que l'intimée avait fait preuve de négligence en omettant d'installer un panneau signalant aux automobilistes l'existence du virage à droite serré sur le chemin Snake Hill, virage qu'elle a qualifié de [TRADUCTION] « danger caché ». Elle a également estimé que M. Nikolaisen avait été négligent en roulant à une vitesse excessive sur le chemin Snake Hill et en conduisant son véhicule pendant qu'il avait les facultés affaiblies. L'appelant a été tenu responsable de négligence concourante parce qu'il avait accepté de monter à bord du véhicule de M. Nikolaisen. La responsabilité a été partagée ainsi : 15 p. 100 à l'appelant, le reste étant réparti solidairement entre M. Nikolaisen (50 p. 100) et l'intimée (35 p. 100).

La juge Wright a d'abord conclu que l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989 imposait à l'intimée une obligation légale de diligence envers les personnes circulant sur le chemin Snake Hill. Elle s'est ensuite demandée si l'intimée s'était

s. 192 and the jurisprudence interpreting that section. She referred specifically to Partridge v. Rural Municipality of Langenberg, [1929] 3 W.W.R. 555 (Sask. C.A.), in which it was stated at p. 558 that "the road must be kept in such a reasonable state of repair that those requiring to use it may, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety". She also cited Shupe v. Rural Municipality of Pleasantdale, [1932] 1 W.W.R. 627 (Sask. C.A.), at p. 630: "[R]egard must be had to the locality . . . the situation of the road therein, whether required to be used by many or by few; . . . to the number of roads to be kept in repair; to the means at the disposal of the council for that purpose, and the requirements of the public who use the road." Relying on Galbiati v. City of Regina, [1972] 2 W.W.R. 40 (Sask. Q.B.), Wright J. observed that although the Act does not mention an obligation to erect warning signs, the general duty of repair nevertheless includes the duty to warn motorists of a hidden hazard.

conformée à la norme de diligence énoncée à l'art. 192 et dans la jurisprudence portant sur l'interprétation de cet article. Elle a fait état, en particulier, de l'arrêt Partridge c. Rural Municipality of Langenberg, [1929] 3 W.W.R. 555, dans lequel la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan a déclaré, à la p. 558, que [TRADUCTION] « le chemin doit être tenu dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, de façon que ceux qui doivent l'emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité ». Elle a également cité le passage suivant de l'affaire Shupe c. Rural Municipality of Pleasantdale, [1932] 1 W.W.R. 627 (C.A. Sask.), p. 630 : [TRADUCTION] « [I]l faut tenir compte de la localité où est situé le chemin, [. . .] de son emplacement dans celle-ci, se demander s'il sera beaucoup ou peu fréquenté; [. . .] du nombre de chemins à entretenir; des ressources budgétaires dont dispose le conseil à cette fin et des besoins du public qui emprunte ce chemin ». Se fondant sur l'affaire Galbiati c. City of Regina, [1972] 2 W.W.R. 40 (B.R. Sask.), la juge Wright a fait observer que, bien que la Loi ne mentionne pas explicitement l'obligation d'installer des panneaux d'avertissement, l'obligation générale d'entretien comporte néanmoins celle de signaler aux automobilistes l'existence d'un danger caché.

Having laid out the relevant case law, Wright J. went on to discuss the character of the road. Relying primarily on the evidence of two experts at trial, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, she found that the sharp right turning curve was a hazard that was not readily apparent to the users of the road. From their testimony she concluded (at para. 85):

89 Après avoir fait état de la jurisprudence pertinente, la juge Wright a poursuivi en examinant la nature du chemin. S'appuyant principalement sur les témoignages donnés par deux experts au procès, MM. Anderson et Werner, elle a conclu que le virage à droite serré constituait un danger que les usagers du chemin ne pouvaient voir aisément. De leurs témoignages, elle a tiré la conclusion suivante (au par. 85) :

It is a hidden hazard. The location of the Nikolaisen rollover is the most dangerous segment of Snake Hill Road. Approaching the location of the Nikolaisen rollover, limited sight distance, created by uncleared bush, precludes a motorist from being forewarned of an impending sharp right turn immediately followed by a left turn. While there were differing opinions on the maximum speed at which this curve can be negotiated, I am satisfied that when limited sight distance is combined with the tight radius of the curve and lack of superelevation, this curve cannot be safely negotiated at speeds greater [TRADUCTION] Il s'agit d'un danger caché. L'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau est situé sur le tronçon le plus dangereux du chemin Snake Hill. À l'approche de cet endroit, des broussailles réduisent la distance de visibilité de l'automobiliste et l'empêchent de voir l'imminence d'un virage à droite serré, qui est immédiatement suivi d'un virage à gauche. Bien que des opinions divergentes aient été émises quant à la vitesse maximale à laquelle ce virage peut être pris, je suis d'avis que, vu la distance de visibilité réduite, l'existence d'une courbe serrée et l'absence de surélévation du chemin, ce

virage ne peut être pris en sécurité à une vitesse supérieure à 60 kilomètres à l'heure dans des conditions favorables, ou 50 kilomètres à l'heure sur chaussée humide. [En italique dans l'original.]

Wright J. then noted that, while it would not be reasonable to expect the respondent to construct the road to a higher standard or to clear all of the bush away, it was reasonable to expect the respondent to erect and maintain a warning or regulatory sign "so that a motorist, using ordinary care, may be forewarned, adjust speed and take corrective action in advance of entering a dangerous situation" (para. 86).

La juge Wright a ensuite précisé que, bien qu'on ne puisse raisonnablement exiger de l'intimée qu'elle construise le chemin selon une norme plus élevée ou qu'elle enlève toutes les broussailles, il était raisonnable de s'attendre à ce qu'elle installe et maintienne un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation [TRADUCTION] « afin qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales soit prévenu et puisse réduire sa vitesse et prendre des mesures correctives avant d'arriver à l'endroit dangereux » (par. 86).

90 Wright J. then considered s. 192(3) of the Act, which provides that there is no breach of the statutory standard of care unless the municipality knew or should have known of the danger. Wright J. observed that between 1978 and 1990, there were four accidents on Snake Hill Road, three of which occurred "in the same vicinity" as the Nikolaisen rollover, and two of which were reported to the authorities. On the basis of this information, she held that "[i]f the R.M. [Rural Municipality] did not have actual knowledge of the danger inherent in this portion of Snake Hill Road, it should have known" (para. 90). Wright J. also found significant the relatively low volume of traffic on the road, the fact that there were permanent residences on the road, and the fact that the road was frequented by young and perhaps less experienced drivers.

La juge Wright a ensuite analysé le par. 192(3) de la Loi, qui prévoit qu'il n'y a manquement à l'obligation de diligence que si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. Elle a rappelé que quatre accidents étaient survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill de 1978 à 1990. Trois de ceux-ci se sont produits [TRADUCTION] « aux environs » de l'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau, et deux ont été signalés aux autorités. Sur la base de cette information, elle a conclu que [TRADUCTION] « [s]i la M.R. [municipalité rurale] ne connaissait pas concrètement le danger intrinsèque que comporte cette portion du chemin Snake Hill, elle aurait dû le connaître » (par. 90). La juge Wright a également accordé de l'importance au débit relativement faible de la circulation sur le chemin, au fait que des résidences permanentes étaient situées en bordure de celui-ci et au fait que le chemin était fréquenté par des conducteurs jeunes et peut-être moins expérimentés.

91 In respect to causation, Wright J. found that it was probable that a warning sign would have enabled Mr. Nikolaisen to take corrective action to maintain control of his vehicle despite the fact of his impairment. She concluded (at para. 101):

En ce qui concerne le lien de causalité, la juge Wright a estimé qu'un panneau de signalisation aurait probablement permis à M. Nikolaisen de prendre des mesures correctives et de conserver la maîtrise de son véhicule, même si ses facultés étaient affaiblies. Elle a aussi tiré la conclusion suivante, au par. 101 :

Mr. Nikolaisen's degree of impairment only served to increase the risk of him not reacting, or reacting inappropriately to a sign. Mr. Nikolaisen was not driving recklessly such that he would have intentionally disregarded

[TRADUCTION] Le degré d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen n'a fait qu'accroître le risque qu'il ne réagisse pas du tout ou encore de façon inappropriée à une signalisation. M. Nikolaisen ne conduisait pas de façon si téméraire qu'il a warning or regulatory sign. He had moments earlier, when departing the Thiel residence, successfully negotiated a sharp curve which he could see and which was apparent to him.

aurait intentionnellement fait abstraction d'un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation. Quelques instants plus tôt, au moment de quitter la résidence des Thiel, il avait pris avec succès un virage serré qu'il pouvait clairement voir.

Wright J. also addressed the appellant's argument that the municipality was in breach of a common law duty of care which was not qualified or limited by any of the restrictions set out under s. 192. She held that Just v. British Columbia, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1228, and the line of authority both preceding and following that decision did not apply to the case before her given the existence of the statutory duty of care. She also found that any qualifying words in s. 192 of the Act pertained to the standard of care and did not impose limitations on the statutory duty of care.

92 La juge Wright s'est également penchée sur l'argument de l'appelant voulant que la municipalité ait manqué à une obligation de diligence de common law qui ne serait pas atténuée ou restreinte par l'une ou l'autre des dispositions de l'art. 192. Elle a estimé que l'arrêt Just c. Colombie-Britannique, [1989] 2 R.C.S. 1228, ainsi que la jurisprudence antérieure et postérieure à cette décision ne s'appliquaient pas à l'affaire dont elle était saisie, vu l'existence de l'obligation légale de diligence. Elle a également jugé que les termes restrictifs de l'art. 192 de la Loi visaient la norme de diligence et n'avaient pas pour effet de limiter la portée de l'obligation légale de diligence.

B. Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan, [2000] 4 W.W.R. 173, 2000 SKCA 12

On appeal, Cameron J.A., writing for a unanimous court, dealt primarily with the trial judge's finding that the respondent's failure to place a warning sign or regulatory sign at the site of the accident constituted a breach of its statutory duty of road repair. He did not find it necessary to rule on the issue of causation given his conclusion that the trial judge erred in finding the respondent negligent.

93 En appel, exprimant la décision unanime de la cour, le juge Cameron s'est attaché principalement à la conclusion de la juge de première instance portant que, en omettant d'installer un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation à l'endroit de l'accident, l'intimée avait manqué à son obligation légale d'entretien des routes. Il n'a pas jugé nécessaire de se prononcer sur la question du lien de causalité, vu sa conclusion que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur en déclarant l'intimée responsable de négligence.

Cameron J.A. characterized the trial judge's conclusion that the respondent had breached the statutory duty of care as a matter of mixed fact and law. He noted that an appellate court is not to interfere with a trial judge's findings of fact unless the judge made a "palpable and overriding error" which affected his or her assessment of the facts. With respect to errors of law, however, Cameron J.A. remarked that the ability of an appellate court to overturn the finding of the trial judge is "largely unbounded". Regarding errors of mixed fact and law, Cameron J.A. noted that these are typically subject to the same standard of review as findings

94 Le juge Cameron a qualifié la conclusion de la juge de première instance que l'intimée avait manqué à son obligation légale de diligence de conclusion portant sur une question mixte de fait et de droit. Il a souligné qu'une cour d'appel ne doit pas modifier les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance à moins que ce dernier n'ait commis une « erreur manifeste et dominante » ayant faussé son appréciation des faits. Pour ce qui est des erreurs de droit, toutefois, le juge Cameron a fait remarquer que le pouvoir d'une cour d'appel d'infirmer la conclusion du juge de première instance est [TRADUCTION] « presque illimité ». En ce qui concerne les erreurs

of fact. One exception to this, according to Cameron J.A., occurs where the trial judge identifies the correct legal test, yet fails to apply one branch of that test to the facts at hand. As support for this proposition, Cameron J.A. cited (at para. 41) Iacobucci J. in Canada (Director of Investigation and Research) v. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 S.C.R. 748, at para. 39:

> [I]f a decision-maker says that the correct test requires him or her to consider A, B, C, and D, but in fact the decision-maker considers only A, B, and C, then the outcome is as if he or she had applied a law that required consideration of only A, B, and C. If the correct test requires him or her to consider D as well, then the decision-maker has in effect applied the wrong law, and so has made an error of law.

95 Turning to the applicable law in this case, Cameron J.A. acknowledged that the standard of care set out in the Act and the jurisprudence interpreting it requires municipalities to post warning signs to warn of hazards that prudent drivers, using ordinary care, would be unlikely to appreciate. Based on the jurisprudence, Cameron J.A. set out (at para. 50) an analytical framework to be used in order to assess if a municipality has breached its duty in this regard. This framework requires the judge:

1. To determine the character and state of the road at the time of the accident. This, of course, is a matter of fact that entails an assessment of the material features of the road where the accident occurred, as well as those factors going to the maintenance standard, namely the location, class of road, patterns of use, and so on.

2. To assess the issue of whether persons requiring to use the road, exercising ordinary car[e], could ordinarily travel upon it safely. This is essentially a reasonable person test, one concerned with how a mixtes de fait et de droit, le juge Cameron a précisé qu'elles sont normalement assujetties à la même norme de contrôle que les conclusions de fait. Selon le juge Cameron, cette règle générale souffre une exception, qui s'applique dans les cas où, bien que le juge du procès ait retenu le bon critère juridique applicable, il omet d'en appliquer un élément aux faits de l'affaire dont il est saisi. Au soutien de cette affirmation, le juge Cameron a cité, au par. 41, les propos suivants du juge Iacobucci dans l'arrêt Canada (Directeur des enquêtes et recherches) c. Southam Inc., [1997] 1 R.C.S. 748, par. 39 :

> [Si] un décideur dit que, en vertu du critère applicable, il lui faut tenir compte de A, B, C et D, mais que, dans les faits, il ne prend en considération que A, B et C, alors le résultat est le même que s'il avait appliqué une règle de droit lui dictant de ne tenir compte que de A, B et C. Si le bon critère lui commandait de tenir compte aussi de D, il a en fait appliqué la mauvaise règle de droit et commis, de ce fait, une erreur de droit.

Relativement au droit applicable en l'espèce, le juge Cameron a reconnu que la norme de diligence énoncée dans la Loi et dans la jurisprudence portant sur l'interprétation de cette loi exige des municipalités qu'elles installent des panneaux de mise en garde pour signaler les dangers que les conducteurs prudents et prenant des précautions normales ne pourraient vraisemblablement pas mesurer. Se fondant sur la jurisprudence, le juge Cameron a établi, au par. 50, un cadre analytique permettant de déterminer si une municipalité a manqué à son obligation à cet égard. Suivant ce cadre, le juge doit examiner les aspects suivants :

[TRADUCTION]

1. Le juge doit déterminer la nature et l'état du chemin au moment de l'accident. Il s'agit, bien sûr, d'une question de fait, qui nécessite une appréciation des caractéristiques physiques du chemin à l'endroit où l'accident s'est produit, ainsi que de tous les facteurs se rapportant à la norme d'entretien, à savoir l'emplacement du chemin, le type de chemin dont il s'agit, les utilisations habituelles de celui-ci, et ainsi de suite.

2. Il soit se demander si les personnes qui devaient emprunter le chemin pouvaient généralement, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité. Il s'agit essentiellement du critère de la reasonable driver on that particular road would have conducted himself or herself. It is necessary in taking this step to take account of the various elements noted in the authorities referred to earlier, namely the locality of the road, the character and class of the road, the standard to which the municipality could reasonably have been expected to maintain the road, and so forth. These criteria fall to be balanced in the context of the question: how would a reasonable driver have driven upon this particular road? Since this entails the application of a legal standard to a given set of facts, it constitutes a question of mixed fact and law.

3. To determine either tha[t] the road was in a reasonable state of repair or that it was not, depending upon the assessment made while using the second step. If it is determined that the road was not in a reasonable state of repair, then it becomes necessary to go on to determine whether the municipality knew or should have known of the state of disrepair before imputing liability.

According to Cameron J.A., the trial judge did not err in law by failing to set out the proper legal test. She did, however, make an error in law of the type identified by Iacobucci J. in Southam, supra. In his view, when applying the law to the facts of the case, the trial judge failed to assess the manner in which a reasonable driver, exercising ordinary care, would ordinarily have driven on the road, and the risk, if any, that the unmarked curve might have posed for the ordinary driver. As noted by Cameron J.A., the trial judge "twice alluded to the matter, but failed to come to grips with it" (para. 57).

Cameron J.A. also found that the trial judge had made a "palpable and overriding" error of fact in determining that the respondent had breached the standard of care. According to Cameron J.A., the trial judge's factual error stemmed from her reliance on the expert testimony of Mr. Werner and Mr. Anderson. Cameron J.A. found that the evidence of both experts was based on the fundamental premise personne raisonnable, qui sert à déterminer comment se serait comporté un conducteur raisonnable sur ce chemin en particulier. À cette étape, il faut tenir compte des nombreux facteurs énoncés dans la jurisprudence mentionnée précédemment, c'est-à-dire l'emplacement du chemin, la nature et le type du chemin, la norme d'entretien à laquelle on pouvait raisonnablement s'attendre d'une municipalité, et ainsi de suite. Ces facteurs doivent être soupesés dans le contexte de la question suivante : Comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait-il conduit son véhicule sur ce chemin en particulier? Puisque cette question suppose l'application d'une norme juridique à un ensemble donné de faits, elle constitue une question mixte de fait et de droit.

3. Il doit déterminer si le chemin était dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, compte tenu des conclusions tirées à la deuxième étape. S'il est établi que le chemin ne se trouvait pas dans un état raisonnable d'entretien, il faut alors déterminer si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état d'entretien avant de conclure à la responsabilité de celle-ci.

96 Selon le juge Cameron, la juge de première instance n'a pas commis d'erreur de droit en ce qui concerne le critère juridique applicable. Elle a cependant commis une erreur de droit du genre de celle exposée par le juge Iacobucci dans l'arrêt Southam, précité. À son avis, lorsqu'elle a appliqué le droit aux faits de l'espèce, la juge de première instance a omis, d'une part, de se demander comment un conducteur raisonnable, faisant montre de prudence normale, aurait conduit son véhicule sur ce chemin, et, d'autre part, d'évaluer le risque, s'il en est, que le virage non annoncé aurait pu constituer pour le conducteur moyen. Comme l'a souligné le juge Cameron de la Cour d'appel, la juge de première instance [TRADUCTION] « a évoqué la question à deux reprises, mais elle ne l'a pas abordée » (par. 57).

97 Le juge Cameron a également estimé que la juge de première instance avait commis une erreur de fait « manifeste et dominante » en concluant que l'intimée n'avait pas exercé le degré de diligence requis. Selon le juge Cameron, cette erreur de fait découlait de l'importance accordée par la juge Wright aux témoignages d'experts de MM. Werner et Anderson. À son avis, les témoignages de ces deux experts that the ordinary driver could be expected to travel the road at a speed of 80 km/h. In his view, this premise was misconceived and unsupported by the evidence.

reposaient sur la prémisse fondamentale qu'on pouvait s'attendre à ce que le conducteur moyen circule sur le chemin à une vitesse de 80 km/h. Selon lui, cette prémisse était erronée et n'était pas étayée par la preuve.

98 Cameron J.A. concluded that although the trial judge was free to accept the evidence of some witnesses over others, she was not free to accept expert testimony that was based on an erroneous factual premise. According to Cameron J.A., had the trial judge found that a prudent driver, exercising ordinary care for his or her safety, would not ordinarily have driven this section of Snake Hill Road at a speed greater than 60 km/h, then she would have had to conclude that no hidden hazard existed since the curve could be negotiated safely at this speed.

Le juge Cameron a conclu que, bien qu'il fût loisible à la juge de première instance d'accorder davantage foi à certains témoignages qu'à d'autres, il ne lui était pas loisible de retenir un témoignage d'expert fondé sur une prémisse factuelle erronée. Selon lui, si la juge de première instance avait estimé qu'un conducteur prudent prenant des précautions normales pour assurer sa sécurité n'aurait généralement pas roulé sur cette portion du chemin Snake Hill à plus de 60 km/h, alors elle aurait dû conclure à l'absence de danger caché puisque le virage pouvait être pris en sécurité à cette vitesse.

99 Cameron J.A. agreed with the trial judge that a common law duty of care was not applicable in this case. His remarks in this respect are found at para. 44 of his reasons:

> Concerning the duty of care, it might be noted that unlike statutory provisions empowering municipalities to maintain roads, but imposing no duty upon them to do so, the duty in this instance owes its existence to a statute, rather than the neighbourhood principle of the common law: Just v. British Columbia, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 1228 (S.C.C.). The duty is readily seen to extend to all who travel upon the roads.

Le juge Cameron a souscrit à l'opinion de la juge de première instance que l'obligation de diligence de common law ne s'appliquait pas en l'espèce. Il a fait les commentaires suivants à ce sujet, au par. 44 de ses motifs :

> [TRADUCTION] En ce qui concerne l'obligation de diligence, il convient de préciser que, contrairement aux dispositions législatives qui habilitent les municipalités à entretenir les chemins, sans toutefois leur imposer l'obligation de le faire, en l'espèce l'obligation doit son existence à une loi, plutôt qu'au principe de common law fondé sur la proximité : Just c. Colombie-Britannique, [1989] 2 R.C.S. 1228. On saisit immédiatement que l'obligation de diligence existe en faveur de tous ceux qui circulent sur les routes.

VI. Analysis

A. Did the Court of Appeal Properly Interfere with the Decision at Trial?

(1) The Standard of Review

Although the distinctions are not always clear, the issues that confront a trial court fall generally into three categories: questions of law, questions of fact, and questions of mixed law and fact. Put briefly, questions of law are questions about what the correct legal test is; questions of fact are questions about what actually took place between the parties; and questions of mixed law and fact are questions about whether the facts satisfy the legal tests (Southam, supra, at para. 35).

Of the three categories above, the highest degree of deference is accorded to the trial judge's findings of fact. The Court will not overturn a factual finding unless it is palpably and overridingly, or clearly wrong (Southam, supra, at para. 60; Stein v. The Ship "Kathy K", [1976] 2 S.C.R. 802, at p. 808; Toneguzzo-Norvell (Guardian ad litem of) v. Burnaby Hospital, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 114, at p. 121). This deference is principally grounded in the recognition that only the trial judge enjoys the opportunity to observe witnesses and to hear testimony first-hand, and is therefore better able to choose between competing versions of events (Schwartz v. Canada, [1996] 1 S.C.R. 254, at para. 32). It is however important to recognize that the making of a factual finding often involves more than merely determining the who, what, where and when of the case. The trial judge is very often called upon to draw inferences from the facts that are put before the court. For example, in this case, the trial judge inferred from the fact of accidents having occurred on Snake Hill Road

VI. L'analyse

A. La Cour d'appel a-t-elle eu raison de modifier la décision de la juge de première instance?

(1) La norme de contrôle

101 Bien qu'elles ne soient pas toujours faciles à distinguer, les questions auxquelles doit répondre un tribunal de première instance se classent généralement en trois catégories : les questions de droit, les questions de fait et les questions mixtes de fait et de droit. En résumé, les questions de droit concernent la détermination du critère juridique applicable; les questions de fait portent sur ce qui s'est réellement passé entre les parties et les questions mixtes de fait et de droit consistent à déterminer si les faits satisfont au critère juridique (Southam, précité, par. 35).

102 De ces trois catégories, ce sont les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance qui commandent le degré le plus élevé de retenue. La Cour ne modifie les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance que si celui-ci a commis une erreur manifeste ou dominante ou si la conclusion est manifestement erronée (Southam, précité, par. 60; Stein c. Le navire « Kathy K », [1976] 2 R.C.S. 802, p. 808; Toneguzzo-Norvell (Tutrice à l'instance de) c. Burnaby Hospital, [1994] 1 R.C.S. 114, p. 121). Cette retenue repose principalement sur le fait que, puisqu'il est le seul à avoir l'occasion d'observer les témoins et d'entendre les témoignages de vive voix, le juge de première instance est en conséquence plus à même de choisir entre deux versions divergentes d'un même événement (Schwartz c. Canada, [1996] 1 R.C.S. 254, par. 32). Cependant, il est important de reconnaître que tirer une conclusion de fait implique souvent davantage que le simple fait de déterminer qui a fait quoi, ainsi que où et quand il l'a fait. Le juge de première instance est très souvent appelé à faire des inférences à partir des faits qui lui sont that the respondent knew or should have known of the hidden danger.

présentés. En l'espèce, par exemple, la juge de première instance a inféré du fait que des accidents s'étaient produits sur le chemin Snake Hill que l'intimée connaissait ou aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger caché.

103 This Court has determined that a trial judge's inferences of fact should be accorded a similar degree of deference as findings of fact (Geffen v. Goodman Estate, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 353). In reviewing the making of an inference, the appeal court will verify whether it can reasonably be supported by the findings of fact that the trial judge reached and whether the judge proceeded on proper legal principles. I respectfully disagree with the majority's view that inferences can be rejected only where the inference-drawing process itself is deficient: see Toronto (City) Board of Education v. O.S.S.T.F., District 15, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 487, at para. 45:

> When a court is reviewing a tribunal's findings of fact or the inferences made on the basis of the evidence, it can only intervene "where the evidence, viewed reasonably, is incapable of supporting a tribunal's findings of fact": Lester (W. W.) (1978) Ltd. v. United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipefitting Industry, Local 740, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 644, at p. 669 per McLachlin J.

An inference can be clearly wrong where the factual basis upon which it relies is deficient or where the legal standard to which the facts are applied is misconstrued. My colleagues recognize themselves that a judge is often called upon to make inferences of mixed law and fact (para. 26). While the standard of review is identical for both findings of fact and inferences of fact, it is nonetheless important to draw an analytical distinction between the two. If the reviewing court were to review only for errors of fact, then the decision of the trial judge would necessarily be upheld in every case where evidence existed to support his or her factual findings. In my view, this Court is entitled to conclude that inferences made by the trial judge were clearly wrong, just as it is entitled to reach this conclusion in respect to findings of fact.

Notre Cour a jugé qu'il fallait appliquer aux inférences de fait du juge de première instance le même degré de retenue qu'à ses conclusions de fait (Geffen c. Succession Goodman, [1991] 2 R.C.S. 353). La cour d'appel qui contrôle la validité d'une inférence se demande si celle-ci peut raisonnablement être étayée par les conclusions de fait tirées par le juge de première instance et si celui-ci a appliqué les principes juridiques appropriés. En toute déférence, je ne partage pas l'opinion de la majorité selon laquelle des inférences ne peuvent être rejetées que dans les cas où le processus qui les a produites est lui-même déficient : voir Conseil de l'éducation de Toronto (Cité) c. F.E.E.E.S.O., district 15, [1997] 1 R.C.S. 487, par. 45 :

> Lorsqu'une cour de justice contrôle les conclusions de fait d'un tribunal administratif ou les inférences qu'il a tirées de la preuve, elle ne peut intervenir que « lorsque les éléments de preuve, perçus de façon raisonnable, ne peuvent étayer les conclusions de fait du tribunal » : Lester (W.W.) (1978) Ltd. c. Association unie des compagnons et apprentis de l'industrie de la plomberie et de la tuyauterie, section locale 740, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 644, à la p. 669, le juge McLachlin.

Une inférence peut être manifestement erronée si ses assises factuelles présentent des lacunes ou si la norme juridique appliquée aux faits est mal interprétée. Mes collègues eux-mêmes reconnaissent qu'un juge est souvent appelé à tirer des inférences mixtes de fait et droit (par. 26). Bien que la norme de contrôle soit la même et pour les conclusions de fait et pour les inférences de fait, il importe néanmoins de faire une distinction analytique entre les deux. Si le tribunal de révision ne faisait que vérifier s'il y a des erreurs de fait, la décision du juge de première instance serait alors nécessairement confirmée dans tous les cas où il existe des éléments de preuve étayant les conclusions de fait de ce dernier. Selon moi, notre Cour a le droit de conclure que les inférences du juge de première instance étaient manifestement erronées, tout comme elle peut le faire à l'égard des conclusions de fait.

My colleagues take issue with the above statement that an appellate court will verify whether the making of an inference can reasonably be supported by the trial judge's findings of fact, a standard which they believe to be less strict than the "palpable and overriding" standard. I do not agree that a less strict standard is implied. In my view there is no difference between concluding that it was "unreasonable" or "palpably wrong" for a trial judge to draw an inference from the facts as found by him or her and concluding that the inference was not reasonably supported by those facts. The distinction is merely semantic.

104 Mes collègues ne sont pas d'accord avec l'énoncé susmentionné — savoir celui portant que la cour d'appel se demande si une inférence peut raisonnablement être étayée par les conclusions de fait tirées par le juge de première instance — estimant qu'il s'agit d'une norme de contrôle moins exigeante que celle de l'erreur « manifeste et dominante ». Pour ma part, je ne crois pas que cet énoncé implique l'application d'une norme moins exigeante. À mon avis, il n'y a aucune différence entre le fait de conclure qu'il était « déraisonnable » ou « manifestement erroné » pour un juge de tirer une inférence des faits qu'il a constatés, et le fait de conclure que cette inférence n'était pas raisonnablement étayée par ces faits. La distinction est purement sémantique.

By contrast, an appellate court reviews a trial judge's findings on questions of law not merely to determine if they are reasonable, but rather to determine if they are correct; Moge v. Moge, [1992] 3 S.C.R. 813, at p. 833; R. v. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 606, at p. 647; R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994), at p. 90. The role of correcting errors of law is a primary function of the appellate court; therefore, that court can and should review the legal determinations of the lower courts for correctness.

105 En revanche, une cour d'appel ne contrôle pas les conclusions tirées par le juge de première instance à l'égard des questions de droit simplement pour déterminer si elles sont raisonnables, mais plutôt pour déterminer si elles sont correctes : Moge c. Moge, [1992] 3 R.C.S. 813, p. 833; R. c. Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 606, p. 647; R. P. Kerans, Standards of Review Employed by Appellate Courts (1994), p. 90. Un des rôles principaux d'une cour d'appel consiste à corriger les erreurs de droit et, par conséquent, cette cour peut et doit vérifier si les conclusions juridiques de la juridiction inférieure sont correctes.

In the law of negligence, the question of whether the conduct of the defendant has met the appropriate standard of care is necessarily a question of mixed fact and law. Once the facts have been established, the determination of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant will in most cases be reviewable on a standard of correctness since the trial judge must appreciate the facts within the context of the appropriate standard of care. In many cases, viewing the facts through the legal lens of the standard of care gives rise to a policy-making or law-setting function that is the purview of both the trial and appellate courts. As stated by Kerans, supra, at p. 103, "[t]he evaluation of facts as meeting or not meeting a legal test is a process that involves law-making. Moreover, it is probably correct to say that every new attempt to apply a legal rule to a set of facts involves some measure of interpretation of that rule, and thus more law-making" (emphasis in original).

106 Dans le contexte du droit relatif à la négligence, la question de savoir si la conduite du défendeur est conforme à la norme de diligence appropriée est forcément une question mixte de fait et de droit. Une fois les faits établis, la décision touchant la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté ou non la norme de diligence est, dans la plupart des cas, contrôlable selon la norme de la décision correcte, puisque le juge de première instance doit apprécier les faits au regard de la norme de diligence appropriée. Dans bien des cas, l'examen des faits à travers le prisme juridique de la norme de diligence implique l'établissement de politiques d'intérêt général ou la création de règles de droit, rôle qui relève autant des cours de première instance que des cours d'appel. Comme l'a dit Kerans, op. cit., p. 103, [TRADUCTION] « [l]'examen de la

question de savoir si les faits satisfont ou non à un critère juridique donné est un processus qui implique une fonction créatrice de droit. Qui plus est, il est probablement exact d'affirmer que chaque nouvelle tentative d'appliquer une règle de droit à un ensemble de faits emporte une certaine interprétation de cette règle et, partant, l'élaboration de règles de droit additionnelles » (en italique dans l'original).

107 In a negligence case, the trial judge is called on to decide whether the conduct of the defendant was reasonable under all the circumstances. While this determination involves questions of fact, it also requires the trial judge to assess what is reasonable. As stated above, in many cases, this will involve a policy-making or "law-setting" role which an appellate court is better situated to undertake (Kerans, supra, at pp. 5-10). For example, in this case, the degree of knowledge that the trial judge should have imputed to the reasonably prudent municipal councillor raised the policy consideration of the type of accident-reporting system that a small rural municipality with limited resources should be expected to maintain. This law-setting role was recognized by the United States Supreme Court in Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of U.S., Inc., 466 U.S. 485 (1984), at note 17, within the context of an action for defamation:

Dans une affaire de négligence, le juge de première instance est appelé à décider si la conduite du défendeur était raisonnable eu égard à toutes les circonstances. Bien que la prise de cette décision demande l'examen de questions de fait, elle exige également du juge de première instance qu'il établisse ce qui est raisonnable. Comme il a été mentionné plus tôt, dans bien des cas cette décision implique l'établissement de politiques d'intérêt général ou la « création de règles de droit », rôle qu'une cour d'appel est mieux placée pour remplir (Kerans, op. cit., p. 5 à 10). En l'espèce, par exemple, le degré de connaissance que la juge de première instance aurait dû prêter au conseiller municipal raisonnablement prudent soulevait une considération participant d'une politique d'intérêt général, savoir le genre de système d'information sur les accidents qu'une petite municipalité rurale aux ressources budgétaires limitées est censée tenir. Ce rôle créateur de droit a été reconnu par la Cour suprême des États-Unis dans l'arrêt Bose Corp. c. Consumers Union of U.S., Inc., 466 U.S. 485 (1984), à la note 17, dans le contexte d'une action en diffamation :

> A finding of fact in some cases is inseparable from the principles through which it was deduced. At some point, the reasoning by which a fact is "found" crosses the line between application of those ordinary principles of logic and common experience which are ordinarily entrusted to the finder of fact into the realm of a legal rule upon which the reviewing court must exercise its own independent judgment. Where the line is drawn varies according to the nature of the substantive law at issue. Regarding certain largely factual questions in some areas of the law, the stakes — in terms of impact on future cases and future conduct — are too great to entrust them finally to the judgment of the trier of fact.

> [TRADUCTION] Une conclusion de fait est, dans certains cas, indissociable des principes qui ont été appliqués pour y arriver. À un point donné, le raisonnement menant à la « constatation d'un fait » cesse d'être l'application des principes ordinaires de logique et d'expérience générale, qui est généralement l'apanage du juge de première instance, pour devenir l'application d'une règle de droit, tâche où le tribunal de révision doit exercer son propre jugement. Cette ligne de démarcation se déplace selon la nature de la règle de droit substantiel en litige. Dans quelques branches du droit, certaines questions largement factuelles soulèvent des enjeux — incidence sur d'éventuelles affaires et le comportement futur — qui sont trop importants pour être confiés en premier et dernier ressort au juge de première instance.

My colleagues assert that the question of whether or not the standard of care was met by the defendant in a negligence case is subject to a standard of palpable and overriding error unless it is clear that the trial judge made some extricable error in principle with respect to the characterization of the standard or its application, in which case the error may amount to an error of law (para. 36). I disagree. In many cases, it will not be possible to "extricate" a purely legal question from the standard of care analysis applicable to negligence, which is a question of mixed fact and law. In addition, while some questions of mixed fact and law may not have "any great precedential value" (Southam, supra, at para. 37), such questions often necessitate a normative analysis that should be reviewable by an appellate court.

108 Mes collègues affirment que la question de savoir si, dans une affaire de négligence, le défendeur a respecté ou non la norme de diligence appropriée est assujettie au critère de l'erreur manifeste et dominante, sauf si le juge de première instance a clairement commis une erreur de principe isolable relativement à la détermination de la norme à appliquer ou à son application, auquel cas l'erreur peut constituer une erreur de droit (par. 36). Je ne suis pas d'accord. Dans bon nombre de cas, il ne sera pas possible d'« isoler » une question de droit pur de l'analyse de la norme de diligence applicable en matière de négligence, qui est une question mixte de fait et de droit. En outre, bien que certaines questions mixtes de fait et de droit puissent ne pas avoir « une grande valeur comme précédents » (Southam, précité, par. 37), ces questions impliquent souvent une analyse normative que devrait pouvoir contrôler une cour d'appel.

Consider again the issue of whether the municipality knew or should have known of the alleged danger. As a matter of law, the trial judge must approach the question of whether knowledge should be imputed to the municipality having regard to the duties of the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor. If the trial judge applies a different legal standard, such as the reasonable person standard, it is an error of law. Yet even if the trial judge correctly identifies the applicable legal standard, he or she may still err in the process of assessing the facts through the lens of that legal standard. For example, there may exist evidence that an accident had previously occurred on the portion of the road on which the relevant accident occurred. In the course of considering whether or not that fact satisfies the legal test for knowledge the trial judge must make a number of normative assumptions. The trial judge must consider whether the fact that one accident had previously occurred in the same location would alert the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor to the existence of a hazard. The trial judge must also consider whether the ordinary, reasonable and prudent councillor would have been alerted to the previous accident by an accident-reporting system. In my view, the question of whether the fact of a previous accident having occurred fulfills the applicable knowledge

109 Revenons maintenant à la question de savoir si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le danger allégué. Sur le plan juridique, le juge de première instance doit se demander s'il y a lieu de prêter cette connaissance à la municipalité eu égard aux obligations qui incombent au conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent. Si le juge de première instance applique une autre norme juridique, par exemple celle de la personne raisonnable, il commet une erreur de droit. Cependant, même en supposant que le juge de première instance détermine correctement la norme juridique à appliquer, il lui est encore possible de commettre une erreur lorsqu'il apprécie les faits à la lumière de cette norme juridique. Par exemple, il peut exister une preuve indiquant qu'un accident s'était déjà produit sur le tronçon de chemin en cause. Le juge de première instance qui se demande si ce fait satisfait ou non au critère juridique applicable à la question de la connaissance doit poser un certain nombre d'hypothèses normatives. Il doit se demander si le fait qu'un accident se soit déjà produit au même endroit alerterait le conseiller municipal moyen, raisonnable et prudent de l'existence d'un danger. Il doit également se demander si ce conseiller aurait appris l'existence de l'accident antérieur par un système d'information sur les accidents. Selon moi, la question de savoir si le fait qu'un accident se soit produit antérieurement requirement is a question of mixed fact and law and it is artificial to characterize it as anything else. As is apparent from the example given, the question may also raise normative issues which should be reviewable by an appellate court on the correctness standard.

satisfait à l'exigence de connaissance applicable est une question mixte de fait et de droit, et il serait artificiel de la qualifier autrement. Comme l'indique clairement l'exemple qui précède, cette question peut également soulever des questions normatives que devrait pouvoir contrôler une cour d'appel selon la norme de la décision correcte.

110 I agree with my colleagues that it is not possible to state as a general proposition that all matters of mixed fact and law are reviewable according to the standard of correctness: citing Southam, supra, at para. 37 (para. 28). I disagree, however, that the dicta in Southam establishes that a trial judge's conclusions on questions of mixed fact and law in a negligence action should be accorded deference in every case. This Court in St-Jean v. Mercier, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 491, 2002 SCC 15, a medical negligence case, distinguished Southam on the issue of the standard applicable to questions of mixed fact and law where the tribunal has no particular expertise. Gonthier J., writing for a unanimous Court, stated at paras. 48-49:

Je partage l'opinion de mes collègues selon laquelle on ne peut poser comme principe général que toutes les questions mixtes de fait et de droit sont assujetties à la norme de la décision correcte : citant Southam, précité, par. 37 (par. 28). Cependant, je ne crois pas que l'opinion formulée dans Southam signifie que, dans une affaire de négligence, les conclusions du juge de première instance sur des questions mixtes de fait et de droit commandent systématiquement une attitude empreinte de retenue. Dans l'arrêt St-Jean c. Mercier, [2002] 1 R.C.S. 491, 2002 CSC 15, affaire de négligence médicale, notre Cour a différencié cette affaire de l'arrêt Southam sur la question de la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions mixtes de fait et de droit dans les cas où le tribunal ne possède d'expertise particulière. Exposant la décision unanime de la Cour, le juge Gonthier a dit ceci, aux par. 48 et 49 :

> A question "about whether the facts satisfy the legal tests" is one of mixed law and fact. Stated differently, "whether the defendant satisfied the appropriate standard of care is a question of mixed law and fact" (Southam, at para. 35).
> Generally, such a question, once the facts have been established without overriding and palpable error, is to be reviewed on a standard of correctness since the standard of care is normative and is a question of law within the normal purview of both the trial and appellate courts. Such is the standard for medical negligence. There is no issue of expertise of a specialized tribunal in a particular field which may go to the determination of facts and be pertinent to defining an appropriate standard and thereby call for some measure of deference by a court of general appeal (Southam, supra, at para. 45; and Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, supra, at p. 647).

> La question qui consiste « à déterminer si les faits satisfont au critère juridique » est une question mixte de droit et de fait ou en d'autres termes, « la question de savoir si le défendeur a respecté la norme de diligence appropriée est une question de droit et de fait » (Southam, par. 35).
> Une fois les faits établis sans erreur manifeste et dominante, cette question doit généralement être révisée suivant la norme de la décision correcte puisque la norme de diligence est normative et constitue une question de droit qui relève de la compétence habituelle des tribunaux de première instance et d'appel. C'est la norme applicable à la négligence médicale. Il n'est pas question de l'expertise d'un tribunal spécialisé dans un domaine particulier, pouvant toucher la détermination des faits et avoir une incidence sur la définition de la norme appropriée et exiger de ce fait une certaine déférence de la part d'une cour générale d'appel (Southam, par. 45; Nova Scotia Pharmaceutical Society, précité, p. 647).

111 I also disagree with my colleagues that Jaegli Enterprises Ltd. v. Taylor, [1981] 2 S.C.R. 2, is authority for the proposition that when the question

Je ne peux non plus me ranger à l'avis de mes collègues selon lequel l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises Ltd. c. Taylor, [1981] 2 R.C.S. 2, permet d'affirmer of mixed fact and law at issue is a finding of negligence, that finding should be deferred to by appellate courts. In that case the trial judge found that the conduct of the defendant ski instructor met the standard of care expected of him. Moreover, the trial judge found that the accident would have occurred regardless of what the ski instructor had done (Taylor v. The Queen in Right of British Columbia (1978), 95 D.L.R. (3d) 82). Seaton J.A. of the British Columbia Court of Appeal disagreed with the trial judge that the ski instructor had met the applicable standard of care (Taylor (Guardian ad litem of) v. British Columbia (1980), 112 D.L.R. (3d) 297). Seaton J.A. recognized nevertheless that the "final question" was whether "the instructor's failure to remain was a cause of the accident" (p. 307). On the issue of causation, a question of fact, Seaton J.A. clearly substituted his opinion for that of the trial judge's without regard to the appropriate standard of review. His concluding remarks on the issue of causation at p. 308 highlight his lack of deference to the trial judge's conclusion on causation:

> On balance, I think that the evidence supports the plaintiffs' claim against the instructor, that his conduct in leaving the plaintiff below the crest was one of the causes of the accident.

This Court, which restored the finding of the trial judge, did not clearly state whether it did so on the basis that the appellate court was wrong to interfere with the trial judge's finding of negligence or whether it did so because the appellate court wrongly interfered with the trial judge's conclusions on causation. The reasons suggest the latter. The only portion of the trial judgment that this Court referred to was the finding on causation. Dickson J. (as he then was) remarks in Jaegli Enterprises, supra, at p. 4:

> At the end of a nine-day trial Mr. Justice Meredith, the presiding judge, delivered a judgment in which he que, lorsque la question mixte de fait et de droit en litige est la conclusion de négligence tirée par le juge de première instance, les cours d'appel doivent faire preuve de retenue à l'égard de cette conclusion. Dans cette affaire, le juge de première instance avait conclu que le défendeur, un instructeur de ski, avait respecté la norme de diligence à laquelle il était tenu. Il avait aussi conclu que l'accident serait survenu, indépendamment de la conduite de l'instructeur de ski (Taylor c. The Queen in Right of British Columbia (1978), 95 D.L.R. (3d) 82). Le juge Seaton de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a exprimé son désaccord avec la conclusion du juge de première instance que l'instructeur de ski avait respecté la norme de diligence applicable (Taylor (Guardian ad litem of) c. British Columbia (1980), 112 D.L.R. (3d) 297). Il a néanmoins reconnu que [TRADUCTION] « l'ultime question » consistait à se demander si « l'omission de l'instructeur de rester près de la demanderesse avait été une cause de l'accident » (p. 307). Sur la question du lien de causalité, qui est une question de fait, le juge Seaton a clairement substitué son opinion à celle du juge de première instance sans tenir compte de la norme de contrôle appropriée. Ses remarques finales sur la question de la causalité, à la p. 308, font ressortir son absence de retenue à l'égard de la conclusion du juge de première instance sur ce point :

> [TRADUCTION] Tout bien considéré, j'estime que la preuve étaye la prétention des demandeurs voulant que la conduite de l'instructeur, qui l'a laissée seule sous la crête de la butte, a été l'une des causes de l'accident.

112 En rétablissant la décision du juge de première instance, notre Cour n'a pas précisé si elle le faisait parce que la cour d'appel avait eu tort de modifier la conclusion de ce dernier sur la négligence ou parce qu'elle avait erronément modifié ses conclusions sur la causalité. Les motifs donnent à penser que la dernière proposition est la bonne. La seule partie du jugement de première instance mentionnée par notre Cour se rapporte à la conclusion sur le lien de causalité. Le juge Dickson (plus tard Juge en chef) a fait les remarques suivantes dans l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises, précité, à la p. 4 :

> À la fin d'un procès de neuf jours, le juge Meredith, qui a présidé le procès, a rendu un jugement dans lequel il a very carefully considered all of the evidence and concluded that the accident had been caused solely by Larry LaCasse and that the plaintiffs should recover damages, in an amount to be assessed, against LaCasse. The claims against Paul Ankenman, Jaegli Enterprises Limited and the other defendants were dismissed with costs.

examiné soigneusement toute la preuve et a conclu que l'accident était imputable uniquement à Larry LaCasse et que les demandeurs pouvaient recouvrer de LaCasse des dommages-intérêts pour un montant à déterminer. Les réclamations contre Paul Ankenman, Jaegli Enterprises Limited et les autres défendeurs ont été rejetées avec dépens.

113 The Court went on to cite a number of cases, some of which did not involve negligence (see Schreiber Brothers Ltd. v. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 S.C.R. 78), for the general proposition that "it [is] wrong for an appellate court to set aside a trial judgment where [there is not palpable and overriding error, and] the only point at issue [was] the interpretation of the evidence as a whole" (p. 84). Given that the Court focussed on the issue of causation, a question of fact alone, I do not think that Jaegli Enterprises establishes that a finding of negligence by the trial judge should be deferred to by appellate courts. In my view, the Court in Jaegli Enterprises merely affirmed the longstanding principle that an appellate court should not interfere with a trial judge's finding of fact absent a palpable and overriding error.

La Cour a ensuite cité quelques décisions, dont certaines ne traitent pas de négligence (voir Schreiber Brothers Ltd. c. Currie Products Ltd., [1980] 2 R.C.S. 78), au soutien de la proposition générale qu'« une cour d'appel ne peut à bon droit infirmer une décision de première instance lorsque la seule question en litige porte sur l'interprétation de l'ensemble de la preuve » (p. 84). Étant donné que la Cour s'est attachée à la question du lien de causalité, question de fait seulement, je ne crois pas que l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises établisse que les cours d'appel doivent faire montre de retenue lorsque le juge de première instance conclut à la négligence. À mon avis, dans l'arrêt Jaegli Enterprises, la Cour n'a fait que confirmer le principe bien établi portant qu'une cour d'appel ne doit pas modifier une conclusion de fait du juge de première instance en l'absence d'erreur manifeste et dominante.

(2) Error of Law in the Reasons of the Court of Queen's Bench

(2) L'erreur de droit dans les motifs de la Cour du Banc de la Reine

114 The standard of care set out in s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, as interpreted within the jurisprudence, required the trial judge to examine whether the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred posed a hazard to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. Having identified the correct legal test, the trial judge nonetheless failed to ask herself whether a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have been able to safely drive the portion of the road on which the accident occurred. To neglect entirely one branch of a legal test when applying the facts to the test is to misconstrue the law (Southam, supra, at para. 39). The Saskatchewan Court of Appeal was therefore right to characterize this failure as an error of law and to consider the factual findings made by the trial judge in light of the appropriate legal test.

Suivant la norme de diligence énoncée à l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, telle qu'elle a été interprétée dans la jurisprudence, la juge de première instance devait se demander si le tronçon du chemin Snake Hill sur lequel s'est produit l'accident constituait un danger pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. Après avoir déterminé quel était le critère juridique applicable, la juge de première instance a toutefois omis de se demander si un tel conducteur aurait pu rouler en sécurité sur le tronçon en question. Le fait d'omettre entièrement une étape d'un critère juridique, dans l'application de celui-ci aux faits de l'espèce, équivaut à mal interpréter le droit (Southam, précité, par. 39). Par conséquent, la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan a donc eu raison de qualifier cette omission d'erreur de droit et de contrôler les conclusions de fait tirées par la juge de première instance à la lumière du critère juridique approprié.

The long line of jurisprudence interpreting s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989 and its predecessor provisions clearly establishes that the duty of the municipality is to keep the road "in such a reasonable state of repair that those requiring to use it may, exercising ordinary care, travel upon it with safety" (Partridge, supra, at p. 558; Levey v. Rural Municipality of Rodgers, No. 133, [1921] 3 W.W.R. 764 (Sask. C.A.), at p. 766; Diebel Estate v. Pinto Creek No. 75 (Rural Municipality) (1996), 149 Sask. R. 68 (Q.B.), at pp. 71-72). Legislation in several other provinces establishes a similar duty of care and courts in these provinces have interpreted it in a similar fashion (R. v. Jennings, [1966] S.C.R. 532, at p. 537; County of Parkland No. 31 v. Stetar, [1975] 2 S.C.R. 884, at p. 892; Fafard v. City of Quebec (1917), 39 D.L.R. 717 (S.C.C.), at p. 718). This Court, in Jennings, supra, interpreting a similar provision under the Ontario Highway Improvement Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 171, remarked at p. 537 that: "[i]t has been repeatedly held in Ontario that where a duty to keep a highway in repair is imposed by statute the body upon which it is imposed must keep the highway in such a condition that travellers using it with ordinary care may do so with safety".

115 La jurisprudence de longue date portant sur l'interprétation de l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989 et des dispositions qu'il a remplacées établit clairement que les municipalités ont l'obligation de tenir les chemins [TRADUCTION] « dans un état raisonnable d'entretien de façon que ceux qui doivent l[es] emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité » (Partridge, précité, p. 558; Levey c. Rural Municipality of Rodgers, No. 133, [1921] 3 W.W.R. 764 (C.A. Sask.), p. 766; Diebel Estate c. Pinto Creek No. 75 (Rural Municipality) (1996), 149 Sask. R. 68 (B.R.), p. 71 et 72). Plusieurs autres provinces ont adopté des lois établissant une obligation de diligence semblable, et les tribunaux de ces provinces ont interprété cette obligation de la même façon (R. c. Jennings, [1966] R.C.S. 532, p. 537; Comté de Parkland n° 31 c. Stetar, [1975] 2 R.C.S. 884, p. 892; Fafard c. City of Quebec (1917), 39 D.L.R. 717 (C.S.C.), p. 718). Interprétant une disposition similaire de la Highway Improvement Act de l'Ontario, R.S.O. 1960, ch. 171, notre Cour a indiqué, dans l'arrêt Jennings, précité, p. 537, qu'[TRADUCTION] « [i]l a été décidé à maintes reprises en Ontario que, lorsque l'obligation de maintenir une route en bon état d'entretien est légalement imposée à un organisme, celui-ci doit maintenir la route dans un état permettant à ceux qui l'empruntent en prenant des précautions normales d'y circuler en sécurité ».

There is good reason for limiting the municipality's duty to repair to a standard which permits drivers exercising ordinary care to proceed with safety. As stated by this Court in Fafard, supra, at p. 718: "[a] municipal corporation is not an insurer of travellers using its streets; its duty is to use reasonable care to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition for ordinary travel by persons exercising ordinary care for their own safety". Correspondingly, appellate courts have long held that it is an error for the trial judge to find a municipality in breach of its duty merely because a danger exists, regardless of whether or not that danger poses a risk to the ordinary user of the road. The type of error to be guarded against was described by Wetmore C.J. in Williams v.

116 Il existe de bonnes raisons de limiter l'obligation d'entretien des routes incombant aux municipalités au respect d'une norme suffisante pour permettre aux conducteurs qui prennent des précautions normales d'y circuler en sécurité. Comme l'a dit notre Cour dans l'arrêt Fafard, précité, p. 718 : [TRADUCTION] « [l]es municipalités ne sont pas les assureurs des automobilistes qui roulent dans leurs rues; leur obligation consiste à faire preuve de diligence raisonnable et de maintenir leurs rues dans un état raisonnablement sécuritaire pour la circulation normale des personnes qui prennent des précautions normales en vue d'assurer leur propre sécurité ». En conséquence, les cours d'appel estiment depuis longtemps que le juge de première instance commet une erreur s'il conclut qu'une municipalité

Town of North Battleford (1911), 4 Sask. L.R. 75 (en banc), at p. 81:

> The question in an action of this sort, whether or not the road is kept in such repair that those requiring to use it may, using ordinary care, pass to and fro upon it in safety, is, it seems to me, largely one of fact . . . I would hesitate about setting aside a finding of fact of the trial Judge if he had found the facts necessary for the determination of the case, but he did not so find. He found that the crossing was a "dangerous spot without a light, and that if the utmost care were used no accident might occur, but it was not in such proper or safe state as to render such accident unlikely to occur." He did not consider the question from the standpoint of whether or not those requiring to use the road might, using ordinary care, pass to and fro upon it in safety. The mere fact of the crossing being dangerous is not sufficient . . . . [Emphasis added.]

117 From the jurisprudence cited above, it is clear that the mere existence of a hazard or danger does not in and of itself give rise to a duty on the part of the municipality to erect a sign. Even if a trial judge concludes on the facts that the conditions of the road do, in fact, present a hazard, he or she must still go on to assess whether that hazard would present a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. The ordinary driver is often faced with inherently dangerous driving conditions. Motorists drive in icy or wet conditions. They drive at night on country roads that are not well lit. They are faced with obstacles such as snow ridges and potholes. These obstacles are often not in plain view, but are obscured or "hidden". Common sense dictates that motorists will, however, exercise a degree of caution when faced with dangerous driving conditions. A municipality is expected to provide extra cautionary measures only where the conditions of the road and the surrounding circumstances do not signal to the driver the possibility that a hazard is present. For example, the ordinary driver expects a dirt road to become slippery when wet. By contrast, paved manque à son obligation du seul fait qu'un danger existe, indépendamment de la question de savoir si ce danger présente ou non un risque pour l'usager ordinaire du chemin. Le genre d'erreur qu'il faut éviter a été décrit ainsi par le juge en chef Wetmore dans l'affaire Williams c. Town of North Battleford (1911), 4 Sask. L.R. 75 (in banco), p. 81 :

> [TRADUCTION] Il me semble que la question qui se pose dans ce genre d'action — soit celle de savoir si le chemin est tenu dans un état d'entretien tel que ceux qui doivent l'emprunter puissent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité — est essentiellement une question de fait [. . .] j'hésiterais à écarter une conclusion de fait du juge de première instance s'il avait relevé l'existence des faits nécessaires pour trancher l'affaire, mais il ne l'a pas fait. Il a conclu que l'intersection était « un endroit dangereux non éclairé, et qu'aucun accident ne s'y produirait si on faisait preuve d'une prudence extrême, mais que cet endroit n'était pas tenu dans un état d'entretien propre à rendre improbable un tel accident ». Il n'a pas examiné la question en se demandant si ceux qui doivent emprunter ce chemin peuvent, en prenant des précautions normales, y circuler en sécurité. Le seul fait que l'intersection soit dangereuse n'est pas suffisant . . . [Je souligne.]

Il ressort clairement de la jurisprudence susmentionnée que la simple existence d'un risque ou danger ne fait pas en soi naître pour la municipalité l'obligation d'installer un panneau de signalisation. Même si, à partir des faits, le juge de première instance arrive à la conclusion que l'état du chemin crée effectivement un risque, il doit poursuivre son analyse et se demander si ce risque présente un danger pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. Le conducteur moyen rencontre souvent des conditions de conduite intrinsèquement dangereuses. Les automobilistes conduisent leur véhicule sur des chaussées glacées ou humides. Ils roulent la nuit sur des chemins de campagne mal éclairés. Ils rencontrent des obstacles comme des bancs de neige et des nids-de-poule. Souvent ces obstacles ne sont pas visibles, car ils sont dissimulés ou « cachés ». Le bon sens suggère que les automobilistes font toutefois preuve d'une certaine prudence en présence de conditions de conduite dangereuses. On n'attend de la municipalité qu'elle prenne des mesures d'avertissement supplémentaires que lorsque l'état du chemin et l'ensemble des bridge decks on highways are often slick, though they appear completely dry. Consequently, signs will be posted to alert drivers to this unapparent possibility.

autres circonstances ne signalent pas au conducteur la possibilité qu'un danger existe. Par exemple, le conducteur moyen s'attend à ce qu'un chemin de terre devienne glissant lorsqu'il est mouillé. À l'opposé, les tabliers de pont asphaltés qui se trouvent sur les routes sont souvent glissants, bien qu'ils paraissent complètement secs. Par conséquent, des panneaux sont installés pour alerter les conducteurs de cette possibilité non apparente.

The appellant in this case argued, at para. 27 of his factum, that the trial judge did, in fact, assess whether a reasonable driver using ordinary care would find the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred to pose a risk. He points in particular to the trial judge's comments at paras. 85-86 that:

> There is a portion of Snake Hill Road that is a hazard to the public. In this regard I accept the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner. Further, it is a hazard that is not readily apparent to users of the road. It is a hidden hazard. . . .
> . . . where the existence of . . . bush obstructs the ability of a motorist to be forewarned of a hazard such as that on Snake Hill Road, it is reasonable to expect the R.M. to erect and maintain a warning or regulatory sign so that a motorist, using ordinary care, may be forewarned, adjust speed and take corrective action in advance of entering a dangerous situation. [Emphasis added.]

118 En l'espèce, l'appelant a plaidé, au par. 27 de son mémoire, que la juge de première instance s'était, en fait, demandé si un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales considérerait que le tronçon du chemin Snake Hill où s'est produit l'accident constitue un risque. Il souligne en particulier les commentaires suivants de la juge de première instance, aux par. 85 et 86 :

> [TRADUCTION] Il y a, sur le chemin Snake Hill, un tronçon qui présente un danger pour le public. À cet égard, je retiens les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner. En outre, il s'agit d'un danger qui n'est pas facilement décelable par les usagers du chemin. Il s'agit d'un danger caché . . .
> . . . à l'endroit où la présence des broussailles empêche les automobilistes de voir venir un danger comme celui qui existe sur le chemin Snake Hill, il est raisonnable de s'attendre à ce que la M.R. installe et maintienne un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation afin qu'un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales soit prévenu et puisse réduire sa vitesse et prendre des mesures correctives avant d'arriver à l'endroit dangereux. [Je souligne.]

The appellant's argument suggests that the trial judge discharged her duty to apply the facts to the law merely by restating the facts of the case in the language of the legal test. This was not, however, sufficient. Although it is clear from the citation above that the trial judge made a factual finding that the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred presented drivers with a hidden hazard, there is nothing in this portion of her reasons to suggest that she considered whether or not that portion of the road would pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. The finding that a hazard, or even that a hidden hazard, exists does not automatically give rise to the conclusion that the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care could not travel through it safely. A proper application of the test demands that the trial judge ask the question: "How would a reasonable driver have driven on this road?" Whether or not a hazard is "hidden" or a curve is "inherently" dangerous does not dispose of the question. My colleagues state that it was open to the trial judge to draw an inference of knowledge of the hazard simply because the sharp curve was a permanent feature of the road (para. 61). Here again, there is nothing in the reasons of the trial judge to suggest that she drew such an inference or to explain how such an inference accorded with the legal requirements concerning the duty of care.

119 L'appelant semble prétendre que la juge de première instance s'est acquittée de son devoir d'appliquer le droit aux faits simplement en intégrant les faits de l'espèce à la formulation du critère juridique. Ce n'était toutefois pas suffisant. Bien qu'il ressorte clairement des passages précités que la juge de première instance a, à partir des faits, conclu que la portion du chemin Snake Hill où s'est produit l'accident exposait les conducteurs à un danger caché, il n'y a rien dans cette partie de ses motifs qui indique qu'elle s'est demandé si cette portion du chemin présentait un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. Le fait de conclure à l'existence d'un danger, même caché, n'implique pas forcément que le conducteur

raisonnable prenant des précautions normales ne peut pas y circuler en sécurité. Pour bien appliquer le critère juridique, le juge de première instance doit se poser la question suivante : « Comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait-il roulé sur ce chemin? » Le fait de conclure qu'il existe ou non un danger « caché » ou qu'une courbe est quelque chose d' « intrinsèquement » dangereux ne vide pas la question. Mes collègues affirment que la juge de première instance pouvait inférer la connaissance du danger du seul fait que la courbe serrée constituait une caractéristique permanente du chemin (par. 61). Ici encore, rien dans les motifs de la juge de première instance n'indique qu'elle a tiré une telle inférence ou n'explique en quoi une telle inférence satisfaisait aux conditions juridiques relatives à l'obligation de diligence.

120 Nor did the trial judge consider the question in any other part of her reasons. Her failure to do so becomes all the more apparent when her analysis (or lack thereof) is compared to that in cases in which the courts applied the appropriate method. The Court of Appeal referred to two such cases by way of example. In Nelson v. Waverley (Rural Municipality) (1988), 65 Sask. R. 260 (Q.B.), the plaintiff argued that the defendant municipality should have posted signs warning of a ridge in the middle of the road that resulted from the grading of the road by the municipality. The trial judge concluded that if the driver had exercised ordinary care, he could have travelled along the roadway with safety. Instead, he drove too fast and failed to keep an adequate lookout considering the maintenance that was being performed on the road. In Diebel Estate, supra, the issue was whether the municipality had a duty under s. 192 to post a sign warning motorists that a rural road ended abruptly in a T-intersection. The question of how a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have driven on that road was asked and answered by the trial judge in the following passage at p. 74:

La juge de première instance n'a pas non plus examiné cette question ailleurs dans ses motifs. Son omission à cet égard devient encore plus évidente lorsqu'on compare son analyse (ou son absence d'analyse) à celle des affaires où les tribunaux ont appliqué la bonne démarche. La Cour d'appel a donné comme exemple deux de ces affaires. Dans Nelson c. Waverley (Rural Municipality) (1988), 65 Sask. R. 260 (B.R.), le demandeur prétendait que la municipalité défenderesse aurait dû installer des panneaux signalant la présence, au milieu du chemin, d'un sillon résultant de travaux municipaux de nivellement. Le juge de première instance a estimé que, si le conducteur avait pris des précautions normales, il aurait pu rouler en sécurité sur la chaussée. Au lieu de cela, il a roulé trop vite et manqué de vigilance compte tenu des travaux d'entretien qui étaient effectués sur le chemin. Dans Diebel Estate, précité, il s'agissait de déterminer si la municipalité avait, en vertu de l'art. 192, l'obligation d'installer un panneau avertissant les automobilistes qu'une route rurale se terminait de façon abrupte à un croisement en T. Le juge de première instance s'est demandé comment un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales aurait roulé sur ce chemin, et il a répondu ainsi à cette question, à la p. 74 :

His [the expert's] conclusions as to stopping are, however, mathematically arrived at and never having been on the road, from what was described in the course of the trial, I would think the intersection could be a danger at night to a complete stranger to the area, depending on one's reaction time and the possibility of being confused by what one saw rather than recognizing the T intersection to be just that. On the other hand I would think a complete stranger in the area would be absolutely reckless to drive down a dirt road of the nature of this particular road at night at 80 kilometres per hour. [Emphasis added; emphasis in original deleted.]

toutefois d'opérations mathématiques et bien que je n'aie jamais emprunté le chemin en question, d'après les descriptions faites au procès, je suis d'avis que le croisement pourrait constituer un danger la nuit pour quelqu'un qui ne connaît absolument pas l'endroit, eu égard à la vitesse de réaction de chacun et à la possibilité que quelqu'un confonde le croisement en T avec quelque chose d'autre. Par ailleurs, j'estime que quelqu'un ne connaissant aucunement l'endroit agirait de façon tout à fait téméraire en roulant à 80 kilomètres à l'heure la nuit sur un chemin de terre comme celui qui nous intéresse. [Je souligne; soulignement dans l'original omis.]

The conclusion that Wright J. erred in failing to apply a required aspect of the legal test does not automatically lead to a rejection of her factual findings. This Court's jurisdiction to review questions of law entitles it, where an error of law has been found, to take the factual findings of the trial judge as they are, and to assess these findings anew in the context of the appropriate legal test.

121 Le fait de conclure que la juge Wright a commis une erreur de droit en omettant d'appliquer un élément essentiel du critère juridique n'invalide pas forcément ses conclusions de fait. En effet, la compétence de notre Cour en matière d'examen des questions de droit l'autorise, lorsqu'une telle erreur est décelée, à reprendre telles quelles les conclusions de fait du juge de première instance et à les réévaluer au regard du critère juridique approprié.

In my view, neither Wright J.'s factual findings nor any other evidence in the record that she might have considered had she asked the appropriate question, support the conclusion that the respondent was in breach of its duty. The portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred did not pose a risk to a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care because the conditions of Snake Hill Road in general and the conditions with which motorists were confronted at the exact location of the accident signalled to the reasonable motorist that caution was needed. Motorists who appropriately acknowledged the presence of the several factors which called for caution would have been able to navigate safely the so-called "hidden hazard" without the benefit of a road sign.

122 Selon moi, ni les faits retenus par la juge Wright ni aucun autre élément de preuve au dossier qu'elle aurait pu prendre en considération si elle s'était posé la bonne question n'appuient sa conclusion que l'intimée a manqué à son obligation. La portion du chemin Snake Hill où s'est produit l'accident ne présentait pas de risque pour un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales, car l'état de ce chemin en général et les conditions auxquelles les automobilistes doivent faire face à l'endroit précis de l'accident avertissent l'automobiliste raisonnable que la prudence s'impose. Les automobilistes sachant reconnaître les divers facteurs qui appellent à la prudence auraient pu franchir le soi-disant [TRADUCTION] « danger caché » sans l'aide d'un panneau de signalisation.

The question of how a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have driven on Snake Hill Road necessitates a consideration of the nature and locality of the road. A reasonable motorist will not approach a narrow gravel road in the country in the same way that he or she will approach a paved highway. It is reasonable to expect a motorist to drive more slowly and to pay greater attention to the potential presence of hazards when driving on a

123 Pour savoir comment un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales aurait conduit son véhicule sur le chemin Snake Hill, il faut tenir compte de la nature du chemin et de la configuration des lieux. Un automobiliste raisonnable ne roulera pas sur une étroite route de campagne gravelée de la même façon que sur une route asphaltée. Il est raisonnable de s'attendre à ce qu'un automobiliste conduise moins vite et soit plus attentif à la présence road that is of a lower standard, particularly when he or she is unfamiliar with it.

124 While the trial judge in this case made some comments regarding the nature of the road, I agree with the Court of Appeal's findings that "[s]he might have addressed the matter more fully, taking into account more broadly the terrain through which the road passed, the class and designation of the road in the scheme of classification, and so on . . . " (para. 55). Instead, the extent of her analysis of the road was limited to the following comments, found at para. 84 of her reasons:

> Snake Hill Road is a low traffic road. It is however maintained by the R.M. so that it is passable year round. There are permanent residences on the road. It is used by farmers for access to their fields and cattle. Young people frequent Snake Hill Road for parties and as such the road is used by those who may not have the same degree of familiarity with it as do residents.

125 In my view, the question of how the reasonable driver would have negotiated Snake Hill Road necessitated a somewhat more in-depth analysis of the character of the road. The trial judge's analysis focussed almost entirely on the use of the road, without considering the sort of conditions it presented to drivers. It is perhaps not surprising that the trial judge did not engage in this fuller analysis, given that she did not turn her mind to the question of how a reasonable driver would have approached the road. Had she considered this question, she likely would have engaged in the type of assessment that was made by the Court of Appeal at para. 13 of its judgment:

> The road, about 20 feet in width, was classed as "a bladed trail," sometimes referred to as "a land access road," a classification just above that of "prairie trail". As such, it was not built up, nor gravelled, except lightly at one end of it, but simply bladed across the terrain following the path of least resistance. Nor was it in any way signed.

de dangers potentiels sur un chemin de catégorie inférieure, particulièrement s'il n'est pas familier avec celui-ci.

Bien que, en l'espèce, la juge de première instance ait fait certains commentaires sur la nature du chemin, je souscris à la conclusion de la Cour d'appel selon laquelle [TRADUCTION] « [e]lle aurait pu examiner la question de manière plus approfondie, en tenant davantage compte du type de terrain que le chemin traversait, de la nature et de la désignation du chemin selon le système de classification des routes et ainsi de suite . . . » (par. 55). Au lieu de cela, son analyse s'est limitée aux commentaires suivants, au par. 84 de ses motifs :

> [TRADUCTION] Le chemin Snake Hill est un chemin à faible débit de circulation. Il est néanmoins entretenu par la M.R. à longueur d'année afin de le garder carrossable. Des résidences permanentes sont situées en bordure de celui-ci. Les fermiers l'utilisent pour accéder à leurs champs et à leur bétail. Des jeunes gens empruntent le chemin Snake Hill pour se rendre à des fêtes, de sorte qu'il est utilisé par des conducteurs qui ne le connaissent pas toujours aussi bien que les résidents de l'endroit.

À mon avis, la question de savoir comment un conducteur raisonnable aurait roulé sur le chemin Snake Hill nécessitait un examen un peu plus approfondi de la nature du chemin.
