2002 SCC 33 (CanLII)

Given the fact that Snake Hill Road is a low standard road, in a category only one or two levels above a prairie trail, one can assume that a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would approach the road with a certain degree of caution.

Comme le chemin Snake Hill est une route de catégorie inférieure, à peine un ou deux niveaux au-dessus d'un chemin de prairie, on peut présumer qu'un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales y roulerait avec une certaine prudence.

126 Having considered the character of the road in general, and having concluded that by its very nature it warranted a certain degree of caution, it is nonetheless necessary to consider the material features of the road at the point at which the accident occurred. Even on roads which are of a lower standard, a reasonable driver exercising due caution may be caught unaware by a particularly dangerous segment of the road. That was, in fact, the central argument that the appellant put forward in this case. According to the appellant's "dual nature" theory, at para. 8 of his factum, the fact that the curvy portion of Snake Hill Road where the accident occurred was flanked by straight segments of road created a risk that a motorist would be lulled into thinking that the curves could be taken at speeds greater than that at which they could actually be taken.

127 While it is not clear from her reasons that the trial judge accepted the appellant's "dual nature" theory, it appears that her conclusion that the municipality did not meet the standard of care required by it was based largely on her observation of the material features of the road at the location of the Nikolaisen rollover. Relying on the evidence of two experts, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, she found the portion of the road on which the accident occurred to be a "hazard to the public". In her view, the limited sight distance created by the presence of uncleared bush precluded a motorist from being forewarned of the impending sharp right turn immediately followed by a left turn. Based on expert testimony, she concluded that the curve could not be negotiated at speeds greater than 60 km/h under favourable conditions, or 50 km/h under wet conditions.

127 Bien que les motifs de la juge de première instance n'indiquent pas clairement si elle a retenu la thèse de la « nature hybride » du chemin, il semble que sa conclusion selon laquelle la municipalité a manqué à son obligation d'entretien ait reposé largement sur son examen des caractéristiques physiques du chemin, à l'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau. S'appuyant sur les témoignages de deux experts, MM. Anderson et Werner, elle a estimé que la portion du chemin où s'est produit l'accident constituait un [TRADUCTION] « danger pour le public ». Selon elle, le fait que la distance de visibilité ait été réduite par la présence de broussailles empêchait les automobilistes de voir l'imminence d'un virage à droite serré, qui est immédiatement suivi d'un virage à gauche. Sur la base des témoignages d'experts, elle a conclu que le virage ne pouvait être pris à une vitesse supérieure à 60 km/h dans des conditions favorables, ou 50 km/h sur chaussée humide.

128 Again, I would not reject the trial judge's factual finding that the curve presented motorists with an inherent hazard. The evidence does not, however, support a finding that a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have been unable to negotiate the curve with safety. As I explained earlier, the municipality's duty to repair is implicated only when an objectively hazardous condition exists, and where it is determined that a reasonable driver arriving at the hazard would be unable to provide for his or her own security due to the features of the hazard.

128 Je ne rejetterais pas, je le répète, la conclusion de fait selon laquelle la courbe présentait un risque

intrinsèque pour les automobilistes. Toutefois, il n'y a rien dans la preuve qui permette de conclure qu'un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales aurait été incapable de prendre le virage en sécurité. Comme je l'ai expliqué plus tôt, l'obligation d'entretien des municipalités n'est en cause que lorsqu'il existe une situation objectivement dangereuse et qu'il est établi qu'un conducteur raisonnable s'approchant du danger serait incapable d'assurer sa sécurité en raison des caractéristiques de ce danger.

129 I agree with the trial judge that part of the danger posed by the presence of bushes on the side of the road was that a driver would not be able to predict the radius of the sharp right-turning curve obscured by them. In my view, however, the actual danger inherent in this portion of the road was that the bushes, together with the sharp radius of the curve, prevented an eastbound motorist from being able to see if a vehicle was approaching from the opposite direction. Given this latter situation, it is highly unlikely that any reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would approach the curve at speeds in excess of 50 km/h, a speed which was found by the trial judge to be a safe speed at which to negotiate the curve. Since a reasonable driver would not approach this curve at speeds in excess of which it could safely be taken, I conclude that the curve did not pose a risk to the reasonable driver.

Je partage l'opinion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle une partie du danger créé par les broussailles se trouvant en bordure de la route tenait au fait qu'un conducteur ne pourrait deviner le rayon de courbure prononcé du virage à droite serré qu'elles dissimulaient. À mon sens, toutefois, le véritable danger intrinsèque de ce tronçon du chemin résidait dans le fait que les broussailles, ainsi que le court rayon de courbure du virage, empêchent les automobilistes circulant en direction est de voir si un véhicule s'approche en sens inverse. Par conséquent, il est très peu probable qu'un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales approcherait de ce virage à une vitesse supérieure à 50 km/h, vitesse à laquelle la juge de première instance a conclu qu'il était possible de le prendre en sécurité. Étant donné qu'un conducteur raisonnable n'approcherait pas de ce virage à une vitesse supérieure à celle lui permettant de le prendre en sécurité, je conclus que le virage ne constituait pas un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable.

130 One need only refer to the series of photographs of the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred to appreciate the extent to which visual clues existed which would alert a driver to approach the curve with caution (Respondent's Record, vol. II, at pp. 373-76). The photographs, which indicate what the driver would have seen on entering the curve, show the presence of bush extending well into the road. From the photographs, it is clear that a motorist approaching the curve would not fail to appreciate the risk presented by the curve, which is simply that it is impossible to see around it and to gauge what may be coming in the opposite direction. In addition, the danger posed by the inability to see what is approaching in the opposite direction is somewhat heightened by the fact that this road is used by farm operators. At trial, the risk was described in the following terms by Mr. Sparks, an engineer giving expert testimony:

Il suffit d'examiner les photos du tronçon du chemin Snake Hill où l'accident est survenu pour constater à quel point il existait des indices visuels propres à inciter les conducteurs à s'approcher du virage avec prudence (dossier de l'intimée, vol. II, p. 373-376). Les photos, qui montrent ce que voit le conducteur sur le point d'amorcer le virage, laissent voir la présence de broussailles s'avançant considérablement au-dessus du chemin. Il ressort clairement de ces photographies qu'un automobiliste approchant du virage ne manquerait pas pressentir le risque que présente celui-ci, savoir qu'il est tout simplement impossible de voir de l'autre côté de la courbe ce qui peut arriver en sens inverse. De plus,

> . . . if you can't, if you can't see far enough down the road to, you know, if there's somebody that's coming around the corner with a tractor and a cultivator and you can't see around the corner, then, you know, drivers would have a fairly strong signal, in my view, that due care and caution would be required.

The expert testimony relied on by the trial judge does not support a finding that the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred would pose a risk to a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. When asked at trial whether motorists, exercising reasonable care, would enter the curve at a slow speed because they could not see what was coming around the corner, Mr. Werner agreed that he, himself, drove the corner "at a slower speed" and that it would be prudent for a driver to slow down given the limited sight distance. Similarly, Mr. Anderson admitted to having taken the curve at 40-45 km/h the first time he drove it because he "didn't want to get into trouble with it". When asked if the reason he approached the curve at that speed was because he could not see around it, he replied in the affirmative: "[t]hat's why I approached it the way I did."

Perhaps most tellingly, Mr. Nikolaisen himself testified that he could not see if a vehicle was coming in the opposite direction as he approached the curve. The following exchange which occurred during counsel's cross-examination of Mr. Nikolaisen at trial is instructive:

> Q. . . . You told my learned friend, Mr. Logue, that your view of the road was quite limited, that is correct? The view ahead on the road is quite limited, is that right?

le danger que constitue l'incapacité de voir ce qui arrive en sens inverse est d'une certaine manière exacerbé par le fait que le chemin est utilisé par des exploitants agricoles. Au procès, ce risque a été décrit ainsi par M. Sparks, ingénieur, qui témoignait à titre d'expert :

> [TRADUCTION] . . . si vous ne pouvez pas voir, si vous ne pouvez pas voir assez loin sur le chemin pour, vous savez, savoir si quelqu'un arrive en sens inverse avec un tracteur tirant une herse et que vous ne pouvez voir, de l'autre côté du virage, alors, vous savez, cela devrait envoyer un message clair aux conducteurs, selon moi, que l'attention et la prudence s'imposent.

131 Le témoignage d'expert retenu par la juge de première instance n'étaye pas sa conclusion que la portion du chemin Snake Hill où s'est produit l'accident présente un risque pour un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. Lorsqu'on lui a demandé si un automobiliste prenant des précautions normales amorcerait le virage à vitesse réduite étant donné qu'il ne peut voir ce qui l'attend au détour du chemin, M. Werner a reconnu que lui-même prend le virage [TRADUCTION] « à vitesse réduite » et qu'il serait prudent que les conducteurs ralentissent en raison de la distance de visibilité limitée. De même, M. Anderson a admis avoir pris le virage à 40-45 km/h la première fois qu'il est passé par là, car il [TRADUCTION] « ne voulait pas se placer dans une situation difficile ». Lorsqu'on lui a demandé s'il avait pris le virage à cette vitesse parce qu'il ne pouvait pas voir ce qui l'attendait, il a répondu par l'affirmative : [TRADUCTION] « [c']est la raison pour laquelle je l'ai approché comme je l'ai fait. »

132 Fait encore plus révélateur peut-être, M. Nikolaisen lui-même a témoigné qu'il ne pouvait pas savoir si un véhicule venait en sens inverse lorsqu'il s'approchait du virage. L'échange suivant, durant le contre-interrogatoire de M. Nikolaisen au procès par l'avocat de la partie adverse, est éclairant :

> Q. . . . Vous avez dit à mon savant collègue, M. Logue, que votre visibilité était plutôt réduite, est-ce exact? La visibilité sur le chemin est plutôt réduite, n'est-ce pas?

2002 SCC 33 (CanLII)

A. As in regards to travelling through the curves, yes, that's right, yeah.

Q. Yes. And you did not know what was coming as you approached the curve, that is correct?

A. That's correct, yes.

Q. There might be a vehicle around that curve coming towards you or someone riding a horse on the road, that is correct?

A. Or a tractor or a cultivator or something, that's right.

Q. Or a tractor or a cultivator. You know as a person raised in rural Saskatchewan that all of those things are possibilities, that is right?

A. That's right, yeah, that is correct.

R. Lorsqu'on se trouve dans les courbes, oui, c'est exact.

Q. Oui. Et vous ne saviez pas ce qui s'en venait lorsque vous approchiez du virage, est-ce exact?

R. C'est exact, oui.

Q. Il aurait pu y avoir un véhicule venant dans votre direction de l'autre côté de la courbe ou quelqu'un se promenant à cheval sur le chemin, est-ce exact?

R. Ou un tracteur, un cultivateur ou autre chose, c'est vrai.

Q. Ou un tracteur ou un cultivateur. Vous savez, puisque vous avez grandi en milieu rural en Saskatchewan, que toutes ces situations sont autant de possibilités, n'est-ce pas?

R. C'est vrai, oui.

133 Nor do I accept the appellant's submission that the "dual nature" of the road had the effect of lulling drivers into taking the curve at an inappropriate speed. This theory rests on the assumption that the motorists would drive the straight portions of the road at speeds of up to 80 km/h, leaving them unprepared to negotiate suddenly appearing curves. Yet, while the default speed limit on the road was 80 km/h, there was no evidence to suggest that a reasonable driver would have driven any portion of the road at that speed. While Mr. Werner testified that a driver "would be permitted" to drive at a maximum of 80 km/h, since this was the default (not the posted) speed limit, he later acknowledged that bladed trails in the province are not designed to meet 80 km/h design criteria. I agree with the Court of Appeal that the evidence is that "Snake Hill Road was self-evidently a dirt road or bladed trail" and that it "was obviously not designed to accommodate travel at a general speed of 80 kilometres per hour". As I earlier remarked, the locality of the road and its character and class must be considered when determining whether the reasonable driver would be able to navigate it safely.

Je ne retiens pas non plus l'argument de l'appelant portant que la « nature hybride » du chemin avait pour effet d'amener les conducteurs à prendre le virage à une vitesse inappropriée. Cette théorie repose sur l'hypothèse que les automobilistes roulent sur les portions en ligne droite du chemin à une vitesse pouvant atteindre 80 km/h, et qu'ils se trouvent en conséquence pris de court lorsqu'ils doivent prendre un virage soudain. Pourtant, bien que la vitesse permise sur le chemin soit 80 km/h, rien dans la preuve n'indiquait qu'un conducteur raisonnable aurait roulé à cette vitesse à quelque endroit du chemin. Après avoir témoigné que les conducteurs [TRADUCTION] « étaient autorisés » à rouler à une vitesse maximale de 80 km/h, cette vitesse étant la vitesse permise par défaut (et non la vitesse affichée), M. Werner a reconnu que les chemins nivelés de la province ne sont pas conçus pour permettre la circulation à une vitesse de 80 km/h. À l'instar de la Cour d'appel, je suis d'avis que la preuve établit que [TRADUCTION] « le chemin Snake Hill était manifestement un chemin de terre ou un chemin nivelé » et qu'il « n'était clairement pas conçu pour permettre une vitesse générale de 80 kilomètres à l'heure ». Comme je l'ai souligné précédemment, la configuration du chemin, de même que sa nature et sa catégorie doivent être prises en considération pour décider si le conducteur raisonnable aurait pu y rouler en sécurité.

Furthermore, the evidence at trial did not suggest that drivers were somehow fooled by the so-called "dual nature" of the road. The following exchange between counsel for the respondent and Mr. Werner at trial is illustrative of how motorists would view the road:

Q. Now, Mr. Werner, would you not agree that the change in the character of this road as you proceeded from east to west was quite obvious?

A. It was straight, and then you came to a hill, and you really didn't know what might lie beyond the hill.

Q. That's right. But I mean, the fact that the road went from being straight and level to suddenly there was a hill and you couldn't see -- you could see from the point of the top of the hill that the road didn't continue in a straight line, couldn't you?

A. Yes, you could, from the top of the hill, it's a very abrupt hill, yes.

Q. And as you proceeded down though the hill it became quite obvious, did it not, that the character of the road changed?

A. Yes, it changed, yes.

Q. Now you were faced with something other than a straight road?

A. M'hm. Yes.

Q. Now you were on -- and at some point along there the surface of the road changed, did it not?

A. Yes.

Q. And, of course, the road was no longer, I use the term built-up to refer to a road that has grade and it has some drainage. As you proceeded from west to east, you realized, you could see, it was obvious that this was not longer a built-up road?

A. It was a road essentially that was cut out of the topography and had no ditches, and there was an abutment or shoulder right to the driving surface. It was different than the first part.

Q. Yes. And all those differences were obvious, were they not?

En outre, rien dans la preuve présentée au procès n'indiquait que les conducteurs avaient été trompés de quelque façon par la soi-disant « nature hybride » du chemin. L'échange suivant, entre l'avocat de l'intimée et M. Werner, illustre bien la façon dont les automobilistes perçoivent le chemin :

[TRADUCTION]

Q. Maintenant M. Werner, ne seriez-vous pas d'accord pour dire que le changement dans la nature de ce chemin lorsque vous rouliez d'est en ouest était très évident?

R. On roulait en ligne droite, puis on descendait une colline, et on ne savait vraiment pas ce qui pouvait se trouver de l'autre côté de la colline.

Q. C'est vrai. Mais je veux dire, le fait que le chemin suivait d'abord un tracé horizontal et en ligne droite pour soudainement devenir une colline et que vous ne pouviez pas voir -- vous pouviez voir du haut de la colline que le chemin ne continuait pas en ligne droite, n'est-ce pas?

R. Oui, vous pouviez, du haut de la colline, c'est une colline très abrupte, oui.

Q. Et au fur et à mesure que vous descendiez la colline il devenait assez évident, n'est-ce pas, que la nature du chemin changeait?

R. Oui, ça changeait, oui.

Q. Vous vous trouviez alors devant autre chose qu'un chemin en ligne droite?

R. M'hm. Oui.

Q. Vous étiez maintenant sur -- et à un moment donné la surface du chemin changeait, n'est-ce pas?

R. Oui.

Q. Et, évidemment, le chemin n'était plus, j'utilise le terme aménagé pour désigner un chemin possédant une certaine élévation et qui est dans une certaine mesure drainé. Au fur et à mesure que vous rouliez d'ouest en est, vous constatiez, vous pouviez voir, il était évident, qu'il ne s'agissait plus d'un chemin aménagé?

R. Il s'agit essentiellement d'un chemin tracé suivant la topographie des lieux et sans fossés, et il y avait un accotement à droite du conducteur. C'était différent de la portion précédente.

Q. Oui. Et toutes ces différences étaient évidentes, n'est-ce pas?

A. Well, I -- they were clear, satisfactorily clear to me, yes. [Emphasis added.]

135 Although they may be compelling factors in other cases, in this case the "dual nature" of the road, the radius of the curve, the surface of the road, and the lack of superelevation do not support the conclusion of the trial judge. The question of how a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would approach this road demands common sense. There was no necessity to post a sign in this case for the simple reason that any reasonable driver would have reacted to the presence of natural cues to slow down. The law does not require a municipality to post signs warning motorists of hazards that pose no real risk to a prudent driver. To impose a duty on the municipality to erect a sign in a case such as this is to alter the character of the duty owed by a municipality to drivers. Municipalities are not required to post warnings directed at drunk drivers and thereby deal with their inability to react to the cues that alert the ordinary driver to the presence of a hazard.

136 My colleagues assert that the trial judge properly considered all aspects of the applicable legal test, including whether the curve would pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. They say that the trial judge did discuss, both explicitly and implicitly, the conduct of an ordinary or reasonable motorist approaching the curve. Secondly, they note that she referred to the evidence of the experts, Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, both of whom discussed the conduct of an ordinary motorist in this situation. Thirdly, the fact that the trial judge apportioned negligence to Nikolaisen indicates, in their view, that she assessed his conduct against the standard of the ordinary driver, and thus considered the conduct of the latter (para. 40).

R. Bien, je -- elles étaient évidentes, suffisamment évidentes pour moi, oui. [Je souligne.]

Bien qu'ils puissent constituer des facteurs concluants dans d'autres affaires, la « nature hybride » du chemin, le rayon de courbure du virage, le revêtement du chemin et l'absence d'élévation n'étayent pas en l'espèce la conclusion de la juge de première instance. Pour répondre à la question de savoir comment un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales roulerait sur ce chemin, il faut faire appel au bon sens. Il n'était pas nécessaire d'installer un panneau de signalisation en l'espèce, et ce pour la simple raison que n'importe quel conducteur raisonnable aurait réagi aux indices naturels l'invitant à ralentir. Le droit n'oblige pas les municipalités à installer des panneaux signalant aux automobilistes des dangers qui ne font pas courir de risque véritable aux conducteurs prudents. Imposer à la municipalité l'obligation d'installer un panneau dans un cas comme celui qui nous occupe équivaut à modifier la nature de l'obligation qu'ont les municipalités envers les conducteurs. Les municipalités ne sont pas tenues d'aménager des panneaux d'avertissement à l'intention des conducteurs en état d'ébriété et, ainsi, de remédier à leur incapacité de réagir aux indices qui alertent le conducteur moyen de la présence d'un danger.

Mes collègues affirment que la juge de première instance a dûment pris en considération tous les aspects du critère juridique applicable, y compris la question de savoir si la courbe présentait un risque pour le conducteur moyen qui prend des précautions normales. Ils disent que la juge de première instance a effectivement examiné, explicitement et implicitement, la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen ou raisonnable qui s'approche du virage. Ils font ensuite remarquer qu'elle a fait état du témoignage des experts MM. Anderson et Werner, qui ont tous deux analysé la conduite de l'automobiliste moyen se trouvant dans cette situation. Enfin, le fait qu'elle ait imputé une partie de la responsabilité à M. Nikolaisen indique, à leur avis, qu'elle a évalué sa conduite au regard à la norme du conducteur moyen, et qu'elle a donc pris en compte la façon dont ce dernier aurait conduit (par. 40).

I respectfully disagree that it is explicit in the trial judge's reasons that she considered whether the portion of the road on which the accident occurred posed a risk to the ordinary driver exercising reasonable care. As I explained above, the fact that the trial judge restated the legal test in the form of a conclusion in no way suggests that she turned her mind to the issue of whether the ordinary driver would have found the curve to be hazardous.

Nor do I agree that a discussion of the conduct of an ordinary motorist in the situation was somehow "implicit" in the trial judge's reasons. In my view, it is highly problematic to presume that a trial judge made factual findings on a particular issue in the absence of any indication in the reasons as to what those findings were. While a trial judge is presumed to know the law, he or she cannot be presumed to have reached a factual conclusion without some indication in the reasons that he or she did in fact come to that conclusion. If the reviewing court is willing to presume that a trial judge made certain findings based on evidence in the record absent any indication in the reasons that the trial judge actually made those findings, then the reviewing court is precluded from finding that the trial judge misapprehended or neglected evidence.

138 Je n'estime pas non plus que l'examen de la façon de conduire de l'automobiliste moyen dans cette situation ressorte « implicitement » des motifs de la juge de première instance. À mon avis, il est très problématique de présumer qu'un juge de première instance a tiré des conclusions de fait à l'égard d'une question précise alors qu'il n'y a aucune indication dans ses motifs quant à la nature de ces conclusions. Bien que le juge de première instance soit censé connaître le droit, on ne peut présumer qu'il a tiré à une conclusion factuelle en l'absence d'indication dans ses motifs qu'il est effectivement arrivé à cette conclusion. Si le tribunal de révision est prêt à supposer que le juge de première instance a tiré certaines conclusions, sur la foi de la preuve figurant au dossier, bien que rien dans les motifs n'indique qu'il a vraiment tiré ces conclusions, alors le tribunal de révision ne saurait conclure que le juge de première instance a mal interprété des éléments de preuve ou a négligé d'en tenir compte.

In my view, my colleagues have throughout their reasons improperly presumed that the trial judge reached certain factual findings based on the evidence despite the fact that those findings were not expressed in her reasons. On the issue of whether the curve presented a risk to the ordinary driver, my colleagues note that "in relying on the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner, the trial judge chose not to base her decision on the conflicting evidence of other witnesses" (para. 46). The problem with this statement is that although the trial judge relied on the evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner to conclude that the portion of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred was a hazard, it is impossible from her reasons to discern what, if any, evidence she relied on to reach the conclusion that the curve presented a risk to the ordinary driver exercising reasonable care. In the absence of any indication that she considered this issue, I am not willing to presume that she did.

139 À mon avis, tout au long de leurs motifs, mes collègues ont à tort présumé que la juge de première instance était arrivée à certaines conclusions de fait fondées sur la preuve, malgré le fait que ces conclusions ne soient pas formulées dans ses motifs. Quant à la question de savoir si le virage présentait un risque pour le conducteur moyen, mes collègues ont fait remarquer qu'« en s'appuyant sur les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner, la juge de première instance a choisi de ne pas fonder sa décision sur les témoignages contradictoires rendus par d'autres témoins » (par. 46). Le problème que pose cet énoncé est que, même si la juge de première instance s'est appuyée sur les témoignages de MM. Anderson et Werner

pour conclure que la portion du chemin Snake Hill où s'est produit l'accident constituait un danger, il est impossible, à partir de ses motifs, de dire si elle s'est appuyée sur un témoignage — et, dans l'affirmative, sur lequel de ceux-ci — pour conclure que la courbe présentait un risque pour le conducteur moyen qui prend des précautions raisonnables. En l'absence de toute indication que la juge de première instance s'est penchée sur cette question, je ne suis pas disposé à présumer qu'elle l'a fait.

140 My colleagues similarly presume findings of fact when discussing the knowledge of the municipality. On this issue, they reiterate that "it is open for a trial judge to prefer some parts of the evidence over others, and to re-assess the trial judge's weighing of the evidence, is, with respect, not within the province of an appellate court" (para. 62). At para. 64 of their reasons, my colleagues review the findings of the trial judge on the issue of knowledge and conclude that the trial judge "drew the inference that the municipality should have been put on notice and investigated Snake Hill Road, in which case it would have become aware of the hazard in question". I think that it is improper to conclude that the trial judge made a finding that the municipality's system of road inspection was inadequate in the absence of any indication in her reasons that she reached this conclusion. My colleagues further suggest that the trial judge did not impute knowledge to the municipality on the basis of the occurrence of prior accidents on Snake Hill Road (para. 65). They even state that it was not necessary for the trial judge to rely on the accidents in order to satisfy s. 192(3) (para. 67). This, in my view, is a reinterpretation of the trial judge's findings that stands in direct contradiction to the reasons that were provided by her. The trial judge discusses other factors pertaining to knowledge only to heighten the significance that she attributes to the fact that accidents had previously occurred on other portions of the road (at para. 90):

De même, mes collègues supposent l'existence de conclusions factuelles dans leur examen de la question de la connaissance incombant à la municipalité. Sur ce point, ils réitèrent que « le juge de première instance peut préférer certaines parties de la preuve à d'autres, et, en toute déférence, il n'appartient pas au tribunal d'appel de procéder à nouveau à l'appréciation de la preuve, tâche déjà accomplie par le juge de procès » (par. 62). Au paragraphe 64 de leurs motifs, mes collègues examinent les conclusions de la juge de première instance sur la question de la connaissance et concluent qu'elle « a inféré que la municipalité aurait dû être informée de la situation sur le chemin à Snake Hill et aurait dû faire enquête à cet égard, ce qui lui aurait permis de prendre connaissance de l'existence du danger ». Je ne crois pas qu'on puisse à juste titre conclure que la juge de première instance est arrivée à la conclusion que le système d'inspection routière de la municipalité était inadéquat, alors que rien dans ses motifs n'indique qu'elle a tiré cette conclusion. Mes collègues estiment en outre que la juge de première instance n'a pas prêté à la municipalité la connaissance requise sur la base des accidents survenus antérieurement sur le chemin Snake Hill (par. 65). Ils disent même qu'il n'était pas nécessaire de s'appuyer sur ces accidents pour satisfaire aux exigences du par. 192(3) (par. 67). À mon avis, ils donnent à ces conclusions une nouvelle interprétation, qui contredit directement les motifs qu'elle a exposés. La juge de première instance examine d'autres facteurs qui touchent à la connaissance requise, uniquement pour souligner l'importance qu'elle accorde au fait que des accidents sont survenus antérieurement ailleurs sur le chemin (au par. 90) :

If the R.M. did not have actual knowledge of the danger inherent in this portion of Snake Hill Road, it should have known. While four accidents in 12 years may not in itself be significant, it takes on more significance given the close proximity of three of these accidents, the relatively low volume of traffic, the fact that there are permanent residences on the road and the fact that the road is frequented by young and perhaps less experienced drivers. [Emphasis added.]

[TRADUCTION] Si la M.R. ne connaissait pas concrètement le danger intrinsèque que comporte cette portion du chemin Snake Hill, elle aurait dû le connaître. Le fait que quatre accidents se soient produits en 12 ans n'est peut-être pas significatif en soi, mais il le devient si l'on considère que trois de ces accidents sont survenus à proximité, qu'il s'agit d'une route à débit de circulation relativement faible, que des résidences permanentes sont situées en bordure de celle-ci et que ce chemin est fréquenté par des conducteurs jeunes et peut-être moins expérimentés. [Je souligne.]

141 My colleagues refer to the decision of Van de Perre v. Edwards, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 1014, 2001 SCC 60, in which I stated that "an omission [in the trial judge's reasons] is only a material error if it gives rise to the reasoned belief that the trial judge must have forgotten, ignored or misconceived the evidence in a way that affected his conclusion" (para. 15). This case is however distinguishable from Van de Perre. In Van de Perre, the appellate court improperly substituted its own findings of fact for the trial judge's clear factual conclusions on the basis that the trial judge had not considered all of the evidence. By contrast, in this case my colleagues assert that this Court should not interfere with the "findings of the trial judge" even where no findings were made and where such findings must be presumed from the evidence. The trial judge's failure in this case to reach any conclusion on whether the ordinary driver would have found the portion of the road on which the accident occurred hazardous, in my view, gives rise to the reasoned belief that she ignored the evidence on the issue in a way that affected her conclusion.

Mes collègues citent l'arrêt Van de Perre c. Edwards, [2001] 2 R.C.S. 1014, 2001 CSC 60, dans lequel j'ai dit, au par. 15, qu'« une omission [dans les motifs du juge de première instance] ne constitue une erreur importante que si elle donne lieu à la conviction rationnelle que le juge de première instance doit avoir oublié, négligé d'examiner ou mal interprété la preuve de telle manière que sa conclusion en a été affectée ». Cependant, le présent pourvoi peut être distingué de l'affaire Van de Perre. Dans cette affaire, la Cour d'appel avait irrégulièrement substitué ses propres conclusions de fait aux conclusions factuelles évidentes du juge de première instance, au motif que celui-ci n'avait pas pris en compte tous les éléments de preuve. Par contraste, dans le présent pourvoi, mes collègues affirment que notre Cour ne doit pas modifier les « conclusions de la juge de première instance », même si aucune conclusion n'a été tirée et s'il faut supposer leur existence à partir de la preuve. En l'espèce, je suis d'avis que l'omission de la juge de première instance de tirer quelque conclusion que ce soit quant à la question de savoir si le conducteur moyen aurait considéré comme dangereux le tronçon du chemin où s'est produit l'accident fait naître la conviction rationnelle que, sur ce point, elle a négligé d'examiner la preuve de telle manière que sa conclusion en a été affectée.

142 Finally, I do not agree that the trial judge's conclusion that Mr. Nikolaisen was negligent equates to an assessment of whether a motorist exercising ordinary care would have found the curve on which the accident occurred to be hazardous. It is clear from the trial judge's reasons that she made a factual finding that the curve could be driven safely at 60 km/h in dry conditions and 50 km/h in wet conditions and that Mr. Nikolaisen approached the curve at an

Enfin, je ne peux souscrire à l'opinion que la conclusion de la juge de première instance selon laquelle M. Nikolaisen a fait preuve de négligence vaut examen de la question de savoir si l'automobiliste moyen prenant des précautions normales aurait estimé que la courbe où s'est produit l'accident était dangereuse. Il ressort clairement des motifs de la juge de première instance qu'elle a tiré les conclusions de fait suivantes : il était possible de prendre excessive speed. As earlier stated, what she failed to consider was whether the ordinary driver exercising reasonable care would have approached the curve at a speed at which it could be safely negotiated, or, stated differently, whether the curve posed a real danger to the ordinary driver.

le virage en sécurité à 60 km/h à l'heure sur chaussée sèche et à 50 km/h sur chaussée humide, et M. Nikolaisen s'est approché du virage à une vitesse excessive. Comme je l'ai indiqué plus tôt, elle a omis de se demander si le conducteur moyen qui prend des précautions normales se serait approché du virage à une vitesse qui lui aurait permis de le prendre en sécurité ou, autrement dit, si la courbe présentait un danger réel pour le conducteur moyen.

B. Did the Trial Judge Err in Finding that the Respondent Municipality Knew or Should Have Known of the Danger Posed by the Municipal Road?

B. La juge de première instance a-t-elle commis une erreur en concluant que la municipalité intimée connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le danger que présentait le chemin municipal?

143 Pursuant to s. 192(3) of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, fault is not to be imputed to the municipality in the absence of proof by the plaintiff that the municipality "knew or should have known of the disrepair".

Conformément au par. 192(3) de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, aucune faute n'est imputée à la municipalité à moins que le demandeur n'établisse que celle-ci « connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin ».

144 The trial judge made no finding that the respondent municipality had actual knowledge of the alleged state of disrepair, but rather imputed knowledge to the respondent on the basis that it should have known of the danger. This is apparent in her findings on knowledge at paras. 89-91 of her reasons:

La juge de première instance n'a pas conclu que la municipalité intimée connaissait concrètement le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétend-on, le chemin, mais elle lui a plutôt prêté cette connaissance pour le motif qu'elle aurait dû connaître l'existence du danger. C'est ce qui ressort de ses conclusions à cet égard, aux par. 89 à 91 de ses motifs :

> Breach of the statutory duty of care imposed by section 192 of the Rural Municipality Act, supra, cannot be imputed to the R.M. unless it knew of or ought to have known of the state of disrepair on Snake Hill Road. Between 1978 and 1990 there were four accidents on Snake Hill Road. Three of these accidents occurred in the same vicinity as the Nikolaisen rollover. The precise location of the fourth accident is unknown. While at least three of these accidents occurred when motorists where travelling in the opposite direction of the Nikolaisen vehicle, they occurred on that portion of Snake Hill Road which is the most dangerous — where the road begins to curve, rather than where it is generally straight and flat. At least two of these accidents were reported to authorities.
> If the R.M. did not have actual knowledge of the danger inherent in this portion of Snake Hill Road, it should have known. While four accidents in 12 years may not in itself be significant, it takes on more significance > [TRADUCTION] On ne peut reprocher à la municipalité rurale d'avoir manqué à l'obligation légale de diligence imposée par l'art. 192 de la loi intitulée la Rural Municipality Act, précitée, que si la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill. De 1978 à 1990, quatre accidents sont survenus sur ce chemin. Trois de ces accidents ont eu lieu dans le même secteur que celui où le véhicule de Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau. On ne connaît pas le lieu précis du quatrième accident. Bien que, dans au moins trois de ces accidents, les automobilistes aient circulé en sens inverse du véhicule de Nikolaisen, les accidents se sont produits dans la partie la plus dangereuse du chemin Snake Hill — là où commencent les courbes, et non dans la partie où le chemin est généralement droit et plat. Au moins deux de ces accidents ont été signalés aux autorités.

> Si la M.R. ne connaissait pas concrètement le danger intrinsèque que comporte cette portion du chemin Snake Hill, elle aurait dû le connaître. Le fait que quatre accidents se soient produits en 12 ans n'est peut-être pas given the close proximity of three of these accidents, the relatively low volume of traffic, the fact that there are permanent residences on the road and the fact that the road is frequented by young and perhaps less experienced drivers. I am not satisfied that the R.M. has established that in these circumstances it took reasonable steps to prevent this state of disrepair on Snake Hill Road from continuing.

I find that by failing to erect and maintain a warning and regulatory sign on this portion of Snake Hill Road the R.M. has not met the standard of care which is reasonable in the circumstances. Accordingly, it is in breach of its duty of care to motorists generally, and to Mr. Housen in particular. [Emphasis added.]

Whether the municipality should have known of the disrepair (here, the risk posed in the absence of a sign) involves both questions of law and questions of fact. As a matter of law, the trial judge must approach the question of whether knowledge should be imputed to the municipality with regard to the duties of the ordinary, reasonable and prudent municipal councillor (Ryan v. Victoria (City), [1999] 1 S.C.R. 201, at para. 28). The question is then answered through the trial judge's assessment of the facts of the case.

I find that the trial judge made both errors of law and palpable and overriding errors of fact in determining that the respondent municipality should have known of the alleged state of disrepair. She erred in law by approaching the question of knowledge from the perspective of an expert rather than from the perspective of a prudent municipal councillor. She also erred in law by failing to appreciate that the onus of proving that the municipality knew or should have known of the alleged disrepair remained on the plaintiff throughout. The trial judge clearly erred in fact by drawing the unreasonable inference that the respondent municipality should have known that the portion of the road on which the accident occurred was dangerous from evidence that accidents had occurred on other parts of Snake Hill Road.

significatif en soi, mais il le devient si l'on considère que trois de ces accidents sont survenus à proximité, qu'il s'agit d'une route à débit de circulation relativement faible, que des résidences permanentes sont situées en bordure de celle-ci et que le chemin est fréquenté par des conducteurs jeunes et peut-être moins expérimentés. Je ne suis pas convaincue que la M.R. a établi avoir, dans ces circonstances, pris des mesures raisonnables pour remédier au mauvais état du chemin Snake Hill.

J'estime que, en omettant d'installer et de maintenir un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation dans cette partie du chemin Snake Hill, la M.R. n'a pas satisfait à la norme de diligence qui est raisonnable dans les circonstances. Par conséquent, elle ne s'est pas acquittée de son obligation de diligence à l'égard des automobilistes en général et à l'égard de M. Housen en particulier. [Je souligne.]

145 La question de savoir si la municipalité aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin (en l'occurrence, le risque que présentait l'absence de signalisation) soulève à la fois des questions de droit et des questions de fait. Sur le plan juridique, le juge de première instance doit se demander s'il y a lieu de présumer que la municipalité connaissait ce fait, au regard des obligations qui incombent au conseiller municipal ordinaire, raisonnable et prudent (Ryan c. Victoria (Ville), [1999] 1 R.C.S. 201, par. 28). Le juge de première instance répond ensuite à la question en appréciant les faits de l'espèce dont il est saisi.

146 J'estime que la juge de première instance a commis et des erreurs de droit et des erreurs de fait manifestes et dominantes en statuant que la municipalité intimée aurait dû connaître le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétend-on, le chemin. Elle a commis une erreur de droit lorsqu'elle a examiné la question de la connaissance du point de vue du spécialiste plutôt que du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent. Elle a commis une autre erreur de droit en ne reconnaissant pas que le fardeau de prouver que la municipalité connaissait ou aurait dû connaître le mauvais état du chemin ne cessait jamais d'incomber au demandeur. La juge de première instance a clairement commis une erreur de fait en inférant déraisonnablement que la municipalité intimée aurait dû savoir que la partie du chemin où l'accident s'est produit était dangereuse, compte tenu de la preuve que des accidents avaient eu lieu ailleurs sur le chemin Snake Hill.

147 The trial judge's failure to determine whether knowledge should be imputed to the municipality from the perspective of what a prudent municipal councillor should have known is implicit in her reasons. The respondent could not be held, for the purposes of establishing knowledge under the statutory test, to the standard of an expert analysing the curve after the accident. Yet this is precisely what the trial judge did. She relied on the expert evidence of Mr. Anderson and Mr. Werner to reach the conclusion that the curve presented a hidden hazard. She also implicitly accepted that the risk posed by the curve was not one that would be readily apparent to a lay person. This is evident in the portion of her judgment where she accepts as a valid excuse for not filing a timely claim against the respondent the appellant counsel's explanation that he did not believe the respondent to be at fault until expert opinions were obtained. The trial judge stated in this regard: "[i]t was only later when expert opinions were obtained that serious consideration was given to the prospect that the nature of Snake Hill Road might be a factor contributing to the accident" (para. 64). Her failure to consider the risk to the prudent driver is also apparent when one considers that she ignored the evidence concerning the way in which the two experts themselves had approached the dangerous curve (see para. 54 above).

Il ressort implicitement des motifs de la juge de première instance qu'elle n'a pas décidé s'il fallait prêter à la municipalité la connaissance requise en considérant cette question du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent. Pour trancher la question de la connaissance requise suivant le critère prévu par la loi, l'intimée ne pouvait être tenue aux mêmes normes qu'un spécialiste analysant la courbe après l'accident. Pourtant, c'est exactement ce qu'a fait la juge de première instance. Elle s'est fondée sur les témoignages d'expert donnés par MM. Anderson et Werner pour conclure que la courbe présentait un danger caché. Elle a également reconnu implicitement que le risque visé par la courbe n'était pas un risque facilement décelable par un profane. Cela ressort clairement du passage de son jugement où elle considère comme une excuse valable pour justifier le dépôt tardif de l'action contre l'intimée l'explication de l'avocat de l'appelant selon laquelle il ne croyait pas que l'intimée était dans son tort jusqu'à ce qu'il prenne connaissance des opinions des experts. La juge de première instance a dit ceci à cet égard : [TRADUCTION] « [c]e n'est que plus tard, après avoir obtenu l'opinion des experts, que la possibilité que la nature du chemin Snake Hill puisse avoir été un facteur ayant contribué à l'accident a été sérieusement envisagée » (par. 64). Son omission de s'interroger sur le risque que courrait le conducteur prudent apparaît elle aussi clairement, lorsqu'on considère qu'elle n'a pas tenu compte de la preuve concernant la façon dont les deux experts avaient eux-mêmes pris le virage dangereux (voir le par. 54 qui précède).

148 Had the trial judge considered the question of whether the municipality should have known of the alleged disrepair from the perspective of the prudent municipal councillor, she would necessarily have reached a different conclusion. There was no evidence that the road conditions which existed posed a risk that the respondent should have been aware of. The respondent had no particular reason to inspect that segment of the road for the presence of hazards. It had not received any complaints from motorists respecting the absence of signs on the road, the lack of superelevation on the curves, or the presence of

Si la juge de première instance avait répondu à la question de savoir si la municipalité aurait dû connaître le mauvais état dans lequel se trouvait, prétend-on, le chemin en se plaçant du point de vue du conseiller municipal prudent, elle serait nécessairement arrivée à une conclusion différente. Il n'y avait aucune preuve établissant que le danger existant créait un risque que l'intimée aurait dû connaître. Cette dernière n'avait aucune raison particulière d'aller inspecter cette portion du chemin pour voir s'il y existait des dangers. Elle n'avait reçu aucune plainte d'automobilistes relativement à l'absence de signalisation, à l'absence de surélévation des trees and vegetation which grew up along the sides of the road.

In addition, the question of the respondent's knowledge is linked inextricably to the standard of care. A municipality can only be expected to have knowledge of those hazards which pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care, since these are the only hazards for which there is a duty to repair. The trial judge should not have expected the respondent in this case to have knowledge of the road conditions that existed at the site of the Nikolaisen rollover since that road condition simply did not pose a risk to the reasonable driver. In addition to the evidence that was discussed above in the context of the standard of care, this conclusion is supported by the testimony of the several lay witnesses that testified at trial. Craig Thiel, a resident on the road, testified that he was not aware that Snake Hill Road had a reputation of being a dangerous road, and that he himself had never experienced difficulty with the portion of the road on which the accident occurred. His wife, Toby, also testified that she had experienced no problems with the road.

The trial judge also clearly erred in fact by imputing knowledge to the municipality on the basis of the four accidents that had previously occurred on Snake Hill Road. While her factual findings regarding the accidents themselves have a sound basis in the evidence, these findings simply do not support her conclusion that a prudent municipal councillor ought to have known that a risk existed for the normal prudent driver. As such, the trial judge erred in drawing an unreasonable inference from the evidence that was before her. As stated above, the standard of review for inferences of fact is, above all, one of reasonableness. This is reflected in the following passage from Joseph Brant Memorial Hospital v. Koziol, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 491, at pp. 503-4:

. . . "it is a well-known principle that appellate tribunals should not disturb findings of fact made by a trial judge courbes ou à la présence d'arbres et de végétation en bordure du chemin.

149 En outre, la question de la connaissance de l'intimée est intimement liée à celle de la norme de diligence. Une municipalité est uniquement censée avoir connaissance des dangers qui présentent un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales, puisqu'il s'agit des seuls dangers à l'égard desquels existe une obligation d'entretien. En l'espèce, la juge de première instance n'aurait pas dû attendre de l'intimée qu'elle connaisse le danger qui existait à l'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau, puisque ce danger ne présentait tout simplement pas de risque pour le conducteur raisonnable. Outre les éléments de preuve examinés précédemment relativement à la norme de diligence, les témoignages de plusieurs témoins ordinaires qui ont déposé au procès étayent cette conclusion. Craig Thiel, qui habite le long de ce chemin, a témoigné qu'il ne savait pas que le chemin Snake Hill avait la réputation d'être dangereux et qu'il n'avait lui-même jamais éprouvé de difficulté à conduire à l'endroit du chemin où est survenu l'accident. Sa conjointe, Toby, a également dit ne pas avoir connu de problème sur ce chemin.

150 La juge de première instance a clairement commis une autre erreur de fait en présumant, sur la foi des quatre accidents survenus auparavant sur le chemin Snake Hill, que la municipalité connaissait l'existence du danger. Bien que ses conclusions de fait relativement aux accidents eux-mêmes soient solidement étayées par la preuve, elles n'appuient tout simplement pas sa conclusion qu'un conseiller municipal prudent aurait dû savoir qu'il existait un risque pour le conducteur prudent. En conséquence, la juge de première instance a fait erreur en tirant une inférence déraisonnable de la preuve qui lui était soumise. Comme il a été indiqué plus tôt, la norme de contrôle applicable aux inférences de fait est, d'abord et avant tout, celle de la décision raisonnable. Les propos suivants du juge Spence dans l'arrêt Joseph Brant Memorial Hospital c. Koziol, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 491, p. 503-504, illustrent bien ce principe :

. . . « c'est un principe bien connu que les tribunaux d'appel ne doivent pas remettre en cause les conclusions

if there were credible evidence before him upon which he could reasonably base his conclusion". [Emphasis added.]

de fait du juge de première instance, s'il existait des témoignages dignes de foi sur lesquels le juge pouvait raisonnablement fonder ses conclusions ». [Je souligne.]

151 As I stated above, there was no evidence to suggest that the respondent had actual knowledge that accidents had previously occurred on Snake Hill Road. To the contrary, Mr. Danger, the administrator of the municipality, testified that the first he heard of the accidents was at the trial.

Comme je l'ai mentionné précédemment, il n'y avait aucune preuve indiquant que l'intimée savait concrètement que d'autres accidents étaient survenus auparavant sur le chemin Snake Hill. Au contraire, M. Danger, l'administrateur de la municipalité, a témoigné qu'il avait entendu parler de ces accidents pour la première fois au procès.

152 Implicit in the trial judge's reasons, then, was the expectation that the municipality should have known about the accidents through an accident-reporting system. The appellant put forward that argument explicitly before this Court, placing significant emphasis on the fact that respondent "has no regularized approach to gathering this information, whether from councillors or otherwise". The argument suggests that, had the municipality established a formal system to find out whether accidents had occurred on a given road, it would have known that accidents had occurred on Snake Hill Road and would have taken the appropriate corrective action to ensure that the road was safe for travellers.

153 I find the above argument to be flawed in two important respects. First, the argument that the other accidents on Snake Hill Road were relevant in this case is based on the assumption that there was an obligation on the respondent municipality to have a "regularized" accident-reporting system, and that the informal system that was in place was somehow deficient. In my view, the appellant did not meet its onus to show that the system relied on by the municipality to discharge its obligations under s. 192 of the The Rural Municipality Act, 1989 was deficient. The evidence shows that, prior to 1988, there was no formal system of accident reporting in place. There was, nonetheless, an informal system whereby the municipal councillors were responsible for finding out if there were road hazards. Information that hazards existed came to the attention of the councillors via complaints, and from their own familiarity

J'estime que l'argument susmentionné présente deux lacunes importantes. Premièrement, l'argument selon lequel les autres accidents survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill étaient pertinents en l'espèce repose sur la présomption que la municipalité intimée avait l'obligation d'avoir un système « structuré » d'information sur les accidents, et que le système informel en place était d'une certaine manière déficient. À mon avis, l'appelant ne s'est pas acquitté du fardeau qui lui incombait de démontrer que le système sur lequel la municipalité se fondait pour remplir ses obligations au titre de l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, était déficient. La preuve établit que, avant 1988, il n'existait pas de système officiel d'information sur les accidents. Il existait néanmoins, un système informel dans le cadre duquel les conseillers municipaux étaient chargés de s'enquérir de l'existence de dangers with the roads within the township under their jurisdiction. The trial judge made a palpable error in finding that this informal system was deficient in the absence of any evidence of the practice of other municipalities at the time that the accidents occurred and what might have been a reasonable system, particularly given the fact that the rural municipality in question had only six councillors. There is no evidence that a rural municipality of this type requires the sort of sophisticated information-gathering process that may be required in a city, where accidents occur with greater frequency and where it is less likely that word of mouth will suffice to bring hazards to the attention of the councillors.

sur les routes. Les conseillers étaient informés de l'existence de dangers par suite des plaintes qu'ils recevaient et par leur propre expérience des routes situées dans les cantons qu'ils représentaient. La juge de première instance a commis une erreur manifeste en concluant que ce système informel était déficient, alors qu'aucune preuve n'indiquait quelles étaient les pratiques suivies par d'autres municipalités à cet égard au moment des accidents, ni n'expliquait en quoi aurait consisté un système raisonnable, compte tenu particulièrement du fait que la municipalité rurale concernée ne comptait que six conseillers. Il n'y a aucune preuve indiquant qu'une municipalité rurale de ce genre a besoin du genre de mécanisme élaboré de collecte de renseignements dont peut avoir besoin une grande ville, où les accidents sont plus fréquents et où il est peu probable que le bouche à oreille soit suffisant pour porter les dangers à l'attention des conseillers.

154 The respondent municipality now has a more formalized system of accident reporting. Since 1988, Saskatchewan Highways and Transportation annually provides the municipalities with a listing of all motor vehicle accidents which occur within the municipality and which are reported to the police. While I agree that this system may provide the municipality with a better chance of locating hazards in some circumstances, I do not accept that the adoption of this system is relevant on the facts of this case. Only one accident, which occurred in 1990, was reported to the respondent under this system. The appellant adduced no evidence to suggest that this accident occurred at the same location as the Nikolaisen rollover, or that this accident occurred as a result of the conditions of the road rather than the negligence of the driver.

La municipalité intimée possède maintenant un système plus officiel d'information sur les accidents. Depuis 1988, en effet, le ministère de la Voirie et du Transport de la Saskatchewan communique annuellement à chaque municipalité la liste de tous les accidents d'automobile survenus sur son territoire et signalés aux policiers. Bien que ce système puisse, j'en conviens, permettre aux municipalités de mieux repérer les dangers dans certaines circonstances, je ne crois pas que son adoption soit pertinente eu égard aux faits de l'espèce. Un seul accident, survenu en 1990, a été signalé à l'intimée par le truchement de ce système. L'appelant n'a produit aucun élément de preuve indiquant que cet accident est survenu au même endroit que celui où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau, ou qu'il était attribuable à l'état de la route plutôt qu'à la négligence du conducteur.

155 Secondly, and perhaps more importantly, it was simply illogical for the trial judge to infer from the fact of the earlier accidents that the respondent should have known that the site of the Nikolaisen rollover posed a risk to prudent drivers. The three accidents, which took place in 1978, 1985, and 1987, occurred on different curves, while the vehicles involved were proceeding in the opposite direction. The accidents of 1978 and 1987 occurred on the first right-turning curve in the road with the drivers travelling westbound, at the bottom of the hill. The accident in 1985 took place on the next curve in the road with the driver also travelling westbound, again on a different curve from the one where the Nikolaisen rollover took place. If anything, these accidents signal that the municipality should have been concerned with the curves that were, when travelling westbound, to the east of the site of the Nikolaisen rollover. The evidence disclosed no accidents that had occurred at the precise location of the accident that is the subject of this case.

Deuxièmement, élément peut-être plus important encore, il était tout simplement illogique pour la juge de première instance d'inférer de l'existence des accidents antérieurs que l'intimée aurait dû savoir que l'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau présentait un risque pour les conducteurs prudents. Les trois accidents — qui sont survenus en 1978, 1985 et 1987

— se sont produits dans des courbes différentes, et les véhicules concernés circulaient en sens inverse. L'accident de 1978 et celui de 1987 ont eu lieu dans le premier virage à droite au pied de la colline, les automobilistes roulant alors en direction ouest. L'accident de 1985 s'est produit dans la deuxième courbe, toujours en direction ouest, encore une fois dans une courbe différente de celle où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau. Si ces accidents indiquent quoi que ce soit, c'est plutôt que la municipalité aurait dû se préoccuper des courbes qui, pour les véhicules circulant en direction ouest, se trouvent à l'est de l'endroit où le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen a fait un tonneau. La preuve n'a révélé aucun accident qui se serait produit à l'endroit précis où est survenu l'accident qui nous intéresse.

156 Furthermore, the mere occurrence of an accident does not in and of itself indicate a duty to post a sign. In many cases, accidents happen not because of the conditions of the road, but rather because of the negligence of the driver. Illustrative in this regard is Mr. Agrey's accident on Snake Hill Road in 1978. Mr. Agrey testified that, just prior to the accident, he had turned his attention away from the road to talk to one of the passengers in the vehicle. Another passenger shouted to him to "look out", but by the time he was alerted it was too late to properly navigate the turn. Mr. Agrey was charged and fined for his carelessness. As was discussed in the context of the standard of care, a municipality is not obligated to make safe the roads for all drivers, regardless of the care and attention that they are exercising when driving. It need only keep roads in such a state of repair as will allow a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care to drive with safety.

Qui plus est, le simple fait qu'un accident se produise n'emporte pas en soi l'obligation d'installer un panneau signalisateur. Dans bien des cas, les accidents surviennent non pas à cause de l'état de la route, mais plutôt à cause de la négligence du conducteur. Un bon exemple de cela est l'accident dont a été victime M. Agrey sur le chemin Snake Hill en 1978. Ce dernier a témoigné que, juste avant l'accident, il avait quitté des yeux la route pour parler à l'un des passagers du véhicule. Un autre passager lui a crié de faire attention, mais il était déjà trop tard pour bien exécuter le virage. Accusé de conduite imprudente, M. Agrey a été déclaré coupable et condamné à une amende. Comme on l'a vu plus tôt, dans le contexte de la norme de diligence, une municipalité n'a pas l'obligation de rendre les chemins sécuritaires pour tous les conducteurs, indépendamment de la prudence et de l'attention avec lesquelles ils conduisent. Elle est seulement tenue de maintenir les chemins dans un état propre à permettre au conducteur raisonnable qui prend des précautions normales d'y circuler en sécurité.

157 In addition to the substantial errors discussed above, I would also note that, in my view, the trial judge was inattentive to the onus of proof on this issue. When reviewing the evidence pertaining to other accidents on Snake Hill Road, the trial judge remarked, at para. 31: "Cst. Forbes does not recall any other accident on Snake Hill Road during her time at the Shellbrook RCMP Detachment, from 1987 until 1996. Cpl. Healey had heard of one other accident. Forbes and Healey are only two of nine members of the RCMP Detachment at Shellbrook" (emphasis added). By this comment, the trial judge seems to imply that there may have been more accidents on Snake Hill Road that had been reported and that the respondent should have known about this. With all due respect to the trial judge, if there had been accidents other than the ones that were raised at trial, it was up to the appellant to bring evidence of these accidents forward, either by calling the RCMP members to whom they had been reported, or by calling those who were involved in the accidents, or by any other available means. Furthermore, the significance that the trial judge attributed to the other accidents that occurred on Snake Hill Road was dependent on her assumption that the respondent should have had a formal accident-reporting system in place. The respondent did not bear the onus of demonstrating that it was not obliged to have such a system; there was, rather, a positive onus on the appellant to demonstrate that such a system was required and that the informal reporting system was inadequate.

Outre les erreurs substantielles examinées précédemment, je tiens également à souligner que, selon moi, la juge de première instance ne s'est pas souciée du fardeau de preuve sur cette question. Lorsqu'elle a examiné la preuve relative aux autres accidents survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill, la juge

C. Did the Trial Judge Err in Finding that the Accident was Caused in Part by the Failure of the Respondent Municipality to Erect a Sign Near the Curve?

The trial judge's findings on causation are found at para. 101 of her judgment, where she states:

I find that this accident occurred as a result of Mr. Nikolaisen entering the curve on Snake Hill Road at a speed slightly in excess of that which would allow successful negotiation. The accident occurred at the most dangerous segment of Snake Hill Road where a warning or regulatory sign should have been erected and maintained to warn motorists of an impending and hidden hazard. Mr. Nikolaisen's degree of impairment only de première instance a fait les remarques suivantes au par. 31 : [TRADUCTION] « La gendarme Forbes ne se souvient pas de quelque autre accident sur le chemin Snake Hill durant la période où elle était affectée au détachement de la GRC de Shellbrook, de 1987 à 1996. Le caporal Healey avait entendu parler d'un autre accident. Forbes et Healey ne sont que deux des neuf membres du détachement de la GRC à Shellbrook » (je souligne). Par cette remarque, la juge de première instance semble laisser entendre que d'autres accidents sur le chemin Snake Hill ont pu avoir été signalés et que l'intimée aurait dû le savoir. En toute déférence pour la juge de première instance, s'il y avait eu d'autres accidents que ceux qui ont été mentionnés au procès, il appartenait à l'appelant d'en faire la preuve, soit en faisant témoigner les membres de la GRC à qui les accidents avaient été signalés ou encore les personnes en cause dans ces accidents, soit en utilisant tout autre moyen à sa disposition. En outre, l'importance que la juge de première instance a accordée aux autres accidents survenus sur le chemin Snake Hill dépendait du postulat que l'intimée aurait dû posséder un système officiel d'information sur les accidents. L'intimée n'était pas tenue de prouver qu'elle n'avait pas l'obligation de disposer d'un tel système. Il incombait plutôt à l'appelant d'établir que ce genre de système était nécessaire et que le système informel existant était insuffisant.

C. La juge de première instance a-t-elle commis une erreur en concluant que l'accident avait été causé, en partie, par le défaut de la municipalité intimée d'installer un panneau de signalisation près de la courbe?

158 Les conclusions de la juge de première instance au sujet du lien de causalité figurent au par. 101 de son jugement, où elle dit ceci :

[TRADUCTION] J'estime que l'accident s'est produit parce que M. Nikolaisen s'est engagé dans le virage sur le chemin Snake Hill à une vitesse légèrement supérieure à celle qui lui aurait permis de réussir la manœuvre. L'accident est survenu dans la portion la plus dangereuse du chemin Snake Hill, à un endroit où un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation aurait dû être installé et maintenu pour avertir les automobilistes de served to increase the risk of him not reacting, or reacting inappropriately to a sign. Mr. Nikolaisen was not driving recklessly such that he would have intentionally disregarded a warning or regulatory sign. He had moments earlier, when departing the Thiel residence, successfully negotiated a sharp curve which he could see and which was apparent to him. I am satisfied on a balance of probabilities that had Mr. Nikolaisen been forewarned of the curve, he would have reacted and taken appropriate corrective action such that he would not have lost control of his vehicle when entering the curve.

l'imminence d'un danger caché. Le degré d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen n'a fait qu'accroître le risque qu'il ne réagisse pas du tout ou encore de façon inappropriée à une signalisation. M. Nikolaisen ne conduisait pas de façon si téméraire qu'il aurait intentionnellement fait abstraction d'un panneau d'avertissement ou de signalisation. Quelques instants plus tôt, au moment de quitter la résidence des Thiel, il avait pris avec succès un virage serré qu'il pouvait clairement voir. Je suis convaincue, selon la prépondérance des probabilités, que si on avait prévenu M. Nikolaisen de l'existence de la courbe, il aurait réagi et pris des mesures appropriées, qui l'auraient empêché de perdre la maîtrise de son véhicule en s'engageant dans le virage.

159 The trial judge's above findings in respect to causation represent conclusions on matters of fact. Consequently, this Court will only interfere if it finds that in coming to these conclusions she made a manifest error, ignored conclusive or relevant evidence, misunderstood the evidence, or drew erroneous conclusions from it (Toneguzzo-Norvell, supra, at p. 121).

Les conclusions susmentionnées de la juge de première instance touchant le lien de causalité sont des conclusions portant sur des questions de fait. Par conséquent, notre Cour n'interviendra que si elle estime que, pour arriver à ses conclusions, la juge a commis une erreur manifeste, n'a pas tenu compte d'un élément de preuve déterminant ou pertinent, a mal compris la preuve ou en a tiré des conclusions erronées (Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité, p. 121).

160 In coming to her conclusion on causation, the trial judge made several of the types of errors that this Court referred to in Toneguzzo-Norvell. To the extent that the trial judge relied on the evidence of Mr. Laughlin, the only expert to have testified on the issue of causation, I find that she either misunderstood his evidence or drew erroneous conclusions from it. The only other testimony in respect to causation was anecdotal evidence pertaining to Mr. Nikolaisen's level of impairment provided by Craig Thiel, Toby Thiel and Paul Housen. Although their testimonies provided some evidence in respect to causation, for reasons I will discuss, it was not evidence on which the trial judge could reasonably rely. Nor do I find that the trial judge was entitled to rely on evidence that Mr. Nikolaisen successfully negotiated the curve from the Thiel driveway onto Snake Hill Road. The inference that the trial judge drew from this fact was unreasonable and ignored evidence that Mr. Nikolaisen swerved even on this curve. In addition, the trial judge clearly erred by ignoring other relevant evidence in respect to causation, in particular the fact that Mr. Nikolaisen had driven on the En arrivant à sa conclusion sur le lien de causalité, la juge de première instance a commis plusieurs des erreurs mentionnées par notre Cour dans l'arrêt Toneguzzo-Norvell, précité. Dans la mesure où la juge de première instance s'est fondée sur le témoignage de M. Laughlin, le seul expert à avoir témoigné sur la question du lien de causalité, j'estime qu'elle a mal interprété son témoignage ou qu'elle en a tiré des conclusions erronées. Les éléments anecdotiques des témoignages de Craig Thiel, Toby Thiel et Paul Housen concernant le degré d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen constituent la seule autre preuve testimoniale sur le lien de causalité. Bien que leurs témoignages aient fourni quelques éléments de preuve touchant cette question, il ne s'agit pas, pour des raisons que j'examinerai plus loin, d'éléments sur lesquels la juge de première instance pouvait raisonnablement s'appuyer. Je n'estime pas non plus qu'elle pouvait se fonder sur la preuve que M. Nikolaisen avait réussi à prendre le virage permettant d'accéder au chemin Snake Hill depuis l'entrée des Thiel. L'inférence que la juge de première instance a tirée de ce fait était déraisonnable et faisait abstraction de la preuve selon laquelle road three times in the 18 to 20 hours preceding the accident.

le véhicule de M. Nikolaisen avait fait une embardée même dans cette courbe. En outre, la juge de première instance a clairement commis une erreur en ne prenant pas en considération d'autres éléments de preuve pertinents concernant le lien de causalité, en particulier le fait que M. Nikolaisen avait roulé à trois reprises sur le chemin en question au cours des 18 à 20 heures ayant précédé l'accident.

I cannot agree with the trial judge that the testimony of Mr. Laughlin, a forensic alcohol specialist employed by the RCMP supports the finding that Mr. Nikolaisen would have reacted to a sign forewarning of the impending right-turning curve on which the accident occurred. The preponderance of Mr. Laughlin's testimony establishes that persons at the level of impairment which Mr. Nikolaisen was found to be at when the accident occurred would be unlikely to react to a warning sign. In addition, Mr. Laughlin's testimony points overwhelmingly to the conclusion that alcohol was the causal factor which led to this accident. The trial judge erred by misapprehending one comment in Mr. Laughlin's testimony and ignoring the significance of his testimony when taken as a whole.

161 Je ne partage pas l'avis de la juge de première instance voulant que le témoignage de M. Laughlin, spécialiste judiciaire en matière d'alcool au service de la GRC, étaye la conclusion que M. Nikolaisen aurait réagi à un panneau lui signalant l'imminence du virage droite où s'est produit l'accident. Le témoignage de M. Laughlin établit de façon prépondérante que des personnes dans un état d'ébriété aussi avancé que celui de M. Nikolaisen au moment de l'accident ne réagiraient vraisemblablement pas à un panneau d'avertissement. De plus, le témoignage de M. Laughlin mène irrésistiblement à la conclusion que l'alcool a été le facteur causal de l'accident. La juge de première instance a commis une erreur à cet égard, car elle a mal interprété un élément de la déposition de M. Laughlin et elle a omis de tenir compte de l'importance de son témoignage, considéré globalement.

Based on blood samples obtained by Constable Forbes approximately three hours after the accident occurred, Mr. Laughlin predicted that Mr. Nikolaisen's blood alcohol level at the time of the accident ranged from 180 to 210 milligrams percent. Mr. Laughlin commented at length on the effect that this level of blood alcohol could be expected to have on a person's ability to drive, testifying:

162 À la lumière des échantillons de sang prélevés par la gendarme Forbes environ trois heures après l'accident, M. Laughlin a estimé que, au moment de l'accident, l'alcoolémie de M. Nikolaisen se situait entre 180 et 210 mg par 100 ml de sang. Dans son témoignage, M. Laughlin a commenté en détail l'incidence d'une telle alcoolémie sur la capacité d'une personne de conduire :

Well, My Lady, this alcohol level that I've calculated here is a very high alcohol level. The critical mental faculties [that] are important in operating a motor vehicle will be impaired by the alcohol. And any skill that depends on these mental faculties will be affected. These include anticipation, judgment, attention, concentration, the ability to divide attention among two or more areas of interest. Because these are affected to such a degree, it would be unsafe for anybody to operate a motor vehicle with this level of alcohol in their body.

When asked about his knowledge of research pertaining to the effects of alcohol on the risk of being involved in an automobile accident, Mr. Laughlin had this to say:

> At this level the moderate user of alcohol risk of causing crash is tremendously high, probably 100 times that of a sober driver, or even higher. And in some cases at this level, I've seen scientific literature indicating that the risk of causing a fatal crash is 2 to 300 times that of a sober driver. . . . if an impaired person is an experienced drinker there — it won't be that high. However, there will be an increased risk compared to a sober state. . . . But above 100 milligrams percent, regardless of tolerance, a person will be impaired with respect to driving ability.

Following these comments, Mr. Laughlin discussed the ability of a severely impaired person to react to the presence of a hazard when driving:

> My Lady, I would like to add that the driving task is a demanding one and involves many multi-various tasks occurring at the same time. The hazard for a person under the influence of alcohol is it takes longer to notice a hazard or danger if one should occur; it takes longer to decide what corrective action is appropriate, and it takes longer to execute that decision and the person may tend to make incorrect decisions. So there is increased risk in that process. As well, if the impairment has progressed to the point where the motor skills are affected, the execution of that decision is impaired. So it's not a very graceful attempt at a corrective action. As well, some people tend to make more risks under the influence of alcohol. They do not apply sound reasoning and judgment. They are not able to properly assess the impairment of their driving skills, they are not able to properly assess the risk, not able to properly assess the changing road and weather conditions and adjust for that. But even if they do recognize those as hazards, they may tend to take more risks than a sober driver would.

163 The above comments support the conclusion that the accident occurred as a result of Mr. Nikolaisen's impairment and not as a result of any failure on the part of the respondent. Indeed, when the portions of Mr. Laughlin's testimony that the trial judge relied Interrogé sur l'état des recherches touchant l'incidence de l'alcool sur le risque d'accident automobile, voici ce qu'a dit M. Laughlin :

> [TRADUCTION] À ce taux-là, le risque qu'une personne qui consomme modérément de l'alcool provoque un accident est extrêmement élevé, probablement 100 fois plus élevé que le conducteur à jeun, ou plus encore. Et dans certains cas, à ce taux-là, j'ai lu des textes scientifiques dans lesquels on indiquait que le risque de provoquer un accident mortel est de 200 à 300 fois plus élevé que celui d'un conducteur à jeun. [. . .] [S]i la personne en état d'ébriété est quelqu'un qui a l'habitude de boire, le risque n'est pas aussi élevé. Cependant, il est plus grand que si la personne avait été à jeun. [. . .] Mais au dessus de 100 mg par 100 ml de sang, peu importe le degré de tolérance à l'alcool, une personne a les facultés affaiblies pour ce qui concerne sa capacité de conduire.

Après avoir fait ces remarques, M. Laughlin a décrit la capacité d'une personne en état d'ébriété avancé de réagir à la présence d'un danger lorsqu'elle conduit.

> [TRADUCTION] Madame, j'aimerais ajouter que conduire un véhicule est une activité exigeante, qui demande d'accomplir une multiplicité de tâches simultanément. Le danger pour la personne qui conduit en état d'ébriété réside dans le fait qu'il lui faut plus de temps pour déceler la présence d'un risque ou d'un danger; il lui faut plus de temps pour décider quelle mesure corrective est requise, et elle prend plus de temps à mettre cette décision à exécution; de plus, une telle personne peut avoir tendance à prendre de mauvaises décisions. Ce processus accroît donc le risque. Aussi, si l'ébriété est avancée au point où les habiletés motrices sont affaiblies, l'exécution de la décision s'en trouve compromise. Il s'ensuit donc une tentative plutôt malhabile de corriger la situation. De plus, certaines personnes tendent à prendre davantage de risques lorsqu'elles sont en état d'ébriété. Elles ne font pas preuve de discernement et de jugement. Elles sont incapables d'évaluer correctement les changements dans l'état de la route et les conditions météorologiques et d'adapter leur conduite en conséquence. Mais même si elles reconnaissent qu'il s'agit effectivement de dangers, elles peuvent avoir tendance à prendre davantage de risques que le conducteur à jeun.

Les remarques qui précèdent étayent la conclusion que l'accident s'est produit en raison de l'état d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen et non de quelque manquement de la part de l'intimée. De fait, lorsque les extraits du témoignage de M. Laughlin sur lesquels on are considered in their context, they do not support her conclusion that Mr. Nikolaisen would have been able to react to a sign had one been posted. When asked by counsel whether it was possible for an individual with Mr. Nikolaisen's blood alcohol level to perceive and react to a road sign, Mr. Laughlin responded:

> Yes, it's possible that a person will see and react to it and maybe react properly. It's possible that they will react improperly or may miss it altogether. I think what's key here is that at this level of alcohol, it's more likely that the person under this level of alcohol will either miss the sign or not react properly compared to the sober driver. That the driver with this level of alcohol will make more mistakes than will the sober driver. [Emphasis added.]

In the passage above, it is clear that Mr. Laughlin is merely admitting that anything is possible, while solidly expressing the view that drivers at this level of intoxication are more likely to not react to a sign or other warning. This view is also apparent in the following passage, in which Mr. Laughlin expands on the ability of an intoxicated driver to react to signs and other road conditions:

> What happens with respect to perception under the influence of alcohol is a driver tends to concentrate on the central field of vision, and miss certain indicators on the periphery, that's called tunnel vision. As well, drivers tend to concentrate on the lower part of that central field of view and therefore they don't have a very long preview distance in the course of operating a motor vehicle and looking down the road. And so studies indicate that under the influence of alcohol drivers tend to miss more signs, warnings, indicators, especially those in the peripheral field of view or farther down the road. [Emphasis added.]

In argument before this Court, the appellant emphasized that although Mr. Laughlin was the only expert to testify with respect to causation, lay witnesses testified that Mr. Nikolaisen was not visibly impaired prior to leaving the Thiel residence.

s'est fondée la juge de première instance sont examinés dans leur contexte, ils n'appuient pas la conclusion de cette dernière que M. Nikolaisen aurait été capable de réagir à un panneau de signalisation s'il y en avait eu un. Répondant à la question d'un avocat lui demandant s'il était possible qu'une personne ayant l'alcoolémie de M. Nikolaisen voit un panneau de signalisation et y réagisse, M. Laughlin a dit ceci :

Il est clair, dans le passage qui précède, que M. Laughlin reconnaît simplement que tout est possible, tout en avançant avec conviction qu'il y a une plus forte probabilité que les conducteurs ayant atteint ce degré d'ébriété ne réagissent pas à un panneau de signalisation ou à une autre mesure d'avertissement. Cette opinion ressort également clairement de l'extrait suivant, où il donne des précisions supplémentaires sur la capacité d'une personne en état d'ébriété de réagir aux panneaux de signalisation et à d'autres éléments sur les routes :

Au cours des plaidoiries devant notre Cour, l'appelant a souligné que, bien que M. Laughlin ait été le seul expert entendu au sujet du lien de causalité, les témoins ordinaires ont attesté que M. Nikolaisen n'avait pas les facultés visiblement

It is not clear from the trial judge's reasons that she relied on testimony to this effect given by Craig Thiel, Toby Thiel and Paul Housen. To the extent that she did rely on such evidence to establish that the accident was caused in part by the respondent's negligence, I find this reliance to be unreasonable. Whereas the lay witnesses in this case were qualified to give their opinion on whether they, as ordinary drivers, could safely negotiate the segment of Snake Hill Road on which the accident occurred, they were not qualified to assess the degree of Mr. Nikolaisen's impairment. The reason for their lack of qualification in this regard was explained by Mr. Laughlin in the following response to counsel's question on whether it is possible to draw a conclusion from the fact that an individual does not exhibit any impairment of their motor skills and speech:

> No, Your Honour, because, My Lady, when you're looking at motor skill impairment or for signs of motor skill impairment, you're looking for signs of intoxication, not impairment. Remember I mentioned that the first components affected by alcohol are cognitive and mental faculties. These are all important in driving. However, it is very difficult when you look at an individual who has been consuming alcohol to tell that they have impaired in attention or divided attention, or concentration, or judgment. So as an indicator of impairment, motor skills are not reliable. And if you think about the Criminal Code process, they've been abandoned 30 years ago as a useful indicator of impairment. No longer do we rely on police officers subjective assessment of person's motor skills to determine impairment. [Emphasis added.]

165 It is also clear from the trial judge's reasons that she relied to some extent on evidence that Mr. Nikolaisen successfully negotiated the curve at the point where the driveway to the Thiel residence intersected the road. I agree with the respondent that this fact is simply not relevant. The ability of Mr. Nikolaisen to negotiate this curve does not establish that his driving ability was not impaired. As noted by the respondent, at para. 101 of its factum, he may affaiblies avant de quitter la résidence des Thiel. Les motifs de la juge de première instance n'indiquent pas clairement si elle s'est appuyée sur les témoignages de Craig Thiel, Toby Thiel et Paul Housen à cet égard. Dans la mesure où elle se serait fondée sur cette preuve pour conclure que l'accident avait été causé en partie par la négligence de l'intimée, j'estime qu'il était déraisonnable de le faire. En l'espèce, bien que compétents pour exprimer leur opinion sur la question de savoir s'ils pourraient, en tant que conducteurs moyens, manœuvrer en toute sécurité sur le tronçon du chemin Snake Hill où l'accident s'est produit, les témoins ordinaires n'étaient pas compétents pour évaluer le degré d'ébriété de M. Nikolaisen. La raison de leur absence de compétence à cet égard a été expliquée en ces termes par M. Laughlin, dans la réponse suivante qu'il a donnée à l'un des avocats qui lui demandait s'il était possible de tirer des conclusions du fait qu'une personne ne démontre ni signe d'affaiblissement de ses habiletés motrices ni problème d'élocution :

> [TRADUCTION] Non, votre Honneur, puisque, Madame, lorsqu'on vérifie s'il y a affaiblissement des habiletés motrices ou des signes de cet affaiblissement, on cherche des indices d'ébriété, et non d'affaiblissement des facultés. Rappelez-vous que j'ai dit que les premières facultés affectées par l'alcool sont les facultés cognitives et mentales. Elles sont toutes importantes lorsqu'il s'agit de conduire un véhicule. Cependant, lorsqu'on examine une personne qui a consommé de l'alcool, il est très difficile de dire si son attention ou sa capacité de diviser son attention, ou si sa concentration ou son jugement sont réduits. En conséquence les habiletés motrices ne sont pas des indices fiables d'affaiblissement des facultés. Et si on pense au processus prévu par le Code criminel, on a cessé d'y recourir depuis 30 ans en tant qu'indices utiles de l'affaiblissement des facultés. On ne se fie plus à l'appréciation subjective policier quant aux habiletés motrices d'une personne pour déterminer si les facultés de celle-ci sont affaiblies. [Je souligne.]

Il appert également des motifs de la juge de première instance qu'elle s'est dans une certaine mesure fondée sur la preuve indiquant que M. Nikolaisen avait réussi à prendre le virage à l'intersection de l'entrée de la résidence des Thiel et du chemin Snake Hill. Je partage l'avis de l'intimée selon lequel ce fait n'est tout simplement pas pertinent. La capacité de M. Nikolaisen de prendre ce virage n'établit pas que sa capacité de conduire have been driving more slowly at this point, or he may simply have been lucky. More importantly, this evidence contributes nothing to the issue of whether or not Mr. Nikolaisen would have reacted to a sign on the curve where the accident occurred, had one been present. There was no sign on the curve one faces upon leaving the driveway, just as there was no sign on the curve where the accident took place.

n'était pas affaiblie. Comme l'a souligné l'intimée, au par. 101 de son mémoire, il a pu réduire sa vitesse à cet endroit, ou simplement avoir eu de la chance. Facteur plus important encore cette preuve n'aide d'aucune façon à déterminer si M. Nikolaisen aurait réagi à un panneau placé à l'approche de la courbe où s'est produit l'accident, si un tel panneau avait existé. Il n'y avait aucun panneau aux abords de la courbe située à la sortie de l'entrée, tout comme il n'y en avait pas aux abords de celle où s'est produit l'accident.

At any rate, the trial judge's reliance on Mr. Nikolaisen's successful negotiation of the curve at the location of the Thiel driveway ignores relevant evidence that he had swerved or "fish-tailed" when leaving the Thiel residence. A reasonable inference to be drawn from this evidence is that while Mr. Nikolaisen was able to negotiate this curve, he did not do so free from difficulty. While this evidence may not be significant in and of itself, it should have been enough to alert the trial judge to the problems inherent in the inference she drew from his ability to navigate this earlier curve.

166 Quoi qu'il en soit, en se fondant sur le fait que M. Nikolaisen avait pris avec succès le virage devant l'entrée des Thiel, la juge de première instance a fait abstraction de l'élément de preuve pertinent indiquant que l'arrière de son véhicule avait zigzagué à son départ de la résidence des Thiel. On peut raisonnablement inférer de cette preuve que, quoique M. Nikolaisen ait été en mesure de prendre ce virage, il n'y est pas parvenu sans difficulté. Bien que cette preuve ne soit pas nécessairement importante en soi, elle aurait dû néanmoins alerter la juge de première instance quant aux problèmes intrinsèques de l'inférence qu'elle tirait de la capacité de M. Nikolaisen de prendre ce premier virage.

In addition to ignoring the relevant evidence of the fish-tail marks, the trial judge failed to consider the relevance of the fact that Mr. Nikolaisen had travelled Snake Hill Road three times in the 18 to 20 hours preceding the accident. In her review of the evidence, she noted at para. 8 of her reasons that: "Mr. Nikolaisen was unfamiliar with Snake Hill Road. While he had in the preceding 24 hours travelled the road three times, only once was in the same direction that he was travelling upon leaving the Thiel residence."

167 En plus de ne pas avoir tenu compte de la preuve pertinente que constituaient les traces des zigzags, la juge de première instance n'a pas considéré pertinent le fait que M. Nikolaisen avait circulé sur le chemin Snake Hill à trois reprises au cours des 18 à 20 heures ayant précédé l'accident. Dans son examen de la preuve, elle a souligné, au par. 8 de ses motifs, que [TRADUCTION] « M. Nikolaisen ne connaissait pas bien le chemin Snake Hill. Bien qu'il ait emprunté ce chemin à trois reprises au cours des 24 heures précédentes, il ne l'a fait qu'une seule fois dans la même direction que celle qu'il a prise en quittant la résidence des Thiel. »

I simply cannot see how the trial judge found accidents which occurred when motorists were travelling in the opposite direction relevant to the issue of the respondent's knowledge of a risk to motorists while at the same time suggesting that the fact that Mr. Nikolaisen had driven the road in the opposite direction twice was irrelevant to the issue of whether or not he would have recognized that the curve posed a risk or that he would have reacted to a warning sign. This discrepancy aside, I find the fact that Mr. Nikolaisen had travelled Snake Hill Road in the same direction when he left the Thiel residence to go to the Jamboree the evening before the accident highly relevant to the causation issue. The finding that the outcome would have been different had Mr. Nikolaisen been forewarned of the curve ignores the fact that he already knew that the curve was there. I agree with the respondent that the obvious reason Mr. Nikolaisen was unable to safely negotiate the curve on the afternoon of the 18th, despite having negotiated this curve and others without difficulty in the preceding 18 to 20 hours was the combined effect of his drinking, lack of sleep and lack of food.

168 Je ne vois tout simplement pas comment la juge de première instance a pu conclure que les accidents qu'ont eu des automobilistes circulant en sens inverse étaient pertinents pour statuer sur la connaissance par l'intimée de l'existence d'un risque d'accident, tout en suggérant du même souffle que le fait que M. Nikolaisen ait roulé à deux reprises

en sens inverse sur le chemin en question n'était pas pertinent pour déterminer s'il aurait reconnu que la courbe présentait un risque ou s'il aurait réagi à un panneau d'avertissement. Indépendamment de cette contradiction, j'estime que le fait que M. Nikolaisen ait roulé dans la même direction sur le chemin Snake Hill après avoir quitté la résidence des Thiel pour se rendre au jamboree, la veille de l'accident, est fort pertinent en ce qui concerne le lien de causalité. La conclusion que le résultat aurait été différent si une signalisation avait prévenu M. Nikolaisen de l'existence de la courbe ne tient pas compte du fait qu'il savait déjà qu'elle existait. Je souscris à l'opinion de l'intimée que la raison évidente pour laquelle M. Nikolaisen n'a pas réussi à prendre le virage en toute sécurité dans l'après-midi du 18, alors qu'il avait déjà pris ce virage et d'autres sans difficulté au cours des 18 à 20 heures précédentes, était l'effet combiné de sa consommation d'alcool, de son manque de sommeil et du fait qu'il n'avait pas mangé.

169 In conclusion on the issue of causation, I wish to clarify that the fact that the trial judge referred to some evidence to support her findings on this issue does not insulate those findings from review by this Court. The standard of review for findings of fact is reasonableness, not absolute deference. Such a standard entitles the appellate court to assess whether or not it was clearly wrong for the trial judge to rely on some evidence when other evidence points overwhelmingly to the opposite conclusion. The logic of this approach was aptly explained by Kerans, supra, in the following passage at p. 44:

Pour conclure sur la question du lien de causalité, j'aimerais préciser que le fait que la juge de première instance ait mentionné certains éléments de preuve au soutien de ses conclusions sur ce point n'a pas pour effet de soustraire ces conclusions au pouvoir de contrôle de notre Cour. La norme de contrôle applicable aux conclusions de fait est celle de la décision raisonnable et non celle de la retenue absolue. Cette norme permet au tribunal d'appel de se demander si le juge de première instance a clairement fait erreur en décidant comme il l'a fait sur le fondement de certains éléments de preuve alors que d'autres éléments mènent irrésistiblement à la conclusion inverse. Kerans, op. cit., p. 44, a habilement exposé la logique de cette démarche dans le passage suivant :

> The key to the problem is whether the reviewer is to look merely for "evidence to support" the finding. Some evidence might indeed support the finding, but other evidence may point overwhelmingly the other way. A court might be able to say that reliance on the "some" in the face of the "other" was not what the reasonable trier of fact would do; indeed, it might say that, in all the circumstances it was convinced that to rely on the one in the face of the other was quite unreasonable. To say that "some evidence" is enough, then, without regard to that "other l'ensemble des circonstances, il est convaincu qu'il était tout à fait déraisonnable de se fonder sur certains éléments compte tenu des autres. En conséquence, affirmer que « certains éléments de preuve » suffisent, sans égard aux « autres éléments », revient à abandonner l'examen du caractère raisonnable.

D. Did the Courts Below Err in Finding that no Common Law Duty of Care Exists Alongside the Statutory Duty Imposed Under Section 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989?

D. Les juridictions inférieures ont-elles commis une erreur en concluant qu'aucune obligation de diligence de common law ne coexiste avec l'obligation légale imposée par l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989?

170 The appellant urges this Court to find that a common law duty of care exists alongside the statutory duty of care imposed on the respondent by s. 192 of The Rural Municipality Act, 1989. According to the appellant, the application of the common law duty of care would free the Court from the need to focus on how a reasonable driver exercising ordinary care would have navigated the road in question. The appellant submits that the Court would instead apply the "classic reasonableness formulation" which, in its view, would require the Court to take into account the likelihood of a known or foreseeable harm, the gravity of that harm, and the burden or cost of preventing that harm. The appellant argues that the respondent would be held liable under this test.

L'appelant invite notre Cour à conclure qu'une obligation de diligence de common law coexiste avec l'obligation légale de diligence imposée à l'intimée par l'art. 192 de la Rural Municipality Act, 1989. Selon l'appelant, l'application de l'obligation de diligence de common law dispenserait la Cour de la nécessité de se demander comment un conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales aurait roulé sur le chemin en cause. L'appelant soutient que la Cour pourrait plutôt appliquer le [TRADUCTION] « critère classique de la conduite raisonnable », lequel, à son avis, l'obligerait à tenir compte des éléments suivants : la probabilité qu'un préjudice connu ou prévisible survienne, la gravité de ce préjudice et le fardeau ou le coût qu'il faudrait assumer pour le prévenir. L'appelant prétend que, suivant ce critère, l'intimée serait tenue responsable.

171 The courts below rejected the above argument when it was put to them by the appellant. I would not interfere with their ruling on this issue for the reason that it is unnecessary for this Court to impose a common law duty of care where a statutory one clearly exists. In any event, the application of the common law test would not affect the outcome in these proceedings.

Les juridictions inférieures ont rejeté l'argument susmentionné de l'appelant. Je ne modifierais pas leur décision sur cette question, car il est inutile que notre Cour impose une obligation de diligence de common law lorsqu'il existe clairement une obligation d'origine législative. Quoi qu'il en soit, l'application du critère prévu par la common law ne modifierait pas l'issue de la présente instance.

172 I agree with the respondent's submissions that in this case, where the legislature has clearly imposed a statutory duty of care on the respondents, it would be redundant and unnecessary to find that a common law duty of care exists. The two-part test to establish a common law duty of care set out in Kamloops (City of) v. Nielsen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 2, simply has no application where the legislature has defined a statutory duty. As was stated by this Court in Brown

Je souscris à l'argument de l'intimée selon lequel, en l'espèce, il serait redondant et inutile de conclure qu'elle est assujettie à une obligation de diligence de common law alors que le législateur lui a clairement imposé une obligation légale de diligence. Le critère à deux volets énoncé dans l'arrêt Kamloops (Ville de) c. Nielsen, [1984] 2 R.C.S. 2, pour statuer sur l'existence d'une obligation de diligence de common law, ne s'applique tout

v. British Columbia (Minister of Transportation and Highways), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 420, at p. 424:

> . . . if a statutory duty to maintain existed as it does in some provinces, it would be unnecessary to find a private law duty on the basis of the neighbourhood principle in Anns v. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728. Moreover, it is only necessary to consider the policy/operational dichotomy in connection with the search for a private law duty of care.

All of the authorities cited by the appellant as support for the imposition of an independent common law duty of care can be distinguished from the case at hand on the basis that no statutory duty of care existed (Just, supra; Brown, supra; Swinamer v. Nova Scotia (Attorney General), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 445; Ryan, supra).

173 In addition, I find that the outcome in this case would not be different if the case were determined according to ordinary negligence principles. First, were the Court to engage in a common law analysis, it would still look to the statutory standard of care as laid out in The Rural Municipality Act, 1989, as interpreted by the case law in order to assess the scope of liability owed by the respondent to the appellant. As this Court stated in Ryan, supra, at para. 29:

> Statutory standards can, however, be highly relevant to the assessment of reasonable conduct in a particular case, and in fact may render reasonable an act or omission which would otherwise appear to be negligent. This allows courts to consider the legislative framework in which people and companies must operate, while at the same time recognizing that one cannot avoid the underlying obligation of reasonable care simply by discharging statutory duties.

174 Moreover, even under the common law analysis, this Court would be called upon to question the type of hazards that the respondent, in this case, ought to have foreseen. Whatever the approach, it is only rea-simplement pas lorsque le législateur a prescrit l'obligation dans la loi. Comme l'a indiqué notre Cour dans l'arrêt Brown c. Colombie-Britannique (Ministre des Transports et de la Voirie), [1994] 1 R.C.S. 420, p. 424 :

> . . . s'il existait une obligation d'entretien imposée par la loi comme c'est le cas dans certaines provinces, il serait inutile de rechercher une obligation en droit privé en se fondant sur le principe du prochain établi dans l'arrêt Anns c. Merton London Borough Council, [1978] A.C. 728. En outre, il est nécessaire d'examiner la dichotomie politique générale-opérations seulement en ce qui concerne la recherche d'une obligation de diligence en droit privé.

Tous les arrêts invoqués par l'appelant pour justifier sa prétention que la municipalité devrait être assujettie à une obligation indépendante de diligence de common law peuvent être distingués de la présente affaire, étant donné qu'il n'existait aucune obligation légale de diligence dans ces affaires (Just, précitée; Brown, précitée; Swinamer c. Nouvelle-Écosse (Procureur général), [1994] 1 R.C.S. 445; Ryan, précitée).

En outre, j'estime que le résultat serait le même en l'espèce si l'affaire était tranchée d'après les principes ordinaires de la négligence. Tout d'abord, si la Cour faisait l'analyse prévue par la common law, elle appliquerait quand même la norme légale de diligence établie dans la Rural Municipality Act, 1989, telle qu'elle a été interprétée par la jurisprudence, pour déterminer l'étendue de la responsabilité de l'intimée envers l'appelant. Comme l'a dit notre Cour dans l'arrêt Ryan, précité, par. 29 :

> Cependant, les normes législatives peuvent être hautement pertinentes pour déterminer ce qui constitue une conduite raisonnable dans un cas particulier, et elles peuvent, en fait, rendre raisonnable un acte ou une omission qui, autrement, paraîtrait négligent. En conséquence, les tribunaux peuvent examiner le cadre législatif dans lequel les personnes et les sociétés doivent agir, tout en reconnaissant qu'il est impossible de se soustraire à l'obligation sous-jacente de diligence raisonnable simplement en s'acquittant de ses obligations légales.

De plus, même dans le cadre de l'analyse requise par la common law, notre Cour devrait s'interroger sur le type de dangers que l'intimée aurait dû prévoir en l'espèce. Indépendamment de l'approche choisie, sonable to expect a municipality to foresee accidents which occur as a result of the conditions of the road, and not, as in this case, as a result of the condition of the driver.

The courts have long restricted the standard of care under the statutory duty to require municipalities to repair only those hazards which would pose a risk to the reasonable driver exercising ordinary care. Compelling reasons exist to maintain this interpretation. The municipalities within the province of Saskatchewan have some 175,000 kilometres of roads under their care and control, 45,000 kilometres of which fall within the "bladed trail" category. These municipalities, for the most part, do not boast large, permanent staffs with extensive time and budgetary resources. To expand the repair obligation of municipalities to require them to take into account the actions of unreasonable or careless drivers when discharging this duty would signify a drastic and unworkable change to the current standard. Accordingly, it is a change that I would not be prepared to make.

VII. Disposition

In the result, the judgment of the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal is affirmed and the appeal is dismissed with costs.

Appeal allowed with costs, GONTHIER, BASTARACHE, BINNIE and LEBEL JJ. dissenting.

Solicitors for the appellant: Robertson Stromberg, Saskatoon; Quon Ferguson MacKinnon, Saskatoon.

Solicitors for the respondent: Gerrand Rath Johnson, Regina.

il n'est que raisonnable d'attendre d'une municipalité qu'elle prévoit les accidents qui surviennent en raison de l'état du chemin, et non, comme en l'espèce, ceux qui résultent de l'état du conducteur.

175 Depuis longtemps, les tribunaux limitent l'étendue de la norme de diligence découlant de l'existence d'un devoir légal de diligence à l'obligation pour les municipalités d'éliminer seulement les dangers qui présenteraient un risque pour le conducteur raisonnable prenant des précautions normales. Des raisons impérieuses militent en faveur du maintien de cette interprétation. Les municipalités de la province de la Saskatchewan assument l'entretien et la surveillance de quelque 175 000 kilomètres de route, dont 45 000 kilomètres font partie de la catégorie des « chemins nivelés ». La plupart de ces municipalités ne disposent ni d'effectifs permanents considérables ni de ressources importantes en temps et en argent. Élargir l'obligation d'entretien des municipalités en exigeant qu'elles tiennent compte, dans l'exécution de cette obligation, des actes des conducteurs déraisonnables ou imprudents, entraînerait une modification radicale et irréalisable de la norme actuelle. Il s'agit en conséquent d'un changement que je ne serais pas disposé à apporter.

VII. Dispositif

176 En définitive, le jugement de la Cour de l'appel de la Saskatchewan est confirmé et le pourvoi est rejeté avec dépens.

Summary:

The appellant brought proceedings in 2011 concerning events that took place between 1988 and 1990. On an application to amend her style of cause the chambers judge expressed concern that the claims appeared to have been brought out of time, seized herself of the matter and ordered a case planning conference. At the case planning conference the chambers judge struck the appellant's claims as being an abuse of process under Rule 9-5(1) because they were barred by the Limitation Act. The appellant submits the chambers judge erred in making a final order at the case planning conference and in striking her claims without a factual foundation.

Held: appeal allowed, matter remitted to the Supreme Court. The chambers judge should not have determined the matter on her own motion. An application requiring affidavit evidence or leading to a final judgment should not be decided at a case planning conference. Based on the notice of civil claim alone it was not clear and obvious that the plaintiff could not succeed or that the action was an abuse of process. The limitation issue only arises if it is pleaded in defence and cannot be resolved in an evidentiary vacuum because of the 30-year ultimate limitation period.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Goepel:

INTRODUCTION

[1] This appeal raises for consideration the power of a Supreme Court judge to dismiss a proceeding at a case planning conference ("CPC"); whether a cause of action which on its face appears to be outside the applicable limitation period can be dismissed as an abuse of process; and the appropriateness of a judge deciding a matter on her own motion.

BACKGROUND

[2] The appellant commenced these proceedings on February 28, 2011. The notice of civil claim makes allegations against the various named defendants concerning events surrounding the birth of her daughter and her daughter's subsequent apprehension by representatives of the Ministry of Social Services and Housing. The events which are the subject matter of the allegations took place between August 1988, and July 1990. There are numerous claims against each of the defendants and the appellant alleges that as a result of their actions she sustained various personal injuries.

[3] On March 5, 2012, and May 29, 2012, the appellant received orders extending the time to serve the various defendants. By the end of June 2012, she had served all of the named defendants except the RCMP, Gibsons Detachment.

[4] On June 28, 2012, the appellant filed an ex parte application in which she sought to amend her style of cause to properly name the RCMP as a defendant and to add as defendants several additional individuals who were employees of certain of the organizations already named as defendants in the actions.

[5] When the application came on for hearing on June 29, 2012, the appellant, who has been self-represented throughout, appeared by telephone. The chambers judge expressed her concern to the appellant that all her claims appeared to have been brought out of time. She urged the appellant to obtain legal advice and warned her that if applications were brought by the named defendants to strike out her claim, the defendants could all get costs against her.

[6] In the course of the hearing the chambers judge suggested that the proceedings were an abuse of process because they had no hope of succeeding. She told the appellant it would not be appropriate for all the defendants to be troubled with the lawsuit if it was not properly brought and it appeared to her that it was not.

[8] On September 4, 2012, the appellant wrote to trial scheduling to arrange the CPC that the chambers judge had ordered. The conference was ultimately scheduled for 9:15 a.m. on November 29, 2012. By that time seven responses to the notice of civil claim had been filed by six separate law firms on behalf of the various defendants who had been served. Six of the responses pled that the claims were barred pursuant to the Limitation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 266. Four of the responses pled that some or all of the claims did not disclose a cause of action. One response pled that the claims were frivolous and vexatious. None of the defendants pled that the claims were an abuse of process.

[9] In advance of the CPC all of the parties, including the appellant, filed case plan proposals. Under the heading “Other” the appellant raised for consideration scheduling for service of the notice of civil claim on amended parties, amending her pleadings and arguments regarding postponement of limitation. The defendants in their case plan proposals indicated under the heading “Other” that they intended to seek an order that the plaintiff’s claims be struck given the expiry of the limitation period, an order for security for costs, and an order that the action which was set in the Fort St. John registry be transferred to the Vancouver registry. The defendants did not, however, file any applications seeking the relief set out in their CPC briefs.

[10] The defendants attached to their case plan proposals a written argument that the claim should be struck out under the Limitation Act. In their written submissions the defendants suggested, in the alternative, that it was plain and obvious that the claims could not succeed and the action should be dismissed pursuant to Rule 9-5(1)(a) as disclosing no reasonable claim or as an abuse of process within the meaning of Rule 9-5(1)(d).

[11] On November 16, 2012, the appellant wrote to trial scheduling concerning the case planning conference. She inquired as to whether or not she could be allowed to file affidavit evidence.

[12] In response the appellant was advised in an email of November 19, 2012, from trial scheduling that:

> You should come prepared with an argument as to why the claims you are asserting are not out of time. You do not need to have affidavits, but a brief written outline of your argument (just a page or two) would be helpful. You should describe in a general way what amendments you intend to make to the pleading. This should be sent to the Court and the other lawyers two days before the CPC. The rest of the questions can be addressed at the case planning conference.

[13] On November 28, 2012, the appellant filed a 17-page submission setting out her factual and legal arguments in regards to the postponement of the limitation period. In explaining the reasons why the action had been delayed she indicated that she had been under severe stress and a dissociative state after her daughter was taken from her, that she could not get the documents she needed and that she had received inadequate legal advice. She also indicated that she feared suing the Ministry of Children and Family Development and others earlier because she had reason to believe that they would retaliate by taking her daughter away from her again. In addition the submission dealt with the need to amend her pleadings, add certain parties, and whether her notice of civil claim was an abuse of process. In regards to the latter she submitted that the notice of claim was not an abuse of process because the 30-year ultimate limitation period exists to protect claims that have been commenced after the apparent expiry of the limitation period.

THE CASE PLANNING CONFERENCE

[14] At the CPC the appellant again appeared by telephone as did counsel for two groups of the defendants. The remaining four counsel were in the courtroom with the judge. At the outset the chambers judge advised that the purpose of the CPC was for her to address the question as to whether the claims that the appellant had brought should be dismissed or struck because of the time it had taken for the action to be commenced. She indicated that she had read the appellant's argument and complimented her for articulating the reasons why the limitation period should be postponed. She then asked the appellant if there was anything she wished to add to her written argument. The appellant indicated that she had provided an explanation in a general way and could probably make a few more specific formal arguments. In response the chambers judge indicated that she considered it to be a very good argument and she did not think there was anything more that could be said.

[15] The chambers judge then indicated she was going to give her reasons for judgment and in doing so she would assume that the appellant could prove all of the facts set out in her argument. Before giving the judgment the chambers judge indicated she had received material from other counsel which she had read but she did not need to hear from any of them because her decision was based on the argument made by the appellant.

[16] In her reasons for judgment the chambers judge set out the history of the proceeding and how it had first come before her on the application that the appellant had brought to add parties. She noted that at the time of that first application she had pointed out to the appellant that her claims were brought 11 to 20 years after the incidents described and were therefore on their face barred by the provisions of the Limitation Act. She stated that at the time of the initial application she had adjourned the application to add parties and directed that a CPC be convened to revisit the question as to whether the claim should be struck out under Rule 9-5(1)(d) as an abuse of process.

[17] The chambers judge then set out certain of the arguments that the appellant had made in regards to a postponement of the limitation period. She then indicated that assuming all of the facts set out in the appellant's submission were true, the appellant had waited too long to bring these proceedings and they were barred by the Limitation Act. In reaching this conclusion she made reference to the decision of this Court in Vance v. Peglar (1996), 22 B.C.L.R. (3d) 251 (C.A.) in which the rules to be applied in determining when a limitation period begins to run are set out. The chambers judge concluded in her reasons as follows:

> [39] Having considered all of the submissions and the statement of claim, the claims in my view are barred, and they have no prospect of success. As I said to you, Ms. Jensen, last day, it is not in your interest for the Court to permit you to carry on with a case that will only cause you more stress and anxiety and at the end of the day could result in you being faced with a large award of costs against you, costs of the other parties' legal expenses.
> [40] I have concluded, therefore, that it is just and right, and indeed necessary for me to strike out your statement of claim under Rule 9-5(1). That means that no further action can be commenced in relation to those claims that you have described in that statement of claim.

[18] Following the delivery of the reasons there was some further discussion between the appellant and the chambers judge. The appellant indicated that there was much more evidence that she could lead to substantiate her claim that the limitation period could be postponed.

[19] The chambers judge ended the CPC by saying that because the appellant was impecunious and had been acting on her own she was not inclined to award costs.

[20] The entered order contains the following provisions:

1. The plaintiff's claim is struck pursuant to Rule 9-5(1);

2. The plaintiff is barred from commencing any further actions based on the claims described in the notice of civil claim; and

3. Each party is to bear their own costs.

THE APPEAL

[21] The appellant now challenges that decision. She submits that the chambers judge erred in striking out the action at a CPC because a judge cannot make a final order at such a conference. She further submits that the chambers judge erred in striking out the action under Rule 9-5(1)(d) as an abuse of process without evidence or a factual foundation for doing so.

[22] The various groups of respondents have all filed nearly identical factums supporting the judgment below. They submit that the order below was a "final order", not a final judgment and accordingly could be made at a CPC. They further submit that Rules 5-3 and 9-5 should be read together in determining the powers of the Court to make an order respecting abuse of its process and that a judge has the power at any stage of the proceedings to strike an action as an abuse of process. They submit that even if an incorrect process was followed, it was an irregularity but can be cured by Rule 22-7. In that regard they submit that the chambers judge's analysis of the postponement provisions of the Limitation Act was correct and that the appellant suffered no prejudice because the chambers judge proceeded on the basis that the appellant could prove the truth of the contents of her submission.

DISCUSSION

A. Overview

[23] In this matter the chambers judge acted from the very best of intentions. She was trying to spare a self-represented appellant from the costs of what she considered a doomed proceeding. Judges, however, cannot always do what they want. In this case, in her well-meaning attempt to do what she considered right, the chambers judge fell into procedural and substantive error. The procedural errors concern her acting on her own motion and deciding the matter at a CPC. The substantive error concerns the application of the test for striking pleadings under Rule 9-5(1).

B. Acting On Own Motion

[24] Civil litigation is an adversarial process. The judge is the referee. Judges must leave it to the parties to determine the court processes that they wish to engage to resolve a proceeding. Absent extraordinary circumstances such as those facing Chief Justice McEachern when picketers threatened to shut down the courthouse (Re British Columbia Government Employees Union et al. and Attorney General of British Columbia et al. (1982), 2 D.L.R. (4th) 705; aff'd (1985) 20 D.L.R (4th) 399; aff'd [1988] 2 S.C.R. 214), judges should not act on their own motion. To do so compromises their role of impartial arbitrator.

[25] The chambers judge quite properly brought to the self-represented appellant's attention the provisions of the Limitation Act and the cost consequences to her if the defendants brought an application to have her claim dismissed on that ground. Having taken those steps, the chambers judge should not have gone further. It was not her role to save the appellant from potential folly.

[26] It was for the parties to decide how they wished this action to be determined. The various defendants all pled the Limitation Act. Some pled that certain of the claims did not disclose a cause of action. None suggested the claim was an abuse of process. If some or all of the defendants wished to have the matter determined in a summary fashion it was for them, not the chambers judge, to set down a motion.

[27] The chambers judge decided the case on her own initiative in the absence of any application by the parties. For the chambers judge to act on her own motion was a clear error. She took from the parties their right to control the proceedings and determine for themselves the battleground upon which they wanted the proceedings resolved.

C. The Case Planning Conference

a. The Rule

[28] Rule 5 of the Supreme Court Civil Rules, B.C. Reg. 168/2009, governs the conduct and procedures at a CPC. Rule 5-3 sets out a broad range of orders that a judge or master can make at a CPC. Rule 5-3(2) limits the applications that can be heard and orders that can be made at a CPC. The relevant portion of the Rule reads:

> (2) A case planning conference judge or master must not, at a case planning conference,
> (a) hear any application supported by affidavit evidence… or
> (b) make an order for final judgment, …

[29] Rule 12-2(11) similarly limits the nature of applications and orders that can be heard and made at a trial management conference ("TMC").

[30] In this case the procedure followed by the chambers judge violated both prongs of Rule 5-3(2).

b. Rule 5-3(2)(a) – Affidavit Evidence

[31] The Court at a CPC or a TMC can hear contested applications which can be determined on the basis of representations of counsel: Gill v. A & P Fruit Growers Ltd., 2011 BCSC 1421. If an application requires affidavit evidence it cannot be heard: Vernon v. British Columbia (Ministry of Housing and Social Development, Liquor Distribution Branch), 2010 BCSC 1688.

[32] The chambers judge directed a CPC to determine whether the action should proceed. In advance of the conference she gave no indication as to the Rule upon which she intended to rely. The chambers judge appears to have based her decision on Rule 9-5(1). That Rule, as did its predecessor Rule 19(24), reads:

> (1) At any stage of a proceeding, the court may order to be struck out or amended the whole or any part of a pleading, petition or other document on the ground that
> (a) it discloses no reasonable claim or defence, as the case may be,
>
> (b) it is unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
>
> (c) it may prejudice, embarrass or delay the fair trial or hearing of the proceeding, or
> (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court,

> and the court may pronounce judgment or order the proceeding to be stayed or dismissed and may order the costs of the application to be paid as special costs.

[33] In her reasons the chambers judge indicated that the question before her was whether the proceeding brought by the appellant should be struck out as an abuse of process. While evidence is not admissible under Rule 9-5(1)(a) it is admissible under Rule 9-5(1)(d) which deals with abuse of process. The appellant in advance of the CPC sought clarification as to whether she would be able to file affidavit evidence. She was advised that she need not file affidavits but should come prepared to argue why the claims were not out of time.

[34] The limitation issue cried out for affidavit evidence. The applicability of the postponement provisions is a fact-intensive question. It could only be decided on a proper factual foundation. It was not the type of question that could be decided on the basis of counsel's representations. It was an error to hear the application at a CPC.

c. Rule 5-3(2)(b) – Order for Final Judgment

[35] The respondents submit that there is a distinction between an order and a judgment, and that what occurred in this case was not a judgment of the issues raised by the appellant in her pleadings. In support of that position they cite Stroub v. Kazakoff (1977), 2 B.C.L.R. 262 (S.C.) and First City Trust Co. v. Triple Five Corporation Ltd. (1989), 94 A.R. 106, 57 D.L.R. (4th) 554 (C.A.).

[36] In Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce v. Bury (1979), 103 D.L.R. (3d) 560, 11 Alta. L.R. (2d) 93 (S.C.), Stephenson J. (as he then was) explained the distinction between an "order" and a "judgment" at pp. 561-62:

> Williston & Rowles, The Law of Civil Procedure 1970, vol. 2, pp. 1020-21, refer to authorities that distinguish between judgments and orders. One of the references is to Loring v. Illsley (1850), 1 Cal. 24, and the following quotation from that case is included:
> > What then is the distinction between an order and a final judgment?... The former is a decision made during the > progress of the cause, either prior or subsequent to final judgment settling some point of practice or some question collateral to the main issue presented by the pleadings and necessary to be disposed of before such issue can be decided upon by the Court, or necessary to be determined in carrying the execution into effect.

> The authors say that where the controversy between the parties is determined it is a judgment and every other decision is an order.

[37] In this case, the decision of the chambers judge determined the controversy between the parties. It brought the appellant's action to an end. It was an order for final judgment. It was an order that cannot be made at a CPC.

D. Striking the Claim

[38] Turning to the point of substance I would first note that because there was no application before the Court it is not entirely clear what Rule the chambers judge relied on. While she made specific reference in her reasons to Rule 9-5(1)(d), the order states that the action was struck pursuant to Rule 9-5(1).

[39] In Chapman v. Canada, 2003 BCCA 665, this Court set out at paras. 12-13 the criteria for applications brought under the then Rule 19(24); it must be plain and obvious that the impugned pleading has the fault alleged:

> [12] The criteria for application of all provisions of Rule 19(24) are established in authorities considered by the chambers judge: Hunt v. Carey Can. Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959; Berscheid v. Ensign, [1999] B.C.J. No. 1172 (B.C.S.C.); Babavic v. Babowech, [1993] B.C.J. No. 1802, World Wide Treasure Adventures Inc. v. Trivia Games Inc. (1996), 17 B.C.L.R. (3d) 187 (B.C.C.A.), and Kripps v. Touche Ross & Co. (1990), 48 B.C.L.R. (2d) 171 (B.C.C.A.). The test is whether it is plain and obvious that the impugned pleading has the fault alleged. Otherwise the party whose pleading is challenged is entitled to a trial of the issue.
> [13] The orders in this case were made under Rule 19(24)(a) and (d). Thus in order to succeed the applicant is required to establish that it is plain and obvious that the pleadings disclose no cause of action (Rule 19(24)(a)) or that the proceedings are an abuse of process (Rule 19(24)(d)). Otherwise the litigation will be allowed to proceed.

[40] In Babavic v. Babowech, [1993] B.C.J. No. 1802, 42 A.C.W.S. (3d) 447 (S.C.), Baker J. in an oft-cited passage commented on the principle of abuse of process at paras. 17-18:

2014 BCCA 173 (CanLII)

> [17] ... The principle of abuse of process is somewhat amorphous. The discretion afforded courts to dismiss actions on the ground of abuse of process extends to any circumstance in which the court process is used for an improper purpose. …
> [18] The categories of abuse of process are open. Abuse of process may be found where proceedings involve a deception on the court or constitute a mere sham; where the process of the court is not being fairly or honestly used, or is employed for some ulterior or improper purpose; proceedings which are without foundation or serve no useful purpose and multiple or successive proceedings which cause or are likely to cause vexation or oppression. ...

[41] The chambers judge held that the action brought by the appellant should be struck because it was brought outside of the time set out in the Limitation Act for bringing the proceedings and had no prospect for success. She cited no authorities in support of her conclusion.

[42] There are numerous cases which have held that Rule 9-5 is not the appropriate mechanism to determine a limitation issue. The cases include: Canadian Pacific Ltd. v. British Columbia Hydro and Power Authority (1979), 10 B.C.L.R. P 6 (S.C.); Roeder v. Lang Michener Lawrence & Shaw, 2005 BCSC 1784; Fuoco Estate v. Kamloops (City), 2001 BCCA 325 [Fuoco]; Border Enterprises Ltd. v. Beazer East, Inc., 2003 BCSC 49; Rain Coast Water Corp. v. British Columbia, 2008 BCSC 1182; Mattson v. Remus, 2009 BCSC 836; and Hughes v. Hughes, 2011 BCSC 1569.

> [15] Counsel have been unable to direct us to any cases in which Rule 19(24)(a), standing alone, has been used to resolve a limitation issue. That may be because statements of claim do not raise limitation issues, as is the case here. The statutory limitations is a defence pleading. It is an issue that does not arise until it is pleaded in defence. ...

[44] Those words resonate in this case. The notice of civil claim, in and of itself, does not raise a limitation issue. The limitation issue only arises if it is pleaded in defence. Even then, the issue cannot be resolved in an evidentiary vacuum. The Limitation Act contains provisions pursuant to which the running of time is postponed. Pursuant to s. 8(1)(c) of the Limitation Act the ultimate postponement is 30 years from the date on which the right to bring the action arose.

[45] In this case the events which are the subject matter of the litigation commenced approximately 22 years prior to the issuance of the writ. The respondents have now raised the Limitation Act as a defence to the claim. The appellant has indicated that she intends to rely on the postponement provisions to escape the consequences of the Act. Whether she can or cannot do so successfully will undoubtedly be determined in a properly brought application. Based on the appellant's pleading alone it is not plain and obvious that her action cannot succeed.

[46] Similarly it is not plain and obvious that the action is an abuse of process. While the action may ultimately fall on the limitation issue it cannot be said that the court's process is being used for any improper purpose. The fact that a claim arises outside the initial limitation period does not in itself allow a claim to be struck out as an abuse of process. Different considerations might arise if a claim is brought outside the ultimate limitation period. In such a case it may be plain and obvious that the action cannot succeed and such a claim can be properly resolved pursuant to Rule 9-5(1): Chisamore v. Cumis Life Insurance Co., 2006 BCSC 462.

[47] What occurred in this case was more than an irregularity. It cannot be cured under Rule 22-7. The limitation issue is one which must be determined on a proper application with a full evidentiary foundation. It cannot be determined pursuant to Rule 9-5(1). It cannot be determined at a CPC. It matters not whether the chambers judge's analysis of the Limitation Act ultimately proves to be correct.

DISPOSITION

[48] For all the above reasons I would allow the appeal, set aside the order dismissing the action and remit the action to the Supreme Court. It is clear from the case planning briefs that there are numerous procedural matters to be resolved. These include the appellant's desire to file a reply, amend her pleadings and add new parties. The defendants in turn wish to schedule applications to strike the claim under the Limitation Act or as disclosing no cause of action. They also wish to seek security for costs.

[49] The timing of these applications is a matter best determined at a CPC. Accordingly, I would direct that no steps be taken in the action by any party before a CPC is convened in the Supreme Court to determine how matters shall proceed further, save and except the appellant will have liberty to file a reply to plead the postponement provisions in advance of the CPC.

Court of Appeal for Ontario,

A.C.J. (ad hoc)
January 18, 2012

2012 ONCA 32 (CanLII)

Torts -- Invasion of privacy -- Intrusion upon seclusion -- Right of action for intrusion upon seclusion existing in Ontario -- Range of damages for intrusion upon seclusion being up to $20,000 -- Defendant committing tort of intrusion upon seclusion when she used her position as bank employee to repeatedly examine private banking records of her spouse's ex- wife -- Damages in amount of $10,000 awarded.

The plaintiff and the defendant did not know each other, but they worked for different branches of the same bank and the defendant had formed a common law relationship with the plaintiff's ex-husband. For about four years, the defendant used her workplace computer to access the plaintiff's personal bank accounts at least 174 times. She did not publish, distribute or record the information in any way. When she discovered the conduct, the plaintiff brought an action for damages for invasion of privacy and moved for summary judgment. The defendant brought a cross-motion for summary judgment dismissing the action. The motion judge found that the tort of invasion of privacy does not exist at common law in Ontario. He dismissed the plaintiff's motion and granted the defendant's motion. The plaintiff appealed.

Held, the appeal should be allowed.

A right of action for intrusion upon seclusion should be recognized in Ontario. The case law supports the existence of such a cause of action. Privacy has long been recognized as an important underlying and animating value of various traditional causes of action to protect personal and territorial privacy. Charter jurisprudence recognizes privacy as a fundamental value in our law and specifically identifies, as worthy of protection, a right to informational privacy that is distinct from personal and territorial privacy. The right to informational privacy closely tracks the same interest that would be protected by a cause of action for intrusion upon seclusion. It is within the capacity of the common law to evolve to respond to the problem posed by the routine collection and aggregation of highly personal information that is readily accessible in electronic form. Technological change poses a novel threat to a right of privacy that has been protected for hundreds of years by the common law under various guises and that, since 1982 and the Charter, has been recognized as a right that is integral to our social and political order. Finally, the facts of this case cried out for a remedy.

The key features of the cause of action of intrusion upon seclusion are, first, that the defendant's conduct must be intentional (which includes recklessness); second, that the defendant must have invaded, without lawful justification, the plaintiff's private affairs or concerns; and third, that a reasonable person would regard the invasion as highly offensive, causing distress, humiliation or anguish. Proof of harm to a recognized economic interest is not an element of the cause of action.

Given the intangible nature of the interest protected, damages for intrusion upon seclusion will ordinarily be measured by a modest conventional sum. The appropriate range is up to $20,000. Awards of aggravated and punitive damages may be appropriate in exceptional cases, but are not to be encouraged, as predictability and consistency are paramount values in an area where symbolic or moral damages are awarded. [page242]

The defendant committed the tort of intrusion upon seclusion when she repeatedly examined the plaintiff's private bank records. The intrusion was intentional, it amounted to an unlawful invasion of the plaintiff's private affairs, it would be viewed as highly offensive to the reasonable person and it caused distress, humiliation or anguish. The plaintiff was awarded damages in the amount of $10,000. The intrusion upon her seclusion did not exhibit any exceptional quality calling for an award of aggravated or punitive damages.

Christopher Du Vernet and Carlin McGoogan, for appellant.

Alex Cameron and N. Melanson, for respondent.

[1] SHARPE J.A.: -- Does Ontario law recognize a right to bring a civil action for damages for the invasion of personal privacy?

[2] In July 2009, the appellant, Sandra Jones, discovered that the respondent, Winnie Tsige, had been surreptitiously looking at Jones' banking records. Tsige and Jones did not know each other despite the fact that they both worked for the same bank and Tsige had formed a common-law relationship with Jones' former husband. As a bank employee, Tsige had full access to Jones' banking information and, contrary to the bank's policy, looked into Jones' banking records at least 174 times over a period of four years.

[3] The central issue on this appeal is whether the motion judge erred by granting summary judgment and dismissing Jones' claim for damages on the ground that Ontario law does not recognize the tort of breach of privacy. Facts

[4] Jones and Tsige worked at different branches of the Bank of Montreal ("BMO"). Jones maintains her primary bank account there. Jones and Tsige did not know or work with each other. However, Tsige became involved in a relationship with Jones' former husband. For about four years, Tsige used her workplace computer to access Jones' personal BMO bank accounts at least 174 times. The information displayed included transactions details as well as personal information, such as date of birth, marital status and address. Tsige did not publish, distribute or record the information in any way.

[5] Jones became suspicious that Tsige was accessing her account and complained to BMO. When confronted by BMO, Tsige admitted that she had looked at Jones' banking information, that she had no legitimate reason for viewing the information and that she understood it was contrary to BMO's code of business conduct and ethics and her professional responsibility. Tsige explained then, and maintains in this action, that she was [page246] involved in a financial dispute with the appellant's former husband and accessed the accounts to confirm whether he was paying child support to the appellant. Jones does not accept that explanation as she says it is inconsistent with the timing and frequency of Tsige's snooping.

[6] Tsige has apologized for her actions and insists that she has ceased looking at Jones' banking information. Tsige is contrite and embarrassed by her actions. BMO disciplined Tsige by suspending her for one week without pay and denying her a bonus.

> [7] In her statement of claim, Jones asserts that her privacy interest in her confidential banking information has been "irreversibly destroyed" and claims damages of $70,000 for invasion of privacy and breach of fiduciary duty, and punitive and exemplary damages of $20,000. 1. Motions for summary judgment

[8] Jones proceeded under the simplified procedure of Rule 76 of the Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194 and moved for summary judgment. Tsige brought a cross-motion for summary judgment to dismiss the action.

[9] The motion judge found that Tsige did not owe Jones a fiduciary obligation and dismissed that claim. Jones has not appealed that finding.

[10] The motion judge then reviewed the jurisprudence concerning the existence of a tort of invasion of privacy. He observed that recent Superior Court decisions have refused to strike out such claims at the pleading stage and that some academic writing indicates that the tort may exist.

[11] The motion judge concluded, however, that the statement of Cronk J.A. in Euteneier v. Lee (2005), 77 O.R. (3d) 621, [2005] O.J. No. 3896 (C.A.), at para. 63, leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [2005] S.C.C.A. No. 516 is, in his words, "binding and dispositive of the question" of whether the tort of invasion of privacy exists at common law in Ontario. Euteneier concerned a lawsuit brought by a woman whose clothes were forcibly removed by police following her suicide attempt while she was detained in a holding cell. In considering whether the trial judge had accurately described the plaintiff's privacy and dignity interests, Cronk J.A. observed, at para. 63, "[the plaintiff] properly conceded in oral argument before this court that there is no 'free-standing' right to dignity or privacy under the Charter or at common law". [page247]

[12] The motion judge added that given the existence of privacy legislation protecting certain rights, any expansion of those rights should be dealt with by statute rather than common law.

[13] The motion judge dismissed Jones' motion for summary judgment and granted the motion brought by Tsige. He rejected Jones' submission that costs should be denied on the ground that the issue was novel and that Tsige's conduct was objectionable. The motion judge felt that Jones had pursued the litigation aggressively and failed to accept reasonable settlement offers. He awarded costs fixed at $35,000. Issues

> [14] Jones appeals to this court, raising the following issues:
> (1) Did the motion judge err in holding that Ontario law does not recognize a cause of action for invasion of privacy? (2) Did the motion judge err with respect to costs?

Issue 1. Does Ontario law recognize a cause of action for invasion of privacy?
(a) Introduction

[15] The question of whether the common law should recognize a cause of action in tort for invasion of privacy has been debated for the past 120 years. Aspects of privacy have long been protected by causes of action such as breach of confidence, defamation, breach of copyright, nuisance and various property rights. Although the individual's privacy interest is a fundamental value underlying such claims, the recognition of a distinct right of action for breach of privacy remains uncertain. As Adams J. stated in Ontario (Attorney General) v. Dieleman (1994), 20 O.R. (3d) 229, [1994] O.J. No. 1864, 117 D.L.R. (4th) 449 (Gen. Div.), at p. 688 D.L.R., after a comprehensive review of the case law, "invasion of privacy in Canadian common law continues to be an inceptive, if not ephemeral, legal concept, primarily operating to extend the margins of existing tort doctrine".

[16] Canadian, English and American courts and commentators almost invariably take the seminal articles of S.D. Warren and L.D. Brandeis, "The Right to Privacy" (1890), 4 Harv. L. Rev. 193 and William L. Prosser, "Privacy" (1960), 48 Cal. L. Rev. 383 as their starting point.

[17] Warren and Brandeis argued for the recognition of a right of privacy to meet the problems posed by technological and social [page248] change that saw "instantaneous photographs" and "newspaper enterprise" invade "the sacred precincts of private life" (at p. 195). They identified the "general right of the individual to be let alone", the right to "inviolate personality" (at p. 205), "the more general right to the immunity of the person" and "the right to one's personality" (at p. 207) as fundamental values underlying such well-known causes of action as breach of confidence, defamation and breach of copyright. They urged that open recognition of a right of privacy was well-supported by these underlying legal values and required to meet the changing demands of the society in which they lived.

[18] Professor Prosser's article picked up the threads of the American jurisprudence that had developed in the 70 years following the influential Warren and Brandeis article. Prosser argued that what had emerged from the hundreds of cases he canvassed was not one tort, but four, tied together by a common theme and name, but comprising different elements and protecting different interests. Prosser delineated a four-tort catalogue, summarized as follows, at p. 389:

> 1. Intrusion upon the plaintiff's seclusion or solitude, or into his private affairs.
> 2. Public disclosure of embarrassing private facts about the plaintiff.
>
> 3. Publicity which places the plaintiff in a false light in the public eye.
> 4. Appropriation, for the defendant's advantage, of the plaintiff's name or likeness.

[19] Most American jurisdictions now accept Prosser's classification and it has also been adopted by the Restatement (Second) of Torts (2010). The tort that is most relevant to this case, the tort of "intrusion upon seclusion", is described by the Restatement, at 652B as:

> One who intentionally intrudes, physically or otherwise, upon the seclusion of another or his private affairs or concerns, is subject to liability to the other for invasion of his privacy, if the invasion would be highly offensive to a reasonable person.

[20] The comment section of the Restatement elaborates this proposition and explains that the tort includes physical intrusions into private places as well as listening or looking, with or without mechanical aids, into the plaintiff's private affairs. Of particular relevance to this appeal is the observation that other non-physical forms of investigation or examination into private concerns may be actionable. These include opening private and personal mail or examining a private bank account, [page249] "even though there is no publication or other use of any kind" of the information obtained.

[21] If Jones has a right of action, it falls into Prosser's first category of intrusion upon seclusion. While I will make some reference to the fourth category of appropriation of the plaintiff's name or likeness in my discussion below, I will focus primarily on intrusion upon seclusion. I do so for two reasons. First, I accept Prosser's insight that the general right to privacy embraces four distinct torts, each with its own considerations and rules, and that confusion may result from a failure to maintain appropriate analytic distinctions between the categories. Second, as a court of law, we should restrict ourselves to the particular issues posed by the facts of the case before us and not attempt to decide more than is strictly necessary to decide that case. A cause of action of any wider breadth would not only over-reach what is necessary to resolve this case, but could also amount to an unmanageable legal proposition that would, as Prosser warned, breed confusion and uncertainty.

[22] The following discussion will examine whether the common law recognizes a cause of action for invasion of privacy. I will canvass case law from Ontario and other provinces and examine federal and provincial legislation relating to privacy. For completeness, I will also discuss the state of the law in foreign jurisdictions.
(b) Case law

[23] Reflecting on Canadian jurisprudence, Allen M. Linden and Bruce Feldthusen, Canadian Tort Law, 9th ed. (Toronto:
LexisNexis, 2011) observed, at p. 59, that "[w]e seem to be drifting closer to the American model". See, also, Colin H.H. McNairn and Alexander K. Scott, Privacy Law in Canada (Toronto:
Butterworths, 2001), at ch. 3; Barbara McIsaac, Rick Shields and Kris Klein, The Law of Privacy in Canada, looseleaf (Toronto: Carswell, 2000), at 2.4; Philip Osborne, The Law of Torts, 4th ed. (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2011), at pp. 267-71.

[24] My analysis of the case law supports the same conclusion: Ontario has already accepted the existence of a tort claim for appropriation of personality and, at the very least, remains open to the proposition that a tort action will lie for an intrusion upon seclusion.
(i) Ontario case law

[25] In Canada, there has been no definitive statement from an appellate court on the issue of whether there is a common law right of action corresponding to the intrusion on seclusion [page250] category. Ontario trial judges have, however, often refused to dismiss such claims at the pleading stage as disclosing no cause of action and some have awarded damages for claims based on violations of the right to be free of intrusion upon seclusion. The clear trend in the case law is, at the very least, to leave open the possibility that such a cause of action does exist.

[26] Saccone v. Orr (1981), 34 O.R. (2d) 317, [1981] O.J. No. 3132 (Co. Ct.), for example, involved the recording of a private conversation without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiff. The recording was then played at a municipal council meeting and a transcript of the conversation published in a local newspaper. Jacob Co. Ct. J. dismissed the defendant's argument against the existence of a tort of invasion of privacy, found in favour of the plaintiff and awarded damages of $500.

[27] Roth v. Roth (1991), 4 O.R. (3d) 740, [1991] O.J. No. 1301 (Gen. Div.) involved interference with the plaintiffs' ability to use and enjoy their cottage property. Mandel J. considered the application of several torts -- assault, battery, nuisance and trespass -- but found that the cumulative effect of the defendants' actions could best be described as an invasion of privacy. He rejected the contention that the common law did not allow for a claim for invasion of privacy and held, at p. 743 O.R., that the common law should not be confined to existing categories but must evolve. In recognizing the right of privacy, Mandel J. quoted a passage from a leading torts text indicating that liability for breach of privacy should only be imposed where the intrusion is substantial and would be regarded as offensive and intolerable to a person of reasonable sensitivity. He then stated, at p. 758 O.R., "whether the invasion of privacy of an individual will be actionable will depend on the circumstances of the particular case and the conflicting rights involved".

[28] A third trial judgment to award damages for breach of privacy falls under Prosser's fourth category of appropriation of the plaintiff's name or likeness. Athans v. Canadian Adventure Camps Ltd. (1977), 17 O.R. (2d) 425, [1977] O.J. No. 2417 (H.C.J.) involved a claim by an expert water-skier against a public relations firm that had copied a distinctive photograph of the plaintiff water skiing. Henry J. relied on Krouse v. Chrysler Canada Ltd. (1973), 1 O.R. (2d) 225, [1973] O.J. No. 2157 (C.A.), in which Estey J.A. had suggested that an action in tort for the appropriation of personality did exist under the common law of Ontario. Henry J. held that the plaintiff failed to make out the tort of passing off, but did have a claim for the tort of "appropriation of personality". The plaintiff recovered damages [page251] measured by the amount the plaintiff ought reasonably to have received in the market for permission to use his image.

[29] There are also several Ontario cases in which the trial judge refused to strike pleadings alleging the tort of invasion of privacy as disclosing no cause of action.

[30] Somwar v. McDonald's Restaurants of Canada Ltd. (2006), 79 O.R. (3d) 172, [2006] O.J. No. 64 (S.C.J.) contains perhaps the most coherent and definitive pronouncement in Ontario jurisprudence of the existence of a common law tort of invasion of privacy corresponding to the intrusion upon seclusion category. Somwar accused his employer, McDonald's Restaurants, of unlawfully invading his privacy by conducting a credit bureau check on him without his consent. The plaintiff claimed damages for invasion of privacy and for punitive damages. The defendant moved to strike the statement of claim and dismiss the plaintiff's action on the basis that it did not disclose a reasonable cause of action under rule 21.01(1)(b) of the Rules of Civil Procedure.

[31] Stinson J. reviewed the Ontario case law and observed that while the cases were not entirely consistent, even where the courts did not accept the existence of a privacy tort, they rarely went so far as to rule out the potential of such a tort. The body of case law, together with the recognition by the Supreme Court of Canada of the protection of privacy under s. 8 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, led him to conclude, at paras. 29 and 31:

> With advancements in technology, personal data of an individual can now be collected, accessed (properly and improperly) and disseminated more easily than ever before. There is a resulting increased concern in our society about the risk of unauthorized access to an individual's personal information. The traditional torts such as nuisance, trespass and harassment may not provide adequate protection against infringement of an individual's privacy interests. Protection of those privacy interests by providing a common law remedy for their violation would be consistent with Charter values and an "incremental revision" and logical extension of the existing jurisprudence. . . . . .

> Even if the plaintiff's claim for invasion of privacy were classified as "novel" (which, in any event, is not a proper basis for dismissing it), the foregoing analysis leads me to conclude that the time has come to recognize invasion of privacy as a tort in its own right. It therefore follows that it is neither plain nor obvious that the plaintiff's action cannot succeed on the basis that he has not pleaded a reasonable cause of action.

[32] Somwar was followed in Nitsopoulos v. Wong, [2008] O.J. No. 3498, 298 D.L.R. (4th) 265 (S.C.J.). See, also, Capan v. Capan, [1980] O.J. No. 1361, 14 C.C.L.T. 191 (H.C.J.); Lipiec v. Borsa, [1996] O.J. No. 3819, 31 C.C.L.T. (2d) 294 (Gen. Div.); [page252] Shred-Tech Corp. v. Viveen, [2006] O.J. No. 4893, 2006 CarswellOnt 7762 (S.C.J.), at para. 30. Compare Haskett v. Trans Union of Canada Inc., [2001] O.J. No. 4949, 10 C.C.L.T. (3d) 128 (S.C.J.).
(ii) Provincial case law

[33] While there appears to be no appellate decision from another province definitively establishing a common law right of action for intrusion upon seclusion, dicta in at least two cases support the idea. In Motherwell v. Motherwell, [1976] A.J. No. 555, 73 D.L.R. (3d) 62 (S.C. App. Div.), a case involving harassing telephone calls, the court held the plaintiff had a right of action in nuisance but added, at para. 25, that "the interests of our developing jurisprudence would be better served by approaching invasion of privacy by abuse of the telephone system as a new category, rather than seeking by rationalization to enlarge" the existing categories of nuisance.

[34] The issue in Dyne Holdings Ltd. v. Royal Insurance Co. of Canada, [1996] P.E.I.J. No. 28, 135 D.L.R. (4th) 142 (S.C. App. Div.), leave to appeal to S.C.C. refused [1996] S.C.C.A. No. 344, was an insurer's duty to defend. One aspect of the claim arguably amounted to an invasion of privacy akin to the category of intrusion upon exclusion. After a review of the jurisprudence, Carruthers C.J. observed, at p. 160 D.L.R.: "the courts in Canada are not far from recognizing a common law right to privacy if they have not already done so. It is also clear that Canadian courts do not hesitate to protect privacy interests under some recognized tort."
(iii) Euteneier v. Lee

[35] This brings me to Euteneier v. Lee, and the statement from the case that the motion judge here found to be dispositive. In my respectful view, the motion judge's reliance on Euteneier for the proposition Ontario law excludes any and all claims for breach of privacy interests was misplaced. The plaintiff in Euteneier had been arrested and detained on criminal charges. She complained of her treatment while in police custody and sought damages for negligence, assault, civil conspiracy and breach of her ss. 7, 9, 12 and 15 rights under the Charter. The trial judge found that based on the appellant's own behaviour while in custody, which included an apparent suicide attempt, the defendant police officers had conducted themselves in a reasonable and prudent manner. They had breached no duty nor exhibited any bad faith or malice to ground any of the claims she had asserted and the claim was dismissed. [page253]

[36] The plaintiff's first appeal was to the Divisional Court on account of the quantum of damages assessed by the trial judge: see Euteneier v. Lee, [2003] O.J. No. 4239, 113 C.R.R. (2d) 44 (Div. Ct.). The Divisional Court allowed the appeal in part. A new trial was ordered on the issue of whether, after disrobing the plaintiff to prevent her from continuing to use articles of clothing to hang herself, the police were negligent, committed assault or breached the plaintiff's Charter rights [at para. 42] "by confining her in the [holding cell] and by handcuffing her to its bars without taking steps to maintain her dignity or to prevent her humiliation".

[37] The defendants appealed the order for a new trial to this court and the plaintiff cross-appealed seeking a new trial on all issues. This court allowed the appeal and dismissed the cross-appeal. Cronk J.A., writing for the court, held that the Divisional Court had failed to apply the proper standard of review with respect to the trial judge's factual findings. Of particular significance to the point at issue on this appeal is Cronk J.A.'s observation, at paras. 47 and 56. She noted that the plaintiff did not plead that the defendants owed her any duty to maintain her dignity and prevent her humiliation, and that any reference to her dignity or privacy interests were as particulars of other causes of action or as the consequences she alleged flowed from the actions of the defendants. Cronk J.A. held that the Divisional Court had erred in treating those allegations as stand-alone causes of action.

[38] Accordingly, it is clear from the context and from the words used that the passage, at para. 63, relied on by the motion judge -- "[the plaintiff] properly conceded in oral argument before this court that there is no 'free standing' right to dignity or privacy under the Charter or at common law" -- could not have been intended to express any dispositive or definitive opinion as to the existence of a tort claim for breach of a privacy interest. No such claim had been advanced by the plaintiff, no argument on that point was addressed by counsel, and in my view, no opinion on that point was expressed by this court.

(c) Charter jurisprudence

[39] Charter jurisprudence identifies privacy as being worthy of constitutional protection and integral to an individual's relationship with the rest of society and the state. The Supreme Court of Canada has consistently interpreted the Charter's s. 8 protection against unreasonable search and seizure as protecting the underlying right to privacy. In Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, [1984] S.C.R. No. 36, at pp. 158-59 S.C.R., [page254] Dickson J. adopted the purposive method of Charter interpretation and observed that the interests engaged by s. 8 are not simply an extension of the concept of trespass, but rather are grounded in an independent right to privacy held by all citizens.

[40] In R. v. Dyment, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 417, [1988] S.C.J. No. 82, at p. 427 S.C.R., La Forest J. characterized the s. 8 protection of privacy as "[g]rounded in a man's physical and moral autonomy" and stated that "privacy is essential for the well-being of the individual. For this reason alone, it is worthy of constitutional protection, but it also has profound significance for the public order." La Forest J. added, at p. 429 S.C.R.:

> In modern society, especially, retention of information about oneself is extremely important. We may, for one reason or another, wish or be compelled to reveal such information, but situations abound where the reasonable expectations of the individual that the information shall remain confidential to the persons to whom, and restricted to the purposes for which it is divulged, must be protected.

[41] Charter jurisprudence has recognized three distinct privacy interests: Dyment, at pp. 428-29 S.C.R.; R. v. Tessling, [2004] 3 S.C.R. 432, [2004] S.C.J. No. 63, 2004 SCC 67, at paras. 19-23. The first two interests, personal privacy and territorial privacy, are deeply rooted in the common law. Personal privacy, grounded in the right to bodily integrity, protects "the right not to have our bodies touched or explored to disclose objects or matters we wish to conceal". Territorial privacy protects the home and other spaces where the individual enjoys a reasonable expectation of privacy. The third category, informational privacy, is the interest at stake in this appeal. In Tessling, Binnie J. described it, at para. 23:

> Beyond our bodies and the places where we live and work, however, lies the thorny question of how much information about ourselves and activities we are entitled to shield from the curious eyes of the state (R. v. S.A.B., [2003] 2 S.C.R. 678, 2003 SCC 60). This includes commercial information locked in a safe kept in a restaurant owned by the accused (R. v. Law, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 227, 2002 SCC 10, at para. 16). Informational privacy has been defined as "the claim of individuals, groups, or institutions to determine for themselves when, how, and to what extent information about them is communicated to others": A. F. Westin, Privacy and Freedom (1970), at p. 7. Its protection is predicated on the assumption that all information about a person is in a fundamental way his own, for him to communicate or retain . . . as he sees fit.

(1972), at p. 13).

[42] This characterization would certainly include Jones' claim to privacy in her banking records. [page255]

[43] In Hill v. Church of Scientology of Toronto (1995), 24 O.R. (3d) 865, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 1130, [1995] S.C.J. No. 64, Cory J. observed, at para. 121, that the right to privacy has been accorded constitutional protection and should be considered as a Charter value in the development of the common law tort of defamation. In Hill, Cory J. stated, at para. 121: "reputation is intimately related to the right to privacy which has been accorded constitutional protection". See, also, R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, [1995] S.C.J. No. 98, at para. 113, per L'Heureux-Dubé J.: identifying privacy as "an essential component of what it means to be 'free'".

[44] The Charter treatment of privacy accords with art. 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, G.A. Res. 271(III), UNGAOR, 3d Sess., Supp. No. 13, UN. Doc. A/810 (1948) 71, which provides that "[n]o one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, home or correspondence" and proclaims that "[e]veryone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks". Privacy is also recognized as a fundamental human right by art. 17 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 19 December 1966, 999 U.N.T.S. 171.

[45] While the Charter does not apply to common law disputes between private individuals, the Supreme Court has acted on several occasions to develop the common law in a manner consistent with Charter values: see R.W.D.S.U., Local 580 v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573, [1986] S.C.J. No. 75, at p. 603 S.C.R.; R. v. Salituro, [1991] 3 S.C.R. 654, [1991] S.C.J. No. 97, at pp. 666 and 675 S.C.R.; Hill v. Scientology, at p. 1169 S.C.R.; R.W.D.S.U., Local 558 v. Pepsi- Cola Canada Beverages (West) Ltd., [2002] 1 S.C.R. 156, [2002] S.C.J. No. 7, 2002 SCC 8; Grant v. Torstar Corp., [2009] 3 S.C.R. 640, [2009] S.C.J. No. 61, 2009 SCC 61.

[46] The explicit recognition of a right to privacy as underlying specific Charter rights and freedoms, and the principle that the common law should be developed in a manner consistent with Charter values, supports the recognition of a civil action for damages for intrusion upon the plaintiff's seclusion: see John D.R. Craig, "Invasion of Privacy and Charter Values: The Common-Law Tort Awakens" (1997), 42 McGill L.J. 355.
(d) Legislation
(i) Acts relating to private information

[47] The federal and Ontario governments have enacted a complex legislative framework addressing the issue of privacy. [page256] These include Personal Information Protection and Electronic Documents Act, S.C. 2000, c. 5 ("PIPEDA"); Personal Health Information Protection Act, 2004, S.O. 2004, c. 3, Sch. A; Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. F.31; Municipal Freedom of Information and Protection of Privacy Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. M.56; Consumer Reporting Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. C.33.

[48] Tsige argues that it is not open to this court to adapt the common law to deal with the invasion of privacy on the ground that privacy is already the subject of legislation in Ontario and Canada that reflects carefully considered economic and policy choices. It is submitted that expanding the reach of the common law in this area would interfere with these carefully crafted regimes and that any expansion of the law relating to the protection of privacy should be left to Parliament and the legislature.

[49] I am not persuaded that the existing legislation provides a sound basis for this court to refuse to recognize the emerging tort of intrusion upon seclusion and deny Jones a remedy. In my view, it would take a strained interpretation to infer from these statutes a legislative intent to supplant or halt the development of the common law in this area: see Robyn Bell, "Tort of Invasion of Privacy -- Has its Time Finally Come?" in Archibald and Cochrane, eds., Annual Review of Civil Litigation (Toronto: Carswell, 2005), at p. 225.

[50] PIPEDA is federal legislation dealing with "organizations" subject to federal jurisdiction and does not speak to the existence of a civil cause of action in the province. While BMO is subject to PIPEDA, there are at least three reasons why, in my view, Jones should not be restricted to the remedy of a PIPEDA complaint against BMO. First, Jones would be forced to lodge a complaint against her own employer rather than against Tsige, the wrongdoer. Second, Tsige acted as a rogue employee contrary to BMO's policy and that may provide BMO with a complete answer to the complaint. Third, the remedies available under PIPEDA do not include damages, and it is difficult to see what Jones would gain from such a complaint.

[51] The Ontario legislation essentially deals with freedom of information and the protection of certain private information with respect to government and other public institutions. Like PIPEDA, it has nothing to do with private rights of action between individuals.
(ii) Provincial Privacy Acts

[53] Under Quebec law, the right to privacy is explicitly protected both by arts. 3 and 35-37 of the Civil Code of Québec, S.Q. 1991, c. 64 and by s. 5 of the Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms, R.S.Q. c. C-12. See Robbins v. Canadian Broadcasting Corp. (1957), 12 D.L.R. (2d) 35(Que. S.C.); Aubry v. Éditions Vice-Versa, [1998] 1 S.C.R. 591, [1998] S.C.J. No. 30; H. Patrick Glenn, "The Right to Privacy in Quebec Law" in Dale Gibson, ed., Aspects of Privacy Law: Essays in Honour of John M. Sharp (Toronto: Butterworths, 1980), at ch. 3.

[54] Significantly, however, no provincial legislation provides a precise definition of what constitutes an invasion of privacy. The courts in provinces with a statutory tort are left with more or less the same task as courts in provinces without such statutes. The nature of these acts does not indicate that we are faced with a situation where sensitive policy choices and decisions are best left to the legislature. To the contrary, existing provincial legislation indicates that when the legislatures have acted, they have simply proclaimed a sweeping right to privacy and left it to the courts to define the contours of that right.

(e) Other jurisdictions
(i) United States

[55] As already indicated, most American states have recognized a right of action for invasion of privacy rights as defined by the four categories identified by Prosser and now adopted by the Restatement.

> [56] Generally speaking, to make out cause of action for intrusion upon seclusion, a plaintiff must show (1) an unauthorized intrusion; (2) that the intrusion was highly offensive to the reasonable person; (3) the matter intruded upon was private; and [page258] (4) the intrusion caused anguish and suffering. See William Prosser, Law of Torts, 4th ed. (West Publishing Company, 1971), at pp. 808-12.

[57] The first element indicates that the tort focuses on the act of intrusion, as opposed to dissemination or publication of information: Roe v. Cheyenne Mt. Conf. Resort, Inc., 124 F.3d 1221 (10th Cir. 1997), at p. 1236 F.3d. The focus of the court in determining whether this element is satisfied is on "the type of interest involved and not the place where the invasion occurs": Evans v. Detlefsen, 857 F.2d 330 (6th Cir. 1988), at p. 338 F.2d.

[58] With regard to the second element, factors to be considered in determining whether a particular action is highly offensive include the degree of intrusion, the context, conduct and circumstances of the intrusion, the tortfeasor's motives and objectives and the expectations of those whose privacy is invaded: see J.D. Lee and Barry A. Lindahl, Modern Tort Law: Liability & Litigation, 2nd ed., looseleaf (West Group, 2002), at 48:6.

[59] In determining the third element, the plaintiff must establish that the expectation of seclusion or solitude was objectively reasonable. The courts have adopted the two-prong test used in the application of the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution. The first step is demonstrating an actual subjective expectation of privacy, and the second step asks if that expectation is objectively reasonable: Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347, 88 S. Ct. 507 (1967), at p. 361 U.S.

[60] The fourth element has received considerably less attention as anguish and suffering are generally presumed once the first three elements have been established.
(ii) Commonwealth jurisdictions

[61] In England, privacy is expressly protected by art. 8 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 4 November 1950, 213 U.N.T.S. 221 at 223, incorporated by the Human Rights Act 1998 (U.K.), 1998 c. 42:
"Everyone has the right to respect for his private and family life, his home and his correspondence." However, the House of Lords held in Wainwright v. Home Office, [2003] UKHL 53, [2003] 4 All E.R. 969 (H.L.), at para. 31, that while privacy may be "a value which underlies the existence of a rule of law (and may point the direction in which the law should develop)", privacy is not "a principle of law in itself" capable of supporting a private law right if action for damages. Yet the next year, in Campbell v. MGN Ltd., [2004] UKHL 22, [2004] 2 A.C. 457 (H.L.), the House of Lords granted an injunction to restrain on grounds of breach [page259] of confidence publication of newspaper stories and photographs of a supermodel leaving a drug addiction treatment facility. Lord Hoffman held, in Campbell, at para. 51, that the tort of breach of confidence had evolved into a form of privacy protection, described by the court as a tort of misuse of private information:

> [T]he new approach takes a different view of the underlying value which the law protects. Instead of the cause of action being based upon the duty of good faith applicable to confidential personal information and trade secrets alike, it focuses upon the protection of human autonomy and dignity
> -- the right to control the dissemination of information about one's private life and the right to the esteem and respect of people.

[62] The reformulated action for breach of confidence has been held to embrace damages claims to protect privacy interests that would easily fall within the intrusion upon seclusion category: see Mosely v. News Group Newspapers Ltd., [2008] EWHC 1777, [2008] All E.R. (D) 322 (Q.B.), at para. 7: "[t]he law now affords protection to information in respect of which there is a reasonable expectation of privacy, even in circumstances where there is no pre-existing relationship giving rise of itself to an enforceable duty of confidence".

> [63] In Lenah Game Meats Pty Ltd v. Australian Broadcasting Corp., [2001] H.C.A. 63, 185 A.L.R. 1 (H.C. Aust.), the High Court of Australia expressly left the door open to the recognition of a common law right to privacy despite earlier authority to the contrary. This was applied in Grosse v. Purvis, [2003] Q.D.C. 151, Aust. Torts Reports 81-706, where the elements for the tort were found to be (1) a willed act by the defendant; (2) which intrudes upon the privacy or seclusion of the plaintiff; (3) in a manner which would be considered highly offensive to a reasonable person of ordinary sensibilities; and (4) which causes the plaintiff detriment in the form of mental, psychological or emotional harm or distress or which prevents or hinders the plaintiff from doing an act which she is lawfully entitled to do.

[64] In Hosking v. Runting, [2004] NZCA 34, [2005] 1 NZLR 1 (C.A.), the New Zealand Court of Appeal recognized a common law tort of breach of privacy that is separate and distinct from the tort of breach of confidence. Although the court dismissed the claim on the merits, the majority judgment confirmed the existence of a privacy tort in New Zealand dealing with wrongful [page260] publication of private facts to address publicity that is (at para. 126) "truly humiliating and distressful or otherwise harmful". The elements of the tort were described, at para. 117:

> 1. The existence of facts in respect of which there is a reasonable expectation of privacy; and

2012 ONCA 32 (CanLII)

2. Publicity given to those private facts must be considered highly offensive to an objective reasonable person. 2. Defining the tort of intrusion upon seclusion
(a) Introduction

[65] In my view, it is appropriate for this court to confirm the existence of a right of action for intrusion upon seclusion. Recognition of such a cause of action would amount to an incremental step that is consistent with the role of this court to develop the common law in a manner consistent with the changing needs of society.
(b) Rationale

[66] The case law, while certainly far from conclusive, supports the existence of such a cause of action. Privacy has long been recognized as an important underlying and animating value of various traditional causes of action to protect personal and territorial privacy. Charter jurisprudence recognizes privacy as a fundamental value in our law and specifically identifies, as worthy of protection, a right to informational privacy that is distinct from personal and territorial privacy. The right to informational privacy closely tracks the same interest that would be protected by a cause of action for intrusion upon seclusion. Many legal scholars and writers who have considered the issue support recognition of a right of action for breach of privacy: see, e.g., P. Winfield, "Privacy" (1931), 47 Law Q. Rev. 23; D. Gibson, "Common Law Protection of Privacy: What to do Until the Legislators Arrive" in Lewis Klar, ed., Studies in Canadian Tort Law (Toronto: Butterworths, 1977) 343; Robyn M. Ryan Bell, "Tort of Invasion of Privacy -- Has its Time Finally Come?" in Todd Archibald and Michael Cochrane, eds., Annual Review of Civil Litigation (Toronto: Carswell, 2005) 225; Peter Burns, "The Law and Privacy: The Canadian Experience" (1976), 54 Can. Bar Rev. 1; John D.R. Craig, "Invasion of Privacy and Charter Values: The Common-Law Tort Awakens" (1997), 52 McGill L.J. 355.

[67] For over 100 years, technological change has motivated the legal protection of the individual's right to privacy. In modern times, the pace of technological change has accelerated exponentially. Legal scholars such as Peter Burns have written [page261] of "the pressing need to preserve 'privacy' which is being threatened by science and technology to the point of surrender": "The Law and Privacy: the Canadian Experience", at p. 1. See, also, Alan Westin, Privacy and Freedom (New York:
Atheneum, 1967). The Internet and digital technology have brought an enormous change in the way we communicate and in our capacity to capture, store and retrieve information. As the facts of this case indicate, routinely kept electronic databases render our most personal financial information vulnerable. Sensitive information as to our health is similarly available, as are records of the books we have borrowed or bought, the movies we have rented or downloaded, where we have shopped, where we have travelled and the nature of our communications by cellphone, e-mail or text message.

[68] It is within the capacity of the common law to evolve to respond to the problem posed by the routine collection and aggregation of highly personal information that is readily accessible in electronic form. Technological change poses a novel threat to a right of privacy that has been protected for hundreds of years by the common law under various guises and that, since 1982 and the Charter, has been recognized as a right that is integral to our social and political order.

[69] Finally, and most importantly, we are presented in this case with facts that cry out for a remedy. While Tsige is apologetic and contrite, her actions were deliberate, prolonged and shocking. Any person in Jones' position would be profoundly disturbed by the significant intrusion into her highly personal information. The discipline administered by Tsige's employer was governed by the principles of employment law and the interests of the employer and did not respond directly to the wrong that had been done to Jones. In my view, the law of this province would be sadly deficient if we were required to send Jones away without a legal remedy.
(c) Elements

[70] I would essentially adopt as the elements of the action for intrusion upon seclusion the Restatement (Second) of Torts (2010) formulation which, for the sake of convenience, I repeat here:

> One who intentionally intrudes, physically or otherwise, upon the seclusion of another or his private affairs or concerns, is subject to liability to the other for invasion of his privacy, if the invasion would be highly offensive to a reasonable person.

[71] The key features of this cause of action are, first, that the defendant's conduct must be intentional, within which I would [page262] include reckless; second, that the defendant must have invaded, without lawful justification, the plaintiff's private affairs or concerns; and third, that a reasonable person would regard the invasion as highly offensive causing distress, humiliation or anguish. However, proof of harm to a recognized economic interest is not an element of the cause of action. I return below to the question of damages, but state here that I believe it important to emphasize that given the intangible nature of the interest protected, damages for intrusion upon seclusion will ordinarily be measured by a modest conventional sum.
(d) Limitations

[72] These elements make it clear that recognizing this cause of action will not open the floodgates. A claim for intrusion upon seclusion will arise only for deliberate and significant invasions of personal privacy. Claims from individuals who are sensitive or unusually concerned about their privacy are excluded: it is only intrusions into matters such as one's financial or health records, sexual practises and orientation, employment, diary or private correspondence that, viewed objectively on the reasonable person standard, can be described as highly offensive.

> [73] Finally, claims for the protection of privacy may give rise to competing claims. Foremost are claims for the protection of freedom of expression and freedom of the press. As we are not confronted with such a competing claim here, I need not consider the issue in detail. Suffice it to say, no right to privacy can be absolute and many claims for the protection of privacy will have to be reconciled with, and even yield to, such competing claims. A useful analogy may be found in the Supreme Court of Canada's elaboration of the common law of defamation in Grant v. Torstar where the court held, at para. 65, that "[w]hen proper weight is given to the constitutional value of free expression on matters of public interest, the balance tips in favour of broadening the defences available to those who communicate facts it is in the public's interest to know." 3. Damages

[74] As I have indicated, proof of actual loss is not an element of the cause of action for intrusion upon seclusion. However, the question necessarily arises: what is the appropriate approach to damages in cases, like the present, where the plaintiff has suffered no pecuniary loss? [page263]

[75] Where the plaintiff has suffered no provable pecuniary loss, the damages fall into the category of what Professor Stephen M. Waddams, The Law of Damages, looseleaf (Toronto: Canada Law Book, 2011), at para. 10.50, describes as "symbolic" and others have labelled as "moral" damages: see Dulude v. Canada, [2000] F.C.J. No. 1454, 192 D.L.R. (4th) 714 (C.A.), at para. 30. They are awarded "to vindicate rights or symbolize recognition of their infringement": Waddams, at para. 10.50. I agree with Prof. Waddams' observation that a conventional range of damages is necessary to maintain "consistency, predictability and fairness between one plaintiff and another".

[76] Guidance in determining an appropriate range of damages can be gleaned from existing case law from Ontario as well as from the provinces where there is a statutory cause of action.
(b) Damages under Ontario case law

[77] Although the tort of intrusion upon exclusion has not been fully recognized in Ontario law, several cases award damages for invasion of privacy in conjunction with, or under the head of, a traditional tort such as nuisance or trespass. These claims typically involve intangible harm such as hurt feelings, embarrassment or mental distress, rather than damages for pecuniary losses. I attach, as Appendix A, a summary of these cases and the damages awarded and will briefly discuss the facts of some of those cases here.

[78] In Saccone v. Orr, the court found that the proven damages were minimal; the plaintiff had not lost his job or suffered any material loss. However, acknowledging that the plaintiff's privacy was invaded and that he was embarrassed and felt that his confidence had been betrayed, the court awarded damages in the amount of $500. Similarly, in Provincial Partitions Inc. v. Ashcor Inplant Structures Ltd., [1993] O.J. No. 4685, 50 C.P.R. (3d) 497 (Gen. Div.), the judge found that the defendant committed the tort of nuisance by invasion of privacy through abuse of telephone communications when they called the plaintiff, a competitor company, dozens of times. The judge awarded only $500 against each defendant and because the defendants had already ceased placing the phone calls, the judge declined to provide injunctive relief.

[79] In Roth v. Roth, the plaintiff claimed $100,000 in damages for intimidation, harassment and invasion of privacy, in addition to approximately $400,000 in additional damages for other tortious acts. The judge found that because the various causes of action overlapped, damages were best addressed as a lump sum and that the plaintiff was entitled to aggravated [page264] damages. Despite the lack of evidence of actual physical or psychological harm, the plaintiff was awarded the sum of $20,000.

[80] MacKay v. Buelow, [1995] O.J. No. 867, 24 C.C.L.T. (2d) 184 (Gen. Div.) involved a family law dispute in which the defendant had harassed his ex-wife over a period of four months. He continuously called her, stalked her on several occasions, threatened to kill her and threatened to kidnap their child and take her to another country. The trial judge found that the plaintiff was entitled to a remedy for the [at para. 17] "calculated, devilishly creative and entirely reprehensible conduct by the defendant" and awarded $25,000 general damages, $15,000 aggravated damages, $15,000 punitive damages, together with special damages and a significant award for the future medical care she would require.

(c) Damages under provincial legislation

[81] The four provincial privacy acts do not require proof of damage as an element of the cause of action. The Manitoba Privacy Act, however, is the only statute that provides specific guidance with regard to the determination of damages:

Considerations in awarding damages

> 4(2) In awarding damages in an action for a violation of privacy of a person, the court shall have regard to all the circumstances of the case including
> > (a) the nature, incidence and occasion of the act, conduct or publication constituting the violation of privacy of that person;
> >
> > (b) the effect of the violation of privacy on the health, welfare, social, business or financial position of that person or his family;
> >
> > (c) any relationship, whether domestic or otherwise, between the parties to the action;
> >
> > (d) any distress, annoyance or embarrassment suffered by that person or his family arising from the violation of privacy; and
> > (e) the conduct of that person and the defendant, both before and after the commission of the violation of privacy, including any apology or offer of amends made by the defendant.

[82] The other provincial statutes leave this determination to judicial discretion. The case law, however, demonstrates that courts frequently consider the same factors enumerated in the Manitoba Act. Appendix B contains a summary of these cases, mostly from British Columbia.

[83] Absent proof of actual pecuniary loss, the awards are, for the most part, modest. For example, in Heckert v. 5470 Investments Ltd., [2008] B.C.J. No. 1854, 2008 BCSC 1298, 299 D.L.R. (4th) 689, [page265] the judge noted [at para. 148] that the only evidence regarding damages were "Ms. Heckert's general statements that she felt stressed and needed to see her chiropractor and acupuncturist for additional visits". The judge still found that Ms. Heckert's landlord had invaded her privacy by installing close imaging cameras in the hallway outside of her door, but that the lack of medical evidence meant that the award could be not more than nominal damages of $3,500.

and after discovering she was perpetrating fraud against her company, reported this to her employer. The plaintiff claimed general damages for emotional pain and suffering, loss of enjoyment of life and diminution of her reputation as well as punitive or exemplary damages for the invasion of privacy. In assessing the quantum of damages, the judge considered the degree to which the plaintiff's life was destroyed following the invasion of privacy -- notably the termination of her employment, the need to seek psychological care for depression and post-traumatic stress disorder -- and weighed this against the plaintiff's own misconduct. The judge awarded [at para. 68] $30,000, including aggravated damages for the "substantial degree of suffering experienced by the plaintiff".

[85] The benchmark case for exemplary or punitive damages for an invasion of privacy under the British Columbia regime is Malcolm v. Fleming, [2000] B.C.J. No. 2400, 2000 CarswellBC 1316 (S.C.). The defendant, the plaintiff's landlord, installed a video camera in the plaintiff's apartment and recorded her in various stages of undress in her bathroom and bedroom. The judge awarded punitive damages of $35,000 in addition to $15,000 in general damages. In determining the figure for punitive damages the judge considered such factors as the intimate location of the invasion, the relationship between the parties as landlord and tenant as having a high expectation of privacy, the substantial premeditation and planning, the additional humiliation of discovery prior to trial, the fact that a permanent record of the violation existed creating the potential for future embarrassment and the fact that there was no other means of punishment as there was no criminal act perpetrated.

[86] Other cases have awarded punitive damages in consideration of society's abhorrence of the defendant's actions, a lack of remorse on the part of the defendant and the desire to promote specific deterrence: see [page266] Watts v. Klaemt; Lee v. Jacobson; Weber v. Jacobson, [1992] B.C.J. No. 132, 87 D.L.R. (4th) 401 (S.C.), revd [1994] B.C.J. No. 2459, 120 D.L.R. (4th) 155 (C.A.). In Hollinsworth v. BCTV, a division of Westcom TV Group Ltd., [1996] B.C.J. No. 2638, 34 C.C.L.T. (2d) 95 (S.C.), affd [1998] B.C.J. No. 241, 1998 B.C.C.A. 304 (C.A.), for example, the court assessed the plaintiff's damages for both breach of confidentiality and for the invasion of privacy at $15,000. The court there noted, at para. 27 (S.C.), that these damages were higher than usual for breaches of the Privacy Act in consideration of the "reprehensible conduct" of the defendant. In Hollinsworth, the defendant lied to a reporter, saying that he had consent to use a videotape of the plaintiff undergoing surgery to treat baldness. The video was then aired during a news broadcast.

(d) Determining the quantum of damages

> [87] In my view, damages for intrusion upon seclusion in cases where the plaintiff has suffered no pecuniary loss should be modest but sufficient to mark the wrong that has been done. I would fix the range at up to $20,000. The factors identified in the Manitoba Privacy Act, which, for convenience, I summarize again here, have also emerged from the decided cases and provide a useful guide to assist in determining where in the range the case falls:
> (1) the nature, incidence and occasion of the defendant's wrongful act; (2) the effect of the wrong on the plaintiff's health, welfare, social, business or financial position; (3) any relationship, whether domestic or otherwise, between the parties; (4) any distress, annoyance or embarrassment suffered by the plaintiff arising from the wrong; and (5) the conduct of the parties, both before and after the wrong, including any apology or offer of amends made by the defendant.

[88] I would neither exclude nor encourage awards of aggravated and punitive damages. I would not exclude such awards as there are bound to be exceptional cases calling for exceptional remedies. However, I would not encourage such awards as, in my view, predictability and consistency are paramount values in an area where symbolic or moral damages are awarded and absent truly exceptional circumstances, plaintiffs should be held to the range I have identified. [page267] 3. Application to this case

[89] It is my view that, in this case, Tsige committed the tort of intrusion upon seclusion when she repeatedly examined the private bank records of Jones. These acts satisfy the elements laid out above: the intrusion was intentional, it amounted to an unlawful invasion of Jones' private affairs, it would be viewed as highly offensive to the reasonable person and caused distress, humiliation or anguish.

[90] In determining damages, there are a number of factors to consider. Favouring a higher award is the fact that Tsige's actions were deliberate and repeated and arose from a complex web of domestic arrangements likely to provoke strong feelings and animosity. Jones was understandably very upset by the intrusion into her private financial affairs. On the other hand, Jones suffered no public embarrassment or harm to her health, welfare, social, business or financial position and Tsige has apologized for her conduct and made genuine attempts to make amends. On balance, I would place this case at the mid- point of the range I have identified and award damages in the amount of $10,000. Tsige's intrusion upon Jones' seclusion, this case does not, in my view, exhibit any exceptional quality calling for an award of aggravated or punitive damages.

Issue 2. Did the motion judge err with respect to costs?

[91] As I would set aside the judgment in favour of Tsige and grant judgment in favour of Jones, it is not necessary for me to consider Jones' contention that the motion judge erred in his costs award. Disposition

[92] Accordingly, I would allow the appeal, set aside the summary judgment dismissing the action and in its place substitute an order granting summary judgment in Jones' favour for damages in the amount of $10,000.

[93] Both parties have filed bills of costs asking for significant awards. In my view, it is appropriate to take into account the novel issue raised by this case which has clearly broken new ground. There is discretion to depart from the usual order in cases of novelty. In my view, in the unusual circumstances of this case, the parties should bear their own costs throughout and I would make no order as to costs.

Appeal allowed. [page268] Appendix A: Ontario damage awards

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR QUEBEC

Expropriation — Contestation of the right to expropriate — Bad faith of the expropriating party — Burden of proof — Code of Civil Procedure, art. 777.

Municipal law — Validity of a by-law disputed by incidental arguments — Statutory right of a municipality to expropriate — Cities and Towns Act, R.S.Q. 1964, c. 193, ss. 411, 605.

Appellant is contesting the right to expropriate of respondent (the "Town"), which passed a by-law ordering the expropriation of his land for purposes of a municipal park and offering him an indemnity of one dollar. The land is a shale quarry covering forty arpents located approximately three miles from the centre of the Town of Boucherville. On December 7, 1965, the Town issued a permit for appellant to work this quarry but made it subject to a number of conditions, inter alia that the Town could take 10,000 tons of stone free of charge and that appellant would transfer the part of his lot that was used as a quarry to the Town for $1. The Town did in fact take the specified quantity of stone free of charge, but appellant refused to transfer his quarry. On March 1, 1966 the municipal council passed a resolution requiring appellant to sign the contract transferring the quarry to the Town. At the same time counsel for the Town were authorized to take the necessary measures to stop the quarrying of stone until appellant had signed the contract. On April 19, 1966 the municipal council adopted a by-law ordering that part of lot 167, namely appellant's land, be homologated for purposes of a park. On August 9, 1966 the municipal council passed a resolution ordering "that appropriate legal proceedings be taken regarding the operation of a quarry [belonging to appellant] . . . and that if existing by-laws are insufficient for this purpose, a recommendation be made to this Council without delay". Finally, on December 6, 1966 the contested expropriation by-law was passed. The Superior Court judge concluded that the Town had expropriated appellant not for the reason put forward but solely to prevent him from operating his quarry, and

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DU QUÉBEC

Expropriation — Contestation du droit à l'expropriation — Mauvaise foi de l'expropriante — Fardeau de la preuve — Code de procédure civile, art. 777.

Droit municipal — Validité d'un règlement attaquée par moyens incidents — Droit statutaire d'une municipalité à l'expropriation — Loi des cités et villes, S.R.Q. 1964, c. 193, art. 411, 605.

L'appelant conteste le droit à l'expropriation de l'intimée (la «Ville») qui a décrété, par règlement, l'expropriation de son terrain pour fin de parc municipal et lui a offert un dollar comme indemnité. Le terrain est une carrière de schiste de quarante arpents située à environ trois milles du centre de la ville de Boucherville. La Ville avait émis à l'appelant, le 7 décembre 1965, un permis pour en extraire de la pierre mais en l'assujettissant à certaines conditions, entre autres, qu'elle puisse prélever gratuitement 10,000 tonnes de pierre et que l'appelant lui cède pour le prix de $1 la partie du lot servant de carrière. La Ville a effectivement prélevé gratuitement la quantité de pierre prévue mais l'appelant a refusé de céder sa carrière. Le 1er mars 1966, le conseil municipal, par résolution, requiert l'appelant de signer le contrat cédant la carrière à la Ville. En même temps, les avocats de la Ville reçoivent mandat de prendre les mesures nécessaires pour arrêter l'extraction de la pierre jusqu'à ce que l'appelant ait signé le contrat. Le 19 avril 1966, le conseil municipal adopte un règlement décrétant l'homologation pour fin de parc d'une partie du lot 167, soit le terrain de l'appelant. Le 9 août 1966, le conseil municipal décrète par résolution «que des procédures légales appropriées soient prises relativement à l'exploitation d'une carrière [de l'appelant] . . . et s'il y a insuffisance de règlement à cet effet, qu'une recommandation soit faite à ce conseil sans délai». Enfin, le 6 décembre 1966 le règlement d'expropriation contesté est adopté. Le juge de la Cour supérieure a conclu que la Ville n'avait pas exproprié l'appelant pour la raison invoquée mais uniquement pour l'empêcher d'exploiter sa carrière et qu'ainsi elle avait agi de mauvaise foi et abusé de son had thus acted in bad faith and abused its power: he found in favour of appellant and quashed the by-law. The Court of Appeal reversed the judgment on the ground that the expropriated party, on whom the burden of proof rested, had failed to establish fraud and flagrant injustice. Hence the appeal to this Court.

Held: The appeal should be allowed.

The trial judge made no error of law and drew no incorrect conclusions from the facts when he decided that the resolutions passed by the Town, and the content of these resolutions, showed clearly that the Town's bad faith was such as to be the equivalent of a fraud upon the party concerned. It may be added that while the resolutions and by-laws passed by the municipal council clearly condemn the Town, this condemnation is confirmed by the other circumstances. There is no legislation permitting the Town to make the issuing of a permit to operate the quarry conditional upon appellant's transferring his land to the Town. Since the wrongful and unjust conduct of the Town with regard to appellant prior to the adoption of the expropriation by-law had been proved, it was up to the Town to prove a subsequent change, which it did not do. On the contrary, in its efforts to acquire appellant's property for $1, the Town continued to act in bad faith since its valuation was clearly unfair and disregarded a recognized legal principle that the indemnity must be calculated on the basis of the value to the owner, not the value to the expropriating party. Appellant did not have to demonstrate that the Town did not intend to use the quarry as a park. Once the initial bad faith was proved, it vitiated and nullified the Town's actions regardless of the intentions that the Town may eventually have formed in order to attain its objectives. We are dealing with a cause of nullity that transcends the others and vitiates whatever it produces.

The argument that a municipal by-law can be nullified only by a petition to quash, as provided by s. 411 of the Cities and Towns Act, cannot be allowed. Section 411 creates an additional but not an exclusive remedy. It is also possible to dispute the validity of a municipal by-law on defence or by incidental arguments, such as the contestation of the right to expropriate in the case at bar. Finally, the Town's statutory right to expropriate under s. 605 of the Cities and Towns Act is not an absolute right. It may be contested, as in the case at bar, if the expropriating party commits abuses that vitiate the substance of its decisions.

pouvoir: il a maintenu la contestation et annulé le règlement. La Cour d'appel a infirmé le jugement pour le motif que l'exproprié, sur qui reposait le fardeau de la preuve, n'avait pas établi la fraude et l'injustice flagrante. D'où le pourvoi en cette Cour.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi doit être accueilli.

Le juge de première instance n'a pas fait d'erreur de droit et il n'a pas non plus tiré des faits des conclusions erronées lorsqu'il a décidé que les résolutions adoptées par la Ville et leur contenu montraient clairement que la mauvaise foi de la Ville était telle qu'elle équivalait à une fraude envers l'intéressé. On peut ajouter que si les résolutions et règlements du conseil municipal condamnent explicitement la Ville, les autres circonstances confirment cette condamnation. Aucun texte de loi ne permettait à la Ville d'imposer comme condition à la délivrance d'un permis pour l'exploitation de la carrière, que l'appelant lui cède son terrain. La preuve ayant été faite du comportement abusif et injuste de la Ville à l'égard de l'appelant avant l'adoption du règlement d'expropriation, il incombait à la Ville de prouver que les choses auraient changé par la suite, ce qu'elle n'a pas fait. Au contraire, en cherchant à obtenir la propriété de l'appelant pour la somme de $1, la Ville continue à agir de mauvaise foi, puisque son évaluation n'est pas, à sa face, honnête et méconnaît un principe de droit reconnu selon lequel l'indemnité doit être calculée d'après la valeur pour le propriétaire et non la valeur pour l'expropriant. L'appelant n'avait pas à démontrer que la Ville n'avait pas l'intention d'utiliser la carrière pour fin de parc. La mauvaise foi initiale ayant été prouvée, elle viciait les actes de la Ville et entraînait leur nullité abstraction faite des intentions que la Ville a finalement pu former pour atteindre ses fins. Il s'agit d'une cause de nullité qui transcende les autres et qui vicie ce qui en découle.

L'argument selon lequel un règlement municipal peut être attaqué en nullité uniquement par requête en cassation tel que prévu à l'art. 411 de la Loi des cités et villes ne peut être retenu. L'article 411 crée un recours supplémentaire mais non exclusif. Il est également possible d'attaquer la validité d'un règlement municipal en défense ou par des moyens incidents, comme en l'espèce par la contestation du droit d'expropriation. Enfin le droit statutaire d'expropriation de la Ville, en vertu de l'art. 605 de la Loi des cités et villes, n'est pas un droit absolu. Il peut être contesté, comme on l'a fait en l'espèce, si l'expropriant commet des abus qui vicient le fond de sa décision.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal of Quebec reversing a judgment of the Superior Court. Appeal allowed.

Viateur Bergeron, Q.C., and Richard Gaudreau, for the appellant.

Yvon Denault, for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

BEETZ J.—The issue is whether respondent committed an abuse of power in expropriating appellant's land. The case also raises both procedural and jurisdictional questions.

By-law No. 533 ordering expropriation of this land for purposes of a municipal park was adopted on December 6, 1966 by resolution No. 66-906 of the municipal council of the Town of Boucherville. The notice of expropriation estimated the value of the expropriated immovable (part of lot 167) at one dollar; this was the amount of the indemnity offered to the expropriated party by the expropriating party.

Lucien Landreville contested "the right to expropriate" under art. 777 C.C.P., pleading inter alia that:

[TRANSLATION] Under the pretext of exercising a statutory right specifically granted to cities and towns under ss. 605 et seq. of the Cities and Towns Act, namely the right to expropriate for municipal purposes, the expropriating municipality in its notice of expropriation falsely and unlawfully alleged its desire to acquire the property of the expropriated party for purposes of a municipal park, when in fact it wished to acquire the said property not for municipal purposes but solely with the objective of putting an end to the operation of a POURVOI à l'encontre d'un arrêt de la Cour d'appel du Québec infirmant un jugement de la Cour supérieure. Pourvoi accueilli.

Viateur Bergeron, c.r., et Richard Gaudreau, pour l'appelant.

Yvon Denault, pour l'intimée.

Le jugement de la Cour a été rendu par

LE JUGE BEETZ—Il faut décider si, en expropriant le terrain de l'appelant, l'intimée a commis un abus de pouvoir. La cause soulève également des questions de procédure et de juridiction.

Le règlement n° 533, décrétant l'expropriation de ce terrain pour fin de parc municipal, a été adopté le 6 décembre 1966 par la résolution n° 66-906 du conseil municipal de la ville de Boucherville. L'avis d'expropriation estime à un dollar la valeur de l'immeuble exproprié (partie du lot 167); c'est l'indemnité que l'expropriante offre à l'exproprié.

Lucien Landreville a contesté «le droit à l'expropriation» suivant l'art. 777 C.p.c. Il plaide entre autres que

Sous prétexte d'exercer un droit statutaire spécifiquement reconnu aux cités et villes, en vertu des articles 605 et suivants de la Loi des cités et villes, soit celui d'exproprier pour fins municipales, la Municipalité Expropriante à l'occasion de son avis d'expropriation, allègue faussement et illégalement vouloir acquérir la propriété de l'Exproprié pour fins de parc municipal alors qu'en réalité elle désire acquérir ladite propriété non pas pour fins municipales mais plutôt dans le seul et unique but de mettre fin à l'exploitation d'une carrière quarry located on it, more specifically, a shale borrow pit . . .

Lucien Landreville also pleaded that the Town:

[TRANSLATION] falsely and in bad faith alleged the necessity of developing the said lot P-167 for purposes of a municipal park . . .

He further pleaded that:

[TRANSLATION] the expropriating municipality attempted unlawfully and in bad faith to camouflage its true intention, which is to put an end to the operation being carried out on lot P-167 . . .

The Superior Court (Nolan J.) held that the expropriation was motivated by a reason other than the reason put forward: the sole aim of the Town was to prevent Lucien Landreville from operating his quarry. The Town had therefore acted in bad faith, treated Landreville unfairly and abused its power. Consequently, the trial judge found in favour of appellant, dismissed the notice of expropriation and quashed the resolution and the by-law ordering the expropriation.

The Court of Appeal (Tremblay C.J.A. and Casey and Turgeon JJ.A.) reversed the judgment of the Superior Court and dismissed Lucien Landreville's contestation. Turgeon J.A., with whom Tremblay C.J.A. concurred, held that:

[TRANSLATION] the expropriated respondent, on whom the burden of proof rested, failed to establish the fraud and flagrant injustice alleged in his defence. The evidence of the engineer Gilles Chabot and the town planner Victor Lambert convinced me of this.

The Chief Justice and Turgeon J.A. took for granted, without deciding the point, that in its contestation the expropriated party could argue the nullity of the by-law ordering the expropriation. Casey J.A. paid more attention to this latter question, which does not appear to have been raised in Superior Court, but he agreed with the opinion of his colleagues on the main issue:

The motivation of the Councillors or the suspicion that they do not intend to proceed with the work requires proof far stronger than that contained in this record.

The appeal, filed under the old s. 36 of the Supreme Court Act, asks this Court to set aside the decision of the Court of Appeal and restore the s'y trouvant, plus particulièrement d'un banc d'emprunt de schiste . . .

Lucien Landreville plaide aussi que la Ville

invoque faussement et de mauvaise foi les nécessités d'aménager pour fins de parc municipal ledit lot P-167 . . .

Il plaide également que la municipalité expropriante tente illégalement et de mauvaise foi de camoufler ses véritables intentions qui sont de faire cesser l'exploitation faite sur le lot P-167 . . .

La Cour supérieure (le juge Nolan) a jugé que l'expropriation a été inspirée par un motif autre que la raison invoquée: le mobile unique de la Ville était d'empêcher Lucien Landreville d'exploiter sa carrière; la Ville a donc agi de mauvaise foi, traité Landreville injustement et abusé de son pouvoir. Le premier juge maintient par conséquent la contestation, rejette l'avis d'expropriation et annule la résolution et le règlement décrétant l'expropriation.

La Cour d'appel (le juge en chef Tremblay et les juges Casey et Turgeon) a infirmé le jugement de la Cour supérieure et rejeté la contestation de Lucien Landreville. Le juge Turgeon, avec qui le juge en chef Tremblay est d'accord, juge que l'exproprié intimé sur qui reposait le fardeau de la preuve, n'a pas établi la fraude et l'injustice flagrante qu'il a alléguées en défense. Les dépositions de l'ingénieur Gilles Chabot et de l'urbaniste Victor Lambert m'en ont convaincu.

Le Juge en chef et le juge Turgeon prennent pour acquis sans le décider que l'exproprié peut dans sa contestation attaquer en nullité le règlement décrétant l'expropriation. Le juge Casey s'attache davantage à cette dernière question qui ne paraît pas avoir été soulevée en Cour supérieure mais il rejoint l'opinion de ses collègues sur le fond:

Le pourvoi, déposé suivant l'art. 36 (ancien) de la Loi sur la Cour suprême nous demande de casser l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel et de rétablir le judgment of the Superior Court. (Affidavits attesting that the value of the matter in controversy exceeds ten thousand dollars were filed by appellant. The jurisdiction of this Court was not questioned.)

The evidence consisted mainly of resolutions and by-laws adopted by the Town. The remainder of the evidence included the testimony of Lucien Landreville, Victor Lambert, town planner and witness for Lucien Landreville, Gilles Chabot, engineer and witness for the Town, and Eugène McClish, Town clerk.

The facts are not disputed but the Court of Appeal and the Superior Court did not draw the same conclusions from them.

The land that the Town wished to expropriate is a shale quarry covering forty arpents (1,472,027 sq. ft.) located in an open field approximately three miles from the centre of the Town of Boucherville in the Parish of Sainte-Famille de Boucherville, which was annexed by the Town in 1963. At the time the expropriation was ordered the quarry was approximately twenty-five feet deep and covered forty per cent of the farm belonging to Lucien Landreville. Exploitation began in December 1965 when the owner transferred to contractors the right of quarrying the shale, at first for a one-year period and later for a ten-year period.

Believing he needed a permit, Lucien Landreville sent a written request to the municipal authorities on December 7, 1965, after he had transferred quarrying rights to the first contractor. At first, the Mayor, whom he went to see, told him that the matter was "as good as money in the bank". Later, however, at the Town Hall, the Town's engineer, Gilles Chabot, and the Mayor told him that the Town could not agree to issue him a permit unless he transferred the land to the Town once the quarrying was over. In the application for a permit, dated December 7, 1965, which was dictated to him, Lucien Landreville wrote "that in consideration of this application" he "would undertake" to transfer this part of his lot to the Town "for the sum of $1 plus other consideration and an access to the said land". (The offer was withdrawn on April 11, 1968.)

jugement de la Cour supérieure. (Des affidavits attestant que la valeur de la matière en litige dépasse dix mille dollars ont été déposés par l'appelant. La juridiction de cette Cour n'a pas été mise en doute.)

La partie la plus importante de la preuve consiste en résolutions et règlements adoptés par la Ville. Le reste de la preuve comprend la déposition de Lucien Landreville, celle de Victor Lambert, urbaniste, témoin de Lucien Landreville, celle de Gilles Chabot, ingénieur et témoin de la Ville et celle d'Eugène McClish, greffier de la Ville.

Les faits ne sont pas contestés, mais la Cour d'appel et la Cour supérieure n'en tirent pas les mêmes conclusions.

Le terrain que la Ville veut exproprier est une carrière de schiste de quarante arpents (1,472,027 p.c.) située en plein champ à environ trois milles du centre de la ville de Boucherville dans la Paroisse Sainte-Famille de Boucherville annexée à la Ville en 1963. Au moment où l'expropriation est décrétée, la carrière est profonde d'environ vingt-cinq pieds. Elle occupe quarante pour cent de la ferme appartenant à Lucien Landreville. Son exploitation a commencé en décembre 1965, le propriétaire ayant cédé à des entrepreneurs le droit d'en extraire le schiste, d'abord pour une période d'un an et ensuite pour une période de dix ans.

Croyant avoir besoin d'un permis, Lucien Landreville en fait la demande par écrit aux autorités municipales le 7 décembre 1965, après avoir cédé un droit d'extraction à un premier entrepreneur. Le maire, à qui il avait rendu visite, lui avait d'abord déclaré que cette bonne affaire était «de l'argent tout trouvé». Mais subséquemment, à l'Hôtel de ville, l'ingénieur de la Ville, Gilles Chabot, et le maire lui ont dit que la Ville ne pouvait consentir à lui émettre un permis à moins qu'il ne cède le terrain à la Ville après l'extraction. Dans la demande de permis en date du 7 décembre 1965, qui lui a été dictée, Lucien Landreville écrit «qu'en considération de la présente demande» il «s'engagerait» à céder cette partie de son lot à la Ville «pour la somme de $1 et autres considérations ainsi qu'un accès audit terrain». (L'offre sera révoquée le 11 avril 1968.)

Pursuant to this application, a resolution of the municipal council dated December 16, 1965 authorized Lucien Landreville to lease part of his lot to Mégantic Construction Inc. for quarrying of the stone, but with a number of conditions, including the following: the excavation was limited to a depth of twenty feet; all excavation or quarrying of stone was to end on May 1, 1967; the earth removed was to be deposited at a place to be specified by the Town and to remain its property; the Town could take 10,000 tons of stone free of charge; Lucien Landreville was to transfer to the Town for $1, by means of a notarized contract, the part of his lot that was used as a quarry; a notary was chosen to prepare the contract, which the Mayor and the Secretary-Treasurer were empowered to sign.

The 10,000 tons of stone, valued at $0.85 a ton, were in fact used for municipal purposes free of charge, but Lucien Landreville did not agree to transfer his quarry to the Town.

On March 1, 1966 the municipal council passed a resolution refusing to grant Paul-Emile Lamontagne and Lucien Landreville permission to use lot 167 as a dump. The same resolution required Lucien Landreville to sign the contract transferring the quarry to the Town. Counsel for the Town were authorized to take the necessary measures to stop the quarrying of stone until Lucien Landreville had signed the contract. If he refused, they were to see that the quarrying was halted indefinitely and sue him for damages.

On March 15, 1966 a proposal was made to the municipal council that a land surveyor [TRANSLATION] "be authorized to prepare plans for the piece of land to be homologated on lot 167 belonging to Mr. Lucien Landreville". (The copy in the record does not mention, however, whether this proposal was adopted.)

On April 19, 1966 the municipal council adopted a by-law ordering that part of lot 167 be homologated for purposes of a park. (The record does not show whether the homologation was actually carried out.)

Suite à cette demande, une résolution du conseil municipal en date du 16 décembre 1965 autorise Lucien Landreville à louer partie de son lot à Mégantic Construction Inc. pour l'extraction de la pierre, mais à certaines conditions dont les suivantes: l'excavation est limitée à une profondeur de 20 pieds; toute excavation ou extraction de pierre doivent se terminer le 1er mai 1967; la terre déplacée doit être déposée à un endroit déterminé par la Ville et demeurer sa propriété; il est permis à la Ville de prélever gratuitement 10,000 tonnes de pierre; Lucien Landreville doit par contrat notarié céder à la Ville pour le prix de $1 la partie de son lot servant de carrière; un notaire est désigné pour préparer le contrat que le maire et le secrétaire-trésorier sont habilités à signer.

Les 10,000 tonnes de pierre, valant $0.85 la tonne, serviront effectivement et gratuitement à des fins municipales. Mais Lucien Landreville ne consentira pas à céder sa carrière à la Ville.

Le 1er mars 1966, le conseil municipal, par résolution, refuse à Paul-Émile Lamontagne et à Lucien Landreville la permission d'utiliser le lot 167 comme dépotoir. Par la même résolution, Lucien Landreville est requis de signer le contrat cédant la carrière à la Ville. Les avocats de la Ville reçoivent mandat de prendre les mesures nécessaires pour arrêter l'extraction de la pierre jusqu'à ce que Lucien Landreville ait signé le contrat. S'il refuse, les avocats doivent prendre des dispositions pour que l'extraction de la pierre cesse indéfiniment et que Lucien Landreville soit recherché en dommages-intérêts.

Le 15 mars 1966, il est proposé au conseil municipal qu'un arpenteur géomètre «soit autorisé à faire les plans concernant la partie de terrain à homologuer sur le lot 167 de M. Lucien Landreville». (La copie qui se trouve au dossier ne mentionne pas cependant si cette proposition a été adoptée.)

Le 19 avril 1966, le conseil municipal adopte un règlement décrétant l'homologation pour fins de parc d'une partie du lot 167. (Le dossier ne révèle pas si on a effectivement procédé à l'homologation.)

On August 9, 1966 the municipal council resolved [TRANSLATION] "that appropriate legal proceedings be taken regarding the operation of a quarry known as a borrow pit within our boundaries, namely on lot No. 167 of the official cadastre of the Parish of Ste-Famille, and that if existing by-laws are insufficient for this purpose, a recommendation be made to this Council without delay".

On December 6, 1966 the council adopted the [TRANSLATION] "by-law to provide for the acquisition by mutual consent or by expropriation of part of lot No. 167 of the official cadastre of the Parish of Ste-Famille de Boucherville, registration division of Chambly, for the sum of $1 for purposes of a municipal Park". Counsel for the Town were authorized to take the necessary measures to acquire the land by mutual consent or expropriation with prior taking of possession.

On January 17, 1967, the municipal council adopted construction and zoning by-laws Nos. 545 and 546, covering the entire area of the Town of Boucherville. According to these by-laws and the accompanying plan (D-5), Lucien Landreville's quarry is in a residential development zone. In the middle of this zone quite a large area is zoned as a park (P-48). This is a proposed regional park outlined on the plan by curved or elliptical lines, with the exception of a single rectangular projection. This rectangle represents Lucien Landreville's quarry, which the municipality said it wanted to add to the proposed park.

The notice of expropriation is dated February 21, 1967.

The following are the trial judge's reasons for his conclusions:

If this expropriation were being contested solely on the grounds that the City was wrong or unwise in deciding to add Petitioner's property to the park zone P-48 because of the alleged incongruity of adding to the said park zone 40 arpents of land used as a quarry, the whole superficies of which consists of a hole some 25 feet deep, the undersigned would have no hesitation in dismissing the Contestation as it is not the function of the Court to substitute its views for those of the municipal council.

Le 9 août 1966, il est résolu par le conseil municipal «que des procédures légales appropriées soient prises relativement à l'exploitation d'une carrière appelée banc d'emprunt dans nos limites, soit sur le lot n° 167 du cadastre officiel de la Paroisse Ste-Famille et s'il y a insuffisance de règlement à cet effet, qu'une recommandation soit faite à ce Conseil sans délai».

Le 6 décembre 1966 est adopté le «règlement pourvoyant à l'acquisition de gré à gré ou par voie d'expropriation de partie du lot n° 167 du cadastre officiel de la Paroisse Ste-Famille de Boucherville, division d'enregistrement de Chambly, pour la somme de $1 pour fin de parc municipal». Les conseillers juridiques de la Ville reçoivent mandat de prendre les procédures nécessaires pour l'acquisition de gré à gré ou par voie d'expropriation avec prise de possession au préalable.

Le 17 janvier 1967, le conseil municipal adopte des règlements de construction et de zonage, les règlements n°s 545 et 546, s'appliquant à tout le territoire de la ville de Boucherville. Selon ces règlements et le plan qui y est joint, (D-5), la carrière de Lucien Landreville se trouve en pleine zone de développement résidentiel. Au milieu de cette zone, il y a une zone de parc (P-48) de dimensions considérables. Il s'agit d'un projet de parc régional qui apparaît au plan sous une forme aux lignes plutôt courbes ou elliptiques sauf une seule projection de forme rectangulaire. Ce rectangle représente la carrière de Lucien Landreville que la municipalité dit vouloir annexer au parc qu'elle se propose d'aménager.

L'avis d'expropriation est en date du 21 février 1967.

Voici comment le premier juge motive ses conclusions:

For the same reason, the Court is of the opinion that the fact that the park P-48 may not be built for fifteen years or more (as was proven) should not be considered per se as a valid ground for invalidating the City's by-law decreeing the expropriation. Nor is it its function to pass judgment on the valuation of $1.00 placed on the Contestant's land in the certificate accompanying the Notice of Expropriation even though the municipal valuation for tax purposes was proven to be $100.00 per arpent.

The Court's decision has been reached on the evidence as a whole. Considered by themselves the complaints of Petitioner on the three points mentioned above are irrelevant. But considered together with the other actions of Petitioner they help to confirm Contestant's contention that Petitioner acted unjustly towards him in this matter.

The undersigned is satisfied from the proof which was adduced in this case that Petitioner had an ulterior motive in decreeing the expropriation of Contestant's land and that this motive was its determination to stop Contestant from exploiting his quarry.

The resolutions which were passed, and the contents of these resolutions, show clearly that Petitioner was determined to prevent Contestant from operating a quarry on his land unless he first deeded the land over to the City; and that when all other threats and maneuvers failed it was decided to foil Contestant by expropriating his land. In fact, Petitioner was so anxious to teach Contestant a lesson that the by-law decreeing the expropriation of Contestant's land was passed more than a month before Petitioner's land was added to the park zone P-48 by the Plan D-5.

In the opinion of the undersigned, Petitioner's bad faith is further evidenced by the fact that when this case was heard in March 1970, more than three years after Petitioner passed the by-law decreeing the expropriation of Contestant's land, Petitioner had taken no steps to expropriate any of the other lots forming part of the park zone P-48 except for one single lot on which a road was built as part of the network of roads in the Petitioner municipality and which the undersigned seriously doubts was in any way, other than accidentally, related to park zone P-48.

The principle has been clearly laid down in many cases dealing with decisions reached by municipal corporations that the Courts must not interfere unless fraud is established or a violation of the law or an abuse of power, in either case so violent as to be the equivalent of a fraud upon the public or the parties concerned.

Corporation de la Ville de Dorval v. Sanguinet Automobile Ltée, [1960] Que. K.B. 706, Roy v. Corporation

Cour est aussi d'avis que le fait que le parc (P-48) ne puisse être aménagé avant quinze ans ou plus (selon la preuve) ne peut être considéré en soi comme un motif valable d'annulation du règlement municipal prévoyant l'expropriation. Elle n'a pas non plus à rendre jugement sur l'évaluation du terrain du défendeur qui a été fixée à $1, selon le certificat accompagnant l'avis d'expropriation, même si l'on a prouvé qu'aux fins des taxes municipales sa valeur était de $100 l'arpent.

La décision de la Cour se fonde sur l'ensemble de la preuve. En eux-mêmes, les trois points mentionnés précédemment ne sont pas pertinents. Mais examinés en même temps que les autres actes de la demanderesse, ils confirment la prétention du défendeur selon laquelle la demanderesse s'est comportée de façon injuste à son égard.

Le soussigné est convaincu que la preuve a établi que la demanderesse avait un autre motif inavoué pour exproprier la terre du défendeur: mettre fin à l'exploitation de la carrière du défendeur.

Les résolutions qui ont été adoptées et leur contenu montrent clairement que la demanderesse était résolue à empêcher le défendeur d'exploiter une carrière sur son terrain s'il n'en transférait pas d'abord la propriété à la ville; lorsque toutes les autres menaces et manœuvres eurent échoué, on décida d'avoir raison du défendeur en expropriant sa terre. En fait, la demanderesse était si pressée de donner une leçon au défendeur qu'elle a adopté le règlement prévoyant l'expropriation du terrain du défendeur plus d'un mois avant que le terrain de la demanderesse ne soit inclus dans la zone de parc P-48 par le plan D-5.

A mon avis, la mauvaise foi de la demanderesse est en outre mise en lumière par le fait qu'en mars 1970, date de l'audition, soit plus de trois ans après l'adoption par la demanderesse du règlement prévoyant l'expropriation de la terre du défendeur, la demanderesse n'avait pris aucune autre mesure pour exproprier les autres lots compris dans la zone de parc P-48, excepté un lot sur lequel fut construite une rue faisant partie du réseau routier de la municipalité demanderesse. Je doute sérieusement que la construction de cette rue soit directement reliée à l'aménagement de la zone de parc P-48.

Il a été établi par de nombreux arrêts relatifs à des décisions des municipalités, que les tribunaux ne doivent pas modifier ces décisions à moins qu'on puisse prouver qu'il y a eu fraude ou violation de la loi ou abus de pouvoir si manifestes que cela équivaut à une fraude envers le public ou les parties intéressées.

The undersigned believes this to be a case which falls within the principles laid down in the above cases.

The undersigned therefore has no hesitation in finding that in passing By-law No. 533 on December 6, 1966 decreeing the expropriation of Contestant's property, Petitioner committed an abuse of power, a flagrant injustice equivalent to bad faith towards Contestant.

I find no error of law in the reasons of the trial judge and I cannot say that the conclusions he draws from the facts are manifestly incorrect.

I would, however, add the following reasons to those of the trial judge.

The burden of proof is a heavy one when it involves establishing the commission of an "abuse of power equivalent to fraud" and "resulting in a flagrant injustice": City of Sillery v. Sun Oil Co. and Royal Trust Co.[1], at p. 557.

In the case at bar, however, the municipal council is clearly condemned by its own resolutions and by-laws, and this condemnation is confirmed by the other circumstances.

In the resolution of December 16, 1965, far from opposing the operation of a quarry on Lucien Landreville's farm because of existing or expected zoning or a proposed park, the municipal council indicated that it was prepared to allow this operation on the conditions mentioned above: that the earth removed, 10,000 tons of stone and above all the land itself be given to the Town. From the very beginning, therefore, the Town was trying to appropriate the quarry without paying for it.

There is explicit legislation enabling municipalities to require, as a condition precedent to the approval of a subdivision plan, that the owner convey to them free of charge a specified percentage of his land, to be used for parks or playgrounds; or to appropriate without indemnity in specific cases land to be used for streets or lanes or the land necessary for the first public road on a lot. For example, s. 429 of the Cities and Towns Act, bert-Gallion, [1929] 46 B.R. 15—Le juge Rivard aux pages 29 et 30, Sula c. Cité de Duvernay, [1970] B.R. 234.

Je crois que les principes formulés dans ces arrêts s'appliquent à la présente cause.

Je n'ai donc aucune hésitation à déclarer que la demanderesse, en adoptant, le 6 décembre 1966, le règlement n° 533 prévoyant l'expropriation du terrain du défendeur, a commis un abus de pouvoir, une injustice flagrante prouvant sa mauvaise foi envers le défendeur.

Je ne trouve aucune erreur de droit dans les motifs du premier juge et il m'est impossible de dire que les conclusions qu'il tire des faits sont manifestement erronées.

Aux motifs du premier juge, j'ajouterai cependant ceux qui suivent.

Le fardeau de la preuve est lourd quand il s'agit d'établir la commission d'un «abus de pouvoir équivalant à fraude» et «ayant pour effet une injustice flagrante»: Cité de Sillery c. Sun Oil Co. et Royal Trust Co.[1], à la p. 557.

Mais, dans la présente affaire, les résolutions et règlements mêmes du conseil municipal le condamnent explicitement, les autres circonstances confirmant cette condamnation.

Dans la résolution du 16 décembre 1965, loin de s'opposer à l'exploitation d'une carrière sur la ferme de Lucien Landreville à cause d'un zonage actuel ou anticipé ou à cause d'un projet de parc, le conseil municipal se montre disposé à permettre cette exploitation mais aux conditions que l'on sait: don de la terre déplacée et de 10,000 tonnes de pierre, et surtout, don du terrain à la Ville. Dès ce premier moment, la Ville tente donc de s'approprier la carrière sans la payer.

Des textes de loi explicites permettent aux municipalités d'exiger, comme condition préalable à l'approbation d'un plan de subdivision, que le propriétaire leur cède gratuitement un pourcentage déterminé de terrain aux fins d'aménagement de parcs ou de terrains de jeu, ou de s'approprier sans indemnité dans des cas précis l'emprise de rues ou de ruelles ou le terrain nécessaire au premier chemin de front sur un lot. Aussi, l'art. 429 de la

R.S.Q. 1964, c. 193, as amended by L.Q. 1975, c. 66, s. 15—a provision subsequent to the facts at issue—states that the municipal council may make by-laws:

(8) To require, as a condition precedent to the approval of a subdivision plan, whether it provides for streets or not, that the owner convey to the municipal corporation, for park or playground purposes, an area of land not exceeding ten per cent of the land comprised in the plan and situated at a place which, in the opinion of the council, is suitable for the establishment of parks or playgrounds; or to exact from the owner, instead of such area of land, the payment of a sum not exceeding ten per cent of the real value of the land comprised in the plan, notwithstanding the application of section 21 of the Real Estate Assessment Act (1971, chapter 50) . . .

See also art. 392f(g) of the Municipal Code, ss. 610a, 610b, 610c and 1054 of the Charter of the City of Montreal, S.Q. 1959-60, c. 102, S.Q. 1960-61, c. 97, s. 30, S.Q. 1963, c. 70, s. 21, L.Q. 1969, c. 91, s. 6; s. 336(204) of the Charter of the City of Quebec, L.Q. 1976, c. 54, s. 15. Municipalities may not, however, extend this legislation by using permit-granting powers that they have or think they have to extort from an owner advantages such as those that the Town attempted to obtain from Lucien Landreville on December 16, 1965: such action by a municipality demonstrates bad faith and constitutes an abuse of power.

The Town repeated its conduct five and a half months later with its resolution of March 1, 1966. I am not thinking of its refusal to authorize use of lot 167 as a dump but of the notice to transfer title that was sent to Lucien Landreville with a threat of legal proceedings and prevention of further quarrying. The Town still had no objection in principle, however, to the operation of a quarry on this site provided that Lucien Landreville agreed to relinquish his property; and there was no mention of a park.

The threats became more specific with the resolution or proposal of March 15, 1966 authorizing a surveyor to make plans for homologation which necessarily suggests expropriation. There was still no mention of a park.

Loi des cités et villes, S.R.Q. 1964, c. 193, modifié par L.Q. 1975, c. 66, art. 15—une disposition subséquente aux faits en litige—porte que le conseil municipal peut faire des règlements:

8° Pour exiger, comme condition préalable à l'approbation d'un plan de subdivision, que des rues y soient prévues ou non, que le propriétaire cède à la corporation municipale, pour fins de parcs ou de terrains de jeux, une superficie de terrain n'excédant pas dix pour cent du terrain compris dans le plan et situé à un endroit qui, de l'avis du conseil, convient pour l'établissement de parcs ou de terrains de jeux, ou exiger du propriétaire, au lieu de cette superficie de terrain, le paiement d'une somme n'excédant pas dix pour cent de la valeur réelle du terrain compris dans le plan, nonobstant l'application de l'article 21 de la Loi sur l'évaluation foncière (1971, chapitre 50) . . .

Voir également l'art. 392f*g*) du Code municipal, les art. 610a, 610b, 610c, et 1054 de la Charte de la Ville de Montréal, S.Q. 1959-60, c. 102, S.Q. 1960-61, c. 97, art. 30, S.Q. 1963, c. 70 art. 21, L.Q. 1969, c. 91, art. 6; l'art. 336, 204° de la Charte de la Ville de Québec, L.Q. 1976, c. 54, art. 15. Mais une municipalité ne peut suppléer à ces textes en se servant du pouvoir qu'elle possède ou croit posséder d'octroyer un permis pour extorquer d'un propriétaire des avantages comme ceux que la Ville a tenté d'obtenir de Lucien Landreville le 16 décembre 1965: elle fait alors preuve de mauvaise foi et commet un abus de pouvoir.

La Ville récidive cinq mois et demi après, avec sa résolution du 1er mars 1966. Ce n'est pas au refus d'autoriser l'utilisation du lot 167 comme dépotoir que je songe, mais à la mise en demeure de passer titre qui doit être adressée à Lucien Landreville avec la menace de procédures judiciaires, et celle d'arrêter l'extraction de la pierre. Mais la Ville n'a toujours pas d'objection de principe à l'exploitation d'une carrière sur cet emplacement pourvu que Lucien Landreville consente à se départir de son bien. Et il n'est pas question de parc.

Les menaces se précisent avec la résolution ou la proposition du 15 mars 1966 autorisant un arpenteur à faire des plans d'homologation: l'homologation fait nécessairement penser à l'expropriation. Il n'est toujours pas question de parc.

The park was mentioned for the first time in the resolution of April 19, 1966, ordering the homologation for purposes of a park of a site that, a month and a half earlier, the Town had been willing in principle to have used as a quarry.

Moreover, the resolution of August 9, 1966 must be interpreted in the light of the resolutions that preceded and followed it: the municipal council was in fact asking for suggestions of how it could attain the objectives that it had been pursuing unlawfully from the beginning.

Finally, there is by-law No. 533, dated December 6, 1966, ordering the expropriation of Lucien Landreville's quarry for purposes of a park. It is this by-law that must be considered, but not in isolation from the events that preceded and culminated in it. If implemented to the letter, this by-law would secure for the Town in substance the very thing it had been wrongfully seeking to obtain by its resolutions of December 16, 1965 and March 1, 1966, namely ownership of Lucien Landreville's land for the sum of $1. What begins and continues in abuse and bad faith remains vitiated to the end, unless there is evidence of a change in circumstances and attitudes that indicates the supervening of good faith. The resolutions leading up to the by-law of December 6, 1966 establish the initially wrongful and unjust conduct of the Town with regard to Lucien Landreville's property. From that moment on, in my view, it was up to the Town to prove a subsequent change. It did not do so.

The Court of Appeal relied on the testimony of Victor Lambert and Gilles Chabot, to which the trial judge did not refer specifically.

Victor Lambert is a town planner and witness for Lucien Landreville. The part of his testimony most favourable to the Town is the part in which he approves the creation of park zone P-48 by means of a by-law dated January 17, 1967. He also says, however, that he found the addition of the rectangular area representing Lucien Landreville's quarry to be incongruous, and that he could not understand what priorities would lead the Town to acquire this land for a park ten or fifteen

Il en est question pour la première fois dans la résolution du 19 avril 1966, décrétant l'homologation pour fins de parc d'un emplacement, qu'un mois et demi auparavant la Ville était prête, en principe, à laisser utiliser comme carrière.

De plus, la résolution du 9 août 1966 doit s'interpréter à la lumière de celles qui la précèdent et de celles qui la suivent: le conseil municipal demande en fait qu'on lui suggère quelque moyen d'atteindre les fins qu'il poursuit illégalement depuis le début.

Vient enfin le règlement n° 533, en date du 6 décembre 1966, décrétant l'expropriation pour fin de parc de la carrière de Lucien Landreville. C'est ce règlement qu'il faut juger. Mais on ne peut le juger en faisant abstraction de ce qui le prépare et dont il est l'aboutissement. S'il est mis en œuvre suivant sa lettre, ce règlement procurera en substance à la Ville la chose même qu'elle cherchait à obtenir abusivement par ses résolutions du 16 décembre 1965 et du 1er mars 1966, savoir, la propriété du terrain de Lucien Landreville pour la somme de $1. Ce qui commence et se poursuit dans l'abus et la mauvaise foi reste vicié jusqu'à la fin, à moins que l'on ne démontre un changement de circonstances et de sentiments qui indique la survenance de la bonne foi. Les résolutions menant au règlement du 6 décembre 1966 établissent le comportement initialement abusif et injuste de la Ville relativement à la propriété de Lucien Landreville. Dès lors, à mon avis, c'est à la Ville qu'il incombait de prouver que les choses avaient changé par la suite. Elle ne l'a pas fait.

La Cour d'appel s'appuie sur la déposition de Victor Lambert et celle de Gilles Chabot, auxquelles le premier juge n'a pas spécifiquement référé.

Victor Lambert est un urbaniste, témoin de Lucien Landreville. La partie de son témoignage la plus favorable à la Ville est celle où il approuve la création de la zone de parc P-48 par le règlement du 17 janvier 1967. Mais il déclare aussi trouver incongrue l'addition à cette zone du rectangle représentant la carrière de Lucien Landreville. Il déclare également ne pouvoir s'expliquer en vertu de quelles priorités la Ville ferait l'acquisition de ce terrain pour fin de parc dix ou quinze ans avant years before it was needed for this purpose. Taken as a whole, this testimony does not appear to me to strengthen the Town's position.

Gilles Chabot is the Town's engineer. He stated that the Town's planning board had been studying the construction and zoning by-law adopted on January 17, 1967 since 1962. Though he did not actually say so, he implied that the municipal council may have had this by-law in mind before its adoption. In his view, the Town was faced with a "fait accompli" in the form of the excavation of Lucien Landreville's quarry; it was better to fill in the excavation completely or partially and add it to what would later become a large regional park than to let it remain in an area that had just been designated residential. As for the nominal value of $1 offered to Lucien Landreville for his land, he explained that this was due to the fact that the Town's costs for filling in the excavation would be much greater than the value of the land.

This is the same Gilles Chabot, however, who, along with the Mayor, told Lucien Landreville in December 1965 that the Town would agree to let him operate his quarry provided that he transferred the ownership of it after the excavation was completed. How can this witness later speak of a "fait accompli" when he contributed to bringing it about? If the operation of a quarry on this site was not desirable in view of a proposed zoning by-law then under study, why, in so far as it believed it could do otherwise, did the Town allow the operation and even become involved in it?

The explanation of the nominal value of $1 offered to Lucien Landreville for his land is taken up again by the Town in its factum submitted to this Court. This explanation is unexpected, to say the least: the Town takes 10,000 tons of stone free of charge, thereby helping to transform the expropriated property into a hole, which the expropriated party is then charged for filling in by having the cost of this filling deducted from the expropriation indemnity. From the Town's point of view this hole was indeed a treasure-trove. In my view, the offer of $1 and the explanation seeking to justify it are d'en avoir besoin pour cette fin. Ce témoignage, considéré dans son ensemble, ne me paraît pas renforcer la position de la Ville.

Gilles Chabot est l'ingénieur de la Ville. Il atteste que la commission d'urbanisme de la Ville étudiait depuis 1962 le règlement de construction et de zonage effectivement adopté le 17 janvier 1967. Il ne le dit pas expressément, mais il laisse entendre que le conseil municipal pouvait avoir ce règlement à l'esprit avant son adoption. Selon lui, la Ville s'était trouvée devant «un fait accompli» avec l'excavation de la carrière de Lucien Landreville; il était préférable de remplir totalement ou partiellement cette excavation et de l'annexer à ce qui allait plus tard devenir un grand parc régional plutôt que de la laisser subsister dans ce que l'on venait de désigner comme quartier résidentiel. Quant à la valeur nominale de $1 offerte à Lucien Landreville pour son terrain, elle s'explique, dit-il, du fait que les frais que la Ville devrait encourir pour remplir l'excavation excéderaient de beaucoup la valeur du terrain.

Pourtant, c'est ce même Gilles Chabot qui, avec le maire, déclarait à Lucien Landreville en décembre 1965 que la Ville consentirait à le laisser exploiter sa carrière s'il en cédait la propriété après l'excavation. Comment ce témoin peut-il par la suite parler de «fait accompli» alors qu'il a concouru à son accomplissement? Si l'exploitation d'une carrière n'était pas souhaitable sur cet emplacement, compte tenu d'un projet de règlement de zonage alors sous étude, pourquoi, dans la mesure où la Ville croyait pouvoir faire autrement, en a-t-elle permis l'exploitation et même y a-t-elle pris part?

L'explication de la valeur nominale de $1 offerte à Lucien Landreville pour son terrain est reprise par la Ville dans le factum qu'elle adresse à cette Cour. Cette explication est pour le moins inattendue: la Ville prélève gratuitement 10,000 tonnes de pierre et contribue pour autant à transformer d'abord la propriété expropriée en un trou dont elle mettrait ensuite le remplissage à la charge de l'exproprié en déduisant le coût du remplissage de l'indemnité d'expropriation. Voilà un trou recélant pour la Ville des richesses surprenantes. Cette offre de $1 et l'explication qui prétend la justifier based on a valuation that is clearly unfair, since it disregards the long-recognized legal principle that the indemnity must be calculated on the basis of the value to the owner, not the value to the expropriating party: Cedar Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company v. Lacoste[2]; Fraser v. Fraserville[3]; The City of Montreal v. McAnulty Realty Co.[4], at pp. 278, 281, 282, 290, 297; Attorney General of Quebec v. Hébert[5], at p. 695; Place Versailles Inc. et al. v. Minister of Justice of Quebec[6], at pp. 1128, 1129. The Town's bad faith is therefore clear from the actual by-law ordering the expropriation, and not only from the preceding resolutions.

In addition, if Lucien Landreville had not contested the right to expropriate, the deposit of this one dollar, representing an indemnity calculated on the basis of a false principle, would have allowed the Town to obtain prior possession until such time as the Public Service Board determined the true value of a piece of land which, for municipal tax purposes, had already been assessed at $4,000. Furthermore, for the only other expropriation carried out within zone P-48, which took place in 1970 and involved a road, the Town borrowed $1,600 and did not require prior possession in its by-law.

Under these circumstances, it is not surprising that the trial judge, who saw and heard the witnesses and says that he based his conclusions on the evidence as a whole, did not find it necessary to refer specifically to the oral evidence.

In the Court of Appeal, Casey J.A. expressed the opinion that in order to succeed Lucien Landreville would have had to prove that the Town did not intend to use the quarry as a park. The key allegation in Lucien Landreville's case, however, is the bad faith of the Town. If bad faith is proved, as I believe it was, it vitiates and nullifies the Town's actions regardless of the intentions that the sont à mon avis fondées sur une évaluation qui, à sa face, n'est pas honnête: elle méconnaît un principe de droit reconnu depuis longtemps selon lequel l'indemnité doit être calculée d'après la valeur pour le propriétaire et non pas d'après la valeur pour l'expropriant: Cedar Rapids Manufacturing and Power Company v. Lacoste[2]; Fraser v. Fraserville[3]; La Cité de Montréal c. McAnulty Realty Co.[4], aux pp. 278, 281, 282, 290, 297; Procureur général du Québec c. Hébert[5], à la p. 695; Place Versailles Inc. et autre c. Ministre de la Justice du Québec[6], aux pp. 1128, 1129. La mauvaise foi de la Ville se manifeste donc dans le règlement même qui décrète l'expropriation et non pas seulement dans les résolutions qui l'ont précédé.

Au surplus, si Lucien Landreville n'avait pas contesté le droit à l'expropriation, le dépôt de ce dollar unique, représentant une indemnité calculée suivant un faux principe, aurait permis à la Ville d'obtenir la possession préalable en attendant que la Régie des services publics fixe la valeur véritable d'un terrain qui, pour fins de taxe municipale, était déjà évalué à $4,000. Par ailleurs, pour la seule autre expropriation faite à l'intérieur de la zone P-48, celle d'un chemin en 1970, la Ville a emprunté $1,600 et n'a pas exigé la possession préalable dans son règlement.

Dans ces circonstances, il n'y a pas lieu de s'étonner que le premier juge, qui a vu et entendu les témoins et qui déclare s'appuyer sur toute la preuve, n'ait pas trouvé nécessaire de référer expressément à la preuve testimoniale.

En Cour d'appel, le juge Casey exprime l'avis que, pour réussir, Lucien Landreville aurait dû prouver que la Ville n'avait pas l'intention d'utiliser la carrière pour fin de parc. Or l'allégation cruciale de Lucien Landreville dans sa contestation est la mauvaise foi de la Ville. Si la mauvaise foi est prouvée, comme je crois qu'elle l'a été, elle vicie les actes de la Ville et entraîne leur nullité Town may eventually have formed in order to attain its objectives.

The appellant here contends that the "by-law is not in the public interest" and further, that the council acted "in bad faith and through fraud and partiality". The authorities are clear that the onus of proving these allegations rests upon the applicant. They are equally clear that if the applicant succeeds in proving these allegations, the by-law is invalid.

Estey J., speaking for the majority of this Court in Kuchma v. Rural Municipality of Taché[7], at p. 239.

Fraud, dishonesty, bad faith, extortion and bribery form a special category of causes of nullity, which transends all others.

Fraud unravels everything. The Court is careful not to find fraud unless it is distinctly pleaded and proved; but once it is proved, it vitiates judgments, contracts and all transactions whatsoever . . .

Lord Denning in Lazarus Estates Ltd. v. Beasley[8], at p. 712.

This was also the opinion of Lord Loreburn in Marquess of Clanricarde v. Congested Districts Board of Ireland[9]:

There is only one point in the case, a short point, whether the Congested Districts Board could be restrained from using its compulsory power to acquire Lord Clanricarde's lands in county Galway. In form their proceedings were regular, but in substance, so the appellant contended, they were proceeding ultra vires. At first there was another contention that they were not proceeding bona fide, and it was explained that this conveyed no sort of reflection upon their honesty or good faith, but merely that there was some by-motive. I think it would be better to select some happier expression. I do not understand an honest dishonesty. . . . fraud or dishonesty stands on a different footing. A court will always defeat that under any shape, and quite regardless of all form.

abstraction faite des intentions que la Ville a finalement pu former pour atteindre ses fins:

[TRADUCTION] L'appelant prétend en l'espèce que «le règlement n'est pas d'intérêt public» et que le conseil a agi «de mauvaise foi, frauduleusement et avec partialité». La jurisprudence a clairement établi qu'il incombe au demandeur de prouver ces allégations. Il est clair également que le règlement devient invalide si le demandeur réussit à faire la preuve de ces allégations.

Le juge Estey, parlant pour la majorité de cette Cour dans Kuchma c. La municipalité rurale de Taché[7], à la p. 239.

La fraude, la malhonnêteté, la mauvaise foi, l'extorsion ou la corruption forment une catégorie particulière de causes de nullité qui transcende toutes les autres.

Lord Denning dans Lazarus Estates Ltd. v. Beasley[8], à la p. 712.

C'était aussi l'avis de Lord Loreburn dans Marquess of Clanricarde v. Congested Districts Board of Ireland[9]:

[TRADUCTION] La présente cause ne soulève qu'un seul point qui se résume ainsi: peut-on empêcher le Congested Districts Board d'utiliser son pouvoir coercitif pour faire l'acquisition des terres du comté de Galway appartenant à lord Clanricarde. Les procédures ne sont entachées d'aucun vice de forme mais, comme le prétend l'appelant, il y a excès de pouvoir sur le fond. Au début, on a prétendu que le Conseil n'avait pas agi selon les motifs invoqués et on a expliqué que cette allégation ne mettait pas en cause son honnêteté ni sa bonne foi, mais simplement qu'il avait un motif secondaire. Je suis d'avis qu'il serait préférable de s'exprimer différemment. Je ne puis concevoir de malhonnêteté honnête. . . . la fraude et la malhonnêteté doivent être traitées différemment. Un tribunal doit toujours leur faire obstacle quelle que soit leur forme.

This brings me to the questions of procedure and jurisdiction.

The question of procedure was raised in the Court of Appeal by Casey J.A., who found merit in the argument that a municipal by-law could be nullified only by a petition to quash on the ground of illegality, a direct remedy provided for in s. 411 of the Cities and Towns Act, and not by incidental arguments or on defence, as in the case at bar, where Lucien Landreville is disputing the validity of the by-law ordering the expropriation by contesting the notice of expropriation.

Section 411 of the Cities and Towns Act creates an additional but not an exclusive remedy; it cannot have the effect of depriving a person of other remedies that would normally be available to him. In my view, it is also possible to dispute the validity of a municipal by-law on defence or by incidental arguments. This is the meaning of the rather long-standing line of authority for which this Court demonstrated its preference in Duquet v. The Town of Ste-Agathe-des-Monts[10].

The Superior Court could not dispose of Lucien Landreville's contestation without ruling on the validity of the resolution and the by-law ordering the expropriation. Having concluded that they were invalid, should the Court have limited itself in the order it made to dismissing the notice of expropriation, without explicitly quashing the resolution and the by-law as requested by the expropriated party? I think not. This would be nothing but formalism, since the resolution and by-law have no purpose other than the expropriation in question. In my view, Lucien Landreville could ask in defence that the resolution and the by-law ordering the expropriation be quashed.

Article 777 C.C.P. provides that:

the party being expropriated can only contest the right to expropriate.

Article 1066e of the old Code of Civil Procedure provided that:

[10] [1977] 2 S.C.R. 1132.

Ce qui m'amène aux questions de procédure et de juridiction.

La question de procédure a été soulevée en Cour d'appel par le juge Casey qui trouve de la valeur à l'argument selon lequel un règlement municipal peut être attaqué en nullité uniquement par requête en cassation pour cause d'illégalité, recours direct prévu à l'art. 411 de la Loi des cités et villes, et non pas par des moyens incidents ou en défense comme c'est le cas en l'espèce puisque c'est par une contestation de l'avis d'expropriation que Lucien Landreville attaque la validité du règlement décrétant l'expropriation.

L'article 411 de la Loi des cités et villes, crée un recours supplémentaire mais non exclusif; il ne peut avoir pour effet de priver les justiciables des autres recours dont ils disposeraient normalement. A mon avis, il est également possible d'attaquer la validité d'un règlement municipal en défense ou par des moyens incidents. C'est le sens d'une jurisprudence assez ancienne pour laquelle cette Cour a manifesté sa préférence dans Duquet c. La ville de Ste-Agathe-des-Monts[10].

La Cour supérieure ne pouvait disposer de la contestation de Lucien Landreville sans opiner sur la validité de la résolution et du règlement décrétant l'expropriation. Ayant conclu à leur invalidité, devait-elle, dans le dispositif de son jugement, se contenter de rejeter l'avis d'expropriation sans annuler expressément cette résolution et ce règlement comme le lui demandait l'exproprié? Je ne le crois pas. Ce serait là pur formalisme car la résolution et le règlement n'ont aucun autre objet que la présente expropriation. Lucien Landreville pouvait selon moi demander en défense l'annulation de la résolution et du règlement décrétant l'expropriation.

Par ailleurs, l'art. 777 C.p.c. porte que l'exproprié ne peut contester que le droit à l'expropriation.

L'article 1066e de l'ancien Code de procédure prescrivait que

[10] [1977] 2 R.C.S. 1132.

1978 CanLII 202 (SCC)

No party being expropriated may file any plea against the notice save to contest the right of the expropriating party to have recourse to expropriation.

In Hamel v. Town of Asbestos[11], this Court, which was called upon to apply art. 1066e, held (at p. 538):

[TRANSLATION] in opposition to the notice, the expropriated party may argue that the expropriating party does not have the statutory right to resort to expropriation, but not that there were irregularities or illegalities in the procedure followed in exercising this right.

In the case at bar, however, the Town contends that the statutory right of the municipal council to expropriate for purposes of a park cannot be questioned in view of s. 605(c) of the Cities and Towns Act, which enables it to:

expropriate any immoveable property, any part thereof or any servitude it may need for any municipal purpose.

Since the Town's statutory right to expropriate is indisputable, Lucien Landreville's defence would appear to contravene art. 777 C.C.P.

This submission by the Town goes beyond procedure and gets into jurisdiction. It cannot be retained, however, since it would enable a town to thwart any efforts to contest its expropriations by wording them in such a way as to give them an appearance of legality.

In Hamel (supra), appellant alleged that the municipality had committed procedural irregularities, and in particular that the by-law ordering the expropriation had been adopted by an illegally convened and improperly held meeting. He did not, however, contest the municipality's right to expropriate his immovable. He did not deny that in his case the expropriating party was entitled to resort to expropriation.

In the case at bar, although in general Lucien Landreville recognized the Town's authority to expropriate immovables, including hiw own, for municipal purposes, he contested its right to exercise this authority as it had done in the circumstances, by committing not procedural irregularities but abuses that vitiated the substance of its l'exproprié ne peut produire un plaidoyer à l'encontre de l'avis que pour contester le droit de l'expropriant au recours de l'expropriation.

Dans l'arrêt Hamel c. Ville d'Asbestos[11], cette Cour, qui devait appliquer l'art. 1066e, a décidé (à la p. 538):

l'exproprié peut, à l'encontre de l'avis, plaider que l'expropriant n'a pas le droit statutaire de recourir à l'expropriation, mais non les irrégularités ou illégalités dans la procédure suivie pour exercer le droit à ce recours.

Or, selon la Ville, dans la présente cause, le droit statutaire du conseil municipal d'exproprier pour fin de parc ne peut être mis en doute vu l'al. c) de l'art. 605 de la Loi des cités et villes qui lui permet d'avoir recours aux procédures d'expropriation pour s'approprier tout immeuble ou partie d'immeuble ou servitude dont il a besoin pour toutes fins municipales.

Le droit statutaire de la Ville à l'expropriation étant incontestable, la défense de Lucien Landreville contreviendrait donc à l'art. 777 C.p.c.

Cet argument de la Ville dépasse la procédure et rejoint la juridiction. Mais il ne peut être retenu: il permettrait à une ville de faire échec à toute contestation de ses expropriations en libellant ces dernières de façon à leur donner une apparence de droit.

Dans l'arrêt Hamel (supra), l'appelant reprochait à la municipalité d'avoir commis des irrégularités de procédure, alléguant en particulier que le règlement décrétant l'expropriation avait été adopté par une assemblée illégalement convoquée et irrégulièrement tenue. Mais il ne contestait pas le droit qu'avait la municipalité d'exproprier son immeuble. Il ne niait pas que l'expropriant avait, dans son cas, droit de recourir à l'expropriation.

Dans la présente affaire, quoique Lucien Landreville reconnaisse généralement le pouvoir que possède la Ville d'exproprier des immeubles, y compris le sien, pour des fins municipales, il lui conteste le droit de l'exercer comme elle l'a fait dans les circonstances, en commettant non pas des irrégularités de procédure mais des abus qui decision. In so doing and in so far as he is concerned, Lucien Landreville is in my view contesting "the right to expropriate" in the sense in which this phrase from art. 777 C.C.P. must be understood.

The appeal should be allowed, the decision of the Court of Appeal set aside and the judgment of the Superior Court restored, with costs in this Court as in the Court of Appeal.

SUMMARY 30

2024 BCSC 1292 (CanLII)

Introduction

[1] On May 16, 2024, the British Columbia Legislature enacted Bill 21, the Legal Professions Act, S.B.C. 2024, c. 26 (Act). It creates a new single regulator of legal professions in British Columbia: the Legal Professions of British Columbia (LPBC) to regulate lawyers, notaries public, and certain paralegals practicing in the Province, as well as new classes of government-created legal professionals that may be created and governed by Cabinet regulation.

[2] The Law Society of British Columbia (Law Society), and the Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia and Kevin Westell (collectively referred to as the "Trial Lawyers") apply for injunctive relief, pending the trial in these actions.

[3] The issue in both cases is the same: whether the defendants (jointly referred to as the "Province"), have exceeded their constitutional competence by enacting this legislation.

[4] The plaintiffs assert that the Act is unconstitutional because it eliminates the self-governance and self-regulation of lawyers in British Columbia. The Trial Lawyers take the same position, and add that Bill 21 infringes the Charter, particularly s. 2(d) (freedom of association); individual rights under ss. 7 (life, liberty and security of the person) and 8 (unreasonable search and seizure), and are not saved by s. 1.

[5] In this application, the plaintiffs seek injunctive relief to prevent the Act from causing immediate and irreparable harm to the public interest in the administration of justice. In particular, the plaintiffs seek these orders:

a) suspending the operation of ss. 215, 223-229 of the Act; and

b) enjoining the Lieutenant Governor in Council (LGIC) from bringing ss. 1-214, 216-222, 230-310, 315-316 of the Act into force until the determination by this Court of the claims in the Law Society's notice of civil claim.

[6] This decision addresses whether the Province should be enjoined from implementing any part of the Act, until the court has considered and determined the plaintiffs' constitutional challenge. For the reasons that follow, I decline to order injunctive relief.

The Parties

Law Society

[7] The Law Society is the body through which lawyers exercise self-government and self-regulation in British Columbia. It is an independent non-profit society continued by s. 2(1) of the Legal Profession Act, S.B.C. 1998, c. 9 (LPA) to govern the professional bar for the purposes of upholding and protecting the public interest in the administration of justice.

[8] It is the Law Society's position that the practice of law is, and must continue to be, an independent and self-regulating profession. The Law Society fulfills its obligation to regulate lawyers practicing in British Columbia in the public interest by, among other things, preserving and protecting the rights and freedoms of all persons, and ensuring the independence, integrity, honour and competence of lawyers. The fundamental obligation on the professional bar to self-regulate lawyers in the public interest is reflected in s. 3 of the LPA.

[9] The Law Society asserts that Bill 21 ends self-governance and self-regulation of lawyers in British Columbia and compromises the independence of the bar.

Trial Lawyers

[10] The Trial Lawyers Association is a non-profit society with a membership of approximately 1600 legal professionals. Its mission is to support and promote the rights of individuals in British Columbia. Its members practice in many areas, from family and employment law to criminal defence and personal injury litigation, representing individuals rather than corporations or governments.

[11] Kevin Westell is a criminal defence lawyer practicing in Vancouver, British Columbia. Mr. Westell is a member and elected bencher of the Law Society.

[12] The Trial Lawyers describe that their application is “to restrain the executive from furthering the processes created by legislation which has already been passed to end the Law Society and lawyer self-regulation, irreparably damaging the independence of the bar, and undermining the building blocks of the rule of law.”

[13] They specifically note that “none of that is hyperbole or ‘might happen, might not, let’s wait and see’. It will happen, and it will be contrary to the Constitution of this Province and Country.”

Law Foundation

[14] The Law Foundation is not a party, it is an application respondent. I mention it in this section to clarify its participation in this application. It appears to address the impact that he Act will have on it. Its position is that all of the provisions of the Act must be enjoined until the constitutional challenge brought by the plaintiffs is determined, to avoid unnecessary complications and expense.

The Province

[15] The Province says that the legislation was enacted to address the implementation of a single regulator for lawyers, notaries public and paralegals. The plaintiffs do not oppose there being a single regulator.

[16] In addition, the Province says that the goals of Bill 21 are to address the costs of legal services (access to justice) and prioritize reconciliation with Indigenous peoples. The plaintiffs support these goals.

[17] The Province asserts that the Act also addresses the problem that it perceives as governance issues arising from bencher elections. It points out that the election of benchers has some advantages, but also some significant disadvantages. The disadvantages are that electing individuals makes it less likely that the board will have the complete range of competencies that a public interest regulator should have and may not provide appropriate diversity of expertise, perspective, and lived experience. Bencher elections may create the appearance, or even the reality that benchers are beholden to the lawyers who elect them rather than to the public interest.

[18] The plaintiffs do not agree that any problem exists regarding bencher elections.

Chronology

[19] On March 1, 2022, the Attorney General wrote to the Law Society and the Society of Notaries Public of British Columbia (Society of Notaries Public) regarding the government's intention to change the regulatory model governing lawyers in British Columbia and to seek the Law Society and Society of Notaries Public's involvement in the transitional planning process.

[20] On September 14, 2022, the Ministry of Attorney General (Ministry) released an Intentions Paper on Legal Professions Regulatory Modernization (Intentions Paper). The Law Society issued a response to the Intentions Paper on November 16, 2022. It agreed with the Ministry's emphasis on access to justice and some of the steps outlined in the Intentions Paper (such as licensing paralegals), but expressed concerns that the Intentions Paper did not make clear how the government intended to preserve independence of the bar. The Law Society asserted that an independent bar requires self-governance by a regulatory board on which lawyers are in the majority; that a reduction in the size of the governing board would undermine diversity on the board; that defining the regulated scope of practice for paralegals would create an unnecessary barrier to their entry into practice; and that the public interest is best served by legislation that enables, rather than constrains, an independent regulator.

[21] The Province issued a "What We Heard" report detailing the responses to the Intentions Paper in May 2023.

[22] In January 2024, the Federation of Law Societies of Canada wrote to the Attorney General to request the opportunity to review the government's proposed draft single-regulator legislation, and provide feedback from its perspective. The Attorney General did not respond to the request.

[23] The Attorney General released a public update in March 2024. The Law Society publicly responded to express the concern that there had not been sufficient recognition of the necessary independence of a new legal regulator from the government. The Trial Lawyers and other organizations from across Canada wrote an open letter to the Attorney General on March 25, 2024, expressing concern about the proposed legislation and that it had not been shared publicly with stakeholders. They noted that an independent bar is “critical to the integrity of the legal system and a properly functioning democratic society. The bar can only be independent if it is self-governed and self-regulated.”

[24] The text of Bill 21 was made available publicly when it was introduced in the Legislature for first reading on April 10, 2024.

[25] The Law Society issued a response to Bill 21 on the same day. It noted that the public interest required the public’s trust that the legal regulator is independent of government influence. The Law Society advised that if Bill 21 was passed and enacted, it had instructed counsel to challenge its constitutionality. The Trial Lawyers Association issued its own statement in opposition to Bill 21 on April 10, 2024.

[26] On April 26, 2024, the benchers of the Law Society wrote to the Attorney General to urge the government to reconsider proceeding with Bill 21 without significant amendment.

[27] The Province moved to close the debate on Bill 21 on May 15, 2024. Bill 21 remained in Committee Stage at that time. On the same day, counsel for the Law Society wrote to the Attorney General to provide formal notice of the Law Society’s impending court challenge to Bill 21.

[28] Bill 21 received third reading on May 15, 2024, and Royal Assent after 4:00 p.m. on May 16, 2024.

[29] The Law Society commenced this proceeding on May 17, 2024. This action was filed the same day. The Trial Lawyers commenced 10heir action on May 21, 2024.

[30] At this time, only a few provisions of the Act are currently in force. They prescribe a transitional planning process. The rest of Bill 21 is not in force. It will come into force upon regulation by the LGIC in accordance with s. 317.

[31] The Act provides a two-part structure:

a) sections 215 and 223-229 are currently in force. They begin a transitional planning process (transitional provisions);

b) the remaining provisions of Bill 21 are substantive provisions (substantive provisions). They are not currently in force, but will come into force by regulation (s. 317).

[32] The transitional provisions establish the transitional board, transitional Indigenous council, and advisory committee.

[33] The transitional board set out in the transitional provisions comprise a seven-person transitional board of which four members are appointed by the benchers, one member is appointed by the directors of the Society of Notaries Public, one member is appointed by the BC Paralegal Association, and one member appointed by the LGIC.

[34] The transitional Indigenous council is comprised of a five- or six-person transitional Indigenous council, consisting of three members appointed by the BC First Nations Justice Council, a member appointed by Métis Nation British Columbia, and one or two members of the transitional board appointed by the transitional board.

[35] The Act requires the transitional board to:

a) appoint a person responsible for managing the transition, who will eventually become the first CEO of the regulator;

b) develop the first rules of the board in collaboration with the Indigenous council; and

c) appoint a transitional tribunal chair, who must develop the first tribunal rules.

[36] The transitional provisions require the Law Society and Society of Notaries Public to cooperate with the transitional board and pay certain transition costs. They immunize the members of the transitional board, transitional Indigenous council, and advisory committee from any liability for any actions done in good faith.

[37] The remaining substantive provisions address the governance of the legal profession under a single regulator, its board of directors and chief executive officer, the establishment and participation of an Indigenous council; licencing and authority to practise; professional conduct, competence and discipline and other related matters.

[38] The Province says that the substantive provisions, if they come into force, require the necessary transitional planning process to be complete, which the Province anticipates will take 18-24 months.

Injunctive Relief in Constitutional Cases

[39] An injunction may be granted by an interlocutory order in cases where it appears to the court to be just or convenient that the order should be made. This court has the jurisdiction to grant interlocutory injunctive relief against the Crown in constitutional cases.

[40] The Courts have recognized that orders staying legislation, or enjoining legislation from being brought into force, are fundamentally different from injunctions in private law matters, where the injunction merely prevents an individual from exercising a private right. An order staying legislation, or enjoining legislation from being brought into force, interferes with the Legislature's law-making function and deprives the public of the benefit of a law that their elected representatives have determined to be in the public interest, before anything has been determined on the merits. It should be ordered in rare and exceptional circumstances: Manitoba (A.G.) v. Metropolitan Stores Ltd., [1987] 1 S.C.R. 110 at 147–48.

[41] There is a presumption that the legislation will produce a "public good". As explained in Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), 2000 SCC 57 at para. 9:

> … The assumption of the public interest in enforcing the law weighs heavily in the balance. Courts will not lightly order that laws that … a legislature has duly enacted for the public good are inoperable in advance of complete constitutional review, which is always a complex and difficult matter. It follows that only in clear cases will interlocutory injunctions against the enforcement of a law on grounds of alleged unconstitutionality succeed.

The Test for Interim Injunction

[42] The test to be applied is set out in RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1994] 1 S.C.R. 311. The applicant must establish that:

a) there is a serious question to be tried;

b) the applicant will suffer irreparable harm if the injunction is not granted; and

c) the balance of convenience favours the granting of the injunction.

[43] In this case, as I have noted, the plaintiffs seek to suspend the transitional provisions of the Act that are in force and enjoin the LGIC from bringing the substantive provisions into force, until this action is concluded.

Serious Question to be Tried

[44] The first step is "a serious question to be tried". It is not a rigorous test: the threshold is not high. It is not likely to be dispositive of the application. It excludes frivolous or vexatious claims: Harm Reduction Nurses Association v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2023 BCSC 2290 at para. 35. The determination is made on the basis of common sense and an extremely limited view of the merits:

RJR-MacDonald at para. 348. There is no higher standard in a constitutional case: Harm Reduction Nurses at para. 48.

Irreparable Harm

[45] The second step is "irreparable harm". RJR-MacDonald describes that test at para. 84:

> At the second stage the applicant must convince the court that it will suffer irreparable harm if the relief is not granted. 'Irreparable' refers to the nature of the harm rather than its magnitude. In Charter cases, even quantifiable financial loss relied upon by an applicant may be considered irreparable harm so long as it is unclear that such loss could be recovered at the time of a decision on the merits.

[46] It is in the context of the second step that the distinction between staying or suspending legislation that is in effect (the transitional provisions) and enjoining the provisions that are not in effect (substantive provisions) is important.

[47] As noted, in constitutional challenges, suspending legislation that has been enacted must only be done in clear, rare and exceptional cases. This applies to the transitional provisions of the Act.

[48] In respect of an interlocutory injunction that seeks to enjoin the Province from enacting legislation in the future, the substantive provisions of the Act, it may be premature to address the issue of irreparable harm. Nevertheless, the court has the jurisdiction to consider irreparable harm at this stage: Cambie Surgeries Corporation v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2019 BCCA 29 at paras. 48-49 citing the "clear case" hurdle set out in Harper.

[49] Cambie Surgeries also cites Manitoba Federation of Labour et al. v. The Government of Manitoba, 2018 MBQB 125. The quoted passage includes the conclusion of Edmond J. that "... only in clear cases will interlocutory injunctions against the enforcement of the law on grounds of alleged unconstitutionality or a violation of the Charter succeed." In his analysis:

> Although the facts of these cases are different, they make it clear that interlocutory injunctions or stays are rarely granted in constitutional cases because it is assumed that laws enacted by democratically enacted > legislatures are directed to the common good and serve a valid public purpose.

> That does not mean that injunctions are never granted. In order to overcome the assumed benefit to the public interest arising from the continued application of the legislation, the moving plaintiffs who rely on the public interest must demonstrate that the suspension or exemption of the legislation would provide a public benefit. [At paras. 154-5; emphasis added [by BCCA])]

[50] This was in contention in Harm Reduction Nurses. There, the Province argued that an interlocutory injunction ought not to be granted because the impugned legislation was not yet in force. The plaintiffs asserted that despite that, the legislation that sought to enjoin people from consuming certain illegal substances in certain public areas, could result in irreparable harm, even at the interlocutory injunction stage.

[51] Chief Justice Hinkson determined that the application for an injunction was not premature, as the applicants had demonstrated that in spite of the legislation not being in effect, he could assess the irreparable harm.

Balance of Convenience

[52] The third step in the test is the "balance of convenience". RJR-MacDonald notes at paras. 85-86 that:

> The third branch of the test, …will often determine the result in applications involving Charter rights. In addition to the damage each party alleges it will suffer, the interest of the public must be taken into account. The effect a decision on the application will have upon the public interest may be relied upon by either party.

[53] When the nature and declared purpose of legislation is to promote the public interest, the court hearing the interlocutory injunction must assume that is does. Thus, the party seeking the injunction who also relies on the public interest: "must demonstrate that the suspension of the legislation would itself provide a public benefit." The Court goes on to note that at the third stage, "harm to the [plaintiffs] is balanced with harm to the [Province] including any harm to the public interest established by the [Province]."

[54] RJR-MacDonald placed this limitation on the court in determining the balance of convenience, at para. 77:

> … A court should not, as a general rule, attempt to ascertain whether actual harm would result from the restraint sought. To do so would in effect require judicial inquiry into whether the government is governing well, since it implies the possibility that the government action does not have the effect of promoting the public interest and that the restraint of the action would therefore not harm the public interest. …

Discussion

Is there a serious question to be tried?

[55] The Law Society and the Trial Lawyers assert that their claim is not frivolous or vexatious. The Province agrees.

[56] Because of the low threshold that must be met to determine that there is a serious issue to be tried and because this stage is not dispositive of whether an interlocutory injunction should be granted, I will summarize the parties' positions. I have fully considered the extensive submissions made but it is not my role to assess the merits of the applications.

The Law Society

[57] The Law Society argues that Bill 21 is inconsistent with the independence of the bar and is unconstitutional as a result. This raises a serious question to be tried that is clearly arguable.

[58] It asserts that independence of the bar is a constitutional imperative and is a cornerstone of our legal system. It is an unwritten constitutional principle, but flows by necessary implication from numerous express constitutional terms, in particular, from the preamble to and ss. 96-101 of the Constitution Act, 1867 and ss. 7, 10(b), and 11(d) of the Charter. It is inextricably linked with and necessary to the independence of the judiciary and the rule of law. The Province's legislative authority must be interpreted in a manner consistent with the independence of the bar.

[59] The Law Society submits that independence of the bar requires both individual and institutional independence. The principle protects lawyers' performance of their multi-faceted role in our legal system, including their duties to their clients, to the court, and the administration of justice. Institutional independence is required to safeguard individual independence. The independence of the bar is maintained in Canada by self-governance and self-regulation of the legal profession.

[60] It says that Bill 21 is inconsistent with the institutional dimension of the independence of the bar. It ends self-government and self-regulation in the legal profession. Instead of the current regime, lawyers, notaries public, paralegals as well as an Indigenous council will all be involved in regulating the legal profession.

[61] The Law Society's conclusion in this first stage is: "Bill 21 ends the self-governance of the legal profession, circumscribes the mandate of lawyers' governing body, and gives Cabinet the power to regulate lawyers. It is inconsistent with the independence of the bar and unconstitutional as result."

Trial Lawyers

[62] The Trial Lawyers adopt the Law Society's arguments about the independence of the bar as a constitutional imperative and lawyer self-regulation. They assert that the Act:

a) results in the termination of the Law Society as the entity that regulates lawyers in British Columbia. In its place, Bill 21 purports to create a single regulator governing lawyers, notaries, paralegals, and entirely new classes of legal professionals in the province created and controlled by the government;

b) limits the scope of the new LPBC's duty to regulate the combined legal professions in the public interest;

c) imposes a governance model on lawyers that makes them subject to regulation by a functional majority of non-lawyers, government appointees, and other governments, each of whom have pecuniary and other interests engaged in shaping the manner in which lawyers can, and cannot, act against them;

d) allows the government to make new legal professions in parallel to lawyers on the government's own assessment, scope of practice, and rules;

e) allows the government to exercise direct control over the regulation of the practice of law, competence, and professional discipline of lawyers in British Columbia; and

f) compromises the independence of the judiciary, whose members must be selected from an independent and impartial bar.

[63] The Trial Lawyers also raise Charter issues.

[64] Their position is that the Act violates individual rights prescribed under s. 7 that provides individuals with a right to the effective assistance of counsel in the face of state action interfering with personal autonomy and/or psychological integrity. The effective assistance of counsel is predicated on an independent bar. Section 7 also guarantees an accused's right to a fair trial absent abuse of process. This right is dependent on the integrity of the judicial process, which is itself dependent on the independence of the bar and judiciary. The independence of the bar is a necessary component of an accused's right to a fair trial.

[65] Equally, they argue that the Act may interfere with lawyers' rights to liberty and security of the person under s. 7 and specifically refers to the substantive sections of the Act that deal with mental health and competence.

[66] Section 10(b) provides individuals the right to retain and instruct counsel on arrest or detention. The individual and institutional independence of lawyers plays a crucial role in the effective protection of these rights of an accused.

[67] Section 11(d) guarantees any person charged with an offence a right to a fair and public hearing before an independent judiciary. Our adversarial system of law depends on an independent bar, and more specifically independent legal expertise and professional advice, to function as an effective mode of procedure, in particular for those charged with criminal offences. An independent bar is essential to and forms the foundation of an independent judiciary. An independent bar is therefore vital, in many respects, to the right of those charged with an offence to a fair and public hearing before an independent judiciary.

[68] The Trial Lawyers submit that the Act offends the right to associate under s. 2(b) of the Charter. Whether lawyers' rights of association for the purposes of self-regulation and self-governance are activities protected under s. 2(d) of the Charter, and whether Bill 21 has, in purpose or effect, substantially interfered with those activities are serious issues to be tried.

[69] They also assert that the Act may authorize the unreasonable search and seizure of lawyers' premises, offending s. 8 of the Charter.

The Province

[70] The Province agrees that based upon the low threshold required, the plaintiffs have likely satisfied this first test, but point out that there are "some frailties" in the plaintiffs' submissions. These include whether unwritten constitutional principles can invalidate legislation and whether the independence of the bar means that lawyers must be "free from influence or incursion by any source", and whether they are under the current LPA. The Province says that lawyers are not and have never been "free from influence or incursion by any source". Lawyers have always been subject to some kinds of influence by non-lawyers and external regulation, including from the Law Society, and the Truth and Reconciliation Commission. They are subject to the provisions of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46 and the Human Rights Code, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 210.

[71] The Province argues that the Act will not result in the state interference with anything that affects lawyers' advice or advocacy. Any unwritten constitutional principle about the independence of the bar should be interpreted in a functional manner: the state cannot interfere with those aspects of the regulation of the bar that bear directly and immediately on a lawyer's function of advising and advocating on behalf of clients. If it does, it would be ultra vires the Act.

[72] The Province challenges the Charter arguments of the Trial Lawyers. They assert that the Law Society is not an association that advances lawyers' interests but rather a statutory regulator.

[73] In respect of the Trial Lawyers' position on s. 78 (authorizing the chief executive officer to enter and inspect lawyers' offices) and s. 88 (authorizing the chief executive officer to require licensees to do certain things and impose limits or conditions on licensees), the Province points out that these powers are transferred to executive director under the Act.

[74] The Province argues that s. 7 of the Charter does not create a right to be licensed to work in any particular profession. An order requiring that a person obtain certain medical treatment, failing which their licence may be suspended or made subject to conditions, does not engage s. 7: Hoogerbrug v. British Columbia, 2024 BCSC 794 at paras. 276-294.

Conclusion on serious issue to be tried

[75] I have set out the parties' submissions on this question to add context to the determination of this first step. The plaintiffs have set out their challenges clearly and forcibly. While the defendants pointed to some frailties with the arguments presented, they agree that this test is satisfied.

[76] There is no doubt that there is a serious question to be tried.

[77] In Harm Reduction Nurses, Hinkson C.J. addressed the question of whether the application to enjoin prospective legislation in the context of this first step. He set out the Province's argument that the impugned act in that case must be considered together with the forthcoming regulations to provide a full context. He disagreed (at para. 56):

> I conclude that I must determine the application before me on the Act as it is presently written; that is, without any regulations, as that is the form that the > Province proposes to bring into force. Unless the LGIC were to, in effect, exempt from the Act so as to render it moot entirely, the Charter implications pleaded by the plaintiff would remain attendant, and the issues to be tried would remain serious. Just because the LGIC may have the authority to tailor the application of the Act does not guarantee the form that any such tailoring may take, nor does it guarantee that any such tailoring will occur at all.

[78] Chief Justice Hinkson suspended the legislation for three months pending a constitutional challenge.

[79] I intend to address this argument at the second step of the test.

Will irreparable harm result if the interlocutory injunction is not granted?

Distinction between Transitional and Substantive Provisions

[80] The plaintiffs argue that the distinction between staying legislation currently in force (the transitional provisions) and enjoining legislation that is not in effect (the substantive provisions) is unnecessary.

[81] The Law Society says that the irreparable harm flows from the Act as a whole, as all of the provisions are inextricably intertwined.

[82] It also argues that this application is not premature, it is timely. The harm and threat are even greater later. The proper course is not to wait and see if the transitional board and transitional Indigenous council reach an irreconcilable impasse, with the attendant consequences for public confidence in the administration of justice, but to prevent this impasse from happening while the constitutional challenge is determined.

[83] The Trial Lawyers support that position. They say that the Province is committed to its path. If the plaintiffs are shown to be correct at trial, the Act, without suspending the transitional provisions, “the constitution has been and will continue to be infringed each day moving forward as the ‘transition’ unfolds.”

[84] The Province asserts that when assessing the irreparable harm and the balance of convenience criteria, it is necessary to distinguish between the two orders sought: One is a stay of the transitional provisions that are currently in force. The other is quia timet injunction, enjoining the LGIC from bringing the substantive provisions into force. These orders are different and the legislative provisions at issue are different.

[85] Robert J. Sharpe describes quia timet injunctions in his text, Injunctions and Specific Performance (Toronto: Thomson Reuters, 2023) at §1:20.:

> Where the harm to the plaintiff has yet to occur the problems of prediction are encountered. Here, the plaintiff sues quia timet—because he or she fears—and the judgment as to the propriety of injunctive relief must be made without the advantage of actual evidence as to the nature of harm inflicted on the plaintiff. The court is asked to predict that harm will occur in the future and that the harm is of a type that ought to be prevented by injunction. Thus, while all injunctions involve predicting the future, the label quia timet and the problem of prematurity relate to the situation where the difficulties of prediction are more acute in that the plaintiff is asking for injunctive relief before any of the harm to be prevented by the injunction has been suffered.

Law Society

[86] The Law Society asserts that all of the provisions of the Act must be suspended and enjoined. The transitional provisions are inextricably intertwined with the substantive provisions. The irreparable harm begins with the transitional provisions and continues with the substantive provisions.

[87] The Law Society says that the injunction sought regarding the substantive provisions is not premature. It is skeptical that the LGIC will not enact the substantive provisions for 18-24 months or will let the transitional planning process complete. It provides this example:

> The Province goes so far as to suggest that it would be better to wait and see if the Transitional Board and transitional Indigenous Council reach an irreconcilable impasse in trying to make the first rules, with the attendant consequences for public confidence in the administration of justice, than to prevent this impasse from happening while the constitutional challenge is determined.

[88] The irreparable harm the Law Society says that it will suffer is its continued existence is in doubt, and its administrative programs will be irreparably interrupted. It will be forced to discharge a duty to participate in the transitional planning process that does not uphold and protect the public interest in the administration of justice. It will have been forced to act against both the independence of the bar and its mandate. The benchers will have been forced to act against their oaths of office. This harm to the Law Society's institutional fabric and to its reputation could not be repaired.

[89] The Law Society asserts that it will suffer irreparable monetary loss: section 228 of Bill 21 requires the Law Society and the Society of Notaries Public to pay the operational costs incurred by the transitional board; the transitional Indigenous council and the advisory committee in the exercise of their powers and the performance of their duties; remunerate the members of the transitional board and transitional Indigenous council and reimburse them for reasonable travel expenses and out-of-pocket expenses; and remunerate the person responsible for managing the transition from the current operation to the operation of Bill 21. The Law Society estimates these costs could exceed $1 million.

[90] The Law Society says that public confidence in the administration of justice will be shaken. It asserts:

> In the event the Law Society is ultimately successful in demonstrating that Bill 21 is inconsistent with the independence of the bar and unconstitutional as a result, a reasonable and informed person will have witnessed the government's concerted and determined efforts to implement a governance scheme that undermines the independence of the bar, not only in the face of opposition by the Law Society, [and other legal organizations], but also by forcing the Law Society to cooperate in the process.

Trial Lawyers

[91] The Trial Lawyers agree with and adopt the submission of the Law Society that the implementation of Bill 21 will cause irreparable harm.

[92] They assert that Bill 21 will irrevocably terminate lawyers' rights under s. 2(d) of the Charter to associate for the purposes of self-regulation and other purposes. It will be the end of the Law Society, institutionally, financially, and physically and be replaced by a regulator over which non-lawyers and representatives of government hold a functional majority, marking the end of any meaningful self-regulation and self-governance.

[93] The Trial Lawyers argue that Bill 21 will impair lawyers' ability to challenge government action and imperil individuals' Charter rights if there is no guarantee of an independent lawyer regulated by an independent regulator. Members of the legal profession are regularly involved in litigation for or against the government and self-governing First Nations. This may create a conflict in certain matters, for example, lawyers are also called upon to negotiate, conclude, and interpret agreements with governments and self-governing First Nations. They can no longer do so, because Bill 21 "affords the government and self-governing First Nations direct influence and control over lawyers' professional conduct." It creates a conflict of interest and imperils individuals' rights under ss. 7, 10(b), and 11(d) of the Charter.

[94] They point to an example where lawyers are seeking to challenge government action on the basis of alleged infringements of the Charter, Constitution, or otherwise. Lawyers' independence from government is "fundamental to lawyers' ability stand fearlessly between the state and its citizens". By abolishing self-regulation and the independence of the bar, Bill 21 undermines lawyers' ability to advocate for the rights of individuals and against inappropriate exercises of executive power.

[95] The Trial Lawyers say that Bill 21 will expose lawyers to potential investigation into their physical and mental health conditions, compelled treatment, and criminal sanctions. This is the combined effect of ss. 68 and 88 of Bill 21. This may expose lawyers to the threat of prosecution and potential imprisonment for refusing to submit to compelled medical treatment by LPBC. Further, lawyers will also be subject to sweeping and unreasonable warrantless searches by their new regulator. If Bill 21 is not stopped pending trial, lawyers can be the subject of warrantless searches and inquiries dealing with their mental health because mental health is now inseparable from competence under the new scheme.

The Province

[96] The Province argues that neither the transitional provisions nor the substantive provisions pose a risk of irreparable harm, or any harm. In this context, it urges a distinction be made between staying the transitional provisions in effect and a quia timet injunction enjoining the LGIC from bringing the substantive provisions into effect.

[97] In respect of the transactional provisions, the Province asserts that the transitional provisions have no practical consequence for lawyers or their clients.

[98] It says that for the Law Society, $1 million amounts to $70 per lawyer. In 2023, the Law Society earned more than $1 million of interest income on the $39 million reserve in its general fund and had an operating surplus of more than $2 million.

[99] The Province acknowledges that an interim injunction was granted in Harm Reduction Nurses, despite the regulations not being in effect, because of the irreparable harm arising from among other reasons: drug users would have to use drugs alone or in less public spaces, putting them at risk of dying from an overdose that may have been reversable if someone else had been nearby; and drug users found by police in prohibited areas could have whatever remained of their drug supply destroyed, which could lead them to purchase cheaper, lower quality drugs that are more likely to be toxic and cause death (at paras. 76-94).

[100] The Province submits that the transitional provisions do not impose any new obligations on lawyers. If the constitutional challenge succeeds and any constitutional problems with the Act are incurable by amendment, some time and modest resources may have been spent developing rules that are not ultimately implemented. The resources would not be wasted in any event: the work of the transitional board and transitional Indigenous council may result in useful concepts that can be considered by the benchers for incorporation into the rules.

[101] In respect of the substantive provisions, the Province argues that the plaintiffs have not established a quia timet injunction to prevent prospective harm should be granted. They have not shown that "a high degree of probability the alleged harm will in fact occur imminently or in the near future" without the injunction.

[102] The Province has expressed through their counsel that the substantive provisions will not be brought into force until the transitional planning process is completed and that will likely take 18-24 months. Thus, the application is premature. If this action is not resolved by the time the transitional planning process nears completion and it becomes realistic that the LGIC may bring the substantive provisions into force, then the Law Society can renew this application.

Conclusion on irreparable harm

Distinction between Transitional and Substantive Provisions

[103] It is my view that a distinction ought to be made between the transitional provisions that are in force and the substantive provisions that are not in effect. The jurisprudence makes a clear distinction.

Transitional Provisions

[104] Suspending legislation must only be done in clear, rare and exceptional cases.

[105] I do not find that the plaintiffs have established that irreparable harm will result from the enforcement of the transitional provisions. On the contrary, the plaintiffs' argument that they are inextricably intertwined with substantive provisions such that they must be suspended is speculative. Their assertion is that the transitional provisions lead to the enactment of the substantive provisions and they do not wish to participate in the transitional planning process set out in the Act.

[106] The transitional provisions do not threaten the existence of the Law Society. Its participation in such a process is vital in order to protect the independence of the bar, and ensure that its initiatives concerning access to justice and reconciliation are considered in the transitional planning process. Combining the regulation of legal professionals into a single regulator is supported by the Law Society and the Trial Lawyers. This transition will take place. The Law Society's expertise is necessary to make such a transition. The Law Society says it is being conscripted into a planning process that they do not agree with. The Law Society can make its concerns clear from within the transitional planning process.

[107] I am not convinced that requiring the Law Society to participate in the transitional planning process creates any harm, and certainly not irreparable harm. It is far from a clear case to justify the suspension of the legislation in force. I make the same finding in respect of the money that the Law Society must contribute to the transitional planning process. It is modest in relation to its assets. It may produce a positive, rather than negative result.

Substantive Provisions

[108] I reiterate that the position of the Law Society and the Trial Lawyers is that all of the provisions of the Act should be enjoined because they are inextricably intertwined. I have found that they are not.

[110] The Province has assured the court, through its counsel, that the LGIC will not bring the substantive provisions into effect until the transitional planning process is complete, likely 18-24 months from now. The plaintiffs are skeptical. They say that the Province has not provided an undertaking not to do so. There are no statutory preconditions to the LGIC bringing further provisions into force.

[111] Counsel for the Province have assured me that the transitional planning process must be complete and that it is unlikely to be complete before 18-24 months elapses. If it appears that the LGIC intends to bring the substantive provisions into effect before the transitional planning process is complete, the plaintiffs will have leave to bring an injunction application at that time. It is also likely that the plaintiffs' constitutional challenge will be heard and determined by this court in that time.

[112] I have found the Law Society's involvement in the transitional planning process to be valuable and appropriate, conscripted or not. That process may produce recommendations about what substantive provisions should be reflected in the Act.

[113] There is also the possibility that the transitional planning process does not complete or is not approved and that no substantive provisions, or those presently contained in the Act will be the substantive provisions that come into effect. Despite the Trial Lawyers assertion that it is inevitable, I consider that it is difficult to predict.

[114] In order to obtain a quia timet injunction, the plaintiffs must demonstrate a high probability that the alleged harm will, in fact, occur.

[116] In short, I find that the plaintiffs have not satisfied the test of irreparable harm.

Does the balance of convenience, taking into account the public interest, favour granting injunctive relief?

Law Society

[117] The Law Society says that it is "advancing a serious constitutional question that strikes at the bedrock of the Canadian legal system and of the administration of justice in this province." An injunction at this stage will protect the public interest in the administration of justice, before the any provision of the Act takes effect. The public interest is served because the constitutionality of the scheme will be determined as the first stage.

[118] The Law Society says that it is not asking this Court to determine whether the government is governing well, or to inquire into the effectiveness of government action. It does not resist the presumption that Bill 21 serves a public interest. Its argument is that "there is a countervailing, distinct, and significant public interest in an injunction pending determination of this critical constitutional question".

[119] The Law Society asserts that there is no real harm that arises from maintaining and preserving the status quo. It will continue with its work to implement the Truth and Reconciliation Action Plan, the Indigenous Framework, and the recommendations of the Mental Health Task Force, among many other initiatives and innovations, will continue uninterrupted. There are other ways to achieve the transition to a single regulator.

[120] The Law Society says that maintaining the status quo prevents Bill 21 from implementing "a radical and historic transformation from the longstanding status quo of legal governance in this province". Thus, the balance of convenience must weigh in favour of the issuance of an injunction. It adds that there is no risk to the public interest in the administration of justice if the injunction is granted and the status quo maintained.

Trial Lawyers

[121] The Trial Lawyers reiterate the Law Society's position on the status quo: there is a compelling public interest in enjoining the provisions of Bill 21 and determining its constitutional validity first. They say that "beyond the government's usual prerogative to have its laws effected, there is no equally urgent competing interest of the government that justifies changing the status quo pending trial."

The Province

[122] The Province refers to Harper, quoted above, that it is wrong to insist that the government provide proof that the law will produce a public good. In this case, "it is presumed that the Act will improve access to legal services and make lawyer regulation more responsive to the public interest. The public benefits of the Act must weigh heavily in the balance of convenience." This court must not assess whether the legislation will be successful in achieving its goals or whether there are preferable alternatives.

[123] Referring again to Harm Reduction Nurses, the Province says that Hinkson C.J. did not evaluate whether the impugned legislation was actually in the public interest, would succeed in realizing its objectives, or was preferable to conceivable alternatives. Rather, he found that the balance of convenience weighed in favour of a stay because the legislation would cause serious and specific harm that could not be reversed if the constitutional challenge succeeded: potentially preventable overdose deaths.

[124] The Province takes a similar position to that which it took in regard to the test of irreparable harm: there is no point in delaying the transitional planning process from taking place; there will be modest resources spent; the Province can amend the Act to conform with any constitutional problems that the court may find after a factual basis is established by the transitional planning process.

Conclusion on the balance of convenience

[125] It is my view that enjoining the Act engages the concern expressed in RJR-MacDonald: it implies the possibility that the government action does not have the effect of promoting the public interest. I find that it also implies that the Law Society and the Trial Lawyers have a superior understanding of the public interest and a greater role to play in protecting it. I do not agree with either implication.

[126] In particular, I specifically find that the transitional provisions promote a public good that the Law Society and the Trial Lawyers support: a single regulator, promoting reconciliation and access to justice.

[128] I further find that it is premature to enjoin the substantive provisions of the legislation and the balance of convenience is not met by doing so. I do not find that they are inextricably intertwined with transitional provisions because it assumes that the transitional planning process will not produce any results. I also accept the transitional planning process must be completed first and that it may influence the substantive provisions that do come into effect.

[129] Because the Law Foundation's submission refers to the effect of the substantive provisions I will not address it. Its position supporting an injunction is premature.

[130] Both the Law Society and the Trial Lawyers assert that the balance of convenience favours the status quo and that no change means no risk of harm. With respect, such a position at this third step of the test renders a consideration of irreparable harm superfluous. It is entirely undermined by a conclusion that balance of convenience favours the status quo because there will be no risk of harm in maintaining it.

[131] The plaintiffs have not demonstrated that the balance of convenience favours an interim injunction.

Summary

[132] While the plaintiffs have met the first test in RJR-MacDonald, a serious issue to be tried, I have found that they have not established that irreparable harm will result or that the balance on convenience supports the granting of an injunction.

[133] The application for an interlocutory injunction is dismissed without prejudice to the plaintiffs' right to reapply if there is a material change in circumstances and it becomes realistic that the LGIC may bring the substantive provisions into force in the near future.

Overview

[1] For over 150 years, since its creation in 1874, the Law Society of British Columbia [LSBC] has been an independent, self-governing society charged with regulating lawyers in the public interest.

[2] In 2024, the Legislature of British Columbia enacted Bill 21, Legal Professions Act, 5th Sess, 42nd Leg, British Columbia, 2024 (transition provisions assented to 16 May 2024) S.B.C. 2024, c. 26 [Bill 21] which provides for the amalgamation of the LSBC with the Society of Notaries Public of British Columbia [SNPBC] in order to create a new regulator (the "new regulator") with regulatory jurisdiction over lawyers, notaries public and paralegals as well as, potentially, new legal professions. A central element of Bill 21 is the elimination of self-governance and self-regulation of lawyers by a board comprised of a majority of elected lawyers.

[3] The plaintiffs in these two actions, the LSBC (Action No. S243258) and Trial Lawyers of British Columbia and Kevin Westall [together, TLABC] (Action No. S243325) challenge Bill 21 on the basis that it undermines the independence of the Bar, which is a foundational, underlying principle of the Canadian Constitution, and is therefore ultra vires the provincial legislature.

[4] The TLABC also alleges that aspects of Bill 21 violate the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, Part I of the Constitution Act, 1982, being Schedule B to the Canada Act 1982 (U.K.), 1982, c. 11, specifically ss. 2(d), 7, 8, 10(b) and 11(d).

Preliminary Issues

Proper Defendants

[5] The defendants seek an order removing His Majesty the King in Right of the Province of British Columbia as a defendant on the basis that the proper defendant in a constitutional challenge is the Attorney General: Allen v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles), 2 B.C.L.R. (2d) 255 at 260–61, 1986 CanLII 1044 (S.C.). The plaintiffs do not take issue with this position, thus the relief sought by the defendants will be granted and the style of cause amended accordingly. The Lieutenant Governor in Council [LGinC] remains a proper party given the plaintiffs' request for injunctive relief.

Evidentiary Issues

[6] Various evidentiary issues were raised. For example, the LSBC challenged the admissibility of certain affidavit evidence filed by the SNPBC describing the historical relationship between notaries and lawyers. The defendants also challenged portions of the evidence filed by the LSBC on the basis that it is hearsay, opinion, or both. The portions challenged as hearsay evidence include descriptions of the different law societies' involvement in developing legal professions legislation and historical facts drawn from academic and other literature. The evidence challenged as opinion includes, for example, legal opinion on the meaning and effect of the legislation.

[7] It is not necessary for me to rule on these objections. While I agree that aspects of the impugned evidence are problematic, for example various statements in the affidavit evidence filed by the LSBC effectively opining on the perceived impact of Bill 21 on the independence of the Bar, none of that evidence factors into my analysis in any meaningful way. Rather, the analysis turns on facts and evidence that are largely uncontradicted.

Current Regulatory Model: Legal Profession Act, S.B.C. 1998, c. 9

[8] At present, the LSBC is continued pursuant to the Legal Profession Act, S.B.C. 1998, c. 9, as amended [LPA]. Key elements of the current regulatory model, for the purposes of this case, include:

a) Section 3 confirms that it is the object and duty of the LSBC to "uphold and protect the public interest". Section 3 then sets out a number of functions of the LSBC which are intended to achieve that object.

b) Section 4 sets out the composition of the LSBC governing board. The directors, known as "benchers", are comprised of the Attorney General, up to six persons appointed by the Attorney General (pursuant to s. 5), and elected lawyers (pursuant to s. 7). Under s. 7, the benchers may establish rules governing elections, which rules currently provide for the election of 25 benchers distributed across nine geographic regions in the province.

c) Section 11 empowers the LSBC to make rules for the governing of the society, lawyers, law firms, articled students and applicants and for carrying out the LPA. The rules do not require government approval, although certain rules must be approved by a vote of members at a general meeting.

d) As part of its rule-making function under s. 11, the LSBC has established a Code of Professional Conduct, which is based in large part on the Federation of Law Societies' Model Code of Professional Conduct.

[9] Together, these provisions, as well as other aspects of the LPA, create the current self-governing and self-regulating model for the regulation of the legal profession in British Columbia.

New Regulatory Model: Bill 21

[10] As noted above, if brought into force, Bill 21 will significantly alter the regulation of lawyers in British Columbia. The key changes highlighted by the plaintiffs, which they say eliminate self-governance and self-regulation and undermine the independence of the Bar, include:

a) Section 3 designates the legal professions subject to regulation under Bill 21, including lawyers, notaries public, regulated paralegals and "a profession designated by regulation" (s. 3(d)). Section 4 then authorizes the LGinC, on the recommendation of the Attorney General, to make regulations designating a profession as a legal profession. Section 4(2) identifies a number of factors that the Attorney General must consider before making a recommendation, including in s. 4(2)(v) "whether the designation would have an undue impact on the independence of licensees under this Act".

b) Section 5 provides for the amalgamation of the LSBC and the SNPBC, with the newly formed regulator to be known as "Legal Professions British Columbia".

c) Section 6 sets out the duties of the new regulator, which include: (i) regulating the practice of law in BC; (ii) establishing standards and programs for the education, training, competence, practice and conduct of applicants, trainees, licensees and law firms; and (iii) ensuring the independence of licensees. Section 6(2) further directs that the regulator "must exercise its powers and perform its duties under this Act in the public interest".

d) Section 7 sets out a number of guiding principles that the regulator "must" have regard to in carrying out its functions, including in s. 7(b) "supporting reconciliation with Indigenous peoples and the implementation of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples" [UNDRIP] and in s. 7(c) "identifying, removing or preventing barriers to the practice of law in British Columbia that have a disproportionate impact on Indigenous persons and other persons belonging to groups that are under-represented in the practice of law".

e) Section 8 provides for a board of directors for the new regulator comprised of 17 directors as follows:

(i) 5 directors elected by and from among lawyers;

(ii) 2 directors elected by and from among notaries public who are not also lawyers;

(iii) 2 directors who are regulated paralegals;

(iv) 3 directors appointed by the LGinC, of whom at least one must be an individual of a First Nation;

2026 BCSC 779 (CanLII)

(v) 5 directors appointed by a majority of the other directors holding office, after a merit-based process, of whom 4 must be lawyers, one must be a notary public who is not a lawyer, and at least one must be an Indigenous person.

Pursuant to this section, the board of the new regulator is no longer controlled by a majority of elected lawyers. Prior to the creation of the new board, a transitional board will be put in place pursuant to s. 230.

f) Under section 10, the board of the new regulator may establish an executive committee of no more than five people, a maximum of two of whom can be elected lawyer directors.

g) Section 27 empowers the board to make any rules it considers necessary or advisable for the performance of the regulator's duties and provides that the board may make different rules for different legal professions. Section 26 provides that before making a rule, the board must consult the Indigenous Council (see below) respecting the extent to which the rule accords with the principles set out in ss. 7(b) and (c) [dealing with reconciliation and the removal of barriers].

h) Section 29 establishes the Indigenous Council and sets out the composition of the council. Section 30 sets out the role of the Indigenous Council, which includes:

(i) Advising and working in collaboration with the regulator on any matter relating to the implementation of UNDRIP in the context of the regulation of the practice of law in BC, including in respect of the incorporation of Indigenous legal traditions and Indigenous practices and the systemic challenges faced by Indigenous persons that require investigation and action by the regulator;

(ii) Advising on matters that under the Act require consultation with the Indigenous Council;

(iii) Participating in the regulator's strategic planning processes; and

(iv) Exercising certain approval powers as conferred by the Act.

i) Section 224 establishes a Transitional Indigenous Council which, pursuant to section 226, is required to collaborate with the transitional board of the new regulator to develop the first rules of the new regulator. Under s. 226(2)(b), any such new rules may not be made unless first approved by the Transitional Indigenous Council.

j) Section 37 provides that a person must not practice law in BC unless licenced under the Act. Section 38 sets out a number of exceptions to the s. 37 prohibition, including, in s. 38(1)(i), "a person in a class of persons prescribed under section 212" [which authorizes the LGinC to pass regulations prescribing classes of persons so exempted].

k) Section 211 confers a general regulation-making authority on the LGinC to make "regulations respecting any matter for which regulations are contemplated" by Bill 21. Pursuant to section 214, in the event of an inconsistency between a regulation made by the LGinC and a rule made under Bill 21, the regulation prevails.

[11] In addition to these provisions, the TLABC points to a number of additional sections of Bill 21 that it submits breach various Charter rights, including:

a) Section 78 authorizes the chief executive officer of the new regulator to enter the office of a lawyer or law firm and examine records relating to the practice of law and further, for the purposes of an investigation, to order a licensee or law firm to produce records and attend for an examination under oath.

b) Section 68, which sets out a number of definitions relating to professional conduct and competence, includes reference to a "health condition" preventing a licensee from practising law with reasonable skill and competence. In other words, according to the TLABC, Bill 21 equates a health condition, including a mental health condition, with incompetence.

c) Section 88 empowers the chief executive officer of the new regulator, upon determining that someone has practised law incompetently, to require a licensee or trainee to receive counselling or medical treatment, including treatment for a substance use disorder.

LSBC's and TLABC's Challenges to Bill 21

[12] I will address the specific arguments advanced by the LSBC and the TLABC under the various issues set out below, but it is useful to provide a general overview of their respective positions.

[13] The LSBC submits that an independent Bar is a fundamental, underlying principle of the Canadian Constitution and is vital to maintaining the legitimacy of Canada's constitutional democracy. They argue that the principle of an independent Bar is reflected in the written constitution, specifically the judicature provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 (ss. 96–101), and in ss. 7, 10 and 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. They submit that provincial legislatures cannot use the legislative authority granted under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867 to enact legislation undermining an independent Bar.

[14] The LSBC submits that Bill 21 does exactly that. It overturns over 150 years of self-governance and self-regulation and, in doing so, erodes the essential conditions of an independent Bar. As such, the LSBC contends that Bill 21 is ultra vires the provincial legislature and its powers under ss. 92(13) and 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[15] While the principal focus of the LSBC's challenge is the composition of the governing board of the new regulator, the LSBC submits that it is the "waterfall effect" of numerous measures contained in Bill 21 that, taken together, significantly erode the independence of the Bar.

[16] The TLABC supports the position of the LSBC on its vires arguments. Additionally, the TLABC submits that Bill 21 violates individuals' rights under ss. 7, 10(b) and 11(d) of the Charter by undermining the independence of the Bar and thereby impeding access to effective assistance by independent counsel and to a fair hearing before an independent judge. The TLABC further submits that Bill 21 violates lawyers' s. 2(d) right to free association, s. 8 right to be free from unreasonable search and seizure, and s. 7 right to life, liberty and security of the person. The s. 7 argument focusses on what the TLABC submits are provisions of Bill 21 that permit the chief executive officer of the new regulator to compel lawyers to undergo treatment for mental health conditions.

Position of the Attorney General of British Columbia

[17] The defendants acknowledge that independent lawyers play a crucial role in the administration of justice. However, the defendants argue that lawyers are not constitutionally guaranteed the right to be free from any and all forms of democratic regulation. They submit that the regulatory powers of lawyers' governing bodies are delegated to them by provincial legislatures and that the regulatory model chosen is a matter of legislative policy.

[18] The defendants also acknowledge that the regulatory powers of provincial legislatures are not unconstrained. For example, the legislature cannot enact legislation creating rules or imposing requirements on lawyers that undermine their fundamental duty to provide clients with independent advice and advocacy. Such a duty, they acknowledge, is a principle of fundamental justice protected under s. 7 of the Charter. The defendants submit that Bill 21 preserves the independence of lawyers when independence is understood in this sense.

[19] However, according to the defendants, the plaintiffs' claims go well beyond the protection of this duty by asserting that a model of self-governance, by which lawyers are governed by an independent regulator with a board comprised of a majority of elected lawyers, is constitutionally mandated. The defendants submit that there is no authority in Canada, or elsewhere in the democratic world, supporting this expansive definition of independence.

[20] With respect to the TLABC's Charter arguments, the defendants submit that these arguments are premised in large measure on a misreading of Bill 21 and a misapplication of the various Charter provisions and, accordingly, the Charter grounds are devoid of merit.

The Intervenors

[21] A number of parties were granted leave to intervene in the two proceedings. The positions advanced by the intervenors are summarized below.

Canadian Bar Association

[22] The Canadian Bar Association [CBA] submits that Bill 21 unconstitutionally impairs the independence of the Bar, both in fact and appearance, by eliminating self-regulation and giving the state control over the regulation of lawyers. They contend that lawyers play an indispensable role in the administration of justice through their independent advice and advocacy and that independence of the Bar and self-regulation are essential to protecting lawyer's crucial role in the administration of justice.

[23] They submit that to ensure public confidence in the justice system, the public must have the utmost confidence that the profession has institutional protections in place to ensure independence. They submit that self-regulation, defined as the governing board having a substantial majority of elected lawyers, is essential to maintaining both individual and institutional independence, as it ensures the regulator is answerable to the profession, not government, enabling lawyers to safeguard the independence of the Bar.

[24] Further, the CBA submits that while the Constitution does not expressly guarantee self-regulation or an independent Bar, a number of constitutional protections have no meaning without a self-regulating and independent Bar. They argue that these concepts are protected as unwritten constitutional principles that safeguard the rule of law and as necessary corollaries to the written guarantees in the judicature provisions and fair trial rights under the Charter.

[25] In the CBA's submission, Bill 21 eliminates self-regulation by replacing the strong majority of elected lawyers with a co-governance regime where government controls and participates directly in the regulation of lawyers. In their view, the new board being functionally controlled by non-lawyers and accountable to non-lawyers removes a structural protection to independence.

[26] Further, the CBA submits that Bill 21 puts lawyer regulation squarely in the hands of the state through: (a) rule-making power being held by a board not answerable or functionally controlled by lawyers; (b) Cabinet's authority to pass regulations to create new legal professions and define their scope of practice; (c) the legislature's role in defining professional conduct standards and competence requirements; (d) the removal of tools for democratic participation by lawyers in their governance; and (e) the changes to the regulator's mandate and the imposition of a government-defined guiding principle of independence. They submit that taken together these changes eliminate structural protections for institutional independence and grant unnecessarily broad powers to government to directly regulate the practice of law.

Law Society of Manitoba

[27] The Law Society of Manitoba [LSM] submits that an independent regulator is necessary to ensuring an independent Bar and that Bill 21 establishes a regulator that is not, or will not be seen to be, independent of government. While the LSM admits that there is no single way to ensure an independent Bar, it submits that self-regulation and self-governance are hallmarks of an independent Bar.

[28] The LSM focuses on the consequences of the proposed board structure and the ability of government to enact regulations that would override the regulator's decisions. The LSM submits that these two components of Bill 21 remove self-regulation and permit government control of the regulator.

[29] The LSM contends that the board is not self-regulating and thus not independent because: (1) lawyers do not form the majority of those appointing the board-appointed directors; (2) when the board is fully populated, lawyers have a majority by only one, such that attendance will dictate whether the regulator is self-governing; and (3) lawyers will not be a majority of the executive committee, if established. The LSM distinguishes its own board structure on the basis that none of its appointed benchers are appointed by government and appointed lawyers are appointed by a group of which the majority are duly elected lawyers.

[30] The LSM further submits that the government's power to make regulations which would prevail against any rule made by the regulator would mean that government could always override the decisions of the regulator and effectively eliminate the independence of the Bar. This ability, it contends, operates as a "trump" card allowing the government to usurp the regulator's decisions without limit, making the entire scheme subject to the whim of the government of the day.

Society of Notaries Public of British Columbia

[31] The intervenor the SNPBC submits that the proper constitutional framework to address this case is that the Constitution guarantees the independence of legal professions, not just lawyers. As such, the SNPBC submits that co-regulation and co-governance is constitutionally sound.

[32] The SNPBC submits that the rule of law, an essential component of the Constitution's architecture, is supported by the role of independent legal professionals beyond just advocacy and representation. It notes that notaries public play an important role in educating and guiding society to facilitate voluntary compliance with the law and that such compliance is an essential precondition to the rule of law. Thus, it submits that the Constitution's protection of independent legal professionals should focus on function rather than title.

[33] Under this framing, the SNPBC argues that the board composition constitutes appropriate government regulation which does not infringe independence of the legal professions. The SNPBC stresses that legal professions are not guaranteed independence from each other, just government or third parties, and cooperation between professions has the potential to further their shared constitutional role. As such, the SNPBC submits that Bill 21 simply creates a new framework for the self-governance of independent legal professionals.

[34] In response to the TLABC's s. 2(d) Charter arguments, the SNPBC submits that to the extent the TLABC suggests that a single regulator infringes lawyers' rights by compelling association with non-lawyers, this argument must be rejected. The SNPBC submits that such compelled association through collective regulation is appropriate in the circumstances and presents no danger to lawyers' liberty interests.

Indigenous Bar Association

[35] The intervenor the Indigenous Bar Association [IBA] submits that neither the Indigenous Council nor the s. 7(b) guiding principles undermine the independence of the Bar as properly understood and construed.

[36] The IBA contends that the Indigenous Council's role is carefully prescribed, is limited in scope, and does not create a model of co-governance. It cautions that a broad notion of independence cannot be enforced in the abstract; not all constraints on the governance and regulation of lawyers constitute an intrusion on independence. While the IBA questions the LSBC's articulation of independence as an unwritten constitutional principle, it submits that even under this articulation the Indigenous Council does not infringe the independence of the Bar. The IBA notes that the Indigenous Council's approval powers post-transition are limited in a way that does not undermine self-regulation. Further, it submits that the Transitional Indigenous Council does not undermine independence as it simply ensures an Indigenous voice in the creation of the first set of rules, and the first board, once constituted, may make any rules it considers necessary or advisable.

[37] Further, the IBA submits that any risk suggested by the plaintiffs that the Indigenous Council may be involved in the creation of rules that erode the independence of the Bar is not an inherent or structural risk and could be properly addressed through judicial review. It also asserts that having members of First Nations on the Indigenous Council does not create any inherent potential for bias or conflict of interest nor otherwise impair their ability to properly fulfill the mandate of the Indigenous Council. Such involvement has no proper analogy to threats to independence from direct state regulation.

[38] Regarding the guiding principles in s. 7(b), the IBA submits that these principles are not an imposition of government policy: they do not prescribe how the regulator must have regard to these principles and do nothing more than require the regulator to consider things it has already adopted. The IBA notes that the LSBC has itself taken steps to implement UNDRIP and further reconciliation. Further, they assert that neither UNDRIP nor reconciliation are “government policy”: reconciliation is the grand purpose of s. 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and through the Declaration of the Rights of Indigenous Peoples Act, S.B.C. 2019, c. 44 [DRIPA] the province has affirmed the application of UNDRIP to the laws of BC.

[39] Finally, the IBA submits that the principles of independence of the Bar and reconciliation should be considered together when interpreting the Constitution. The IBA notes that traditionally the concept of independence has been formulated without consideration of Indigenous perspectives, but that moving forward any conceptualization must account for an Indigenous perspective and be expressed in a way that furthers reconciliation.

Law Foundation of British Columbia

[40] The Law Foundation of British Columbia (the “Foundation”) intervened for the limited purpose of opposing the plaintiffs’ proposed alternative remedy that only some parts of Bill 21 be declared ultra vires. While the Foundation took no position on the outcome of the application generally, it submits that the alternative remedies could destabilize the Foundation’s ability to carry out its mandate.

[41] Bill 21 proposes several changes to the Foundation’s structure, including absorbing the Notary Foundation and making corresponding changes to its board. The Foundation submits that if Part 18, which revises the makeup of the Foundation, is declared ultra vires but Part 11, which sets out the role of the Foundation following the creation of the new regulator, remains, the Foundation would face procedural hurdles to their operations and a confusing and piecemeal governance structure.

[42] It submits that this would place the Foundation into a post-amalgamation state without the necessary transitional provisions to effect this change and make sense of the provisions that remain. The Foundation cautions that this resulting state of limbo would hinder their ability to fund vital legal services in BC.

Background/Context

[43] Considerable evidence was led by both the LSBC and the defendants about the history of legal regulation in BC and throughout Canada, regulatory structures in other countries and the process leading to the enactment of Bill 21.

[44] While this evidence provides some useful context, it has minimal bearing on the issues the Court needs to decide. I will therefore not review the evidence in detail but will highlight some of the key points that emerge.

History of the Regulation of Legal Professions in British Columbia and Elsewhere in Canada

British Columbia

[45] Since the LSBC was incorporated as the regulator of the legal profession in 1874, it has been largely self-regulating and self-governing. It has been led by benchers, a majority of whom have been elected lawyers, and since 1884 it has held the exclusive right to make rules and regulations in respect of the discipline of lawyers and admission to the bar with no requirement for consultation with, or approval by, any government or other external body.

[46] Throughout its existence, the LSBC has taken the lead on changes to its governing legislation, including by proposing and drafting amendments, often after consultation with the profession. Where the legislature has revised these proposals, the LSBC has historically maintained a collaborative role through this process.

[47] For example, when the LPA was revised and modernized in 1987, resulting in the Legal Profession Act, S.B.C. 1987, c. 25, the process was initiated and largely driven by the LSBC. It involved extensive consultation with the Bar and consensus-building, something noted by the government when the new legislation was introduced in the Legislature. Numerous subsequent amendments were made to the LPA leading to its current form, all of which involved extensive participation by and input from the LSBC. The LSBC submits that this history reflects an acknowledgement of its essential role in maintaining an independent Bar.

Other Canadian Jurisdictions

[48] At the time of Confederation, self-governance and self-regulation were not consistent features of lawyer regulation in the original provinces, and indeed each of the provinces had a different model of lawyer regulation. The provinces and territories that subsequently joined Canada also had varied regulatory models and none, at the time they joined, satisfied the conditions for both self-governance and self-regulation.

[49] Nonetheless, subject to certain exceptions described below, there are now several common features of lawyer regulation across Canadian jurisdictions, including: (1) the legal regulator is self-governing, governed by a majority of lawyers elected by lawyers, who are empowered to make rules for the governance of the society and the legal profession; (2) the legal regulator controls admission and discipline of lawyers; (3) the legal regulator is not required to consult with or get approval from any government or other entity in making rules and such entities are not allowed to make rules or regulations; and (4) the legal regulator plays a substantive role in developing and amending its governing legislation, including by making proposals for amendments.

[50] While these features can be described as general trends, they are not airtight rules.

[51] When these features came into being varies by jurisdiction. For example, while power over admission was often delegated fairly quickly following the creation of a legal regulator, when jurisdictions delegated disciplinary powers varies quite widely, with some legal regulators not gaining such powers until the 1920s or 30s. In the Yukon, lawyer discipline was regulated by the courts until 1984.

[52] Further, there are a number of exceptions to the trend of legal regulators holding independent and exclusive power to make rules and regulations. In Saskatchewan, if the Legislative Assembly finds a rule or amendment to a rule to be prejudicial to the public interest, then the rule ceases to have effect and is deemed to have been revoked. In New Brunswick, rules about the taxation of lawyers' fees require Cabinet approval. In Nova Scotia, Cabinet has a broad regulation-making power in relation to lawyer regulation.

[53] The Yukon is also a notable exception. Lawyers in the Yukon only became self-regulating in 1984, when the Law Society of the Yukon came into existence. From 1984 to 2017, Yukon's Cabinet had the power to annul any rule of the legal regulator it considered contrary to the public interest. In 2017, Yukon's Cabinet was granted the authority to create new categories of legal professionals.

[54] Manitoba and Québec are also particular outliers. Manitoba does not meet the LSBC's definition of self-governance as only 12 of its 25 benchers are lawyers elected by lawyers. The other 13 benchers consist of four appointed lawyer benchers, six appointed lay benchers, one articled student elected by the articling class, the immediate past president of the Law Society of Manitoba, and the Dean of the Faculty of Law of the University of Manitoba. Appointed benchers are selected through a committee process established by the Law Society of Manitoba.

[55] In Québec, the regulation of professional corporations was standardized by the Professional Code, S.Q. 1973, c. 43 (now in amended form, C.Q.L.R., c. C-26), leading to significant government oversight through a co-regulatory model. This legislation established the Offices des professions du Québec (the "Office"), whose members are appointed by Cabinet. Any proposed rule or regulation must be approved by both the Office and Cabinet. The Barreau must first send the rule or regulation to the Office for review for compliance with the Professional Code. After this review, the Office makes its recommendation to Cabinet, who may approve the rule or regulation, with or without modification, or withhold its approval. In exceptional circumstances, should the Barreau fail to draft rules or regulations required by the Professional Code or the Office, Cabinet can unilaterally impose those rules or regulations and determine their content. This oversight extends to the Barreau's Code of Professional Conduct.

The International Context

[56] The LSBC underscores the importance of maintaining a strong, independent Bar by reference to events in the United States where the current federal administration has engaged in what the LSBC describes as an "unprecedented assault on lawyers and the rule of law". The LSBC highlights these events not to suggest that Bill 21 is the equivalent to the actions taken in the United States, but rather to make the point that the elimination of self-governance and self-regulation undermines the independence of the Bar and thereby weakens an essential safeguard for ensuring that the rule of law and our essential democratic structures remain intact. For their part, the defendants point to the regulatory models adopted in Australia and New Zealand which involve systems of co-regulation in which the courts, government, professional associations and statutory boards all have defined roles. For example, in certain Australian states and in New Zealand, aspects of lawyer discipline are handled by statutory commissioners or boards. The defendants submit that these different models function well in serving the public interest and do not threaten lawyer independence.

[57] The evidence of the regulatory models in Australia and New Zealand illustrates that there are different approaches to the regulation of lawyers in other jurisdictions. However, given the very different constitutional frameworks existing in those countries, these examples have minimal relevance to the issues that arise in this case.

Process Leading to the Enactment of Bill 21

[58] In the same way that the substance of Bill 21 represents a significant departure from the long-established approach to the regulation of lawyers in BC, so too did the process leading to its enactment.

[59] As discussed above, while the LSBC has always been established and governed pursuant to statute, it has also always been consulted, and indeed has generally taken the lead, on developing legislative amendments impacting the regulation of lawyers.

[60] That was not the case in respect of the development of Bill 21.

[61] The government first announced in March 2022 that it intended to create a new regulatory model to govern lawyers, notaries and paralegals. That announcement was followed in September 2022 with the publication of an Intentions Paper on the Legal Professions Regulatory Modernization (the "Intentions Paper") which outlined the policy objectives of the proposed new model. The Intentions Paper expressly addressed the independence of the Bar. It stated:

> The importance of an independent bar to the functioning of a free and democratic society cannot be overstated. The Ministry is not proposing, and has no intention of implementing, changes that would interfere with the ability of a lawyer (or other legal service provider) to fearlessly advocate for their client and provide independent legal advice to their client, even, and especially, when their client is at odds with government.

[62] The Intentions Paper invited submissions from the Bar and the public on those policy objectives and in May 2023, the Ministry published a "What We Heard" report summarizing the submissions received. Those submissions included responses from the CBA and other legal organizations, as well as individual lawyers and members of the public.

[63] Thereafter, and indeed throughout the 2022–2024 period, there were numerous meetings between government representatives and the various legal organizations at which the policy underpinnings of the proposed new regulatory model were discussed. Benchers of the LSBC were provided with copies of the draft legislation during these meetings, although they were required to keep the drafts confidential.

[64] While the LSBC acknowledges that the government consulted in a general way about the proposed changes to the regulation of the various legal professions, its central complaint is that government did not share publicly a draft of Bill 21 before it was first tabled in the legislature and, as such, the government made no effort to build consensus with the Bar and the public.

[65] The point made by the LSBC and TLABC is that the long and established history of the Bar, through the LSBC, being consulted and directly involved in developing its own governing legislation reflects an acknowledgment of the self-governing status of the profession as an integral aspect of an independent Bar. The failure to follow a similar process in respect of Bill 21, in the LSBC's submission, demonstrates a disregard for the LSBC's role and for the importance of an independent Bar.

[66] However, as I noted at the outset, the evidence about the process leading to the enactment of Bill 21 has minimal bearing on the issues before the Court in this litigation. While that process did indeed depart from past practice, I agree with the defendants that this is a political issue rather than a legal or constitutional one.

Issues

[67] The following issues arise:

a) Is the independence of the Bar an unwritten constitutional principle?

b) If so, what is the content of or meaning to be given to that principle?

c) Does Bill 21, in whole or in part, infringe the principle of an independent Bar?

2026 BCSC 779 (CanLII)

d) Does Bill 21 infringe the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, specifically ss. 2(d), 7, 8, 10(b) and/or 11(d)?

e) If so, can the infringement(s) by justified in a free and democratic society pursuant to s. 1?

f) If some or all of Bill 21 is found to be unconstitutional, what is the appropriate remedy?

Analysis

Overview

[68] It is common ground that the provinces have legislative authority to regulate the practice of law in the province pursuant to ss. 92(13) and 92(14) of the Constitution Act, 1867: Law Society of British Columbia v. Mangat, 2001 SCC 67 at paras. 38, 42 [Mangat]. Indeed, it has long been recognized that the authority of governing bodies like the LSBC is delegated to those bodies by the provincial legislatures: Finney v. Barreau du Québec, 2004 SCC 36 at paras. 1, 14, 22.

[69] The central question in this case is whether the legislature, in enacting Bill 21, acted outside of that authority by creating a regulatory structure that improperly undermines the independence of the Bar.

[70] As a preliminary point, it is useful to note that the parties differ on the proper analytical framework. The LSBC submits that the first part of the analysis should be broken down into two issues: (i) is the independence of the Bar an unwritten constitutional principle? and (ii) if so, what is the meaning and content of the principle of the independence of the Bar?

[71] The defendants argue that these two issues are better analyzed through the lens of a single question: does the Constitution protect absolute lawyer independence as claimed by the plaintiffs? As part of this approach, the defendants say that the LSBC defines independence in the broadest possible way. They go so far as to suggest that the LSBC's formulation of lawyer independence would mean that law societies, and individual lawyers, could not be subject to the provisions of the Criminal Code and human rights legislation or to oversight by the courts.

[72] The difficulty with the defendants' formulation is that it mischaracterizes the LSBC's position and purports to address an argument not advanced by the LSBC. Specifically, the LSBC does not argue that an independent Bar requires lawyers to have "absolute" independence in the sense of being free from "any and all forms of democratic regulation", and, as such, the defendants' proposed single question approach does not align with the case as advanced by the plaintiffs.

[73] Further, I agree with the LSBC that the analysis of the constitutional status of an independent Bar involves two distinct concepts or questions: (i) is the independence of the Bar a foundational constitutional principle? and (ii) if so, what is the meaning or content of that principle and what legal rules flow therefrom?

[74] Another central theme of the defendants' position is that the harms alleged by the plaintiffs, and by the CBA, in terms of the impact of Bill 21 on an independent Bar are largely speculative in that they assume hypothetical worst-case scenarios. The defendants submit that that is an improper basis for assessing the constitutionality of legislation. They cite Brown v. Canada (Citizenship and Immigration), 2020 FCA 130 at paras. 61–88, where the court observed at para. 79 that there "is no proposition of law that legislation, to pass constitutional muster, must exclude all possibility of unconstitutional exercises of discretion." The defendants argue that in the event the new regulator makes a decision, or takes an action, that undermines the principle of independence, that decision or action can be challenged by way of judicial review. The IBA makes a similar argument.

[75] That is true; however, that does not obviate the need to examine Bill 21 to determine whether it creates a regulatory structure that improperly undermines the independence of the Bar. Put another way, the LSBC's challenge is directed at the regulatory model created by Bill 21, not the possible future decisions of the new regulator. As the Supreme Court of Canada held in Reference re Impact Assessment Act, 2023 SCC 23:

> [74] … a court cannot circumvent its duty to meaningfully review the constitutionality of legislation by suggesting that, insofar as an administrative decision maker applies a law unconstitutionally, the application of that law may be judicially reviewed. The constitutional validity of a law and its administrative application are distinct concepts. Where a constitutionally valid law grants a decision maker broad and imprecise discretion, that discretion must be exercised reasonably and in accordance with the purpose for which it was given … But where a law is ultra vires and therefore unconstitutional, it cannot be saved by the prospect of administrative judicial review.

[76] One other preliminary point is worth highlighting. Throughout their submissions, both written and oral, the defendants offered no clear rationale for the significant changes brought about to the regulation of lawyers under Bill 21 or to the jettisoning of the long-established practice of consultation and collaboration with the legal profession about changes to their governing legislation.

[77] The defendants describe the purpose of Bill 21 in these terms (written submission at para. 115):

> … the purpose of the Act is to provide for simpler, streamlined regulation of all legal professionals in the province through a single regulator, to offer more choices (and more affordable choices) of legal service providers for the public, to modernize the governance and electoral structure of the regulator, to preserve the independence of licensees, and to advance reconciliation within the legal professions. The purpose of the Act is not to end or diminish lawyer independence. (Nor does the Act have that effect …).

[78] While the plaintiffs take issue with this last statement, they support generally the objects of Bill 21 as stated by the defendants. However, as they note, those objects do not explain or support the fundamental governance changes brought about by Bill 21.

[79] The defendants rightly submit that absence of a clear justification for the legislation, as well as the failure to obtain consensus with lawyers and the public, are irrelevant to the constitutionality of the legislation ultimately enacted by the legislature. That is true. However, the inability, or failure, to justify overturning 150 years of self-regulation, in the face of widespread opposition from the Bar, is notable.

Is the Independence of the Bar an Unwritten Constitutional Principle?

[80] It has long been established that Canada's Constitution has both written and unwritten terms. The written constitution includes the Constitution Act, 1867, Constitution Act, 1982 as well as the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The unwritten constitution includes principles central to Canada's system of democratic governance, including federalism, democracy, constitutionalism and the rule of law, and respect for minorities: Reference Re Secession of Quebec, [1998] 2 S.C.R. 217 at para. 32, 1998 CanLII 793 [Secession Reference]. In identifying these "fundamental and organizing principles", the Supreme Court made it clear that this list is not exhaustive.

[81] The unwritten constitutional principles "inform and sustain the constitutional text: they are the vital unstated assumptions upon which the text is based": Secession Reference at para. 49.

[82] In Reference Re Remuneration of Judges of the Provincial Court of Prince Edward Island, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 3, 1997 CanLII 317, Chief Justice Lamer held that judicial independence is also an unwritten constitutional principle:

> [83] … Notwithstanding the presence of s. 11(d) of the Charter, and ss. 96-100 of the Constitution Act, 1867, I am of the view that judicial independence is at root an unwritten constitutional principle, in the sense that it is exterior to the particular sections of the Constitution Acts. The existence of that principle, whose origins can be traced to the Act of Settlement of 1701, is recognized and affirmed by the preamble to the Constitution Act, 1867. The specific provisions of the Constitution Acts, 1867 to 1982, merely "elaborate that principle in the institutional apparatus which they create or contemplate" …

[83] An independent Bar has similarly been described by Canadian courts at all levels as an essential underpinning of Canada's constitutional order and as necessary for maintaining an independent judiciary and the proper administration of justice.

[84] One of the most oft-cited articulations of this concept is found in Attorney General of Canada v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 307 at 335–36, 1982 CanLII 29 [Jabour], where Justice Estey, speaking for the Court said:

> The independence of the Bar from the state in all its pervasive manifestations is one of the hallmarks of a free society. Consequently, regulation of these members of the law profession by the state must, so far as by human ingenuity it can be so designed, be free from state interference, in the political sense, with the delivery of services to the individual citizens in the state, particularly in fields of public and criminal law. The public interest in a free society knows no area more sensitive than the independence, impartiality and availability to the general public of the members of the Bar and through those members, legal advice and services generally.

[85] In a similar vein, in Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143 at 187, 1989 CanLII 2, Justice McIntyre said:

> It is incontestable that the legal profession plays a very significant — in fact, a fundamentally important — role in the administration of justice, both in the criminal and the civil law. I would not attempt to answer the question arising from the judgments below as to whether the function of the profession may be termed judicial or quasi-judicial, but I would observe that in the absence of an independent legal profession, skilled and qualified to play its part in the administration of justice and the judicial process, the whole legal system would be in a parlous state.

[86] In R. v. Neil, 2002 SCC 70, the Supreme Court again emphasized the importance of an independent Bar, of which a lawyer's duty of undivided loyalty is a fundamental component, as essential to maintaining public confidence in the legal system:

> [12] … Unless a litigant is assured of the undivided loyalty of the lawyer, neither the public nor the litigant will have confidence that the legal system, which may appear to them to be a hostile and hideously complicated environment, is a reliable and trustworthy means of resolving their disputes and controversies …
> [13] The value of an independent bar is diminished unless the lawyer is free from conflicting interests.

[87] These are but three of an innumerable number of judicial statements acknowledging the importance of an independent Bar. In my view, these are not merely examples of judges spouting eloquent but meaningless platitudes. Rather, they reflect judicial acknowledgement that an independent Bar is a foundational constitutional principle.

[88] While the independence of the Bar is an unwritten constitutional principle, it is a principle that is implicit in certain parts of the written constitutional text, specifically in the judicature provisions of the Constitution Act, 1867 (ss. 96–101) and in the fundamental rights and freedoms guaranteed under ss. 7, 10(b) and 11(d) of the Charter.

[89] The judicature provisions establish certain requirements for maintaining an independent superior judiciary. Those provisions protect the core jurisdiction of the superior courts, granting them a "special and inalienable status": Trial Lawyers Association of British Columbia v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2014 SCC 59 at para. 29 [Trial Lawyers].

[90] Sections 97 and 98 specifically acknowledge the existence of the Bars of Ontario, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Quebec and direct that judges appointed to the superior courts of those provinces must be selected from the Bars of the respective province. In doing so, the Constitution implicitly contemplates the continuance of independent Bars.

[91] Professor, now Justice, Patrick Monahan made this point in his article "The Independence of the Bar as a Constitutional Principle in Canada" in In the Public Interest: The Report and Research Papers of the Law Society of Upper Canada's Task Force on the Rule of Law and the Independence of the Bar (Toronto: Irwin Law, 2007) at p. 131:

> The link between the independence of the judiciary and the independence of the Bar is also implicitly recognized by sections 97 and 98 of the Constitution Act, 1867, which require that judges of the Superior Courts in the provinces be chosen from the Bars of those provinces. Like the other guarantees in Part VII of the Act, this requirement is intended to protect the independence of the judiciary, given the independence of the Bars of the provinces as they existed in 1867. In this sense, the Constitution Act, 1867 assumes the continued existence of independent bars in the provinces, as an essential element in the protection of the independence of the judiciary.

See also: Roy Millen, “The Independence of the Bar: An Unwritten Constitutional Principle” (2005) 84:1 The Canadian Bar Review 107.

[92] The independence of the courts is, in turn, inextricably tied to the independence of the Bar, both by virtue of the fact that judges are selected from the independent Bars of each province and territory and, equally importantly, that the courts can only function by having lawyers present evidence and arguments in accordance with their duties owed to their clients and to the administration of justice more generally.

[93] The defendants submit that the judicature provisions do not support a finding that independence of the Bar is a constitutional principle because those provisions are structural in nature rather than rights-conferring: British Columbia (Attorney General) v. Le, 2023 BCCA 200 at paras. 191–195, citing Poorkid Investments Inc. v. Ontario (Solicitor General), 2023 ONCA 172 at para. 31.

[94] However, the LSBC does not rely on the judicature provisions as conferring rights on individual lawyers. Rather, as Professor Monahan notes, those provisions protect the independence of the judiciary as a key structural component of the Canadian constitutional framework which assumes, and indeed is largely dependent upon, the existence of an independent Bar. Similarly, an independent Bar is necessary to ensure that the fundamental rights enshrined by ss. 7, 10(b) and 11(d) are properly acknowledged and protected.

[95] To conclude on this issue, I am satisfied that the independence of the Bar is an unwritten constitutional principle, the importance of which is well captured in the oft-cited statement of Jack Giles K.C. in his article “The Independence of the Bar” (2001) 59:4 The Advocate 549 at 549, where he said:

> The principle of an independent bar, like the principle of an independent judiciary, is an idea that has a fundamental constitutional character. This is so because where it is interfered with all other constitutional rights including the rule of law are placed in jeopardy.
> It is simply inconceivable that a constitution which guarantees fundamental human rights and freedoms should not first protect that which makes it possible to benefit from such guarantees, namely every citizen’s > constitutional right to effective, meaningful and unimpeded access to a court of law through the aegis of an independent bar.

What Is the Meaning of or Content to Be Given to the Principle of the Independence of the Bar?

[96] As noted above, the LSBC does not advance a conception of "absolute" lawyer independence as suggested by the defendants. Rather, the LSBC's conception of independence is well stated in its written submission (at para. 67):

> An independent Bar composed of lawyers who are free of influence by public authorities (or any other source) is a fundamental component of our free society. Independence of the Bar is the fundamental public right that lawyers may provide legal assistance for or on behalf of a client without fear of interference or sanction by the government, subject only to the lawyer's professional responsibilities as prescribed by the Law Society, and the lawyer's general duty as a citizen to obey the law.

[97] This formulation aligns with Justice Estey's description in Jabour (see para. 84 above) of an independent Bar being free from influence by "the state in all of its pervasive manifestations" to ensure that members of the public receive independent and impartial legal advice and services.

[98] Independence of the Bar is not an abstract concept but rather manifests itself in the work that lawyers do to advance and protect the interests of their clients.

[99] Throughout the history of Canada, and particularly since the enactment of the Charter, Canadian courts have been called upon to make decisions having direct and significant impacts on the social and economic fabric of the country.

[100] These cases only happened because of the diligent and courageous efforts of lawyers who advanced novel positions in the face of opposing interests, often represented by the state.

> [53] … One of the great and often unrecognized strengths of Canadian society is the existence of an independent bar. Because of that > independence, lawyers are available to represent popular and unpopular interests, and to stand fearlessly between the state and its citizens.

[102] The importance of an independent Bar is of course not limited to litigation matters. In the commercial world, lawyers are at the heart of the transactions that drive our economy. It is lawyers who negotiate, structure and paper the deals in our natural resource, real estate, technology and other sectors that impact so directly on the financial well-being of the citizens of our province and our country.

[103] Similarly, lawyers are intimately involved in advising governments at all levels on the constitutionality and general legality of public laws and initiatives.

[104] The essential role of lawyers is perhaps best reflected in the area of criminal law where, on a daily basis, lawyers act to protect the liberty of their clients in criminal prosecutions backed by the weight and resources of the state.

[105] In Andrews at 188, Justice McIntyre commented on the role of lawyers in the administration of justice, noting the particular burdens on lawyers in the criminal law:

> … While it may be arguable whether the lawyer exercises a judicial, quasi-judicial, or governmental role, it is clear that at his own discretion he can invoke the full force and authority of the State in procuring and enforcing judgments or other remedial measures which may be obtained. It is equally true that in defending an action he has the burden of protecting his client from the imposition of such state authority and power. By any standard, these powers and duties are vital to the maintenance of order in our society and the due administration of the law in the interest of the whole community.

[106] It is axiomatic that in carrying out their advisory and advocacy roles in each of these areas, lawyers must be, and must be seen to be, independent from outside influences, including, in particular, the influence of the state.

[107] This concept of lawyer independence is central to the concept of an independent Bar as formulated in the various decisions referred to above and reflects the fact that the right to impartial advice free from undue outside influence is a right that belongs to clients: Jabour at 335–36.

[108] Thus, legislation or other measures said to undermine the independence of the Bar must be examined through the lens of the impact on lawyers' ability to provide such impartial advice and zealous advocacy. This includes measures directed at lawyers individually that might affect the lawyer-client relationship, but also legislation establishing the regulatory model and structures governing matters such as eligibility for licensure, competence, professional conduct and discipline. Simply put, lawyers cannot be said to be truly independent if they are subject to regulation by a body which is itself controlled, or unduly influenced, by outside forces, particularly those exerted by the state.

[109] The need for institutional independence acknowledges the fact that in addition to the duties owed to clients, lawyers owe broader duties to the courts and to the administration of justice more generally. As Justice McIntyre said in Andrews, the powers and duties exercised by lawyers "are vital to the maintenance of order in our society and the due administration of the law in the interest of the whole community": at 188 (see para. 105 above). See also: Fortin v. Chrétien, 2001 SCC 45 at paras. 52–53; Mangat at para. 45.

[110] Accordingly, determination of the plaintiffs' vires arguments turns on whether Bill 21 violates this conception of an independent Bar, by interfering with or unduly influencing the duties owed by lawyers, both to their clients and to the administration of justice more broadly, either through its direct application to lawyers and their clients or by way of the regulatory structure it creates.

The Relationship of Unwritten Constitutional Principles to the Written Constitution

[111] Having found that the independence of the Bar is an unwritten constitutional principle, the next question is how that principle applies to the analysis of the constitutional validity of Bill 21.

[112] The role of unwritten constitutional principles in interpreting and applying the written text of the Constitution was considered by the Supreme Court of Canada in

Toronto (City) v. Ontario (Attorney General), 2021 SCC 34, a decision that both the LSBC and the defendants rely on in support of their respective positions.

[113] Toronto (City) was a constitutional challenge to legislation enacted by the Ontario legislature reducing the size of the Toronto city council. The legislation was passed during the course of an ongoing municipal election.

[114] The judge at first instance found that the legislation limited the municipal candidates' right to freedom of expression as guaranteed by s. 2(b) of the Charter and municipal voters' right to effective representation under s. 2(b) and that the legislation could not be saved under s. 1. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal.

[115] A further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was dismissed on the basis of a slim 5-4 majority. For the purposes of the present case, of note is the Supreme Court's discussion of the unwritten constitutional principle of democracy and whether it could be used by a court to invalidate otherwise valid provincial legislation.

[116] The majority, relying on previous decisions of the Court (for example Secession Reference), confirmed that certain unwritten principles are foundational components of the Canadian Constitution that have "full legal force" and that "can guide and constrain the decision-making of the executive and legislative branches": at para. 49.

[117] According to the majority, unwritten principles are not "provisions" of the Constitution, rather they are general principles that serve to give effect to the written text: at para. 54. The unwritten principles do so in two ways:

a) They may be used in the interpretation of constitutional provisions, e.g., the unwritten principles of judicial independence and the rule of law have aided in the interpretation of ss. 96–100 of the Constitution Act, 1867 which safeguard the core jurisdiction of superior court judges (at para. 55); and

b) They can be used to develop structural doctrines unstated in the written Constitution (at para. 56).

[118] However, according to the majority:

> [57] Neither of these functions support the proposition advanced by the City that the force of unwritten principles extends to invalidating legislation. Indeed, the truth of the matter is to the contrary. Attempts to apply unwritten constitutional principles in such a manner as an independent basis to invalidate legislation, whether alone or in combination, suffer from a normative and a practical deficiency, each related to the other, and each fatal on its own.
>
> [58] First, such attempts trespass into legislative authority to amend the Constitution, thereby raising fundamental concerns about the legitimacy of judicial review and distorting the separation of powers …
> [59] Secondly, unwritten constitutional principles are "highly abstract" and "[u]nlike the rights enumerated in the Charter — rights whose textual formulations were debated, refined and ultimately resolved by the committees and legislative assemblies entrusted with constitution-making authority — the concept[t] of democracy . . . ha[s] no canonical formulation[n]" …

[119] The majority went on to make the point that unwritten principles, particularly the principle of democracy, weigh strongly in favour of upholding the validity of legislation that conforms to the written text of the Constitution and thus cannot be used to narrow the broad legislative competence afforded provincial legislatures under s. 92: at para. 80.

[120] The defendants submit that the majority decision in Toronto (City) is fatal to the position of the plaintiffs, who seek to invalidate Bill 21 by reason of the unwritten principle of the independence of the Bar.

[121] The LSBC disagrees. The LSBC submits that it is seeking to apply the unwritten constitutional principle of an independent Bar in the first way acknowledged by the Court in Toronto (City)—to interpret written aspects of the Constitution, specifically ss. 92(13) and (14). It says that, based on the principle of the independence of the Bar, those provisions of the Constitution must be interpreted narrowly so as not to undermine that independence.

[122] The LSBC submits that this interpretation and application of Toronto (City) is consistent with other Supreme Court of Canada authorities. For example, the LSBC cites Trial Lawyers where the Court invalidated hearing fees established under the BC Supreme Court Rules as being inconsistent with s. 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

[123] Speaking for the majority in Trial Lawyers, Chief Justice McLachlin noted that while s. 92(14) confers broad authority on provincial legislatures in connection with the administration of justice, which include the power to levy hearing fees, that power is not unconstrained. Rather, the province's authority under s. 92(14) must be considered and interpreted in light of other provisions of the Constitution, specifically s. 96: at paras. 24–25.

[124] According to Chief Justice McLachlin, s. 96, while referring to the appointment of judges, protects the core jurisdiction of the superior courts, a central element of which is the resolution of disputes: at paras. 28–29, 32. Thus, hearing fees that impede people's ability to access the courts undermine that core function and are therefore inconsistent with s. 96: at para. 32.

[125] While this finding was sufficient to dispose of the issue before the Court, Chief Justice McLachlin also found support for her position in the unwritten constitutional principle of the rule of law, which is "inextricably intertwined" with the s. 96 function (at para. 39). The Chief Justice said:

> [40] In the context of legislation which effectively denies people the right to take their cases to court, concerns about the maintenance of the rule of law are not abstract or theoretical. If people cannot challenge government actions in court, individuals cannot hold the state to account — the government will be, or be seen to be, above the law. If people cannot bring legitimate issues to court, the creation and maintenance of positive laws will be hampered, as laws will not be given effect. And the balance between the state's power to make and enforce laws and the courts' responsibility to rule on citizen challenges to them may be skewed: Christie v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2005 BCCA 631, 262 D.L.R. (4th) 51, at paras. 68-69, per Newbury J.A.

[126] Thus, the principle of the rule of law supported Chief Justice McLachlin's finding that "s. 92(14), read in the context of the Constitution as a whole, does not give the provinces the power to administer justice in a way that denies the right of Canadians to access courts of superior jurisdiction": at para. 43.

[127] In Toronto (City), the majority referred to Trial Lawyers and described Chief Justice McLachlin's analysis in these terms:

> [75] … The rule of law was used in [Trial Lawyers] as an interpretive aid to s. 96, which in turn was used to narrow provincial legislative authority under s. 92(14). The rule of law was not being used as an independent basis for invalidating the impugned court fees. In this way, McLachlin C.J.'s reasoning simply reflects a purposive interpretation of s. 96 informed by unwritten constitutional principles.

[128] The LSBC submits that, similarly, in this case, the independence of the Bar is being used as an aid in interpreting the scope of provincial legislative authority under ss. 92(13) and (14).

[129] As noted above, the defendants submit that the majority finding in Toronto (City) is a complete answer to the LSBC's arguments. They further submit that if there is any uncertainty arising out of Toronto (City), that uncertainty is put to rest by Mercer v. Yukon (Government of), 2025 YKCA 5.

[130] There, the appellant brought a constitutional challenge to the Yukon Civil Emergency Measures Act, R.S.Y. 2002, c. 34 [CEMA] pursuant to which the territorial government declared a state of emergency during the COVID-19 pandemic. The appellant argued that CEMA improperly delegated various legislative functions to the executive branch of government and, as such, the Act violated the unwritten constitutional principles of democracy, rule of law, separation of powers, responsible government and parliamentary sovereignty.

[131] The Court of Appeal reproduced the trial judge's summary of the appellant's argument as an accurate distillation of the position advanced at trial and on appeal (at para. 12):

> [56] The plaintiffs say that CEMA is inconsistent with the structure of the Yukon Act that provides for three branches of government—legislative, executive, and judicial—each operating within their own sphere of activity. This structure is informed not only by the text of the Yukon Act but also by unwritten constitutional principles, identified by the plaintiffs as democracy, rule of law, separation of powers, responsible government, and parliamentary sovereignty. These principles assist in interpreting the text of the Yukon Act, the delineation of spheres of jurisdiction, the scope of rights and obligations, and the role of political institutions (Reference Secession at para. 52). The plaintiffs say a consideration of CEMA in the context of these principles and the text of the Yukon Act, reveals it as legislation that improperly interferes with the legislative and judicial realms, by giving powers or protections to the executive that intrude into those of the other two branches. The plaintiffs say there are limits on the delegation of powers by the Legislature, limits that come from the constitutional text (i.e. the Yukon Act) and unwritten constitutional principles. CEMA does not respect those limits and as such is unconstitutional. The plaintiffs refer to this as an improper delegation of the core competence of the Legislature.

[132] As is the case here, the parties in Mercer disagreed on the proper interpretation and application of Toronto (City). The Court of Appeal noted the permissible uses of unwritten constitutional principles as determined by the Supreme Court in Toronto (City) and observed that the appellant was not seeking to rely on either of those permissible uses:

> [45] Having rejected the dissent's approach to [unwritten constitutional principles], the Court in City of Toronto explained that [unwritten constitutional principles] "may assist courts in only two distinct but related ways": at para. 54, emphasis added. These two ways are: 1) to aid in the interpretation of constitutional provisions; and 2) to assist in developing unstated structural doctrines that can fill gaps regarding questions on which the text of the Constitution is silent.
> [46] I note that Mr. Mercer does not rely on either of these permissible uses here. He does not seek to interpret particular provisions of the Yukon Act or Constitution, nor does he rely on [unwritten constitutional principles] to fill gaps in the constitutional structure. Rather, he asks this Court to conclude that CEMA is invalid because it does not respect [unwritten constitutional principles]. This is directly contrary to the majority's holding in City of Toronto that "[a]ttempts to apply unwritten constitutional principles…as an independent basis to invalidate legislation" suffer from two "fatal" deficiencies: at para. 57. First, there is the possibility of an unwarranted intrusion by the court into the legislative authority to amend the Constitution. Second, the "highly abstract" nature of [unwritten constitutional principles], if used in this way, could serve to decrease legal certainty and predictability: at para. 59. As the Court noted, "protection from legislation that some might view as unjust or unfair properly lies not in the amorphous underlying principles of our Constitution, but in its text and the ballot box": City of Toronto at para. 59,

> quoting British Columbia v. Imperial Tobacco Canada Ltd., 2005 SCC 49 at para. 66.

[133] The Court of Appeal concluded:

> [49] In sum, Mr. Mercer's position is similar to that rejected by the majority in City of Toronto: he is inviting judicial invalidation of CEMA in a manner that is wholly untethered from basic constitutional structure. The structure of the Constitution is to be addressed via purposive textual interpretation: City of Toronto at para. 53. Here, Mr. Mercer argues CEMA interferes with ss. 10–16 of the Yukon Act, but offers no explanation as to how that occurs. With the exception of the reference to "responsible government" in the preamble of the Yukon Act, which I address in the next section, Mr. Mercer's arguments do not point to any text, with or without the support of [unwritten constitutional principles], to support his assertion of constitutional invalidity.

[134] The Court of Appeal went on to find that the appellant's reliance on the term "responsible government" was misplaced. Specifically, the Court held that the delegation of certain functions to the executive branch under CEMA was well within the legislature's authority: at paras. 60–61.

[135] The defendants here submit that the LSBC is advancing arguments similar to those rejected by the Court in Mercer. I disagree. In my view, there are two key differences in the LSBC's position. First, the LSBC does seek to rely on one of the permissible uses of unwritten principles identified by the Supreme Court in Toronto (City), namely to aid in the interpretation of ss. 92(13) and (14). Second, the LSBC is not relying on arguments "wholly untethered from basic constitutional structure"; rather, its position is that the independence of the Bar is an essential structural element of the constitution.

[136] In my view, the unwritten constitutional principle of an independent Bar is properly being applied by the LSBC as an interpretive aid in determining the scope of ss. 92(13) and (14).

[137] Paraphrasing Jack Giles K.C. (see para. 95 above), it is inconceivable that a constitution that protects fundamental rights would not also protect access to independent courts by way of an independent Bar. Put another way, the idea that the legislature could use its plenary authority under ss. 92(13) and (14) to regulate lawyers in such a manner as to eviscerate an independent Bar is simply unthinkable.

Is Bill 21, in Whole or in Part, Ultra Vires the Provincial Legislature?

[138] This then leads me to the issue that lies at the heart of this case. What is the impact of Bill 21 on the independence of the Bar?

[139] As described above, the plaintiffs identify a number of provisions of Bill 21 that they say violate the principle of an independent Bar, both in terms of their specific impact as well as in their cumulative effect. I propose to consider the specific provisions challenged by the plaintiffs and will then examine, if necessary, the manner in which they cumulatively operate, i.e. the "waterfall effect" as labelled by the LSBC.

Composition of the New Board

[140] I turn first to the provisions of Bill 21 that eliminate self-governance and self-regulation, specifically s. 8, which establishes the new governing board that is not comprised of a majority of elected lawyers.

[141] At the outset, I note that both parties adduced evidence going to the question of whether governance of lawyers by lawyers constitutes "best practice." For example, the LSBC relies on the expert report of Professor Poonam Puri of Osgoode Hall Law School, who was qualified as an expert in corporate governance.

[142] In her report, Professor Puri opines:

> … In the case of a regulator of lawyers, having a majority of elected lawyers is important for good governance. …
>
> In the context of a regulator of lawyers, independence for directors means independence both from the entity and its management, but also from the government. Given the unique role of lawyers in upholding the rule of law, it is important for the board of a regulator of lawyers to have voices around the table that are willing to go against the interests of the government where necessary.

2026 BCSC 779 (CanLII)

> In my view, when considering governance at a regulator of lawyers, director independence is not maximized when: (i) the board is not a majority of elected lawyers; (ii) the executive committee does not need to be majority elected lawyers; and (iii) quorum for making decisions does not require a majority elected lawyers to be present.
>
> … having a majority of elected lawyers promotes good self-regulation in the public interest.

[143] For their part, the defendants cite a number of academic and other sources that question whether self-governance of lawyers by lawyers is an appropriate or effective model given the inherent conflicts that may arise between the duties owed by directors to the public interest and the self-interest of those lawyers and their constituents: see e.g., Michael J. Trebilcock, “Regulating the Market for Legal Services” (2008) 45:5 Alta. L.R. 215 at 229–31; Anita Anand, “Governance Gone Wrong: Examining Self-Regulation of the Legal Profession” (2018) 21:2 Legal Ethics 99 at 104, 112–13.

[144] The defendants submit that a purely electoral model whereby the board is comprised of a majority of lawyers elected by lawyers creates an appearance, and sometimes the reality, of regulatory capture that undermines public confidence in the regulation of the practice of law.

[145] It is not necessary to resolve this conflict in order to determine the issues in this litigation. Specifically, the validity of Bill 21 does not turn on whether it establishes a “better” governance structure than the current LPA. Rather, the central question is whether Bill 21’s governance model undermines the independence of the Bar in an unconstitutional manner. That said, it is worth noting that nothing in the evidence adduced in this litigation supports any suggestion that the LSBC in its current form has governed the legal profession in a manner contrary to the public interest.

[146] I have referred above to the numerous judicial statements describing an independent Bar as a bedrock principle of the Canadian Constitution and, indeed, I have found the independence of the Bar to be an unwritten constitutional principle. I have also found that unwritten principles can be used to interpret the written text of the Constitution, even in a manner that limits or narrows the scope of the written provisions. Again, this is how the unwritten principle of the rule of law was applied to s. 92(14) in Trial Lawyers.

[147] However, as the defendants submit, no authority has gone so far as to hold that the model of self-governance advanced by the LSBC is constitutionally guaranteed and that ss. 92(13) and (14) must be interpreted in a way that precludes a provincial legislature imposing a different model.

[148] In fact, the courts have described the choice of governance model as a matter of legislative choice and/or public policy.

[149] For example, in Jabour, where Justice Estey described an independent Bar as one of the hallmarks of a free society, he also noted that the regulation of legal professionals was implemented for the protection of the public. It is worth quoting Justice Estey at some length (at 334–36):

> … It is the establishment of this protection that is the primary purpose of the Legal Professions Act. Different views may be held as to the effectiveness of the mode selected by the Legislature, but none of the parties here challenged the right of the province to enact the legislation. It is up to the Legislature to determine the administrative technique to be employed in the execution of the policy of its statutes. I see nothing in law pathological about the selection by the provincial Legislature here of an administrative agency drawn from the sector of the community to be regulated. Such a system offers some immediate advantages such as familiarity of the regulator with the field, expertise in the subject of the services in question, low cost to the taxpayer as the administrative agency must, by the statute, recover its own expenses without access to the tax revenues of the Province. On the other hand, to set out something of the other side of the coin, there is the problem of conflict of interest, an orientation favourable to the regulated, and the closed shop atmosphere. In some provinces some lay Benchers are appointed by the provincial governments; in other provinces the Attorney General is seized with the duty as an ex officio Bencher of safe-guarding the public interest; a right of appeal from decision affecting members is given to the Court; and the confirmation by the Provincial Executive, the Lieutenant Governor in Council, of all regulations adopted by the Society as a prerequisite to their validity. It is for the Legislature to weigh and determine all these matters and I see no constitutional consequences necessarily flowing from the regulatory mode adopted by the province in legislation validly enacted within its sovereign sphere as is the case here.

> There are many reasons why a province might well turn its legislative action towards the regulation of members of the law profession. These members are officers of the provincially-organized courts; they are the object of public trust daily; the nature of the services they bring to the public makes the valuation of those services by the unskilled public difficult; the quality of service is the most sensitive area of service regulation and the quality of legal services is a matter difficult of judgment. The independence of the Bar from the state in all its pervasive manifestations is one of the hallmarks of a free society. Consequently, regulation of these members of the law profession by the state must, so far as by human ingenuity it can be so designed, be free from state interference, in the political sense, with the delivery of services to the individual citizens in the state, particularly in fields of public and criminal law. The public interest in a free society knows no area more sensitive than the independence, impartiality and availability to the general public of the members of the Bar and through those members, legal advice and services generally. The uniqueness of position of the barrister and solicitor in the community may well have led the province to select self-administration as the mode for administrative control over the supply of legal services throughout the community. Having said all that, it must be remembered that the assignment of administrative control to the field of self-administration by the profession is subject to such important protective restraints as the taxation officer, the appeal to the courts from action by the Benchers, the presence of the Attorney General as an ex officio member of the Benchers and the legislative need of some or all of the authority granted to the Law Society. In any case this decision is for the province to make.

[150] In its written submissions, the LSBC argues that this reference to the regulatory model being a decision “for the province to make” is simply referring to the relationship between the provincial and federal levels of government. In oral submissions, in response to a question, counsel for the LSBC suggested that the choice for the province was about whether or not to legislate, not about the preferred regulatory model.

[151] Respectfully, Justice Estey’s decision in Jabour cannot be construed so narrowly. His statement about it being a decision for the province to make follows a passage in which he discusses the pros and cons of self-regulation and where he again observes that it “is for the Legislature to weigh and determine all these matters” (at 335). Justice Estey then goes on to state that he sees “no constitutional consequences necessarily flowing from the regulatory mode adopted by the province” (at 335).

[152] Similarly, in Pearlman v. Manitoba Law Society Judicial Committee, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 869 at 888, 1991 CanLII 26, the Supreme Court of Canada, while acknowledging that self-government of the legal professions was created in the public interest, recognized it was nonetheless a matter of legislative choice:

> In the case at bar, the Manitoba Legislature has spoken, and spoken clearly. The Law Society Act manifestly intends to leave the governance of the legal profession to lawyers and, unless judicial intervention is clearly warranted, this expression of the legislative will ought to be respected.

[153] Earlier in its reasons, at 886–87, the Court quoted a report entitled The Report of the Professional Organizations Committee (1980) produced by the Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General, for the legislative rationale for making the legal profession self-governing, which included the following statement, endorsed by the Court:

> In the government of the professions, both public and professional authorities have important roles to play. When the legislature decrees, by statute, that only licensed practitioners may carry on certain functions, it creates valuable rights. As the ultimate source of those rights, the legislature must remain ultimately responsible for the way in which they are conferred and exercised. Furthermore, the very decision to restrict the right to practise in a professional area implies that such a restriction is necessary to protect affected clients or third parties. The regulation of professional practice through the creation and the operation of a licensing system, then, is a matter of public policy: it emanates from the legislature; it involves the creation of valuable rights; and it is directed towards the protection of vulnerable interests.
> On the other hand, where the legislature sees fit to delegate some of its authority in these matters of public policy to professional bodies themselves, it must respect the self-governing status of those bodies. Government ought not to prescribe in detail the structures, processes, and policies of professional bodies. The initiative in such matters must rest with the professions themselves, recognizing their particular expertise and sensitivity to the conditions of practice. In brief, professional self-governing bodies must be ultimately accountable to the legislature; but they must have the authority to make, in the first place, the decisions for which they are to be accountable.
> [Emphasis added in SCC decision.]

[154] This is consistent with other statements made by the Supreme Court of Canada that have recognized the importance of self-regulation, but as a matter of privilege granted by the legislature rather than as a constitutional imperative. For example, in Law Society of New Brunswick v. Ryan, 2003 SCC 20, the Court at para. 36 cited David A.A. Stager & Harry W. Arthurs, Lawyers in Canada (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1990) at 31 where the authors stated:

> The privilege of self-government is granted to professional organizations only in exchange for, and to assist in, protecting the public interest with respect to the services concerned…

[155] The same point was made in Law Society of British Columbia v. Trinity Western University, 2018 SCC 32 [Trinity Western] where the Court said:

> [32] The legal profession in British Columbia, as in other Canadian jurisdictions, has been granted the privilege of self-regulation. In exchange, the profession must exercise this privilege in the public interest …

[156] Elsewhere in Trinity Western, the Court expanded on the notion of the legislature delegating regulatory authority to self-governing bodies as a means of protecting the public interest and maintaining the independence of the Bar:

> [37] To that end, where a legislature has delegated aspects of professional regulation to the professional body itself, that body has primary responsibility for the development of structures, processes, and policies for regulation. This delegation recognizes the body's particular expertise and sensitivity to the conditions of practice. This delegation also maintains the independence of the bar; a hallmark of a free and democratic society (Canada (A.G.), at pp. 335-36). Therefore, where a statute manifests a legislative intent to leave the governance of the legal profession to lawyers, "unless judicial intervention is clearly warranted, this expression of the legislative will ought to be respected" (Pearlman, at p. 888). As Iacobucci J. later explained in Ryan, we give deference to law society decisions to "giv[e] effect to the legislature's intention to protect the public interest by allowing the legal profession to be self-regulating" (para. 40).
> [38] In sum, where legislatures delegate regulation of the legal profession to a law society, the law society's interpretation of the public interest is owed deference. This deference properly reflects legislative intent, acknowledges the law society's institutional expertise, follows from the breadth of the "public interest", and promotes the independence of the bar.

[157] As is apparent from these various references, while the determination of the appropriate regulatory model for lawyers is a matter of legislative choice, legislatures in Canada, including in British Columbia, have largely exercised that choice in favour of self-government and self-regulation in recognition of lawyers' professional expertise and commitment to the public interest.

[158] That said, as the defendants submit, there is no authority for the proposition that a regulatory board comprised of a majority of elected lawyers is necessary for maintaining both individual lawyer and institutional independence.

[159] Nor does the evidence support such a proposition. Manitoba is, as noted, a jurisdiction in which the governing law society does not have a majority of elected lawyer directors and yet its ability to function independently is not challenged. The LSM CEO deposes:

> In my time as a senior executive, the LSM has acted independently of government consistent with its designation as the regulator of the practice of law for the purpose of upholding and protecting "the public interest in the delivery of legal services with competence, integrity and independence". In my experience, despite being a creature of statute the LSM has operated, and continues to operate, without direction or interference from the government of the day. That is to say, consistent with its statutory designation as the regulator of the practice of law in Manitoba the LSM acts independently.

[160] Further, the LSBC has long had a number of benchers appointed by the provincial government, including non-lawyer benchers. There is no evidence to suggest, nor does the LSBC allege, that those benchers have failed to act independently and in the public interest.

[161] Even if that was a concern, which it is not, pursuant to Bill 21, the LGinC appoints only three out of a total of 17 directors. Thus, its ability to control or unduly influence the new regulator through the exercise of its appointment power is limited.

[162] I note as well that five of the 17 directors are to be appointed by the majority of other directors holding office. Of these five, four must be lawyers (s. 8 (1)(e)). Thus, when fully constituted, the board of the new regulator will be comprised of an, albeit slim, majority of lawyers. There is no basis on which to suggest that the appointed lawyers will act any less independently, or be more vulnerable to government influence, than the elected lawyer directors.

[163] The same holds true for the other non-lawyer legal professionals on the board (ss. 8(1) (b) and (c)).

[164] The CBA and the defendants both make arguments about the representative nature of a governing board comprised of a majority of elected lawyers. For example, the CBA submits that the electoral model ensures that the elected benchers remain accountable to lawyers, rather than to non-lawyers or to the government. The CBA highlights the fact that Bill 21 eliminates the ability of member lawyers to direct the benchers by way of binding resolutions, thereby further diminishing benchers' accountability to the membership.

[166] Neither argument is compelling. As I noted above (see para. 145), there is nothing in the record to suggest that the LSBC in its current form has failed to govern lawyers in the public interest. The CBA's argument also misses the mark given that the object and duty of the legal regulator is to act in the public interest and not to advance, or be accountable to, the interests of lawyers.

[167] In summary on this point, it is well established that the legislature has the authority to determine how lawyers should be regulated and, while the legislature has historically chosen a self-governance model, that model is not constitutionally mandated as a requirement for maintaining an independent Bar. As Professor Monahan notes in his article at 136 (see para. 91 above): "it is the independence of the profession that is constitutionally protected, but not necessarily its 'self governing status'" [emphasis in original].

Duties and Guiding Principles

[168] The LSBC puts considerable emphasis on the fact that under Bill 21, the new regulator no longer has as its core object the broad mandate to "uphold and protect the public interest", which is currently set out in s. 3 of the LPA.

[169] Instead, s. 6 identifies the new regulator's duties, which include regulating the practice of law in BC, establishing applicable standards for education, competence, conduct etc., and ensuring the independence of licensees. Section 6(2) further directs that the regulator "must exercise its powers and perform its duties under this Act in the public interest". The LSBC describes the commitment to the public interest under s. 6 as "considerably denuded".

[170] I do not accept that the new formulation under Bill 21 undermines or diminishes the obligation of the new regulator to act in the public interest. Specifically, there is, in my view, no meaningful difference between a provision stipulating that the object and duty of the regulator is to uphold and protect the public interest and one that mandates that the regulator exercise its duties in the public interest.

[171] It is important to note that the "public interest" mandate language found in s. 3 of the current LPA was only added to the statute in 1987. It cannot seriously be contended that the LSBC had no obligation prior to that date to act in the public interest.

[172] Further, language similar to s. 3 of the LPA exists in the governing statute of only one other provincial law society (New Brunswick). Legislation in other provinces (Saskatchewan, Ontario, Manitoba and Nova Scotia) largely mirrors the language used in Bill 21. The LSBC does not argue that those provincial law societies lack a public interest mandate.

[173] The LSBC also takes issue with the imposition of mandatory guiding principles under s. 7 of Bill 21, including under s. 7(b) the principle of "supporting reconciliation with Indigenous peoples and the implementation of the United Nations Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous Peoples".

[174] The LSBC submits that a legislated requirement to support reconciliation and the implementation of UNDRIP effectively makes the new regulator an instrument of government policy and is antithetical to the concept of an independent Bar. In particular, they contend that the provisions of Bill 21 require the new regulator to take an institutional position on reconciliation which may be inconsistent with the legitimate interests of lawyers' clients involved in matters in which reconciliation, or at least the nature and content of reconciliation activities, may be in issue. Further, the LSBC submits that the requirement to support the implementation of UNDRIP goes well beyond the scope of what courts have described as the constitutional imperative of reconciliation.

[175] I am unable to accede to the LSBC's arguments on this issue for a number of reasons. First, it is not clear how a legislated requirement of institutional support for reconciliation compromises the duties that lie at the heart of an independent Bar to provide independent and objective advice and advocacy to clients. The guiding principles provide a framework for the new regulator in carrying out its public interest mandate. The principles do not direct the manner in which individual lawyers must act in relation to their clients. Further, the guiding principles must be read alongside the regulator's express duty to ensure the independence of licensees (s. 6(1)(c)).

[176] Second, as discussed above, the LSBC's conception of independence is not absolute as suggested by the defendants but acknowledges that lawyers, and the LSBC itself, are subject to laws of general application. In this regard, the Court of Appeal has recognized that there is an obligation generally on all public institutions to pursue reconciliation: Servatius v. Alberni School District No. 70, 2022 BCCA 421 at paras. 105–107.

[177] With respect to UNDRIP, the provincial government has an obligation to ensure that the laws of the province are consistent with the UN Declaration: DRIPA. The Court of Appeal has held that the effect of DRIPA is to incorporate UNDRIP into the positive law of the province*: Gitxaala v. British Columbia (Chief Gold Commissioner)*, 2025 BCCA 430 at para. 143.

[178] Thus, as the defendants submit, s. 7(b) simply requires the new regulator to operate within the existing legal framework in British Columbia, in the same way that it must take account of Charter values and comply with legislation like the *Human Rights Cod*e, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 210.

[179] Third, the LSBC has itself long been committed to reconciliation and has implemented a number of measures in pursuit of that goal. While the LSBC rightfully distinguishes between measures adopted voluntarily and those imposed by government, there is no meaningful difference in terms of the impact of such measures. For example, the LSBC's support of reconciliation has not impeded the ability of lawyers to act for clients in opposition to claims of Indigenous rights. There is no basis to suggest that the independence of those lawyers has been compromised or that they have been subject to sanction by the LSBC.

[180] In short, I am not satisfied that the legislative imposition of guiding principles on the new regulator improperly compromises the independence of the Bar.

Role of the Indigenous Council and Transitional Indigenous Council

[181] The LSBC frames the creation of the Indigenous Council and Transitional Indigenous Council as introducing a model of co-governance and unilaterally imposing government policy on the legal regulator. They take issue with both the composition of these bodies and their role in the new regulator.

[182] Turning first to the Indigenous Council, respectfully, the LSBC overstates the role of this body. While the Indigenous Council has an important role in the new regulator, it is a carefully circumscribed role. The Indigenous Council has approval power in respect of two sets of rules: (1) rules respecting the use of alternative resolution processes in discipline and competence matters that reflect or are influenced by Indigenous practices (at s. 94(3)); and (2) rules that are designed to meet the specific needs of Indigenous persons who are parties to, or witnesses in, a proceeding before the tribunal (at s. 131(6)).

[183] The other aspects of the Indigenous Council's role, as laid out in s. 30 and referenced throughout Bill 21, are purely advisory. The Indigenous Council is to advise and work in collaboration with the board on a range of issues, many of which clearly benefit from the structural inclusion of Indigenous perspectives, including the systemic challenges faced by Indigenous persons that require investigation and action by the regulator, and the incorporation of Indigenous legal traditions and practices into the practices and procedures of the regulator.

[184] In my view, the role of the Indigenous Council does not undermine independence because the Council does not have independent rule-making authority. In many areas its role is advisory. As for the two areas for which it has approval powers, such approval powers cannot threaten independence because it does not enable the unilateral imposition of rules.

[185] The LSBC also argues that the composition of the Indigenous Council is a threat to independence, with a particular focus on the fact that its members do not have to be lawyers. Section 29 sets out the composition of the Indigenous Council. Its members are appointed by the board following a merit-based process. The Indigenous Council is to consist of: two members who are directors; one member who is not a director; two to four members appointed from among persons nominated by the BC First Nations Justice Council; and one to two members appointed from among persons nominated by Métis peoples or entities representing Métis peoples: at s. 29(1). The appointed members must be Indigenous persons (at s. 29(2)(a)) and are, to the extent possible, to collectively reflect the diversity of the Indigenous population of BC (at s. 29(2)(b)).

[186] The LSBC's argument in this regard assumes a false binary: if regulation is not by lawyers, it is regulation by government. The defendants' response is apt: "The members of the Indigenous council and transitional Indigenous council need not be lawyers, but that is not reason to dismiss their perspectives, let alone to fear that their perspectives will somehow be dangerous." There is no basis for believing that the inclusion of another set of perspectives, through the vehicle of the Indigenous Council, will in any way threaten the independence of the Bar. As already noted, they have no power to unilaterally impose rules: they have limited approval powers and a larger advisory role. As already noted, self-regulation and self-governance are not steadfast requirements for ensuring an independent Bar. I would add that, as noted above, the LSBC has long had the benefit of different perspectives in the form of lay benchers.

[187] Turning next to the Transitional Indigenous Council, as set out in s. 226, the Transitional Indigenous Council and the transitional board must collaborate to develop the board's first set of rules, and the Transitional Indigenous Council must approve these rules.

[188] The defendants contend that this power does not undermine independence because it does not give the Transitional Indigenous Council unilateral rule-making authority and the board still has an ongoing duty, including in making the first rules, to ensure the independence of licensees.

[189] The defendants submit that the Transitional Indigenous Council's role in making the first rules is to ensure "that the lived experience of Indigenous persons is considered when creating the first rules" and is meant to help counteract their historic exclusion and ongoing underrepresentation in the profession.

[190] As with the Indigenous Council's approval powers, the Transitional Indigenous Council's approval powers over the first rules does not undermine independence. Approval power does not equate to rule-making authority. The transitional board has the duty to ensure the independence of licensees such that any rules that the Indigenous Council might consider for approval should not pose any threat to independence in the first place.

[191] The LSBC also objects to these new bodies on the basis that they constitute a unilateral imposition of government policy and direct government interference.

They reason that the creation of the Indigenous Council and Transitional Indigenous Council reflect the implementation of government policy, namely the BC First Nations Justice Strategy, furthering a partnership between the provincial government and the BC First Nations Justice Council.

[192] The defendants, for their part, submit that there is nothing objectionable about the content of the BC First Nations Justice Strategy, which has as its primary objective reversing the overrepresentation of Indigenous persons in the criminal justice system and underrepresentation as actors with roles and responsibilities within that system.

[193] As discussed above, the provincial legislature has latitude in deciding how to set up the legal regulator; the regulatory model is, within constitutional constraints, a policy choice. If the legislature wants to pursue a particular model in the hopes that it will, as suggested by the defendants, reduce barriers to Indigenous individuals becoming lawyers and judges, that is open to it so long as it does not undermine the independence of the Bar. Beyond characterizing this choice as a “government policy”, the LSBC has not pointed to anything specific about the Indigenous Council’s existence, as a policy choice, that threatens independence of the Bar. As such, creating these bodies falls squarely within the legislature’s authority when determining an appropriate regulatory model for the legal profession.

Lieutenant Governor in Council’s Regulation-Making Power

[194] The LSBC argues that the regulation-making powers given to the LGinC, i.e. Cabinet, allow the government to regulate the practice of law directly.

[195] The LSBC contends that s. 211(1) gives Cabinet a broad and vague power to make regulations that supersede the board’s rules based on Cabinet’s assessment of what is “necessary and advisable” for carrying out Bill 21 according to its intent. This interpretation is based on reading s. 211(1) of Bill 21 together with s. 41(1)(a) of the Interpretation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 238.

[196] The defendants submit that the Interpretation Act does not grant Cabinet "new or broader" regulation-making authority; it merely affirms the common law doctrine of jurisdiction by necessary implication. The defendants submit that this provision cannot change the express limits on Cabinet's regulation-making powers as set out in Bill 21.

[197] Respectfully, the plaintiffs read this power too broadly. Section 211(1) states:

> General regulation-making authority
> 211(1) The Lieutenant Governor in Council may make regulations respecting any matter for which regulations are contemplated by this Act.

[198] The LSBC's interpretation of this provision gives no meaning to the phrase "respecting any matter for which regulations are contemplated by this Act." Regulations are only "contemplated" in a few specific matters under Bill 21: (a) designating a profession as a legal profession (s. 4); (b) prescribing classes of persons as exempt from the prohibition against unauthorized practice (s. 212); and (c) prescribing the scope of practice for notaries and regulated paralegals (s. 213). As such, s. 211(1) does not extend the scope of regulations that Cabinet can make but simply empowers Cabinet to make regulations where regulations are already contemplated.

[199] The LSBC also objects to those areas where Bill 21 specifically contemplates regulations. They submit that these powers should only be held by the legal regulator and that in giving them to Cabinet, the government is fragmenting the authority of the regulator, amounting to government capture of the regulator. They go so far as to claim that giving these powers to Cabinet is akin to a "sword of Damocles above the head of the legal regulator that clearly preserves to the executive unlimited power to directly regulate the practice of law in the province."

[200] The defendants contest the idea that these provisions amount to giving the executive the direct power to regulate the practice of law. They note, correctly, that if Cabinet designates an additional profession, that profession will be regulated by the regulator. If Cabinet exempts a class of persons from the prohibition on unlicensed practice, those persons will be unregulated. The defendants also note that there is nothing novel about allowing certain non-lawyers to provide legal services within defined spheres, listing as examples, among others, notaries, Native court workers and family justice counsellors, all of which are currently outside the ambit of LSBC regulation.

[201] The powers given to Cabinet in Bill 21 are not at odds with the principle of independence of the Bar nor do they amount to direct government regulation. These powers amount to tools that could allow the government, if necessary, to address unmet areas of legal services by allowing non-lawyers to provide legal services within defined spheres. There is nothing inherent to the exercise of these powers that threatens the ability of lawyers to fulfill their duties as independent advocates, nor does it threaten the ability of the regulator to act independently in regulating lawyers. While, as is clear from the concerns of the LSBC, it is possible in an extreme scenario for such a power to be used in a way that threatens the independence of the Bar, the LSBC's arguments ignore the presumption that executive actors will exercise their delegated authority constitutionally: Brown at paras. 61–88.

[202] If these powers were somehow used in a way that threatens the independence of the Bar, that decision could be challenged on judicial review. Any regulation that threatens the independence of licensees, which the regulator has a duty to ensure under s. 6(1)(c), would be ultra vires the legislation as regulations "must be consistent both with specific provisions of the enabling statute and with its overriding purpose or object": Auer v. Auer, 2024 SCC 36 at para. 33. It could also be challenged on the basis of the constitutional principle of independence of the Bar.

[203] In a related argument, the LSBC takes issue with the fact that Bill 21 codifies aspects of legal regulation, for example the definitions of "professional misconduct", "incompetence" and "conduct unbecoming" that under the LPA were left to the benchers to define. The LSBC submits that this attacks "both the theory and the practice of self-regulation and self-governance".

[204] The LSBC did not develop this argument in any meaningful way. Further, the definitions in Bill 21 are general in nature and must be read in conjunction with s. 6(1) of Bill 21 which confers a duty on the new regulator to “regulate the practice of law in British Columbia” and to “establish standards and programs for the education, training, competence, practice and conduct of applicants, trainees, licensees and law firms”. The LSBC has not identified how the codified provisions impede the ability of the new regulator to act independently or how these provisions interfere with lawyers’ ability to provide independent advice and advocacy.

[205] In sum, none of the impugned provisions of Bill 21 interfere with the independence of the Bar. There is no doubt that the cumulative impact of the various provisions constitutes a dramatic change in the way in which lawyers will be regulated, but I am not satisfied that the new regulatory structure is unconstitutional.

Does Bill 21 Infringe the Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

[206] The TLABC raises a range of Charter concerns, which I will deal with in turn.

Section 2(d): Right to Associate

[207] The TLABC argues that by ending self-regulation, Bill 21 violates lawyers’ right to freedom of association under s. 2(d). They argue that the LSBC is the only institution that can effect lawyers’ associative rights because of its regulatory authority and the fact that it by definition represents all lawyers.

[208] Section 2(d) protects three classes of activities: (1) the right to join with others and form associations; (2) the right to join with others in the pursuit of other constitutional rights; and (3) the right to join with others to meet on more equal terms the power and strength of other groups or entities: Mounted Police Association of Ontario v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 SCC 1 at para. 66.

[209] Courts follow a two-step framework to decide whether a complainant’s s. 2(d) rights have been infringed: (1) whether activities fall within the range of activities protected under the freedom of association guarantee; and (2) whether the legislation or government action, in purpose or effect, substantially interferes with those activities: Société des casinos du Québec inc. v. Association des cadres de la Société des casinos du Québec, 2024 SCC 13 at paras. 5–7.

[210] The inherent flaw in the TLABC's reasoning is that the LSBC is not an association meant to represent lawyers; its purpose is to regulate lawyers in the public interest. As such, its activities do not fall within the range of activities protected under s. 2(d). Since Bill 21 was enacted for the purpose of regulating the profession, s. 2(d) has no application: Murtaza v. Registrar of the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario, 2016 ONSC 1745 at para. 16. Regardless, Bill 21 does not limit lawyers' association rights because it neither precludes an activity because of its associational nature (R. v. N.S., 2022 ONCA 160 at para. 169, citing Harper v. Canada (Attorney General), 2004 SCC 33 at para. 125) nor prevents lawyers from associating in pursuit of shared objectives through lawyers' associations, as evidenced by the participation of both the TLABC and CBA in this litigation.

Section 7: Right to Life, Liberty, and Security of the Person

[212] The TLABC argues that Bill 21 infringes lawyers' s. 7 rights to life, liberty, and security of the person because it allows the regulator to impose unilateral forced treatment and conflates mental health and substance abuse issues with competence, stigmatizing lawyers with mental health conditions and increasing the risk of harm to said lawyers.

[213] The TLABC rests its argument on the association it contends is created in s. 68 between mental health conditions and competence. It argues that this association makes a lawyer's health condition relevant to a range of regulatory interventions, most notably what they term "forced treatment".

[214] The TLABC argues that this "forced treatment" infringes lawyers' rights to liberty and security of the person, which protect an individual's autonomy and dignity, including the right of a person to make fundamental decisions about their life, including whether, and when, to receive medical interventions. The TLABC further contends that due to the operation of s. 198, which details offences under the legislation, and s. 202, which lays out penalties for committing said offences, a lawyer could be subject to a fine or imprisonment for refusing medical treatment prescribed by the new regulator.

[215] The key statutory provision is the definition of “incompetently” in s. 68, which reads in part:

> "incompetently", in relation to the practice of law, means in a manner that demonstrates either of the following:
> (b) a health condition that prevents a licensee from practising law with reasonable skill and competence;

[216] Contrary to the TLABC’s contentions, practicing incompetently under this definition does not turn on the existence of a health condition but on whether a health condition is affecting a licensee’s ability to practice with reasonable skill and competence. The focus remains conduct, not condition.

[217] The defendants submit that these provisions are aimed at helping both the public and lawyers experiencing health problems. They allow the regulator to understand why issues are arising in a lawyer’s practice, so that the appropriate steps can be taken to get them back on track. The acknowledgment that health conditions may influence a lawyer’s ability to practice law to an acceptable standard is not stigmatizing; it is a reality which a regulator has a duty to address.

[218] The defendants submit further that while the primary purpose of these provisions is to protect the public by ensuring that licensee are not impaired by health conditions from practicing law to an acceptable standard, their secondary purpose is to convey that, when a licensee’s ability to practice is impaired by a health condition, there is nothing fundamentally wrong with them, they are simply experiencing a health issue for which they need health care. This is based on compassion, not stigmatization.

[219] The TLABC also objects to the ability of the new regulator to require a licensee or trainee to receive counselling or medical treatment, including treatment for a substance use problem or substance use disorder: at ss. 88(1)(c), 122(3)(c)(ii). However, as noted by the defendants, the new regulator cannot compel lawyers to receive treatment they do not want. It is open to the lawyer to decline, though this may lead to consequences such as a suspension or cancellation of their license.

[220] It has already been determined that such consequences do not engage the complainant's s. 7 rights. In Hoogerbrug v. British Columbia, 2024 BCSC 794 (appeal dismissed as moot in Tatlock v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2025 BCCA 181), a case dealing with COVID-19 vaccination requirements for health care workers, Mr. Justice Coval stated:

> [276] On the evidence, the Orders compelled none of the Tatlock petitioners to accept unwanted medical treatment. Thus, unlike Carter, their s. 7 rights associated with bodily integrity and medical self-determination were not engaged.
> [277] Instead, they lost their jobs because they chose not to accept vaccination against a highly contagious virus which posed the risk of serious illness and death to vulnerable patients and other healthcare workers. In my view, this loss did not engage their s. 7 right to liberty because of the well-established principle that s. 7 does not protect the right to work in any specific employment or particular profession, particularly when the job-loss arises from non-compliance with its governing rules and regulations. This is not a constitutionally-protected fundamental life choice.

[221] Further, the TLABC's interpretation of s. 198 is inconsistent with the plain language meaning of that provision. Declining to comply with an order for medical treatment would not constitute an offence under this provision.

[222] The TLABC makes a range of other arguments about how lawyers' s. 7 rights are engaged by the provisions around health and treatment, but none are relevant in light of the above interpretation of these provisions.

Section 8: Unreasonable Search and Seizures

[223] The TLABC also argues that s. 78 authorizes unreasonable search and seizures contrary to s. 8 of the Charter.

2026 BCSC 779 (CanLII)

[224] Section 78(1) authorizes the following:

> (1) For the purpose of an investigation, the chief executive officer may, subject to any limit or condition established in the rules, do any of the following without a warrant:
>
> > (a) during business hours, enter the business premises in which a licensee, trainee or law firm practises law;
> >
> > (b) inspect or examine the records, or any other thing, of a licensee, trainee or law firm that relate to the practice of law by the licensee, trainee or law firm;
> > (c) observe the practice of law by the licensee, trainee or law firm or the licensee's supervision of the practice of law.

[225] A warrantless search is presumptively unreasonable, however that presumption may be rebutted where the search or seizure is: (i) authorized by law; (ii) the law is itself reasonable; and (iii) the manner in which the search is carried out is reasonable: R. v. Collins, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 265 at 278, 1987 CanLII 84.

[226] As there is no specific search or seizure in issue, the TLABC's challenge turns on the reasonableness of s. 78.

[227] As noted, the courts have upheld similar search provisions in the current LPA. In A Lawyer v. The Law Society of British Columbia, 2021 BCCA 437, the Court of Appeal found that s. 36 of the LPA, which authorizes the LSBC to make rules concerning investigations, and the specific rules enacted for that purpose, do not violate s. 8. The Court of Appeal endorsed the analysis of the chambers judge who came to the same conclusion:

> [35] Relying on Branch, Mulgrew v. Law Society of British Columbia, 2016 BCSC 1279 and Goodwin v. British Columbia (Superintendent of Motor Vehicles), 2015 SCC 46, the judge held that a flexible approach to reasonableness must be taken in this regulatory context. He applied the framework from Goodwin and concluded that the nature and purpose of the legislative scheme, the mechanism employed and the degree of intrusiveness, as well as the availability of judicial supervision, all weighed in favour of a finding that the authorizing law was reasonable:
> > [157] In my view, the exercise of the investigatory power under R. 4-55, while broad, is not arbitrary. Rather, it requires a reasonably held belief of misconduct and it is rationally connected to the Law Society's ability to fulfill its duty to the public. Given its duty to protect the public, it is not unreasonable that R. 4-55(6) authorized the R. 4-55 Order to > require the [appellant] to produce all documents and permit them to be copied. These powers and requirements are not unreasonable given the important duty the Law Society has in protecting the public.

>
> [158] Section 36 of the [Legal Profession Act] provides the Law Society with the authority to make rules to fulfill its mandate to protect the public. The Law Society made one such rule by establishing R. 4-55. In my view, considerable deference should be provided to the Law Society in making rules to fulfill its mandate by issuing an order under R. 4-55 … In my view, the mechanism employed (ie., the R. 4-55 Order) and its degree of intrusiveness is not unreasonable given the Law Society's duty to uphold the public interest by regulating the practice of law.
> [159] Furthermore, there are a number of safeguards, or checks, built into the R. 4-55 investigatory process that also support the reasonableness of the process and its degree of intrusiveness.
>
>
> [164] … While the legislative scheme in question may not provide the [appellant] with immediate resort to judicial supervision in respect of the seizure of the Firm's records, it does provide for a review mechanism which is, in my view, appropriate in the context.
>
> [166] The scope of a seizure made under R. 4-55 is admittedly broad. However, given the [appellant's] diminished expectation of privacy over the Firm's records, the seizure of those records pursuant to the R. 4-55 Order does not, in my view, amount to a major intrusion upon [the appellant's] privacy. Moreover, the seizure of records under R. 4-55 does not result in any immediate consequences for the [appellant]. It is only after (and if) a citation is issued that a tribunal or panel is established by ss. 38 and 41 of the [Legal Profession Act] for the purposes of holding a hearing which could result in sanctions. The Discipline Committee's decision is ultimately reviewable by the Court of Appeal. In the circumstances, the review mechanism provided for is reasonable and the availability of judicial supervision is adequate.

[228] The TLABC raises concerns about the impact of the search and seizure provision of Bill 21 on solicitor-client privilege. The defendants submit that these concerns are conclusively answered by the Court of Appeal decision in Skogstad v. The Law Society of British Columbia, 2007 BCCA 310, where the Court held that confidential and privileged information disclosed to the LSBC as part of an investigation remains protected pursuant to s. 88 of the LPA.

[229] The protections in s. 88 of the LPA are largely replicated in s. 209 of Bill 21, including ss. 209(4) and (5) which state:

> (4) A licensee, trainee or law firm that, in accordance with this Act or the rules, provides the regulator with any information or records that are confidential or privileged is deemed conclusively not to have breached any duty or obligation that would otherwise have been owed to the regulator or to the client of the licensee, trainee or law firm not to disclose the information or records.
> (5) For certainty, if a licensee, trainee or law firm discloses, in accordance with this Act or the rules, any privileged information or privileged records to the regulator, the privilege of the information or records is not affected by the disclosure.

2026 BCSC 779 (CanLII)

[230] The TLABC seeks to distinguish cases decided under the LPA based upon the altered structure and makeup of the new regulator. Specifically, the TLABC submits that the statutory protections are significantly undermined by the fact that the new regulator is not a body controlled by lawyers. This follows on the position advanced by both plaintiffs that under the structure created by Bill 21, the new regulator is no longer independent.

[231] However, I have found that the new regulatory model, in terms of the makeup of the board, does not undermine the independence of the regulator. Moreover, the provisions of s. 209 are clear and unambiguous in their protection of privilege.

[232] In the result, I am not satisfied that s. 78 is unreasonable and violates s. 8 of the Charter. This finding does not, of course, immunize the new regulator from Charter scrutiny in the event it conducts a specific search or seizure in a manner that violates an individual's s. 8 rights.

The Public's Rights Under ss. 7, 10(b), and 11(d)

[233] The TLABC contends that Bill 21 deprives the public of independent lawyers, thus infringing their fair trial rights under ss. 7, 10(b) and 11(d). As I have already concluded that Bill 21 does not infringe the independence of the Bar, these Charter arguments also fail.

Conclusion

[234] In summary, I find that Bill 21 does not improperly undermine the independence of the Bar and is not ultra vires the provincial legislature. Nor does it violate the Charter. The actions of both the LSBC and the TLABC are dismissed.

delay amounted to abuse of process — Whether stay of proceedings warranted.

Administrative law — Appeals — Standard of review — Standard of review applicable to questions of procedural fairness and to abuse of process in statutory appeals.

The Law Society of Saskatchewan brought disciplinary proceedings against one of its member lawyers in 2012. In 2018, the member was found guilty of four charges of conduct unbecoming a lawyer, and in 2019, disbarred without a right to apply for readmission for almost two years. During the disciplinary proceedings, the member applied for a stay of the proceedings on the basis of inordinate delay amounting to an abuse of process. His application was dismissed by the Hearing Committee of the Law Society. The Court of Appeal dismissed the member's conduct appeal but allowed his appeal of the stay decision. It granted the stay, concluding that there had been inordinate delay which resulted in significant prejudice to the member such that the public's sense of decency and fairness would be affected and the Law Society's disciplinary process brought into disrepute.

Held (Côté J. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed, the judgment of the Court of Appeal set aside and the matter remitted to the Court of Appeal to address the outstanding grounds of appeal.

Per Wagner C.J. and Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Brown, Rowe, Martin, Kasirer and Jamal JJ.: The instant case is a statutory appeal pursuant to Saskatchewan's The Legal Profession Act, 1990. Therefore, the standard of review is correctness for questions of law and palpable and overriding error for questions of fact and of mixed fact and law. Whether there has been an abuse of process is a question of law; thus, the applicable standard of review is correctness. While the Court of Appeal correctly determined the standard of review, it failed to apply it properly. There was also no proper basis for the Court of Appeal to contradict the Hearing Committee's attribution of certain delays to the member, and no palpable and overriding error justified the Court of Appeal's substitution of its own views for the Hearing Committee's conclusions that there was no significant prejudice to the member. While the actions of the Law Society were not above reproach, the delay was not inordinate. There was no abuse of process.

de procédure — Le délai a-t-il constitué un abus de procédure? — L'arrêt des procédures est-il justifié?

Droit administratif — Appels — Norme de contrôle — Norme de contrôle applicable aux questions d'équité procédurale et d'abus de procédure dans les appels prévus par la loi.

En 2012, la Law Society of Saskatchewan (« Barreau ») a engagé des procédures disciplinaires contre l'un de ses avocats membres. En 2018, ce dernier a été déclaré coupable de quatre chefs d'accusation de conduite indigne d'un avocat, et en 2019, il a été radié sans avoir le droit de solliciter sa réinscription pendant presque deux ans. Durant les procédures disciplinaires, le membre a demandé l'arrêt des procédures pour cause de délai excessif constituant un abus de procédure. Sa demande a été rejetée par le Comité d'audition du Barreau. La Cour d'appel a rejeté l'appel du membre de la décision relative à la conduite professionnelle, mais a accueilli son appel de la décision relative à l'arrêt des procédures. Elle a accordé l'arrêt des procédures, concluant à l'existence d'un délai excessif qui avait causé au membre un préjudice important de nature à heurter le sens de la décence et de l'équité du public et susceptible de déconsidérer le processus disciplinaire du Barreau.

Arrêt (la juge Côté est dissidente) : Le pourvoi est accueilli, l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel est annulé et l'affaire est renvoyée à la Cour d'appel pour qu'elle examine les moyens d'appel restants.

Le juge en chef Wagner et les juges Moldaver, Karakatsanis, Brown, Rowe, Martin, Kasirer et Jamal : Le présent pourvoi porte sur un appel interjeté en vertu de la loi de la Saskatchewan intitulée The Legal Profession Act, 1990. En conséquence, la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions de droit est celle de la décision correcte, alors que celle applicable aux questions de fait et aux questions mixtes de fait et de droit est la norme de l'erreur manifeste et déterminante. La question de savoir s'il y a eu abus de procédure est une question de droit; c'est donc la norme de contrôle de la décision correcte qui s'applique. Bien que la Cour d'appel ait choisi la norme de contrôle appropriée, elle ne l'a pas appliquée adéquatement. Il n'existait, en outre, aucun fondement valable justifiant la Cour d'appel d'annuler l'attribution par le Comité d'audition de certains délais au membre, et aucune erreur manifeste et déterminante justifiant la substitution par la Cour d'appel de ses propres conclusions à celles du Comité d'audition à savoir qu'il y avait absence de préjudice important causé au membre n'a été relevée. Malgré le fait que les actions du Barreau n'étaient pas irréprochables, le délai n'était pas excessif. Il n'y a pas eu abus de procédure.

In Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, [2019] 4 S.C.R. 653, the Court held that when the legislature provides for a statutory appeal mechanism from an administrative decision maker to a court, this indicates that appellate standards are to apply. While this proposition was stated in the context of substantive review, the direction that appeals are to be decided according to the appellate standards of review was categorical. Thus, where questions of procedural fairness are dealt with through a statutory appeal mechanism, they are subject to appellate standards of review.

Dans l'arrêt Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration) c. Vavilov, 2019 CSC 65, [2019] 4 R.C.S. 653, la Cour a conclu que, dans les cas où un législateur établit dans une loi un mécanisme d'appel à une cour de justice des décisions d'un décideur administratif, cela indique que les normes générales en matière d'appel trouvent application. Bien que cette conclusion ait été formulée dans un contexte de contrôle judiciaire sur le fond, la directive prescrivant que les appels doivent être décidés selon la norme générale en matière d'appel était catégorique. Par conséquent, lorsque des questions d'équité procédurale sont examinées dans le cadre d'un mécanisme d'appel prévu par la loi, elles sont soumises aux normes de contrôle en matière d'appel.

In administrative proceedings, abuse of process is a question of procedural fairness. The Court dealt with abuse of process as it relates to administrative delay in Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, and recognized that decision makers have, as a corollary to their duty to act fairly, the power to assess allegedly abusive delay. Delay may constitute an abuse of process in two ways: the fairness of a hearing can be compromised where delay impairs a party's ability to answer the complaint against them, or, even when there is no prejudice to hearing fairness, an abuse of process may occur if significant prejudice has come about due to inordinate delay.

Dans le contexte de procédures administratives, l'abus de procédure est une question d'équité procédurale. Dans l'arrêt Blencoe c. Colombie-Britannique (Human Rights Commission), 2000 CSC 44, [2000] 2 R.C.S. 307, la Cour s'est penchée sur la question de l'abus de procédure relativement aux délais administratifs, et a reconnu que les décideurs administratifs possèdent, corollairement à leur devoir d'agir équitablement, le pouvoir d'examiner les allégations de délai abusif. Le délai en cause peut constituer un abus de procédure dans deux situations : l'équité de l'audience peut être compromise lorsque le délai en cause nuit à la capacité d'une partie de répondre à la plainte portée contre elle, ou, même dans les cas où il n'y a pas d'atteinte à l'équité de l'audience, il peut y avoir abus de procédure si un préjudice important a été causé en raison d'un délai excessif.

Blencoe sets out a three-step test to determine whether delay that does not affect hearing fairness nonetheless amounts to an abuse of process. First, the delay must be inordinate. This is determined on an assessment of the context overall, including the nature and purpose of the proceedings, the length and causes of the delay, and the complexity of the facts and issues in the case. These factors are not exhaustive, such that additional contextual factors can be considered in a particular case. Second, the delay must have directly caused significant prejudice. Prejudice is a question of fact. Examples include significant psychological harm, stigma attached to the individual's reputation, disruption to family life, loss of work or business opportunities, as well as extended and intrusive media attention. When these two requirements are met, courts or tribunals will proceed to a final assessment of whether the delay amounts to an abuse of process. Delay will amount to an abuse of process if it is manifestly unfair to a party

L'arrêt Blencoe établit une analyse à trois volets pour déterminer si un délai qui ne porte pas atteinte à l'équité de l'audience constitue néanmoins un abus de procédure. Premièrement, le délai en cause doit être excessif. Cette détermination se fait en appréciant le contexte dans son ensemble, y compris la nature et l'objet des procédures, la longueur et les causes du délai ainsi que la complexité des faits de l'affaire et des questions en litige. Comme il ne s'agit pas d'une liste exhaustive, d'autres facteurs contextuels peuvent être pris en considération dans une affaire donnée. Deuxièmement, ce délai doit avoir directement causé un préjudice important. L'existence ou non d'un préjudice est une question de fait. Par exemple, il peut s'agir d'un préjudice psychologique important, d'une réputation entachée, d'une vie familiale perturbée ou encore de la perte d'un emploi ou d'occasions d'affaires. Le préjudice peut également prendre la forme d'une attention médiatique prolongée et envahissante. Lorsque ces deux conditions or in some other way brings the administration of justice into disrepute.

sont réunies, le tribunal judiciaire ou administratif procède à une dernière évaluation afin de déterminer si le délai constitue un abus de procédure. Un délai constituera un abus de procédure s'il est manifestement injuste envers une partie ou s'il déconsidère d'une autre manière l'administration de la justice.

When an abuse of process is found, several remedies are available. Courts and tribunals must be mindful as to appropriate remedies in the various contexts in which abuse of process can occur. Remedies for abuse of process can serve several purposes: they can compensate the applicant for the prejudice caused by the delay, serve as an incentive for the decision maker to address any problems of systemic delay, or express the court or the tribunal's concern relating to delay in the administrative system. As the doctrine of abuse of process is broad, it can usefully be appreciated on a spectrum. Various remedies are available, up to and including a permanent stay of proceedings.

Lorsqu'un abus de procédure a été établi, plusieurs réparations peuvent être accordées. Les tribunaux judiciaires et administratifs doivent examiner attentivement les réparations qui sont appropriées dans les divers contextes susceptibles de donner lieu à un abus de procédure. Les réparations accordées en cas d'abus de procédure peuvent viser différents objectifs : elles peuvent indemniser la partie demanderesse du préjudice que lui a causé le délai, inciter le décideur à s'attaquer à des problèmes de délai systémique, ou exprimer les préoccupations du tribunal judiciaire ou administratif concerné à l'égard des délais dans le système de justice administrative. Comme la doctrine de l'abus de procédure est un vaste concept, il peut être utile de l'examiner selon une échelle de gravité. Diverses formes de réparation peuvent être accordées, pouvant aller jusqu'à l'arrêt des procédures de façon permanente.

A stay of proceedings is the ultimate remedy for abuse of process, because it is final: the process will be permanently stayed. In disciplinary matters, that means that charges will not be dealt with, any complaint will go unheard and the public will not be protected. Given these consequences, a stay should be granted only in the clearest of cases, when the abuse falls at the high end of the spectrum of seriousness. The decision whether to grant a stay involves a balancing of public interests. On one hand, the public has an interest in ensuring that a tribunal established for its protection follows fair procedures, untainted by an abuse of process. On the other hand, the public has an interest in the resolution of administrative cases on the merits. A balance must be struck between the public interest in a fair administrative process untainted by abuse and the competing public interest in having the complaint decided after a public hearing. When faced with a proceeding that has resulted in abuse, the court or tribunal must ask itself whether going ahead with the proceeding would result in more harm to the public interest than if the proceedings were permanently halted. If the answer is yes, then a stay of proceeding should be ordered. Otherwise, the application for a stay should be dismissed. In conducting this inquiry, the court or tribunal may have regard to whether other available remedies for abuse of process, short of a L'arrêt des procédures est l'ultime réparation en cas d'abus de procédure parce qu'elle est définitive : le processus sera arrêté de façon permanente. Cela signifie, en matière disciplinaire, que des accusations ne seront pas examinées, que des plaintes ne seront pas entendues et que le public ne sera pas protégé. Vu ces conséquences, l'arrêt des procédures ne devrait être accordé que dans les cas les plus manifestes, soit lorsque l'abus se situe à l'extrémité supérieure de l'échelle de gravité. La décision d'accorder ou non un arrêt des procédures implique la mise en balance d'intérêts publics. D'une part, le public a intérêt à s'assurer qu'un tribunal administratif constitué pour le protéger suit une procédure équitable et exempte d'abus de procédure. D'autre part, le public a intérêt à ce que les instances administratives soient décidées au fond. Un juste équilibre doit être établi entre l'intérêt du public à ce qu'il existe un processus administratif équitable et exempt d'abus de procédure et son intérêt opposé à ce que les plaintes soient décidées au fond au terme d'une audience publique. En présence d'une instance qui a donné lieu à un abus de procédure, le tribunal judiciaire ou administratif doit se poser la question à savoir si continuer les procédures serait plus préjudiciable à l'intérêt public que les arrêter de façon permanente. Si la réponse est oui, l'arrêt des procédures devrait être ordonné. Dans le cas contraire, la demande stay, would adequately protect the public's interest in the proper administration of justice.

d'arrêt des procédures devrait être rejetée. Dans le cadre de cette analyse, le tribunal judiciaire ou administratif peut se demander s'il est possible de recourir à d'autres réparations, moins radicales que l'arrêt des procédures, qui protégeraient adéquatement l'intérêt du public dans la bonne administration de la justice.

When an abuse of process is established, but the abuse is not such that a stay of proceedings is warranted, other remedies may be appropriate. While proof of significant prejudice is required to establish an abuse of process, the remedies ordered may vary according to the degree of prejudice. A high degree of prejudice may justify a stay. Lesser, but nevertheless significant prejudice, could justify other remedies. In such cases, the public interest can be properly served by continuation of the proceedings, while the applicant receives some compensation for the abuse that he or she suffered. In the context of a disciplinary tribunal, a stay of proceedings, a reduction in sanction, or variation of an award of costs are possible remedies. This is not an exhaustive list. Various tribunals may be empowered by their enabling statutes to grant other remedies. They should not hesitate to use such tools to combat inordinate delay amounting to an abuse of process.

Lorsqu'un abus de procédure est établi, mais que l'abus n'est pas tel qu'un arrêt des procédures est justifié, d'autres réparations peuvent être appropriées. Bien que la preuve d'un préjudice important soit nécessaire afin d'établir l'existence d'un abus de procédure, la réparation ordonnée peut varier en fonction du degré de préjudice constaté. Un degré élevé de préjudice peut justifier un arrêt des procédures, alors qu'un préjudice de degré moindre, néanmoins important, pourrait justifier d'autres réparations. Dans de tels cas, l'intérêt public peut être adéquatement servi par la continuation des procédures, tout en s'assurant que la partie demanderesse reçoit une certaine forme de compensation pour l'abus dont elle a souffert. Dans le contexte des tribunaux disciplinaires, l'arrêt des procédures, la réduction de la sanction ou la modification d'une ordonnance relative aux dépens représentent autant de possibles réparations. Il ne s'agit pas d'une liste exhaustive. Divers tribunaux disposent, en vertu de leur loi habilitante, du pouvoir d'accorder d'autres réparations. Ils ne devraient pas hésiter à se prévaloir de tels pouvoirs pour remédier à un délai excessif constituant un abus de procédure.

Per Côté J. (dissenting): There is disagreement with the majority's disposition. The delay in these proceedings amounted to an abuse of process, and the Court of Appeal did not err in quashing the penalty for professional misconduct imposed on the member. Disagreement with the majority also extends to the legal principles governing the assessment of inordinate delay in administrative proceedings, including the majority's reframing of the test for whether administrative delay amounts to an abuse of process and its reliance on Vavilov for the proposition that appellate standards of review apply in the present case.

La juge Côté (dissidente) : Il y a désaccord quant au dispositif des juges majoritaires. Le délai en l'espèce constituait un abus de procédure, et la Cour d'appel n'a pas commis d'erreur en annulant la sanction pour inconduite professionnelle infligée au membre. Le désaccord avec les juges majoritaires concerne aussi les principes juridiques régissant l'appréciation du délai excessif dans les procédures administratives, y compris la reformulation, par les juges majoritaires, du test pour déterminer si un délai administratif constitue un abus de procédure et le fait qu'ils se fondent sur l'arrêt Vavilov pour appuyer la thèse selon laquelle il faut recourir aux normes de contrôle applicables en l'appel en l'espèce.

The Court recognized in Blencoe that inordinate delay, on its own, is a breach of procedural fairness and thus abusive. An applicant need not demonstrate significant prejudice for unfair conduct to constitute an abuse of process; this requirement applies only where a stay of proceedings is sought. Inordinate delay risks bringing the administration of justice into disrepute. For this reason alone, courts must sanction it whenever it is brought to their attention. They possess a wide range of remedial tools, including declarations, costs, orders for an expedited hearing, reductions in penalty, and stays of proceedings, to grant relief that is proportionate to the abuse of process.

La Cour a reconnu dans l'arrêt Blencoe qu'un délai excessif, à lui seul, porte atteinte à l'équité procédurale, et qu'il est de ce fait abusif. Il n'est pas nécessaire que le demandeur fasse la preuve d'un préjudice important pour qu'une conduite inéquitable constitue un abus de procédure; cette exigence s'applique uniquement lorsque l'arrêt des procédures est demandé. Un délai excessif risque de déconsidérer l'administration de la justice. Pour cette seule raison, les tribunaux doivent sanctionner de tels délais chaque fois qu'ils sont portés à leur attention.

Les tribunaux disposent d'un vaste éventail de mesures de redressement — notamment les jugements déclaratoires, l'adjudication de dépens, les ordonnances enjoignant de tenir une audience accélérée, les réductions de peine et les arrêts des procédures — afin d'accorder une réparation qui soit proportionnelle à l'abus de procédure.

The majority purportedly relies on Blencoe in articulating a three-step test for determining whether delay in administrative proceedings amounts to an abuse of process; however, this framework rests on a mistaken understanding of the doctrine of abuse of process. Under the majority's approach, even inordinate delay that directly causes significant prejudice is not per se abusive, as the last step of its test indicates. Not only is this proposition doctrinally flawed, but it results in an unduly elevated standard that is disproportionate to the remedies available for abusive delay, which range from a mere declaration to a stay of proceedings. The majority's test is so onerous that it invites complacency in administrative proceedings. The Court rightly recognized in Blencoe that inordinate delay, on its own, is a breach of the duty of fairness. Prejudice is not a necessary condition for delay to be inordinate, although it may contribute to such a finding. Evidence of prejudice remains highly significant at the remedial stage, since the remedy must be proportionate to the abuse of process. This is consistent with the central principle laid down by the majority in Blencoe, namely that courts may grant a stay of proceedings only in the clearest of cases, where the applicant has demonstrated significant prejudice arising from inordinate administrative delay.

Les juges majoritaires affirment se fonder sur l'arrêt Blencoe en formulant un test à trois volets pour déterminer si le délai dans des procédures administratives constitue un abus de procédure; or, ce cadre d'analyse repose sur une compréhension erronée de la doctrine de l'abus de procédure. Suivant l'approche adoptée par les juges majoritaires, même le délai excessif qui cause directement un préjudice important n'est pas en soi abusif, comme l'indique le dernier volet de leur analyse. Non seulement cette proposition est-elle viciée sur le plan théorique, mais elle crée une norme indûment élevée qui est disproportionnée par rapport aux réparations disponibles en cas de délai abusif, lesquelles vont du simple jugement déclaratoire à l'arrêt des procédures. L'analyse des juges majoritaires est si exigeante qu'elle invite à la complaisance dans les procédures administratives. Dans l'arrêt Blencoe, la Cour a reconnu à juste titre que le délai excessif, à lui seul, est un manquement à l'obligation d'équité. Le préjudice n'est pas une condition nécessaire pour que le délai soit considéré comme excessif, bien qu'il puisse contribuer à une telle conclusion. La preuve d'un préjudice demeure fort pertinente au stade de la réparation, puisque celle-ci doit être proportionnelle à l'abus de procédure. Cette démarche est compatible avec le principe fondamental qu'ont établi les juges majoritaires dans l'arrêt Blencoe, soit que les tribunaux ne peuvent ordonner l'arrêt des procédures que dans les cas les plus manifestes, où le demandeur a prouvé l'existence d'un préjudice important découlant d'un délai administratif excessif.

Abuse of process must be disentangled analytically from a stay of proceedings, which is but one of the remedies available at common law to redress abusive conduct. It is crucial to draw this distinction because the threshold for demonstrating abusive conduct is much lower than the one for obtaining a stay of proceedings. The Court has established stringent requirements for granting a stay of proceedings. To obtain a stay, an applicant must satisfy the following test: there must be prejudice to the fairness of the trial or the integrity of the justice system that will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome; there must be no alternative remedy capable of redressing the prejudice; and where it is unclear whether a stay is warranted after the first two steps, the court is required to balance the interests in favour of granting a stay, such as denouncing misconduct and

Il faut dissocier l'abus de procédure de l'arrêt des procédures, lequel ne représente qu'une des mesures de redressement pouvant être accordées en common law pour remédier à la conduite abusive. Il est essentiel de faire cette distinction, car le seuil à atteindre pour démontrer qu'il y a eu conduite abusive est beaucoup moins élevé que celui applicable à l'arrêt des procédures. La Cour a établi des exigences rigoureuses pour accorder l'arrêt des procédures. Un demandeur doit satisfaire au test suivant pour obtenir l'arrêt des procédures : il doit y avoir une atteinte à l'équité du procès ou à l'intégrité du système de justice qui sera révélée, perpétuée ou aggravée par le procès ou par son issue; il ne doit y avoir aucune autre réparation susceptible de remédier à l'atteinte; et, s'il subsiste une incertitude quant à l'opportunité de l'arrêt des procédures à l'issue des deux premières étapes, le tribunal doit mettre preserving the integrity of the justice system, against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits. This test also applies to abusive delay in administrative proceedings.

The majority conflates the doctrine of abuse of process with the test for stays of proceedings, which are only a subset of the remedies that courts may order to sanction abusive conduct. The majority thus fails to distinguish between, on the one hand, the test for whether conduct amounts to an abuse of process and, on the other hand, the test for whether a stay of proceedings is warranted in the circumstances. The former is flexible and unencumbered by particular requirements; the court must simply determine whether the impugned conduct undermines adjudicative fairness or the integrity of the justice system. The latter establishes an onerous threshold that is met only in the clearest of cases, where the applicant satisfies specific, stringent requirements.

Where the applicant has demonstrated that the delay is inordinate, the next step in the analysis is for the court to determine the appropriate remedy in the circumstances. Courts possess an extensive arsenal of remedial tools to sanction and redress abusive conduct that account for the circumstances of each case, ranging from a declaration to a stay of proceedings. The choice of remedy for an abuse of process falls within the trial judge's discretion. Applicants must satisfy a specific test to obtain a stay of proceedings, but other remedies are not subject to that test. The guiding principle in determining the appropriate remedy is proportionality. Courts must consider the nature and magnitude of the prejudice as primary factors, alongside the length and causes of the delay, in selecting a remedy proportionate to the abuse of process. As mandated by Blencoe, the applicant must demonstrate significant prejudice to obtain a stay of proceedings for inordinate delay in the administrative law context, but this standard does not apply to alternative remedies.

With respect to the applicable standard of review, the Court's jurisprudence is clear: the question of whether an administrative decision maker has complied with its duty of fairness is subject to the standard of correctness, regardless of the existence of an appeal mechanism. There is no reason to revisit this well-established starting point. The majority purports to clarify the standard of review applicable to questions of procedural fairness in a statutory appeal. It en balance les intérêts militant en faveur de cet arrêt, comme le fait de dénoncer la conduite répréhensible et de préserver l'intégrité du système de justice, et l'intérêt que représente pour la société un jugement définitif statuant sur le fond. Ce test s'applique également au délai abusif dans des procédures administratives.

Les juges majoritaires confondent la doctrine de l'abus de procédure avec l'analyse applicable aux arrêts des procédures, qui ne sont qu'un sous-ensemble des réparations que les tribunaux peuvent ordonner pour sanctionner une conduite abusive. Les juges majoritaires ne font donc pas la distinction entre, d'une part, le test pour déterminer si la conduite constitue un abus de procédure et, d'autre part, celui pour juger si un arrêt des procédures est justifié dans les circonstances. Le premier test est souple et n'est encombré d'aucune exigence particulière; le tribunal n'a qu'à déterminer si la conduite contestée mine l'équité juridictionnelle ou l'intégrité du système de justice. Le second test établit un seuil élevé qui n'est atteint que dans les cas les plus manifestes, lorsque le demandeur satisfait à des exigences particulières rigoureuses.

Lorsque le demandeur a établi que le délai est excessif, l'étape suivante de l'analyse du tribunal consiste à déterminer la réparation appropriée dans les circonstances. Les tribunaux disposent d'un vaste arsenal de mesures de redressement qui tiennent compte des circonstances de chaque cas pour sanctionner et réparer la conduite abusive, allant du jugement déclaratoire à l'arrêt des procédures. Le choix de la réparation pour un abus de procédure relève du pouvoir discrétionnaire du juge de première instance. Les demandeurs doivent satisfaire à un test spécifique pour obtenir l'arrêt des procédures, mais les autres réparations n'y sont pas assujetties. Le principe directeur pour déterminer la réparation appropriée est la proportionnalité. Les tribunaux doivent prendre en considération la nature et l'ampleur du préjudice en tant que facteurs principaux, parallèlement à la durée et aux causes du délai, dans le choix d'une réparation proportionnelle à l'abus de procédure. Comme l'exige l'arrêt Blencoe, le demandeur doit faire la preuve d'un préjudice important afin d'obtenir un arrêt des procédures pour délai administratif excessif. Cette exigence ne s'applique toutefois pas aux autres réparations.

En ce qui a trait à la norme de contrôle applicable, la jurisprudence de la Cour est claire : la question de savoir si un décideur administratif s'est acquitté de son obligation d'équité est soumise à la norme de la décision correcte, sans égard à l'existence d'un mécanisme d'appel. Il n'y a aucune raison de revenir sur ce point de départ bien établi. Les juges majoritaires prétendent préciser la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions d'équité procédurale does so, however, without meaningfully considering Khela, the governing authority on this point of law, or any other case relating to the duty of procedural fairness. The mere reference to Vavilov, a judgment that was rendered in a different context and that excluded procedural fairness review from its purview, does not suffice to oust Khela and other directly applicable precedents.

While clarifications to the framework for determining the standard of review applicable to questions of procedural fairness are warranted, the Court should draw on its existing jurisprudence to articulate a principled approach. The standard of correctness must remain the starting point of the analysis in the context of procedural fairness review. It is for the courts to provide the legal answer to procedural fairness questions. The correctness standard applies to questions of compliance with the duty of procedural fairness as defined by the common law or by statute. However, the requirements of fairness are context-dependent, and deference is owed to the administrative decision maker's underlying findings of fact.

The majority's articulation of the standard of review in the context of inordinate administrative delay cannot be agreed with. Inordinate delay constitutes an abuse of process on its own; it is the legal standard against which an administrative body's conduct is measured. Courts do not owe deference to an administrative decision maker's conclusion on whether delay is inordinate and its choice of remedy for abuse of process.

In the case at bar, there is agreement with the analysis of the Court of Appeal. The delay grossly exceeded the inherent time requirements of this case; it is plainly inordinate and, as a result, abusive. This inordinate delay caused serious prejudice to the member and his employees. In these circumstances, the Court of Appeal correctly sanctioned this abuse of process by ordering that the penalty for professional misconduct, but not the convictions themselves, be set aside.

dans le cas des appels prévus par la loi. Or, ils le font sans véritablement prendre en compte l'arrêt Khela, qui fait autorité sur ce point de droit, ou tout autre arrêt relatif à l'obligation de respecter l'équité procédurale. Le seul renvoi à l'arrêt Vavilov, un jugement qui a été rendu dans un contexte différent et qui a exclu l'équité procédurale de son champ d'application, ne suffit pas pour écarter l'arrêt Khela et d'autres précédents directement applicables.

Bien qu'il soit nécessaire de clarifier le cadre d'analyse guidant le choix de la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions d'équité procédurale, la Cour doit s'inspirer de sa jurisprudence pour définir une approche fondée sur des principes. La norme de la décision correcte doit demeurer le point de départ de l'analyse dans le contexte du contrôle de l'équité procédurale. Il appartient aux tribunaux judiciaires de donner une réponse juridique aux questions d'équité procédurale. C'est la norme de la décision correcte qui s'applique aux questions de respect de l'obligation d'équité procédurale définie par la common law ou par la loi. Toutefois, les exigences de l'équité dépendent du contexte, et il faut faire preuve de déférence à l'égard des conclusions de fait sous-jacentes du décideur administratif.

Il n'est pas possible d'être d'accord avec la façon dont les juges majoritaires conçoivent la norme de contrôle dans le contexte du délai administratif excessif. Le délai excessif constitue à lui seul un abus de procédure; il est la norme juridique à l'aune de laquelle la conduite de l'organisme administratif est évaluée. Les tribunaux n'ont pas à faire preuve de déférence à l'égard de la conclusion d'un décideur administratif sur le caractère excessif ou non du délai et quant au choix de la réparation pour abus de procédure.

En l'espèce, il y a accord avec l'analyse de la Cour d'appel. Le délai a largement dépassé le temps intrinsèquement requis par cette affaire; il est manifestement excessif, et par le fait même, abusif. Ce délai excessif a causé un préjudice sérieux au membre de même qu'à ses employés. Dans ces circonstances, c'est à bon droit que la Cour d'appel a sévi contre cet abus de procédure en ordonnant que la sanction pour inconduite professionnelle, mais non les déclarations de culpabilité elles-mêmes, soit annulée.

I. Introduction

[1] This appeal arises from disciplinary proceedings pursued by the appellant, the Law Society of Saskatchewan ("Law Society"), against the respondent, Peter V. Abrametz. Mr. Abrametz was found guilty of four charges of conduct unbecoming a lawyer, and disbarred without a right to apply for readmission for almost two years.

[2] During the disciplinary proceedings, Mr. Abrametz applied for a stay of the proceedings on the basis of inordinate delay amounting to an abuse of process. His application was dismissed by the Hearing Committee for the Law Society ("Hearing Committee"), but allowed on appeal by the Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan. The Law Society appeals from that decision.

LE JUGE ROWE —

I. Introduction

[1] Le présent pourvoi découle de procédures disciplinaires engagées par l'appelante, la Law Society of Saskatchewan (« Barreau »), contre l'intimé, Peter V. Abrametz. Ce dernier a été déclaré coupable de quatre chefs d'accusation de conduite indigne d'un avocat et a été radié sans avoir le droit de solliciter sa réinscription pendant presque deux ans.

[2] Durant les procédures disciplinaires, Me Abrametz a demandé l'arrêt des procédures pour cause de délai excessif constituant un abus de procédure. Sa demande a été rejetée par le Comité d'audition du Barreau (« Comité d'audition » ou « Comité »), mais accueillie en appel par la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan. Le Barreau se pourvoit maintenant devant notre Cour.

[3] This appeal affords the Court the opportunity to address once again the doctrine of abuse of process as it relates to inordinate delay in the administrative context. This was recognized more than 20 years ago in Blencoe v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307. This appeal also allows us to clarify the standard of review applicable to questions of procedural fairness and to abuse of process in statutory appeals.

[4] I would allow the appeal. While the Court of Appeal correctly determined the standard of review, it failed to apply it properly. The Hearing Committee did not err when it concluded that there was no abuse of process.

II. Facts

[5] Mr. Abrametz is a member of the Law Society of Saskatchewan. He has practiced in Prince Albert, Saskatchewan, for 49 years.

A. Pre-Charge Investigation

[6] In 2012, the Law Society commenced an audit investigation of Mr. Abrametz's financial records due to apparent irregularities in the use of a trust account. On the eve of a visit by investigators to his office in December 2012, Mr. Abrametz self-reported to the Law Society that he had failed to promptly deposit more than $36,000 in fees into his office account.

[7] The Law Society's investigation related to eight transactions by Mr. Abrametz. In seven of these, Mr. Abrametz had issued cheques to clients that were then endorsed by the clients and cashed by Mr. Abrametz. In the other case, he had issued three cheques to a fictitious person, endorsed that false name on the cheques and cashed them. In addition, Mr. Abrametz had on 11 occasions advanced money to clients, relating to settlement funds, charging them a flat 30 percent fee of the amount advanced, as well as a 30 percent contingency fee, and interest.

II. Faits

[5] Maître Abrametz est membre du Barreau de la Saskatchewan. Il exerce le droit à Prince Albert, en Saskatchewan, depuis 49 ans.

A. Enquête antérieure au dépôt des accusations

[6] En 2012, le Barreau a procédé à une vérification des registres financiers de Me Abrametz en raison d'irrégularités apparentes dans l'utilisation d'un compte en fiducie. La veille d'une visite des enquêteurs à son bureau en décembre 2012, Me Abrametz a lui-même déclaré au Barreau qu'il avait omis de déposer promptement dans son compte d'entreprise plus de 36 000 $ en honoraires.

[7] L'enquête du Barreau visait huit opérations effectuées par Me Abrametz. Dans sept de ces opérations, Me Abrametz avait émis des chèques à l'ordre de clients. Ces chèques avaient ensuite été endossés par les clients, puis encaissés par Me Abrametz. Dans l'autre opération, il avait émis trois chèques à l'ordre d'une personne fictive, les avait endossés en signant d'un faux nom, puis les avait encaissés. De plus, à 11 occasions, Me Abrametz avait avancé à des clients de l'argent, en lien avec des fonds découlant de règlements, leur facturant des honoraires fixes correspondant à 30 p. 100 du montant avancé, ainsi que des honoraires conditionnels de 30 p. 100, et des intérêts.

[8] The investigation also looked into whether some of these transactions were carried out to evade tax.

[9] In February 2013, Mr. Abrametz was served with a notice of intention to interim suspend. However, by agreement with the Law Society in March 2013, Mr. Abrametz was allowed to continue to practice, subject to certain conditions: Mr. Abrametz had to retain another lawyer to supervise and monitor his practice and trust account activities; he had to seek prior approval from this supervisor for withdrawals/cheques from any trust account; and he could not accept the return of trust cheques from clients, nor accept endorsed cheques to be cashed or negotiated. A second notice of intention to interim suspend was served in November 2014, but the Law Society and Mr. Abrametz again agreed that he could continue to practice under substantially similar conditions. Mr. Abrametz continued to practice under these conditions without incident while the Law Society investigation continued.

[10] In October 2014, the auditor submitted a final trust report to the Law Society.

[11] In October 2015, the Law Society issued a formal complaint containing seven charges against Mr. Abrametz and appointed a Hearing Committee.

B. Post-Charge Prosecution

[12] A simultaneous investigation into Mr. Abrametz's tax situation gave rise to litigation before the Court of Queen's Bench between the Law Society and Mr. Abrametz regarding the scope of the Law Society's investigatory powers: 2016 SKQB 134; 2016 SKQB 320, 408 D.L.R. (4th) 134.

[13] In March 2016, Mr. Abrametz applied to the Hearing Committee for an interim stay of the disciplinary proceedings until the resolution of the tax investigation. The Hearing Committee dismissed the request in August 2016.

[8] L'enquête visait également à déterminer si certaines de ces opérations avaient été effectuées à des fins d'évasion fiscale.

[9] En février 2013, Me Abrametz a reçu signification d'un avis d'intention de suspension provisoire. Cependant, par suite d'une entente conclue avec le Barreau en mars 2013, Me Abrametz a pu continuer d'exercer le droit, sous réserve de certaines conditions : il devait faire appel à un autre avocat pour surveiller et contrôler son cabinet et les activités liées aux comptes en fiducie; il devait obtenir l'autorisation de cet avocat afin de pouvoir effectuer des retraits de tout compte en fiducie ou émettre des chèques à partir d'un tel compte; il ne pouvait pas accepter le retour de chèques en fiducie de clients ni accepter des chèques endossés pour les encaisser ou les négocier. Un deuxième avis d'intention de suspension provisoire a été signifié en novembre 2014, mais le Barreau et Me Abrametz ont de nouveau convenu qu'il pouvait continuer d'exercer sous réserve de conditions essentiellement similaires. Maître Abrametz a continué d'exercer le droit selon ces conditions, sans incident, pendant que le Barreau poursuivait son enquête.

[10] En octobre 2014, le vérificateur a transmis au Barreau un rapport définitif sur les comptes en fiducie.

[11] En octobre 2015, le Barreau a déposé une plainte officielle contenant sept chefs d'accusation contre Me Abrametz et a constitué un comité d'audition.

B. Poursuite postérieure au dépôt des accusations

[13] En mars 2016, Me Abrametz a demandé au Comité d'audition de suspendre provisoirement les procédures disciplinaires jusqu'à la conclusion de l'enquête fiscale. Le Comité a rejeté la demande en août 2016.

[14] The Hearing Committee heard the disciplinary matter on May 17-19, August 9-10 and September 29, 2017. The conduct decision was rendered on January 10, 2018. Mr. Abrametz was found guilty of four of the seven charges. The four convictions were for matters disclosed in his self-report; they related to the advances to clients on settlement funds (referred to above).

[15] On July 13, 2018, Mr. Abrametz applied for a stay of proceedings on the basis that the time taken by the Law Society to investigate and decide his case constituted an abuse of process. The application was heard on September 18, 2018, at the same hearing as that for submissions regarding penalty. The stay application was dismissed on November 9, 2018, in the stay decision.

[16] On January 20, 2019, the penalty decision was rendered; the Committee ordered Mr. Abrametz disbarred without a right to apply for readmission until January 1, 2021.

[17] The conduct, stay and penalty decisions were published as one. In these reasons I address primarily the stay.

III. Judgments Below

A. Hearing Committee for the Law Society of Saskatchewan, 2018 SKLSS 8 (D. Chow, J. McCuskee and E. Sorestad)

[18] On the question of delay, the Hearing Committee found that Mr. Abrametz had made extensive efforts to conceal his actions. The Committee also referred to the complexity arising from the nature and number of allegations of conduct unbecoming and the number of client files and other documents that needed to be examined. The Hearing Committee also found that a significant share of delay in the [14] Le Comité d'audition a entendu l'affaire disciplinaire du 17 au 19 mai, les 9 et 10 août ainsi que le 29 septembre 2017, et il a rendu sa décision relative à la conduite professionnelle de Me Abrametz le 10 janvier 2018. Ce dernier a été reconnu coupable de quatre des sept chefs d'accusation. Les quatre déclarations de culpabilité portaient sur des faits divulgués dans sa déclaration volontaire : elles se rapportaient aux avances consenties à des clients sur des fonds découlant de règlements (tel que je l'ai mentionné précédemment).

[15] Le 13 juillet 2018, Me Abrametz a demandé un arrêt des procédures au motif que le temps mis par le Barreau pour enquêter à son égard et rendre sa décision constituait un abus de procédure. La demande a été entendue le 18 septembre 2018, lors de la même audience que celle consacrée aux observations concernant la sanction. La demande d'arrêt des procédures a été rejetée le 9 novembre 2018 dans la décision relative à l'arrêt des procédures.

[17] La décision relative à la conduite professionnelle, ainsi que celles relatives à l'arrêt des procédures et à la sanction ont été publiées dans une seule et unique décision. Dans les présents motifs, je vais examiner principalement la décision relative à l'arrêt des procédures.

III. Décisions des juridictions inférieures

A. Comité d'audition du Barreau de la Saskatchewan, 2018 SKLSS 8 (D. Chow, J. McCuskee et E. Sorestad)

[18] En ce qui concerne la question du délai, le Comité d'audition a conclu que Me Abrametz avait déployé des efforts considérables pour dissimuler ses actions. Le Comité a également souligné qu'il s'agissait d'une affaire complexe du fait de la nature et du nombre des allégations de conduite indigne, ainsi que de la quantité de dossiers-clients et d'autres documents à examiner. Le Comité d'audition a en proceedings should be attributed to Mr. Abrametz, due to his unavailability or the unavailability of his counsel. The Hearing Committee further noted that Mr. Abrametz had brought an application for a temporary stay of proceedings in April 2016.

[19] The Hearing Committee found that the delay was neither inordinate nor unacceptable given the complexity of the case, the extent of the investigation and the delay attributed directly to Mr. Abrametz's conduct. The Hearing Committee also concluded that any prejudice that Mr. Abrametz may have experienced as a result of the delay was not so significant that continuation of the process would be so unfair to him that the public's sense of fairness would be harmed, having regard to the Law Society's mandate to protect the public.

B. Court of Appeal for Saskatchewan, 2020 SKCA 81 (Ottenbreit, Leurer and Barrington-Foote JJ.A.)

[20] Mr. Abrametz appealed the conduct, penalty and stay decisions to the Court of Appeal pursuant to s. 56(1) of The Legal Profession Act, 1990, S.S. 1990-91, c. L-10.1.

[21] The Court of Appeal dismissed Mr. Abrametz's conduct appeal but allowed the stay appeal.

[22] The Court of Appeal held that whether there had been delay constituting an abuse of process is a question of law, reviewable on the basis of correctness; the findings of fact underlying the stay decision are reviewable on the standard of palpable and overriding error.

[23] The Court of Appeal stated that Blencoe set a high threshold for finding an abuse of process where hearing fairness had not been compromised. The Court of Appeal concluded, nonetheless, that Mr. Abrametz was entitled to a stay.

outre statué qu'une partie importante du délai devait être attribuée à Me Abrametz en raison de son indisponibilité ou de celle de son avocat. Il a également souligné le fait que Me Abrametz avait demandé la suspension temporaire des procédures disciplinaires en avril 2016.

[19] Le Comité d'audition a conclu que le délai n'était ni excessif ni inacceptable compte tenu de la complexité de l'affaire, de l'ampleur de l'enquête et du délai directement attribuable à la conduite de Me Abrametz. Le Comité a également conclu que tout préjudice qu'avait pu subir Me Abrametz en raison du délai n'était pas à ce point important que la continuation du processus serait si injuste envers lui qu'elle serait susceptible de heurter le sens de l'équité et de la décence du public, eu égard à la mission de protection du public qui incombe au Barreau.

B. Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan, 2020 SKCA 81 (les juges Ottenbreit, Leurer et Barrington-Foote)

[20] Maître Abrametz a interjeté appel à la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan des décisions relatives à la conduite professionnelle, à la sanction et à l'arrêt des procédures en vertu du par. 56(1) de la loi intitulée The Legal Profession Act, 1990, S.S. 1990-91, c. L-10.1.

[23] La Cour d'appel a indiqué que l'arrêt Blencoe a fixé un seuil élevé à atteindre pour que les tribunaux puissent conclure à l'existence d'un abus de procédure dans les cas où l'équité de l'audience n'a pas été compromise. Elle a néanmoins conclu que Me Abrametz avait droit à l'arrêt des procédures.

[24] The Court of Appeal concluded that there were significant periods that were not adequately explained and that could not be justified by the scale and complexity of the proceedings. The Court of Appeal concluded that of the 53-month period in issue, only 18 months were inherent to the process, and only 2 ½ months were attributable to Mr. Abrametz. The remainder, totaling 32 ½ months, the Court of Appeal concluded, was undue delay. The Hearing Committee's failure to reach that conclusion was the result of palpable and overriding errors (as referred to), and the Hearing Committee's failure to apply the law correctly to the facts.

[25] The Court of Appeal concluded that there had been inordinate delay which resulted in significant prejudice to Mr. Abrametz, such that the public's sense of decency and fairness would be affected. It concluded that this inordinate delay would bring the Law Society's disciplinary process into disrepute. Mr. Abrametz's application for a stay should have been granted by the Hearing Committee.

IV. Analysis

A. Standard of Review

[26] This case allows the Court to clarify the standard of review applicable to questions of procedural fairness and abuse of process in a statutory appeal. The Court received submissions from the parties and interveners on this point.

[27] In Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, [2019] 4 S.C.R. 653, the Court held that when the legislature provides for a statutory appeal mechanism from an administrative decision maker to a court, this indicates that appellate standards are to apply: paras. 33 and 36-52. While this proposition was stated in the context of substantive review, the direction that appeals are to be decided according to the appellate standards of review was categorical. Thus, where questions of procedural fairness are dealt with through a statutory appeal mechanism, they are subject to appellate standards of review.

[25] La Cour d'appel a conclu à l'existence d'un délai excessif qui avait causé à Me Abrametz un préjudice important de nature à heurter le sens de l'équité et de la décence du public. Elle a jugé que ce délai excessif était susceptible de déconsidérer le processus disciplinaire du Barreau. La demande d'arrêt des procédures de Me Abrametz aurait dû être accueillie par le Comité d'audition.

IV. Analyse

A. Norme de contrôle

[26] La présente affaire permet à la Cour de clarifier la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions d'équité procédurale et d'abus de procédure en cas d'appel prévu par la loi. Les parties et les intervenants ont soumis à la Cour des observations sur ce point.

[28] This does not depart from Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v. Khosa, 2009 SCC 12, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 339, and Mission Institution v. Khela, 2014 SCC 24, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 502, as those decisions related to judicial review and to the granting of prerogative writs. Here, we are dealing with a statutory appeal. As our Court has stated in Vavilov, at para. 36, "[w]here a legislature has provided that parties may appeal from an administrative decision to a court, either as of right or with leave, it has subjected the administrative regime to appellate oversight and indicated that it expects the court to scrutinize such administrative decisions on an appellate basis."

[29] This case is a statutory appeal pursuant to The Legal Profession Act, 1990. Therefore, the standard of review is correctness for questions of law and palpable and overriding error for questions of fact and of mixed fact and law: Housen v. Nikolaisen, 2002 SCC 33, [2002] 2 S.C.R. 235; Ward v. Quebec (Commission des droits de la personne et des droits de la jeunesse), 2021 SCC 43, [2021] 3 S.C.R. 176, at paras. 24-25.

[30] Whether there has been an abuse of process is a question of law. Thus, the applicable standard of review is correctness.

B. Inordinate Delay in Administrative Law

(1) Introduction

[31] Administrative decision makers regularly decide issues that affect individuals' rights, privileges and interests. This Court recognized the important role of administrative decision makers in Vavilov, at para. 4:

This area of the law concerns matters which are fundamental to our legal and constitutional order, and seeks to navigate the proper relationship between administrative decision makers, the courts and individuals in our society. In parallel with the law, the role of administrative decision making in Canada has also evolved. Today, the administration of

[28] Cela ne déroge pas aux affaires Canada (Citoyenneté et Immigration) c. Khosa, 2009 CSC 12, [2009] 1 R.C.S. 339, et Établissement de Mission c. Khela, 2014 CSC 24, [2014] 1 R.C.S. 502, puisque ces décisions concernaient respectivement un contrôle judiciaire et la délivrance de brefs de prérogative. En l'espèce, nous sommes saisis d'un appel prévu par la loi. Comme l'a affirmé notre Cour dans Vavilov, par. 36, « [l]orsqu'il accorde aux parties la possibilité de porter en appel, de plein droit ou sur autorisation, une décision administrative devant une cour de justice, le législateur assujettit le régime administratif à une compétence d'appel et indique qu'il s'attend à ce que la cour vérifie attentivement cette décision lors d'un processus d'appel. »

B. Délai excessif en droit administratif

(1) Introduction

[31] Les décideurs administratifs tranchent régulièrement des questions qui touchent les droits, les privilèges et les intérêts des gens. Dans l'arrêt Vavilov, par. 4, notre Cour a reconnu le rôle important que jouent les décideurs administratifs :

Ce domaine du droit touche des questions fondamentales pour notre ordre juridique et constitutionnel et tente d'assurer la bonne marche des rapports entre les décideurs administratifs, les cours de justice et les membres de notre société. Parallèlement au droit, le rôle du processus décisionnel administratif au Canada a connu sa propre évolution.

countless public bodies and regulatory regimes has been entrusted to statutory delegates with decision-making power. The number, diversity and importance of the matters that come before such delegates has made administrative decision making one of the principal manifestations of state power in the lives of Canadians.

Aujourd'hui, l'administration d'innombrables organismes publics et régimes de réglementation est confiée par la loi à des délégataires ayant un pouvoir décisionnel. Le nombre, la diversité et l'importance des affaires dont sont saisis ces délégataires font du processus décisionnel administratif l'une des principales manifestations du pouvoir de l'État dans la vie de la population canadienne.

[32] Legislatures delegate authority to administrative decision makers because of their proximity and responsiveness to stakeholders, their ability to render decisions promptly, flexibly and efficiently, and their ability to provide simplified and streamlined proceedings that can promote access to justice: Vavilov, at para. 29.

[32] Les législateurs délèguent des pouvoirs aux décideurs administratifs en raison de la proximité des décideurs et des parties intéressées ainsi que de la réceptivité des décideurs envers ces dernières; de la capacité des décideurs de trancher de manière rapide, souple et efficace; et de leur faculté d'alléger et de simplifier la procédure et de favoriser ainsi l'accès à la justice : Vavilov, par. 29.

(2) The Doctrine of Abuse of Process

(2) La doctrine de l'abus de procédure

[33] The doctrine of abuse of process is rooted in a court's inherent and residual discretion to prevent abuse of its process: Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, 2003 SCC 63, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, at para. 35; Behn v. Moulton Contracting Ltd., 2013 SCC 26, [2013] 2 S.C.R. 227, at para. 39; R. v. Power, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601, at p. 612; P. M. Perell, "A Survey of Abuse of Process", in T. L. Archibald and R. S. Echlin, eds., Annual Review of Civil Litigation 2007 (2007), 243, at p. 243. The doctrine was recognized in R. v. Jewitt, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 128, at pp. 135-37, where the Court drew from Dubin J.A. in R. v. Young (1984), 40 C.R. (3d) 289 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 329, where he stated that > there is a residual discretion in a trial court judge to stay proceedings where compelling an accused to stand trial would violate those fundamental principles of justice which underlie the community's sense of fair play and decency and to prevent the abuse of a court's process through oppressive or vexatious proceedings. [Emphasis added; p. 135.]

[34] Abuse of process is a broad concept that applies in various contexts: C.U.P.E., at para. 36; Behn, at para. 39. In criminal proceedings, unfair or oppressive treatment of an accused can constitute an abuse of the court's process and warrant judicial intervention: R. v. Cawthorne, 2016 SCC 32, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 983,

at para. 25, citing Power, at pp. 612-15; Jewitt, at pp. 136-37; R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at para. 59. In civil matters, it can warrant granting a motion to strike pleadings or to preclude relitigation of an issue: see Behn; Canam Enterprises Inc. v. Coles (2000), 51 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.), rev'd 2002 SCC 63, [2002] 3 S.C.R. 307.

[35] It is also characterized by its flexibility. It is not encumbered by specific requirements, unlike the concepts of res judicata and issue estoppel: Behn, at para. 40; C.U.P.E., at paras. 37-38. In Behn, at para. 40, LeBel J. referred with approval to Goudge J.A., dissenting, in Canam Enterprises Inc. (C.A.), where Goudge J.A. explained that the doctrine of abuse of process > engages the inherent power of the court to prevent the misuse of its procedure, in a way that would be manifestly unfair to a party to the litigation before it or would in some other way bring the administration of justice into disrepute. It is a flexible doctrine unencumbered by the specific requirements of concepts such as issue estoppel. [Emphasis added; para. 55.]

Such flexibility is important in the administrative law context, given the wide variety of circumstances in which delegated authority is exercised.

CSC 32, [2016] 1 R.C.S. 983, par. 25, citant Power, p. 612-615; Jewitt, p. 136-137; R. c. O'Connor, [1995] 4 R.C.S. 411, par. 59. En matière civile, un abus de procédure peut justifier l'octroi d'une requête en radiation ou d'une requête visant à empêcher qu'une question soit débattue à nouveau : voir Behn; Canam Enterprises Inc. c. Coles (2000), 51 O.R. (3d) 481 (C.A.), inf. par 2002 CSC 63, [2002] 3 R.C.S. 307.

Une telle souplesse est importante en droit administratif, compte tenu de la grande variété des circonstances dans lesquelles des pouvoirs délégués sont exercés.

[37] Such considerations underlie the courts' concern with inordinate delay in the administrative context.

(3) Abuse of Process in Administrative Proceedings

[38] In administrative proceedings, abuse of process is a question of procedural fairness: Blencoe, at paras. 105-7 and 121; G. Régimbald, Canadian Administrative Law (3rd ed. 2021), at pp. 344-50; P. Garant, with P. Garant and J. Garant, Droit administratif (7th ed. 2017), at pp. 766-67). This Court dealt with abuse of process as it relates to administrative delay in Blencoe. Our Court recognized that decision makers have, as a corollary to their duty to act fairly, the power to assess allegedly abusive delay.

[39] Mr. Blencoe, a former British Columbia Cabinet Minister, was accused by several women of sexual harassment. They filed complaints with the then British Columbia Council of Human Rights. Hearings were scheduled more than 30 months after the initial complaints were filed. Mr. Blencoe applied to have the proceedings stayed on the basis of abuse of process. While this Court declined to do so, it described circumstances when a stay could be ordered.

[40] The Court explained two ways in which delay may constitute an abuse of process.

[41] The first concerns hearing fairness. The fairness of a hearing can be compromised where delay impairs a party's ability to answer the complaint against them, such as when memories have faded, essential witnesses are unavailable or evidence has been lost: Blencoe, at para. 102; D. J. M. Brown and J. M. Evans, with the assistance of D. Fairlie, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (loose-leaf), at § 9:57.

[37] Ce sont de telles considérations qui sous-tendent la préoccupation des tribunaux judiciaires à l'égard des délais excessifs en contexte administratif.

(3) Abus de procédure dans les instances administratives

[41] La première concerne l'équité de l'audience. L'équité de l'audience peut être compromise lorsque le délai en cause nuit à la capacité d'une partie de répondre à la plainte portée contre elle, notamment parce que des souvenirs se sont estompés, des témoins essentiels ne sont pas disponibles ou des éléments de preuve ont été perdus : Blencoe, par. 102; D. J. M. Brown et J. M. Evans, avec l'aide de D. Fairlie, Judicial Review of Administrative Action in Canada (feuilles mobiles), § 9:57.

[42] This is not what is in issue in this appeal. Rather, the Court is concerned with a second category of abuse of process. Even when there is no prejudice to hearing fairness, an abuse of process may occur if significant prejudice has come about due to inordinate delay: Blencoe, at paras. 122 and 132.

[43] Blencoe sets out a three-step test to determine whether delay that does not affect hearing fairness nonetheless amounts to an abuse of process. First, the delay must be inordinate. Second, the delay must have directly caused significant prejudice. When these two requirements are met, courts or tribunals will proceed to a final assessment of whether the delay amounts to an abuse of process. Delay will amount to an abuse of process if it is manifestly unfair to a party or in some other way brings the administration of justice into disrepute: Behn, at paras. 40-41.

[44] The minority reasons in Blencoe concluded that there was an abuse of process, although the appropriate remedy was not a stay but rather an order for an expedited hearing and costs. In my view, the two sets of reasons in Blencoe can be read as complementing each other and expressing a coherent set of principles. The majority reasons set a higher threshold only for an abuse of process requiring a stay, and accepted that lesser remedies continue to be available where a stay is not warranted. With respect to when a stay of proceedings is warranted, the minority reasons recognized that a threshold of "shocking abuse" is necessary to justify a stay of proceedings (para. 155). Moreover, the minority reasons set a lower threshold for an abuse of process which might call for a lesser remedy, such as an order for an expedited hearing or costs.

[44] Dans l'arrêt Blencoe, les juges minoritaires ont conclu à l'existence d'un abus de procédure, statuant toutefois que la réparation appropriée n'était pas un arrêt des procédures, mais plutôt une ordonnance intimant la tenue d'une audience accélérée et l'adjudication de dépens. À mon avis, les motifs de la minorité ainsi que ceux de la majorité dans Blencoe peuvent être considérés comme complémentaires et comme ayant pour effet d'énoncer un ensemble cohérent de principes. Les juges majoritaires ont fixé un seuil plus élevé à atteindre, mais uniquement à l'égard des abus de procédure requérant un arrêt des procédures, et ils ont accepté que l'octroi de réparations moindres demeure possible dans les cas où l'arrêt des procédures n'est pas justifié. Pour ce qui est de la situation justifiant l'octroi d'un arrêt des procédures, les juges minoritaires ont reconnu que le seuil devant être atteint est l'existence d'un délai représentant un « abus scandaleux » : par. 155. En outre, les juges minoritaires ont fixé un seuil moins élevé à l'égard des abus de procédure susceptibles de requérir une réparation moindre, telle qu'une ordonnance intimant la tenue d'une audience accélérée ou l'adjudication de dépens.

(4) Calls to "Jordanize" Blencoe

[45] The Court received submissions to the effect that since Blencoe, it has become more active in addressing institutional delays in criminal proceedings: see R. v. Jordan, 2016 SCC 27, [2016] 1 S.C.R. 631. Mr. Abrametz and some of the interveners argue the Blencoe test needs to be revisited to bring it into conformity with contemporary approaches to delay. Mr. Abrametz refers to the "culture of complacency" in the criminal justice system addressed in Jordan: R.F., at paras. 88-104. Without asking for the direct adoption of the Jordan framework in administrative law, Mr. Abrametz sought to have this Court recognize inordinate delay as prejudicial in and of itself.

[46] Inordinate delay in administrative proceedings, as in other legal proceedings, is contrary to the interests of society. Decisions by administrative decision makers need to be rendered promptly and efficiently. Administrative delay undermines a key purpose for which such decision-making authority was delegated — expeditious and efficient decision-making.

[47] However, there are important reasons why Jordan does not apply to administrative proceedings. Jordan deals with the right to be tried within a reasonable time under s. 11(b) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. No such Charter right applies to administrative proceedings. As such, there is no constitutional right outside the criminal context to be "tried" within a reasonable time.

[48] There are fundamental differences between criminal and administrative proceedings: Blencoe, at paras. 88-96. A human rights body's investigation is aimed at determining what took place and seeks to settle the matter in a non-adversarial manner. The purpose of human rights proceedings is to eradicate discrimination, rather than to punish an offender:

[45] La Cour a reçu des observations selon lesquelles, depuis l'arrêt Blencoe, elle est intervenue de manière plus active à l'égard des délais institutionnels en matière criminelle : voir R. c. Jordan, 2016 CSC 27, [2016] 1 R.C.S. 631. Maître Abrametz et certains intervenants soutiennent que le critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Blencoe doit être revu pour le rendre conforme aux approches contemporaines en matière de délais. Maître Abrametz fait état de la [TRADUCTION] « culture de complaisance » au sein du système de justice criminelle examinée dans l'arrêt Jordan : m.i., par. 88-104. Sans solliciter l'adoption pure et simple en droit administratif du cadre établi dans Jordan, Me Abrametz demande à notre Cour de reconnaître qu'un délai excessif est en soi préjudiciable.

Blencoe, at paras. 94 and 126. Similar distinctions can be drawn between disciplinary and criminal matters. While the former are intended to regulate professional conduct within a limited private sphere of activity, the latter is intended to maintain public order and welfare for the broad public: R. v. Wigglesworth, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 541, at p. 560.

[49] I will now deal more fully with the application of the doctrine of abuse of process to administrative delays.

(5) First Requirement: Whether the Delay Is Inordinate

[50] That a process took considerable time does not in itself amount to inordinate delay. Rather, one must consider the time in light of the circumstances of the case (Brown and Evans, at § 9:57-9:58; R. W. Macaulay, J. L. H. Sprague and L. Sossin, Practice and Procedure Before Administrative Tribunals (loose-leaf), at § 16:81; Blencoe, at para. 122). A process that seems lengthy may be justified on the basis of fairness.

[51] In determining whether delay is inordinate, the court or tribunal should consider the following contextual factors: (a) the nature and purpose of the proceedings, (b) the length and causes of the delay, and (c) the complexity of the facts and issues in the case. These factors are not exhaustive, such that additional contextual factors can be considered in a particular case.

(a) The Nature and Purpose of the Proceedings

(i) Introduction

[52] Many public bodies and regulatory agencies have been entrusted with decision-making authority as statutory delegates: Vavilov, at paras. 4 and 88. Their decisions vary in complexity and significance. Sometimes they involve technical considerations. Other times, common sense and an understanding of the practicalities of ordinary life suffice: Vavilov, at est d'éradiquer la discrimination, et non de punir un contrevenant : Blencoe, par. 94 et 126. Des distinctions semblables peuvent être établies entre les procédures disciplinaires et les procédures criminelles. Alors que les premières visent à réglementer la conduite professionnelle dans une sphère d'activité privée et limitée, les secondes visent à maintenir l'ordre et le bien-être publics au profit de l'ensemble de la population : R. c. Wigglesworth, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 541, p. 560.

(5) Première condition : un délai excessif

[50] Le fait qu'un processus a demandé un temps considérable ne constitue pas en soi un délai excessif. Il faut plutôt considérer la période en question à la lumière des circonstances de l'affaire (Brown et Evans, § 9:57 et 9:58; R. W. Macaulay, J. L. H. Sprague et L. Sossin, Practice and Procedure Before Administrative Tribunals (feuilles mobiles), § 16:81; Blencoe, par. 122). Un processus qui semble long peut être justifié pour des raisons d'équité.

[51] Pour déterminer si un délai est excessif, le tribunal judiciaire ou administratif doit tenir compte des facteurs contextuels suivants : a) la nature et l'objet des procédures, b) la longueur et les causes du délai, et c) la complexité des faits de l'affaire et des questions en litige. Comme il ne s'agit pas d'une liste exhaustive, d'autres facteurs contextuels peuvent être pris en considération dans une affaire donnée.

a) La nature et l'objet des procédures

(i) Introduction

[52] Bon nombre d'organismes publics et d'agences de réglementation se sont vus déléguer des pouvoirs décisionnels par voie législative : Vavilov, par. 4 et 88. Leurs décisions varient en complexité et en importance. Elles impliquent parfois des considérations d'ordre technique. Dans d'autres cas, le bon sens et une compréhension des réalités pratiques de la vie para. 88. Of necessity, time requirements inherent to each of these kinds of proceedings will vary.

(ii) Disciplinary Proceedings

[53] The purposes of disciplinary bodies are to protect the public, to regulate the profession and to preserve public confidence in the profession: The Legal Profession Act, 1990, ss. 3.1 and 3.2; Pharmascience Inc. v. Binet, 2006 SCC 48, [2006] 2 S.C.R. 513, at para. 36; Finney v. Barreau du Québec, 2004 SCC 36, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 17, at para. 16; Fortin v. Chrétien, 2001 SCC 45, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 500, at para. 17; Pearlman v. Manitoba Law Society Judicial Committee, [1991] 2 S.C.R. 869, at pp. 887-88; Wigglesworth, at p. 560; G. MacKenzie, Lawyers & Ethics: Professional Responsibility and Discipline (loose-leaf), at § 26:1. The client or patient is often in a vulnerable position in the professional relationship: Pharmascience Inc., at para. 36; Fortin, at para. 17. The public places great trust in the advice and services of professionals: Pharmascience Inc., at para. 36.

[54] Disciplinary proceedings are neither civil nor criminal, but rather sui generis: MacKenzie, at § 26:2; Béliveau v. Barreau du Québec (1992), 101 D.L.R. (4th) 324 (Qc C.A.). They maintain discipline within a limited sphere of private activity. Thus, as stated before, they differ from criminal matters, which are of a public nature, intended to promote order and welfare within a public sphere of activity: Wigglesworth, at p. 560; Canada (Attorney General) v. Whaling, 2014 SCC 20, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 392, at para. 45.

[55] In disciplinary proceedings, inordinate delay can be harmful to members of professional bodies, complainants and the public in general. Allegations of misconduct against a member can weigh heavily on that person. They can overshadow his or her professional reputation, career and personal life. Anxiety and stress caused by the uncertainty of the outcome and the stigma attached to outstanding complaints are ordinaire suffisent : Vavilov, par. 88. Forcément, les délais inhérents à chacun de ces types de procédures varieront.

(ii) Procédures disciplinaires

good reasons to investigate and prosecute in a timely way. Disciplinary bodies have a duty to deal fairly with members whose livelihood and reputation are affected by such proceedings: MacKenzie, at § 26:1.

le stress causés par l'incertitude quant à l'issue de telles procédures ainsi que la stigmatisation liée à des plaintes non résolues représentent de bonnes raisons d'enquêter et de poursuivre dans les meilleurs délais. Les organismes disciplinaires ont l'obligation de traiter équitablement les membres dont le gagne-pain et la réputation sont touchés par de telles procédures : MacKenzie, § 26:1.

[56] Complainants, whether patients or clients, benefit from having their case proceed promptly, so that they can be heard and move on to put the matter behind them. Finally, the public at large expects professionals guilty of misconduct to be effectively regulated and properly sanctioned. Given their role to protect the public from harmful professional conduct, disciplinary bodies must ensure that the public's concerns are addressed on a timely basis: Wachtler v. College of Physicians and Surgeons (Alta.), 2009 ABCA 130, 448 A.R. 317, at paras. 46-47.

[56] Les personnes qui portent plainte, qu'il s'agisse de patients ou de clients, ont avantage à ce que leur affaire soit traitée rapidement, afin qu'elles puissent être entendues et passer à autre chose. Enfin, le public en général s'attend à ce que les professionnels qui sont coupables d'inconduite soient assujettis à une réglementation efficace et fassent l'objet de sanctions appropriées. Comme les organismes disciplinaires ont pour rôle de protéger le public contre des comportements professionnels préjudiciables, ils doivent veiller à répondre dans les meilleurs délais aux préoccupations du public : Wachtler c. College of Physicians and Surgeons (Alta.), 2009 ABCA 130, 448 A.R. 317, par. 46-47.

(b) The Length and Causes of the Delay

b) La longueur et les causes du délai

[57] When an applicant submits that inordinate delay amounts to an abuse of process, courts and tribunals are called on first to ascertain the length and causes of the delay: Blencoe, at para. 122.

[57] Lorsqu'une partie demanderesse soutient qu'un délai excessif constitue un abus de procédure, les tribunaux judiciaires et administratifs doivent d'abord établir la longueur et les causes du délai : Blencoe, par. 122.

[58] The duty to be fair is relevant at all stages of administrative proceedings, including the investigative stage: D. P. Jones and A. S. de Villars, Principles of Administrative Law (7th ed. 2020), at p. 285; Garant, at pp. 655-57; Irvine v. Canada (Restrictive Trade Practices Commission), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 181; Syndicat des employés de production du Québec et de l'Acadie v. Canada (Canadian Human Rights Commission), [1989] 2 S.C.R. 879; see, for example, Blencoe, at para. 123. When assessing the actual time period of delay, the starting point should be when the administrative decision maker's obligations, as well as the interests of the public and the parties in a timely process are engaged. It should end when the proceeding is completed, including the time taken to render a decision.

déroulant dans les meilleurs délais. Le point final est le moment où la procédure est terminée, ce qui inclut le temps pris pour rendre la décision.

[59] As noted, a lengthy delay is not per se inordinate; it may be justifiable when considered in context. For instance, a case will sometimes involve parallel criminal and administrative proceedings. Some disciplinary proceedings involve allegations of conduct that may be criminal, such as sexual misconduct, fraud and obstruction of justice: MacKenzie, at § 26:5. In some circumstances, disciplinary bodies will proceed while the criminal proceeding are outstanding. In other circumstances, suspension of the disciplinary proceedings to await the conclusion of criminal proceedings can be justified. This can be consistent with procedural fairness and not constitute an abuse of process, even if the delay that results is lengthy.

[59] Comme je l'ai mentionné plus tôt, un long délai n'est pas en soi excessif; il peut être justifiable eu égard au contexte. Par exemple, il arrive parfois qu'une affaire donne lieu à des procédures criminelles et administratives parallèles. Certaines procédures disciplinaires reprochent des conduites qui peuvent être criminelles, telles des allégations d'inconduite sexuelle, de fraude ou d'entrave à la justice : MacKenzie, § 26:5. Dans certaines circonstances, les organismes disciplinaires vont de l'avant alors que des procédures criminelles sont en cours. Dans d'autres circonstances, il peut au contraire être justifié de suspendre les procédures disciplinaires en attendant la conclusion des procédures criminelles. Une telle suspension peut être conforme à l'équité procédurale et ne pas constituer un abus de procédure, même si le délai qui en résulte est long.

[60] In Sazant v. College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, 2012 ONCA 727, 113 O.R. (3d) 420 (leave to appeal refused, [2013] 2 S.C.R. xii), for example, allegations against the member involved multiple complainants who were likely to be called as similar fact witnesses in criminal proceedings. The College monitored progress of the criminal proceedings and proceeded to investigate when the criminal charges were stayed. This added to the time for the disciplinary process. However, as the Court of Appeal concluded, it would have been impractical and unfair to the member for the College to pursue disciplinary proceedings arising from the allegations of misconduct against him without waiting for the criminal proceedings to be resolved: para. 245.

[61] Besides considering the duration of the delay, the court or tribunal should consider the causes of the delay. This includes whether the applicant contributed to or waived parts of the delay: Blencoe, at para. 122.

[61] En plus de tenir compte de la longueur du délai, le tribunal judiciaire ou administratif doit également prendre en considération les causes du délai. Cela inclut la question de savoir si la partie demanderesse a contribué au délai ou renoncé à certaines parties de celui-ci : Blencoe, par. 122.

[62] If the delay was caused by the party who complains of that delay, it cannot amount to an abuse of process: Blencoe, at para. 125; Diaz-Rodriguez v. British Columbia (Police Complaint Commissioner), 2020 BCCA 221, 39 B.C.L.R. (6th) 87, at para. 50; Camara v. Canada, 2015 FCA 43, 91 Admin. L.R. (5th) 13, at paras. 13-14. Nor will there be unfairness if the delay is an inherent part of a fair process.

[63] Delay can be waived. This can be explicit or implicit. Thus, if the applicant asked for suspension of the proceedings, or did not object to a suspension of proceedings while other investigations proceeded and acted in a way that unequivocally suggests they acquiesced to such delay, it can constitute a waiver: Diaz-Rodriguez, at para. 51.

[64] Finally, whether the administrative body used its resources efficiently should be considered in the analysis of inordinate delay. That said, insufficient agency resources cannot excuse inordinate delay in any case: Blencoe, at para. 135. Administrative tribunals have a duty to devote adequate resources to ensure the integrity of the process: see Hennig v. Institute of Chartered Accountants (Alta.), 2008 ABCA 241, 433 A.R. 221, at para. 31.

[65] In sum, the requirements of procedural fairness sometimes slow the pace at which the proceedings progress. Whether the resulting delays are justified will depend on the circumstances of each case.

(c) The Complexity of the Facts and Issues in the Case

[66] The complexity of the facts and issues in a case will affect the time required to decide the matter. For example, sexual abuse allegations might entail difficult and time-consuming investigations. By contrast, large numbers of documents do not necessarily entail complexity, especially in a routine case dealing with issues in which the tribunal has experience. Assessing

[63] Il est possible de renoncer à un délai, que ce soit de manière explicite ou implicite. Par conséquent, si la partie demanderesse requiert la suspension des procédures ou qu'elle ne s'y est pas opposée en attendant que d'autres enquêtes soient menées et qu'elle a agi d'une manière indiquant sans équivoque qu'elle a acquiescé à un tel délai, cela peut constituer une renonciation : Diaz-Rodriguez, par. 51.

c) La complexité des faits de l'affaire et des questions en litige

[66] La complexité des faits d'une affaire et des questions en litige aura une incidence sur le temps requis pour trancher cette affaire. Par exemple, des allégations d'agression sexuelle pourraient entraîner des enquêtes longues et difficiles. Par contraste, une grande quantité de documents n'est pas nécessairement synonyme de complexité, particulièrement dans inordinate delay must account for the wide range of contexts in the administrative system.

le cas d'une affaire courante concernant des questions à l'égard desquelles le tribunal possède de l'expérience. Pour déterminer si un délai est excessif ou non, il faut tenir compte de la grande variété de contextes qui caractérise le système de justice administrative.

(6) Second Requirement: Significant Prejudice

(6) Deuxième condition : un préjudice important

[67] The requirement for significant prejudice is grounded in the foundations of the doctrine of abuse of process in administrative law. If delay alone was sufficient to lead to an abuse of process, it would be "tantamount to imposing a judicially created limitation period": Blencoe, at para. 101. It is only where there is detriment to an individual that a court or a tribunal will conclude that there has been an abuse of process: Blencoe, at para. 109; Brown v. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL), 1994 CarswellBC 2980 (WL); Stefani v. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 27 B.C.L.R. (3d) 34 (S.C.); Misra v. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan, (1988), 52 D.L.R. 477 (Sask. C.A.). Furthermore, in some cases, delay by itself may be beneficial to the affected party. For example, if the affected party is facing the penalty of disbarment, delay in the administrative process might be welcomed by the affected party, insofar as it enables him or her to continue practicing. These are some of the reasons why the doctrine of abuse of process as it relates to administrative delay requires proof of significant prejudice.

[67] La condition requérant l'existence d'un préjudice important découle des fondements de la doctrine de l'abus de procédure en droit administratif. Si le délai suffisait à lui seul pour entraîner un abus de procédure, cela « reviendrait à imposer une prescription d'origine judiciaire » : Blencoe, par. 101. Ce n'est que lorsque le délai est au détriment de la partie touchée qu'un tribunal judiciaire ou administratif conclura à l'abus de procédure : Blencoe, par. 109; Brown c. Assn. of Professional Engineers and Geoscientists of British Columbia, [1994] B.C.J. No. 2037 (QL), 1994 CarswellBC 2980 (WL); Stefani c. College of Dental Surgeons (British Columbia) (1996), 27 B.C.L.R. (3d) 34 (C.S.); Misra c. College of Physicians & Surgeons of Saskatchewan (1988), 52 D.L.R. (4th) 477 (C.A. Sask.). En outre, il arrive parfois que le délai soit lui-même bénéfique pour la partie touchée. Par exemple, si celle-ci est passible de radiation du barreau, elle pourrait accueillir favorablement les délais dans le déroulement des procédures administratives, dans la mesure où ils lui permettent de continuer à exercer. Voilà quelques-unes des raisons pour lesquelles, en ce qui concerne les délais administratifs, la doctrine de l'abus de procédure exige la preuve d'un préjudice important.

[68] The reality is that an investigation or proceeding against an individual tends to disrupt his or her life. This was so in Blencoe, where the majority acknowledged that Mr. Blencoe and his family had suffered prejudice from the moment that sexual harassment allegations against him were made public. The Court concluded, however, that such prejudice could not be said to result directly from the delay in the human rights proceedings, but rather it resulted from the fact that such proceedings were undertaken: para. 133. It is the prejudice caused by inordinate delay that is relevant to the abuse of process analysis. That said, prejudice caused by the investigation of or proceedings against an individual can be exacerbated by inordinate delay. That is to be taken into account: paras. 68-73 and 133.

par. 133. C'est le préjudice causé par le délai excessif qui est pertinent dans l'analyse relative à l'abus de procédure. Cela dit, le préjudice causé à une personne par l'enquête ou les procédures dont elle fait l'objet peut être exacerbé par un délai excessif. Cela doit être pris en compte : par. 68-73 et 133.

[69] Prejudice is a question of fact. Examples include significant psychological harm, stigma attached to the individual's reputation, disruption to family life, loss of work or business opportunities, as well as extended and intrusive media attention, especially given technological developments, the speed at which information can travel today and how easy it is to access.

[69] L'existence ou non d'un préjudice est une question de fait. Par exemple, il peut s'agir d'un préjudice psychologique important, d'une réputation entachée, d'une vie familiale perturbée ou encore de la perte d'un emploi ou d'occasions d'affaires. Le préjudice peut également prendre la forme d'une attention médiatique prolongée et envahissante, particulièrement en raison des progrès technologiques, de la vitesse à laquelle l'information peut circuler de nos jours et de la facilité avec laquelle il est possible d'y accéder.

[70] In Misra, a doctor was suspended from practice for almost six years, while the College of Physicians and Surgeons chose to wait for years for the completion of criminal proceedings against him before proceeding with the disciplinary process. The criminal proceedings were eventually abandoned. Dr. Misra's reputation had suffered; he had been unable to practice his profession; his professional prospects were diminished.

[71] In Investment Dealers Association of Canada v. MacBain, 2007 SKCA 70, 299 Sask. R. 122, lengthy delays exacerbated the harm to the applicant's reputation by publicity from a disciplinary investigation. Profits from his business collapsed, then recovered to some degree as publicity around the initial investigation faded, only to be threatened again after the negative publicity around his business was revived years later when the notices of hearing were finally issued: paras. 40-41; see also Financial and Consumer Services Commission v. Emond, 2020 NBCA 42. This is the type of significant prejudice contemplated in Blencoe.

(7) Conclusion: A Final Assessment

[72] The test for whether delay amounts to an abuse of process has three steps. First, the delay must be inordinate. This is determined on an assessment of the context overall. Second, the delay must have caused significant prejudice. When these two requirements are met, the court or tribunal is to conduct a final assessment as to whether abuse of process is established. This will be so when the delay is manifestly unfair to the party to the proceedings or in some other way brings the administration of justice into disrepute: Behn, at paras. 40-41.

[73] When an abuse of process is found, several remedies are available.

C. Remedies

(1) Introduction to Remedies for Abuse of Process

[74] Courts and tribunals must be mindful as to appropriate remedies in the various contexts in which abuse of process can occur: Blencoe, at para. 117; O'Connor, at para. 66, per L'Heureux-Dubé J., writing for a unanimous Court on this point. In this judgment, I will address the main remedies. The list that follows is not intended to be exhaustive.

[75] Remedies for abuse of process can serve several purposes. They can compensate the applicant for the prejudice caused by the delay. They can serve as an incentive for the decision maker to address any problems of systemic delay. Remedies can also express the court or the tribunal's concern relating to delay in the administrative system.

[76] As noted, the doctrine of abuse of process is broad; it can usefully be appreciated on a spectrum: see, in criminal matters, R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297, at para. 107. Various remedies are available, up to and including a permanent stay

(7) Conclusion : une évaluation finale

[72] L'analyse permettant de déterminer si un délai constitue un abus de procédure comporte trois volets. Premièrement, le délai doit être excessif. Pour déterminer si un délai est excessif, il faut évaluer le contexte dans son ensemble. Deuxièmement, le délai doit avoir causé un préjudice important. Lorsque ces deux conditions sont réunies, le tribunal judiciaire ou administratif doit procéder à une évaluation finale afin de déterminer si l'abus de procédure est établi. L'abus de procédure sera établi si le délai est manifestement injuste envers la partie aux procédures ou s'il déconsidère d'une autre manière l'administration de la justice : Behn, par. 40-41.

[73] Lorsqu'un abus de procédure a été établi, plusieurs réparations peuvent être accordées.

C. Réparations

(1) Introduction aux réparations en cas d'abus de procédure

[76] Comme je l'ai mentionné précédemment, la doctrine de l'abus de procédure est un vaste concept, et il peut être utile de l'examiner selon une échelle de gravité : voir, en matière criminelle, R. c. Regan, 2002 CSC 12, [2002] 1 R.C.S. 297, par. 107. Diverses of proceedings. However, when this high threshold is not met, when there is inordinate delay and resulting prejudice, but it is "not significant enough that proceeding in its wake would, in and of itself, shock the community's sense of fairness and decency" (Regan, at para. 107), then other remedies are available.

formes de réparation peuvent être accordées, pouvant aller jusqu'à l'arrêt des procédures de façon permanente. Cependant, lorsque le seuil élevé requis pour donner ouverture à cette réparation n'est pas atteint, c'est-à-dire lorsqu'il y a eu un délai excessif et qu'il en a résulté un préjudice, mais que l'abus « ne serait pas important au point qu'une procédure engagée dans son sillage puisse, en soi, choquer le sens de l'équité et de la décence de la société » (Regan, par. 107), alors d'autres réparations existent.

[77] Before addressing various remedies for delay amounting to abuse of process, I would make two preliminary points.

[77] Avant d'examiner les diverses réparations susceptibles d'être accordées en cas de délai constituant un abus de procédure, j'aimerais formuler deux remarques préliminaires.

(a) Internal tribunal procedure

a) Les procédures internes des tribunaux administratifs

[78] Addressing delay is an obligation on all parties. As soon as delay becomes a concern, the affected party should seek to use all available procedures to move matters forward. The tribunal may often have internal procedures for dealing with delay; the party complaining of delay should avail itself of these. Even if there are no such procedures, the affected party should raise the issue of delay on the record, by means such as correspondence or oral submissions.

[79] In most cases, the affected party should avail itself of the tribunal procedures first. If the affected party does not act in a timely manner to raise concerns about delay, this may be considered in determining the relevant remedy. That said, in considering whether an affected party has sought to move matters forward, one has to be mindful of practical impediments to doing so: see, for example, Wachtler, at para. 44. There may be exceptional cases where the affected party may ask the courts to step in, in accordance with the existing rules.

[79] Dans la plupart des cas, la partie concernée devrait d'abord se prévaloir des procédures du tribunal administratif. Si elle n'agit pas en temps opportun pour exprimer ses préoccupations quant aux délais, cela peut être pris en compte dans la détermination de la réparation appropriée. Cela dit, pour décider si une partie concernée a tenté de faire progresser les choses, il faut être conscient des obstacles pratiques qui pourraient l'empêcher de le faire : voir, p. ex., Wachtler, par. 44. Il peut survenir des cas exceptionnels où la partie concernée peut demander aux tribunaux judiciaires d'intervenir, conformément aux règles existantes.

[80] Mandamus can be sought to compel administrative decision makers to carry out their duties and, in so doing, to limit delay in administrative proceedings: Blencoe, at para. 150. A party who believes he or she is facing undue delay can seek such a remedy, or an order for an expedited hearing, even before an abuse of process exists, rather than "waiting in the weeds" in the hopes of obtaining a stay at some future point: Blencoe, at para. 182. Mandamus may also be ordered as a remedy for an abuse of process if one is found.

[81] My comments here do not intend to change any of the standards applicable for obtaining an order of mandamus generally. They merely affirm that it may also be an appropriate tool to prevent and address abuse of process.

[82] Also, if used at the right moment, the remedy of an expedited hearing can protect the interests of all parties: Blencoe, at para. 182; D. J. Mullan and D. Harrington, "The Charter and Administrative Decision-Making: The Dampening Effects of Blencoe" (2002), 27 Queen's L.J. 879, at pp. 908-9.

(2) Stay of Proceedings

[83] A stay of proceedings is the ultimate remedy for abuse of process. It is "ultimate" because it is "final"; the process will be permanently stayed: Regan, at para. 53. In disciplinary matters, that means that charges will not be dealt with, any complaint will go unheard and the public will not be protected. Given these consequences, a stay should be granted only in the "clearest of cases", when the abuse falls at the high end of the spectrum of seriousness: Blencoe, at para. 120, citing Power, at p. 616.

[84] The decision whether to grant a stay involves a balancing of public interests. On one hand, the

b) Le mandamus

[81] Les remarques que je formule en l'espèce ne visent pas à modifier quelque norme applicable au prononcé d'une ordonnance de mandamus en général. Elles confirment simplement qu'une telle ordonnance peut constituer un autre moyen approprié de prévenir un abus de procédure et d'y remédier.

(2) L'arrêt des procédures

[83] L'arrêt des procédures est l'ultime réparation en cas d'abus de procédure. Elle est dite « ultime » parce que « définitive »; le processus sera arrêté de façon permanente : Regan, par. 53. Cela signifie, en matière disciplinaire, que des accusations ne seront pas examinées, que des plaintes ne seront pas entendues et que le public ne sera pas protégé. Vu ces conséquences, l'arrêt des procédures ne devrait être accordé que dans les « cas les plus manifestes », soit lorsque l'abus se situe à l'extrémité supérieure de l'échelle de gravité : Blencoe, par. 120, citant Power, p. 616.

[84] La décision d'accorder ou non un arrêt des procédures implique la mise en balance d'intérêts public has an interest in ensuring that a tribunal established for its protection follows fair procedures, untainted by an abuse of process. On the other hand, the public has an interest in the resolution of administrative cases on the merits. A balance must be struck between the public interest in a fair administrative process untainted by abuse and the competing public interest in having the complaint decided on its merits: Blencoe, at paras. 118-21 and 154; Conway, at p. 1667; Robertson v. British Columbia (Commissioner, Teachers Act), 2014 BCCA 331, 64 B.C.L.R. (5th) 258, at paras. 78-80; Diaz-Rodriguez, at paras. 71-73; Law Society of Upper Canada v. Abbott, 2017 ONCA 525, 139 O.R. (3d) 290, at paras. 61-63 (leave to appeal refused, [2018] 1 S.C.R. v).

publics. D'une part, le public a intérêt à s'assurer qu'un tribunal administratif constitué pour le protéger suit une procédure équitable et exempte d'abus de procédure. D'autre part, le public a intérêt à ce que les instances administratives soient décidées au fond. Un juste équilibre doit être établi entre l'intérêt du public à ce qu'il existe un processus administratif équitable et exempt d'abus de procédure et son intérêt opposé à ce que les plaintes soient décidées au fond : Blencoe, par. 118-121 et 154; Conway, p. 1667; Robertson c. British Columbia (Commissioner, Teachers Act), 2014 BCCA 331, 64 B.C.L.R. (5th) 258, par. 78-80; Diaz-Rodriguez, par. 71-73; Law Society of Upper Canada c. Abbott, 2017 ONCA 525, 139 O.R. (3d) 290, par. 61-63 (autorisation d'appel refusée, [2018] 1 R.C.S. v).

[85] When faced with a proceeding that has resulted in abuse, the court or tribunal must ask itself: would going ahead with the proceeding result in more harm to the public interest than if the proceedings were permanently halted? If the answer is yes, then a stay of proceeding should be ordered. Otherwise, the application for a stay should be dismissed. In conducting this inquiry, the court or tribunal may have regard to whether other available remedies for abuse of process, short of a stay, would adequately protect the public's interest in the proper administration of justice.

[86] A stay will be more difficult to obtain where the charges are more serious. For example, in Diaz-Rodriguez, a police officer faced disciplinary proceedings because he used a police baton to repeatedly strike a young man on the head. He also attempted, after the fact, to lay (apparently) unfounded charges, including assaulting a police officer; being intoxicated in a public place; and causing a disturbance: para. 72. The Court of Appeal concluded that in this context, the public interest in fairness in the administrative process did not outweigh the public interest in having the matter proceed to a resolution on its merits: para. 73 (see also: Robertson, at paras. 79-80; R. (J.) v. College of Psychologists (British Columbia) (1995), 33 Admin. L.R. (2d) 174 (B.C.S.C.), at para. 10). The same was also true in Sazant, in which Dr. Sazant faced allegations of sexual misconduct against children.

[86] L'arrêt des procédures sera plus difficile à obtenir en cas de graves accusations. Par exemple, dans l'affaire Diaz-Rodriguez, un policier faisait l'objet de procédures disciplinaires, parce qu'il avait frappé plusieurs fois à la tête un jeune homme au moyen d'un bâton de police. Après-coup, le policier avait également tenté de porter des accusations (apparemment) non fondées, notamment de voies de fait contre un agent de la paix, d'ivresse dans un lieu public et de tapage : par. 72. La Cour d'appel a conclu que, dans ce contexte, l'intérêt du public dans l'équité du processus administratif ne l'emportait pas sur son intérêt dans la tenue d'une audience au fond : par. 73 (voir aussi : Robertson, par. 79-80; R. (J.) c. College of Psychologists (British Columbia) (1995), 33 Admin. L.R. (2d) 174 (C.S. C.-B.), par. 10). Il en était de même dans l'affaire Sazant, où le Dr Sazant

There was a strong public interest in having the case considered on the merits, despite the length of the delay: para. 248.

[87] Even if rare, stays of proceedings are sometimes warranted. An example is MacBain where the charge against an investment dealer did not involve complex factual or legal issues, and he did not contribute to or waive the delay. As well, the Investment Dealers Association failed to provide an explanation for the delay (three years and eight months). When the Court of Appeal heard the case, almost seven years had passed since the commencement of the investigation. Moreover, the member was seriously affected, his business declined greatly, and his personal life was adversely impacted: para. 41.

[88] Finally, in the present case, the Court of Appeal considered that the absence of complainants was relevant in the weighing of competing interests; in effect, the absence of complainants favoured for a stay: paras. 209-10 (CanLII). I cannot agree. The absence of a complainant is a neutral factor. The public at large expects a professional who is guilty of misconduct to be effectively regulated and properly sanctioned. A professional misconduct hearing involves more than the interests of those affected; rather one needs to consider "the effect of the individual's misconduct on both the individual client and generally on the profession in question. This public dimension is of critical significance to the mandate of professional disciplinary bodies": Adams v. Law Society of Alberta, 2000 ABCA 240, 266 A.R. 157, at para. 6.

(3) Other Remedies: Reduction in Sanction and Costs

faisait l'objet d'allégations d'inconduite sexuelle envers des enfants. Il y avait un fort intérêt public à ce que l'affaire soit examinée au fond, malgré la longueur du délai : par. 248.

[87] Bien que cela soit rare, un arrêt des procédures est parfois justifié. Un exemple d'une telle situation est l'affaire MacBain, dans laquelle l'accusation portée contre un courtier en valeurs mobilières ne soulevait pas de questions de fait ou de droit complexes, et le défendeur n'avait ni contribué ni renoncé au délai. De plus, l'Association canadienne des courtiers en valeurs mobilières n'avait pas fourni d'explications pour justifier le délai (trois ans et huit mois). Lorsque la Cour d'appel a entendu l'affaire, presque sept ans s'étaient écoulés depuis le début de l'enquête. En outre, le membre concerné avait été sérieusement affecté, son entreprise avait considérablement décliné et sa vie personnelle avait été bouleversée : par. 41.

[88] Enfin, en l'espèce, la Cour d'appel a considéré que l'absence de personnes plaignantes était un facteur pertinent dans la mise en balance des intérêts opposés, de sorte que l'absence de personnes plaignantes militait effectivement en faveur d'un arrêt des procédures : par. 209-210 (CanLII). Je ne suis pas d'accord. L'absence de personnes plaignantes est un facteur neutre. Le public en général s'attend à ce que les professionnels qui se rendent coupables d'inconduites soient réglementés de manière effective et fassent l'objet de sanctions appropriées. L'audition d'une plainte d'inconduite professionnelle déborde les seuls intérêts des personnes touchées; il faut plutôt tenir compte de [TRADUCTION] « l'incidence de l'inconduite de l'individu en cause à la fois sur le client concerné et sur la profession en question en général. Cette dimension publique revêt une importance cruciale relativement à la mission des organismes disciplinaires professionnels » : Adams c. Law Society of Alberta, 2000 ABCA 240, 266 A.R. 157, par. 6.

(3) Autres réparations : la réduction de la sanction et l'adjudication de dépens

[89] Lorsqu'un abus de procédure est établi, mais que l'abus n'est pas tel qu'un arrêt des procédures est justifié, d'autres réparations peuvent être appropriées : Blencoe, par. 117; Brown et Evans, § 9:60.

[90] The threshold to grant such remedies will be lower than that required for a stay. While proof of significant prejudice is required to establish an abuse of process, the remedies ordered may vary according to the degree of prejudice. A high degree of prejudice may justify a stay. Lesser, but nevertheless significant prejudice, could justify other remedies. In such cases, the public interest can be properly served by continuation of the proceedings, while the applicant receives some compensation for the abuse that he or she suffered.

[90] Le seuil à atteindre pour obtenir de telles réparations est moins élevé que celui requis pour obtenir un arrêt des procédures. Bien que la preuve d'un préjudice important soit nécessaire afin d'établir l'existence d'un abus de procédure, la réparation ordonnée peut varier en fonction du degré de préjudice constaté. Un degré élevé de préjudice peut justifier un arrêt des procédures, alors qu'un préjudice de degré moindre, mais néanmoins important, pourrait justifier d'autres réparations. Dans de tels cas, l'intérêt public peut être adéquatement servi par la continuation des procédures, tout en s'assurant que la partie demanderesse reçoit une certaine forme de compensation pour l'abus dont elle a souffert.

[91] In the context of a disciplinary tribunal, I will address two further remedies: a reduction in sanction and/or costs.

[91] Dans le contexte des tribunaux disciplinaires, je vais examiner deux autres réparations : la réduction de la sanction et/ou l'adjudication de dépens.

(a) Reduction in Sanction

a) La réduction de la sanction

[92] When a member is found guilty of professional misconduct, the tribunal must determine the appropriate sanction.

[92] Lorsqu'un membre est reconnu coupable d'inconduite professionnelle, le tribunal doit déterminer la sanction qu'il convient d'infliger.

[93] As noted, the Law Society's disciplinary process has as its purposes the protection of the public, regulation of the profession and preservation of public confidence in the legal profession. These purposes are relevant to deciding the sanction to be imposed.

[93] Comme je l'ai mentionné précédemment, le processus disciplinaire du Barreau a pour objectifs de protéger le public, de réglementer la profession et de préserver la confiance du public envers la profession juridique. Ces objectifs sont pertinents afin de déterminer la sanction devant être infligée.

[94] A wide range of penalties is possible, from a reprimand to a lifetime revocation of a licence to practice. Various factors, including the presence of an abuse of process, can be considered when determining the appropriate sanction (see J. T. Casey, The Regulation of Professions in Canada (loose-leaf), at § 14:3; J. G. Villeneuve et al., Précis de droit professionnel (2007), at pp. 246-49; MacKenzie, at § 26:18). Since Blencoe, numerous tribunals and courts have taken abuse of process into account as an attenuating factor in deciding an appropriate sanction.

[94] Un large éventail de sanctions sont possibles, allant de la réprimande à la révocation permanente du permis d'exercice. Divers facteurs, incluant la présence d'un abus de procédure, peuvent être pris en considération dans la détermination de la sanction appropriée (voir J. T. Casey, The Regulation of Professions in Canada (feuilles mobiles), § 14:3; J. G. Villeneuve et autres, Précis de droit professionnel (2007), p. 246-249; MacKenzie, § 26:18). Depuis l'arrêt Blencoe, de nombreux tribunaux judiciaires et administratifs ont pris en compte l'abus de procédure comme facteur atténuant dans la détermination de la sanction appropriée.

[95] Wachtler provides an example of how delay can be a factor in determining what disciplinary sanctions should be imposed. The Court of Appeal reduced the member's penalty given the length of the proceedings. The member had received a penalty including a three-month suspension and a costs award against him following disciplinary proceedings by the College of Physicians and Surgeons: paras. 9-10. The Court of Appeal found that the College had failed to properly consider the lengthy delay in the case. The Court of Appeal concluded that although the member had shown that he suffered some prejudice, he was unable to demonstrate that the prejudice was such as would justify a stay: para. 36. Instead, the Court of Appeal reduced the sentence to a one-month suspension (which had already been served) and set aside the costs award: paras. 45-46 and 49.

[95] L'arrêt Wachtler offre un exemple de la manière dont le délai peut constituer un facteur dans la détermination des sanctions disciplinaires à infliger. Dans cette affaire, la Cour d'appel a réduit la sanction infligée au membre en cause en raison de la durée des procédures. Au terme des procédures disciplinaires engagées contre lui par l'ordre des médecins et chirurgiens, le membre s'était vu infliger une sanction comportant une suspension de trois mois et une condamnation à verser des dépens : par. 9-10. La Cour d'appel a conclu que l'ordre des médecins et chirurgiens n'avait pas tenu compte adéquatement du long délai dans cette affaire. Elle a également conclu que, bien que le membre ait établi qu'il avait subi un certain préjudice, il avait été incapable de démontrer que ce préjudice était tel qu'un arrêt des procédures était justifié : par. 36. La Cour d'appel a plutôt réduit la sanction à une suspension d'un mois (que le membre avait déjà purgée) et annulé la condamnation à verser des dépens : par. 45-46 et 49.

[96] The threshold for a reduction in the sanction will be particularly high when the presumptive penalty is licence revocation. Given the gravity of the misconduct generally required for such a penalty to be imposed, setting it aside might imperil public confidence in the administration of justice, rather than enhance it.

[97] For example, in Abbott, the Court of Appeal dealt with a lawyer who had engaged in professional misconduct where licence revocation was the presumptive penalty, as he had knowingly participated in mortgage fraud: para. 17. The Hearing Division of the Law Society Tribunal revoked the lawyer's licence to practice. Given the lengthy delay in the proceedings, the Appeal Division of the Law Society Tribunal reversed this decision, set aside the penalty of licence revocation and substituted a two-year suspension. The Divisional Court dismissed the appeal from the Appeal Division. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal and reinstated the penalty of licence revocation: see paras. 88-90 and 98.

[98] As noted, abuse of process can be viewed on a spectrum. To convert a presumptive licence revocation into a lesser penalty requires a significant abuse of process, one at the high end of the spectrum. Moreover, under no circumstances should the adjustment of the penalty undermine the purposes of the disciplinary process, notably the protection of the public and its confidence in the administration of justice. For these reasons, a remedy that substitutes a licence revocation for a lesser penalty will generally be as difficult to receive as a stay. Both may equally undermine a professional body's responsibility to regulate the profession.

(b) Costs

[99] Courts faced with applications for review of administrative delay have the discretion to set aside an order of costs against a party or to order costs against the administrative agency. This can be done in the exercise of the court's discretion relating to costs. As Blencoe illustrates, even where inordinate delay does not amount to abuse of process, it may still justify an award of costs against the agency: para. 136.

(4) Conclusion

[100] A stay of proceedings, a reduction in sanction, or variation of an award of costs are possible remedies. This is not an exhaustive list. Various tribunals may be empowered by their enabling statutes to grant other remedies. They should not hesitate to use such tools to combat inordinate delay amounting to an abuse of process.

V. Summary

[101] Where delay has not affected the fairness of a hearing, the test to determine if the delay amounts to an abuse of process has three steps:

[98] Comme il a été souligné plus tôt, l'abus de procédure peut être examiné selon une échelle de gravité. Pour qu'une sanction moins sévère puisse être substituée à la révocation présumée d'un permis, il faut être en présence d'un abus de procédure important, à l'extrémité supérieure de l'échelle de gravité. Qui plus est, en aucune circonstance l'ajustement de la sanction ne devrait avoir pour effet de compromettre les objectifs du processus disciplinaire, notamment la protection du public et la confiance de celui-ci dans l'administration de la justice. Pour ces raisons, il sera généralement tout aussi difficile d'obtenir une réparation substituant une sanction moins sévère à la révocation d'un permis que d'obtenir un arrêt des procédures. Ces deux réparations peuvent tout autant nuire à la responsabilité des organismes professionnels de réglementer la profession.

b) L'adjudication de dépens

(4) Conclusion

V. Résumé

[101] Dans les cas où un délai n'a pas eu d'incidence sur l'équité d'une audience, l'analyse permettant de déterminer si ce délai constitue un abus de procédure comporte trois volets :

2022 SCC 29 (CanLII)

1. First, the delay must be inordinate. This is determined on an assessment of the context overall, including the nature and purpose of the proceedings, the length and causes of the delay, and the complexity of the facts and issues in the case; and
2. Second, the delay itself must have caused significant prejudice;
3. When these two requirements are met, the court or tribunal should conduct a final assessment as to whether abuse of process is established. This will be so when the delay is manifestly unfair to a party to the litigation or in some other way brings the administration of justice into disrepute.

[102] When an abuse of process is found, various remedies are available. In rare cases, where going ahead with the proceeding results in more harm to the public interest than if the proceedings were halted, a permanent stay of proceedings will be justified. When this threshold is not met, other remedies exist, including reduction of sanction and a variation in any award of costs.

VI. Application to the Present Case

[103] The Hearing Committee found that the delay did not amount to an abuse of process given the complexity of the case, the scale of the investigation and the delay that could be attributed directly to Mr. Abrametz's conduct. The Hearing Committee also concluded that Mr. Abrametz failed to demonstrate that he suffered significant prejudice from the delay.

[104] The Court of Appeal substituted its own views with respect to the foregoing, and concluded that there had been an abuse of process such that a stay was warranted.

[105] The Court of Appeal did not err in identifying the applicable standard of review: paras. 71-75. However, it failed to apply it properly. Deference should have been accorded to the Hearing Committee as to its findings of fact and of mixed fact and law. It was not. Instead, the Court of Appeal made its own

1. Premièrement, le délai doit être excessif. Cette détermination se fait en appréciant le contexte dans son ensemble, y compris la nature et l'objet des procédures, la longueur et les causes du délai ainsi que la complexité des faits de l'affaire et des questions en litige.
2. Deuxièmement, le délai lui-même doit avoir causé un préjudice important.
3. Lorsque ces deux conditions sont réunies, le tribunal judiciaire ou administratif doit procéder à une évaluation finale afin de déterminer si l'abus de procédure a été établi. L'abus de procédure est établi si le délai est manifestement injuste envers une partie ou s'il déconsidère d'une autre manière l'administration de la justice.

VI. Application à l'espèce

[103] Le Comité d'audition a conclu que le délai en cause ne constituait pas un abus de procédure vu la complexité de l'affaire, l'étendue de l'enquête et la portion du délai qui pouvait être attribuée directement à la conduite de Me Abrametz. Le Comité a également conclu que ce dernier n'avait pas démontré que le délai lui avait causé un préjudice important.

[104] La Cour d'appel a substitué ses propres conclusions à celles susmentionnées, et elle a jugé qu'il y avait eu un abus de procédure justifiant un arrêt des procédures.

[105] La Cour d'appel n'a pas commis d'erreur dans la détermination de la norme de contrôle applicable : par. 71-75. Toutefois, elle n'a pas appliqué cette norme correctement. Elle aurait dû faire montre de déférence à l'égard des conclusions de fait et des conclusions mixtes de fait et de droit tirées par le findings of fact. With respect, this was not open to them.

[106] Regarding the remedy, the Court of Appeal purported to stay the proceedings; however, while it set aside the penalty and costs award imposed by the penalty decision, it allowed the findings of professional misconduct to stand: para. 217. This unusual result is more akin to a reduction in sanction, rather than a stay. Nonetheless, such an order could only have been made if there was an abuse of process in Mr. Abrametz's case. The three-step test I have previously described to determine if delay amounts to an abuse of process applies. As I will explain, none of the requirements were met.

A. The Delay Was Long, But Not Inordinate

[107] The audit started on December 4, 2012. The Hearing Committee heard the disciplinary matter between May and September of 2017, and rendered the conduct decision on January 10, 2018. Mr. Abrametz applied for a stay of proceedings on July 13, 2018, that is after the conduct decision, but before the Penalty Hearing was scheduled. The Penalty Hearing took place on September 18, 2018. In the same hearing, the Hearing Committee dealt with the application for a stay. The stay decision was rendered on November 9, 2018.

[108] From the start of the audit in December 4, 2012, to the stay decision, on November 9, 2018, about 71 months passed. This delay gives rise to serious concern. However, considered contextually, the delay was not inordinate.

[109] The Hearing Committee found that the delay in preparing the report was reasonable. In so doing it had regard to the complexity of the case and the scale of the investigation: at paras. 357 and 364 (CanLII). Further it found that the delay was caused largely by Mr. Abrametz; it noted that 14 ½ months

Comité d'audition. Elle ne l'a pas fait, tirant plutôt ses propres conclusions de fait. Avec égards, il ne lui était pas loisible de le faire.

A. Le délai a été long, mais pas excessif

[107] La vérification a commencé le 4 décembre 2012. Le Comité d'audition a instruit l'affaire disciplinaire de mai à septembre 2017, et il a rendu la décision relative à la conduite professionnelle le 10 janvier 2018. Maître Abrametz a demandé l'arrêt des procédures le 13 juillet 2018, soit après que la décision relative à la conduite professionnelle a été rendue, mais avant que la date de l'audience sur la sanction ait été fixée. L'audience sur la sanction a eu lieu le 18 septembre 2018. Le Comité d'audition a examiné la demande d'arrêt des procédures lors de cette audience. La décision relative à l'arrêt des procédures a été rendue le 9 novembre 2018.

[108] Du début de la vérification, le 4 décembre 2012, jusqu'à la décision relative à l'arrêt des procédures, le 9 novembre 2018, il s'est écoulé environ 71 mois. Ce délai suscite d'importantes préoccupations. Toutefois, considéré dans son contexte, il n'était pas excessif.

[109] Le Comité d'audition a conclu que la partie du délai liée à la préparation du rapport était raisonnable. Pour tirer cette conclusion, il a tenu compte de la complexité de l'affaire et de l'ampleur de l'enquête : par. 357 et 364 (CanLII). Le Comité d'audition a également conclu que cette partie du délai avait of delay were attributable to Mr. Abrametz or his counsel's unavailability: para. 360. It also considered Mr. Abrametz's application to put proceedings on hold pending a different matter before the Court of Queen's Bench, as well as Mr. Abrametz's complaint against Mr. Huber, the Law Society's disciplinary counsel, as contributing to delay: paras. 360-61.

dans une large mesure été causée par Me Abrametz; le Comité a souligné qu'une période de 14 ½ mois était attribuable à l'indisponibilité de Me Abrametz ou de son avocat : par. 360. De plus, il a jugé que la demande de Me Abrametz sollicitant la suspension des procédures en attendant l'issue d'une instance distincte devant la Cour du Banc de la Reine, ainsi que la plainte déposée par Me Abrametz contre Me Huber, l'avocat du Barreau en matière disciplinaire, avaient contribué au délai : par. 360-361.

[110] While the Court of Appeal acknowledged that it should defer to the Hearing Committee's findings of fact, it proceeded to do otherwise, on the basis that the Committee has made a series of palpable and overriding errors.

[111] The Court of Appeal concluded that the Hearing Committee committed such errors of fact both as to the scale and complexity of the investigation. In arriving at this conclusion, the Court of Appeal reviewed in detail the evidence presented before the Hearing Committee. The court acknowledged that the auditor, Mr. Allen, described his investigation as "considerable" and said it was "exceptionally difficult" and that he produced a final report of more than a thousand pages. However, it concluded that "volume and complexity are not the same". It found that there is little evidence of what Mr. Allen did during certain periods. The court determined that Mr. Allen should have finished his report by June 2013 based on the draft report (specifically its page count), the lack of "particulars" of what Mr. Allen did other than complete his trust report, and Mr. Huber's time records: paras. 182-88.

[111] La Cour d'appel a conclu que le Comité d'audition avait commis des erreurs factuelles, à la fois quant à l'ampleur et à la complexité de l'enquête. Pour parvenir à cette conclusion, la Cour d'appel a examiné en détail la preuve présentée au Comité d'audition. Elle a reconnu que le vérificateur, M. Allen, avait dit de son enquête qu'elle était [TRADUCTION] « considérable » et « exceptionnellement difficile », et que ce dernier avait produit un rapport définitif de plus de mille pages. Cependant, la Cour d'appel a néanmoins conclu que [TRADUCTION] « volume et complexité ne sont pas synonymes ». Elle a jugé qu'il y avait peu d'éléments de preuve indiquant ce que M. Allen avait fait pendant certaines périodes. La Cour d'appel a déterminé que M. Allen aurait dû terminer son rapport au plus tard en juin 2013, en se fondant sur le rapport préliminaire préparé par celui-ci (plus précisément le nombre de pages de ce rapport), sur l'absence de [TRADUCTION] « détails » sur ce que M. Allen avait fait à part terminer son rapport sur les comptes en fiducie, ainsi que sur des relevés de temps de Me Huber : par. 182-188.

[112] The Court of Appeal further proceeded to make its own findings by analyzing the evidence and, based on this, characterizing each time period so as to determine the time it considered to be undue delay.

[112] La Cour d'appel a ensuite tiré ses propres conclusions en analysant la preuve et, sur la base de celle-ci, en caractérisant chaque période afin de déterminer celles qu'elle considérait comme des délais injustifiés.

[113] One must ask, under a deferential standard of review, is this what appellate courts are called on

[113] Une question se pose : Est-ce bien là le rôle qui incombe aux cours d'appel dans l'application d'une to do? The "primary role" of the Hearing Committee was "to weigh and assess voluminous quantities of evidence": Housen, at para. 18. An appellate court is not free to interfere with factual conclusions merely because it disagrees with the weight to be assigned to the underlying evidence: para. 23; Benhaim v. St-Germain, 2016 SCC 48, [2016] 2 S.C.R. 352; Hydro-Québec v. Matta, 2020 SCC 37, [2020] 3 S.C.R. 595, at para. 33. An error is palpable if it is plainly seen and if all the evidence need not be reconsidered in order to identify it, and is overriding if it has affected the result: Hydro-Québec, at para. 33; H.L. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2005 SCC 25, [2005] 1 S.C.R. 401, at paras. 55-56 and 69-70; Salomon v. Matte-Thompson, 2019 SCC 14, [2019] 1 S.C.R. 729, at para. 33.

norme de contrôle commandant la déférence? Le « rôle principal » du Comité d'audition était « d'apprécier et de soupeser d'abondantes quantités d'éléments de preuve » : Housen, par. 18. Une cour d'appel n'est pas libre de modifier des conclusions factuelles simplement parce qu'elle n'est pas d'accord avec le poids à attribuer aux éléments de preuve à la base de la conclusion : par. 23; Benhaim c. St-Germain, 2016 CSC 48, [2016] 2 R.C.S. 352; Hydro-Québec c. Matta, 2020 CSC 37, [2020] 3 R.C.S. 595, par. 33. Une erreur est manifeste lorsqu'elle relève de l'évidence et qu'il n'est pas nécessaire de réexaminer toute la preuve pour s'en apercevoir; elle est déterminante lorsqu'elle a influencé la décision : Hydro-Québec, par. 33; H.L. c. Canada (Procureur général), 2005 CSC 25, [2005] 1 R.C.S. 401, par. 55-56 et 69-70; Salomon c. Matte-Thompson, 2019 CSC 14, [2019] 1 R.C.S. 729, par. 33.

[114] The Court of Appeal departed from its proper role when it substituted its own findings of fact, notably on the scale and the complexity of the investigation. The Hearing Committee's conclusions were grounded in the evidence before it, in particular, the affidavit of the auditor of the Law Society, Mr. Allen. The Court of Appeal gave no deference to the Hearing Committee's findings, and simply reweighed this evidence and substituted its own findings.

[115] The Court of Appeal found that there were errors in the Hearing Committee's conclusions regarding the delay attributable to Mr. Abrametz: para. 193. However, the Hearing Committee's finding that, at a certain point, Mr. Abrametz stopped cooperating in the investigation was supported by uncontroverted evidence. There was no proper basis for the Court of Appeal to contradict the Hearing Committee's attribution of certain delays to Mr. Abrametz.

[115] La Cour d'appel a conclu que le Comité d'audition avait commis des erreurs dans ses conclusions concernant le délai attribuable à Me Abrametz : par. 193. Cependant, la conclusion du Comité d'audition selon laquelle Me Abrametz avait, à un certain moment, cessé de coopérer à l'enquête était appuyée par des éléments de preuve non contredits. Il n'existait aucun fondement valable justifiant la Cour d'appel d'annuler l'attribution par le Comité d'audition de certains délais à Me Abrametz.

[116] In short, applying the standard of palpable and overriding error, there was no proper basis for the Court of Appeal to set aside the Hearing Committee's findings that the delay was not inordinate.

[116] Bref, suivant la norme de l'erreur manifeste et déterminante, il n'existait aucun fondement valable justifiant la Cour d'appel d'écarter les conclusions du Comité d'audition selon lesquelles le délai n'était pas excessif.

B. There Was No Significant Prejudice to Mr. Abrametz

[117] Mr. Abrametz identified four types of prejudice that he said were caused by the delay: the media attention; the practice conditions; the impact on his health; and the impact on his family and employees. The Hearing Committee concluded that none of these claims, individually or cumulatively, amounted to significant prejudice that was caused by the delay. The Court of Appeal disagreed; it concluded that Mr. Abrametz suffered significant prejudice.

(1) Media Attention

[118] The Hearing Committee accepted that Mr. Abrametz's reputation suffered as a result of media attention, but concluded that he had failed to demonstrate that this arose from the delay rather than the fact that he was subject to investigation and prosecution. The adverse publicity occurred over a short period early in 2018. The Hearing Committee found that the hearing gave rise to media attention, rather than the period of the investigation which preceded it.

[119] The Court of Appeal concluded that the Hearing Committee erred by failing to consider that Mr. Abrametz practiced under a cloud of suspicion for more than four years. It considered, in particular, that members of the bar and Mr. Abrametz's staff knew that he was being investigated and was practicing under supervision as a result of misconduct allegations. This was so because the Law Society publishes information relating to disciplinary proceedings on its website.

[120] With respect, the issue is not whether the proceedings were disclosed as they were, but whether Mr. Abrametz suffered significant prejudice from such disclosure. The Hearing Committee found he suffered "some degree of stress", but not significant prejudice: para. 335. In all this, no palpable and overriding error

B. Absence de préjudice important causé à Me Abrametz

[117] Maître Abrametz a relevé quatre types de préjudices qui, soutenait-il, lui ont été causés par le délai : l'attention médiatique dont il a fait l'objet, les conditions assujettissant l'exercice de sa profession, les répercussions sur sa santé et les conséquences sur sa famille et son personnel. Le Comité d'audition a conclu qu'aucune de ces prétentions, individuellement ou cumulativement, ne constituait un préjudice important causé par le délai. La Cour d'appel a exprimé son désaccord avec cette conclusion; elle jugé que Me Abrametz avait subi un préjudice important.

(1) L'attention médiatique

[118] Le Comité d'audition a admis que la réputation de Me Abrametz avait souffert par suite de l'attention médiatique dont il a fait l'objet, mais a conclu que ce dernier n'avait pas démontré que ce préjudice découlait du délai plutôt que du fait qu'il faisait l'objet d'une enquête et d'une poursuite. La publicité défavorable était survenue durant une courte période au début de 2018. Le Comité d'audition a conclu que c'était l'audience, et non l'enquête qui l'avait précédée, qui avait suscité l'attention des médias.

[119] La Cour d'appel a conclu que le Comité d'audition a fait erreur en ne tenant pas compte du fait que Me Abrametz a exercé sa profession pendant plus de quatre ans alors que des soupçons pesaient sur lui. La Cour d'appel a estimé, en particulier, que les membres du Barreau et les employés de Me Abrametz savaient qu'il faisait l'objet d'une enquête et qu'il exerçait le droit sous supervision en raison d'allégations d'inconduite. Ces faits étaient connus parce que le Barreau publie sur son site Web de l'information concernant les procédures disciplinaires.

[120] Avec égards, la question n'est pas de savoir si les procédures ont été divulguées comme elles l'ont été, mais plutôt de savoir si Me Abrametz a subi un préjudice important par suite de cette divulgation. Le Comité d'audition a conclu qu'il avait subi [TRADUCTION] « un certain degré stress », mais non was identified that warranted the Court of Appeal's substitution of its own view.

un préjudice important : par. 335. Dans l'ensemble, aucune erreur manifeste et déterminante justifiant la substitution par la Cour d'appel de sa propre conclusion à celle du Comité d'audition n'a été relevée.

(2) Practice Conditions

(2) Les conditions assujettissant l'exercice de sa profession

[121] Regarding the practice conditions, the Hearing Committee did not accept Mr. Abrametz's submission that these caused him significant prejudice; the Hearing Committee did so based on the fact that Mr. Abrametz consented to the conditions, they were not overly restrictive of his practice and they were consistent with the Law Society's mandate to protect the public. It also noted that most of the allegations against Mr. Abrametz were determined to be well founded. The Hearing Committee held that Mr. Abrametz had been unable to provide evidence that he suffered from the conditions in the five years before the disciplinary hearing. He had not argued that the practice conditions impacted his billings or his caseload or the time typically required by him to process his files. Thus, he had provided no evidence that the practice conditions significantly impacted the viability or profitability of his practice.

[121] En ce qui a trait aux conditions assujettissant l'exercice par Me Abrametz de sa profession, le Comité d'audition n'a pas retenu la prétention de Me Abrametz selon laquelle ces conditions lui avaient causé un préjudice important, étant donné que ce dernier avait consenti aux conditions en question, que celles-ci n'étaient pas indûment restrictives et qu'elles concordaient bien avec la mission de protection du public du Barreau. Le Comité d'audition a en outre souligné que la plupart des allégations formulées contre Me Abrametz avaient été jugées fondées. Le Comité a conclu que Me Abrametz avait été incapable de démontrer que les conditions lui avaient causé un préjudice au cours des cinq années précédant l'audience disciplinaire. Maître Abrametz n'avait pas plaidé que les conditions assujettissant l'exercice de sa profession avaient eu une incidence sur son chiffre d'affaires, sa clientèle ou le temps dont il a généralement besoin pour travailler à ses dossiers. Par conséquent, il n'avait présenté aucune preuve indiquant que ces conditions avaient eu des répercussions importantes sur la viabilité ou la rentabilité de son cabinet.

[122] The Court of Appeal took the view that neither Mr. Abrametz's consent to the conditions nor the fact that he was found guilty of most of the charges were relevant. However, the court failed to address the core of the Hearing Committee's analysis on this point, which turned on the lack of evidence of any prejudice resulting from the conditions. Mr. Abrametz was not suspended and he continued to practice until the hearing. Thus, the Court of Appeal failed to set out a proper basis for interfering with the finding that Mr. Abrametz did not suffer significant prejudice from the conditions on his practice.

[122] La Cour d'appel a estimé que ni le fait que Me Abrametz avait consenti aux conditions en question, ni le fait que ce dernier avait été reconnu coupable de la plupart des accusations n'étaient pertinents. Toutefois, la cour a omis de se pencher sur l'aspect central de l'analyse du Comité d'audition sur ce point, qui reposait sur l'absence de preuve de quelque préjudice résultant des conditions d'exercice imposées à Me Abrametz. Ce dernier n'a pas été suspendu, et il a continué d'exercer jusqu'à l'audience. En conséquence, la Cour d'appel n'a pas exposé de fondement valable pour justifier sa décision d'intervenir à l'égard de la conclusion selon laquelle Me Abrametz n'avait pas subi un préjudice important en raison des conditions assujettissant l'exercice de sa profession.

(3) The Impact on Mr. Abrametz's Health, Family and Employees

[123] The Hearing Committee was not persuaded that the minor medical condition complained of by Mr. Abrametz and the stress experienced by his family and employees were connected to the delay. Here again, no palpable and overriding error was identified that would justify the Court of Appeal's substitution of its own views.

(4) Conclusion on the Requirement of Significant Prejudice

[124] It was not shown that the Hearing Committee committed any palpable and overriding error when it concluded that Mr. Abrametz failed to demonstrate any significant prejudice. The Court of Appeal erred by interfering with its findings of fact and findings of mixed fact and law. Even if one could view the remedy ordered by the Court of Appeal as a reduction in sanction, and although the threshold to grant such remedy is lower than that required for a stay, proof of significant prejudice is nonetheless required as part of the three-step test to establish an abuse of process. There was no such proof in this case.

C. Conclusion on Abuse of Process

[125] Since the Hearing Committee has not been shown to have erred in its finding that there was no inordinate delay or significant prejudice to Mr. Abrametz, there is no basis to set aside its conclusion that there was no abuse of process in this case. Consequently, it is not necessary to proceed to the next step and consider what remedy should be ordered.

[126] Notwithstanding the foregoing, the actions of the Law Society were not above reproach. The Law Society is entrusted with self-regulation of the profession, and by extension an aspect of the rule of law. The Law Society should be keenly aware of the importance of justice being done in a timely way; it should make every effort to safeguard procedural

(3) Les répercussions sur la santé de Me Abrametz, sur sa famille et sur son personnel

[123] Le Comité d'audition n'était pas convaincu que le problème de santé mineur dont se plaignait Me Abrametz ainsi que le stress vécu par sa famille et son personnel étaient liés au délai. Ici encore, aucune erreur manifeste et déterminante justifiant la substitution par la Cour d'appel de ses propres conclusions à celles du Comité d'audition n'a été relevée.

(4) Conclusion sur la condition requérant un préjudice important

[124] Il n'a pas été établi que le Comité d'audition a commis une erreur manifeste et déterminante lorsqu'il a conclu que Me Abrametz n'avait pas démontré qu'il avait subi un préjudice important. La Cour d'appel a erré en modifiant les conclusions de fait et les conclusions mixtes de fait et de droit tirées par le Comité d'audition. Même si la réparation ordonnée par la Cour d'appel pouvait être considérée comme une réduction de la sanction, et bien que le seuil à atteindre pour obtenir cette réparation soit inférieur à celui exigé à l'égard d'un arrêt des procédures, la preuve d'un préjudice important est néanmoins requise dans le cadre de l'analyse à trois volets applicable pour déterminer s'il y a eu abus de procédure. Aucune preuve à cet effet n'a été présentée en l'espèce.

C. Conclusion sur l'abus de procédure

[125] Comme il n'a pas été démontré que le Comité d'audition a commis une erreur en concluant à l'absence de délai excessif ou de préjudice important subi par Me Abrametz, rien ne justifie d'annuler sa conclusion selon laquelle il n'y a pas eu abus de procédure en l'espèce. Par conséquent, il n'est pas nécessaire de procéder au volet suivant et de se demander quelle réparation devrait être ordonnée.

[126] Malgré ce qui précède, les actions du Barreau n'étaient pas irréprochables. Le Barreau s'est vu confier la responsabilité de veiller à l'autoréglementation de la profession, et par extension d'un aspect de la primauté du droit. Il devrait être pleinement conscient de l'importance que justice soit rendue en temps opportun; et il devrait déployer tous les fairness. In all this, the Law Society should set an example for its own members.

VII. Conclusion

[127] I would allow the appeal, set aside the judgment of the Court of Appeal and remit the matter to the Court of Appeal to address the outstanding grounds of appeal. Costs are awarded to the Law Society in this Court and in the Court of Appeal.

The following are the reasons delivered by

CÔTÉ J. (dissenting) —

I. Overview

[128] I have had the opportunity to read the reasons of my colleague Rowe J. I disagree with the majority's disposition of this appeal. In my view, the delay in these proceedings amounted to an abuse of process, and the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal did not err in quashing the penalty for professional misconduct imposed on the respondent, Peter V. Abrametz (2020 SKCA 81). My disagreement with the majority, however, also extends to the legal principles governing the assessment of inordinate delay in administrative proceedings.

[129] Without referring to any precedents on procedural fairness review, my colleague relies on Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65, [2019] 4 S.C.R. 653, for the proposition that appellate standards of review apply in the present case. Yet our Court's jurisprudence is clear: the question of whether an administrative decision maker has complied with its duty of fairness is subject to the standard of correctness — regardless of the existence of an appeal mechanism. I see no reason to revisit this well-established starting point.

[130] Nor do I agree with the majority's reframing of the test for whether administrative delay amounts to an abuse of process. This Court recognized in Blencoe efforts requis pour protéger l'équité procédurale. En ce sens, le Barreau devrait donner l'exemple à ses propres membres.

VII. Conclusion

[127] Je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi, d'annuler l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel et de lui renvoyer l'affaire pour qu'elle examine les moyens d'appel restants. Le Barreau a droit aux dépens devant notre Cour et la Cour d'appel.

Version française des motifs rendus par

LA JUGE CÔTÉ (dissidente) —

I. Aperçu

[128] J'ai eu l'occasion de lire les motifs de mon collègue le juge Rowe. Je suis en désaccord avec le dispositif des juges majoritaires. À mon avis, le délai en l'espèce constituait un abus de procédure, et la Cour d'appel de la Saskatchewan n'a pas commis d'erreur en annulant la sanction pour inconduite professionnelle infligée à l'intimé, Peter V. Abrametz (2020 SKCA 81). Toutefois, mon désaccord avec les juges majoritaires concerne aussi les principes juridiques régissant l'appréciation du délai excessif dans les procédures administratives.

[130] Je suis également en désaccord avec la reformulation, par les juges majoritaires, du test pour déterminer si un délai administratif constitue un

v. British Columbia (Human Rights Commission), 2000 SCC 44, [2000] 2 S.C.R. 307, that inordinate delay — on its own — is a breach of procedural fairness and thus abusive. An applicant need not demonstrate "significant prejudice" for unfair conduct to constitute an abuse of process; this requirement applies only where a stay of proceedings is sought.

abus de procédure. Dans l'arrêt Blencoe c. Colombie-Britannique (Human Rights Commission), 2000 CSC 44, [2000] 2 R.C.S. 307, notre Cour a reconnu qu'un délai excessif — à lui seul — porte atteinte à l'équité procédurale, et qu'il est de ce fait abusif. Il n'est pas nécessaire que le demandeur fasse la preuve d'un « préjudice important » pour qu'une conduite inéquitable constitue un abus de procédure; cette exigence s'applique uniquement lorsque l'arrêt des procédures est demandé.

[132] Applying this framework to the case at bar, I agree with the analysis of the Court of Appeal. The appellant, the Law Society of Saskatchewan, subjected Mr. Abrametz to disciplinary proceedings spanning a period of more than 6 years, 32 ½ months of which remain unexplained. The delay grossly exceeded the inherent time requirements of this case; it is plainly inordinate and, as a result, abusive. This undue delay caused serious prejudice to Mr. Abrametz and also affected his employees, all of whom experienced additional stress from the unjustified extension of the proceedings.

[132] Appliquant ce cadre d'analyse au présent pourvoi, je souscris à l'analyse de la Cour d'appel. L'appelante, la Law Society of Saskatchewan (« Barreau »), a soumis Me Abrametz à des procédures disciplinaires qui ont duré plus de 6 ans, dont 32 ½ mois demeurent inexpliqués. Le délai a largement dépassé le temps intrinsèquement requis par cette affaire; il est manifestement excessif, et par le fait même abusif. Ce délai injustifié a causé un préjudice important à Me Abrametz et a aussi affecté ses employés, qui ont tous vécu du stress supplémentaire en raison de la prolongation injustifiée des procédures.

[133] In these circumstances, the Court of Appeal rightly sanctioned the Law Society's abuse of process by ordering that the penalty for Mr. Abrametz's professional misconduct be set aside. I would accordingly dismiss the appeal.

[133] Dans ces circonstances, c'est à bon droit que la Cour d'appel a sanctionné l'abus de procédure du Barreau en ordonnant l'annulation de la sanction infligée pour l'inconduite professionnelle de Me Abrametz. Je suis donc d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

II. Abuse of Process and Inordinate Delay in Administrative Proceedings

[134] I begin my analysis by discussing the framework for assessing abuse of process resulting from inordinate delay in administrative proceedings. I do so because the standard of review depends on the parameters of the test for abuse of process arising from administrative delay. Here, the majority posits that the final assessment of whether delay constitutes an abuse of process is a question of law subject to correctness review, but that findings made with respect to the "requirements" of this test, including inordinate delay, are entitled to deference. Yet as I explain, the doctrine of abuse of process is unencumbered by specific requirements at common law. Inordinate delay is one of the manifestations of abusive conduct that undermines the integrity of the justice system. Therefore, the test for abuse of process arising from administrative delay is based entirely on the "inordinate delay" standard, the application of which is a question of law.

[135] To be more specific, the majority purportedly relies on Blencoe in articulating a three-step test for determining whether delay in administrative proceedings amounts to an abuse of process. The test begins with two requirements: inordinate delay and significant prejudice caused by the delay. Where both requirements are met, there is a final step at which the court must assess whether the delay amounts to an abuse of process because it is manifestly unfair to a party or otherwise brings the administration of justice into disrepute.

[136] With respect, I am of the view that this framework rests on a mistaken understanding of the doctrine of abuse of process. Under the majority's approach, even inordinate delay that directly causes significant prejudice is not per se abusive, as the last step of its test indicates. Not only is this proposition doctrinally flawed, but it results in an unduly elevated standard that is disproportionate to the remedies available for abusive delay, which range from a mere declaration to a stay of proceedings. Simply put, the majority's

II. L'abus de procédure et le délai excessif en droit administratif

[135] Plus précisément, les juges majoritaires affirment se fonder sur l'arrêt Blencoe en formulant un test à trois volets pour déterminer si le délai dans des procédures administratives constitue un abus de procédure. L'analyse a pour point de départ deux exigences : le délai excessif et le préjudice important causé par le délai. Lorsqu'il est satisfait à ces deux exigences, le dernier volet requiert du tribunal qu'il examine si le délai équivaut à un abus de procédure parce qu'il est manifestement injuste envers une partie ou qu'il a autrement pour effet de déconsidérer l'administration de la justice.

test is so onerous that it invites complacency in administrative proceedings.

[137] This Court rightly recognized in Blencoe that inordinate delay — on its own — is a breach of the duty of fairness. In my view, courts should distance themselves from such procedural unfairness by calling it what it is: an abuse of process. Prejudice is not a necessary condition for delay to be inordinate, although it may contribute to such a finding. Evidence of prejudice, I add, remains highly significant at the remedial stage, since the remedy must be proportionate to the abuse of process. This is consistent with the central principle laid down by the majority in Blencoe — namely that courts may grant a stay of proceedings only in the "clearest of cases", where the applicant has demonstrated significant prejudice arising from inordinate administrative delay.

A. Doctrine of Abuse of Process at Common Law

[138] The doctrine of abuse of process "has its roots in a judge's inherent and residual discretion to prevent abuse of the court's process" (Behn v. Moulton Contracting Ltd., 2013 SCC 26, [2013] 2 S.C.R. 227, at para. 39; Toronto (City) v. C.U.P.E., Local 79, 2003 SCC 63, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, at para. 35). This common law doctrine "is used in a variety of legal contexts" (Toronto v. C.U.P.E., at para. 36; see also Behn, at para. 39). Moreover, the analysis of abuse of process at common law "dovetail[s]" with that of the procedural rights guaranteed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (R. v. Regan, 2002 SCC 12, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 297, at para. 50; see also R. v. O'Connor, [1995] 4 S.C.R. 411, at para. 71). The remedies for abuse of process at common law may, however, diverge from those available under s. 24(1) of the Charter (O'Connor, at para. 68).

abusif, réparations qui vont du simple jugement déclaratoire à l'arrêt des procédures. En somme, l'analyse des juges majoritaires est si exigeante qu'elle invite à la complaisance dans les procédures administratives.

[137] Dans l'arrêt Blencoe, notre Cour a reconnu à juste titre que le délai excessif — à lui seul — est un manquement à l'obligation d'équité. À mon avis, les tribunaux doivent dénoncer une telle iniquité procédurale en l'appelant par son nom : un abus de procédure. Le préjudice n'est pas une condition nécessaire pour que le délai soit considéré comme excessif, bien qu'il puisse contribuer à une telle conclusion. J'ajoute que la preuve d'un préjudice demeure fort pertinente au stade de la réparation, puisque celle-ci doit être proportionnelle à l'abus de procédure. Cette démarche est compatible avec le principe fondamental qu'ont établi les juges majoritaires dans l'arrêt Blencoe — soit que les tribunaux ne peuvent ordonner l'arrêt des procédures que dans les « cas les plus manifestes », où le demandeur a prouvé l'existence d'un préjudice important découlant d'un délai administratif excessif.

A. La doctrine de l'abus de procédure en common law

[139] The doctrine of abuse of process "is characterized by its flexibility" and "is unencumbered by specific requirements" (Behn, at para. 40; see also Toronto v. C.U.P.E., at para. 42). The test for abuse of process — in all of its applications — is whether the impugned conduct affects adjudicative fairness or would otherwise bring the administration of justice into disrepute (Blencoe, at para. 115; Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v. Harkat, 2014 SCC 37, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 33, at para. 106; R. v. Nixon, 2011 SCC 34, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 566, at para. 68; R. v. Anderson, 2014 SCC 41, [2014] 2 S.C.R. 167, at paras. 49-50; O'Connor, at paras. 60-64; R. v. Babos, 2014 SCC 16, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 309, at para. 31; Regan, at para. 49; Behn, at para. 39; United States of America v. Cobb, 2001 SCC 19, [2001] 1 S.C.R. 587, at paras. 36-40; R. v. Scott, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 979, at p. 1007; R. v. Power, [1994] 1 S.C.R. 601, at p. 616). In sum, an abuse of process may arise from two often interrelated categories: adjudicative unfairness and harm to the integrity of the justice system.

[140] Abuse of process must be disentangled analytically from a stay of proceedings, which is but one of the remedies available at common law to redress abusive conduct (Regan, at para. 53; Blencoe, at para. 117; see also S. Coughlan, "Threading Together Abuse of Process and Exclusion of Evidence: How it Became Possible to Rebuke Mr. Big" (2015), 71 S.C.L.R. (2d) 415, at pp. 425-29; F. Lowery, "Abuse of Process: The Need for Structure" (2014), 20 Auckland U. L. Rev. 223, at pp. 234 et seq.). It is crucial to draw this distinction because the threshold for demonstrating abusive conduct is much lower than the one for obtaining a stay of proceedings.

[141] This Court has established stringent requirements for granting a stay of proceedings due to the "drastic" nature of this remedy (Regan, at para. 53). It is only in the "clearest of cases" that courts may stay proceedings (O'Connor, at paras. 68 and 82; R. v. Carosella, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 80, at para. 52; Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Tobiass, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 391, at para. 59; Blencoe, at para. 118; Regan, at para. 53; R. v. Nasogaluak, 2010 SCC 6, [2010] 1 S.C.R. 206, at para. 17; Babos, [139] La doctrine de l'abus de procédure « se caractérise par sa souplesse » et « ne s'encombre pas d'exigences particulières » (Behn, par. 40; voir aussi Toronto c. S.C.F.P., par. 42). Le test pour déterminer s'il y a abus de procédure — dans tous les cas d'application possibles — consiste à se demander si la conduite contestée affecte l'équité juridictionnelle ou déconsidère autrement l'administration de la justice (Blencoe, par. 115; Canada (Citoyenneté et Immigration) c. Harkat, 2014 CSC 37, [2014] 2 R.C.S. 33, par. 106; R. c. Nixon, 2011 CSC 34, [2011] 2 R.C.S. 566, par. 68; R. c. Anderson, 2014 CSC 41, [2014] 2 R.C.S. 167, par. 49-50; O'Connor, par. 60-64; R. c. Babos, 2014 CSC 16, [2014] 1 R.C.S. 309, par. 31; Regan, par. 49; Behn, par. 39; États-Unis d'Amérique c. Cobb, 2001 CSC 19, [2001] 1 R.C.S. 587, par. 36-40; R. c. Scott, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 979, p. 1007; R. c. Power, [1994] 1 R.C.S. 601, p. 616). En somme, un abus de procédure peut découler de deux sources souvent interreliées : l'iniquité du processus juridictionnel et l'atteinte à l'intégrité du système de justice.

at para. 31; R. v. Sullivan, 2022 SCCC 19, [2022] 1 S.C.R. 460, at para. 95). An applicant must satisfy the following test to obtain a stay:

(1) there must be prejudice to the fairness of the trial or the integrity of the justice system that will be manifested, perpetuated or aggravated through the conduct of the trial, or by its outcome;

(2) there must be no alternative remedy capable of redressing the prejudice; and

(3) where it is unclear whether a stay is warranted after the first two steps, the court is required to balance the interests in favour of granting a stay, such as denouncing misconduct and preserving the integrity of the justice system, against the interest that society has in having a final decision on the merits (Sullivan, at para. 95; Babos, at para. 32; Regan, at paras. 54-57; Tobiass, at paras. 90-92; O'Connor, at paras. 75-82).

This test also applies to abusive delay in administrative proceedings, as indicated by Bastarache J.'s references to the "clearest of cases" threshold in Blencoe, at paras. 118 and 120.

[142] With respect, I am of the view that the majority's reasons conflate the doctrine of abuse of process with the test for stays of proceedings, which are only a subset of the remedies that courts may order to sanction abusive conduct. The majority thus fails to distinguish between, on the one hand, the test for whether conduct amounts to an abuse of process and, on the other hand, the test for whether a stay of proceedings is warranted in the circumstances (O'Connor, at para. 72). The former is flexible and unencumbered by particular requirements; the court must simply determine whether the impugned conduct undermines adjudicative fairness or the integrity of the justice system. The latter establishes an onerous threshold that is met only in the clearest of cases, where the applicant satisfies specific, stringent requirements.

CSC 6, [2010] 1 R.C.S. 206, par. 17; Babos, par. 31; R. c. Sullivan, 2022 CSC 19, [2022] 1 R.C.S. 460, par. 95). Un demandeur doit satisfaire au test suivant pour obtenir l'arrêt des procédures :

(1) il doit y avoir une atteinte à l'équité du procès ou à l'intégrité du système de justice qui sera révélée, perpétuée ou aggravée par le procès ou par son issue;

(2) il ne doit y avoir aucune autre réparation susceptible de remédier à l'atteinte;

(3) s'il subsiste une incertitude quant à l'opportunité de l'arrêt des procédures à l'issue des deux premières étapes, le tribunal doit mettre en balance les intérêts militant en faveur de cet arrêt, comme le fait de dénoncer la conduite répréhensible et de préserver l'intégrité du système de justice, et l'intérêt que représente pour la société un jugement définitif statuant sur le fond (Sullivan, par. 95; Babos, par. 32; Regan, par. 54-57; Tobiass, par. 90-92; O'Connor, par. 75-82).

Ce test s'applique également au délai abusif dans des procédures administratives, comme l'indiquent les mentions du seuil des « cas les plus manifestes » par le juge Bastarache dans l'arrêt Blencoe, par. 118 et 120.

[143] One final point concerning abuse of process is in order. This common law doctrine has always focused on the integrity of the justice system rather than the interests of particular litigants, as Arbour J. underscored in Toronto v. C.U.P.E., at para. 43:

> In all of its applications, the primary focus of the doctrine of abuse of process is the integrity of the adjudicative functions of courts. Whether it serves to disentitle the Crown from proceeding because of undue delays (see Blencoe, supra), or whether it prevents a civil party from using the courts for an improper purpose (see Hunter, supra, and Demeter, supra), the focus is less on the interest of parties and more on the integrity of judicial decision making as a branch of the administration of justice. In a case such as the present one, it is that concern that compels a bar against relitigation, more than any sense of unfairness to a party being called twice to put its case forward, for example. When that is understood, the parameters of the doctrine become easier to define, and the exercise of discretion is better anchored in principle. [Emphasis added.]

Stated differently, the doctrine of abuse of process "transcends the interests of litigants and focuses on the integrity of the entire system" (Ontario v. O.P.S.E.U., 2003 SCC 64, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 149, at para. 12 (emphasis added); see also I.A.T.S.E., Stage Local 56 v. Société de la Place des Arts de Montréal, 2004 SCC 2, [2004] 1 S.C.R. 43, at para. 16).

[144] In other words, courts must condemn conduct that, if left unsanctioned, would "leave the impression that the justice system condones conduct that offends society's sense of fair play and decency" (Babos, at para. 35; see also Toronto v. C.U.P.E., at para. 43). This is the primary concern addressed by the doctrine of abuse of process at common law, and it is independent of any prejudice suffered by litigants subject to such abusive conduct.

B. Abusive Delay in Administrative Proceedings

(1) Overview of the Blencoe Framework

[145] This Court's decision in Blencoe was a significant jurisprudential step in addressing the issue

> Dans tous ses cas d'application, la doctrine de l'abus de procédure vise essentiellement à préserver l'intégrité de la fonction judiciaire. Qu'elle ait pour effet de priver le ministère public du droit de continuer la poursuite à cause de délais inacceptables (voir Blencoe, précité), ou d'empêcher une partie civile de faire appel aux tribunaux à mauvais escient (voir Hunter, précité, et Demeter, précité), l'accent est mis davantage sur l'intégrité du processus décisionnel judiciaire comme fonction de l'administration de la justice que sur l'intérêt des parties. Dans une affaire comme la présente espèce, c'est cette préoccupation qui commande d'interdire la remise en cause, plus que toute perception d'injustice envers une partie qui serait de nouveau appelée à faire la preuve de ses prétentions, par exemple. Cela compris, il est plus facile d'établir les paramètres de la doctrine et de définir les principes applicables à l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire. [Je souligne.]

En d'autres termes, la doctrine de l'abus de procédure « transcende les intérêts des parties et s'attache à l'intégrité du système » (Ontario c. S.E.E.F.P.O., 2003 CSC 64, [2003] 3 R.C.S. 149, par. 12 (je souligne); voir aussi A.I.E.S.T., local de scène n° 56 c. Société de la Place des Arts de Montréal, 2004 CSC 2, [2004] 1 R.C.S. 43, par. 16).

B. Les délais abusifs en droit administratif

(1) Aperçu du cadre d'analyse de l'arrêt Blencoe

[145] L'arrêt Blencoe de notre Cour a marqué une étape jurisprudentielle importante quant à l'analyse

of delay in administrative proceedings. In that case, Bastarache J., writing for a five-judge majority, and LeBel J., dissenting in part, both recognized that inordinate administrative delay amounts to an abuse of process, even when the hearing is not unfair to the applicant. Bastarache and LeBel JJ. further agreed that courts possess multiple remedial options to sanction abusive delay under administrative law principles. In my view, their opinions broadly complement each other, and their teachings should be reaffirmed in the present case.

de la question des délais en matière administrative. Dans cet arrêt, le juge Bastarache, s'exprimant pour une majorité de cinq juges, et le juge LeBel, dissident en partie, ont tous deux reconnu qu'un délai administratif excessif constitue un abus de procédure, même lorsque l'audience n'est pas inéquitable à l'égard du demandeur. Les juges Bastarache et LeBel ont également convenu que les tribunaux disposent de plusieurs mesures de redressement pour sanctionner les délais abusifs en application des principes du droit administratif. À mon avis, leurs opinions sont largement complémentaires et il y a lieu de réaffirmer leurs enseignements en l'espèce.

[146] As the following passage makes clear, Bastarache J.'s majority opinion focused on the high threshold to be met for an applicant to obtain a stay of proceedings — the only remedy sought by the applicant in that case:

> In my view, there are appropriate remedies available in the administrative law context to deal with state-caused delay in human rights proceedings. However, delay, without more, will not warrant a stay of proceedings as an abuse of process at common law. Staying proceedings for the mere passage of time would be tantamount to imposing a judicially created limitation period. In the administrative law context, there must be proof of significant prejudice which results from an unacceptable delay. [Emphasis added; citations omitted; para. 101.]

Relying on the jurisprudence on stays of proceedings, Bastarache J. reaffirmed that the "power [to order a stay] can be exercised only in the 'clearest of cases'" (para. 118). I note that the guidance provided by Bastarache J. concerning the "clearest of cases" threshold for obtaining a stay of proceedings corresponds precisely to the test for abuse of process laid down by the majority in this case.

[147] The threshold for obtaining a stay of proceedings set out in Blencoe may be summarized as follows. First, the delay must be "unreasonable or inordinate" so as to constitute a breach of the duty of fairness (para. 121). Bastarache J. stressed that "[t]here is no

[146] Comme l'indique clairement le passage qui suit, l'opinion majoritaire du juge Bastarache mettait l'accent sur le seuil exigeant qu'un demandeur doit atteindre pour obtenir un arrêt des procédures — la seule réparation sollicitée par le demandeur dans cette affaire :

> Selon moi, le droit administratif offre des réparations appropriées en ce qui concerne le délai imputable à l'État dans des procédures en matière de droits de la personne. Cependant, le délai ne justifie pas, à lui seul, un arrêt des procédures comme l'abus de procédure en common law. Mettre fin aux procédures simplement en raison du délai écoulé reviendrait à imposer une prescription d'origine judiciaire. En droit administratif, il faut prouver qu'un délai inacceptable a causé un préjudice important. [Je souligne; références omises; par. 101.]

S'appuyant sur la jurisprudence en matière d'arrêts des procédures, le juge Bastarache a réaffirmé que le « pouvoir [d'ordonner un arrêt des procédures] ne peut être exercé que dans les "cas les plus manifestes" » (par. 118). Je souligne que les précisions du juge Bastarache quant au seuil des « cas les plus manifestes » pour obtenir un arrêt des procédures correspondent précisément au test pour déterminer s'il y a abus de procédure établi par les juges majoritaires en l'espèce.

[147] Le seuil établi dans l'arrêt Blencoe pour obtenir un arrêt des procédures peut être résumé comme suit. Premièrement, le délai doit être « déraisonnable ou excessif » de sorte qu'il y a un manquement à l'obligation d'agir équitablement (par. 121). Le juge abuse of process by delay per se" (para. 121); the delay must be "clearly unacceptable" in the circumstances of the case (para. 115). To determine whether the delay is inordinate, the court must undertake a contextual assessment of "the nature of the case and its complexity, the facts and issues, the purpose and nature of the proceedings, whether the respondent contributed to the delay or waived the delay, and other circumstances of the case" (para. 122). Second, the delay must "have directly caused a significant prejudice" (para. 115). Where both requirements are met, the court must consider whether the public interest favours halting the proceedings (para. 120).

Bastarache a souligné que « [l]e délai ne constitue pas en soi un abus de procédure » (par. 121); il doit être « manifestement inacceptable » dans les circonstances de l'affaire (par. 115). Pour juger si le délai est excessif, le tribunal doit entreprendre une évaluation contextuelle de « la nature de l'affaire et de sa complexité, des faits et des questions en litige, de l'objet et de la nature des procédures, de la question de savoir si la personne visée par les procédures a contribué ou renoncé au délai, et d'autres circonstances de l'affaire » (par. 122). Deuxièmement, le délai doit « avoir directement causé un préjudice important » (par. 115). Lorsqu'il est satisfait à ces deux exigences, le tribunal doit se demander si l'intérêt du public milite en faveur de l'arrêt des procédures (par. 120).

[148] LeBel J., for his part, took a more holistic approach to abuse of process arising from inordinate delay in administrative proceedings. While he noted that "[w]hoever asks for a stay of proceedings carries a heavy burden" (para. 180), he focused on the "lower threshold of unreasonable delay that might warrant some kind of judicial action and different, less radical, remedies than a stay in the administrative proceedings" (para. 155). Indeed, LeBel J. stressed that inordinate delay is a breach of procedural fairness and thus abusive. He discussed three possible remedies for abusive delay in administrative proceedings: a stay of proceedings, an order for an expedited hearing, and costs (para. 179).

[148] Pour sa part, le juge LeBel a adopté une méthode plus holistique à l'égard de l'abus de procédure découlant des délais excessifs en matière administrative. Bien qu'il ait souligné que « [q]uiconque demande l'arrêt des procédures assume un lourd fardeau » (par. 180), il a mis l'accent sur « le critère moins rigoureux du délai déraisonnable qui pourrait justifier une forme quelconque d'intervention judiciaire et d'autres réparations moins radicales que l'arrêt des procédures administratives » (par. 155). En effet, le juge LeBel a souligné qu'un délai excessif constitue une atteinte à l'équité procédurale et est par le fait même abusif. Il a examiné trois réparations pouvant être ordonnées en cas de délai abusif en matière administrative : l'arrêt des procédures, l'ordonnance enjoignant de tenir une audience accélérée et l'adjudication de dépens (par. 179).

[149] Under LeBel J.'s approach, the court must first balance three contextual factors (as opposed to requirements) in assessing whether the delay is inordinate, at para. 160:

(1) the time taken compared to the inherent time requirements of the matter . . .;

(2) the causes of delay beyond the inherent time requirements of the matter . . .; and

(3) the impact of the delay, considered as encompassing both prejudice in an evidentiary sense and other harms

[149] Suivant la méthode préconisée par le juge LeBel, le tribunal doit d'abord apprécier trois facteurs contextuels (par opposition à des exigences) dans l'évaluation de la question de savoir si le délai est excessif (par. 160) :

(1) le délai écoulé par rapport au délai inhérent à l'affaire [. . .];

(2) les causes de la prolongation du délai inhérent à l'affaire [. . .];

(3) l'incidence du délai, considérée comme englobant le préjudice sur le plan de la preuve et les autres atteintes

> to the lives of real people impacted by the ongoing delay. [Emphasis deleted.]

Where the court concludes that the delay is inordinate, it must turn its attention to the appropriate remedy in the circumstances. The selection of the remedy requires the court to weigh the three contextual factors listed above as well as other competing interests — including those of the community and, where applicable, of other private litigants (para. 178).

(2) Inordinate Delay Is Abusive — Irrespective of Prejudice

[150] As noted above, Toronto v. C.U.P.E. confirms that inordinate delay in administrative proceedings belongs to the category of abusive conduct that undermines the integrity of the administration of justice — regardless of its effects on the interests of litigants (para. 43). It follows that courts may condemn administrative delay as abusive even where there is no evidence of prejudice. However, prejudice remains a highly significant consideration in determining the appropriate remedy.

[151] The majority in this case proffers two reasons for its position that "significant prejudice" is required for an abuse of process to arise from administrative delay. Its first justification is that sanctioning abuse of process in the absence of significant prejudice would be "tantamount to imposing a judicially created limitation period" (para. 67, citing Blencoe, at para. 101, where Bastarache J. referred to stays of proceedings only). With respect, this assertion is plainly wrong, and it is symptomatic of the conflation of abuse of process with the remedy of a stay of proceedings. Far from establishing a limitation period, alternative remedies allow the claim to proceed but condemn state conduct that undermines the integrity of the justice system. Indeed, I cannot help but mention the irony in the proposition that LeBel J.'s proposed remedy for abusive delay in Blencoe — an order for an expedited hearing — is akin to a statutory limitation period.

> à l'existence des personnes touchées par le délai qui s'écoule. [Soulignement omis.]

Lorsque le tribunal conclut que le délai est excessif, il doit porter son attention sur la réparation appropriée dans les circonstances. Le choix de la réparation oblige le tribunal à apprécier les trois facteurs contextuels énumérés précédemment ainsi que d'autres intérêts opposés — y compris ceux de la collectivité et, le cas échéant, d'autres justiciables (par. 178).

(2) Les délais excessifs sont abusifs — sans égard au préjudice

[151] Les juges majoritaires en l'espèce invoquent deux raisons au soutien de leur position selon laquelle il doit y avoir un « préjudice important » pour qu'un abus de procédure découle d'un délai administratif. Leur première justification est que la sanction d'un abus de procédure en l'absence d'un préjudice important « reviendrait à imposer une prescription d'origine judiciaire » (par. 67, citant Blencoe, par. 101, où le juge Bastarache ne parlait que de l'arrêt des procédures). Avec égards, cette affirmation est tout à fait erronée et témoigne de la confusion entre la doctrine de l'abus de procédure et la réparation qu'est l'arrêt des procédures. Loin d'établir un délai de prescription, les autres réparations permettent à la demande d'aller de l'avant, mais condamnent la conduite de l'État qui mine l'intégrité du système de justice. De fait, je ne puis m'empêcher de mentionner l'ironie de la proposition selon laquelle la réparation pour délai excessif proposée par le juge LeBel dans l'arrêt Blencoe — une ordonnance enjoignant de tenir une audience accélérée — s'apparente à un délai de prescription imposée par la loi.

[152] I am troubled, to say the least, by the second justification offered by the majority — namely that "delay by itself may be beneficial to the affected party. For example, if the affected party is facing the penalty of disbarment, delay in the administrative process might be welcomed by the affected party, insofar as it enables him or her to continue practicing" (para. 67). It is trite law that professional bodies bear the onus of proving the misconduct of persons subject to their jurisdiction. Those who have done nothing wrong will not "benefit" from administrative delay, even if they are allowed to maintain their practice. It is thus improper for courts to consider the unproven "benefits" flowing from administrative delay, since to do so assumes that applicants are guilty of the disciplinary charges brought against them.

[153] In any event, the additional stress caused by inordinately long administrative proceedings may very well be prejudicial, regardless of whether the applicant prevails on the merits. I reiterate that professional bodies, like other administrative decision makers, owe a duty of fairness to professionals subject to disciplinary proceedings. The existence and scope of this duty are independent of the outcome of the adjudication. Inordinate delay — in all cases — is procedurally unfair and thus abusive.

(3) Remedies at Common Law

[154] Where the applicant has demonstrated that the delay is inordinate, the next step in the analysis is for the court to determine the appropriate remedy in the circumstances. Courts possess an extensive arsenal of remedial tools to sanction and redress abusive conduct, ranging from a declaration to a stay of proceedings. The choice of remedy for an abuse of process — be it at common law or under s. 24(1) of the Charter — falls within the trial judge's discretion (Tobiass, at para. 87; Regan, at para. 117; R. v. Bjelland, 2009 SCC 38, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 651, at paras. 15 and 51; R. v. Bellusci, 2012 SCC 44, [2012]

[152] Je suis troublée, c'est le moins qu'on puisse dire, par la deuxième justification donnée par les juges majoritaires — soit qu'il « arrive parfois que le délai soit lui-même bénéfique pour la partie touchée. Par exemple, si celle-ci est passible de radiation du Barreau, elle pourrait accueillir favorablement les délais dans le déroulement des procédures administratives, dans la mesure où ils lui permettent de continuer à exercer » (par. 67). Il est de jurisprudence constante que les ordres professionnels ont le fardeau de prouver l'inconduite des personnes assujetties à leur compétence. Ceux et celles qui n'ont rien à se reprocher ne tirent aucun « bénéfice » d'un délai administratif, et ce, même s'ils sont autorisés à continuer à exercer leur profession. Par conséquent, les tribunaux ne sont pas justifiés de prendre en compte les « bénéfices » non prouvés du délai administratif, car une telle approche présume que les demandeurs sont coupables des accusations disciplinaires portées contre eux.

[153] Quoi qu'il en soit, le stress supplémentaire engendré par des procédures administratives excessivement longues peut fort bien s'avérer préjudiciable, sans égard à la décision sur le fond. Je répète que les ordres professionnels, à l'instar des autres décideurs administratifs, ont une obligation d'agir équitablement envers les professionnels qui font l'objet de procédures disciplinaires. L'existence et la portée de cette obligation sont indépendantes de l'issue de l'instance. Les délais excessifs — dans tous les cas — sont inéquitables sur le plan procédural, et par le fait même abusifs.

(3) Réparations en common law

2 S.C.R. 509, at paras. 17-18; Babos, at para. 48). As noted above, applicants must satisfy a specific test to obtain a stay of proceedings, but other remedies are not subject to that test.

par. 15 et 51; R. c. Bellusci, 2012 CSC 44, [2012] 2 R.C.S. 509, par. 17-18; Babos, par. 48). Rappelons que les demandeurs doivent satisfaire à un test spécifique pour obtenir l'arrêt des procédures, mais que les autres réparations n'y sont pas assujetties.

[155] Originally, a stay of proceedings was seen as the only remedy available for an abuse of process at common law (see, e.g., L'Heureux-Dubé J.'s obiter dictum in O'Connor, at para. 68). However, in Blencoe, Bastarache J. rightly noted that there is "no support for the notion that a stay is the only remedy available in administrative law proceedings", and he stressed that "[o]ther remedies are available", without elaborating on them (para. 117). In the context of inordinate delay, LeBel J. mentioned orders for costs and orders for an expedited hearing as alternative remedies.

[156] There exist other remedial options at common law to redress abusive administrative delay, including reductions in sanction, orders for the exclusion of evidence, and declarations. Traditional prerogative writs such as mandamus may of course complement these remedies. In short, courts have a wide discretion to grant remedies for abusive conduct that account for the circumstances of each case.

[157] The guiding principle in determining the appropriate remedy is proportionality. LeBel J.'s approach in Blencoe requires courts to consider the nature and magnitude of the prejudice as primary factors — alongside the length and causes of the delay — in selecting a remedy proportionate to the abuse of process. As mandated by Blencoe, the applicant must demonstrate "significant prejudice" to obtain a stay of proceedings for inordinate delay in the administrative law context (para. 101), but this standard does not apply to alternative remedies.

[157] Le principe directeur pour déterminer la réparation appropriée est la proportionnalité. La méthode adoptée par le juge LeBel dans l'arrêt Blencoe exige des tribunaux qu'ils prennent en considération la nature et l'ampleur du préjudice en tant que facteurs principaux — parallèlement à la durée et aux causes du délai — dans le choix d'une réparation proportionnelle à l'abus de procédure. Comme l'exige l'arrêt Blencoe, le demandeur doit faire la preuve d'un « préjudice important » afin d'obtenir un arrêt des procédures pour délai administratif excessif (par. 101). Cette exigence ne s'applique toutefois pas aux autres réparations.

[158] Under LeBel J.'s approach, prejudice remains an integral part of the analysis in that it dictates the proper judicial response to the abuse of process. The absence of any prejudice entails that, in certain cases, a declaration of abuse of process may be the only appropriate redress. Although less drastic than other remedies, declaratory relief allows the judiciary to distance itself from abusive conduct and to deter administrative decision makers from ignoring delays in subsequent proceedings (Vancouver (City) v. Ward, 2010 SCC 27, [2010] 2 S.C.R. 28, at para. 37).

[159] In the final analysis, this approach avoids the unfortunate inference that courts condone inordinate delay where the applicant fails to meet the high threshold of "significant prejudice". I echo LeBel J.'s vehement criticism of avoidable delays in Blencoe: "Unreasonable delay in administrative proceedings is illegal under administrative law" (para. 162 (emphasis added)). In my view, it is incumbent on courts to condemn such conduct as an abuse of process whenever it is brought to their attention.

III. Standard of Review

A. Inconsistency With Khela

[160] The majority purports to "clarify" the standard of review applicable to questions of procedural fairness in a statutory appeal. It does so, however, without meaningfully considering Mission Institution v. Khela, 2014 SCC 24, [2014] 1 S.C.R. 502 — the governing authority on this point of law — or any other case relating to the duty of procedural fairness. I see no reason to revisit the foundations of Khela.

[161] In Khela, LeBel J. unambiguously confirmed for a unanimous court that "the standard for determining whether the decision maker complied with the duty of procedural fairness will continue to be 'correctness'" (para. 79; see also Canada (Citizenship and Immigration) v. Khosa, 2009 SCC 12, [2009] 1 S.C.R. 339, at para. 43, referring to

III. Norme de contrôle

A. Incompatibilité avec l'arrêt Khela

[160] Les juges majoritaires prétendent « clarifier » la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions d'équité procédurale dans le cas des appels prévus par la loi. Or, ils le font sans véritablement prendre en compte l'arrêt Établissement de Mission c. Khela, 2014 CSC 24, [2014] 1 R.C.S. 502 — qui fait autorité sur ce point de droit — ou tout autre arrêt relatif à l'obligation de respecter l'équité procédurale. Je ne vois aucune raison de revenir sur les fondements de l'arrêt Khela.

[161] Dans l'arrêt Khela, au nom d'une Cour unanime, le juge LeBel a confirmé sans équivoque que « la norme applicable à la question de savoir si la décision a été prise dans le respect de l'équité procédurale sera toujours celle de la "décision correcte" » (par. 79; voir aussi Canada (Citoyenneté et Immigration) c. Khosa, 2009 CSC 12, [2009] 1 R.C.S. 339, par. 43, renvoyant à Dunsmuir c. Nouveau-Brunswick, 2008 CSC 9, [2008] 1 R.C.S. 190; S.C.F.P. c. Ontario (Ministre du Travail), 2003 CSC 29, [2003] 1 R.C.S. 539, par. 100; Toronto c. S.C.F.P., par. 15 (appliquant la norme de la décision correcte à la question de l'abus de procédure); Baker c. Canada (Ministre de la Citoyenneté et de l'Immigration), [1999] 2 R.C.S. 817, par. 55-62 (appliquant la norme de la décision raisonnable uniquement aux « éléments de fond » de la décision)). Qui plus est, le cadre d'analyse formulé par notre Cour pour l'examen des questions d'équité procédurale s'applique sans égard à quelque mécanisme d'appel que ce soit, bien que l'existence de droits d'appel soit une considération pertinente pour déterminer la teneur de l'obligation d'équité en common law (Baker, par. 24).

[162] Despite this clear statement in Khela, the majority asserts that "where questions of procedural fairness are dealt with through a statutory appeal mechanism, they are subject to appellate standards of review" (para. 27). This is so, in its view, because of this Court's categorical direction in Vavilov that appeals are to be decided according to appellate standards of review.

[163] But the assertion on which the majority relies was made in the context of substantive review — in which the presumptive standard of review is reasonableness, by contrast with Khela. Indeed, the passages of Vavilov cited by my colleague (paras. 27-28) established the principle that "[the legislature] may direct that derogation from the presumption of reasonableness review is appropriate by providing for a statutory appeal mechanism from an administrative decision maker to a court, thereby signalling the application of appellate standards" (Vavilov, at para. 33 (emphasis added); see also para. 36).

[164] With respect, the mere reference to Vavilov — a judgment that was rendered in a different context and that excluded procedural fairness review from its purview — does not suffice to oust Khela and other directly applicable precedents. Indeed, in Vavilov, [164] Avec égards, le seul renvoi à l'arrêt Vavilov — un jugement qui a été rendu dans un contexte différent et qui a exclu l'équité procédurale de son champ d'application — ne suffit pas pour écarter l'arrêt Khela et d'autres précédents directement applicables.

at para. 23, this Court expressly excluded issues of procedural fairness from the framework developed in that case — and rightly so. The central "conceptual basis" for the presumption of reasonableness review in the Vavilov framework is "respect for the legislature's institutional design choice to delegate certain matters to non-judicial decision makers through statute" (para. 26). Moreover, "the consideration of expertise is folded into the new starting point . . ., namely the presumption of reasonableness review" (para. 58). Neither of these considerations applies where procedural fairness is in issue.

En effet, au par. 23 de l'arrêt Vavilov, notre Cour a expressément exclu — à juste titre — les questions d'équité procédurale du cadre d'analyse élaboré dans cet arrêt. Le principal « fondement conceptuel » de la présomption d'application de la norme de contrôle de la décision raisonnable dans le cadre d'analyse énoncé dans l'arrêt Vavilov est le « respect du choix d'organisation institutionnelle du législateur consistant à déléguer certaines questions à des décideurs non judiciaires par voie législative » (par. 26). Qui plus est, « la prise en compte de l'expertise est incorporée au nouveau point de départ [. . .], à savoir la présomption d'application de la norme de la décision raisonnable » (par. 58). Ni l'une ni l'autre de ces considérations ne s'appliquent lorsque l'équité procédurale est en cause.

[165] First, the duty of procedural fairness exists independently of statutorily confined administrative regimes. It is a "general common law principle" incrementally developed by courts over multiple decades of jurisprudence (Cardinal v. Director of Kent Institution, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 643, at p. 653; see also Khela, at para. 82; Canada (Attorney General) v. Mavi, 2011 SCC 30, [2011] 2 S.C.R. 504, at para. 38; Dunsmuir, at para. 87; Mount Sinai Hospital Center v. Quebec (Minister of Health and Social Services), 2001 SCC 41, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 281, at para. 22; Ocean Port Hotel Ltd. v. British Columbia (General Manager, Liquor Control and Licensing Branch), 2001 SCC 52, [2001] 2 S.C.R. 781, at paras. 18-22; Baker, at paras. 20-28; Knight v. Indian Head School Division No. 19, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 653, at p. 669; Martineau v. Matsqui Institution Disciplinary Board, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 602; Kane v. Board of Governors (University of British Columbia), [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1105; Attorney General of Canada v. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 735; Nicholson v. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 311).

[165] Premièrement, l'obligation d'équité procédurale existe indépendamment des régimes administratifs dont la portée et l'application sont circonscrites par la loi. Il s'agit d'un « principe général de common law » qui a été graduellement élaboré dans la jurisprudence au fil de plusieurs décennies (Cardinal c. Directeur de l'établissement Kent, [1985] 2 R.C.S. 643, p. 653; voir aussi Khela, par. 82; Canada (Procureur général) c. Mavi, 2011 CSC 30, [2011] 2 R.C.S. 504, par. 38; Dunsmuir, par. 87; Centre hospitalier Mont-Sinaï c. Québec (Ministre de la Santé et des Services sociaux), 2001 CSC 41, [2001] 2 R.C.S. 281, par. 22; Ocean Port Hotel Ltd. c. Colombie-Britannique (General Manager, Liquor Control and Licensing Branch), 2001 CSC 52, [2001] 2 R.C.S. 781, par. 18-22; Baker, par. 20-28; Knight c. Indian Head School Division No. 19, [1990] 1 R.C.S. 653, p. 669; Martineau c. Comité de discipline de l'Institution de Matsqui, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 602; Kane c. Conseil d'administration (Université de la Colombie-Britannique), [1980] 1 R.C.S. 1105; Procureur général du Canada c. Inuit Tapirisat of Canada, [1980] 2 R.C.S. 735; Nicholson c. Haldimand-Norfolk Regional Board of Commissioners of Police, [1979] 1 R.C.S. 311).

[166] The legislature's delegation of authority to make decisions within a given administrative regime has little to do with the question of whether the process conforms to fairness requirements at common law, or whether such requirements have been ousted expressly or by necessary implication by the enabling statute (see Baker, at paras. 21-28; Ocean Port, at para. 22).

[166] La délégation par le législateur d'un pouvoir décisionnel dans le cadre d'un régime administratif donné a peu à voir avec la question de savoir si le processus respecte les exigences d'équité en common law, ou encore si ces exigences ont été écartées expressément ou par déduction nécessaire par la loi habilitante (voir Baker, par. 21-28; Ocean

Using Baker as a concrete example, I reject the proposition that an immigration officer empowered by the Immigration Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. I-2, to make administrative decisions was entitled to deference from a court applying the common law test for impartiality. In that case, L'Heureux-Dubé J. rightly circumscribed the scope of deference to the "substantive aspects" of the decision (paras. 55 and 62).

Port, par. 22). Prenant l'arrêt Baker comme exemple concret, je rejette la proposition selon laquelle un agent d'immigration habilité par la Loi sur l'immigration, L.R.C. 1985, c. I-2, à prendre des décisions administratives avait droit à la déférence d'une cour de révision appliquant le test de common law relatif à l'impartialité. Dans cette affaire, c'est à bon droit que la juge L'Heureux-Dubé a circonscrit la portée de la déférence aux « éléments de fond » de la décision (par. 55 et 62).

[167] In my view, deference to substantive decisions presupposes that the administrative process is fair and thus subject to review by courts on a correctness standard. The proposition that procedural fairness underlies reasonableness review is ingrained in the Vavilov framework itself. This Court emphasized in Vavilov that "the focus of reasonableness review must be on the decision actually made by the decision maker, including both the decision maker's reasoning process and the outcome" (para. 83). Consequently, courts cannot accord deference to an administrative decision maker who fails to give reasons in circumstances where doing so is required at common law. The same reasoning applies to other types of procedural unfairness as well.

[168] Second, the application of common law principles falls squarely within the expertise of the judiciary. For example, this Court stressed in Toronto v. C.U.P.E. that abuse of process in the context of relitigation "is clearly outside the sphere of expertise of a labour arbitrator who may be called to have recourse to [it]" (para. 15; see also C.U.P.E. v. Ontario, at para. 100: "It is for the courts, not the Minister, to provide the legal answer to procedural fairness questions."). Likewise, this Court's reasoning in Dunsmuir indicates that courts must have the last word on the application of the duty of fairness, at para. 84:

We can see nothing problematic with a grievance adjudicator considering a public law duty of fairness issue where

Rien ne s'oppose à ce que l'arbitre saisi d'un grief examine une question touchant à l'obligation d'équité en droit public such a duty exists. It falls squarely within the adjudicator's task to resolve a grievance. However, as will be explained below, the proper approach is to first identify the nature of the employment relationship and the applicable law. Where, as here, the relationship is contractual, a public law duty of fairness is not engaged and therefore should play no role in resolving the grievance.

lorsqu'une telle obligation existe. Cela ressortit clairement à son mandat de régler le grief. Toutefois, comme nous le verrons plus loin, il convient d'abord de définir la nature du lien d'emploi et le droit applicable. Lorsque, comme en l'espèce, le lien est contractuel, l'obligation d'équité en droit public ne saurait jouer dans le règlement du grief.

[169] The standard of correctness must remain the starting point of the analysis in the context of procedural fairness review. The majority's reliance on the existence of an appeal mechanism as the determinative factor undermines Khela, as it overlooks this starting point. Admittedly, the majority's approach usually leads to the same result where the enabling statute establishes an appeal mechanism. Since procedural fairness is a legal standard, the assessment of whether an administrative decision maker complied with this duty is a question of law subject to correctness review on appeal (R. v. Shepherd, 2009 SCC 35, [2009] 2 S.C.R. 527, at para. 20; R. v. Dussault, 2022 SCC 16, [2022] 1 S.C.R. 306, at para. 26; R. v. Le, 2019 SCC 34, [2019] 2 S.C.R. 692, at para. 23; R. v. Katigbak, 2011 SCC 48, [2011] 3 S.C.R. 326, at para. 68).

[170] Nevertheless, the present case illustrates that appellate standards of review significantly diverge from Khela when it comes to remedial issues. I explained above that the choice of remedy for abuse of process is discretionary. It is well established in this Court's jurisprudence that "an appellate court will be justified in intervening in a trial judge's exercise of his discretion only if the trial judge misdirects himself or if his decision is so clearly wrong as to amount to an injustice", and that "where a trial judge exercises her or his discretion, that decision cannot be replaced simply because the appellate court has a different assessment of the facts" (Regan, at para. 117, quoting Tobiass, at para. 87; see also Bjelland, at para. 15; Bellusci, at paras. 17-18; Babos, at para. 48). This deferential approach is a far cry from the one adopted in this Court's precedents on the duty of fairness at common law.

[170] Cela dit, le présent pourvoi illustre que les normes de contrôle applicables en appel s'écartent considérablement de l'arrêt Khela en ce qui concerne les questions de réparation. J'ai expliqué précédemment que le choix de la réparation pour abus de procédure relève de la discrétion du décideur de première instance. Il est bien établi dans la jurisprudence de notre Cour qu'« une cour d'appel ne sera justifiée d'intervenir dans l'exercice du pouvoir discrétionnaire d'un juge de première instance que si celui-ci s'est fondé sur des considérations erronées en droit ou si sa décision est erronée au point de créer une injustice », et que « lorsqu'un juge du procès exerce son pouvoir discrétionnaire, la cour d'appel ne peut y substituer sa propre décision uniquement parce qu'elle arrive à une appréciation différente des faits » (Regan, par. 117, citant Tobiass, par. 87; voir aussi Bjelland, par. 15; Bellusci, par. 17-18; Babos, par. 48). Cette approche empreinte de déférence diffère considérablement de celle adoptée dans les précédents de notre Cour portant sur l'obligation d'équité en common law.

B. Standard of Review Applicable to Questions of Procedural Fairness

[171] I acknowledge the need to clarify the framework for determining the standard of review applicable to questions of procedural fairness. Multiple judges and authors have underscored the untenable uncertainty plaguing the jurisprudence on procedural fairness review (see, e.g., Bergeron v. Canada (Attorney General), 2015 FCA 160, 474 N.R. 366, at paras. 67-71, per Stratas J.A. (describing the state of the law as a "jurisprudential muddle"); D. McKee, "The Standard of Review for Questions of Procedural Fairness" (2016), 41 Queen's L.J. 355). While clarifications are warranted, I believe this Court should draw on its existing jurisprudence to articulate a principled approach.

[172] The governing authority on procedural fairness review, as mentioned above, is Khela. In that case, LeBel J. confirmed that the question of whether an administrative body has complied with its duty of procedural fairness is, in principle, subject to correctness review (para. 79). Nevertheless, legislatures may — within constitutional bounds — oust the common law and specify the applicable standard of review by statute (Khosa, at para. 18; R. v. Owen, 2003 SCC 33, [2003] 1 S.C.R. 779, at paras. 31-33; Vavilov, at paras. 34-35; Dunsmuir, at paras. 30-31; see, e.g., Administrative Tribunals Act, S.B.C. 2004, c. 45, s. 58(2)(b)).

[173] I now turn to the passages in this Court's jurisprudence that, according to some judges and authors, have muddled the analysis of the standard of review applicable to questions of procedural fairness. The first source of uncertainty flows from the remark in Khela that the decision maker was "entitled to a margin of deference" and to "[s]ome deference" on specific points, at para. 89:

> Section 27(3) [of the Corrections and Conditional Release Act] authorizes the withholding of information when the Commissioner has "reasonable grounds to believe" that should the information be released, it might threaten [171] Je reconnais le besoin de clarifier le cadre d'analyse guidant le choix de la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions d'équité procédurale. Bon nombre de juges et d'auteurs ont souligné l'incertitude intenable qui accable la jurisprudence portant sur le contrôle de l'équité procédurale (voir, p. ex., Bergeron c. Canada (Procureur général), 2015 CAF 160, par. 67-71 (CanLII), motifs du juge Stratas (décrivant l'état du droit comme une « jurisprudence confuse »); D. McKee, « The Standard of Review for Questions of Procedural Fairness » (2016), 41 Queen's L.J. 355). Bien que des clarifications s'imposent, je crois que notre Cour doit s'inspirer de sa jurisprudence pour définir une approche fondée sur des principes.

[173] Je me penche maintenant sur les passages de la jurisprudence de notre Cour qui, selon certains juges et auteurs, ont semé la confusion dans l'analyse de la norme de contrôle applicable aux questions d'équité procédurale. La première source d'incertitude découle des remarques dans l'arrêt Khela selon lesquelles il fallait « dans une certaine mesure, faire preuve de déférence » et « faire preuve d'une certaine déférence » envers le décideur sur certains points en particulier, au par. 89 :

> Aux termes du par. 27(3) [de la Loi sur le système correctionnel et la mise en liberté sous condition], le commissaire peut refuser la communication de renseignements s'il a des « motifs raisonnables de croire » que la

the security of the prison, the safety of any person or the conduct of an investigation. The Commissioner, or his or her representative, is in the best position to determine whether such a risk could in fact materialize. As a result, the Commissioner, or the warden, is entitled to a margin of deference on this point. Similarly, the warden and the Commissioner are in the best position to determine whether a given source or informant is reliable. Some deference is accordingly owed on this point as well. If, however, certain information is withheld without invoking s. 27(3), deference will not be warranted, and the decision will be procedurally unfair and therefore unlawful. [Emphasis added.]

communication de ces renseignements pourrait mettre en danger la sécurité du pénitencier, la sécurité d'une personne, ou pourrait compromettre la tenue d'une enquête. Le commissaire, ou son représentant, est le mieux en mesure de décider si ce risque pourrait effectivement se concrétiser. Par conséquent, il faut, dans une certaine mesure, faire preuve de déférence sur ce point envers le commissaire ou le directeur. De même, ces derniers sont mieux en mesure de déterminer la fiabilité de certaines sources ou de certains informateurs. Par conséquent, il faut, sur ce point également, faire preuve d'une certaine déférence. Toutefois, si le par. 27(3) n'est pas invoqué et que certains renseignements ne sont pas communiqués, la déférence ne sera pas justifiée et la décision sera inéquitable sur le plan procédural et, par conséquent, illégale. [Je souligne.]

[174] Ce passage illustre deux enseignements importants de l'arrêt Khela. Premièrement, la teneur de l'obligation d'équité peut être déterminée par un texte de loi, sous réserve du respect de la Constitution. La disposition en cause dans l'arrêt Khela, soit le par. 27(3) de la Loi sur le système correctionnel et la mise en liberté sous condition, L.C. 1992, c. 20, déroge au droit général à l'information en common law dans le contexte de décisions sur des questions comme les transfèrements de détenus, mais la Cour a reconnu que cette disposition n'éliminait pas le droit constitutionnel à l'habeas corpus. Deuxièmement, les conclusions de fait sous-tendant la décision administrative commandent la déférence. En effet, la Cour a fait preuve de déférence à l'égard des évaluations éminemment contextuelles du risque et de la fiabilité dont dépendent les décisions prises en application du par. 27(3).

[175] Although the Court emphasized in Khela that compliance with the duty of fairness is a question of law, it reaffirmed the longstanding principle that courts cannot establish fairness requirements in a vacuum: ". . . the concept of procedural fairness is eminently variable and its content is to be decided in the specific context of each case" (Knight, at p. 682; Baker, at para. 21; Moreau-Bérubé v. New Brunswick (Judicial Council), 2002 SCC 11, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 249, at paras. 74-75; Council of Canadians with Disabilities v. VIA Rail Canada Inc., 2007 SCC 15, [2007] 1 S.C.R. 650, at para. 231; Dunsmuir, at para. 79). Accordingly, where the administrative decision maker has made factual determinations with respect to the underlying context, such findings are entitled to deference. Institutional constraints on the administrative decision maker are also important contextual factors (see Baker, at para. 27).

de fait à l'égard du contexte sous-jacent, ces conclusions commandent la déférence. Les contraintes institutionnelles auxquelles est soumis le décideur administratif sont elles aussi des facteurs contextuels importants (voir Baker, par. 27).

[176] The second source of uncertainty flows from this Court's statement in VIA Rail Canada Inc., that "[c]onsiderable deference is owed to procedural rulings made by a tribunal with the authority to control its own process" (para. 231; see also Baker, at para. 27). In my view, this assertion may be reconciled with more recent jurisprudence and remains good law.

[176] La deuxième source d'incertitude découle de l'affirmation de notre Cour dans l'arrêt VIA Rail Canada Inc. selon laquelle « [i]l faut faire montre d'une grande déférence à l'égard des décisions procédurales d'un tribunal qui a le pouvoir de contrôler sa propre procédure » (par. 231; voir aussi Baker, par. 27). Selon moi, cette affirmation peut être conciliée avec la jurisprudence plus récente et demeure valable.

[177] Indeed, Khela mandates only that the question of compliance with the duty of procedural fairness be subject to the correctness standard; all procedural rulings falling within the bounds of fairness are entitled to deference. For example, while an opportunity for a party to make submissions may be required at common law in a given context, the administrative decision maker might opt for a hearing, written submissions, or both. Where all three options satisfy the duty of fairness, the reviewing court should not substitute its view for that of the administrative decision maker concerning the most appropriate procedure.

[177] En effet, l'arrêt Khela exige simplement que la question de la conformité à l'obligation d'équité procédurale soit soumise à la norme de la décision correcte; toutes les décisions d'ordre procédural qui se situent dans les limites de l'équité commandent la déférence. Par exemple, lorsque la common law exige qu'une partie ait l'occasion de présenter des observations dans un certain contexte, le décideur administratif peut choisir de tenir une audience, de recevoir des observations par écrit ou les deux. Lorsque les trois possibilités respectent l'obligation d'équité, la cour de révision doit s'abstenir de substituer son opinion à celle du décideur administratif concernant la procédure la plus appropriée.

[178] As this Court stated in Moreau-Bérubé, "[e]valuating whether procedural fairness, or the duty of fairness, has been adhered to by a tribunal requires an assessment of the procedures and safeguards required in a particular situation" (para. 74). J. M. Evans, writing extrajudicially, has rightly emphasized that "the duty of fairness connotes a legally imposed minimum, not optimal, standard of procedural propriety" ("Fair's Fair: Judging Administrative Procedures" (2015), 28 C.J.A.L.P. 111, at p. 121 (emphasis deleted)). Consequently, the reviewing court's role is not to dictate the "correct" or most "fair" procedure in the circumstances, but rather to ensure that minimum fairness requirements are met.

[178] Comme notre Cour l'a affirmé dans l'arrêt Moreau-Bérubé, « [p]our vérifier si un tribunal administratif a respecté l'équité procédurale ou l'obligation d'équité, il faut établir quelles sont les procédures et les garanties requises dans un cas particulier » (par. 74). Dans un article de doctrine, J. M. Evans a souligné à juste titre que [TRADUCTION] « l'obligation d'équité évoque une norme de légitimité procédurale juridiquement imposée minimale, plutôt qu'optimale » (« Fair's Fair : Judging Administrative Procedures » (2015), 28 R.C.D.A.P. 111, p. 121 (italique omis)). Par conséquent, le rôle de la cour de révision n'est pas de dicter la procédure « correcte » ou la plus « juste » dans les circonstances, mais de veiller à ce que les normes minimales d'équité soient respectées.

[179] This Court's jurisprudence on procedural fairness review may thus be synthesized as follows. The reviewing court must apply the correctness standard to questions of compliance with the duty of procedural fairness as defined by the common law or by statute. The requirements of fairness are context-dependent, and deference is owed to the administrative decision maker's underlying findings of fact. In reviewing procedural issues, the court's role is to determine whether the proceedings comport with minimum fairness requirements in a particular situation. Stated differently, the court must refrain from dictating what it considers to be the optimal procedure among the options that meet this standard.

[179] La jurisprudence de notre Cour sur le contrôle de l'équité procédurale peut donc être résumée comme suit. La cour de révision doit appliquer la norme de la décision correcte aux questions de respect de l'obligation d'équité procédurale définie par la common law ou par la loi. Les exigences de l'équité dépendent du contexte, et il faut faire preuve de déférence à l'égard des conclusions de fait sous-jacentes du décideur administratif. Dans son examen des questions procédurales, le tribunal a pour rôle de déterminer si les procédures respectent des exigences minimales d'équité dans une situation particulière. En d'autres termes, le tribunal doit s'abstenir de dicter ce qu'il considère être la procédure optimale parmi les possibilités qui satisfont à ce critère.

C. Standard of Review in the Context of Inordinate Administrative Delay

C. La norme de contrôle dans le contexte du délai administratif excessif

[180] Applying appellate standards of review, the majority asserts that for questions of procedural fairness and abuse of process in a statutory appeal "the applicable standard of review is correctness" because "[w]hether there has been an abuse of process is a question of law" (para. 30). I agree with this conclusion (albeit for different reasons), but I cannot subscribe to the majority's articulation of the standard of review in the context of inordinate administrative delay.

[181] According to the majority, the standard of palpable and overriding error applies to the two requirements of its test, namely inordinate delay and significant prejudice. The third step of the test, which requires the court to "conduct a final assessment as to whether abuse of process is established" (para. 101), is subject to the standard of correctness.

[181] Selon les juges majoritaires, la norme de l'erreur manifeste et dominante s'applique aux deux exigences de leur test, à savoir le délai excessif et le préjudice important. Le troisième volet de l'analyse, qui oblige le tribunal à « procéder à une évaluation finale afin de déterminer si l'abus de procédure a été établi » (par. 101), est assujetti au contrôle selon la norme de la décision correcte.

[182] I disagree with the position that courts owe deference to an administrative decision maker's conclusion on whether delay is inordinate. As discussed above, inordinate delay constitutes an abuse of process on its own; it is the legal standard against which an administrative body's conduct is measured.

[182] Je ne partage pas l'opinion selon laquelle les tribunaux doivent faire preuve de déférence à l'égard de la conclusion d'un décideur administratif sur le caractère excessif ou non du délai. Comme nous l'avons vu précédemment, le délai excessif constitue à lui seul un abus de procédure; il est la

I reiterate that the application of a legal standard to the facts is a question of law subject to correctness review (Shepherd, at para. 20; Dussault, at para. 26; Le, at para. 23; Katigbak, at para. 68).

norme juridique à l'aune de laquelle la conduite de l'organisme administratif est évaluée. Je le répète, l'application aux faits d'une norme juridique est une question de droit assujettie au contrôle selon la norme de la décision correcte (Shepherd, par. 20; Dussault, par. 26; Le, par. 23; Katigbak, par. 68).

[183] My conclusion is buttressed by the jurisprudence on the right to be tried within a reasonable time under s. 11(b) of the Charter. In R. v. Yusuf, 2021 SCC 2, [2021] 1 S.C.R. 5, at para. 2, this Court endorsed the Ontario Court of Appeal's formulation of the standard of review applicable to s. 11(b) rulings: "Deference is owed to a trial judge's underlying findings of fact. Characterizations of periods of delay and the ultimate decision concerning whether there has been unreasonable delay are reviewable on a standard of correctness" (R. v. Pauls, 2020 ONCA 220, 149 O.R. (3d) 609, at para. 40). Moreover, it is noteworthy that both Mr. Abrametz and the Law Society invoked R. v. Virk, 2021 BCCA 58, 403 C.C.C. (3d) 492, in which the British Columbia Court of Appeal similarly held that the standard of correctness applies to a trial judge's conclusion on the unreasonableness of delay (paras. 23-24).

[183] Ma conclusion est renforcée par la jurisprudence sur le droit d'être jugé dans un délai raisonnable que garantit l'al. 11b) de la Charte. Dans l'arrêt R. c. Yusuf, 2021 SCC 2, [2021] 1 R.C.S. 5, par. 2, notre Cour a fait sienne la formulation de la norme de contrôle applicable aux décisions fondées sur cette disposition mise de l'avant par la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario : [TRADUCTION] « Il faut faire preuve de déférence à l'égard des conclusions de fait sous-jacentes du juge de première instance. Les qualifications des délais et la décision finale quant à savoir s'il y a eu délai déraisonnable sont susceptibles de contrôle selon la norme de la décision correcte » (R. c. Pauls, 2020 ONCA 220, 149 O.R. (3d) 609, par. 40). De plus, il convient de souligner que tant Me Abrametz que le Barreau ont invoqué l'arrêt R. c. Virk, 2021 BCCA 58, 403 C.C.C. (3d) 492, dans lequel la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique a également statué que la norme de la décision correcte s'applique à la conclusion du juge de première instance sur le caractère déraisonnable du délai (par. 23-24).

[184] Although the remedies for them differ, unreasonable delay at common law and unreasonable delay under s. 11(b) are conceptually equivalent; they represent the same manifestation of an abuse of process. Given that unreasonable delay is a question of law in criminal proceedings, the same must be true in the context of administrative proceedings. As L'Heureux-Dubé J. concluded in O'Connor, "there is no real utility in maintaining two distinct analytic regimes" for abuse of process at common law and abusive conduct contrary to the Charter (para. 71). Here, and with respect, the majority's application of a deferential standard of review to the requirement of inordinate delay creates unwarranted incoherence in the law.

[184] Bien que les réparations diffèrent selon le cas à l'étude, le délai déraisonnable en common law et le délai déraisonnable en application de l'al. 11b) s'équivalent sur le plan théorique; ils représentent tous les deux la même manifestation d'un abus de procédure. Puisque le délai déraisonnable est une question de droit en matière criminelle, il doit en aller de même en matière administrative. Comme l'a conclu la juge L'Heureux-Dubé dans l'arrêt O'Connor, « il n'est plus réellement utile de maintenir deux régimes d'analyse distincts » pour l'abus de procédure en common law, d'une part, et la conduite abusive contrevenant à la Charte, d'autre part (par. 71). En l'espèce, avec égards, l'application par les juges majoritaires d'une norme de contrôle empreinte de déférence pour l'analyse de l'exigence du délai excessif crée une incohérence injustifiée dans le droit.

[185] Therefore, I would articulate the standard of review for assessing delay in administrative proceedings as follows. The reviewing court owes deference to the administrative decision maker's underlying findings of fact — notably on the length, causes, and effects of the delay. The characterization of periods of delay, the conclusion on whether the delay is inordinate, and the remedy for abuse of process are all subject to correctness review.

IV. Application

[186] In discussing the delay in this case, the majority acknowledges that "the actions of the Law Society were not above reproach" (para. 126). With respect, this is a major understatement.

[187] I conclude without hesitation that the magnitude of the undue delay in this case, which amounted to 32 ½ months in total, meets the "clearly unacceptable" threshold established in Blencoe (para. 115). This inordinate delay caused stress and related health issues to Mr. Abrametz, who was also subject to intrusive conditions for maintaining his legal practice. His employees were adversely affected as well by these unjustifiably long proceedings.

[188] In my view, the length of the unexplained delay and the extent of the prejudice it caused require a correspondingly serious remedy. I conclude that the Court of Appeal rightly ordered that the penalty imposed on Mr. Abrametz be set aside. His disbarment would not serve the public interest.

A. Inordinate Delay

[189] The Law Society initiated its audit investigation of Mr. Abrametz in December 2012. The Law Society's auditor, Mr. Allen, completed a trust report about 23 months later, in October 2014. Almost a full year elapsed before the Law Society issued a formal complaint against Mr. Abrametz in October 2015. The parties litigated certain procedural matters before the commencement of the hearing in May 2017. The penalty decision rendered by the Law Society's Hearing

IV. Application

[186] En discutant du délai en l'espèce, les juges majoritaires reconnaissent que « les actions du Barreau n'étaient pas irréprochables » (par. 126). Avec égards, il s'agit d'un euphémisme.

[187] Je conclus sans hésitation que la durée du délai injustifié en l'espèce, qui s'élève à 32 ½ mois au total, atteint le seuil du délai « manifestement inacceptable » fixé dans l'arrêt Blencoe (par. 115). Ce délai excessif a causé du stress et des problèmes de santé connexes à Me Abrametz, dont la pratique du droit a par ailleurs fait l'objet de conditions intrusives. Ses employés ont souffert eux aussi de ces procédures d'une durée injustifiable.

[188] À mon avis, la durée du délai inexpliqué et l'ampleur du préjudice qu'il a causé doivent donner lieu à une réparation d'un sérieux correspondant. Je conclus que la Cour d'appel a ordonné à bon droit l'annulation de la sanction infligée à Me Abrametz. Sa radiation du tableau de l'ordre ne servirait pas l'intérêt public.

A. Le délai excessif

[189] Le Barreau a entrepris son enquête de vérification de Me Abrametz en décembre 2012. Le vérificateur du Barreau, M. Allen, a produit un rapport sur les comptes en fiducie environ 23 mois plus tard, en octobre 2014. Presque une année complète s'est écoulée avant que le Barreau dépose une plainte officielle contre Me Abrametz, en octobre 2015. Les parties ont plaidé certaines questions de procédure avant le début de l'audience en mai 2017. La décision

2022 SCC 29 (CanLII)

Committee in January 2019 brought the disciplinary proceedings to an end. By then, the proceedings had been going on for approximately 73 months — or just over 6 years since the beginning of the investigation.

[190] In my view, the delay was plainly inordinate in the circumstances, and I say this regardless of the standard of review. The Law Society failed to provide justifications for several lengthy gaps, particularly at the investigatory stage, where most of the undue delay occurred. Cumulatively, the periods of unexplained delay are "clearly unacceptable" and thus inordinate within the meaning of Blencoe.

[191] In its brief analysis of delay, the Hearing Committee made only findings of a general nature: the investigation was complex and extensive; Mr. Abrametz cooperated with Mr. Allen initially but ceased to do so in May 2015; and around 14 months of delay were attributable to the unavailability of Mr. Abrametz's counsel. The Hearing Committee did not determine the inherent time requirements of any step in the proceedings, nor did it address the substantial gaps in the investigation in particular.

[192] Given the blatantly excessive delay in this case, it was incumbent on the Hearing Committee to carefully assess the justifications for the time taken at each key step of the investigation. It merely referred to the affidavit of Mr. Huber, counsel for the Law Society. But neither this affidavit nor the rest of the record discloses any reasonable justifications for the gaps in the proceedings.

[193] I disagree with the majority's assertion that "[t]he Court of Appeal departed from its proper role" in assessing whether the delay was inordinate (para. 114). In the absence of a thorough analysis by the Hearing Committee, the Court of Appeal rightfully made an independent assessment of the periods of delay at every key step of the proceedings. While the Hearing Committee's findings of fact are entitled to deference, I reiterate that the characterization of periods of delay and the overall conclusion on whether relative à la sanction rendue par le Comité d'audition du Barreau en janvier 2019 a mis un terme aux procédures disciplinaires. À cette date, les procédures étaient en cours depuis environ 73 mois — soit un peu plus de 6 ans depuis le début de l'enquête.

[192] Comme le délai était manifestement excessif en l'espèce, il incombait au Comité d'audition d'évaluer soigneusement les justifications données en ce qui concerne le délai écoulé à chacune des étapes clés de l'enquête. Il s'est contenté de mentionner l'affidavit de Me Huber, l'avocat du Barreau. Or, ni cet affidavit ni le reste du dossier ne justifie convenablement les délais dans les procédures.

[193] Je suis en désaccord avec l'affirmation des juges majoritaires selon laquelle « la Cour d'appel s'est écartée du rôle qui est le sien » en se demandant si le délai était excessif (par. 114). Faute d'une analyse exhaustive par le Comité d'audition, c'est à bon droit que la Cour d'appel a fait une évaluation indépendante des délais à chacune des étapes clés des procédures. Bien que les conclusions de fait du Comité d'audition commandent la déférence, je répète que la qualification des délais et la conclusion globale sur la question de the delay was inordinate are subject to the standard of correctness.

[194] After carefully reviewing the record, I substantially agree with the Court of Appeal's meticulous analysis, and I accept its conclusion that 32 ½ months of delay in the proceedings were unjustified. This case is not a close call. I agree with the Court of Appeal that "[t]his delay did not marginally overshoot what might have been considered appropriate. . . . [I]t so grossly exceeded the inherent requirements of this case as to be 'clearly unacceptable' within the meaning of Blencoe" (para. 197 (CanLII)).

[195] Given the Court of Appeal's thorough analysis, it is unnecessary to review each step of the proceedings in detail. I nonetheless address below the relevance of the Hearing Committee's findings on the complexity of the investigation and on Mr. Abrametz's lack of cooperation.

(1) Complexity of the Investigation

[196] The complexity of the investigation cannot account for the Law Society's inactivity between the beginning of the audit investigation and the issuance of the formal complaint, the period during which most of the unexplained delay occurred.

[197] The proceedings started on the right track. In February 2013, only two months into the investigation, the Law Society's Conduct Investigation Committee ("CIC") issued a notice of intention to interim suspend Mr. Abrametz based on the information he had self-reported. This notice referred to all the charges of which Mr. Abrametz was eventually found guilty, almost six years later. Moreover, as early as March 2013, Mr. Allen completed a draft trust report that, according to the Court of Appeal, already contained most of the content and attachments that were used in the final trust report (para. 188). The same month, after negotiating with the CIC, Mr. Abrametz signed an undertaking allowing him to maintain his legal practice under stringent conditions.

[195] Étant donné l'analyse approfondie faite par la Cour d'appel, il est inutile d'examiner chaque étape des procédures en détail. Je vais néanmoins me pencher, ci-après, sur la pertinence des conclusions du Comité d'audition quant à la complexité de l'enquête et au manque de collaboration de Me Abrametz.

(1) La complexité de l'enquête

[197] Les procédures ont débuté sur la bonne voie. En février 2013, seulement deux mois après le début de l'enquête, le Conduct Investigation Committee (« CIC ») du Barreau a publié un avis d'intention de suspendre provisoirement Me Abrametz sur la foi des renseignements que celui-ci avait lui-même fournis. Cet avis faisait état de toutes les accusations dont Me Abrametz sera déclaré coupable presque six ans plus tard. Qui plus est, dès mars 2013, M. Allen a produit un projet de rapport sur les comptes en fiducie qui, selon la Cour d'appel, renfermait déjà l'essentiel du contenu et des annexes qui ont été utilisés dans le rapport définitif sur les comptes en fiducie (par. 188). Le même mois, après avoir négocié avec le CIC, Me Abrametz a signé un engagement lui permettant de continuer à pratiquer le droit à des conditions strictes.

[198] The final trust report, however, was completed by Mr. Allen no less than a year and a half later, in October 2014. The record contains scant evidence of any work done by Mr. Allen during that 19-month period, as the Court of Appeal pointed out: there are no "particulars of when Mr. Allen spent . . . time" reviewing client files and other documents, nor is there any "evidence of what he did in 2014, other than the bare fact that he completed his final trust report on October 30, 2014" (para. 19). Given the deficient explanations offered by the Law Society, the Court of Appeal did not err in finding 15 months of unexplained delay between the draft and the final trust report.

[198] Cependant, le rapport définitif sur les comptes en fiducie a été produit par M. Allen pas moins d'un an et demi plus tard, en octobre 2014. Comme l'a signalé la Cour d'appel, le dossier ne renferme qu'une preuve ténue du travail qu'aurait effectué M. Allen au cours de cette période de 19 mois : il n'y a pas de [TRADUCTION] « détails indiquant quand M. Allen a consacré [. . .] du temps » à l'examen des dossiers des clients et d'autres documents, et il n'y a pas non plus de « preuve de ce qu'il a fait en 2014, autre que le simple fait qu'il a produit son rapport sur les comptes en fiducie définitif le 30 octobre 2014 » (par. 19). Considérant les explications déficientes données par le Barreau, la Cour d'appel n'a commis aucune erreur en concluant à l'existence d'un délai inexpliqué de 15 mois entre le projet de rapport et le rapport définitif sur les comptes en fiducie.

[199] Similarly, after the completion of the trust report, the Law Society inexplicably took an additional 12 months to issue the formal complaint against Mr. Abrametz in October 2015. The formal complaint, I observe, merely reiterated the charges specified in a report prepared by the CIC — the draft of which was reasonably complete by March 2015, or 4 ½ months after the trust report. Yet from that point, the Law Society took over 7 months to issue the formal complaint, a four-page document that substantially reproduced the content of its draft report. Mr. Huber's time records, unsurprisingly, reveal that he worked only a few hours per month on this file during that period. In this context, the Court of Appeal's conclusion that there were 6 months of undue delay between the trust report and the formal complaint seems inevitable.

[199] De même, après l'achèvement du rapport sur les comptes en fiducie, le Barreau a inexplicablement eu besoin de 12 mois additionnels pour déposer la plainte officielle contre Me Abrametz, en octobre 2015. Je constate que la plainte officielle ne faisait que répéter les accusations énoncées dans un rapport rédigé par le CIC — dont le projet avait été raisonnablement complété en mars 2015, soit 4 ½ mois après le rapport sur les comptes en fiducie. Pourtant, à compter de ce moment, le Barreau a mis plus de 7 mois avant de déposer la plainte officielle, un document de 4 pages qui reproduisait pour l'essentiel le contenu de son projet de rapport. Sans surprise, les rapports d'emploi du temps de Me Huber révèlent qu'il n'avait travaillé que quelques heures par mois sur ce dossier pendant cette période. Dans ce contexte, la conclusion de la Cour d'appel qu'il y a eu 6 mois de délai injustifié entre le rapport sur les comptes en fiducie et la plainte officielle va de soi.

[200] To recap, by the time the Law Society issued the formal complaint, the investigation had already been plagued by 21 months of undue delay. It is not worthwhile to examine the other steps of the proceedings in detail. Much of the subsequent undue delay may be attributed to the lack of direction in the investigation and, in particular, the undue focus on Mr. Abrametz's alleged tax evasion.

[201] As early as October 2013, Mr. Allen became aware of the tax issue, but his progress was stalled by Mr. Abrametz's refusal to disclose his financial records the following month. As the Court of Appeal explained, "a decision was made to focus on the tax issue — which the [Law Society] had allowed to languish since . . . October 2013 — rather than expeditiously moving the other charges forward at the same time" (para. 190). The Law Society inexplicably waited until September 2015 to bring an application under s. 63 of The Legal Profession Act, 1990, S.S. 1990-91, c. L-10.1, to obtain the financial records sought by Mr. Allen two years earlier.

[202] Simply put, the time and resources dedicated to the tax issue — which was far more complex than the charges for conduct unbecoming a lawyer — derailed the proceedings. This emphasis was misplaced because the charges laid out in the formal complaint sufficed to have Mr. Abrametz disbarred. Had the Law Society focused on swiftly bringing these charges from the outset, the investigation and prosecution could have proceeded within a reasonable timeframe. The harm had already been done by the time the Law Society communicated its decision to bifurcate the proceedings in July 2015.

(2) Cooperation

[203] The Hearing Committee noted that "[w]hile the Member initially cooperated with the investigation, that cooperation ceased in May of 2015" (2018 SKLSS 8, at para. 357 (CanLII)). This finding relates to Mr. Abrametz's resistance to disclosing his tax records — which was evident as early as October 2013, when he refused to respond to Mr. Allen's tax-related questions. In all other matters, Mr. Abrametz was cooperative. I further note that the bulk of the unexplained delay occurred prior to May 2015.

[204] In any event, this finding rests on a mistaken interpretation of The Legal Profession Act, 1990. The Law Society was required by law to make an application under s. 63 to obtain the financial records

(2) La collaboration

[203] Le Comité d'audition a constaté que [TRADUCTION] « [b]ien que le membre ait d'abord collaboré à l'enquête, cette collaboration a cessé en mai 2015 » (2018 SKLSS 8, par. 357 (CanLII)). Cette conclusion a trait à la réticence de Me Abrametz de communiquer ses documents fiscaux — réticence qui était évidente dès octobre 2013, lorsqu'il a refusé de répondre aux questions de M. Allen en matière fiscale. Relativement à toutes les autres questions, Me Abrametz était coopératif. Je souligne par ailleurs que la plus grande part du délai inexpliqué s'est déroulée avant mai 2015.

[204] Quoi qu'il en soit, cette conclusion repose sur une interprétation erronée de la Legal Profession Act, 1990. Le Barreau était tenu par la loi de présenter une demande fondée sur l'art. 63 pour obtenir les that Mr. Abrametz refused to disclose. Characterizing Mr. Abrametz as "uncooperative" for reasonably opposing the disclosure of his personal financial records would effectively nullify this procedural protection.

[205] It is noteworthy that the Law Society attempted to obtain the same financial records by issuing subpoenas to Mr. Abrametz and his accountants under s. 39 of The Legal Profession Act, 1990. The Court of Queen's Bench quashed these subpoenas as an abuse of process, holding that the Law Society was improperly seeking to discover documents by circumventing the s. 63 process and related hearing. The need for judicial oversight implies that Mr. Abrametz justifiably opposed the production of his financial records. Given the ambiguity that surrounded the scope of the Law Society's investigatory powers prior to adjudication, it was an error to conclude that Mr. Abrametz was uncooperative.

[206] Not only did the Law Society commit an abuse of process by improperly issuing subpoenas, but it also made a frivolous submission in defending its decision to do so. The Law Society argued that Mr. Abrametz did not have standing to challenge the subpoenas served on his accountants for the production of his personal financial records. Needless to say, conduct of this nature is not conducive to the efficient and timely progression of disciplinary proceedings.

B. Prejudice

[207] The Hearing Committee found that the prejudice in this case did not meet the threshold for obtaining a stay of proceedings. I would not interfere with this finding, although I note that the prejudice was far from negligible. Regarding causation, however, the Hearing Committee erred in asserting that there was no causal connection between the unexplained delay and the prejudice.

documents financiers que Me Abrametz refusait de communiquer. Qualifier Me Abrametz de [TRADUCTION] « peu coopératif » pour son opposition valable à la communication de ses documents financiers personnels aurait pour effet de supprimer cette protection procédurale.

[205] Il convient de noter que le Barreau avait tenté d'obtenir les mêmes documents financiers en délivrant des assignations à Me Abrametz et à ses comptables aux termes de l'art. 39 de la Legal Profession Act, 1990. La Cour du Banc de la Reine a annulé ces assignations pour cause d'abus de procédure. Elle a statué que le Barreau tentait indûment d'obtenir la communication de documents en contournant le processus prévu à l'art. 63 et l'audience connexe. Or, la nécessité de recourir à ce processus judiciaire implique que l'opposition de Me Abrametz à la production de ses documents financiers était justifiée. Considérant l'ambiguïté qui entourait la portée des pouvoirs d'enquête du Barreau, il était erroné de conclure que Me Abrametz avait été peu coopératif.

[206] Non seulement le Barreau a-t-il commis un abus de procédure en délivrant indûment des assignations, mais il a aussi formulé un argument frivole en défendant sa décision d'agir de la sorte. En effet, le Barreau a fait valoir que Me Abrametz n'avait pas la qualité voulue pour agir afin de contester les assignations signifiées à ses comptables en vue de la production de ses documents financiers personnels. Il va sans dire qu'une conduite de cette nature ne favorise pas la progression efficace et rapide de procédures disciplinaires.

B. Le préjudice

[207] Le Comité d'audition a conclu que le préjudice en l'espèce n'atteignait pas le seuil requis pour justifier un arrêt des procédures. Je ne modifierais pas cette conclusion, même si je constate que le préjudice fut loin d'être négligeable. Toutefois, le Comité d'audition a eu tort d'affirmer qu'il n'y avait aucun lien de causalité entre le délai inexpliqué et le préjudice.

(1) Nature and Magnitude

[208] The most detrimental effect of the delay was the stress suffered by Mr. Abrametz and his employees. Mr. Abrametz was monitored for high blood pressure resulting from this stress. Importantly, the Hearing Committee considered this prejudice only in analyzing Mr. Abrametz's claim under s. 7 of the Charter. I note that the requirements in the s. 7 context are demonstrably higher than the "significant prejudice" threshold for obtaining a stay of proceedings. Indeed, the majority in Blencoe stressed that "anxiety, stress and stigma" do not engage the liberty and security interests protected by s. 7 (para. 97). Nonetheless, it also recognized that "significant psychological harm to a person, or . . . stigma to a person's reputation" caused by inordinate delay may warrant a stay of proceedings (para. 115).

[209] Therefore, it is important to bear in mind that the Hearing Committee's characterization of the prejudice in this case reflected an onerous Charter standard that Mr. Abrametz did not have to satisfy under the Blencoe framework. The Hearing Committee's findings that Mr. Abrametz suffered "some degree of stress" and that he had a related "minor medical condition" (paras. 335 and 337) were understandable in discussing s. 7 of the Charter. But such detrimental effects must be taken seriously in assessing the magnitude of the prejudice pursuant to administrative law principles. Moreover, the Hearing Committee acknowledged that Mr. Abrametz's employees experienced stress throughout the proceedings (para. 338; A.R., vol. I, at p. 352).

[210] Read contextually, the Hearing Committee's assessment of the prejudice does not preclude the conclusion that the detrimental effects suffered by Mr. Abrametz and his employees were serious, even if they were not so significant as to justify a stay of proceedings. In my view, this is the only reasonable interpretation of the circumstances: a sword of Damocles hung over Mr. Abrametz's professional

(1) La nature et l'ampleur du préjudice

[208] L'effet le plus néfaste du délai a été le stress subi par Me Abrametz et ses employés. Maître Abrametz a été surveillé pour l'hypertension artérielle résultant de ce stress. Fait important, le Comité d'audition n'a pris en compte ce préjudice que dans son analyse de la demande de Me Abrametz fondée sur l'art. 7 de la Charte. Je souligne qu'il est sensiblement plus difficile de satisfaire aux exigences applicables dans le contexte de l'art. 7 que d'atteindre le seuil du « préjudice important » pour obtenir un arrêt des procédures. En effet, dans l'arrêt Blencoe, les juges majoritaires ont souligné que « [l']angoisse, [le] stress [et la] stigmatisation » ne font pas entrer en jeu les droits à la liberté et à la sécurité protégés par l'art. 7 (par. 97). Néanmoins, ils ont également reconnu qu'« un préjudice psychologique important à une personne ou [une atteinte à] sa réputation » causés par un délai excessif peuvent justifier un arrêt des procédures (par. 115).

[209] Par conséquent, il importe de garder à l'esprit que la qualification du préjudice par le Comité d'audition était le reflet d'un seuil onéreux dicté par la Charte, seuil que Me Abrametz n'avait pas à atteindre suivant le cadre d'analyse défini par l'arrêt Blencoe. Les conclusions du Comité d'audition selon lesquelles Me Abrametz avait subi [TRADUCTION] « un certain degré de stress » et qu'il avait un « problème [connexe] de santé mineur » (par. 335 et 337) étaient compréhensibles dans le cadre d'une analyse fondée sur l'art. 7 de la Charte. Des effets aussi néfastes doivent toutefois être pris au sérieux dans l'évaluation de l'ampleur du préjudice au regard des principes du droit administratif. Qui plus est, le Comité d'audition a reconnu que les employés de Me Abrametz avaient vécu du stress tout au long des procédures (par. 338; d.a., vol. I, p. 352).

career for several years — and unduly so for a period of 32 ½ months. This inordinate delay also affected his employees, who worked in precarious circumstances far longer than necessary.

la carrière professionnelle de Me Abrametz pendant plusieurs années, et ce, de façon injustifiée pendant 32 ½ mois. Ce délai excessif a en outre eu une incidence sur ses employés, qui ont travaillé dans des circonstances précaires beaucoup plus longtemps qu'il n'était nécessaire.

[211] The intrusive conditions imposed by the Law Society on Mr. Abrametz's legal practice constituted an additional form of prejudice, albeit a less serious one. The Hearing Committee erred in considering the fact that "the majority of the allegations lodged against the Member were determined by this Hearing Committee to be well founded" (para. 352). This remark worryingly suggests that the Hearing Committee's analysis of prejudice might have been tainted by its conclusions on Mr. Abrametz's guilt. To reiterate, professional bodies owe a duty of fairness to all persons subject to their proceedings — including those in breach of their professional obligations. Inordinate delay is abusive, irrespective of the outcome of the proceedings.

[211] Les conditions intrusives qu'a imposées le Barreau sur la pratique du droit de Me Abrametz constituaient une forme supplémentaire de préjudice, quoique moins sérieux. Le Comité d'audition a eu tort de prendre en compte le fait qu'il [TRADUCTION] « a conclu que la plupart des allégations portées contre le membre étaient bien fondées » (par. 352). Cette remarque laisse entendre de façon troublante que l'analyse du préjudice qu'a faite le Comité d'audition a pu être viciée par ses conclusions à propos de la culpabilité de Me Abrametz. Je le répète, les ordres professionnels ont une obligation d'agir équitablement envers toutes les personnes qui font l'objet de procédures disciplinaires — y compris celles qui ont manqué à leurs obligations professionnelles. Les délais excessifs sont abusifs, sans égard à l'issue des procédures.

[212] Unlike the Court of Appeal, I am not taking account of the reputational harm suffered by Mr. Abrametz. There is no reviewable error in the Hearing Committee's finding that this harm was caused by the hearing itself rather than by the delay. The Hearing Committee noted that "[t]he Member has not pointed to any publicity, adverse or otherwise, of the proceedings between 2013 and 2018. The publicity occurred over a short period of time early in 2018" (para. 350). With respect, the Court of Appeal erred in interfering with this finding.

(2) Causation

(2) La causalité

[213] I part ways with the Hearing Committee on the assessment of causation in respect of the stress experienced by Mr. Abrametz and his employees. In the Hearing Committee's view, there was no causal link between the delay and these detrimental effects. However, this conclusion flowed from the application of an erroneous legal standard of causation. The Hearing Committee stated that it had to be "satisfied that any delay in the investigation or hearing process is the contributing cause to the harm that the Member may have experienced due to the stress" (para. 336 (emphasis added)).

[213] Je diverge d'opinion avec le Comité d'audition en ce qui concerne l'analyse de la causalité à l'égard du stress vécu par Me Abrametz et ses employés. De l'avis du Comité d'audition, il n'y avait aucun lien de causalité entre le délai et ces effets néfastes. Cette conclusion découlait toutefois de l'application d'un critère juridique de causalité erroné. Le Comité d'audition a affirmé qu'il devait être [TRADUCTION]

[214] Although deference applies to findings on causation, it is wrong in law to suggest that prejudice must have a single contributing cause. Indeed, the Hearing Committee effectively applied a "but for" causation test. Yet this Court stated in Blencoe that causation is established where delay is "a contributing cause" (para. 68 (emphasis added)). In that case, Bastarache J. assumed, without deciding, that the delay had "exacerbated" the stigma suffered, although he expressed doubt about whether reputational damage could depend on the duration of the proceedings (para. 71). LeBel J., for his part, acknowledged that "delay was not the only cause" of the prejudice, but he concluded that the delay had "contributed significantly to its aggravation" (para. 177).

[215] Even if we adopt Bastarache J.'s approach to causation in Blencoe, the nature of the prejudice in this case is not akin to reputational damage. Reputation "is quickly ruined and difficult to re-establish" (Blencoe, at para. 71), whereas the effects of stress are continuous, and thus directly dependent on the duration of the proceedings. Common sense dictates that an unjustified delay of 32 ½ months in career-altering proceedings would, at minimum, be a contributing cause of the stress experienced by the affected person. The Hearing Committee's findings on the lack of causation thus cannot stand.

[216] I note, once more, that the outcome of disciplinary proceedings cannot inform the assessment of prejudice and causation. In this case, the proceedings were not the original cause of the prejudice. Nevertheless, the unexplained delay undoubtedly contributed to the detrimental effects suffered by Mr. Abrametz and his employees by unduly extending the proceedings by 32 ½ months.

« convaincu que tout délai touchant le processus d'enquête ou d'audition est la cause du préjudice que le membre a pu subir en raison du stress » (par. 336 (je souligne)).

[214] Bien que les conclusions en matière de causalité commandent la déférence, il est erroné en droit de prétendre que le préjudice doit être causé par un seul facteur. Or, le Comité d'audition a effectivement appliqué un test de la causalité fondée sur un « facteur déterminant ». Pourtant, dans l'arrêt Blencoe, notre Cour a affirmé que la causalité est établie lorsque le délai est « un "facteur qui a contribué" au préjudice » (par. 68 (je souligne)). Dans cette cause, le juge Bastarache a tenu pour acquis, sans en décider, que le délai avait « aggravé » la stigmatisation subie, bien qu'il ait dit douter que le tort causé à la réputation puisse dépendre de la durée des procédures (par. 71). Pour sa part, le juge LeBel a reconnu que « le délai [. . .] n'a pas été la seule cause » du préjudice, mais il a conclu qu'il « [avait] beaucoup contribué à son aggravation » (par. 177).

C. Remedy

[217] As a preliminary matter, I emphasize that the Court of Appeal did not grant a stay of proceedings, despite its characterization of the remedy it ordered:

> For these reasons, I would allow the appeal on the ground that the Hearing Committee erred by dismissing Mr. Abrametz's application to stay the proceedings as a result of undue delay constituting an abuse of process. The [Law Society] proceedings which were commenced by the Formal Complaint are stayed. In the result, the penalty and costs award imposed by the Penalty Decision are set aside. The findings of professional misconduct stand. [Emphasis added; para. 217.]

A stay of proceedings — the "ultimate remedy" (Tobiass, at para. 86) — annuls the disposition as well as the legal and factual bases on which it rests. By maintaining Mr. Abrametz's convictions, the Court of Appeal effectively quashed the penalty rather than staying the proceedings.

[218] Given the nature of the remedy at issue, I will not address the test articulated by this Court for determining whether proceedings should be stayed (see above, at para. 141). Instead, my analysis focuses on the justifications for setting aside Mr. Abrametz's penalty. I am of the view that the Court of Appeal ordered the correct remedy in the circumstances of this case.

[219] The guiding principle in selecting the remedy for an abuse of process is proportionality. Courts have multiple remedial options at their disposal, ranging from a declaration to a stay of proceedings. The remedy must be proportionate to the severity of the abusive conduct, having regard to the length of the unexplained delay and the nature and magnitude of the prejudice it caused. Considerations relating to the public interest complement this contextual analysis.

[220] In this case, the length of the inordinate delay militates in favour of a strong remedy. Simply put, the

C. La réparation

[217] À titre préliminaire, je souligne que la Cour d'appel n'a pas accordé un arrêt des procédures, malgré sa qualification de la réparation qu'elle a ordonnée :

> [TRADUCTION] Pour ces motifs, je suis d'avis d'accueillir l'appel, vu que le Comité d'audition a eu tort de rejeter la demande de Me Abrametz en arrêt des procédures fondée sur le délai injustifié qui a constitué un abus de procédure. Les procédures [du Barreau] qui ont été introduites par la plainte officielle sont suspendues. Par conséquent, la sanction et la condamnation aux dépens infligées par la décision relative à la sanction sont annulées. Les conclusions d'inconduite professionnelle sont maintenues. [Je souligne; par. 217.]

Un arrêt des procédures — l'« ultime réparation » (Tobiass, par. 86) — annule le dispositif ainsi que les fondements juridiques et factuels sur lesquels il repose. En maintenant les déclarations de culpabilité de Me Abrametz, la Cour d'appel a effectivement annulé la sanction, plutôt que prononcé l'arrêt des procédures.

[218] Vu la nature de la réparation en cause, je ne me pencherai pas sur le test formulé par notre Cour pour déterminer s'il y a lieu de prononcer un arrêt des procédures (voir le par. 141 des présents motifs). Mon analyse porte plutôt sur les justifications de l'annulation de la sanction infligée à Me Abrametz. Je suis d'avis que la Cour d'appel a ordonné la bonne réparation dans les circonstances de l'espèce.

[220] En l'espèce, la durée du délai excessif milite en faveur d'une réparation robuste. Pour dire les

Law Society demonstrably failed to comply with its duty of procedural fairness toward Mr. Abrametz. The periods of unexplained delay substantially exceeded the inherent time requirements of the case and are "clearly unacceptable" within the meaning of Blencoe. In my view, courts should not hesitate to condemn such procedural unfairness. Accordingly, the remedy of setting aside the penalty is apposite because it signals to the Law Society — and to administrative bodies more generally — that unacceptable delay brings the administration of justice into disrepute.

[221] The prejudice in this case does not meet the high threshold required for a stay of proceedings, but it is far from negligible. For an unexplained period of 32 ½ months, Mr. Abrametz and his employees experienced undue stress arising from these career-altering disciplinary proceedings. Mr. Abrametz was monitored for high blood pressure, a medical condition attributable to these stressful circumstances. He was also subject to intrusive conditions in order to maintain his legal practice. These prejudicial effects, taken together, are serious.

[222] Overall, the nature and magnitude of the prejudice, considered in light of the length of the unexplained delay, warrant a correspondingly serious remedy, if perhaps not a stay. This factor thus supports the quashing of the penalty imposed by the Hearing Committee.

[223] Finally, the public interest would not be served by maintaining the penalty imposed by the Law Society on Mr. Abrametz. It is true that he was found guilty of serious breaches of his professional obligations. However, multiple considerations convince me that the protection of the public does not require Mr. Abrametz's disbarment at this point. The Law Society took swift action to impose stringent conditions on his legal practice in order to prevent further misconduct. He was closely monitored by the Law Society for over four years — during which time his conduct was exemplary, according to the Hearing Committee (para. 395). Prior to the misconduct investigated by the Law Society, Mr. Abrametz was a longstanding practitioner with no disciplinary choses simplement, le Barreau a clairement manqué à son obligation d'équité procédurale envers Me Abrametz. Les périodes de délai inexpliqué ont considérablement dépassé les délais inhérents de l'affaire et sont « manifestement inacceptables » au sens de l'arrêt Blencoe. À mon avis, les tribunaux ne doivent pas hésiter à condamner une telle iniquité procédurale. Par conséquent, la réparation qui consiste à annuler la sanction est appropriée, car elle signale au Barreau — et plus généralement aux organismes administratifs — que les délais inacceptables déconsidèrent l'administration de la justice.

[222] Globalement, la nature et l'ampleur du préjudice, considérées à la lumière de la durée du délai inexpliqué, justifient une réparation d'un sérieux correspondant, sans toutefois justifier un arrêt des procédures. Ce facteur appuie donc l'annulation de la sanction infligée par le Comité d'audition.

[223] Enfin, l'intérêt public ne serait pas servi en maintenant la sanction qu'a infligée le Barreau à Me Abrametz. Il est vrai que ce dernier a été déclaré coupable de manquements graves à ses obligations professionnelles. Toutefois, de multiples considérations me convainquent que la protection du public n'exige pas la radiation de Me Abrametz du tableau de l'ordre à ce stade-ci. Le Barreau a rapidement fixé des conditions strictes à sa pratique du droit de manière à empêcher que Me Abrametz ne se rende coupable d'autres inconduites. Il a été étroitement surveillé par le Barreau pendant plus de quatre ans — période pendant laquelle sa conduite a été jugée exemplaire par le Comité d'audition (par. 395). Avant l'inconduite qui a fait l'objet de l'enquête du Barreau, record. Additionally, I note that none of his clients complained of his actions.

[224] In short, Mr. Abrametz has already paid a hefty price for his misconduct, and he has proved that his practice is no longer a matter of concern for the protection of the public. The remedy ordered by the Court of Appeal does not annul the proceedings or their outcome, as a stay would. The consequences of staying the proceedings would be much more serious: "Charges that are stayed may never be prosecuted; an alleged victim will never get his or her day in court; society will never have the matter resolved by a trier of fact" (Regan, at para. 53). Here, the allegations of professional misconduct were debated at a public hearing that attracted media attention. The Hearing Committee's findings of guilt stand — as does the stigma flowing from them. These convictions leave an indelible mark on Mr. Abrametz's disciplinary record, which may be accessed by members of the public at their convenience. In this context, the justifications for punishing Mr. Abrametz no longer hold; the penalty of disbarment would not be in the public interest.

V. Conclusion

[225] No less than 6 years elapsed between the beginning of the Law Society's audit investigation and its penalty decision, 32 ½ months of which were unjustified. This inordinate delay caused serious prejudice to Mr. Abrametz and his employees. In these circumstances, the Court of Appeal correctly sanctioned this abuse of process by ordering that the penalty for professional misconduct — but not the convictions themselves — be set aside.

[226] For these reasons, I would dismiss the appeal.

Me Abrametz était un praticien de longue date sans dossier disciplinaire. Je note en outre qu'aucun de ses clients ne s'est plaint de ses actions.

[224] En somme, Me Abrametz a déjà payé un prix élevé pour son inconduite, et il a prouvé que sa pratique n'était plus préoccupante eu égard à la protection du public. La réparation ordonnée par la Cour d'appel n'annule pas les procédures ou leur issue, comme l'aurait fait un arrêt des procédures. Les conséquences de cette dernière réparation seraient beaucoup plus graves : « Les accusations suspendues ne pourr[aient] jamais faire l'objet de poursuites; la présumée victime ne sera[it] jamais capable de se faire entendre en justice; la société sera[it] privée à jamais de la possibilité de faire trancher l'affaire par le juge des faits » (Regan, par. 53). En l'espèce, les allégations d'inconduite professionnelle ont été débattues lors d'une audience publique qui a attiré l'attention des médias. Les déclarations de culpabilité prononcées par le Comité d'audition sont maintenues — tout comme l'opprobre qui en découle. Ces déclarations de culpabilité laissent une marque indélébile sur le dossier disciplinaire de Me Abrametz, auquel les membres du public ont accès à leur guise. Dans ce contexte, les justifications de punir Me Abrametz ne tiennent plus; la sanction de la radiation du tableau de l'ordre ne serait pas dans l'intérêt public.

V. Conclusion

[225] Pas moins de 6 ans se sont écoulés entre le début de l'enquête de vérification par le Barreau et sa décision relative à la sanction, dont 32 ½ mois étaient injustifiés. Ce délai excessif a causé un préjudice sérieux à Me Abrametz et à ses employés. Dans ces circonstances, c'est à bon droit que la Cour d'appel a sévi contre cet abus de procédure en ordonnant que la sanction pour inconduite professionnelle — mais non les déclarations de culpabilité elles-mêmes — soit annulée.

[226] Pour ces motifs, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

* Application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada was dismissed September 27, 2001 (Gonthier, Major and Binnie JJ.). S.C.C. File No. 28379. S.C.C. Bulletin, 2001, p. 1685.

Courts -- Judges -- Bias -- Reasonable apprehension of bias -- Conduct of trial -- Plaintiffs appealing dismissal of action -- Plaintiffs arguing that trial judge's failure to restrain unprofessional and uncivil conduct by defence counsel establishing unfair trial and reasonable apprehension of bias -- Informed and reasonable observer looking realistically at trial would not have apprehended bias or unfair adjudication.

Evidence -- Use of discovery evidence at trial -- Correcting answers given on examination for discovery -- Difference between formal and informal admissions.

Evidence -- Experts -- Expert's reports -- Evidentiary rulings at trial -- Experts may not testify about new matters not touched on in expert's report delivered before trial -- Rules of Civil Procedure, R.R.O. 1990, Reg. 194, rules 31.09, 53.03(1).

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

Evidence -- Experts -- Expert's reports -- Hearsay evidence -- Foundational facts -- Proof of foundational facts for expert's opinion normally going to weight and not admissibility of evidence -- Trial judge, however, not erring in ruling that expert's opinion lacking probative value where party's undertaking to prove foundational facts not satisfied.

The plaintiff JM was delivered by a Caesarean section performed on his mother, the plaintiff BM, by the defendant Dr. A at the defendant The Public General Hospital Society of Chatham ("the Hospital"). JM was born profoundly disabled. He and his parents sued Dr. A, the Hospital and three nurses for negligence. After a 165-day trial marked by rancour and hostility between counsel for the parties, the plaintiffs' action was dismissed. The plaintiffs appealed on the grounds that: (1) Granger J., the trial judge, erred in failing to find that the defendants were negligent in not properly monitoring BM and for not delivering JM earlier; (2) they did not receive a fair trial because of the trial judge's erroneous and one-sided evidentiary rulings; and (3) in failing to restrain the conduct of defence counsel, the trial judge's conduct of the trial raised a reasonable apprehension of bias.

Held, the appeal should be dismissed without costs, but the trial judgment should be varied to take account of the defendants' undertaking not to pursue the cost of the trial.

There was ample evidence to support the finding that the injuries were not caused by any act or omission of the defendants but were caused by a sudden rupture of the placenta resulting in cataclysmic oxygen deprivation. The evidentiary rulings did not support the plaintiffs' contention that they were denied the opportunity to fairly present their case, nor did these rulings create a reasonable apprehension of bias. The rulings reflected a sincere and diligent effort to conduct a fair trial. Virtually all the rulings were correct. The few errors were inconsequential and, even viewed cumulatively, did not result in any significant prejudice. Reviewing each impugned evidentiary ruling individually, this appeal failed because: (1) The trial judge did not err in ruling that Dr.

Fields, an expert witness called by the plaintiffs, could not be questioned about bradycardia (abnormally slow heart rate) because testimony about this topic was contrary to rule 53.03(1) of the Rules of Civil Procedure, which requires a party to serve an expert's report setting out the "substance" of the expert's proposed testimony. The "substance" requirement must be determined in light of the purpose of the rule, which is to facilitate trial preparation by providing opposing parties with adequate notice of opinion evidence to be adduced at trial. An expert may not testify about matters that open up a new field not touched upon by the report. In any event, even if the trial judge erred in his interpretation of rule 53.03, there was no prejudice because the evidence about bradycardia went to causation and Dr. Fields was not qualified to give expert evidence about causation. (2) In light of his ruling about the substance of Dr. Fields' report, the trial judge did not act improperly in refusing the plaintiffs' request for an adjournment, and this denial did not cause any injustice. (3) The trial judge did not err in denying leave to permit Dr. Silver, an expert witness who had been called by the plaintiffs, to testify about matters in a second report that described a new theory of causation. Had this testimony been admitted, the defendants' right to a full and fair defence would have been impaired because they would have been denied the right to cross-examine Dr. Manning, an expert already called by the plaintiffs. Re-calling Dr. Manning would have resulted in undue delay. (4) The trial judge did not err in ruling that the evidence of Ms. Kelly, a home care expert, and of Ms. Staub, an expert about future care costs, lacked probative value, when with respect to the foundational facts underlying their respective opinions, these witnesses intended to rely on videos filed at trial rather than the medical reports referred to in their written reports. In having these witnesses proceed in this way, the plaintiffs were in breach of an undertaking and were refusing to provide the factual foundation of the opinions. Although normally proof of foundational facts goes to the weight and not the admissibility of the opinion, it was open to the trial judge to conclude that the observations and conclusions could not be established in any way other than by adducing the medical reports containing those observations and conclusions. (5) The trial

judge did not err in allowing Dr. A to correct his discovery evidence that JM showed oligohydramnios at birth. Dr. A's discovery answer was not a formal admission, which cannot be withdrawn except by leave of the court or the consent of the party in whose favour it was made, and it was always open to explain his answer in testimony. Although under rule 31.09, a party shall forthwith advise that the answer to a question was incorrect, the impact of corrections is a matter to be decided by the trial judge and the combined effect of rules 31.09 and 53.08 is that a trial judge must grant leave to introduce the evidence unless to do so would cause prejudice that could not be overcome by an adjournment or costs. (6) The trial judge did not err in restricting the cross-examinations of certain defendants to preclude opinio evidence about the conduct of other defendants. The impugned questioning went beyond the witnesses' involvement in the events of the case. (7) Although the trial judge did err in his ruling about the plaintiffs' cross-examination of the defendant Colebrook by ruling that the plaintiffs were precluded from contradicting her on her discovery evidence that they had themselves had read into the record, no prejudice flowed from that ruling. (8) There was no basis to interfere with the trial judge's ruling prohibiting the use of demonstrative evidence, which is a matter of discretion. (9) In view of the pleadings, there was an adversity of interest between the co-defendants, and the trial judge correctly ruled that Dr. A had a right to cross-examine a witness called by the co-defendants. (10) There was no merit in the submissions that the trial judge erred or was inconsistent in his rulings favouring the defendants with respect to the evidence of Drs. Tithecott, Smith and Eyman.

The trial judge's conduct of the trial did not raise a reasonable apprehension of judicial bias. The most serious of six categories of alleged judicial misconduct was that the trial judge refused to restrain defence counsel's repeated attacks on plaintiffs' counsel's integrity and competence, which attacks included repeated accusations of manipulating evidence; of deliberately misinforming witnesses and feeding them answers; of deliberately flouting, subverting and ignoring the rules of practice; and of showing contempt for the trial judge and his rulings. The record supported the plaintiffs' contentions and showed that the degree of trust between counsel had vanished, replaced by a level of rancour and hostility, rarely, if ever, seen in an Ontario courtroom. Although the conduct was not all one-sided, defence counsel was mostly responsible for conduct that by any reasonable standards of civility was unacceptable for any counsel, let alone senior counsel. That the conduct was unacceptable was candidly ackn owledged. The issue for the appeal, however, was what impact this conduct had on the fairness of the trial. The question was whether an informed person viewing the matter realistically would conclude that the way the trial judge dealt with defence counsel attacks on plaintiffs' counsel created a reasonable apprehension of bias and thus deprived the plaintiffs of a fair trial. The answer to this question was negative. First, the trial judge did not remain silent. Second, the failure of the trial judge to do more to restrain defence counsel does not automatically indicate judicial bias. Nothing in the record or in the trial judge's reasons suggested that he condoned the conduct or lent the weight of his office to the defence position. An informed and reasonable observer looking realistically at the trial unfolding would not apprehend bias or unfair adjudication. Third, and admittedly less importantly, most of the attacks occurred during motions and not during the presentation of evidence.

Turning to the other categories of alleged judicial misconduct, while several examples of defence counsel's treatment of the plaintiff BM showed counsel in an unflattering light, none of the examples suggested judicial bias. In making interventions, the trial judge did not act improperly so as to prevent the plaintiffs from fairly presenting their case. There was no merit in the suggestion of misconduct because the trial judge spoke to defence counsel in the absence of plaintiffs' counsel about scheduling. There was nothing in the trial judge's remarks to substantiate the allegation that he unfairly criticized plaintiffs' counsel and there was nothing inappropriate in his reasons for judgment that showed antipathy to the plaintiff BM. Finally, the totality of the plaintiffs' complaints did not establish a reasonable apprehension of bias.

APPEAL from a judgment dismissing an action for negligence against a doctor, three nurses and a hospital.

Barry A. Percival, Q.C., Martin Wunder, Q.C., and Ronald D. Davis, for appellants.
Joshua Liswood and Kathryn M. Frelick, for respondents, The Public General Hospital Society of Chatham, A. Olson, P. Colebrook and M. Want.
W. Niels F. Ortved and J. Thomas Curry, for respondent, G. Asher.

[1] BY THE COURT: -- In July 1990, Barbra and Allen Marchand were expecting their first child. Barbra's pregnancy had been relatively uneventful. However, by July 10 she was 16 days beyond her due date and her obstetrician, Dr. G. Asher, arranged for her to be induced the next day at the Public General Hospital in Chatham.

[2] Mrs. Marchand was admitted to the Hospital at 1:05 a.m. on July 11. At 8:32 that morning her son Joel was delivered by emergency Caesarean section performed by Dr. Asher.

[3] Tragically, Joel was born profoundly disabled. He suffered asphyxia as a fetus with the result that the cells in the cortex of his brain were destroyed. He cannot walk or talk and will be entirely dependent on others for his care throughout his life.

[4] In this action Joel and his parents sued Dr. Asher, the Hospital and three of the Hospital nurses, claiming that their negligence caused Joel's condition.

[5] The trial began on October 18, 1993. It was anticipated to run for six to eight weeks. In the end it took 165 court days to complete. The trial was characterized by an extraordinary level of rancour and hostility on the part of counsel, all of whom were, regrettably, senior members of the bar of Ontario. It was not a trial of which the administration of justice can be proud.

[6] On October 7, 1996, Granger J. released his reasons for judgment dismissing the action. This is the appeal by Joel and his parents from that decision.

[7] The appellants make three broad attacks on the trial judgment.

[8] First, the appellants argue that the trial judge erred in declining to find that the respondents were negligent in not properly monitoring Mrs. Marchand's pregnancy and in not delivering Joel earlier.

[9] Second, the appellants argue that they did not receive a fair trial because of the erroneous and one-sided evidentiary rulings made by the trial judge.

[10] Third, the appellants argue that the trial judge's conduct of the trial raised a reasonable apprehension of bias towards them. They submit that the trial judge failed to restrain or control the unprofessional conduct of defence counsel throughout the entire trial.

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

[11] We will deal with each of these issues in turn.

I. WERE THE RESPONDENTS NEGLIGENT?

[12] In this court the appellants relied on a series of acts and omissions by Dr. Asher and the Hospital nurses, which they argued were negligent and which they claimed led to Joel's tragedy. These acts and omissions all relate to the final stages of Mrs. Marchand's pregnancy as it stretched beyond her due date into its forty-first and forty-second weeks.

[13] The appellants described the four components of this "cumulative negligence" as follows:

(a) failing to instruct Mrs. Marchand about the importance of fetal kick count as an indicator of fetal health;

(b) improperly administering and interpreting the non-stress test given to Mrs. Marchand on July 5;

(c) thereafter failing to retest, monitor, or induce Mrs. Marchand; and

(d) failing to attach a fetal heart monitor once Mrs. Marchand was admitted to the hospital on July 11.

[14] At trial, Granger J. considered and rejected each of these arguments.

[15] The appellants also challenge the finding made by the trial judge that the tragedy which befell Joel was caused not by any act or omission of the respondents, but by a sudden abruption or rupture of the placenta pulling away from the uterine wall. The trial judge found that this began without warning at about 7:40 a.m. on July 11, resulting in cataclysmic oxygen deprivation to Joel's brain before his birth some 50 minutes later. On appeal the appellants raised no allegations of negligence relating to the treatment of Joel from 7:40 a.m. onwards.

[16] We did not find it necessary to call on the respondents to respond to any of these arguments. There was ample evidence before the trial judge to support both his finding that none of the acts of negligence had been established and his determination of the cause of the tragedy that befell Joel. Nonetheless, we will briefly review each of the arguments.

1. Allegations of "Cumulative Negligence"

[17] First, the appellants allege that Dr. Asher was negligent in failing to advise Mrs. Marchand of the significance of reduced fetal movement as her pregnancy went beyond term. However, the trial judge found as a fact that Dr. Asher did indeed have a complete discussion with her concerning fetal movement. Equally important, the trial judge found that Mrs. Marchand reported no significant reduction in fetal movement to Dr. Asher and that any reduction she experienced was a natural consequence of the fetus entering the birth canal and therefore of no moment. These findings are amply supported in the evidence and ought not to be disturbed.

[18] Second, the appellants allege negligence in connection with the non-stress test ("NST") administered to Mrs. Marchand on July 5 to determine the health of her fetus. They say that Nurse Olson was negligent in administering the NST and in interpreting the results to show a healthy fetus, and that Dr. Asher was negligent in failing to review the results himself or failing to have them reviewed by another professional.

[19] Again, however, the findings of the trial judge are to the contrary and are well founded in the evidence. He found that Nurse Olson administered the test properly. Indeed there was no evidence to the contrary. The trial judge also found that she was correct in interpreting the results of the test to indicate a healthy fetus, a conclusion which accorded with the predominant view of the expert witnesses called at trial. While several of the appellants' experts found the test results raised a suspicion, the trial judge correctly concluded that even this could render Nurse Olson's conclusion no more than an error in judgment falling short of negligence. Finally, although the trial judge found that Dr. Asher should have reviewed the NST results himself, he also found that the doctor would have reached the same conclusion as Nurse Olson (which he found to be the correct conclusion) that the test result was normal. Therefore, the course of Mrs. Marchand's pregnancy would not have changed had Dr. Asher reviewed the NST results himself.

[20] The appellants' third allegation of negligence is that Dr. Asher fell below the required standard of care in failing to intervene in Mrs. Marchand's pregnancy until July 10, when he scheduled an induction for the next day.

[21] In addressing this argument the trial judge conducted a careful review of the expert evidence on standard of care called by both sides. He was careful to address himself to the standard required of obstetricians practising in Ontario in July and August 1990. He concluded on the basis of ample evidence that where, as here, the pregnancy was normal and there was no indication of fetal distress, it was entirely acceptable practice to do without serial anti-natal monitoring and to schedule the induction when Dr. Asher did. There is no basis to interfere with that conclusion.

[22] Finally, the appellants allege negligence in the failure of nursing staff to attach a fetal heart monitor to Mrs. Marchand following her admission to the Hospital at 1:05 a.m. on July 11. Nurse Colebrook did not do this but monitored the fetal heart rate intermittently with the use of a stethoscope. That monitoring detected no abnormality before 7:40 a.m.

[23] Once again the trial judge carefully reviewed and considered the expert evidence. He concluded that in the circumstances the nursing decision to monitor the fetal heart rate by stethoscope rather than by attaching a fetal heart monitor met an acceptable standard of care. This was particularly so given that the monitoring results indicated that the fetus was not in distress before 7:40 a.m. The record amply supports this finding and we would not interfere with it.

[24] In summary, the trial judge concluded that none of the components of the cumulative negligence advanced by the appellants were made out on the evidence. In our view, this conclusion is unassailable.

2. Causation

[25] The appellants also attack the finding of causation made by the trial judge. He rejected their assertion at trial that Joel's asphyxia was due to a long slow deterioration of the placenta, which could have been detected by proper care. Rather, he found that the fetus was assaulted by a sudden placental abruption, which commenced without warning about 7:40 a.m. and which resulted in critical oxygen deprivation to the fetus until Joel was delivered at 8:32 a.m.

[26] Here, as well, the finding of the trial judge is well supported in the evidence. It cannot be said in any way to be unreasonable. The trial judge carefully reviewed the evidence. He recognized that much of the evidence describing an abruption came from Dr. Asher himself. There was also, however, significant corroborating evidence, particularly the testing of the relevant blood gases. That clinical evidence supported the conclusion that an acute event, which had its onset at about 7:40 a.m. and evolved rapidly thereafter, caused Joel's profound injuries.

[27] The conclusion about what happened to Joel was carefully drawn after a review of all the evidence. It is a reasonable conclusion, which we must accept. A severe spontaneous placental abruption, not anything done by the respondents, caused this tragedy.

II. DID THE APPELLANTS RECEIVE A FAIR TRIAL?

[28] The appellants submit that, taken cumulatively, a number of evidentiary rulings by the trial judge as well as the trial judge's uneven application of his evidentiary rulings (a) denied the appellants the opportunity fairly to present their case or, (b) created a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the trial judge. In their factum, the appellants submit that the impugned rulings "distorted the trial process", "impaired any reasonable attempt to achieve justice" and

"negated the Marchands' right to present their case fully". The appellants made similar oral submissions.

[29] We do not understand the appellants to say that any one of the evidentiary rulings, standing on its own, would be sufficient to warrant interference by this court. Rather, it is their position that we must consider whether the overall, cumulative effect of these rulings denied the appellants a fair trial. We will review each impugned ruling individually to assess whether the cumulative complaint the appellants advance has any substance.

A. Evidentiary Rulings

1. Ruling limiting expert evidence to the "substance" of the report

[30] During the examination-in-chief of Dr. Fields, an expert witness called by the appellants, their counsel asked about indications of late decelerations on the NST strip. Counsel for the respondents objected on two grounds: first, rule 31.07(1), which prevents a party from introducing information at trial where he or she has refused to furnish the information on discovery; and second, rule 53.03(1), which requires a party to serve an expert's report setting out the substance of the expert's proposed testimony. On examination for discovery, counsel for the respondents had asked that the location of late decelerations be identified on the NST strip. Appellants' counsel refused to provide that information. Although the appellants filed a report from Dr. Fields, the report merely described the NST strip as abnormal and suspicious.

[31] The trial judge ruled that the appellants had failed to comply with both rules 31.07 and 53.03. However, applying rule 53.08, the trial judge allowed Dr. Fields to testify about indications of late decelerations on the NST strip on the ground that counsel for the respondents would have sufficient time to prepare their cross-examination of Dr. Fields. In making this ruling, he cautioned counsel for the appellants (and to a lesser extent counsel for the respondents) that, at some point, attempts to examine experts on matters outside their reports would cause prejudice to the other side requiring the exclusion of testimony.

[32] The appellants' counsel proceeded to examine Dr. Fields extensively on the NST strip. He then began to examine Dr. Fields on the relationship between oxygen deprivation and fetal reserve, and specifically about bradycardia (abnormally slow heart rate). Counsel for the respondents objected on the ground that the concept of bradycardia appeared nowhere in Dr. Fields' report. The appellants' counsel argued that the report dealt with the standard of care in treating an overdue mother, and that the questions went to signs of fetal distress some hours before the delivery. The trial judge ruled that the appellants' counsel could not pursue the "bradycardia" line of questioning because Dr. Fields' report made no mention of when fetal distress was determined.

[33] The appellants submit that Dr. Fields should have been permitted to explain what bradycardia means because bradycardia is a sign of fetal distress, and fetal distress appeared in the report. They contend that the trial judge erred in adopting an unduly narrow construction of rule 53.03, specifically with respect to the phrase "the substance of his or her proposed testimony". In particular, the appellants submit that the trial judge erred in equating "substance" with "summary". Indeed, in their factum, the appellants submit that "the Marchands' expert witnesses were constrained to testifying verbatim from the contents of their reports". It is the appellants' submission that this ruling set an erroneously high standard for what is required in an expert report and impeded the presentation of their case.

[34] Rule 53.03 governs expert opinion evidence. At the time of trial, rule 53.03 provided:

> 53.03 (1) A party who intends to call an expert witness at trial shall, not less than ten days before the commencement of the trial, serve on every other party to the action a report, signed by the expert, setting out his or her name, address and qualifications and the substance of his or her proposed testimony.

> (2) No expert witness may testify, except with leave of the trial judge, unless subrule (1) has been complied with. [See Note 1 at end of document]

Unless a party has fully complied with the requirements set out in rule 53.03(1), an expert witness called by that party may not testify except with leave.

[35] This court considered the meaning of the "substance" of the proposed testimony of an expert in Thorogood v. Bowden (1978), 21 O.R. (2d) 385, 89 D.L.R. (3d) 604 (C.A.). A medical expert retained by the plaintiff in a personal injury action submitted a report indicating that the injuries would manifest in more intensive symptoms later in life. At trial, the plaintiff's medical expert gave evidence about the possibility of arthritis and the future need for an artificial hip. On appeal, the defendant argued that the trial judge ought to have declared a mistrial, as the matters raised by the expert had not been included in his medical reports. The court dismissed the appeal. Lacourcire J.A., writing for the majority, reasoned as follows at p. 386 O.R.:

> We interpret the law with respect to medical reports to be that a medical expert is not to be narrowly confined and limited to the precise contents of his report, but he has a right to explain and amplify. What was done here, in our view, . . . was to expand on what was latent in the medical report, and it did not open a new field. In our view, the trial Judge properly concluded that there was no prejudicial surprise here and, therefore, exercised his discretion and properly refused to declare a mistrial.

[36] Thorogood was applied in Auto Workers' Village (St. Catherines) Ltd. v. Blaney, McMurtry, Stapells, Friedman (1997), 14 C.P.C. (4th) 152 (Ont. Gen. Div.). The plaintiff alleged, among other things, that the solicitors were negligent and caused the plaintiff damages in connection with a condominium project. The plaintiff called a lawyer to give expert opinion evidence in the area of condominium development. During examination in-chief, the witness opined that a clause in an agreement might be void. The defendants objected to this line of questioning on the ground that it went beyond the expert's report. Quinn J. ruled that the expert could not testify about the validity of the clause, as that opinion was not stated in his report. Quinn J. relied on Thorogood and found, at p. 157, that the impugned questioning entered a new field:

> The opinion [by the expert], as to the voidness of the price-escalation clause, creates a discrete instance of solicitors' negligence: one which had never before been raised by the plaintiff. In other words, it opens up a new field. It is neither touched upon nor latent in the report of [the expert]. Therefore, the report does not contain "the substance" of the "proposed testimony" on the issue of voidness, as required by subrule 53.03(1).

See also Iler v. Beaudet, [1971] 3 O.R. 644 (Co. Ct.); McEachrane v. Children's Aid Society of Essex (County) (1986), 10 C.P.C. (2d) 265 (Ont. H.C.J.).

[37] Ollet v. Bristol Aerojet Ltd., [1979] 3 All E.R. 544 (Q.B.) dealt with an action for personal injuries suffered in connection with some machinery. An expert witness filed a report merely setting out a factual description of the machine and the alleged circumstances in which the accident happened. Ackner J. considered the English equivalent of rule 53.03 and found that the report failed to comply with the requirement that the parties exchange the substance of the expert's proposed testimony. He interpreted the term "substance" in light of the function of expert evidence, stating at p. 544:

> . . . An expert, unlike other witnesses, is allowed, because of his special qualifications and/or experience, to give opinion evidence. It is for his opinion evidence that he is called, not for a factual description of the machine or the circumstances of the accident, although that is often necessary in order to explain and/or justify his conclusions. When the substance of the expert's report is to be provided, that means precisely what it says, both the substance of the factual description of the machine and/or the circumstances of the accident and his expert opinion in relation to that accident, which is the very justification for calling him.

[38] In our view, these cases indicate that the "substance" requirement of rule 53.03(1) must be determined in light of the purpose of the rule, which is to facilitate orderly trial preparation by providing opposing parties with adequate notice of opinion evidence to be adduced at trial. Accordingly, an expert report cannot merely state a conclusion. The report must set out the expert's opinion, and the basis for that opinion. Further, while testifying, an expert may explain and amplify what is in his or her report but only on matters that are "latent in" or "touched on" by the report. An expert may not testify about matters that open up a new field not mentioned in the report. The trial judge must be afforded a certain amount of discretion in applying rule 53.03 with a view to ensuring that a party is not unfairly taken by surprise by expert evidence on a point that would not have been anticipated from a reading of an expert's report.

[39] We are unable to conclude that the trial judge erred in his ruling. Although we do not have a copy of his report, it appears from the transcripts that Dr. Fields' report merely stated his conclusion that the appropriate standard of care was to attach a fetal heart monitor on admission to indicate fetal distress at the earliest possible point. Dr. Fields' report did not refer to bradycardia, did not state the point at which fetal distress was determined, and did not deal with the "reserve capacity" that the fetus might have had.

[40] Moreover, the trial judge had ruled that Dr. Fields had expertise only with regard to the standard of care in Michigan. Dr. Fields' report dealt with the topic of fetal distress in connection with his opinion on the standard of care. The appellants' counsel, however, sought to elicit from Dr. Fields, through the bradycardia questions, evidence going to causation. Thus, the bradycardia evidence was directed to an issue not addressed in the report. Accordingly, even if the trial judge erred in his interpretation of rule 53.03, no prejudice arises from that error as Dr. Fields had not been qualified to give expert evidence about causation.

2. Denial of request for adjournment

[41] In the light of the trial judge's ruling restricting Dr. Fields to the "substance" of his report, the appellants requested an adjournment for a "couple of weeks" to obtain supplementary reports from other witnesses they intended to call to give expert evidence. In particular, the appellants sought to obtain a supplementary report from Dr. Silver, whose original report was less than one page and dealt only with the issue of abruption. Counsel for the respondents opposed the request, arguing that the appellants were seeking an opportunity to "re-do the liability case", and that if the request was allowed, the respondents were entitled to a further examination for discovery.

[42] The trial judge refused the appellants' request for an adjournment. He clarified the effect of his ruling concerning Dr. Fields' report, stating that it "is not a general ruling throughout the trial. It does not apply to all the reports. It only replies to the evidence that I heard from Dr. Fields yesterday and the way the evidence was developed." The trial judge emphasized the need to proceed with the trial, noting that counsel for the respondents would be entitled to a further examination for discovery if the experts were allowed to file further reports, thus unduly delaying the completion of the case.

[43] Although the appellants did not specifically address the reasons why the denial of their request for an adjournment was in error, they submit that the Fields ruling required them to revisit every report submitted by their liability experts. The denial of an adjournment, they say, prevented them from fully and fairly presenting their case.

[44] In our view, the trial judge did not act improperly in refusing to grant the request for an adjournment. The trial judge made it clear that the Fields ruling applied only to Dr. Fields, and that he would deal with issues concerning the adequacy of other expert reports as they arose. The trial judge emphasized the need to continue with the trial. This need was properly emphasized, given that: the parties were then several weeks into the trial; there had been substantial discovery prior to the trial; and the filing of additional reports would necessitate further examinations for discovery, thus prolonging the trial. The denial of an adjournment did not cause any injustice in this case.

3. Ruling preventing Dr. Silver from testifying on her second report

[45] The appellants called Dr. Silver, a pathologist at the Toronto Hospital for Sick Children, as an expert witness. Dr. Silver had prepared a report dated April 22, 1993. Following the Fields ruling, the appellants obtained a further report from Dr. Silver. Dr. Silver's second report was served on November 24, 1993. The respondents were not advised of the substance of Dr. Silver's additional evidence before being served with this report. The respondents objected to Dr. Silver testifying on matters raised in the second report on the grounds that: (a) the second report set out a new theory of causation; and (b) allowing Dr. Silver to testify in accordance with the second report would cause prejudice to the respondents as Dr. Manning, an expert in fetal medicine called by the appellants, had already testified and the respondents would be denied the opportunity to cross-examine him on the new theory.

[46] The trial judge ruled that he would not grant leave for Dr. Silver to give evidence about matters set out in the second report. The trial judge described the first report of Dr. Silver, which stated that the presence of meconium within the fetal membrane provided evidence of fetal distress, as extremely short. In contrast, the second report was over three pages long, and largely devoted to explaining the reasons for Dr. Silver's opinion about why a placental abruption could not have resulted in severe birth asphyxiation.

[47] The trial judge commented on the two reports as follows:

. . . I simply do not accept the argument that the report of April 22nd, 1993 would allow Dr. Silver to give the evidence as set out in her report dated November 23, 1993. Mr. Wunder is attempting to do with Dr. Silver exactly what I had ruled he could not do with Dr. Fields, which is, to just state a conclusion in a report and attempt to explain in the evidence the reason for the conclusion. The reason should be in the report so opposing counsel will know such reasoning and can test it by cross-examining other expert witnesses.

[48] The trial judge then considered whether rule 53.08 obliged him to grant leave for Dr. Silver to give evidence as proposed. The trial judge agreed that the respondents would suffer prejudice if Dr. Silver was allowed to give the proposed testimony. Dr. Manning had completed his testimony, and the respondents would be unable to cross-examine Dr. Manning on Dr. Silver's second report. Accordingly, the respondents' right to a full and fair defence would be impaired. The trial judge found that requiring Dr. Manning to return for further cross-examination would result in undue delay. Given these considerations, the trial judge refused to grant leave.

[49] We do not agree that the trial judge erred in denying leave to permit Dr. Silver to testify about matters in her second report for three reasons.

[50] First, the appellants sought to elicit Dr. Silver's opinion that severe birth asphyxiation could not have resulted from an abruption. The first report did not deal with abruption; this report concerned the presence of meconium as an indication of fetal distress. Accordingly, testimony on abruption would certainly "open up a new field" not covered in the first report.

[51] Second, the trial judge found that the respondents would be prejudiced as they had been unable to cross-examine Dr. Manning about Dr. Silver's second report and that requiring Dr. Manning to re-attend would cause undue delay. This was a matter within the discretion of the trial judge and we see no basis to interfere.

[52] Third, Dr. Silver, ultimately, did testify about her opinion that an abruption was not the cause of Joel Marchand's injuries.

[53] We add that the appellants could have avoided the very problem they encountered with respect to the evidence of Dr. Silver. They had gone to trial on a one-page report from a witness they considered important and should not have been surprised when it proved inadequate. When it did, they took no steps to advise the respondents to expect the amplified report they had asked Dr. Silver to prepare.

4. "Foundational facts" rulings

[54] On November 4, 1993, the appellants entered as Exhibit 47 ("Ex. 47") a report written by two home care experts, Ms. Kelly and Ms. Snell, dated August 19, 1993. Ex. 47 listed various source documents, including numerous reports from medical practitioners involved in the care of Joel Marchand. Counsel for Dr. Asher stated that he understood the appellants to be undertaking to call the authors of Ex. 47 and also to prove the source documents. The trial judge responded that the appellants would have to produce their source documents. The appellants' counsel gave no indication that he would not prove the source documents.

[55] On November 24, 1993, the appellants served a letter advising that Ms. Kelly and Ms. Snell would no longer be relying on the medical reports referred to in Ex. 47; instead, the two witnesses would be relying on videos filed at trial. The respondents objected to Ms. Kelly giving opinion evidence on a basis other than the medical reports. The respondents' counsel argued that the appellants had undertaken to prove the medical opinions contained in these reports. The respondents' counsel further argued that Ms. Kelly's evidence was of no probative value as there was no admissible evidence proving the factual foundation of her opinion.

[56] The trial judge accepted the respondents' submissions and ruled that Ms. Kelly's opinion lacked probative value unless the appellants proved the facts on which she based her opinion (the "foundational facts ruling"). The trial judge acknowledged that the appellants might prove Joel's disability in a number of ways, but noted that "if [Ms. Kelly's] opinion is based on the opinions of doctors then the plaintiff must attempt to prove the opinions of such doctors. . .". The trial judge also found that the appellants' counsel's refusal to prove the medical reports referred to in Ex. 47 breached an implied undertaking to prove the opinions of the medical doctors referred to in Ex. 47.

[57] Given the breach of this implied undertaking, the trial judge stated that he did "not intend to give Ex. 47 any weight whatsoever". As the respondents did have notice of the substance of Ms. Kelly's evidence, the trial judge was prepared to allow Ms. Kelly to testify. However, he stated that he would insist that all of the facts on which Ms. Kelly relied be proved by some admissible evidence before he would permit Ms. Kelly to state her opinion.

[58] A similar issue arose later on May 19, 1994. The appellants proposed to call Ms. Staub to give opinion evidence regarding the future care costs for Joel Marchand. Ms. Staub had written a report dated September 13, 1993, which had been filed as an exhibit on an implied undertaking that the appellants would prove the facts on which the report was based. The respondents objected to Ms. Staub being allowed to give evidence on the ground that the appellants had failed to prove the foundational facts. The appellants' counsel suggested that the earlier foundational facts ruling was unclear, and submitted that the foundational facts ruling allowed him to prove the foundational facts upon which Mr. Staub's opinion was based in a manner different than that set out in her written report. The trial judge reiterated that the effect of the foundational facts ruling was that if a report was based on the reports of doctors, the opinion of the doctors must be proven.

[59] The trial judge also referred to an earlier ruling requiring counsel to file a list of the expert witnesses they intended to call or whose reports would be filed under s. 52 of the Ontario Evidence Act, R.S.O. 1990, c. E.23. He also ruled that before an expert could testify a voir dire be held in order to determine the facts or opinions that the expert relied on in forming his or her opinion.

[60] In R. v. Lavallee, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 852, 55 C.C.C. (3d) 97, the Supreme Court of Canada reviewed the circumstances in which expert opinion evidence may be admitted, notwithstanding that the opinion is based upon hearsay evidence. Wilson J. reviewed the Supreme Court's prior decision in R. v. Abbey, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 24, 68 C.C.C. (2d) 394, and at pp. 127-28 C.C.C. [p. 893 S.C.R.] interpreted Abbey as standing for the following propositions:

1. An expert opinion is admissible if relevant, even if it is based on second-hand evidence.

2. This second-hand evidence (hearsay) is admissible to show the information on which the expert opinion is based, not as evidence going to the existence of the facts on which the opinion is based.

3. Where the psychiatric evidence is comprised of hearsay evidence, the problem is the weight to be attributed to the opinion.

4. Before any weight can be given to an expert's opinion, the facts upon which the opinion is based must be found to exist.

Thus, Lavallee establishes that an expert opinion based upon hearsay will be admissible; however, the weight to be attached to that opinion is an issue.

[61] Wilson J. clarified the fourth proposition, and rejected the proposition that every fact relied upon by the expert must be independently proven before any weight could be attached to an expert opinion. She stated at pp. 130-31 C.C.C. [pp. 896-97 S.C.R.]:

> . . . Abbey does not, in my view, provide any authority for that proposition. The court's conclusion in that case was that the trial judge erred in treating as proven the facts upon which the psychiatrist relied in formulating his opinion. The solution was an appropriate charge to the jury, not an effective withdrawal of the evidence. In my view, as long as there is some admissible evidence to establish the foundation for the expert's opinion, the trial judge cannot subsequently instruct the jury to completely ignore the testimony. The judge must, of course, warn the jury that the more the expert relies on facts not proved in evidence the less weight the jury may attribute to the opinion.

. . . . .

Where the factual basis of an expert's opinion is a mlange of admissible and inadmissible evidence the duty of the trial judge is to caution the jury that the weight attributable to the expert testimony is directly related to the amount and quality of admissible evidence on which it relies.

[62] Sopinka J., in a concurring judgment, noted that the principles underlying Abbey give rise to a contradiction: an expert opinion based entirely on hearsay will be admissible, but will be entitled to no weight. He provided the following resolution at pp. 132-33 C.C.C. [p. 899-900 S.C.R.]:

The resolution of the contradiction inherent in Abbey, and the answer to the criticism Abbey has drawn, is to be found in the practical distinction between evidence that an expert obtains and acts upon within the scope of his or her expertise (as in City of St. John), and evidence that an expert obtains from a party to litigation touching a matter directly in issue (as in Abbey.)

In the former instance, an expert arrives at an opinion on the basis of forms of enquiry and practice that are accepted means of decision within that expertise. A physician, for example, daily determines questions of immense importance on the basis of the observations of colleagues, often in the form of second or third-hand hearsay. For a court to accord no weight to, or to exclude, this sort of professional judgment, arrived at in accordance with sound medical practices, would be to ignore the strong circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness that surround it, and would be, in my view, contrary to the approach this court has taken to the analysis of hearsay evidence in general, exemplified in Ares v. Venner (1970), 14 D.L.R. (3d) 4 [(S.C.C.)]. In R. v.

> Jordan (1984), 11 C.C.C. (3d) 565 (B.C.C.A.), a case concerning an expert's evaluation of the chemical composition of an alleged heroin specimen, Anderson J.A. held, and I respectfully agree, that Abbey does not apply in such circumstances: see also R. v. Zundel (1987), 31 C.C.C. (3d) 97 at p. 146 (Ont. C.A.), where the court recognized an expert opinion based upon evidence ". . . of a general nature which is widely used and acknowledged as reliable by experts in that field".
>
> Where, however, the information upon which an expert forms his or her opinion comes from the mouth of a party to the litigation, or from any other source that is inherently suspect, a court ought to require independent proof of that information. The lack of such proof will, consistent with Abbey, have a direct effect on the weight to be given to the opinion, perhaps to the vanishing point. But it must be recognized that it will only be very rarely that an expert's opinion is entirely based upon such information, with no independent proof of any of it. Where an expert's opinion is based in part upon suspect information and in part upon either admitted facts or facts sought to be proved, the matter is purely one of weight. . . .

[63] This court considered the weight to be given to an expert opinion based solely upon hearsay evidence in R. v. Scardino (1991), 6 C.R. (4th) 146, 46 O.A.C. 209 (C.A.). The accused appealed from his conviction for second degree murder. At trial, the accused led expert evidence from a psychiatrist, who testified that the accused suffered from a psychiatric disorder that would have prevented him from appreciating the nature and quality of his acts. Among the evidence relied upon by the expert in forming his opinion was a factual account of the events recounted by the accused. The trial judge instructed the jury that these matters had not been established in evidence, and thus the "degree to which [the expert's] opinion is dependent upon those statements attributed to the accused is of no weight . . .". Finlayson J.A. found that the trial judge had not erred in her charge to the jury, stating at p. 153 C.R.

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

that "[a]n expert's opinion is admissible in evidence, notwithstanding the absence of proof in some areas relied upon by the expert. However, the weight to be given to the opinion in such cases is diminished, sometimes to the point where the opinion can be given no weight at all." This general proposition was reaffirmed by this court in R. v. Grosse (1996), 29 O.R. (3d) 785, 107 C.C.C. (3d) 97 (C.A.), where this court indicated that an expert opinion based entirely upon inadmissible evidence would itself be entitled to no weight and therefore could not be accepted by the trial judge.

[64] It is clear from the Supreme Court's decision in Lavallee that proof of foundational facts goes to the weight to be accorded to the opinion rather than its admissibility. It follows that, taken in isolation, the appellants' unwillingness to prove in evidence the medical reports upon which they had relied was not a sufficient reason to preclude Ms. Kelly and Ms. Staub from testifying.

[65] The trial judge based his refusal to admit the evidence on his finding that the evidence would have no weight. Ordinarily, this is not the appropriate approach. The question of weight can only be assessed at the close of a party's case; it cannot be assessed prior to an expert witness giving testimony. Further, it is not the law that a party must prove the identical factual foundation relied upon by an expert in formulating an opinion. Indeed, the Supreme Court clearly rejected that proposition in Lavallee.

[66] However, it appears to us that the issues in the case at bar were more complex. The appellants sought to rely upon videotapes as the foundation for the opinions of Ms. Kelly and Ms. Staub rather than the medical reports that served as the basis for the Kelly and Staub reports. The trial judge characterized the matter as an attempt by the appellants to rely upon a different set of facts from the facts that served as a basis for the experts' reports.

[67] While a party might prove the same set of facts from alternative sources, it must also be the case that a party cannot rely upon a different set of facts. This proposition is merely a variation of the basic rule articulated in Lavallee: insofar as a party fails to prove those facts relied upon by an expert in forming his or her opinion, the expert opinion will be entitled to little or no weight.

[68] We are not persuaded that, in light of all the factors before the trial judge, he erred in his approach to the problem he faced. The foundational facts ruling has to be considered in the context of a long and difficult trial and in relation to the trial judge's efforts to manage that trial in an efficient manner. The appellants were in breach of an undertaking and were refusing to prove in evidence the factual foundation of the opinion. It was open to the trial judge to conclude that the observations and conclusions could not be established in any way other than by adducing the medical reports containing those observations and conclusions. The videotapes could only provide evidence of Joel Marchand's present capabilities; they could say nothing about Joel Marchand's future development. The appellants' refusal to prove the medical reports provided a sufficient basis for the trial judge to conclude that the experts' opinions would be entitled to no weight. Given the protracted nature of the tri al and the explicit position taken by the appellants as to what they would and would not prove, we would not interfere with the trial judge's decision not to hear evidence that would be given no weight.

[69] Even if the trial judge did err, the error resulted in no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice. The opinions of Ms. Kelly and Ms. Staub were entitled to little or no weight, given that the factual foundations of their reports had not been proved in evidence. Even if the trial judge had heard the proposed testimony, he could not have accepted it. Finally, this evidence pertained only to damages and would have had no impact on the trial judge's liability findings.

5. Ruling allowing the respondents to correct Dr. Asher's discovery admission

[70] On examination for discovery, the appellants' counsel asked Dr. Asher a number of questions relating to his observations of amniotic fluid during Mrs. Marchand's Caesarean section. The relevant questions and answers are reproduced below. The most important is Q. 596 and Dr. Asher's "admission" of oligohydramnios.

594 Q. Am I correct that at birth this child was observed to suffer the symptoms of oligohydramnios?

A. At birth there was very little amniotic fluid.

595 Q. So am I correct, that's a diagnosis of oligohydramnios?

A. That is the diagnosis, but you said symptoms, didn't you?

596 Q. Sorry. Am I correct this child showed oligohydramnios at birth?

A. Yes.

. . . . .

792 Q. . . . May I take it there was some amniotic fluid?

A. Yes.

793 Q. You have told me very little?

A. I said scant I believe.

. . . . .

801 Q. Would you describe the amount of amniotic fluid? Your report says "very little". You told me today, "scant". Are you able to give me some graphic description of how much? Just a couple of drops . . .

A. No, it would be approximately 300 c.c.'s.

802 Q. And what would the normal amount be?

A. It would be as much as 800 c.c.

. . . . .

810 Q. Am I correct, your record -- your Operative Record does not disclose that there was 300 c.c.'s of amniotic fluid?

A. No, that's a recollection.

811 Q. Okay, so I suggest to you that it could have been 150.

A. You can suggest what you want. My recollection is approximately 300 c.c.'s.

812 Q. No, you're the one who is testifying and yes, I can suggest what I want as long as it's not irresponsible . . .

A. Yes.

813 Q. . . . and I just want . . .

A. Well, I think it's a little -- 150 is a big difference at that level.

814 Q. I understand. Could it have been 200, sir?

A. It wasn't measured so I can't tell you absolutely.

815 Q. So we can't be absolute about the 300.

A. No.

816 Q. And so I suggest to you it could have been 200.

A. No.

817 Q. You think it was more than that.

A. Yes.

[71] After the trial had commenced, counsel for the respondents sent the appellants' counsel a letter correcting a number of the answers given by Dr. Asher on discovery, and withdrawing the "admission" of oligohydramnios. The corrections relevant for present purposes are as follows:

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

596 Q. Sorry. Am I correct this child showed oligohydramnios at birth?

A. There was no oligohydramnios at birth. For a 42-week gestation the amniotic fluid would normally be approximately 250 to 300 cc.

. . . . .

801 Q. You reported very little, you told me today scant. Are you able to give me some graphic description of how much, just a couple of drops?

A. No, it would be approximately 300 cc.

802 Q. And what would the normal amount be?

A. An amniotic fluid volume of 800 cc's would be normal for approximately 40 weeks gestation.

[72] The appellants' counsel objected to the trial judge granting leave for Dr. Asher to correct the answers that he gave on discovery. The appellants argued that they relied on Dr. Asher's "admission" of oligohydramnios and would be prejudiced in the presentation of their case if Dr. Asher changed his admission. The appellants' counsel submitted that Rule 31.09(1) requires a party to correct any incorrect or incomplete answers "forthwith", and that the respondents had failed to comply with this requirement. The appellants' counsel also argued that Dr. Asher's corrections would have affected the examination in-chief of Dr. Manning (who had finished testifying) and would affect the examination in-chief of Dr. Johnson (who had been sent a number of Dr. Asher's discovery answers for consideration).

[73] The trial judge reserved his ruling, but did observe that Dr. Asher's discovery answers would in any event have been subject to clarification by him either on examination-in-chief or on cross-examination. He also noted that, even if the corrections were allowed, the appellants' counsel would be able to cross-examine Dr. Asher extensively on any putative mistake. The trial judge did not make an explicit ruling allowing Dr. Asher to correct his answer on discovery, but he did allow the trial to proceed on the basis that Dr. Asher was free to testify that there was no oligohydramnios.

[74] On cross-examination, Dr. Asher gave the following explanation of his discovery answers and of his corrections:

> A. I was under the mistaken idea that 800 cc of amniotic fluid was, was normal for 42 weeks, and I was actually thinking of a term pregnancy which was 40 weeks, or a pregnancy at the due date which was 40 weeks as -- and actually that's -- the average volume at 40 weeks would be 800 cc, the average volume at 42 weeks would be somewhere between 250 and 300 cc.

[75] The appellants submit that the trial judge erred in allowing the respondents to correct the admission made by Dr. Asher during his examination for discovery and that prejudice inevitably flowed as the appellants' case was premised on an admission of oligohydramnios. The appellants also submit that they suffered prejudice in being required to cross-examine Dr. Asher on his admission and then the subsequent correction.

[76] In our view, the trial judge committed no error in permitting Dr. Asher to correct his discovery evidence for three reasons.

[77] First, Dr. Asher's original discovery answer was not a formal admission. As such, it was always open to him to explain his discovery answer in his testimony. In Sopinka, Lederman and Bryant, The Law of Evidence in Canada, 2d ed. (Toronto: Butterworths, 1999) at pp. 1051-53, the authors distinguish between formal and informal admissions. A formal admission is conclusive as to the matter admitted, and cannot be withdrawn except by leave of the court or the consent of the party in whose favour it was made. The Law of Evidence states at pp. 1051-52 that a formal admission may be made in the following ways:

> (1) by a statement in the pleadings or by failure to deliver pleadings; (2) by an agreed statement of facts filed at the trial; (3) by an oral statement made by counsel at trial, or even counsel's silence in the face of statements made to the trial judge by opposing counsel with the intention that the statements be relied on by the judge; (4) by a letter written by a party's solicitor prior to trial; or (5) by a reply or failure to reply to a request to admit facts.

In contrast, an informal admission does not bind the party making it, if it is overcome by other evidence. That is, a party making an informal admission may later lead evidence to reveal the circumstances under which the admission was made in order to reduce its prejudicial effect.

[78] Dr. Asher's original discovery answer does not constitute a formal admission in the sense described in The Law of Evidence. We note as well that rule 51.05, governing the withdrawal of admissions requiring leave of the court, does not apply to an admission made on examination for discovery.

> 51.05 An admission made in response to a request to admit, a deemed admission under rule 51.03 [failure to respond to a request to admit] or an admission in a pleading may be withdrawn on consent or with leave of the court.

See G.D. Watson and C. Perkins, Holmested and Watson: Ontario Civil Procedure (Toronto: Carswell, 1984) at 3126.

[79] Second, rule 31.09 outlines a party's obligations with respect to information obtained subsequent to an examination for discovery. At the time of trial, rule 31.09 provided:

> 31.09 (1) Where a party has been examined for discovery or a person has been examined for discovery on behalf or in place of, or in addition to the party, and the party subsequently discovers that the answer to a question on the examination,

(a) was incorrect or incomplete when made; or

(b) is no longer correct and complete, the party shall forthwith provide the information in writing to every other party.

(2) Where a party provides information in writing under subrule (1),

(a) the writing may be treated at a hearing as if it formed part of the original examination of the person examined; and

(b) any adverse party may require that the information be verified by affidavit of the party or be the subject of further examination for discovery.

(3) Where a party has failed to comply with subrule (1) or a requirement under clause (2)(b), and the information subsequently discovered is,

(a) favourable to the party's case, the party may not introduce the information at the trial, except with leave of the trial judge; or

(b) not favourable to the party's case, the court may make such order as is just.

[80] Holmested and Watson, supra, describe at 3125 the obligation under rule 31.09 as an ongoing duty to correct and complete the answers given. In general, parties are entitled to correct their discovery answers. The impact of corrections is a matter to be decided by the trial judge, who is entitled to examine both the original and the amended answers: See Machado v. Pratt & Whitney Canada Inc. (1993), 17 C.P.C. (3d) 340 (Ont. Master); Capital Distributing Co. v. Blakey (1997), 33 O.R. (3d) 58, 147 D.L.R. (4th) 372 (Gen. Div.).

[81] Third is the combined effect of rules 31.09 and 53.08. Subrule 31.09(3)(a) provides that, where a party has failed to correct a discovery answer "forthwith", the party may not introduce the evidence except with leave. As noted above in the discussion of the ruling with respect to Dr. Silver, subrule 53.08(d) provides that, where evidence is admissible only with leave under subrule 31.09(3), the trial judge shall grant leave unless to do so will cause prejudice or undue delay. Accordingly, notwithstanding non-compliance with subrule 31.09(3), a trial judge must grant leave unless to do so would cause prejudice that could not be overcome by an adjournment or costs.

[82] With respect to the correction, subrule 31.09(2)(a) provides that a correction "may" be treated as forming part of the original examination. As there was no ruling on the correction, it is unclear whether the correction was, in fact, treated in that manner.

[83] There are circumstances in which a party will not be permitted to correct their discovery answers. In Burke v. Gauthier (1987), 24 C.P.C. (2d) 281 (Ont. H.C.J.), a personal injury action, the plaintiff sought to adduce evidence that his physical condition had substantially changed since his examination for discovery. The plaintiff had given no notice of the new evidence, and the respondents objected to its admission. Campbell J. began by describing the purpose of rule 31.09 at p. 285:

> The purpose of the provision is obvious. The parties prepare for trial on the basis of the evidence given at the discoveries. They assume that the answers given on discovery continue to be correct and complete, unless they are given information to the contrary. They figure out what they have to meet, decide how to prepare their own case, what investigations if any to undertake, what witnesses to call, what instructions to seek, and what kind of settlement might be reasonable, on the basis of the evidence given at the discoveries. If that evidence changes then there is a different case to meet. If the changes are not brought to the attention of the adverse party before trial he has no time or > opportunity to investigate and prepare and consider the need for fresh medical examination and must meet a case different from the one that his opponent has led him to expect.

Campbell J. found that the new evidence changed the nature of the case the respondents had to meet. In considering whether to grant leave, he found that the plaintiff was well aware of the change, and that he had made no attempt to bring the new evidence to the defendant's attention. Accordingly, Campbell J. declined to grant leave. See also Bachalo v. Robson (1995), 35 C.P.C. (3d) 230, 101 Man. R. (2d) 316 (Q.B.).

[84] The present case is distinguishable. The respondents did not put forward a different case at trial. Dr. Asher testified, both on discovery and on cross-examination, that there were approximately 300 c.c. of amniotic fluid. The respondents led evidence at trial that indicated 300 c.c. of amniotic fluid did not constitute oligohydramnios for a pregnancy of 42 weeks. Dr. Asher's original discovery answer, that he thought the "child showed oligohydramnios at birth", even if not corrected or explained, did not require the trial judge to find that there was oligohydramnios. There was ample evidence before the trial judge for him to find, as he did, that there was no oligohydramnios at birth.

[85] Accordingly, we do not accept the argument that the appellants were prejudiced by this ruling. The discovery answer did not amount to a formal admission. Even if the trial judge had not allowed Dr. Asher to correct his discovery answers, Dr. Asher was still entitled to give a different answer at trial and explain the reason for the change in his evidence. The trial judge was entitled to decide which version he accepted. The original discovery answers, the corrected answers, and Dr. Asher's explanations were all before the trial judge. The trial judge was entitled to weigh the differing answers and the explanation in deciding the matter. It is clear from his reasons that he accepted Dr. Asher's explanation and the corrected discovery answer. In our view, it was open to the trial judge to reach this conclusion, and there appears to be no basis to interfere with his ruling on this matter.

[86] We see no error in the manner in which this issue was dealt with by the trial judge.

6. Ruling restricting the cross-examinations of defendants to elicit opinion evidence

[87] The appellants discontinued their action against three respondents -- Nurse Brown-Davidson, Nurse Kroeker and Dr. Awad -- on the condition that they be available at trial for cross-examination. The appellants attempted to lead opinion evidence from these witnesses. On appeal the appellants complained about their inability to lead opinion evidence from Dr. Awad.

[88] The trial judge ruled that the appellants were required to comply with rule 53.03 if they intended to elicit opinion evidence from Dr. Awad. As no rule 53.03 reports had been filed, the appellants were required to seek leave of the court. The trial judge further noted that he was required to give leave unless prejudice would result.

[89] Dr. Awad was the pathologist involved in the treatment of Joel Marchand. The respondents objected to counsel for the appellants leading any opinion evidence from Dr. Awad that was not covered by the reports he had prepared as a treating physician. The trial judge ruled that, unless notice was given or leave was granted, Dr. Awad would not be permitted to give independent opinion evidence concerning the conduct of others, or to express his opinion on the cause of Joel's condition. However, the trial judge stated that there could be no objection to Dr. Awad giving opinion evidence concerning his own reports, provided such evidence was limited to his involvement in the matter.

[90] As the cross-examination proceeded, this ruling was applied to limit the right of the appellants to cross-examine Dr. Awad on his opinion of the nature of the abruption, if any, that had occurred. Before this court, the respondents do not attempt to support this ruling. The respondents conceded before us that as Dr. Awad was a treating physician, this was a permissible line of questioning, and that the trial judge erred in his ruling on the point. In our view, this error did not result in any significant prejudice to the appellants. The appellants presented their own evidence on the nature of the abruption. The trial judge fully considered the appellants' theory and we are not satisfied that Dr. Awad's evidence would have made any difference.

[91] Appellants' counsel sought to cross-examine Nurse Olson with respect to her opinion about the conduct of other respondents -- Nurse Colebrook and Nurse Want -- regarding the use of a fetal heart monitor on July 11, 1991. The respondents objected, arguing that the questions called for inadmissible opinion evidence, and that the respondent could not be qualified as an expert for the purpose of giving opinion evidence.

[92] The trial judge ruled that appellants' counsel was "not entitled to ask Nurse Olson, a party defendant, her opinion concerning the conduct of other defendants". Accordingly, he restricted appellants' counsel to cross-examining Nurse Olson regarding events on July 5, 1991, when she administered the NST to Mrs. Marchand. The trial judge relied on the proposition that a plaintiff cannot on discovery ask one defendant about the conduct of another defendant, and concluded that "if such questions cannot be asked on an examination for discovery I fail to see how such questions can be asked at trial." He then provided the following rationale for his ruling:

> A defendant takes the witness box to defend his or her actions as set out in the pleadings, not to give opinion evidence on issues between the plaintiff and other respondents. The opinion of Nurse Olson on issues between herself and the plaintiffs is relevant to the pleaded issues. Here Mr. Wunder proposes to ask Nurse Olson her opinion on issues which are not pleaded between herself and the plaintiffs.

[93] There is support for the proposition that on an examination for discovery a party cannot obtain an expert opinion from the opposite party about the conduct of another party to the action: See Wade v. Sisters of Saint Joseph of the

Diocese of London (1976), 2 C.P.C. 37 (Ont. H.C.J.); Christoyiannis (Litigation guardian of) v. Benoit, [1998] O.J. No. 5200 (Gen. Div.). As the scope of examination for discovery is wider than cross-examination, as a matter of logic, the proposition ought to apply equally to cross-examination.

[94] Nurse Olson was not qualified as an expert at trial. Like Dr. Awad, Nurse Olson was called to testify about her own involvement in the case. It is necessary, then, to regard Nurse Olson as a lay witness for the purpose of assessing the trial judge's ruling.

[95] As a general proposition, lay witnesses may not testify as to their opinion. However, in R. v. Graat, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 819 at pp. 835-37, 2 C.C.C. (3d) 365 at pp. 378-79, Dickson J. noted that the "line between 'fact' and 'opinion' is not clear". As such, he found "no reason in principle or in common sense why a lay witness should not be permitted to testify in the form of an opinion if, by doing so, he is able more accurately to express the facts he perceived." He stated at p. 379 C.C.C. [p. 837 S.C.R.] that a lay witness would be permitted to give opinion evidence in the following circumstances:

I accept the following passage from Cross on Evidence as a good statement of the law as to the cases in which non-expert opinion is admissible (at p. 448):

> When, in the words of an American judge, "the facts from which a witness received an impression were too evanescent in their nature to be recollected, or too complicated to be separately and distinctly narrated", a witness may state his opinion or impression. . . .

[96] The rationale for admitting opinion evidence in such circumstances is that "it may be difficult for the witness to narrate his factual observations individually." Thus, witnesses are allowed to state their opinions because they "had an opportunity for personal observation", and "were in a position to give the court real help".

[97] The impugned line of questioning went beyond Nurse Olson's personal involvement in the case. She was asked for her opinion on the conduct of other respondents. Nurse Olson was not being asked to state an opinion in order "more accurately to express the facts [she] perceived". The proposed testimony fell outside of the basis for admissibility set out in Graat, supra, and, in our view, was properly disallowed.

7. Rulings preventing impeachment of witnesses on read-ins

[98] Nurse Colebrook was asked a number of questions on examination for discovery about her ability to reach Mrs. Marchand's cervix during her vaginal examination on admission to hospital. Nurse Colebrook stated that she was unable to reach Mrs. Marchand's cervix because it was posterior. She also stated that Mrs. Marchand was tense. These questions and answers were read in as part of the appellants' case.

[99] On cross-examination, counsel for the appellants suggested that Nurse Colebrook was unable to reach Mrs. Marchand's cervix because Mrs. Marchand was tense and not because her cervix was posterior. Nurse Colebrook testified that while Mrs. Marchand was in fact tense, she could not reach her cervix because it was posterior. Counsel for the respondents objected to this line of questioning on the ground that appellants' counsel was attempting to contradict the answers he had read in from Nurse Colebrook's discovery.

[100] The trial judge acknowledged that rule 31.11(4) entitled appellants' counsel to rebut discovery evidence read into the record, but interpreted the rule to mean "that such contradiction must be through another witness or by other admissible evidence apart from the evidence of the defendant who was examined for discovery." He ruled as follows:

> In my view the evidence read into the record cannot be contradicted by cross-examining the author of the statement that was read into the record in an attempt to discredit the very evidence which [counsel] made part of the plaintiff's case.

[101] Rule 31.11 governs the use of examination for discovery at trial. The relevant portions of rule 31.11 provide as follows:

> 31.11 (1) At the trial of an action, a party may read into evidence as part of the party's own case against an adverse party any part of the evidence given on the examination for discovery of,
>
> (a) the adverse party; or
>
> (b) a person examined for discovery on behalf or in place of, or in addition to the adverse party, unless the trial judge orders otherwise,
>
> if the evidence is otherwise admissible, whether the party or person has already given evidence or not.
>
> . . . . .
> (4) A party who reads into evidence as part of the party's own case evidence given on an examination for discovery of an adverse party, or a person examined for discovery on behalf or in place of or in addition to an adverse party, may rebut that evidence by introducing any other admissible evidence.

[102] It is clear from the wording of rule 31.11 that a party may read any part of an adverse party's examination for discovery into evidence as part of his or her own case. Moreover, it is also clear that that party is entitled to rebut that evidence by introducing any other admissible evidence. In their discussion of the predecessor to rule 31.11, Holmested and Gale, Ontario Judicature Act and Rules of Practice (Scarborough: Carswell, 1983) at p. 1767, affirm this last proposition:

> If a party, as part of his own case, puts in evidence unfavourable to him from the discovery of the opposite party and does not contradict it, he may be bound by it, but he may contradict that which is unfavourable by other evidence and in the circumstances of the particular case may accept or > reject such portions as he shall see fit, including the evidence given on discovery. . . . There is no general rule that a party putting in discovery is bound by the answers. If a party, as part of his own case, puts in unfavourable evidence from the discovery of an opposite party, he may contradict it by other evidence . . .

[103] There appears to be no case directly deciding whether a party is entitled to contradict discovery answers read into evidence during cross-examination of the declarant. This is hardly surprising as, for obvious tactical reasons, it will be rare for a party to read in an answer and then seek to impeach the declarant on that very answer.

[104] The wording of rule 31.11(4) does not limit a party's right to rebut discovery answers. Rule 31.11(4) states that a party "may rebut that evidence by introducing any other admissible evidence" [emphasis added]. The words "that evidence" refer to the discovery answers read into evidence. In our view, the words "any other admissible evidence" must refer to any evidence other than the discovery answers read into evidence. We can see no reason in principle to prevent a party from attempting to contradict an adverse party's discovery answers by cross-examining the adverse party.

[105] In our view, the trial judge erred in ruling that appellants' counsel could not attempt to contradict Nurse Colebrook's discovery answers by cross-examining her on those answers. However, it is also our view that no prejudice flowed from the trial judge's erroneous ruling. Counsel objected only after the question was asked and Nurse Colebrook reiterated what she had said on discovery. It is highly unlikely that further cross-examination would have elicited evidence helpful to the appellants.

[106] The real source of prejudice, if any, to the appellants was the tactical decision to read in the answers that Nurse Colebrook gave on discovery. Having read those answers in, the appellants risked that a finding would be made unless they could contradict those answers by other evidence. It was unlikely, as a practical matter, that those answers could have been effectively contradicted by cross-examining the declarant. Justice Gordon's comment in Collins v. Belgian Dry Cleaners, Dyers and Furriers Ltd., [1952] 1 D.L.R. 712, 4 W.W.R. (N.S.) 241 at p. 244 (Sask. C.A.) is apposite:

> It is perfectly true that . . . a party has been permitted to adduce evidence contradicting parts of the examination for discovery of his opponent put in at the trial. I still cannot understand why counsel still persist in tendering in evidence questions and answers from their opponent's examination for discovery which are diametrically opposed to their client's contention.

8. Ruling prohibiting demonstrative evidence

[107] In the course of his examination in-chief of Dr. Fields, appellants' counsel sought to refer the witness to an enlargement of the test strip produced by the NST administered on July 5, 1990. Counsel for Dr. Asher objected to its use on the grounds that (a) the enlargement was of poor quality and omitted essential details, and (b) the observations that Dr. Fields might make about the enlargement would likely differ from the observations the defendant nurses could make about the originals. Counsel for the nurses and the hospital endorsed those objections, and made the further objection that (c) Dr. Fields was precluded from testifying about the NST strip by the trial judge's ruling limiting Dr. Fields' testimony.

[108] The trial judge ruled that Dr. Fields could comment on the original NST strip, or a copy the same size as the original, but that he could not comment on the enlargement. The rationale for the ruling was that the respondent nurses did not have the enlargement, and that it would not assist the court if Dr. Fields were able to observe something on the enlargement not observable from the original.

[109] It is well established that a decision whether to admit demonstrative evidence is within the discretion of the trial judge: see Draper v. Jacklyn, [1970] S.C.R. 92, 9 D.L.R. (3d) 264 and Shipman v. Antoniadis (1975), 8 O.R. (2d) 449, 58 D.L.R. (3d) 321 (C.A.). We see no basis for interfering with the trial judge's ruling.

[110] In any event, the ruling could not have affected the outcome of the trial. The original NST strip was already before the court. Dr. Fields was permitted to comment on the original NST strip and the appellants were not prevented from adducing evidence on the matter. This was not a case where a party sought to enter demonstrative evidence to assist a jury in their fact-finding function. The trial was being heard by judge alone, and the trial judge had a copy of the NST strip before him.

9. Ruling permitting cross-examination of Mrs. Kwolek

[111] Mrs. Kwolek, a registered nurse, was called by counsel for the respondent nurses and the hospital as an expert witness. The appellants objected to counsel for Dr. Asher cross-examining witnesses called by counsel for the other respondents on the ground that there was a similarity of interest between the respondent nurses, the hospital, and Dr. Asher.

[112] The trial judge ruled that counsel for Dr. Asher had the right to cross-examine Mrs. Kwolek. He stated that paras. 14 and 27 of the statement of claim were a complete answer to the objection, as the statement of claim pleaded that the medical respondents -- i.e., Dr. Asher -- were responsible for the conduct of the nurses.

[113] The right to confront and interrogate an adverse witness is regarded as a fundamental right of parties to a trial. However, in certain circumstances a party will not be permitted to put leading questions in cross-examination to a witness called by an adverse party. The Law of Evidence sets out these circumstances at p. 940:

> . . . In cases where there are co-defendants with similar interests who have pleaded separately and are represented by different counsel, a trial judge has a discretion to refuse to allow counsel for one defendant to cross-examine a co-defendant's witnesses. If, however, the interests of the parties are not similar, separate counsel are usually allowed to cross-examine a co-defendant or that co-defendant's witnesses.

[114] It is necessary, then, to determine whether the respondent nurses were adverse in interest to Dr. Asher.

[115] The statement of claim pleads that the respondent doctors were responsible for the conduct of the nurses. The doctors would undoubtedly seek to establish that they were not negligent; rather, any negligence was the sole responsibility of the nurses. The nurses would undoubtedly seek to establish that they were not negligent and that any negligence was the sole responsibility of the doctors. Accordingly, based upon the appellants' statement of claim, the respondent nurses and Dr. Asher were adverse in interest.

[116] In their statement of defence, the nurses denied that the doctors were responsible for their conduct, and denied that they were negligent. The nurses stated that they had no knowledge of the negligence alleged to have been committed by the doctors. The hospital and nurses crossclaimed against the medical respondents, and relied upon the allegations contained in the appellants' statement of claim. Similarly, the medical respondents, in their statement of defence, denied all allegations contained in the statement of claim, and crossclaimed against the hospital and nurses.

[117] In view of the pleadings, the trial judge properly concluded that there was an adversity of interest and he properly allowed counsel for Dr. Asher to cross-examine Nurse Kwolek.

B. Uneven Application of Evidentiary Rulings

[118] The appellants submit that the uneven application of certain evidentiary rulings provides further indication of bias on the part of the trial judge.

1. Ruling relating to Dr. Tithecott

[119] The respondents called Dr. Tithecott, a treating physician, as a witness. Dr. Tithecott was asked questions regarding the cord gases, and the inferences he drew from them for the purpose of resuscitating Joel Marchand. He was also asked about the significance of the "marked metabolic acidosis" that Joel Marchand's cord gases displayed. Dr. Tithecott testified that the acidosis "indicated to me that the child had suffered a severe event a short time before delivery". Counsel for the appellants objected on the grounds that (a) Dr. Tithecott was being asked to give opinion evidence, (b) no notice of that opinion had been given to the appellants, (c) counsel for the respondents was obliged to comply with rule 53.03, and (d) Dr. Tithecott ought to be confined to the "four corners of his report". Appellants' counsel was particularly concerned about Dr. Tithecott giving evidence about the timing of the severe event.

[120] The trial judge allowed the examination to proceed. The appellants contend that this ruling is inconsistent with the Awad ruling. Like Dr. Awad, Dr. Tithecott was not a "rule 53.03 witness". Dr. Tithecott was called as a witness of fact, not as an expert witness. Thus, insofar as Dr. Tithecott was testifying about the facts of his own involvement, or the opinions that went to the exercise of his judgment, rule 53.03 was not engaged. We have found that the trial judge erred in applying rule 53.03 to limit the cross-examination of Dr. Awad. However, it is our view that a number of factors distinguish the situation with respect to Dr. Tithecott sufficiently to explain any difference in the manner the trial judge dealt with his evidence. The appellants had substantial notice of this area of questioning by way of: Dr. Tithecott's examinations for discovery, his responses to requests to admit, and the report that he made contemporaneously with his examination of Joel Marchand. Another distinguishing point i s that the trial judge took into account the appellants' right of reply in assessing whether there was any prejudice. In our view, there is no merit to the submission that the trial judge's ruling on this issue indicates bias or an unwillingness to apply the same standard to the respondents as he had applied to the appellants.

2. Rulings relating to Dr. Smith

[121] The appellants complain of two rulings with respect to Dr. Smith. Dr. Smith prepared three reports. The first ruling concerned his third report, filed by the respondents 10 months before Dr. Smith testified, and some four months after Dr. Manning had testified. The report dealt with different blood gas orders. The trial judge ruled that Dr. Smith could testify about his third report. The second ruling permitted counsel for Dr. Asher to ask Dr. Smith to comment on testimony given by Dr. Whyte in cross-examination. The first ruling is said to be inconsistent with the Silver ruling and the second with the Fields ruling.

[122] In our view, there is no merit to these submissions. The trial judge distinguished the Silver ruling on several grounds. It became apparent that appellants' counsel was aware that there were two different blood gas orders and could have raised the matter with Dr. Manning. Accordingly, the trial judge ruled that he was not taken by surprise and that Dr. Smith could give evidence about the contents of the third report. The trial judge also differentiated the Silver ruling from the present situation, noting that Dr. Smith's third report was delivered 10 months before the defence started. Moreover, even if something new was raised by the defence it could be addressed through the appellants' right of reply.

[123] The second ruling concerning Dr. Smith was also correct. It is well established that an expert witness can be asked to comment on the opinion of another expert: see Quantrill v. Alcan-Colony Contracting Co. (1978), 18 O.R. (2d) 333 (C.A.).

3. Ruling relating to Dr. Eyman

[124] Dr. Eyman was called by the respondent, Dr. Asher, to give expert evidence on the issue of Joel Marchand's life expectancy. Dr. Eyman had prepared two reports on the issue of damages. The first report was dated November 12, 1993 and was prepared on the basis of materials sent to Dr. Eyman by the respondents. The second report was dated May 5, 1994 and was prepared after Dr. Eyman attended a physical examination of

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

Joel Marchand conducted by two other physicians, and viewed four hours of videotapes of Joel Marchand. The second report was based upon Dr. Eyman's own observations and the observations of the two other physicians.

[125] During the voir dire on the foundational facts issue, Dr. Eyman was asked what materials he was sent and what materials he relied upon. He could not recall precisely what materials he relied upon. The appellants submitted that, in accordance with the foundational facts ruling, the respondents were required to prove all the documents Dr. Eyman had been given. The trial judge rejected this argument.

[126] The trial judge differentiated his ruling with respect to Dr. Eyman from his rulings with respect to Ms. Kelly and Ms. Staub. He characterized his rulings with respect to Ms. Kelly and Ms. Staub as a response to the appellants' attempts to rely upon a different set of facts from those relied upon by Ms. Kelly and Ms. Staub. In contrast, his ruling with respect to Dr. Eyman was based on the respondents having proven the same set of facts relied upon by Dr. Eyman, albeit through different means.

[127] Dr. Eyman's reports appeared to be based on factual observations; for example, whether Joel Marchand could crawl. Observations of this nature would be capable of proof through various sources. It appears to us that in the Eyman ruling, the trial judge characterized the appellants' position concerning Ms. Kelly's and Ms. Staub's reports as an attempt to rely upon "X, Y, Z" rather than "A, B, C" where the experts had relied upon "A, B, C" in preparing their reports. We have already found that to the extent the trial judge limited the right of the appellants to establish the same foundational facts relied on by Ms. Kelly and Ms. Staub through different means, he erred. However, as the Eyman ruling indicates, the trial judge was endeavouring to be consistent. If he erred in the application of the Kelly and Staub rulings, any error he committed falls well short of an indication of bias or a predisposition to favour the respondents.

C. Conclusion on the Evidentiary Rulings

[128] We conclude that the evidentiary rulings of the trial judge and the manner in which they were applied do not support the contention that the appellants were denied the opportunity to fairly present their case, nor did these rulings create a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the trial judge. The trial judge's rulings were carefully considered and reflect, in our view, a sincere and diligent effort to conduct a fair trial. We have concluded that virtually all of the impugned rulings were correctly decided. The very few errors we have identified were inconsequential and even viewed cumulatively did not result in any significant prejudice to the appellants. Accordingly, this ground of appeal is dismissed.

III. DID THE TRIAL JUDGE'S CONDUCT OF THE TRIAL RAISE A REASONABLE APPREHENSION OF BIAS?

[129] The appellants' main contention on the appeal is that the trial judge's conduct of the trial raised a reasonable apprehension of bias towards them. They submit that throughout the trial defence counsel were insulting, hostile, discourteous and rude to their counsel, Mr. Wunder, and indeed to Mrs. Marchand, and yet the trial judge condoned this behaviour, never restraining or controlling it. The appellants submit that, by itself, the trial judge's refusal to restrain defence counsel raises a reasonable apprehension of bias. The appellants also submit that the trial judge showed hostility to Mr. Wunder, that he interfered in Mr. and Mrs. Marchand's presentation of the case, and that, in his reasons, he unfairly judged the credibility of Mrs. Marchand. All of this conduct, the appellants contend, further supports their claim of judicial bias.

[130] The trial judge's conduct, which the appellants submit cumulatively amounts to judicial bias, can conveniently be discussed under the following six categories, of which the first is by far the most serious:

(1) the trial judge refused to restrain defence counsel's repeated attacks on Mr. Wunder's integrity and competence;

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

(2) the trial judge refused to control defence counsel's inappropriate treatment of Mrs. Marchand;

(3) the trial judge prevented the appellants from fairly presenting their case by his one-sided interventions;

(4) the trial judge on one occasion talked with defence counsel in the absence of appellants' counsel;

(5) the trial judge unfairly criticized Mr. Wunder; and

(6) the trial judge showed antipathy to Mrs. Marchand in his reasons for judgment.

[131] Before considering this ground of appeal, we will briefly review the principles that apply to a claim of judicial bias. These principles, now well established, have recently been summarized by the Supreme Court of Canada in R. v. S. (R.D.), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 484, 118 C.C.C. (3d) 353. They are as follows:

1. All adjudicative tribunals owe a duty of fairness to the parties who appear before them. The scope of the duty and the rigour with which the duty is applied vary with the nature of the tribunal. Courts, however, should be held to the highest standards of impartiality.

2. Impartiality reflects a state of mind in which the judge is disinterested in the outcome and is open to persuasion by the evidence and submissions. In contrast, bias reflects a state of mind that is closed or predisposed to a particular result on material issues.

3. "Fairness and impartiality must be both subjectively present and objectively demonstrated to the informed and reasonable observer. If the words or actions of the presiding judge give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias to the informed and reasonable observer, this will render the trial unfair." (at p. 524 S.C.R.)

4. The test for bias contains a twofold objective standard: the person considering the alleged bias must be reasonable and informed; and the apprehension of bias must itself be reasonable. In the words of de Grandpr J. in Committee for Justice and Liberty v. Canada (National Energy Board), [1978] 1 S.C.R. 369 at p. 394, 68 D.L.R. (3d) 716, approved of by the Supreme Court of Canada in S. (R.D.), supra:

> [T]he apprehension of bias must be a reasonable one, held by reasonable and right-minded persons, applying themselves to the question and obtaining thereon the required information. . . . [The] test is "what would an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically -- and having thought the matter through -- conclude. . . ."

5. The party alleging bias has the onus of proving it on the balance of probabilities.

6. Prejudgment of the merits, prejudgment of credibility, excessive and one-sided interventions with counsel or in the examination of witnesses and the reasons themselves may show bias. The court must decide whether the relevant considerations taken together give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias.

7. The threshold for a finding of actual or apprehended bias is high. Courts presume that judges will carry out their oath of office. Thus, to make out an allegation of judicial bias requires cogent evidence. Suspicion is not enough. The threshold is high because a finding of bias calls into question not just the personal integrity of the judge but the integrity of the entire administration of justice.

8. Nonetheless, if the judge's words or conduct give rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias, it colours the entire trial and cannot be cured by the correctness of the subsequent decision. Therefore, on appeal, a finding of actual or apprehended bias will ordinarily result in a new trial.

[132] The respondents deny that either the words or the conduct of the trial judge gave rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias. They submit, in the alternative, that the appellants waived their right to claim judicial bias and should be precluded from doing so on appeal. In support of their submission on waiver, they say that an allegation of bias should be raised at the first available opportunity, and that instead the appellants waited until 19 months after the completion of the evidence and three months after the release of the reasons for judgment. They also point out that the appellants opposed four mistrial motions brought by the defence during the trial and that the appellants insisted the trial judge hear their own motion for a mistrial (because of the alleged perjury of a witness) even while their motion to recuse the trial judge for bias was pending. [See Note 2 at end of document] It is unnecessary for us to consider this alternative submission of waiver in the light of our conclusion that the appellants' claim of judicial bias fails on its merits.

[133] We therefore turn to the appellants' allegation of judicial bias, applying the legal principles we summarized to the six categories of bias raised by the appellants.

1. The Trial Judge Refused to Restrain Defence Counsel's Repeated Attacks on Mr. Wunder's Integrity and Competence

[134] This is the appellants' main submission in support of their allegation of judicial bias. They submit that throughout the 165 days of trial, defence counsel repeatedly accused their counsel, Mr. Wunder, of manipulating evidence; of deliberately misinforming witnesses and feeding them answers through objections during cross-examination; of deliberately flouting, subverting and ignoring the rules of practice; and of showing contempt for the trial judge and his rulings. They contend that the trial judge failed to restrain defence counsel's repeated attacks on Mr. Wunder's integrity and competence, and by not restraining it, the trial judge condoned it and lent the weight of his office to the defence position. Thus, the appellants argue that the trial judge's failure to restrain defence counsel's attacks on Mr. Wunder gave rise to apprehended bias.

[135] The record shows that from early on in the trial, any degree of trust between Mr. Wunder, on the one hand, and Mr. Tait, counsel for Dr. Asher, and Mr. Liswood, counsel for the hospital and nurses, on the other, had completely vanished, to be replaced by a level of rancour and hostility rarely, if ever, seen in an Ontario courtroom. The record also amply supports the appellants' contention that Mr. Tait repeatedly attacked Mr. Wunder's integrity and competence. Comments about counsel that have no place in any courtroom infected this trial from start to finish. The following examples should adequately give the flavour of what took place.

[136] Mr. Tait accused Mr. Wunder of "a complete lack of integrity"; of cheating and intentionally defying the rules of practice; of using the right to object to cross-examination "to suggest answers to every witness who has come into this courtroom"; of abuses of the Rules of Civil Procedure; of using and abusing solicitor-client privilege as a "mask for deception", to "conceal misconduct", "as a manipulative device", "to conceal the devices by which the evidence of witnesses is manipulated" and as a "shield for deceit"; of "manipulating" the evidence and facts; of deliberately misinforming an expert witness; of "flatly lying" to the court; of deliberately misleading the court, showing contempt for the court, defying and deceiving the court about the evidence of Dr. Whyte; of "trickery" and "sleight of hand"; and of committing an outrage on the court. Mr. Tait told the trial judge that he (Mr. Tait) [was] wrong to assume Mr. Wunder was competent and would comply with the Rules of Civil Procedure, and he ev en suggested that Mrs. Marchand made a mistake in choosing Mr. Wunder as her counsel.

[137] The following two passages typify the tenor of Mr. Tait's verbal attacks on Mr. Wunder:

> I don't want to leave today . . . without at least indicating to Your Honour, the sense of total outrage, that a deceitful, legal mind could possibly invent so preposterous a distortion of the judicial process; a complete violation of every principle of Ashmore that he has so freely adopted.
>
> . . . . .

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

> This is a profound disgrace. I invite Your Honour to reread Ashmore tonight and I invite you to tell Mr. Wunder to take this argument to the Court of Appeal if he wishes, but it will not be heard in this court.
>
> . . . . .
>
> It wasn't for me to say that I disagreed with the ruling. We accept it and we went on. But to come forward with this kind of scurrilous manipulation, of which -- of what, for Mr. Wunder was essentially a break, a break that he so genuinely didn't expect that he invited you to rule last week.
>
> . . . This is scurrilous and this is disgraceful and I ask Your Honour not to countenance it.
>
> . . . . .
> Mr. Wunder has abused the rules of practice and his obligations as counsel in respect of this particular witness at every turn. And the rules of practice and the relief they provide for honest counsel are not there as an excuse to permit unchecked grossly improper manipulation of the whole litigation process.

[138] Mr. Tait was not alone in his criticisms of Mr. Wunder. Mr. Liswood, too, maligned the appellants' counsel. He accused Mr. Wunder of manipulating, abusing and making a mockery of the judicial system; of using the Rules of Civil Procedure as an "excuse to permit unchecked grossly improper manipulation of the whole litigation process"; of "flagrantly subverting" the Rules of Civil Procedure; of "suppressing" facts and information from the defence; of "contrivance and manipulation" in the delivery of expert reports; of continually withdrawing from his commitments; and of violating Rule 10 of the Rules of Professional Conduct by knowingly attempting to deceive the court and by knowingly misstating the contents of documents.

[139] We do not intend to suggest that this conduct was all one-sided. On occasion, Mr. Wunder acted in a similar way. But

Mr. Tait and Mr. Liswood must accept most of the responsibility for conduct that by any reasonable standards of civility was unacceptable for any counsel, let alone senior counsel who should know better.

[140] In this court, Mr. Ortved and Mr. Curry, who acted for Dr. Asher, made no attempt to defend Mr. Tait's conduct or to substantiate any of Mr. Tait's many allegations against Mr. Wunder. Instead, they candidly acknowledged that Mr. Tait's conduct toward Mr. Wunder had fallen below an acceptable standard. Mr. Liswood also acknowledged that his own conduct at trial had been unacceptable. We have little doubt that the appellants must have found the repeated maligning of their counsel unsettling, to say the least.

[141] The unprofessional conduct of counsel is a matter for the Law Society of Upper Canada. The issue before us, however, centres not on the conduct of counsel but its impact on the fairness of the trial. Our focus centres on the conduct of the trial judge. The question we must answer is whether an informed person viewing the matter realistically would conclude that the way the trial judge dealt with defence counsel's attacks on Mr. Wunder created a reasonable apprehension of bias and thus deprived the appellants of a fair trial. We are not persuaded that the trial judge's conduct supports a finding of bias.

[142] There are three answers to the appellants' submission that a reasonable apprehension of bias arises from the trial judge's refusal to restrain or control defence counsel. First, the trial judge did not remain silent about counsel's conduct. He intervened in the trial. On the fifteenth day of the trial, November 16, 1993, Mr. Tait accused Mr. Wunder of manipulating the schedule of witnesses to give one of the appellants' experts, Dr. Fields, time to repair his evidence. Mr. Wunder objected to this characterization of his conduct. The trial judge responded:

> Look, he says a lot of things and you say a lot of things. I do not pay a whole lot of attention to what you are saying on those matters. Now, let us just proceed with this.

[143] The following day, Mr. Tait protested that in his 27 years of practice he had "never been so badly treated by any other counsel". He added that he had "never met the equal of Mr. Wunder for ignoring his obligations". This time, the trial judge replied at length, in an attempt to change the atmosphere of the trial. He urged counsel to stop their "interminable fighting" and he emphasized the need for civility in the courtroom:

> Let me say this that it struck me last night as I reflected upon what I considered to be a rather lengthy day. We had some rather strenuous debates about certain matters that we should never lose sight of why we are here. It strikes me that what we are here to do is to try this issue fairly, make sure we try it fairly to all parties, and to achieve that there has to be full and complete disclosure. Having practiced in those days when you did not make disclosure unless you had to, I know what it is like. But those are not what we are doing today. These cases are far too complex for that.
> I am also struck, as I read in the latest issue of the Canadian Lawyer, somebody was interviewing the former Attorney General, Ian Scott, and he said that the only thing that makes litigation is good manners. Somehow there's a lack of manners in this trial and I do not suggest to point a finger at anyone. I think it is important, we are going to be here for another few weeks. We are into our fifth week and there is no reason why we cannot all act like gentlemen in the courtroom. We can stop sniping at each other. If anybody thinks that there has been prejudice as a result of a lack of disclosure, they can politely argue strenuously, but politely argue rule 53.08 and 31.07, all deal with the matter. If anybody thinks that as a result of the lack of disclosure that they have been prejudiced and they want an adjournment, I am going to grant it. I make it abundantly clear right now that I am going to do my utmost to make sure that this matter is fairly dealt with. We have a plaintiff here who is entit led to have her action heard before this court. She wants to have it heard whether she is right or wrong. We will not know until the case, but she will have heard, and so will Dr.

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

Asher and so will the nurses. They are entitled to that. So I just urge you all, let us get along. Let us try and move along with this case. It is going to be long enough without this interminable fighting.

. . . . .

Let us move on but let us not conduct ourselves in a manner in which it really does not place the legal profession in a good light. We have a tough enough issue as it is to try now. Let us move forward.

[144] Unfortunately, the trial judge's exemplary words seemed to have had little effect. Soon after, Mr. Tait again disparaged Mr. Wunder's ability:

. . . Mr. Wunder is a counsel who lectures the profession and writes books about trial preparation. He's a senior counsel. He's entitled to style himself a Queen's Counsel and while I have a dim view as to his appreciation of the contents of the Rules of Practice, that is no excuse for adjourning a trial.

[145] The appellants complain that though the trial judge's intervention on November 17, 1993 was salutary, after that day and indeed for the rest of the trial, the trial judge never tried to restrain defence counsel. This complaint is not entirely correct because on February 9, 1994, during an interchange with Mr. Percival (acting for Mr. Wunder on a motion), the trial judge again commented on counsel's conduct:

Mr. Percival: I am sorry, I wish I could be more helpful to you on that issue, but as I said, I felt that that was the address because I saw, I thought to a certain extent there was some very, I thought, intemperate and rather strong language utilized by Mr. Liswood, condemning the conduct of Mr. . . .

The Court: There has been a lot of strong language in this trial . . .

Mr. Percival: Well, I'm not going to try to get into it.

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

The Court: . . . Mr. Percival on both sides, and I keep reminding counsel of what the former Attorney General said, that only good manners makes litigation bearable.

Mr. Percival: I understand.

The Court: And that falls on deaf ears from time to time in this trial.

Mr. Percival: And I know that this has been a very difficult trial. I've seen some of the transcripts. I certainly have not had the opportunity to do it all, and as I said to you before, this has been a very difficult case I think for everybody, quite apart from your Honour.

[146] Although the appellants say that the trial judge should have done more, his observations both in November 1993 and in February 1994 at least show that he was not oblivious to what was taking place and that he tried to control counsel's conduct.

[147] Second, the failure of the trial judge to do more to restrain or control defence counsel does not automatically indicate judicial bias. We recognize that other trial judges might well have dealt with the acrimony in the courtroom differently, and perhaps more effectively. This trial judge chose to be relatively passive, indeed, probably too passive. He was well aware of the acrimony and chose largely to ignore [it].

[148] Just as civility in the courtroom is very much the responsibility of counsel, it is also very much the responsibility of the trial judge. It is [a] shared responsibility of profound importance to the administration of justice and its standing in the eyes of the public it serves. Unfortunately, we have no doubt that the failure to satisfactorily discharge this responsibility in this case tarnished the reputation of the administration of justice. This case underlines the importance being given by leaders of the bench and bar to improving civility in the courtroom.

[149] However for this court, the question must be whether in light of what went on in the courtroom there was a reasonable apprehension of bias on the part of the trial judge, thus depriving the appellants of a fair trial. Nothing in the trial record or in the trial judge's reasons suggests that he condoned defence counsel's conduct or lent the weight of his office to the defence position. A review of the transcripts establishes that counsel's conduct had no effect on the trial judge's efforts to fairly judge the case before him. The trial judge's reasons are thorough and present a fair and balanced consideration of all the contentious issues in the trial. In short, we do not think that an informed and reasonable observer looking realistically at the trial unfolding would apprehend from the trial judge's conduct that he was biased, or unfair in adjudicating this case.

[150] Third, and admittedly a less important answer to the appellants' submission, is that most of the acrimonious language and most of the attacks on Mr. Wunder occurred during submissions on motions, not during the presentation of evidence. This, in our view, is one reason why defence counsel's conduct had no impact on the appellants' fair presentation of their case.

[151] To conclude this ground of appeal, although we deplore the conduct of defence counsel, the appellants have not shown that the way the trial judge dealt with defence counsel's attacks on Mr. Wunder gave rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias.

2. The Trial Judge Refused to Control Defence Counsel's Inappropriate Treatment of Mrs. Marchand

[152] The appellants submit that defence counsel's conduct towards Mrs. Marchand was inappropriate and went unchecked by the trial judge. The appellants rely on five examples of inappropriate conduct. The first two examples show defence counsel in an unflattering light. However, none of the examples suggest judicial bias. We will deal briefly with each of them:

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

(a) During Mrs. Marchand's first day of testimony, Mr. Tait commented to Mr. Liswood, "She's a liar." This unfortunate comment was said loud enough for Mrs. Marchand to hear it and loud enough for the court reporter to record it. However, the trial judge did not hear the comment and, once apprised of it, he neither condoned nor accepted it.

(b) The appellants submit that Mr. Tait and Mr. Liswood taunted Mrs. Marchand with deprecating facial expressions from the counsel table. The record suggests that defence counsel rolled their eyes, smiled and laughed out loud during parts of Mrs. Marchand's cross-examination. Defence counsel's conduct again was unprofessional but, in our view, did not affect the fairness of the trial.

(c) The appellants contend that Mr. Tait taunted Mr. and Mrs. Marchand by gratuitously reminding them again and again that their son Joel had almost no brain tissue. We find no merit in this contention. Throughout the trial, Mr. Tait accepted that Joel Marchand had suffered a tragic injury. In our view, neither the phrasing nor the tone nor the content of his cross-examination of Mr. and Mrs. Marchand was objectionable. The issues in the case required the defence to explore Joel's brain function, his ability to see and whether he could play with a computer. As the trial judge pointed out to Mrs. Marchand, questioning on these issues was relevant to Joel's life expectancy and to the appellants' damages claim. The absence of any objection to this questioning from the appellants' counsel is perhaps the best evidence that the cross-examination was not unfair.

(d) The appellants also submit that on cross-examination defence counsel harassed Mrs. Marchand for being unable to remember her last menstrual period in September 1989. The defence undoubtedly conducted a tough, aggressive cross-examination but, in our view, not a harassing cross-examination. Joel's expected due date and its relationship to Mrs. Marchand's menstrual period was an important issue at trial, and Mrs. Marchand had previously given five different answers about when her last menstrual period occurred. Again, Mr. Wunder did not object either to the tone or to the length of the cross-examination on this issue. In a trial where both sides made frequent objections and interjections, the lack of an objection on this issue is a good indicator that this complaint now made has little substance.

(e) Finally, the appellants submit that defence counsel insulted and belittled Mrs. Marchand during their cross-examination of her. As we have said, the cross-examination was at times aggressive, apparently even loud. But we do not consider it to have been unfair. Mr. Wunder did at one point ask the trial judge to ask Mr. Tait to "keep his tone down and not be rude to the witness". The trial judge refused, commenting that he did not think Mr. Tait had been rude but that if Mrs. Marchand was being intimidated he would intervene. In the light of this observation and our review of the entire cross-examination of Mrs. Marchand, we cannot find anything in the words or the conduct of the trial judge that would reasonably suggest that he was biased.

3. The Trial Judge Prevented the Appellants from Fairly Presenting Their Case by His One-Sided Interventions

[153] The appellants submit that the trial judge intervened excessively during Mr. Wunder's cross-examination of witnesses and by doing so, prevented the appellants from fairly presenting their case. Before discussing the interventions the appellants rely on, we will briefly review the legal principles that apply to this submission.

[154] A trial judge is not required to sit mute and listen to evidence without commenting or interjecting. A trial judge has the right, indeed the duty, to intervene to clarify and understand the evidence or to control the trial, provided that in intervening, the trial judge does not interfere with the fair presentation of the evidence and does not prejudge the issues in dispute or the credibility of the witnesses. The limits on the trial judge's right to intervene were concisely set out by Evans J.A. in Majcenic v. Natale, [1968] 1 O.R. 189

> . . . I can appreciate that on occasion it is not only desirable but necessary that the trial Judge question the witnesses for the purpose of clarification of the evidence and I do not consider that he is solely an umpire or arbitrator in the proceedings. There is a limit however to the intervention and when the intervention is of such a nature that it impels one to conclude that the trial Judge is directing examination or cross-examination in such a manner as to constitute possible injustice to either party, then such intervention becomes interference and is improper.

[155] The appellants submit that the trial judge in this case crossed the permissible limits of intervention. We disagree. The appellants gave several examples of what they claimed were one-sided interventions by the trial judge during Mr. Wunder's cross-examination. These examples were put forward to show that the trial judge unfairly intervened to articulate a defence position or that he disrupted the appellants' presentation to a degree that raised a reasonable apprehension of bias. We will review the most salient examples, most of which were not objected to at the time and none of which, in our view, supports the appellants' submissions.

[156] The appellants point to an intervention by the trial judge during the cross-examination of Dr. Asher. Mr. Wunder was trying to impeach Dr. Asher on his discovery evidence, and defence counsel objected that Mr. Wunder had not done so properly. The trial judge intervened, appropriately, to point out that Mr. Wunder had not covered the topic on Dr. Asher's discovery:

> The Court: But you did not ask.
> Mr. Wunder: I'm sorry, sir?
>
> The Court: You did not ask him, how much did you take out after.
>
> Mr. Wunder: Well . . .

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

The Court: I think the important point is, Mr. Wunder, you said, "You didn't tell me this on discovery."

Mr. Wunder: Yes, sir.

The Court: And he did tell you about taking them about after and I do not appreciate you suggesting to a witness that "you don't tell me something on discovery" when he does in fact tell you something on discovery.

Mr. Wunder: Your Honour, well -- you are the final arbiter of that, as to whether or not it's . . .

The Court: No, but you were -- you were suggesting to this witness that this evidence about him taking the clots out of the uterus was brand new evidence which you had never heard of before.

[157] Mr. Wunder eventually accepted that he had not adequately dealt with the topic on discovery when he said: "And I guess I can be faulted for not asking you in greater detail the quantity or how it was removed."

[158] The appellants also point to an incident that arose during an argument over the late disclosure of Dr. Kirsch's medical records. Defence counsel suggested an adverse inference might be drawn on a particular point. Mr. Wunder questioned what the adverse inference might be. Instead of allowing defence counsel to answer, the trial judge responded:

The Court: Well, suppose that the adverse inference he proposes to advance is that I find as a fact that Barbra suffered severe pain.

Mr. Wunder: If that is my friend's position, if you articulate it adequately I would like to hear it from him.

Mr. Liswood: Joe, may I . . .

Mr. Wunder: Excuse me, wait, could I have Mr. Colangelo

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

-- I'd like to know from Mr. Colangelo . . .

The Court: Well, he would extend that I would think. On his argument he would extend it that that would alter the opinions of Dr. Fields, Manning, Johnson. He would say the same thing with regard to the use of the hands and scooting.

Mr. Wunder: I would just like my friend to articulate what adverse inference that he is talking about so that I can meet the argument, sir, and appreciate his argument.

The Court: Well, I am not absolutely sure that he has to because what he is saying is that that is a possibility and he says that I cannot deal with that until we get to the end of the trial.

Mr. Wunder: I understand, sir. He did not complete the sentence. He is going to argue an adverse inference. I would like to know what adverse inference, that's all, from him.

The Court: Well, he is going to argue it at some later date.

[159] In our view, the trial judge did not act improperly in intervening to set out the defence position. This was probably done with a view to moving the trial along. Moreover, counsel for all the parties fully argued whether an adverse inference should have been drawn without any inappropriate intervention by the trial judge.

[160] The appellants also point to an intervention by the trial judge during Mr. Tait's cross-examination of the appellants' expert, Dr. Fields, on his qualifications to give opinion evidence. Mr. Wunder objected to the questioning and the trial judge responded:

Mr. Wunder: Your Honour, aren't all these questions really designed to go to a matter of weight? The doctor is really qualified to give opinion evidence.

The Court: I suspect that I may hear some argument as to the ability of this witness, or whether or not I should allow this witness to give expert evidence as to the standard of care which might be expected in Ontario if he is not familiar with it. He makes a bald statement. He makes a bald statement as I understand it. I am only anticipating what I think Mr. Tait might say, that he makes a bald statement that the standard of practice is the same.

Mr. Wunder: Well, the . . .

The Court: That is quite a different question than saying that he does not have expertise.

Mr. Wunder: Expertise evidence is expert evidence received by courts without regard to geographical barriers, and often . . .

The Court: Well, let us let Mr. Tait press on and we will come back to you, Mr. Wunder, when we argue this whole issue.

Mr. Wunder: Thank you, sir.

The trial judge's comments are innocuous and no possible apprehension of bias can arise from them, particularly because the trial judge permitted Dr. Fields to give expert evidence.

[161] Finally, the appellants submit that the trial judge especially interfered with their presentation of the case during the cross-examination of Dr. Asher on his withdrawal of the admission of oligohydramnios. A lengthy argument took place during this cross-examination, much of it over an excerpt from a textbook on obstetrics. During the argument, covering 44 pages of transcript, the trial judge intervened many times and put a few questions to the witness. However, as we read these pages, the trial judge was simply trying to control, as he was entitled to do, a heated exchange between counsel. As well, the few questions the trial judge asked were not obviously helpful to the defence.

[162] The appellants cite other examples from Mr. Wunder's cross-examination, which they say also demonstrate that the trial judge's interventions were one-sided. We do not think that individually or collectively these other examples support the appellants' claim of judicial bias. The trial judge intervened when needed in order to try to control this difficult trial and to understand the evidence, including intervening during defence counsel's cross-examination.

4. The Trial Judge Spoke with Defence Counsel in the Absence of Mr. Wunder

[163] On one occasion in April 1995, respondents' counsel telephoned the trial judge to find out whether he would sit two days previously scheduled as non-sitting days to accommodate an out-of-town witness. Mr. Wunder was not party to the call, apparently because he was ill and was home recovering. The appellants now contend that the trial judge exhibited bias by speaking to respondents' counsel alone.

[164] We see no merit in this contention. The telephone call was limited to scheduling. Moreover, it was disclosed immediately to Mr. Wunder in writing and the next day in open court. Mr. Wunder accepted the trial judge's explanation for the telephone call.

5. The Trial Judge Unfairly Criticized Mr. Wunder

[165] The appellants submit that not only did defence counsel unfairly criticize their counsel, so too did the trial judge. The contend that the trial judge showed "a deeply critical attitude, perhaps outright hostility" toward Mr. Wunder. In our view, the trial record does not substantiate this contention. We will refer briefly to the two examples relied on by the appellants during oral argument to show that their contention has no merit.

[166] The appellants pointed to an exchange between the trial judge and Mr. Wunder over the contents of expert reports, which took place during the examination-in-chief of the appellants' expert, Dr. Geisler. The exchange was as follows:

Mr. Wunder: Your Honour, I cannot believe that my friends'

cross-examination is limited to and dependent upon what is in the plaintiff's reports. I just can't believe it. Surely they bring much more to this trial than that and surely they can't complain that they chose not to cross-examine people on issues that relate clearly to life expectancy.

The Court: Now wait a second. Let me get something straight, Mr. Wunder. If I am defending a case and I have your medical reports which identifies the areas that your experts are going to talk on or give evidence on or render opinions on, why would I venture into areas that could be just a mine field, to discuss with the doctor when I know that your other experts are allowed to give evidence about those matters?

Mr. Wunder: Because under our jurisprudence every expert is allowed to expand on his report.

The Court: Well because you see -- where you and I are parting company is that you want to play by the rule -- sort of the ambush rules as your experts get in the box . . .

Mr. Wunder: I resent that remark, Your Honour.

The Court: Well, you know, that is what it is coming down to.

Mr. Wunder: That's what my friends have persuaded you it's coming down to, sir.

The Court: No, they have not persuaded me of anything, Mr. Wunder. I will make up my own mind.

We see nothing unfairly critical in the trial judge's comments, which indeed reflect our views on the issue being debated.

[167] The appellants also rely on an exchange between the trial judge and Mr. Wunder over the "Colebrook ruling", which took place during the cross-examination of Dr. Asher. The relevant part of what was a rather innocuous exchange is as follows:

The Court: You keep saying burdened with the ruling in

Colebrook. I am satisfied that the ruling, the Colebrook Number Two Ruling is correct. You say burdened with it. I would have thought you would have known that. Maybe you did not know that principle.

Mr. Wunder: I certainly didn't, Your Honour.

The Court: Well, there you go.

Mr. Wunder: If I may continue my representations to Your Honour. Here is a statement by you and by me. One, that I didn't want to be taken to vouch for the truthfulness of what Dr. Asher says and I wanted to be able to challenge his credibility. So that was clearly stated on the record. And secondly, you assuring me that I would be able to cross-examine him on that correction, as you said, almost forever. Now . . .

The Court: And you have got that right.

Mr. Wunder: I'm sorry, Your Honour. When someone has a right to cross-examine, Your Honour, you recall from Sopinka, where they lead the simplest fact, one can cross-examine on all issues and I want -- I want to exercise that right. We've been on that before. Do you need the reference from Sopinka, sir?

The Court: No. I know what Sopinka says.

Mr. Wunder: I'm sure you do, sir.

The Court: But you are talking about having read something into the record, making it part of the plaintiff's case, and then are you entitled to cross-examine the author of that statement that you read into the record to prove that it is not true? You and I seem to part company on that. You seem to think that you can. I have said that you cannot.

Again, we find nothing unfair in the trial judge's observations, and certainly none of his observations reflect any animosity or hostility toward Mr. Wunder.

[168] As we have said before, the trial judge presided over a long and difficult trial, marked by open hostility and lack of trust among counsel, and by frequent interruptions by all counsel to the flow of evidence. The trial judge cannot be criticized, let alone be found guilty of judicial bias, for his occasional mild rebuke to counsel. We add that those occasional rebukes were quite evenly distributed throughout the trial and among all trial counsel. The appellants' claim that the trial judge showed "outright hostility" to Mr. Wunder is not substantiated on this record. In sharp contrast to this claim, the trial judge praised Mr. Wunder's dedication to his clients' case, in a ruling on June 3, 1994 dismissing a defence motion to refer Mr. Wunder's conduct to the Official Guardian for review:

> I assume that Mr. Liswood and Mr. Colangelo are suggesting that Mr. Wunder who acts on behalf of the Litigation Guardian, is not protecting the best interests of Joel Marchand and accordingly his conduct of this action on behalf of Joel Marchand required review by the Official Guardian.
> This trial commenced on October 18th, 1993 and I am told that as of this day, the court has been convened approximately 90 days and the Plaintiffs' case is not complete. I am doubtful that the Plaintiffs' case will be completed by the end of June 1994. Mr. Wunder has appeared at trial on all of the days that court has been convened and although I have not agreed with all of his submissions or the manner in which parts of the Plaintiffs' case has been presented, it would be unfair of me prior to hearing all of the evidence to second guess Mr. Wunder on the presentation of the Plaintiffs' case. Mr. Wunder has been a dedicated counsel who has attempted to present his clients' case in a manner which he feels is most favourable to his client. It would be wrong for me at this time in this trial to say that Mr. Wunder has not acted in the best interests of his clients. In my opinion, the actions of Mr. Wunder in this trial indicate that he perceives that his strategy in presenting his clients' case is in the best interests of his clients and at the end of the trial when I have heard all of the evidence, he may be right.

2000 CanLII 16946 (ON CA)

Mr. Wunder enjoys an exceedingly high reputation in the person injury field in Ontario and I must take his reputation of excellence into account when I consider the Motion of the Respondents to have this matter referred to the Official Guardian for review. There is absolutely no doubt in my mind that Mr. Wunder has dedicated himself to the presentation of this action and the suggestion that his conduct of this action should be reviewed by the Office of the Official Guardian is totally unfounded and is not warranted in this action. I want the record to indicate that although I have not agreed with many of the submissions of Mr. Wunder, and have ruled against him on some occasions in this trial, I see no reason to alter my views that Mr. Wunder is attempting to act in the best interests of his clients and perceives that his actions are in the best interests of his clients.

6. The Trial Judge Showed Antipathy to Mrs. Marchand in His Reasons for Judgment

[169] The appellants submit that the trial judge's reasons reflect his antipathy towards Mrs. Marchand. They argue that the trial judge rejected her evidence except where it bolstered the respondents' defence abruption theory and that he suggested in his reasons Mrs. Marchand "sought success in this case in priority to Joel's well-being". The appellants gave three examples of the trial judge's alleged antipathy. We will briefly review each example. None of them supports the appellants' submission.

[170] First, the appellants point to the trial judge's discussion of Joel's life expectancy. In that discussion, the trial judge expressed reservations about Mrs. Marchand's beliefs concerning her son's abilities and her reaction to professional advice for Joel's care.

[171] The trial judge thoroughly considered the question of Joel's life expectancy, devoting nearly 200 pages of his reasons to it. He praised Mrs. Marchand as a devoted, loving and caring mother who was trying to do the best for her son. The trial judge, however, was concerned about the divergence between Mrs. Marchand's evidence and the expert evidence, especially on the key issue of Joel's mobility. On that issue, everyone accepted the importance of the evidence of Dr. Richard Eyman, a defence expert in epidemiology and biostatistics, who had developed a scale to predict life expectancy based on physical skills. In assessing Joel's mobility, the trial judge took into account the optimistic beliefs expressed by Mrs. Marchand and two of her friends, and compared them with the 41/2 hours of videotapes of Joel, the evidence of Joel's physiotherapist and the evidence of a doctor who participated in the defence medical (examination of Joel).

[172] The trial judge concluded that he could find no acceptable evidence that Joel could crawl, scoot or roll, which are key Eyman criteria. The trial judge was concerned that the appellants' efforts to suggest otherwise had their genesis in the Eyman criteria, a concern that was heightened by the apparently overstated information Mr. and Mrs. Marchand gave to Dr. MacGregor, who assessed Joel's mobility just before trial. The beliefs that Mrs. Marchand maintained about Joel's ability are entirely understandable, but the trial judge was entitled to discount those beliefs when they clashed with the expert evidence. In our view, the trial judge's unwillingness to accept Mrs. Marchand's evidence on Joel's mobility does not reflect antipathy toward her but a fair weighing of all the evidence presented to him.

[173] The second example that the appellants rely on is the trial judge's finding on reduced fetal movements. The appellants argued at trial that Dr. Asher was negligent because he failed to tell Mrs. Marchand to count her baby's movements. This argument could succeed only if the evidence showed a significant reduction in fetal movements. There was no such evidence. The trial judge accepted Mrs. Marchand's testimony that some reduction in fetal movements had occurred but he did not elevate her testimony to support a finding of significant reduction. This does not substantiate a claim of bias.

[174] Finally, the appellants complain that the trial judge accepted Dr. Kirsch's evidence about a discussion he had with Mrs. Marchand after Joel was born. Dr. Kirsch said that during an office assessment Mrs. Marchand told him that at the time of abruption she had suffered pain concurrently with a fall in the fetal heart rate. This evidence was adverse to Mrs. Marchand's interests and she was not asked about it in examination-in-chief or in re-examination. Nonetheless, the trial judge accepted Dr. Kirsch's evidence. Doing so cannot be equated with antipathy towards Mrs. Marchand.

[175] Overall, we are satisfied that the evidence reasonably supports the trial judge's findings of credibility. Mrs. Marchand overstated her evidence, albeit understandably, and the trial judge was justified in concluding that her evidence did not withstand scrutiny.

7. The Cumulative Effect

[176] The appellants submit that the trial judge's conduct, as described in the six categories above, cumulatively amounts to judicial bias. We reject this submission.

[177] We have dealt with the appellants' submissions relating to individual complaints in each of the six categories and found that none of the conduct complained about established judicial bias. However, the principles in S. (R.D.) call for a consideration of the cumulative effect of the allegations of bias. For this reason, we must consider whether the totality of the appellants' complaints gives rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias. We do not think that they do.

[178] In our opinion the relentless acrimony between counsel in this complex and lengthy case did not prevent the trial judge from conducting and judging the case fairly and thoroughly. We are satisfied that a reasonably informed person, observing the trial judge's conduct during the entire trial and reading his reasons for judgment, would have no difficulty in concluding that he remained impartial and that he demonstrated no actual or apprehended bias.

[179] We therefore also dismiss this ground of appeal.

IV. COSTS

[180] The trial judge awarded the respondents their party-and-party costs of the trial, which he fixed in the total amount of $2,154,447.85 ($1,233,791.25 payable to Dr. Asher and $920,656.60 payable to the other respondents). The trial judge ordered that O.H.I.P. pay a small portion of those costs and the appellants the remainder. He also dismissed a defence motion to have Mr. Wunder pay 70% of the cost award.

[181] The appellants appeal the costs order. They submit that we should deny the respondents their costs of the trial even if we dismiss the appellants' appeal. In their factums filed on appeal, the respondents sought to maintain the trial judge's costs award. In oral argument, however, counsel for all respondents undertook not to pursue the appellants for the costs of the trial and stated that the respondents were not seeking costs of this appeal. In light of this concession and the tragic event that led to this case we think it appropriate to vary the costs order at trial to provide that the appellants have no obligation for the respondents' costs.

V. CONCLUSION

[182] For the foregoing reasons, paras. 2 and 3 of the judgment at trial are set aside, to be replaced by an order that the dismissal of the action is without costs. This appeal is dismissed without costs.

Order accordingly.

RODERICK McLEAN.....APPELLANT;

AND

BENJAMIN BRADLEY .....RESPONDENT.

1878
*Feb'y. 6, 7.
June 4.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF NOVA SCOTIA.

Absent and absconding debtors Act of Nova Scotia, Ch. 97, Rev. St. of N. S.—Attachment—Demurrer—Conversion by Sheriff—Corporation, sale by—Justification under Order of Court—Seal.

One H. instituted proceedings against the L. C. M. Company, the officers of which resided in the United States, but which did business in Nova Scotia, and, on the 25th May, 1872, caused a Writ of Attachment to be issued out of the Supreme Court at Amherst, under the absent and absconding debtors Act of Nova Scotia, (1) directed to the Appellant, the High Sheriff of the County of Cumberland. Under this Writ, the Appellant seized certain chattels, as being the chattels of the said Company. On the 12th November, 1872, an order was issued out of the said Court, directing the Appellant to sell, and the Appellant did sell said chattels as being of a perishable nature. On the 11th December, 1874, a discontinuance was filed in the said cause by H. On the 30th May, 1876, the Respondent commenced an action against the Appellant for the conversion of the chattels in question, contending that the Company, having failed in its operations and being desirous of winding up its affairs, and being indebted to him, had sold and conveyed to him the said chattels by a certain memorandum of sale, dated July 5th, 1867, "signed on behalf of the Company," by one "Hawley, agent." To this memorandum a seal was affixed which did not purport to be the seal of the Company. The Appellant pleaded to the Declaration, that he did not convert; goods not Plaintiff's; not possessed; and also a special plea of justification, setting forth the proceedings by H., and that he had seized and sold the goods as the goods of the Company, in obedience to the attachment and order issued in said proceedings. The Respondent replied, setting up the discontinuance. The Appellant rejoined that the proceedings were not discontinued, and that the discontinuance was not filed till after the sale. He also demurred, on the ground that being bound to obey the order of the Court, he could not be affected by the discontinuance. At the trial a verdict of $500 damages was rendered for Respondent. The Appellant obtained a rule nisi to set aside verdict, and the rule and demurrer were argued together. The Court below refused to set aside the verdict and gave judgment for Plaintiff on the demurrer.

Held,—That the appeal should be allowed; that the plea of justification showed a sufficient answer to the declaration; that the replication was bad, and that the verdict must be set aside and judgment be for the Defendant on the demurrer.

Ritchie, J., dissented, on the ground that the seizing under the attachment, and not the sale, constituted the conversion; that there was sufficient evidence to show that the chattels in question had been transferred by the Company to Respondent, and that under Sec. 15, ch. 53 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, the sale of the chattels did not require to be under the corporate seal of the Company.

Per Strong, J.: The sale, and not the seizure, was the conversion complained of, and to this the order of the Court was a sufficient answer. Semble, a mere taking of the goods of a third person under a mesne attachment against a Defendant to keep them in medio until the termination of the action is not a conversion.

Per Henry, J.: The order for sale would not have been a justification for the original levy on the goods, as well as for the sale, if they had been the property of the Respondent, but the evidence failed to show a sale by the Company to the Respondent. Such a sale would require to be under the corporate seal of the Company, and did not come within the meaning of Sec. 15, ch. 53 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia.

THIS was an appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, giving judgment on demurrer in favour of the Plaintiff (Respondent), and discharging a rule nisi, granted to the Defendant (Appellant), to set aside the verdict for the Plaintiff.

The Lawrence Coal Mining Company, a body corporate, incorporated out of Nova Scotia, in the State of Massachusetts, in the United States of America, under the Joint Stock Companies Act of Nova Scotia, commenced coal mining operations in 1862 on a colliery property at or near river Hebert, in the County of Cumberland, in the Province of Nova Scotia, purchased from one George Hibbard, and continued to work the same until 1865, when the Company became hopelessly insolvent. Hibbard, the former owner, who resided on the spot, continued from the outset to be a Director, and was the only resident Director in Nova Scotia, and was Managing Director from 1862 up to the spring of 1867, excepting only one season in 1864, and as such had charge of all the property of the Company. He also attended all the annual meetings of the Company held at Boston.

To enable the Company to carry on its operations, the Company, through Hibbard as Managing Director, obtained from Bradley a loan of $10,000, for which Hibbard, as Managing Director, gave a note or notes and a warrant to confess to Bradley, the Respondent, on which judgment was entered up by Bradley for $10,022.75, for principal and interest, on the 11th September, 1865. In 1866 the real and personal property was advertized for sale under Respondent's judgment, and the real estate was sold to him for $3,975, leaving $6,025 still due; the personal property was not sold, and remained on the premises until July, 1867, when Hawley, as agent of the Company, transferred it to Respondent, who, in consideration of the transfer, gave up notes and claims for about $1,500. Hawley, at the same time, gave the following memorandum of sale (filed in the case as exhibit A):—

"RIVER HEBERT, CUMBERLAND COUNTY,

"NOVA SCOTIA, July 5th, 1867.

"Know all men by these presents, that Benjamin

There was no seal to this document purporting to be the seal of the Company, nor had any resolution been passed by the shareholders authorizing a sale by Hawley, but at an adjourned meeting of the Company, held on the 26th February, 1866, it had been, on motion, voted that Messrs. Hawley, W. G. Howe and Alden, should be and were thereby authorized to sell all the real and personal estate, and also the leasehold of the Company for such sum or sums, and on such terms as in their judgment would be for the best interest of the Company, and pay the proceeds of such sale into the hands of the Treasurer for the benefit of the creditors of said Company, and if the amount of such sale exceeded the debts the balance to be paid pro rata among the stockholders.

From the date of the sale, Bradley, and others claiming under him as proprietors, employed an agent to take care of the property, and paid all taxes and expenses connected with it. The mem. of sale was delivered by Hawley to Alden, who acted as Secretary of the Company.

No meetings of the Company were held subsequent to that of the 26th February, 1866, until December 30 and 31, 1874, when the Company, being still largely indebted to Respondent on his judgment, by a resolution unanimously adopted by the shareholders present, further resolved that all the interest of the Company in the mining lease of the Company be transferred to Respondent.

On the 25th May, 1872, Hibbard, who claimed $1,760 from the Company, brought an action against the Company, and caused a writ of attachment to be issued out of the Supreme Court at Amherst, under the absent or absconding debtors Act of Nova Scotia (1), directed to the Appellant, as High Sheriff of the County of Cumberland, requiring him to seize, and in obedience to the writ the Appellant did seize, certain chattels as being the chattels of the said Company.

On the 12th November, 1872, an order was issued out of the said Court, directing the Sheriff to sell the said chattels, as being of a perishable nature within the meaning of sec. 6, of the last mentioned Act ; and they were sold by the Sheriff.

On the 11th December, 1874, a discontinuance of the cause "and all proceedings thereunder," was entered in the action brought by Hibbard against the Company.

On the 30th May, 1876, the Respondent, contending that the chattels in question were his property, commenced an action of trover against the Appellant, the Sheriff, for the conversion of the said chattels.

The Appellant pleaded to the declaration :—1st. That he did not convert. 2nd. That goods were not the property of the Plaintiff. 3rd. Not possessed. And 4th. A special plea of justification setting forth the proceedings by Hibbard, against the Lawrence Coal Mining Com- pany, and that the Defendant, as Sheriff, under the said writ of attachment, and the said order made in such proceedings, seized and sold the chattels in question as and being the chattels of the Company.

The Plaintiff replied to the fourth plea, that after the proceedings aforesaid the said proceedings were discontinued.

The Defendant rejoined that the proceedings were not discontinued, and that the discontinuance was not filed till after the sale in the fourth plea mentioned.

He also demurred to the replication, on the ground that, being bound to act in obedience to the order of the Court, he could not be affected by a discontinuance of a suit under which property was sold.

The Plaintiff joined in demurrer.

The issues of fact were tried at Amherst on the 16th October, 1876, before the Chief Justice, Sir William Young, and a jury, when a verdict was rendered for the Respondent for five hundred dollars damages.

The Appellant obtained a rule nisi to set aside the verdict, and the said rule nisi and the demurrer were argued together.

The Court below, after argument, gave judgment refusing to set aside the verdict, and, on the 2nd April, 1877, a rule was made ordering that the rule nisi be discharged with costs, and that the Plaintiff have judgment of the demurrer with costs.

The Appellant, thereupon, appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Gormully, for Appellant:—

The Respondent claims title to the chattels in question by a transfer or conveyance thereof from the Lawrence Coal Mining Company. If once admitted to be the property of the Company, they must so remain until divested. The principal question is whether there was an actual sale of the goods; whether exhibit A had the effect of transferring the chattels to Bradley; I contend it had not. That document must operate either as a contract or conveyance. If it operates as a contract, it must be regarded as a contract under seal, or as a simple contract. It is not binding on the Company, because it does not purport to bind them, and because the seal affixed is not the corporate seal of the Company, which was necessary, there having been evidence of the existence of one. Sec. 15, ch. 87, Rev. Stat., N. S., 3rd series, only establishes as a rule of statute law what was formally a rule of common law. It has been held that as to personalty a corporation could sell it, but whether they could do so, except under seal, is another question.

The Statute says: "Acts within the scope of their charter." This sale, purporting to convey all the property, and showing an intention to abandon the object for which the Company was incorporated, should have been under seal.

Hawley never was duly authorized. There never was a meeting respecting the sale, and no evidence of that concerted action which was necessary.

D'Arcy v. The Tamar, Kit Hill and Callington Railway Co. (1); Ridley v. Plymo Grinding Co. (2). There is no evidence that the Company delegated their power; and further, if they did delegate it, they had no right to do so. The last delegation of authority is to Hawley, Howe and Alden—and this was a power which must have been exercised by all three, and was not a power which could be delegated. The Respondent was bound to know what was being done. Exparte Brown (3).

The transaction was a fraudulent one as against the statute of Elizabeth (1), there was no change of possession, and this was a document which should have been registered under the statute.

The learned counsel then proceeded to argue that the learned judge who tried the action had improperly admitted evidence and had misdirected the jury; and that as to the demurrer, the Appellants fourth plea was good in law, and replication bad because it admits and does not sufficiently avoid the plea.

Mr. Haliburton, Q. C., for Respondent:—

The Company became indebted to Bradley for an advance of $10,000. In 1865, they find themselves insolvent. Hibbard, from whom the Company purchased their mine, was the only director resident in Nova Scotia, and was the only person up to this date who had any benefit from the Company. He attended all the meetings and was familiar with all that was done. In 1865, meetings were called, but nothing was done, and at last Bradley enters up judgment and issues execution. He unwisely allowed the matter to stand over to save Sheriffs' fees, and a conveyance became necessary from the Company. Five days after the sale of the personal property, Hibbard renders an account, showing $25 due him. The Company set off against that the rent, and considered they had paid every body; they supposed all claims were paid both in Canada and the United States. The Company authorized Hawley to go to Nova Scotia to sell the property.

[RITCHIE, J.:—Will you show us from the evidence that he was authorized by the Company?]

There is no one at present claiming the property except Bradley. The Company did not claim it, nor any shareholder or director on behalf of the Company.

[THE CHIEF JUSTICE:—A question has been raised which seems important. This property was sold by order of the Court as perishable property. How can the Sheriff be held responsible for selling this specific property under the order of the Court?]

I am prepared to show that the Sheriff, under the circumstances, was not justified in selling.

Where there is a seal, the seal must be presumed to be the seal of the Company. Ontario Salt Co. v. Merchants Salt Co. (limited) (1).

[RITCHIE, J.:—Where is the evidence that Hawley had any right to use the seal of the Company?]

It is to be presumed he had the right.

[RITCHIE, J.:—What evidence raises this presumption?]

The Company took this man's money, which was the consideration for the sale.

[RITCHIE, J.:—If you can show that this party was professing to act for the Company and entered into this sale, and afterwards the Company had known of the facts and received the money, you will have good evidence that the sale was the sale of the Company.]

In 1874 a general meeting of the Company was called, and it is to be presumed the Company ratified the action of Mr. Hawley. When proceedings have been manifestly illegal between a Company and an individual, and the Company choose to continue these dealings, that is a ratification by the Company of such dealings.

[HENRY, J.:—The difficulty seems to me to be that there were no meetings, and no Company.]

It is to be presumed all necessary by-laws were passed to continue the Company, and the meeting of 1874 was a ratification of what was done before.

The transfer purporting to be signed and sealed by R. Hawley, as their agent, was given to the Secretary of the Company, and was never repudiated by them, and Bradley continued thenceforth to be in undisputed possession of the property and paid taxes on it, and employed an agent to take charge of it.

The Company, after notice to it of sale by Hawley, did, by their acquiescence for so many years in the possession of Respondent of the personal property sold to him, by their accepting therefor notes, &c., to the amount of $1,500, and by their unanimous vote in 1874 in further satisfaction of the balance due Respondent, that the lease of the mine should be transferred to him, ratify and confirm the sale of the personal property to Respondent by Hawley, as their agent ; and it must be assumed that all necessary by-laws and resolutions had been passed and adopted to ratify and confirm the sale by Hawley, as agent of the Company. To enforce an executory contract against a corporation it may be necessary to show that it was by deed: but where the corporation has acted upon an executed contract, it is to be presumed against them that everything has been done that was necessary to make it a binding contract upon both parties, they having had all the advantage they would have had if the contract had been regularly made. *Doe dem. If any question could be raised as to the power of the Company to sell, or the agency of Hawley, or as to the validity of the sale by him, or as to the ratification of such agency, or of such sale by the Company, it is settled by the provisions of the Nova Scotian Act respecting factors and agents. Rev. Stat. Nova Scotia, Fourth Series, App. 63, secs. 1—10.

The Respondent further contends that Appellant's plea of justification is bad in substance, for the following reasons:—

Because it appears by it that the attachment under the Nova Scotian Act respecting absent or absconding debtors, was issued against "a body corporate doing business in Nova Scotia," the said Act not extending to such a company, but only to companies "incorporated out of the Province and doing business by an agent within the Province." Rev. Stat. Nova Scotia, Fourth Series, ch. 97.

Because, even if sec. 6 of the said Act refers to such foreign companies doing business in Nova Scotia, it does not appear that the goods in question were exhibited to the Sheriff as the goods of the Company, nor does it appear that they were valued by two sworn appraisers, or that the amount of appraisement was endorsed on writ of attachment, or that the Sheriff levied on such part of the goods as would be sufficient to refund the sum so sworn to, &c.

Because, if sec. 7 is also applicable to such foreign companies, it does not appear that notice of such assessment was given to the agent of the Company, or that the three days were allowed him to find security; nor does it appear that the prothonotary had any power to issue the order for sale in consequence of the absence of a judge. Rex. v. Croke (1).

Because the plea of justification does not show that the Sheriff has made a return of the writ of attachment, without which he cannot be allowed to justify in such a case. Rev. Stat. And Respondent further contends:—That as it is only service of summons on the agent of a foreign company doing business in the Province by an agent, which the statute says "gives jurisdiction to the Court," and as it appears that the summons was served on the agent of Respondent, and not of the company, the Court had no jurisdiction, and the writ of attachment and order for sale, and all proceedings thereunder, were null and void; that a Court of law has in itself no inherent power or right to order perishable goods seized under attachment to be sold, La Rochelle v. Piche et al (1); and that sec. 6 and 7 of Absent or Absconding Debtors Act does not extend to foreign companies doing business in the Province by an agent, and the Court has no power to order a sale of their property under the said Act, and that all proceedings for a sale of such property are therefore null and void. power to the Court to order perishable goods to be sold (1). The Court did in this case order the goods to be sold, and they were sold, and after such sale all the proceedings under the attachment appears to have been discontinued. If the Sheriff had properly taken the goods in the first instance, and if they were legally in his hands, and he sold them under the order of the Court, I think that order would protect him; but, in this case, in my opinion, the conversion of the goods took place when the Sheriff levied on them. The evidence shows the goods originally belonged to the St. Lawrence Coal Mining Company, the officers of which were domiciled in New York. The Company appears to have failed in its operations, and all their property in Nova Scotia was disposed of, except that now in question, and all debts in that Province, except $28, appear to have been settled, leaving a large debt due to the Plaintiff, who had been connected with the Company, and for which he held the promissory notes of the Company. The Supreme Court of Nova Scotia held there was evidence of a sale of these goods; and there appears to me to have been ample evidence for the consideration of the jury of a bonâ fide sale, for a valuable consideration, by the officers of the Company to the Plaintiff, for the purpose of discharging the lawful indebtedness of the Company. I think this was within the legislative power given to incorporated companies under ch. 53, sec. 15, N. S. Acts, which makes acts performed within the scope of their charter, or acts creating them, valid, notwithstanding they may not be done under, or authenticated by, the seal of the Company, if such an authentication was needed, but which, I think, was, in this case, wholly unnecessary (1).

The Company having in the due course of its business become indebted to the Plaintiff, I can see no reason why it might not as well pay that liability by a sale and delivery of personal property to their creditor in discharge thereof, as by handing him the amount in money, or selling the property to third parties, and handing over the proceeds to the creditor.

With reference to the conversion, I think the very circumstance of Defendant's levying on the goods, and subsequently selling them, was a clear conversion. There was not, it is true, evidence that the goods were on the levy moved, but it is clear the Sheriff did levy on them, and it is equally clear that the Court ordered the goods, thus in his hands and under his control, to be sold, as being in his possession under the levy, and that they were so sold.

The definition of a conversion, as given by the editor of Bacon's abridgment "Trover" (B), is this:—

The action being founded upon a conjunct right of property and possession, any act of the Defendant which negatives or is inconsistent with such right, amounts in law to a conversion. It is not necessary to a conversion that there should be a manual taking of the thing in question by the Defendant; it is not necessary that it should be shown that he has applied it to his own use. Does he exercise a dominion over it in exclusion or in defiance of Plaintiff's right? If he does, that is in law a conversion, be it for his own or another person's use."

I think when a Sheriff levies on property he does take possession of it, as against the party, and does convert it. If he exercises control in defiance of the party who had the right, there is a conversion, and he may be sued for the conversion, and, as said by Alderson, B., in Fouldes v. Willoughby (1),

For this simple reason, that it is an act inconsistent with the general right of dominion which the owner of the chattel has in it, who is entitled to the use of it at all times and in all places. When, therefore, a man takes that chattel, either for the use of himself or another, it is a conversion.

v.
BRADLEY.

I think the Plaintiff's right of action did not commence at the time of the sale, but so soon as the Sheriff levied upon the goods, and so exercised a claim and dominion over them adverse to the Plaintiff and inconsistent with his general right of dominion.

Under these circumstances, I think the Plaintiff has made out his case, viz.: that the Company, by its officers, was competent to sell the goods in question, that there was evidence to establish the sale of the goods to the Plaintiff, and of a conversion by the Defendant. I state this with hesitancy, only because the views of my learned brethren are at variance with the conclusion at which I have arrived.

STRONG, J.:—

The conversion complained of by the declaration was the sale, not the seizure or taking of the goods. The 4th plea justifies the sale under the order of the Court, and avers that to have been the act complained of in the declaration. The Plaintiff is therefore confined to the sale as the conversion for which he sues. If he wanted to insist on the taking as constituting a conversion he should have new assigned. I should doubt, however, if a mere taking of the goods of a third person under a mesne attachment against a Defendant, to keep them in medio until the termination of the action, is a conversion. A conversion is defined to be a taking of chattels with an intent to deprive the Plaintiff of his property in them, or with an intent to destroy them or change their nature. Taking under a mesne attachment does not, like taking under a writ of fieri facias with intent to sell, imply any such intention. But, be that as it may, the conversion here must, on the pleadings, be taken to be the sale. Now, this sale was under an order of the Court, and was the act of the Court, not the act of the Sheriff. It was not the case of a writ of execution or attachment being placed in the Sheriff's hands against the goods of A, and a seizure under it of the goods of B, which the exigency of the writ did not warrant; but these specific goods being already in the Sheriff's hands, having been seized under the attachment, the Court orders them to be sold. The Sheriff is, therefore, protected by the order for sale. The issue, it is true, on this line of pleading, is narrowed to this: Was the discontinuance after or before the sale? It appears that the sale took place on the 7th November, 1866, and that there was no discontinuance until December 11th, 1874. The issue on the rejoinder to the replication to the plea of justification ought, therefore, to have been found for the Defendant. But it was proper to consider, whether the plea did disclose a good justification, since there would be no use in granting a new trial if in point of law the Sheriff could not justify. As regards the other point argued, there can, in my judgment, be no doubt that the Company was one to which the Rev. Stats. p. 8, (4th Series), ch. 97, was applicable. I am, therefore, of opinion that the verdict ought to have been set aside with costs, and a new trial ordered.

TASCHEREAU and FOURNIER, J. J., concurred.

HENRY, J.:—

The points to be decided in this case are in an action of trover, brought by the Respondent against the Appellant, who, as Sheriff of the County of Cumberland, sold certain chattel property claimed by the Respondent to belong to him to recover its value.

To the charge of conversion in the Respondent's writ the Appellant pleaded:—

1st. That he did not convert to his own use the Plaintiff's goods, as in the writ alleged.

v.
BRADLEY.

2nd. That the goods were not the property of the Plaintiff.

3rd. That the Plaintiff was not possessed, nor was he entitled to the possession of the said goods.

And by a fourth plea, he justifies the taking of the goods, as and being the goods of the Lawrence Coal Mining Company, under a writ of attachment at the suit of one George Hibbard, against the said Lawrence Coal Mining Company, directed to him as Sheriff of the County of Cumberland; and the subsequent sale thereof under an order issued by the Supreme Court and signed by A. S. Blenkhorn, Esquire, Prothonotary of the said Court at Amherst in the said County of Cumberland, whereby he was ordered and required, amongst other things, as such Sheriff, as aforesaid, to put up and sell the said goods at public auction to respond the judgment which might be obtained. The Plaintiff replied to the latter plea:—

That after the proceedings in the plea mentioned, taken by the said George Hibbard, the suit instituted by the said George Hibbard against the Lawrence Coal Mining Company was discontinued by him, and the attachment and all proceeding thereunder were thereby abandoned; which said discontinuance is on the fyles of this honorable court.

To that replication the Appellant rejoined, first, that the said cause was not discontinued, and second:—

That the said discontinuance was not filed until after the goods in said writ mentioned were sold under the order in his said plea mentioned, and the proceeds applied as therein mentioned.

On the trial of the issues of fact, leave was given to the Appellant to demur to the replication of the Respondent, which he did, and therein says that the Plaintiff's replication is bad in substance, inasmuch as the Sheriff is justified by his writ of attachment and order for sale, and was bound to execute it:—

That the act of the Plaintiff in the cause under which the attachment was made, in discontinuing the cause after the Sheriff had sold the property in question, cannot and does not affect his justification, as pleaded.

1878 CanLII 22 (SCC)

Marginal note on the demurrer :—

Matter of law to be argued—that the Sheriff, being bound to act in obedience to the order of the Court, cannot be affected by a discontinuance of a suit under which property was sold.

Joinder in demurrer by Respondent. Under the charge of the learned Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, before whom the cause was tried in October, 1876, the jury found a verdict for the Plaintiff for $500, and a rule nisi was granted to set it aside on the following grounds :—

1st. That the verdict was against law and evidence.

2nd. That the learned Chief Justice misdirected the jury.

3rd. That evidence was improperly received.

4th. That evidence was improperly rejected, and

5th. That there was no sufficient evidence of the conversion of the goods.

This rule and the demurrer were argued before the whole Court at Halifax, and by a majority of the Court the rule nisi was discharged with costs, and a judgment on the demurrer given in favor of the Respondent.

In the majority judgment, the fourth plea is pronounced bad, and a doubt expressed as to the sufficiency of the replication to it. Hence the judgment on the demurrer. The appeal to this Court is from that judgment on all the points, both as to the facts and the law.

I will first deal with the demurrer. I would not question the correctness of the judgment if the fourth plea is defective, but I don't think it is.

To decide that point, we must first consider the nature of the position held by the Appellant when he received the order for the sale of the goods. He had previously levied on the goods under the attachment, but had not removed them. Section 6, ch. 97 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, entitled : "Of suits against absent and absconding debtors," provides that :—

v.
BRADLEY.

Where the goods consist of stock, or are shown by affidavit to be of a perishable nature, and the agent shall not, within three days after notice of the appraisement, give security for their value, a judge, or a prothonotary of the county, in his absence, may, at his discretion, cause the same to be sold at public auction, and the proceeds thereof shall be retained by the Sheriff, or paid into Court, to respond the judgment.

The prothonotary of the county made an order under the provisions of that section, and directed to the Sheriff, to sell the said goods under the terms thereof.

On receipt of that order it was the Sheriff's duty to execute it. He could have been compelled by legal and summary means to do it, and would also be answerable to the Plaintiff in that suit for any resulting loss or damage to the goods, in case he eventually obtained judgment. So far, therefore, as the conversion by the sale, the order to sell the specific goods would be a complete justification and the plea to that extent is a sufficient answer.

If the plea admitted the goods were the property of the Plaintiff it would have been bad; but, on the contrary, it alleges them to have been, when levied upon, the goods of the Lawrence Coal Mining Company, and that, with the other allegations contained in it, forms a perfect answer to the writ; and, as a whole, is consequently a good plea The Respondent virtually says:—they were not the Plantiff's goods, but those of the Lawrence Coal Mining Company, and I, as Sheriff, levied upon them under the attachment, and subsequently sold them.

A special plea of justification is only necessary where goods of one party are taken out of the possession of another, and is only necessary as a justification for interfering with the possession. If goods are not taken out of the possession of the Plaintiff the right is tried by a simple denial of ownership. The justification in this case would only be necessary in case the goods in question, were, when taken, in contemplation of law, in the possession of the Respondent.

The replication to the plea is bad, for the simple reason that the Respondent could not, by any possibility, be affected by any subsequent act of the Plaintiff in regard to the discontinuance of the suit. I think, therefore, the judgment on the demurrer must be in favor of the Appellant.

Under that ruling the judgment on the facts submitted to the jury should also be for him, if the order for sale would be a justification to the officer for the original levy on the goods, as well as for the sale, even had they been the property of the Respondent; but, as it is not, the result must be affected by the question as to the ownership of the goods when the levy was made. If, then, they were not the Respondent's, he cannot recover; but the whole case, as far as the rule nisi for a new trial goes, depends altogether on the settlement of that question. The property, as admitted by both parties, was that of the Lawrence Coal Mining Company up to the date of the transfer claimed by the Respondent. Did he, then, obtain the property in the goods by the document signed by "J. W. Hawley, agent." If not, he had no property in them. In determining that point we must see if, in the first place, Hawley had sufficient authority to divest the Company of the ownership. The alleged transfer is signed by him on the 5th of July, 1867. He, the Respondent, and others were appointed Directors of the Company on the 18th of January, 1865, for one year from that date. No subsequent appointment of Directors was ever made, and there is no provision to be found anywhere, as far as the evidence goes, as is sometimes the case in respect of public officers, that the Directors should hold office till others were appointed in their place. There may have been such a provision in the v.

by-laws of the Company, but evidence of it is wanting. On the 18th of January, 1866, the Directors ceased to be so; and, as such, could not collectively or individually bind the Company. Resolutions of the stockholders were passed in April and December, 1865, authorizing certain Directors named, to sell on certain conditions the real and personal property of the Company; but Hawley was not one of them. On the 26th of February, 1866, at a meeting of the stockholders, a resolution was passed authorizing Messrs. Hawley, W. G. Howe and Alden:—

> To sell all the real and personal estate, and also the leasehold of the Company for such sum or sums, and on such terms, as in their judgment will be for the best interest of the Company, and pay the proceeds of such sale into the hands of the Treasurer for the benefit of the creditors of the said Company, and if the amount of such sale exceeds the debts, the balance to be paid pro rata among the stockholders.

No one will pretend for a moment that Hawley alone had power to make the sale to the Respondent, which the document signed by him purports to have been made. The delegated power by the Company was to three, and the three were to exercise their judgment in regard to it; and besides, none of them, nor the three together, had power to give any portion of the property in payment of any particular debt. It was to be sold for cash, and that paid into the hands of the Treasurer. The Respondent was himself a Director; and was quite aware, no doubt, of the nature of the authority given to Hawley, Howe and Alden, and is concluded thereby. There is no evidence of any ratification of the sale by the Company. In fact, there was but one meeting of the Company after that of February, 1866, and that was in 1874, which appears to have been called for the purpose of authorizing a transfer of the lease of the mines to the Respondent, which was done; and that only.

Some oral evidence was offered of the authority of Hawley to sell the personal property; but it was objected to and cannot be received for the obvious reason that no meeting had ever considered the subject. In the absence, then, of legitimate evidence, and when considering, too, that if any Directors existed at the time of the transfer, the Respondent was one, and could not become a purchaser through a sale by the Directors, he having with them a fiduciary authority to sell, if any such existed, I must say I can see no authority for the transfer to bind the Company, even if it had been made in the name of the Company and under its seal.

The instrument in question does not purport to be a transfer by the Company. It contains no words making a transfer. It only says baldly that the Respondent has purchased through T. R. Hawley, authorized to sell the same, the property mentioned in the schedule. A mere naked purchase, without evidence of any consideration given, or any delivery of the property, will not pass it. I cannot think the instrument of any more value than a letter to some person would have been, containing the same substance. It does not say who owned the property, or by whom he was authorized to sell it, and it is signed by "T. R. Hawley, agent." Agent of whom? It discloses no consideration or terms for the purchase. No consideration is shown either by, or dehors, the instrument by any one present at the alleged purchase. I will not say a written transfer was absolutely necessary, but I am of opinion the document per se is insufficient to make it. There is no other evidence of it; for neither of the parties to the transfer, Hawley and Dillingham, or any of the witnesses to it, or any other person present, was examined; and there is, therefore, no legal evidence of it. Alden's hearsay evidence upon this point, objected to at the trial, cannot be received.

The Respondent, in his evidence, says:—

McLEAN v. BRADLEY.

Alden, Dillingham, Hawley and Wentworth, were all creditors of the Company, and were the four interested with me in the transfer of the personal property—under his honorary obligation. Thus, then, was Hawley undertaking to act as the agent of the Company to convey, with the assistance of Dillingham, the property of the Company to the Respondent for his, Hawley's, Dillingham's and Wentworth's benefit. Surely the Company, at any time, could repudiate such a transfer; and, if void, as against the Company, it must be so as against a creditor of the Company, as Hibbard appears to have been.

And, now, in conclusion, as to the seal. I have carefully examined all the authorities, and have had no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion that, in the absence of statutory enactment, the contract in question could only be valid under the seal of the Company.

By the registry of the articles of association in evidence, this Company was incorporated, not as a trading company, but :—

For the special purpose of opening and working mines and veins, or deposits of coal and oils in the River Hebert Settlement, * * * and the exporting and making sale thereof, and of constructing and operating railways, tramways, or plank roads, necessary for transporting the said coal, when mined, to tide water, and for the purpose of constructing piers, docks and buildings necessary for carrying on said business, and of doing all other business which may be lawfully undertaken and connected therewith.

This is not, then, a "trading" Company, and therefore rules as to buying and selling stocks in trade will not apply to it.

The "selling" contemplated by this Company was to be of coal and oil, not the houses, buildings, or plant. The intention was to keep the latter as means to enable the Company to carry out the intentions of the charter.

The intention is clear and obvious, and I cannot strain words declaring, as do those of section 15, chap. 53 of the Revised Statutes of Nova Scotia, that :—

1878 CanLII 22 (SCC)

The acts of incorporated companies performed within the scope of their charters, or acts creating them, shall be valid, notwithstanding they may not be done under, or authenticated by the seal of such corporations, to mean that a company may, without seal, sell and dispose of their whole property, and thereby wind up the company. Such a power is certainly, to my mind, not given by the section just quoted; for that section clearly has reference, as to this Company, to acts done "in the opening and working mines, &c." and the exporting and making sale of "coal and oil, &c." It, in fact, only applies to a going Company, and cannot be applied to the expiring flicker, or final sale of the houses, plant, &c., of a bankrupt company. For the reasons given, I think, the rule for the discharge of the rule nisi herein should itself be discharged and the said rule nisi made absolute with costs.

Appeal allowed with costs, and new trial ordered with costs in the Conrt below.

Court of Appeal
Menzies v. Harlos
Date: 1989-06-13

R.P. Gibbons, for appellant.

H.J. Grey, Q.C., for respondents.

(Vancouver No. CA007017)

June 13, 1989. The judgment of the court was delivered by

[1] ESSON J.A.:- On 16th December 1988 we delivered judgment [[1989] B.C.W.L.D. 384] dismissing the plaintiff's appeal from the judgment at trial. That judgment has not yet been entered. The plaintiff now applies for a rehearing or reconsideration, seeking a full reargument of the appeal. The principal basis for the application is the assertion that our reasons dealt with the main factual issues so unsatisfactorily as to indicate a lack of grasp of those issues and, in effect, a failure to deal with them.

[2] The plaintiff's claim is based on alleged medical malpractice by the defendants, who were two of a number of physicians who examined and treated him over a long period of time ending in 1984 when an acoustic neuroma was diagnosed and removed. It is common ground that the neuroma had developed to the stage that it showed symptoms by 1972.

[3] Dr. Harlos was the plaintiff's general practitioner from 1967 to 1983. Dr. Devlin is an internist who saw the plaintiff only once, when he was referred for an assessment in 1980. Had the neuroma been discovered and removed at an early stage, the operation would have been a relatively straightforward matter which would have had few, if any, permanent consequences. By 1984 it had grown very large and the permanent consequences of the surgery required to remove it, including some brain damage, are serious.

[4] After a seven-day trial in October 1986, McKenzie J. reserved judgment and delivered reasons for judgment totalling 67 pages in December 1986 [[1987] B.C.W.L.D. 060]. He found neither defendant to have been in breach of his duty of care. The appeal was heard on 1st and 2nd June 1988. The judgment dismissing the appeal was that of Craig J.A., with Taggart J.A. and I concurring.

1989 CanLII 2760 (BC CA)

[5] The submissions on appeal on behalf of the appellant, which were presented with great force and ability, concentrated on one principal point in respect of each defendant. In respect of Dr Harlos, that was an episode in October 1977. While Dr. Harlos was away, his locum, Dr. Stevens saw Mr. Menzies, suspected an acoustic neuroma and sent the patient for x-ray examination. On his return, Dr. Harlos saw a note from Dr. Stevens but decided to pursue the matter no further. In particular, he did not refer the plaintiff to an ear, nose and throat ("E.N.T.") specialist, as Dr. Stevens had apparently considered doing. That specialty is the one most closely related to the problem which afflicted the plaintiff, and such a referral at that time might well have brought it to light. On three occasions in 1972 and 1973, Dr. Harlos referred the plaintiff to Dr. Banno who is an E.N.T. specialist. Dr. Banno reported the symptoms described by the plaintiff were caused by "left eustachian tube blockage" and "left neurosensory hearing loss with tinnitus". Dr Banno said there was no treatment for the condition. Dr. Banno was originally a defendant in the action, but was dropped from it before trial because the action against him was statute barred.

[6] In respect of Dr. Devlin, the attack is based upon his failure, in the course of an extensive examination, to inquire whether the plaintiff had suffered any hearing problem, which he had. Had Dr. Devlin learned that fact, it likely would have led him to a diagnosis of acoustic neuroma, which was one of the conditions which he suspected as a possible cause of the symptoms he did detect.

[7] Reduced to its simplest form, the submission in respect of Dr. Harlos was that a reference to an E.N.T. specialist was so clearly indicated that his failure to make that reference must lead to the conclusion that he failed in his duty of care. Similarly, the submission in respect of Dr. Devlin is that the failure to ask about hearing problems inevitably leads to a conclusion of negligence. The trial judge considered those submissions, as he considered many other issues in the case. In each instance, he concluded (not in these words) that the submissions rested on a "counsel of perfection" standard and that he could not conclude that the omission by Dr. Harlos to refer, or that of Dr. Devlin to ask the question, was actionable negligence.

[8] In the appellant's brief on this application, these grounds were put forward as the basis for granting a new hearing:

1. The judgment is contrary to the apparent position of this court, as stated during the hearing;

2. The decision fails to focus on the central issues involved in the appeal; and

3. The decision contains inaccurate references with respect to evidence and fails to make reference to important pieces of evidence.

[9] The first point was linked in oral argument with much emphasis upon the fact that judgment was pronounced more than six months after the conclusion of the hearing. The suggestion is that at least two members of the court had demonstrated a proper understanding of the appellant's case during oral argument but, because of the inordinate delay in dealing with the case, had forgotten what it was about. That suggestion demonstrates a regrettable lack of understanding of the significance of comments from the bench during argument, and of the nature of the court's approach to deciding a difficult case.

[10] During the course of hearing of the appeal, there were many indications that the court was favourably inclined to the appellant's case. Counsel for the respondent faced some heavy weather in advancing his submissions on behalf of the judgment under appeal. Counsel for the appellant could properly take some comfort from that. But no counsel should, unless he hears from the bench that it does not need to hear him further or words to that effect, delude himself into thinking that comments or questions during argument necessarily foreshadow the outcome. Often it turns out that they do. There are cases in which judgment is reserved although all members of the court have a clear view of what the result should be. This was very far from being such a case. We left the bench not knowing what the outcome should be, and knowing that many hours of reading and study would be needed in order to come to a firm conclusion.

[11] This may be an appropriate point at which to say something about the burden which the appellant had to discharge on this appeal. The issues were almost entirely factual. It therefore could not be enough to satisfy us that there had been error by the trial judge - it was necessary to demonstrate that his decision was affected by palpable and overriding error. Those strong words, sometimes called the "Kathy K. rule", have been repeated so often in recent years that they may have tended to lose their impact. But, as we have been reminded many times by the Supreme Court of Canada, they establish a test which cannot often be met, one which sometimes requires appellate judges to dismiss an appeal notwithstanding their own view of the "rightness" of the decision, and which forbids them from retrying the case.

1989 CanLII 2760 (BC CA)

[12] In some cases the "Kathy K. rule" simplifies the task of the appellate court. Those are cases in which it becomes manifest during oral argument that the appellant is seeking to have the court retry the case, and that there is no basis for seriously considering allowing the appeal. But where the court is in doubt at the end of the hearing, the rule imposes a heavy burden of work. In those cases, of which this was one, the members of court must read and analyze virtually the whole of a voluminous record. That work precedes the drafting of reasons but to a large extent continues throughout the drafting process. When a draft has been produced, the other members of the court must make their own analysis which may be reflected in separate reasons or may result in basic agreement although often, as was the case here, with extensive suggestions for revisions. As the process goes on the case which the court was inclined to favour during the hearing may come to appear less impressive. Whatever the outcome, the process takes time. We prefer to take less time than was taken here and generally succeed in that, but feel bound to take as much time as is needed.

[13] The submissions on behalf of the appellant on the first ground betrayed some loss of objectivity on the part of counsel, most markedly when he suggested there was "some kind of bias" shown against his client because his evidence on a crucial factual issue had not been accepted by the trial judge as reliable. In my view, there was no proper basis shown for that suggestion. I turn now to the more substantial questions raised by the second and third points.

[14] The application is almost unprecedented in that it seeks a reconsideration of a decision on the ground that it is wrong. It is not unusual for an application to vary to be made and granted where the basis of the application is a demonstrable oversight or error in a particular aspect. An example in the area of fact is an error in calculation in relation to damages. An example in the area of law is reliance on a statute which has been repealed. It is a fundamentally different matter to allow a full reargument of issues which have been argued and decided - to, as it were, allow a second kick at the cat. That approach seems to be widely used by many American appellate courts but has not generally been part of the tradition of courts in this country or elsewhere in the Commonwealth.

[15] Mr. Gibbons submits that the court should be willing to hear reargument because there is, in respect of a case like this, almost no prospect of leave to appeal being granted by the Supreme Court of Canada. Until 1975 there was an appeal as of right and, even after leave to appeal became a requirement, a significant number of civil cases got leave. The suggestion that rehearings should be more frequently permitted in light of present circumstances may find some support in the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada, after it became the court of final resort for Canada, occasionally granted applications for rehearing. In Poole v. R., [1968] S.C.R. 381, 64 W.W.R. 225, 3 C.R.N.S. 213, 3 C.C.C. 257, 68 D.L.R. (2d) 449 [B.C.], the rehearing was granted because the question of jurisdiction upon which the majority had founded its decision had not been argued on the hearing. In Toronto v. Loblaw Groceterias Co., [1972] S.C.R. 600 at 624, 27 D.L.R. (3d) 512n, the rehearing was in respect of a number of asserted errors in the majority reasons.

[16] On the other hand, it does not appear from the reported cases that any provincial appellate court has adopted a different rule than the stringent one which has applied in the past. The only cases which have come to my attention in which the matter has been considered from that viewpoint are in the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal. They are:

[19] In Storey v. Zazelenchuk, a case of a petition under the Controverted Elections Act, the petitioner who had lost at trial and who had lost on appeal on an equal division of the four judges who gave judgment (the fifth judge having retired before judgment), applied for a rehearing on the ground that the issues of law were a matter of public importance and that the uncertainty created by the division in the Court of Appeal should be removed by a majority judgment. All seven members of the court sat on the application which, by a majority of five to two, was dismissed. The rule applied, based on an older line of Saskatchewan cases, was that the court will reconsider its judgment only in special or unusual circumstances of a kind which, the majority held, were not found in that case. Cameron and Tallis JJ.A. dissented.

[20] In Armco v. P.C.L the unsuccessful respondent applied for a rehearing on the ground that the majority judgment had failed to consider and apply several decisions of the Supreme Court of Canada and other appellate courts and that there were special or unusual circumstances to warrant a rehearing because of the effect of the judgment on the construction industry. The application was refused. Tallis and Cameron JJ.A., who had dissented in Storey v. Zazelenchuk, considered themselves bound by that decision to find that the test of "special or unusual circumstances" had not been met. Wakeling J.A. dissented. His judgment is of particular interest for the reasons which he gave for holding that the court should no longer view "special circumstances" in the same way as had been done in the earlier cases. At pp. 632-33 he said:

> Expediency, resulting from a much enlarged work-load, demands that most cases be heard in this court before three judges, which means the issue is determined on the basis of two opinions. No litigant has an absolute right of further appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, but only those who obtain leave. The Supreme Court has stated it is no longer a court for the correction of error and will only take those cases which involve points of significant national interest. In the foreseeable future, most of the Supreme Court cases will be Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms related and for all intents and purposes, this court has become a court of last resort for the residents of Saskatchewan.
> This change of circumstances warrants a change in this court's view of its obligation to litigants. Where once this court could have reasonable assurance its important decisions would be subject to a further review and detailed consideration by the leading legal minds of the land, there is now no such assurance. This must surely mean this court has an added responsibility to be sure its judgments represent the view of the court and not just a panel thereof. It is unacceptable, to the extent that something can be done about it, that the final result of anyone's case might be dependent, in the final analysis, on a matter as haphazard as the makeup of the appellate panel.

1989 CanLII 2760 (BC CA)

> It seems to me that those who have so long praised the development of the common law, have seen in it the growth of a system which has been devised by forward-thinking and often venturesome minds of the judiciary. They have managed to work with law based on precedent and yet over the centuries develop a body of law capable of adapting to changing social and economic conditions. I cannot believe that it is sufficient for this court to accept its new role as a court of last resort without doing all that it reasonably can to see that the judgments it produces are correct, and to this end when a reasonable doubt of correctness is established they will be reheard so the final result will represent the view of the court and not merely a three-member panel thereof.

[21] I have quoted those passages because they put very clearly the case for taking a more liberal approach than in the past to permit reargument. Clearly, if that approach is to be taken, it must be taken cautiously to avoid the danger of opening the floodgates and immersing the court in a flood of new work which, in the end, may serve mainly to add to the already intolerable cost and delay of litigation.

[22] For the purposes of deciding this application, I am prepared to accept that the scope for reargument should be wider than in the past. Without attempting to state a definitive rule, I approach the matter on the basis that if it appears that the court overlooked or misapprehended the evidence in a significant respect, and that a risk of miscarriage of justice ensued, there should be a rehearing.

[23] However wide the limits on this discretion, I would not exercise it in this case. The reasons did focus on the points raised by the appellant, but not, as the argument tended to do, to the exclusion of the whole body of evidence. I cannot find that the reasons, to any significant degree, included any inaccurate references to evidence. Undoubtedly, they failed to refer to many aspects of it. To refer to everything would require reasons of intolerable length but it does not follow that all the evidence was not considered. It is the proper role of counsel to pick out those aspects which best support his case and to urge that they be interpreted as best supports that case. Some of the matters upon which the appellant's case rested proved, on analysis, not be as clear and conclusive as they were made to appear during the submissions. An example of such matters may help to illustrate the point.

[24] The case asserted against Dr. Harlos was that the only conclusion at which he could arrive, based on the plaintiff's symptoms, was that he was suffering from an acoustic neuroma. One of the passages in the evidence of Dr. Harlos cited to us was this exchange at transcript, vol. II, p. 279, lines 33-40:

> Q. What other conditions may have caused the symptoms? A. Of 1977?
> Q. Well, all right, just deal with Dr. Stevens up to then, yes? A. Well, we really - I didn't really know at the time what was causing the symptoms. It could have been a self-limited flu-like illness or it could have been an anxiety attack.

[25] The symptoms of which the plaintiff was complaining were "woozy, dizzy spells, blacking out, losing balance". Dr. Harlos said that it could not be explained at that time on the basis of an acoustic neuroma but that a possible explanation would be "anxiety".

[26] This was in examination in chief. Earlier in his examination in chief, he said that he and Dr. Stevens had concluded, "that he [Menzies] did not have an acoustic neuroma".

[27] In cross-examination at T2/337, lines 23-38, he conceded that he was not an expert in acoustic neuroma and that Dr. Stevens was not an expert in this field. Mr. Gibbons asked why he did not refer the plaintiff to someone who was an expert in making such a diagnosis. Dr. Harlos replied that he had referred Menzies on three occasions to a competent E.N.T. specialist who had seen the plaintiff on three occasions and had reported that his hearing problem was probably vascular. He said, also, at line 32, that the attacks were in retrospect "far apart and the other symptoms were vague and not indicative of an acoustic neuroma and more over we had had at this time two sets of x-rays showing no change in the internal auditory meatus and therefore we were reassured that in all probability he did not have acoustic neuroma."

[28] Mr. Gibbons then referred Dr. Harlos to his examination for discovery. He asked whether Dr. Harlos in October 1977 had considered that the plaintiff Menzies might have acoustic neuroma. Dr. Harlos replied, "Yes, it was a possibility." The next question Mr. Gibbons put to him was, "It was more than a possibility was it not? It was the obvious conclusion from these symptoms was it not?" Dr. Harlos replied, "No."

[29] Mr. Gibbons pursued this subject in his examination for discovery. He asked, "What else could it be with those symptoms? What else - what other type of disease condition - is associated with those symptoms?" Dr. Harlos replied (p. 338/33), "Anxiety would be number one, the deafness, partial deafness of some other cause." Mr. Gibbons then asked Dr. Harlos whether anxiety, having regard to his knowledge of the plaintiff, was something that he would reasonably expect as the cause of these symptoms. Dr. Harlos replied, "I think it could be reasonably expected."

[30] The evidence on this issue was voluminous. For every aspect of it which seems unfavourable to the plaintiff, his counsel can point to several which are favourable. The same was true of the other allegations against Dr. Harlos. As against Dr. Devlin, the evidence was less voluminous but, again, was not all one way in relation to the crucial issue whether his failure to inquire about hearing difficulties was so clearly a breach of sound practice as to necessarily import negligence. In each case, the trial judge interpreted the evidence, in light of all he had heard, as not leading to a conclusion of liability. That is what Mr. Justice Craig referred to when he said in the last paragraph of his reasons:

> While I think that there was a basis for a contrary conclusion in this case, I think, also, that having regard to the evidence which the trial judge accepted, there was ample evidence upon which he could justify the conclusion to which he came.

[31] As against both defendants, the question was whether, in failing to find what was there to be found, they had failed in their duty of care. In the end, we had to conclude that what was in issue here was the interpretation of the evidence as a whole and that we could identify no palpable and overriding error. The issue on appeal was not unlike that raised by the plaintiff in this court in Taylor v. R., where the majority of this court, in a judgment reported at 21 B.C.L.R. 155, 112 D.L.R. (3d) 297, held that the trial judge had erred in failing to find the defendant Ankenman to have been negligent. The trial judgment was restored by the Supreme Court of Canada in very brief reasons reported at (sub nom. Jaegli Ent. Ltd. v. Taylor) [1981] 2 S.C.R. 2, 124 D.L.R. (3d) 415, 40 N.R. 4 (sub nom. Taylor v. Ankenman).

[32] I cannot say that a differently constituted division, rehearing this case, would not come to a different conclusion but that cannot be the test. I am not persuaded that we overlooked matters of significance, much less that we did so in any way that would justify granting the unusual remedy of a rehearing.

[33] I would dismiss the application.

Place and Date of Hearing:	Vancouver, B.C. September 6, 2017
Place and Date of Judgment:	Vancouver, B.C. September 11, 2017

[1] THE COURT: Mr. McLean, who is disbarred as a lawyer, has brought a petition against the Law Society. The petition was preceded by four actions Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society. Mr. McLean discontinued the first two actions, Justice Grauer stayed the third, and Justices Pearlman and Bowden stayed the fourth.

[2] Justice Grauer provided the following background in McLean v. Law Society of British Columbia, 2017 BCSC 987, at para. 1:

> The plaintiff, Mr. McLean, is a former lawyer who was called to the bar in August 2010. His practice did not go smoothly. By October 2012 he had attracted the attention of the Discipline Committee of the Law Society of British Columbia, which authorized a conduct review. In 2013 he was subject to a period of administrative suspension for failing to provide accounting reports, and a panel of three benchers placed administrative conditions on his practice in January 2014. Ultimately, at the end of 2014, Mr. McLean allowed his membership in the Law Society to lapse, and on June 29, 2015, a hearing panel formally ordered him disbarred as ungovernable.

[3] Costs have been ordered against Mr. McLean in favour of the Law Society and fines have been levied against Mr. McLean by the Law Society. All of those obligations are the subject of entered orders in this Court. Mr. McLean has paid none of them. The total he owes is $65,371. Of that, the fines comprise $16,500 and the costs $48,871. Some of the costs are court costs; others are Law Society hearing costs. The following is a list of the eight costs orders and fines:

(a) $5,155.92 stated in a costs certificate dated June 2, 2017 arising from first action (S145607) Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society and its employees, which he discontinued;

(b) $3,618.27 stated in a costs certificate dated June 2, 2017 arising from second action (S148231) Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society and its employees, which he discontinued;

(c) $11,969.76 stated in a costs certificate dated May 23, 2017 arising from the Law Society's successful appeal (CA43059) of various summary judgment applications in the third action Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society and its employees;

(d) $10,130 (including a fine of $6,500) arising from the Law Society's discipline process in 2015 LSBC 06, registered as a judgment in S167374 on August 12, 2016;

(e) $6,785 arising from the Law Society's discipline process in 2015 LSBC 30, registered as a judgment in L170081 on March 8, 2017;

(f) $25,912.50 (including a $10,000 fine) arising from the Law Society's discipline process in 2015 LSBC 47, registered as a judgment in L-170082 on March 8, 2017;

(g) $1,300 arising from the Law Society's discipline process in 2016 LSBC 04, registered as a judgment in L170080 on March 8, 2017; and

(h) $500 stated in an order dated July 5, 2017 representing costs payable on application brought by the Law Society in the fourth action (S173987) Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society and its employees.

[4] Mr. McLean scheduled his petition to be heard September 22, 2017. As he has done in the past in his litigation with the Law Society, Mr. McLean set the hearing date without conferring with counsel for the Law Society. He estimated that his petition could be argued in 50 minutes. It is 73 pages long. Law Society counsel estimates the petition will occupy two hearing days. The latter estimate is the more reliable.

[5] In its application, filed August 17, 2017, the Law Society seeks the following three orders plus costs:

1. An order that the petitioner pay certificates of judgment and cost orders totaling $65,371.45 to the respondent and post $8,100 as security for the respondent's costs in this proceeding;
2. Until the petitioner satisfies the outstanding certificates of judgment and cost orders and posts the security described in the preceding paragraph, an order that the petition be stayed;
3. In the alternative to orders 1 and 2, an order adjourning the hearing of the petition set for September 22, 2017 to a date convenient to counsel for the respondent based on a time estimate of two days . . .

[Emphasis added.]

2017 BCSC 1713 (CanLII)

[6] There is no defence against Mr. McLean's obligation to pay $65,371. Impecuniosity would not negate those obligations. In any event Mr. McLean has not given any evidence about whatever may be his impecuniosity.

[7] There is no need for a further order to enforce Mr. McLean's payment obligations listed above. Those obligations remain outstanding ongoing.

[8] Before addressing the other relief the Law Society seeks, I set out some of the relevant case authority. The following passage is often cited when security for costs is sought against an individual rather than a company. It is at para. 27 in Han v. Cho, 2008 BCSC 1229:

> The onus is on the applicant to establish that he or she will be unable to recover costs (Bronson #1 at para. 45). The fact that the plaintiff resides outside the jurisdiction, has no assets within the jurisdiction, or is impecunious, is not sufficient in itself. The power to order security for costs against an individual is to be exercised cautiously, sparingly, and only under special circumstances, sometimes described as egregious circumstances. Such special circumstances could arise if an impecunious plaintiff also has a weak claim, or has failed to pay costs before, or refused to follow a court order for payment of maintenance.

[9] The court exercises its inherent jurisdiction in deciding whether to order security for costs against an individual. See Gichuru v. Pallai, 2014 BCSC 2330.

[10] I noted earlier that Mr. McLean has not said whether he is impecunious. All that is certain is that he has paid none of the costs or fines he owes to the Law Society. He has taken no steps toward doing so.

[11] In Wang v. British Columbia Medical Association, 2011 BCSC 1659, Justice Dickson, as she then was, granted a stay order against Dr. Wang until she paid an outstanding costs order so as to prevent an abuse of the court's process. On the facts before her, Justice Dickson did not also order security for costs.

[12] Finally, I refer again to Gichuru v. Pallai, cited above, which was decided by Justice Fenlon, as she then was. Her Ladyship ordered security for costs, with a stay pending the posting of security, because the individual plaintiff had failed to pay costs previously ordered against him. Leave to appeal Justice Fenlon's order was denied and the denial of leave was sustained by a three member division of the Court of Appeal. See 2015 BCCA 81 and 2015 BCCA 189.

[13] The authorities cited above, and the other cases to which I was referred, demonstrate the Court's broad discretion associated with the relief the Law Society seeks.

[14] In my view, Mr. McLean, who elects to keep his capacity to pay costs to himself, and who has incurred a substantial list of unpaid court costs, should be ordered to post security before taking the Law Society into court yet again. That is particularly so where, as here, the plaintiff has demonstrated no willingness or attempt to make any of the payments which have been ordered. The Law Society's requested order for security for costs is granted.

[15] The hearing of the petition is stayed until Mr. McLean posts security in a form satisfactory to the registrar and until he pays the court costs owing, which are those listed in subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) and (h), quoted above at para. 3 of these reasons. I will not stop Mr. McLean from working with counsel for the Law Society in the meantime to schedule two days for the hearing of the petition. The resulting hearing date will be one for which both sides are available. However, the posting of the security for costs in satisfactory form, and the payment of the costs listed in the four subparagraphs I have listed above in this paragraph of my reasons, need to be completed 30 days before the scheduled hearing date for the petition. If they are not, the hearing will be adjourned and not reset until they are.

> Failure to produce records on complaint investigation
>
> 3-5.01(1) Subject to subrules (2) and (3), a lawyer who is required under Rule 3-5 or 4-43 to produce and permit the copying of files, documents and other records, provide information or attend an interview and answer > questions and who fails or refuses to do so is suspended until he or she has complied with the requirement to the satisfaction of the Executive Director.

>
> (2) When there are special circumstances, the Discipline Committee may, in its discretion, order that
>
> (a) a lawyer not be suspended under subrule (1), or
>
> (b) a suspension under this Rule be delayed for a specified period of time.
>
> (3) At least 7 days before a suspension under this Rule can take effect, the Executive Director must deliver to the lawyer notice of the following:
>
> (a) the date on which the suspension will take effect;
>
> (b) the reasons for the suspension;
> (c) the means by which the lawyer may apply to the Discipline Committee for an order under subrule (2) and the deadline for making such an application before the suspension is to take effect.

[17] Mr. McLean argues that Rule 3-5.01 is not authorized by s. 26.01 of the Legal Profession Act. He may be right, but the Law Society does not defend the authority for Rule 3-5.01 as coming from s. 26.01. The Law Society instead relies on ss. 3, 11, 26, 36, and 37.1, and particularly I believe s. 26, as the authorizing sections. From my review of those sections, the Law Society appears to be right, particularly when the sections are read with the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Green v. Law Society of Manitoba, 2017 SCC 20 at paras. 9, 20–22, 27–33, and 41. If I were to decide the question of vires in these reasons, my decision would probably be against Mr. McLean.

[18] If it was not for a procedural problem preventing the statutory analysis at this stage, I would quote here and proceed to analyze the sections from the statute both sides have referred to me. The procedural problem is this. The declaratory relief Mr. McLean seeks here is a part of the relief he seeks, and a part of the full argument to be developed, in the petition itself. The petition was not scheduled before me on its merits, and the request for the declaration could not be argued in this interlocutory hearing except, if at all, by consent, which was not given. I therefore do not grant or deny the declaratory relief Mr. McLean seeks. (These reasons should not be construed as containing a substantive ruling on the question of vires for Rule 3-5.01. That issue remains outstanding.)

[19] Finally, before me, Mr. McLean asked for an order that the Law Society either destroy or give to him the forensically made copy it has of Mr. McLean's computer hard drive containing his documents relevant to the disputes he has or has had with the Law Society. Mr. McLean has the original hard drive in his possession. He alleges that the order pursuant to which the Law Society obtained the original hard drive and made the copy is an unauthorized order. Time did not permit that point to be developed in argument before me. Had there been enough time, the Petitioner would have run into the same procedural problem seen above regarding Rule 3-5.01.

[20] The Law Society replies, therefore, that the seizure order is presumptively sound at this stage, and that two of the four actions Mr. McLean commenced against the Law Society are only stayed and not dismissed. It adds that Mr. McLean is hopeful that the stay will be lifted at least for the third action. The Law Society, I note, is not investigating Mr. McLean at present, due no doubt in part to his current status as a disbarred former member.

[21] I order as follows. The Law Society will continue to hold the copy of the hard drive. It will not use documents from the hard drive in any ongoing proceeding with Mr. McLean without Mr. McLean's permission or a further order of this Court. If there comes a stage when Mr. McLean states in writing that all present or further claims by him against the Law Society are at an end, and that he will not apply for readmission, the Law Society will destroy the copy of the hard drive, or return it to Mr. McLean, as he elects.

[22] Costs of the applications before me are to the Law Society in any event of the cause, but are not payable forthwith.

"MACINTOSH J."

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

Introduction

[1] The plaintiff, Kevin McLean is a former practicing member of the defendant, Law Society of British Columbia (the "Law Society"). He has commenced an action against the Law Society as well as a number its employees, alleging various claims that he says arose as a result on investigations and regulatory proceedings conducted by the Law Society against him.

[2] On May 27, 2014, the defendant, Philip Riddell, a Bencher of the Law Society, made an order pursuant to Rule 4-43 of the Law Society Rules (the "impugned order") that an investigation be made of the plaintiff's books, records and accounts, and those of his professional law corporation. In June 2014, investigators designated by the Law Society attended at Mr. McLean's office for the purpose of carrying out the investigation under Rule 4-43. During the course of their attendance, the investigator made copies of records.

[3] The parties brought a number of applications which were heard on May 28-29, 2015. The plaintiff applies for orders granting him leave to file a further amended notice of civil claim, and striking paragraphs of the amended response.

[4] The plaintiff also seeks a declaration that the Law Society exceeded its jurisdiction when Mr. Riddell made the impugned order, and an order setting aside the impugned order. As well, the plaintiff seeks orders that the documents seized by the defendants as a result of the impugned order be returned to him; that he is not required to produce his personal cell phone for copying; and restraining the defendants from attempting to enter his personal residence. The plaintiff's application for orders that various non-parties produce documents was adjourned generally.

[5] The defendants apply for orders dismissing the action against Alison Kirby, John Nalleweg, Kieron Grady, Eva Milz, Mark Bussanich, Deborah Armour, Howie

Caldwell, and Mr. Riddell. As well, they apply to strike a number of paragraphs of the notice of civil claim.

[6] I will deal with each application separately.

The plaintiff's application to further amend the amended notice of civil claim and strike paragraphs of the defendants' amended response to civil claim

[7] The plaintiff applies for an order granting leave to file a further amended notice of civil claim. The defendants opposed the proposed amendments on the basis that they violate the rules governing pleadings, including the requirements relating to material facts, particulars and the prohibition against pleadings which disclose no reasonable claim.

[8] The issue is whether the proposed amendments should be allowed. For the following reasons, I conclude that many of the proposed amendments should not be allowed because they are not proper pleadings.

Applicable Law

[9] Rule 6-1 of the Supreme Court Civil Rules (the "SCCR") allows a party to amend a pleading at any time with leave of the court.

[10] Leave should be granted to amend pleadings when the amendments are necessary to determine the real issues between the parties and to secure the speedy, just and inexpensive determination of the case on its merits. Amendments should be allowed unless the opposite party can demonstrate either prejudice or that the amendments will be useless: Langret Investments S.A. v. McDonnell, [1996] B.C.J. No. 550, at para. 34 (C.A.).

[11] Proposed amendments should be considered on the same basis that an application to strike existing pleadings: McNaughton v. Baker(1988), 25 B.C.L.R. (2d) 17 (C.A.)

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

[12] The applicable portions of Rule 9-5 of the SCCR, which deals with striking pleadings, provide:

> (1)At any stage of a proceeding, the court may order to be struck out or amended the whole or any part of a pleading, petition or other document on the ground that
>
> (a) it discloses no reasonable claim or defence, as the case may be,
>
> (b) it is unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous or vexatious,
>
> (c) it may prejudice, embarrass or delay the fair trial or hearing of the proceeding, or
>
> (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, > and the court may pronounce judgment or order the proceeding to be stayed or dismissed and may order the costs of the application to be paid as special costs.
>
>
> Admissibility of evidence
>
> (2)No evidence is admissible on an application under subrule (1) (a).

[13] In opposing the application to amend the pleadings, the defendants rely primarily on Rule 9-5(1)(a) and (b).

[14] The test for striking out a pleading as disclosing no reasonable claim or defence was set out by the Supreme Court of Canada in Hunt v. Carey Canada Inc., [1990] 2 S.C.R. 959, at para. 980:

> … assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, it is 'plain and obvious' that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action? As in England, if there is a chance that the plaintiff might succeed, then the plaintiff should not be 'driven from the judgment seat'. Neither the length and complexity of the issues, the novelty of the cause of action, nor the potential for the defendant to present a strong defence should prevent the plaintiff from proceeding with his or her case. Only if the action is certain to fail because it contains a radical defect ranking with the others listed in Rule 19(24) of the British Columbia Rules of Court should the relevant portions of a plaintiff's statement of claim be struck out under Rule 19(24)(a).

[15] In R. v. Imperial Tobacco Canada, 2011 SCC 42, at paras. 21-22, the court reiterated that a claim or defence will only be struck if it is plain and obvious, assuming the facts pleaded are true, that the pleadings disclose no cause of action or defence, stating:

> [22] A motion to strike for failure to disclose a reasonable cause of action proceeds on the basis that the facts pleaded are true, unless they are manifestly incapable of being proven: Operation Dismantle Inc. v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 441, at p. 455. No evidence is admissible on such a motion: r. 19(27) of the Supreme Court Rules (now r. 9-5(2) of the Supreme Court Civil Rules). It is incumbent on the claimant to clearly plead the facts upon which it relies in making its claim. A claimant is not entitled to rely on the possibility that new facts may turn up as the case progresses. The claimant may not be in a position to prove the facts pleaded at the time of the motion. It may only hope to be able to prove them. But plead them it must. The facts pleaded are the firm basis upon which the possibility of success of the claim must be evaluated. If they are not pleaded, the exercise cannot be properly conducted.

[16] The following portion of Rule 3-1 of the SCCR sets out the requirements for a notice of civil claim:

> (2)A notice of civil claim must do the following:
>
> > (a) set out a concise statement of the material facts giving rise to the claim;
> >
> > (b) set out the relief sought by the plaintiff against each named defendant;
> >
> > (c) set out a concise summary of the legal basis for the relief sought…

Analysis

The plaintiff's application to file a further amended notice of civil claim

[17] The proposed further amended notice of civil claim is a very long document. The plaintiff asserts that the purpose of the proposed amendments is to plead the material facts relating to the following:

- A working paper prepared for the Law Society dealing with the copying of electronic records entitled "Report of the Mirror Imaging Working Group: Forensic Copying of Computer Records" which is defined as "The LSBC's Forensic Copy Paper";

- Further agreements between the defendants and other parties to circumvent the Legal Professions Act, S.B.C. 1998, c. 9, the Law Society Rules, and/or the case of Gardner v. Law Society (British Columbia), 1990 B.C.L.R. (2d) 122 (S.C.), aff'd (1991), 61 B.C.L.R. (2d) 219 (C.A.);

- The fact the agreement between the defendants was not in a specific form, does not need to be a binding contract;
- The issue of consent; and
- The impugned Law Society Rules.

[18] The defendants do not oppose the following proposed amendments to the notice of civil claim:

- Part 1, paragraphs 45 and 62;
- Part 2; and
- Part 3.

[19] However, the defendants opposed a number of the proposed amendments in Part 1 on the basis they are not material facts. I agree that the proposed amendments objected to contain irrelevant facts, arguments of law, and evidence.

[20] For example, the proposed amendment to paragraph 1 is underlined below and is not a proper pleading:

> 1. The Plaintiff, Kevin A. McLean, is a barrister and solicitor, a Chartered investment manager, and businessman residing in Vancouver, British Columbia. Mr. McLean entered into a practice supervision agreement (the "PSA") with Mr. Robert King on January 29, 2014. Mr. King was engaged to assist Mr. McLean with overall supervision of the 74 files he maintained as a sole practitioner in the same fashion that lawyers use senior counsel at law firms.

[21] Having reviewed the further amended notice of civil claim, and considered the submissions and case law provided, the following proposed amendments to Part 1 of the amended notice of civil claim are not granted:

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

- Paragraph 1. As noted above, the proposed amendment to paragraph 1 contains irrelevant facts and is not a proper pleading;

- Paragraphs 2 ggg. to iii. These proposed amendments do not plead material facts but evidence;

- Paragraph 49. The proposed amendments are unclear. The plaintiff has already alleged that the investigators entered his office without consent and the proposed amendments do not add anything.

- Paragraphs 71 - 72. The proposed amendments are extremely lengthy and contain evidence and legal argument, including quotations from case law and the LSBC Forensic Copy Paper. The proposed amendments to paragraphs 71 and 72 are not proper pleadings.

- Paragraph 73. The proposed amendments does not set out material facts. Rather the proposed amendments set out the laws the plaintiff alleges the defendants broke. The amended notice of civil claim already sets out that the defendants entered into an agreement to extricate the plaintiff from the practice of law unlawfully, and in contravention of the Legal Professions Act. The proposed amendments stating that the particulars of the conspiracy are circumventing and breaching the requirements of statutes and case law, are not proper particulars or pleadings.

- Paragraph 74. The proposed amendment is legal argument.

[22] In my view, the proposed amendments to paragraphs 71 -74 are prolix and violate Rule 3-1(2) of the SCCR which requires that a pleading set out a concise statement of the material facts giving rise to the claim, but not the evidence by which the facts are to be proved. The proposed amendments in paragraphs 71-74 are structured in a confusing way and do not identify the material facts the plaintiff is relying to prove the causes of action he alleges.

[23] Accordingly, the plaintiff is granted to leave to amend paragraphs 46 and 62 in Part 1, Part 2 and Part 3 as set out in the proposed further amended notice of civil claim appended to the plaintiff's application. The plaintiff's application to amend paragraphs 1, 2 ggg. - iii., 49, and 71-74 of the amended notice of civil claim is dismissed.

The plaintiff's application to strike portion of the defendants' response

[24] As stated earlier, the plaintiff applies to strike portions of the defendants' amended response to civil claim. Although in his application the plaintiff sought orders striking a number of paragraphs, at the hearing he only sought an order striking paragraph 10(f) on the basis that it was an inconsistent pleading.

[25] As noted in First Majestic Silver Corp. v. Davila Santos, 2012 BCCA 5, at para. 25, inconsistent allegations may be considered an abuse of process and struck on that basis.

[26] Paragraph 10(f) of the defendants' amended response to the civil claim provides:

> Having regard to the information and concerns that led to the making of the Rule 4-43 order and consistently with the LSBC's standard practice in such cases, Mr. Bussanich and the LSBC considered it important that the plaintiff only become aware of the order upon the commencement of the investigation by the investigators' attending at his office to take possession of copies of the plaintiff's documents, to avoid any risk of tampering or alteration by the plaintiff.

[27] The plaintiff argues that this paragraph is inconsistent with paragraph 10(h) which provides:

> When the investigators attend at the plaintiff's office on June 3, 2014, they were initially asked to wait in the reception area. On arriving and learning that they were present, the plaintiff left by a back door to avoid meeting them. A person apparently in charge of the office then invited the investigators to wait > in the plaintiff's office and they did so. They did not review or copy any documents on this occasion and they left at the close of business.

[28] Although the plaintiff argues the paragraphs are inconsistent, it is unclear as to how they are inconsistent. The plaintiff asserts that pleading that the Law Society's usual standard is to only inform a member of an order when they attend at his office to take possession of copies of the documents, and then plead that they did not take documents until he gave permission is inconsistent. However, in my view there is nothing inconsistent in the two paragraphs such that paragraph 10(f) should be struck on the basis that is an abuse of process. The issue of whether or not the investigators had permission to enter the plaintiff's officer, and whether he gave them permission to take documents are live issues.

[29] Accordingly, the plaintiff's application to strike paragraph 10(f) of the defendants' amended response to civil claim is dismissed.

The defendant's application to dismiss the action against the personal defendants, or, alternatively, strike portions of the amended notice of civil claim [30] The personal defendants other than Lawrence Dirk apply for summary judgment under Rule 9-6 of the SCCR to dismiss the action against them. As well, they take the position that the action against them should be dismissed because the amended notice of civil claim fails to state a reasonable cause of action against them.

[31] In the alternative, the defendants say that various paragraphs of the amended notice of civil claim should be struck under Rule 9-5(1) of the SCCR on the basis they are unnecessary, scandalous, frivolous, or fail to state reasonable claims.

[32] The plaintiff opposes the dismissal of the actions against the personal defendants on the basis that it is premature. The plaintiff says that neither document discovery nor examinations for discovery have been completed. The plaintiff asserts that the defendants have misconceived the depth and breadth of the conspiracy pleas. The plaintiff argues that the malice behind many of the actions taken by the Law Society against him is self-evident in the affidavit materials, and it will be necessary to conduct documentary discovery to determine the extent of the malice.

Applicable Law

[33] The defendants apply pursuant to Rules 9-5 and 9-6 of the SCCR to have portions of the amended notice of civil claim struck, and the claims against the personal defendants dismissed. They say other portions of the amended notice of civil claim should be struck because it is not proper pleadings but rather argument.

[34] I already set out the applicable portions of Rule 9-5 of the SCCR and the test to be applied. As noted, Rule 9-5(1)(a) does not apply when there is a factual dispute.

[35] Rule 9-6 of the SCCR provides:

> (1) In this rule:
>
> > "answering party" , in relation to a claiming party's originating pleading, means a person who serves, on the claiming party, a responding pleading that relates to a claim made in the originating pleading;
> >
> > "claiming party" means a party who filed an originating pleading.
>
>
> (4) In an action, an answering party may, after serving a responding pleading on a claiming party, apply under this rule for judgment dismissing all or part of a claim in the claiming party's originating pleading.
>
> (5) On hearing an application under subrule (2) or (4), the court,
>
> > (a) if satisfied that there is no genuine issue for trial with respect to a claim or defence, must pronounce judgment or dismiss the claim accordingly,
> >
> > (b) if satisfied that the only genuine issue is the amount to which the claiming party is entitled, may order a trial of that issue or pronounce judgment with a reference or an accounting to determine the amount,
> >
> > (c) if satisfied that the only genuine issue is a question of law, may determine the question and pronounce judgment accordingly, and
> >
> > (d) may make any other order it considers will further the object of these Supreme Court Civil Rules.

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

[36] Rule 9-6(4) and (5) allows for dismissal when the court is satisfied there is no genuine issue for trial. Rule 9-6 is not available when there are disputed facts on the pleadings.

[37] In L.D. (Guardian ad litem of) v. Provincial Health Services Authority, 2011 BCSC 628, rev'd on other grounds, 2012 BCCA 491, the chamber's judge considered the scope of Rule 9-6 and noted there is no ability to weigh evidence, assess credibility or draw inferences against the party defending the application when determining whether there is a genuine issue for trial. The Court of Appeal approved of the proposition that an issue of law should only be decided under Rule 9-6 if the judge is satisfied there is no real dispute about the material facts and the issue of law is well settled by authoritative jurisprudence. Rule 9-7 is better suited for deciding novel points of law because there will be a more complete record. See also 4 Corners Properties Ltd. v. Boffo Developments (Smithe) Ltd., 2013 BCSC 1926, at paras. 20-24.

[38] The defendants advance a number of arguments, including that the pleadings do not provide the level of particularity required when pleading conspiracy, relying on Can-Dive Services Ltd. v. Pacific Coast Energy Corp., [1993] B.C.J. No. 2958 (C.A.); and Watson v. Bank of America Corporation, 2014 BCSC 532.

[39] Can-Dive lists the elements of conspiracy that must be proven at para. 5 as follows:

> 1. an agreement between two or more persons;
>
> 2. concerted action taken pursuant to the agreement;
>
> 3. (i) if the action is lawful, there must be evidence that the conspirators intended to cause damage to the plaintiff;
>
> (ii)if the action is unlawful, there must at least be evidence that the conspirators knew or ought to have known that their action would injure the plaintiff (i.e., constructive intent);
>
> 4. actual damage suffered by the plaintiff.

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

[40] In Watson, the defendants made similar arguments in relation to the level of the detail needed to properly plead the tort of conspiracy. The court noted at para. 141-142:

> [141] As a result, the defendants claim that the pleadings are deficient for failing to disclose, among other particulars, the identity of every party to the conspiracy and their relationships, the date(s) of any alleged agreements, and the specific acts of each defendant.
>
> [142] I do not consider Can-Dive to impose those requirements so strictly. They represent an ideal. The Court's conclusion in Can-Dive was that pleadings must be as specific as possible. The very nature of a claim in conspiracy resists particularization at the early stages (North York Branson Hospital v. Praxair Canada Inc., [1998] O.J. No. 5993, (Div. Ct.) at para. 22). It may often not be possible to provide particulars as specific as the date of an agreement in a conspiracy case. Given the nature of conspiracy claims, it would be perverse if the failure to plead a specific date was fatal to a claim that otherwise was not bound to fail.

Analysis

[41] In this case, the plaintiff alleges the pre-dominant purpose of the conspiracy is to harm him by making his continued practice of law impossible, including by conducting an illegal search of his office, and defaming him. As noted earlier, the amended notice of civil claim is a long document and contains irrelevant evidence and legal argument. The material facts are difficult to discern. However, the thrust of the plaintiff's complaint against the personal defendants is that they knowingly agreed to harm the plaintiff by conducting an investigation of his practice of law, including a search of his office, when they knew the impugned order under Rule 4-43 was unlawful and did not give them the authority to do so.

[42] In paragraph 73 of the amended notice of civil claim, the plaintiff refers to the Law Society Rule 4-43, and then sets out the allegations regarding the conspiracy as follows:

> In 2012, the LSBC Defendants entered into an agreement to extricate the Plaintiff from the practice of law without lawful reason and in contravention of the Legal Profession Act (the "Conspiracy Objective"). The particulars of the agreement were as follows:
>
> a) extricate the plaintiff from the practice of law;

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

> b) demoralize the Plaintiff about practicing law;
>
> c) making the practice of law excessively expensive for the Plaintiff;
>
> d) humiliate him through the Unlawful Search and Seizure;
>
> e) make the Plaintiff subject to a litany of expenses, legal fees;
>
> f) make the Plaintiff subject to embarrassment through continued and excessive mailings to his office despite an agreement to the contrary;
>
> g) batter him in public;
>
> h) touch him without consent in public;
>
> i) defaming him to third parties; and
>
> j) other particulars to be provided during the discovery process and at trial.
>
> The parties that were eventually party and privy to the Conspiracy Agreement included the following people:
>
> k) The LSBC Defendants; and
>
> l) others that will become known after these LSBC Defendants unlawfully refuse to attend their appointments for discoveries.
>
> (collectively, the "Conspirators")
>
> The Conspirators to the Conspiracy Agreement had a predominant purpose to injure the Plaintiff (the "Injurious Conspiracy").
>
> The Conspirators to the Conspiracy Agreement used unlawful means that injured the Plaintiff and the Conspirators knew that the unlawful means would injure the Plaintiff (the "Unlawful Conspiracy").
>
> The Injurious Conspiracy and Unlawful Conspiracy caused damage to the Plaintiff (collectively, the "Conspiracies").

[43] The personal defendants include employees of the Law Society, Mr. Dirk who is an investigator, and Mr. Riddell. The claims against them are that they conspired to injure the plaintiff and to circumvent the Legal Profession Act.

[44] The plaintiff asserts that Mr. Riddell knowingly made an unlawful decision when he made the impugned order pursuant to the Law Society Rule 4-43 for an investigation of the books, records and accounts of the plaintiff and his law practice. The plaintiff alleges the defendant Mr. Dirk committed battery against him during the course of carrying out the investigation.

[45] Ms. Kirby, Ms. Berger and Mr. Nallaweg are staff lawyers with the Law Society. The plaintiff alleges that Ms. Kirby and Mr. Nallaweg defamed the plaintiff and made false statements about him. The plaintiff alleges Mr. Berger made false accusations against him. Two staff lawyers employed by the Law Society, Brenda Adlem and Erin Berger are not named as defendants but are referred to the in the amended notice of civil claim as participating in the conspiracy.

[46] Ms. Milz is a chartered professional accountant employed by the Law Society who was the team leader in respect of a trust compliance audit of the plaintiff's books and records. She attended the plaintiff's law office between April 23 and 30, 2013, to conduct a follow-up compliance audit and field work. The plaintiff alleges Ms. Milz defamed and threatened him during the course of the investigation.

[47] The allegations against Mr. Bussanich and Mr. Grady are that they did not carry out their duties during the disciplinary process properly and thereby injured the plaintiff. The allegation against Ms. Armour is that she incited the conspirators and the Law Society's agents to enter the plaintiff's office during the investigation.

[48] The personal defendants, along with Ms. Adlem and Ms. Berger, have all sworn affidavits denying the allegations that they conspired to injure the plaintiff. All of them have deposed they did not enter into a conspiracy to injure the plaintiff or contravene the Legal Professions Act. As well, each of them have deposed that they are not a party of vendetta against the plaintiff and do not have any malice towards him, and that all of their conduct regarding the plaintiff has been for the purpose of carrying out their jobs or duties to the Law Society.

[49] The plaintiff relies on three affidavits in response, two he swore and the other by Amy Diaz, a legal administrative assistant, who assisted the plaintiff with various tasks from time to time.

[50] In his 5th affidavit, the plaintiff deposes that he does not believe the personal defendants are telling the truth in certain circumstances, that their evidence is unclear and equivocal, and that he has requested particulars of the evidence.

[51] As well, he sets out some of the evidence he will be relying on to establish the claims pleaded, including that Ms. Milz defamed him to others, Mr. Dirk battered him and stalked him, Mr. Grady proceeded with a hearing when he knew the plaintiff could not attend, and Ms. Kirby and Mr. Nalleweg made false or defamatory statements about him.

[52] The plaintiff's 6th affidavit and Ms. Diaz's affidavit deal with the investigators' attendance at his office. Ms. Diaz deposes that when she asked for the plaintiff's keys which had been left in his office, one of the investigators told her "No. Nothing leaves this office", and then asked her for her name. Ms. Diaz relayed the information to the plaintiff.

[53] The plaintiff argues the personal defendants knew their actions were illegal in contravention of s. 37 of the Legal Professions Act, which required that the Law Society obtain a search warrant prior to conducting a search of his office. The plaintiff asserts that the personal defendants knew that conducting such a search pursuant to a Law Society rule was illegal. As well, the plaintiff argues that the personal defendants knew that the hearing was being conducted based on information gained from the illegal search and seizure of his documents. The plaintiff also argues that he was battered and harassed by some of the personal defendants as part of the conspiracy to injure him and prevent him from practicing law by intimidation.

[54] The defendants assert that the plaintiff's affidavits do not contain evidence which substantiates his conspiracy claim. They point to the fact that the individual defendants have all comprehensively and unequivocally denied the fact they participated in a conspiracy.

[55] However, the defendants have applied under Rule 9-5 and Rule 9-6 of the SCCR. As noted earlier, if there is a dispute on the facts the issue cannot be determined under those rules. Having reviewed the pleadings and the affidavits I agree it is premature to determine the issue of whether the individual defendants entered into an agreement to extricate the plaintiff from the practice of law without lawful reason and in contravention of the Legal Professions Act. There is a dispute raised by the pleadings as to whether the individual defendants agreed to conspire against the plaintiff. Although the defendants have all deposed they did not conspire against the plaintiff to injure him, the plaintiff alleges they did, and points to certain facts he will be relying upon.

[56] As noted earlier, in considering whether a reasonable claim is alleged under Rule 9-5 of the SCCR, the court must consider the issue on the basis that the facts as alleged are true: Canadian Bar Assn. v. British Columbia, 2008 BCCA 92.

[57] The issue of whether the personal defendants agreed to knowingly use unlawful means, with the predominant purpose to injure the plaintiff cannot be decided on disputed facts.

[58] The defendants argue that the claims in defamation against the personal defendants in the course of their duties in the regulatory matters are bound to fail because of the privilege afforded to communications made for the purpose of carrying out ones duty as a lawyer for a regulatory body, relying of Schut v. Magee, 2003 BCCA 417; Hamouth v. Edwards & Angell, 2005 BCCA 172, at para. 39; and D'Mello v. Law Society of Upper Canada, 2014 ONCA 912.

[59] From Hamouth and D'Mello it is clear that lawyers are entitled to the protection of absolute privilege when they are performing duties for their client during a quasi-judicial proceeding. Absolute privilege applies to communications made by lawyers in the course of their investigations.

[60] As a result, I find that the plaintiff's claims against Ms. Armour, Ms. Berger, Ms. Kirby, and Mr. Nalleweg that they filed false submissions, made false accusations, or defamed him in the course of the investigative and disciplinary proceeding cannot stand.

[61] The defendants also argue that the personal defendants are immune from liability in this action pursuant to s. 86(1) of the Legal Professions Act which provides:

> (1) No action for damages lies against a person, for anything done or not done in good faith while acting or purporting to act on behalf of the society or the foundation under this Act.

[62] As well, they argue that the individual defendants are immune from liability pursuant to s. 1 of the Disciplinary Authority Protection Act, R.S.B.C.1996, c. 98, and that the Law Society and Mr. Riddell are protected by s. 56 of the Administrative Tribunals Act, S.B.C. 2004, c. 45.

[63] However, those provisions do not provide immunity if a person acts maliciously or in bad faith. Here, the plaintiff alleges the personal defendants knowingly acted unlawfully. If the plaintiff is able to prove the personal defendants were knowingly acting unlawfully, or in bad faith, or maliciously, the sections of the acts relied on by the defendants would not provide immunity. In my view, that issue cannot be determined pursuant to Rule 9-6 of the SCCR because there is disputed evidence.

[64] For the reasons set out, I am of the view that the defendants' application to strike the claims against the personal defendants should be dismissed as premature.

[65] I turn to the defendants' alternative submission that portions of the amended notice of civil claim should be struck as disclosing no reasonable cause of action.

[66] I agree there are portions of the amended notice of civil claim that should be struck. They are as follows:

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

- Paragraphs 3, 4 and 51 which refer to prospective plaintiffs.

- The references to Ms. Adlem and Ms. Berger in paragraphs 8-9 and 132-134. Neither are named as defendants and their conduct is not relevant to any of the allegations in the amended notice of civil claim.

- The following paragraphs should be struck on the basis that they contain irrelevant evidence - paragraphs 49, 50, 57, 59, 117, and 124-126;

- The portion of paragraph 73 commencing "On or about 2011, the Plaintiff's former partner at a law firm, Mr. Varty, reported him to the LSBC after he decided to leave the said firm" to the sentence commencing with "In 2012, the LSBC Defendants entered into an agreement to extricate the plaintiff from practice of law" on the basis that it is irrelevant evidence;

- Paragraphs 40 and 72 of Part 1 and paragraphs 14 and 15 of Part 3 on the basis that they contain legal argument; and

- The portions of paragraphs 6, 7, and 10 of part 1 that allege the personal defendants defamed the plaintiff or communicated about him in a malicious manner.

The plaintiff's application for a declaration that the Law Society exceeded its jurisdiction in making the impugned order, and an order setting it aside

[67] The plaintiff seeks a declaration that the Law Society exceeded its jurisdiction when Mr. Riddell made the impugned order, and an order setting it aside. As well, the plaintiff seeks a number of other orders, including a mandatory injunction compelling the defendants to return the documents seized during the search of his office and computer, an order that the plaintiff is not required to produce his personal cell phone for copying by the Law Society, and that the defendants are restrained from attempting to enter his residence. The plaintiff applies pursuant to Rules 1-3, 8,

9-5, 9-6, 14-1 and 22 of the SCCR. As well, the plaintiff relies on the Legal Professions Act.

[68] The defendants oppose the plaintiff's application. The defendants submit this is the plaintiff's second application for judgment pursuant to Rules 9-5 and 9-6 of the SCCR on a legal point pertaining to the purported invalidity of the Law Society Rule 4-43 and the impugned order and is duplicative. The defendants point to the fact that the first application was dismissed.

[69] The defendants argue that the case the plaintiff is relying on to renew his legal argument in regards to the impugned rule, namely Gardner v. Law Society of British Columbia, does not have application as it dealt with an earlier statute. The defendants take the position that the Law Society Rule 4-43 is clearly authorized by ss. 36 and 37.1 of the Legal Professions Act, and that is a full answer to the plaintiff's legal argument.

[70] As well, the defendants submit that the plaintiff's application must fail because there are facts in dispute. They point to the earlier judgment in which it was found that there was a dispute as to whether the plaintiff consented to the search of his office and electronic devices.

Applicable Law

[71] The rules that the plaintiff relies on in this application are Rules 9-5 and 9-6 of the SCCR. As noted earlier, Rule 9-6 is not available when there are disputed facts on the pleadings. While evidence can be considered under Rule 9-6 in determining whether there is evidence to support a claim, the evidence cannot be weighed.

[72] The Law Society's authority to conduct investigations of its members comes from the Legal Professions Act. The applicable provisions of the Legal Professions Act provide:

> 36 The benchers may make rules to do any of the following:

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

(a) establish a discipline committee and delegate any or all authority and responsibility under this Part, other than rule-making authority, to that committee;

(b) authorize an investigation of the books, records and accounts of a lawyer if there is reason to believe that the lawyer may have committed any misconduct, conduct unbecoming a lawyer or a breach of this Act or the rules;

(c) authorize an examination of the books, records and accounts of a lawyer or law firm;

(d) require a lawyer or law firm to cooperate with an investigation or examination under paragraph (b) or (c), including producing records and other evidence and providing explanations on request;

(e) require a lawyer or articled student to appear before the benchers, a committee or other body to discuss the conduct or competence of the lawyer or articled student;

(e.1) require a representative of a law firm to appear before the benchers, a committee or other body to discuss the conduct of the law firm;

(f) authorize the ordering of a hearing into the conduct or competence of a lawyer or an articled student, or the conduct of a law firm, by issuing a citation;

(g) authorize the rescission of a citation;

(h) permit the benchers to summarily suspend or disbar a lawyer convicted of an offence that was proceeded with by way of indictment or convicted in another jurisdiction of an offence that, in the opinion of the benchers, is equivalent to an offence that may be proceeded with by way of indictment;

(i) establish a process for the protection of the privacy and the severing, destruction or return of personal, business or other records that are unrelated to an investigation or examination and that, in error or incidentally, form part of

(i) the books, records or accounts of a lawyer, an articled student or a law firm authorized to be investigated or examined under a rule made under paragraph (b) or section 26, or

(ii) files or other records that are seized in accordance with an order of the Supreme Court under section 37.

Search and seizure

37 (1) The society may apply to the Supreme Court for an order that the files or other records, wherever located, of or relating to a lawyer or articled student be seized from the person named in the order, if there are reasonable grounds to believe that a lawyer or articled student may have committed or will commit any

(a) misconduct,

(b) conduct unbecoming a lawyer, or

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

(c) breach of this Act or the rules.

(2) An application under subsection (1) may be made without notice to anyone or on such notice as the judge requires.

(3) If the application under subsection (1) is in relation to the conduct of an articled student, the order may be made in respect of the books, accounts, files or other records of the student's principal or the principal's firm.

(4) In an application under subsection (1), the person making the application must state on oath or affirmation the grounds for believing the matter referred to in subsection (1) and the grounds for believing that the seizure will produce evidence relevant to that matter.

(5) In an order under subsection (1), the court may

(a) designate the person who will conduct the seizure and authorize that person to conduct it,

(b) state the time and place where the seizure will take place, and

(c) give any other directions that are necessary to carry out the seizure.

Personal records in investigation or seizure

37.1 In conducting an investigation or examination of books, records or accounts under section 26 or rules made under section 36 (b) or in the seizure of files or other records in accordance with an order of the Supreme Court under section 37, the society may collect personal information unrelated to the investigation or examination that, in error or incidentally, is contained in those books, accounts, files or records, but the society must, subject to rules made under section 36 (i),

(a) return that personal information if and as soon as practicable, or

(b) destroy that personal information.

[73] The Interpretation Act, R.S.B.C.1996, c. 238, provides in s. 29:

29. In an enactment:

"record" includes books, documents, maps, drawings, photographs, letters, vouchers, papers and any other thing on which information is recorded or stored by any means whether graphic, electronic, mechanical or otherwise;

[74] Law Society Rule 4-43 provides:

4-43 (1) If the chair of the Discipline Committee reasonably believes that a lawyer or former lawyer may have committed a discipline violation, the chair may order that an investigation be made of the books, records and accounts of the lawyer or former lawyer, including, if considered desirable in the opinion of the chair, all electronic records of the lawyer or former lawyer.

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

> (1.1) When electronic records have been produced or copied pursuant to an order under this Rule, the lawyer concerned may request that a specific record be excluded from the investigation on the basis that it contains personal information that is not relevant to the investigation.
>
> (1.2) The lawyer must make a request under subrule (1.1) in writing to a person designated under subrule (2) within 7 days of receiving a copy of the order under this Rule.
>
> (1.3) An order under this Rule that permits the production or copying of electronic records must provide for a method of evaluating and adjudicating exclusion requests made under subrule (1.1).
> (1.4) A request under subrule (1.1) must be refused unless the records in question are retained in a system of storage of electronic records that permits the segregation of personal information in a practical manner in order to comply with the request.

[75] In Gardner, the chamber's judge dealt with an application for a declaration that the Discipline Committee of the Law Society had exceeded its jurisdiction in ordering the suspension of the petitioner from practicing law and ordering a "spot" audit. During the spot audit, an investigator appointed by the Law Society conducted an extensive review of the petitioner's professional and personal papers located in his law office and in his accountant's office. The documents inspected and photocopied included personal records, unrelated to the petitioner's professional activities as a barrister and solicitor, including documents related to private companies controlled by him. The chamber's judge reviewed the provisions of the former Legal Profession Act, and found that there was no jurisdiction under the Act to allow the Discipline Committee to order the form of audit undertaken. The applicable sections provided:

> 40.(1) Where the chairman of the discipline committee or, in his absence, a member of the executive committee, has reasonable grounds to believe that a member, former member or articled student
>
> > (a) has contravened this Act or a rule made under it, or
> >
> > (b) has conducted himself in a manner that could result in a determination being made under section 45(1)(b) or (c), he may apply, ex parte or on notice as the judge requires, to a judge of the Supreme Court for an order that
> > (c) the books and accounts of the member or former member be audited, and
> >
> > (d) the files or other records of or relating to the member or former member be seized from the person named in the order.
>
> (2) Where the application under subsection (1) is in relation to the conduct of an articled student, the order may be made in respect of the books, accounts, files or other records of the member or firm to whom the student is articled.
>
> (3) In an application under subsection (1), the person making the application shall state on oath,
>
> > (a) his grounds for believing the matter referred to in subsection (1)(a) or (b), or
> >
> > (b) where the application is for an order under subsection (1)(d), his grounds for believing that the seizure will produce evidence relevant to a matter referred to in subsection (1)(a) or (b).
>
> (4) In an order under subsection (1), the court may
>
> > (a) designate the person who will conduct the audit, inspection or seizure and authorize him to conduct it,
> >
> > (b) state the time and place where the audit or seizure will take place,
> >
> > and

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

> (c) give any other directions that are necessary to carry out the audit or seizure.
>
> 41.(1) The discipline committee may inquire into the conduct or competence of a member, former member or articled student.
>
> (2) The discipline committee may make or authorize a preliminary investigation into the conduct or competence of any of the persons referred to in subsection (1) and may order that the person produce for inspection files or other records relative to his practice that are within his possession or power.
>
> (3) An inquiry under subsection (1) shall be by hearing commenced by the issue of a citation to the respondent at the direction of (a) the chairman of the discipline committee, or (b) any 3 benchers.
>
> (4) At a hearing of a citation, the committee may, where it considers it necessary for the effective conduct of the inquiry,
>
> (a) compel the respondent to give evidence under oath, and
>
> (b) order the respondent to produce all files and records that are in his possession or power that are relevant to the matters raised in the citation.

[76] The chamber's judge did not accede to an argument that the authority came from the bencher's resolution delegating their authority to the Standing Discipline Committee to order spot audits. The chamber's judge found as follows:

> [31] In my view, such power cannot properly be delegated to the Discipline Committee which considered this matter and ordered the "spot audit". Section 40 of the Act dealing with "Powers of Chairman of Discipline Committee" reads, in part, as follows:
>
> "40. (1) Where the chairman of the discipline committee or, in his absence, a member of the executive committee, has reasonable grounds to believe that a member, former member or articled student
>
> (b) has conducted himself in a manner that could result in a determination being made under section 45 (1)(b) or (c),
>
> he may apply, ex parte or on notice as the judge requires, to a judge of the Supreme Court for an order that
>
> (c) the books and accounts of the member or former member be audited, and
>
> …"
>
> [32] Pursuant to the alleged delegated power, the requirements of Section 40 with regard to ordering that the books and account of a member be audited would be circumvented. In this perspective, I am in agreement with the submission of Mr. Braidwood that in purporting to delegate their power to > audit the books and accounts of a member, the Benchers are seeking to enlarge the narrower powers expressly contemplated and specifically reserved for the judicial functions performed by the Discipline Committee.

[77] The chamber's judge's decision in Gardner was upheld by the Court of Appeal. In that decision, the Court of Appeal noted at para. 14, the provisions of the Legal Profession Act which conferred power on the benchers provided:

> 24. (1) The benchers may govern and administer the affairs of the society.
>
> (2) Without limiting subsection (1), the benchers may
>
> (a) establish committees, determine the duties of those committees and delegate authority to them,
> (b) order the audit of the books and accounts of a member or a former member…

[78] The Court of Appeal found that there were two disciplinary committees, one created under s. 39 of the Act, and the other created by the bencher's under s. 24, which was regulatory in contradistinction to disciplinary. Only the statutory disciplinary committee could enquire into the conduct or competency of a member, and require the member to produce for inspection files or other records relating to his or her practice. The Court of Appeal found that the scope of the material the Law Society sought could only be seized from the member under s. 40(1)(d) of the Act, and only if authorized by a judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia. In finding the Law Society did not have jurisdiction to authorize a search and seizure order under s. 24 of the Act, the Court stated:

> It is not open to the benchers to vest in a discipline committee of their own creation powers specifically granted to the Statutory Discipline Committee or, under s. 40, to a specified individual and to the Court. The benchers' powers are, in a general sense, limited to the regulatory, administrative, and management aspects of the Law Society's affairs.

[79] It is clear from Gardner, that the Law Society and its employees' authority to conduct investigations of its members must be rooted in its statutory power, and the Law Society cannot create rules or regulations that grant it more power than the enabling statute.

Analysis

[80] As noted earlier, the defendants point to the earlier application by the plaintiff and submit he is simply rearguing that application. However, in the plaintiff's earlier application he sought judgment on the issue of whether the defendants breached his Charter rights. As stated in the judgment, the jurisprudence establishes that alleged Charter violations should not be determined in the absence of a proper evidentiary record. Courts should be reluctant to engage in Charter analyses in a factual vacuum. Each case must be considered on its own facts, or lack of facts. In the earlier application, it was found that there was not a proper evidentiary basis on which to determine whether there had been a Charter violation of the plaintiff's rights.

[81] The defendants argue that Gardner does not apply to this case because the earlier version of the Legal Profession Act was completely revised by the current statute. In enacting the current Act, the Legislature removed various statutory directions as to the Law Society's committee structure and internal operations and expanded the benchers' rule-making powers. The defendants submit that s. 40 of the previous Act is analogous to s. 36 of the current Legal Professions Act. Rule 4-43 is found in Part 4 of the Law Society Rules dealing with discipline. The defendants say that Rule 4-43 authorizes a search and seizure, with a member's consent. As noted earlier, the defendants take the position that Rule 4-43 is authorized by ss. 36 and 37.1 of the current statute.

[82] In my opinion, the language of Rule 4-43 does not appear to grant powers to the Law Society beyond what the Legal Professions Act allows, as was the case in Gardner. Section 36 of the Legal Professions Act provides that the benchers may make rules to establish a discipline committee, delegate authority to the committee, and authorize an investigation and examination of the books, records and accounts of a lawyer if there is reason to believe that the lawyer may have committed any misconduct, conduct unbecoming a lawyer or a breach of the Act or the rules. Rule 4-43 provides that the chair of the discipline committee can order an investigation of the books and records, including electronic records, of a lawyer if he reasonably believes the lawyer or former lawyer may have committed a discipline violation. As noted, s. 29 of the Interpretation Act provides that in an enactment, such as the Legal Profession Act, the term "record" includes books, letters, papers and anything on which information is stored whether graphic, electronic or otherwise.

[83] To the extent the plaintiff alleges the defendants did not as a matter of fact comply with the Legal Professions Act, and specifically the requirement that searches and seizures of a law office require an order of the court absent his permission, that factual determination cannot be made in this application given the disputed evidence.

[84] In my view, the fact the Legal Professions Act has been revised is not an answer to the issues raised on this application, which is did the plaintiff consent to the Law Society and its investigators entering and searching his law office and computer and copying documents. As conceded by the defendants, the Law Society does not have the authority pursuant to s. 36 of the Legal Professions Act and Law Society Rule 4-43 to search a member's law office and computer, and copy documents without his consent.

[85] On this application, the plaintiff argues that he did not give consent to the search of his office and computer, and copying documents. The defendants take the position the plaintiff consented to the Law Society searching his office and computer, and copying documents.

[86] This factual dispute cannot be resolved on this application. As stated earlier, on a summary judgment application pursuant to Rule 9-6 of the SCCR factual disputes are not determined and evidence is not weighed. Accordingly, the plaintiff's applications for a declaration that the Law Society exceeded its jurisdiction when Mr. Riddell made the impugned order and an order setting it aside are dismissed. As well, the corollary orders the plaintiff seeks, including a mandatory injunction compelling the defendants to return the documents seized during the search of his office and computer are also dismissed.

[87] The plaintiff also applies for orders that the Law Society be restrained from requesting that he provide his personal cell phone for inspection and copying and entering his residence to inspect his documents. The plaintiff argues that the s. 36 of the Legal Professions Act and the Law Society Rule 4-43 does not give the Law Society the jurisdiction to make an order which would allow them seize his personal phone and enter his residence.

[88] The impugned order made pursuant to Rule 4-43 provides:

> 1. Pursuant to Law Society Rule 4-43, I order that an investigation be made of the books, records and accounts of Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation.
>
> 2. I direct Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation to:
>
> > a. immediately produce and permit the copying of all files, vouchers, records, accounts, books and any other evidence regardless of the form in which they are kept,
> >
> >
> > c. assist the Executive Director or designate to access, in a comprehensible form, records in the possession or control of Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation that may contain information related to the practice of Kevin A. McLean by providing all information necessary for that purpose, including but not limited to
> >
> > > i. passwords, and
> > >
> > > ii. Encryption keys.
>
> 3. Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation must not alter, delete destroy, remove or otherwise interfere with any book, record or account within the scope of the investigation without the written consent of the Executive Director.
> 4. This order extends to all electronic records and process set out in the Attachment to this Order will be followed.

[89] The attachment to the order indicates that Rules 3-5(6) and 3-5(6.1) of the Law Society Rules apply. In my view, Rule 3-5.01(1) is also relevant. Those rules provide:

2015 BCSC 1431 (CanLII)

> 3-5(6) A lawyer must cooperate fully in an investigation under this Division by all available means including, but not limited to, responding fully and substantively, in the form specified by the Executive Director
>
> (a) to the complaint, and
>
> (b) to all requests made by the Executive Director in the course of an investigation.
>
> (6.1) When conducting an investigation of a complaint, the Executive Director may
>
> (a) require production of files, documents and other records for examination or copying,
>
> (b) require a lawyer to
>
> (i) attend an interview,
>
> (ii) answer questions and provide information relating to matters under investigation, or
>
> (iii) cause an employee or agent of the lawyer to answer questions and provide information relating to the investigation,
>
> (c) enter the business premises of a lawyer
>
> (i) during business hours, or
>
> (ii) at another time by agreement with the lawyer.
> 3-5.01 (1) Subject to subrules (2) and (3), a lawyer who is required under Rule 3-5 [Investigation of complaints] or 4-43 [Investigation of books and accounts] to produce and permit the copying of files, documents and other records, provide information or attend an interview and answer questions and who fails or refuses to do so is suspended until he or she has complied with the requirement to the satisfaction of the Executive Director.

[90] In my opinion, s. 36 of the Legal Professions Act and the Law Society Rule 4-43 do not authorize the Law Society to search the personal cell phone of a member or enter his or her personal residence. Rule 4-43 provides that an investigation of the books, records and accounts of the lawyer and law firm may be ordered. Rule 3-5(6.1) provides that the Executive Director may enter the business premises of a lawyer during business hours.

[91] The fact that s. 36 of the Law Society Act and Rule 4-43 authorizes an investigation of a member's books, records and accounts, does not in my view, allow the Law Society to enter into a member's residence, or seize his personal phone, or suspend him for failing to comply with a request for those items. Section 37 of the Legal Professions Act provides that the Law Society may apply to the Supreme Court for an order to seize files or records of or relating to lawyer, wherever located, if there are reasonable grounds to believe the lawyer committed misconduct, conduct unbecoming a lawyer, or any breach of the Act or the rules. In my opinion, the Law Society is required to apply under that provision if it wants to seize records or files of the plaintiff located in locations other than his law office, such as on his personal phone or in his residence.

[92] The plaintiff asserts that the defendant Law Society has suspended him for not complying with the Rule 4-43 order by failing to provide them with his personal cell phone or access to his home. In my view, insofar as the Law Society is utilizing the Rule 4-43 order to require that the plaintiff produce his personal cell phone or to allow entry into his residence, it does not have the jurisdiction to do so.

[93] Accordingly, I am of the view it is appropriate to grant the orders sought in paragraphs 7 and 8 of the May 13, 2015 application. I am making the following orders:

1. The plaintiff is not required to produce his personal phone to the Law Society pursuant to the Rule 4-43 order, and

2. Restraining the Law Society from entering or attempting to enter the plaintiff's residence pursuant to that order.

[94] Nothing in these orders precludes the Law Society applying for an order pursuant to s. 37 of the Legal Professions Act.

[95] As set out earlier, the orders sought in paragraphs 1-6 and 9-11 in the plaintiff's application filed May 13, 2015, cannot be determined in light of the disputes in the evidence regarding whether the plaintiff consented to the search of his office and computer and copying of documents, and whether the personal defendants committed the tort of conspiracy. Issues relating to whether and what documents seized as a result of the impugned order should be returned cannot be dealt with until the issue of whether or not the plaintiff consented to the search and copying is determined. As a result, paragraphs 1-6, and paragraphs 9-11 of the plaintiff's May 13, 2015 application are dismissed.

Costs

[96] Given the divided success on the applications the plaintiff and the defendants will bear their own costs.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

1.0 INTRODUCTION

[1] The plaintiff, Mr. McLean, is a former lawyer who was called to the bar in August 2010. His practice did not go smoothly. By October 2012 he had attracted the attention of the Discipline Committee of the Law Society of British Columbia, which authorized a conduct review. In 2013 he was subject to a period of administrative suspension for failing to provide accounting reports, and a panel of three benchers placed administrative conditions on his practice in January 2014. Ultimately, at the end of 2014, Mr. McLean allowed his membership in the Law Society to lapse, and on June 29, 2015, a hearing panel formally ordered him disbarred as ungovernable.

[2] In this action, Mr. McLean sues the Law Society, a bencher who was Chair of the Discipline Committee (Mr. Riddell), and a number of individuals who were employees or agents of the Law Society. He claims damages and seeks a number of declarations. As against the personal defendants, his claim is advanced primarily on the basis of an alleged conspiracy to commit unlawful acts aimed at him with a view to "extricating" him from the practice of law. Other torts are also alleged.

[3] Mr. McLean does not challenge his disbarment in this proceeding. What he does challenge is the lawfulness of an administrative order that Mr. Riddell made on May 27, 2014. That order (the "investigation order" or "Rule 4-43 order"), made under what was then Law Society Rule 4-43, authorized a forensic investigation of Mr. McLean's books and records. Mr. McLean asserts that the investigation order was made in violation of the principles of administrative law, and that what followed was an unreasonable search and seizure that breached his rights under section 8 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and his privacy rights under the Privacy Act, RSBC 1996, c 373. This, in Mr. McLean's submission, gives rise to the unlawfulness that supports the claim of conspiracy.

[4] Before me are two applications for summary judgment pursuant to Rule 9-6. The defendants seek judgment dismissing the claim against all of the personal defendants other than Larry Dirk (the claim against Mr. Dirk is pleaded in battery, and is distinct from the conspiracy claim against the other personal defendants). Mr. McLean seeks judgment for damages to be assessed and for the following relief:

- an order setting aside the investigation order (called by Mr. McLean the "limitless seizure order");
- an order that the investigation order is void;
- a declaration that Mr. Riddell was required to issue reasons for the investigation order;
- a declaration that Mr. Riddell was in a conflict of interest by granting the investigation order on the recommendation of "his counsel, Mark Bussanich, barrister and solicitor of the [Law Society]";
- a declaration that Mr. McLean's alleged consent on June 4, 2014, was vitiated by misrepresentations, duress and/or coercion by some of the Law Society defendants;
- a declaration that Mr. McLean's alleged consent on June 4, 2014, has been withdrawn and revoked and that the copies of documents and other records obtained under the investigation order must be returned; and
- costs.

[5] In addition, Mr. McLean applies for interlocutory orders relating to documents and the provision of information. Additional interlocutory applications brought by Mr. McLean and a further application by the defendants for judgment dismissing the entire action by way of summary trial (Rule 9-7) did not proceed to a hearing.

[6] For the reasons that follow, I conclude that Mr. McLean's application for summary judgment must be dismissed, and that the defendants are entitled to a dismissal of Mr. McLean's claims against the personal defendants other than Mr. Dirk.

2.0 PREVIOUS APPLICATIONS

[7] There have been a number of previous applications in this action. In McLean v Law Society of British Columbia, 2015 BCSC 661 ("McLean SC #1") Madam Justice Gerow dismissed an application by Mr. McLean for judgment on the issue of whether the defendants breached his charter rights, which application was brought pursuant to Rules 9-4, 9-5 or 9-6. The judge noted that there was a factual dispute concerning whether Mr. McLean consented to the search of his office and electronic devices, and the copying of his documents, and accordingly the question could not be decided under the rules that Mr. McLean invoked.

[8] In McLean v Law Society of British Columbia, 2015 BCSC 1431 ("McLean SC #2"), Gerow J. considered applications by both sides, including competing applications for summary judgment (Rule 9-6).

[9] Mr. McLean sought an order declaring that the Law Society exceeded its jurisdiction when it made the impugned investigation order. Once again, Gerow J. observed that since she could not resolve the factual dispute of whether the plaintiff consented to what the Law Society did, the plaintiff's application had to be dismissed. As noted above, Mr. McLean now seeks declarations that his alleged consent was vitiated and/or withdrawn.

[10] Mr. McLean also sought orders restraining the Law Society from requesting that he provide his personal cell phone for inspection and copying, and from entering his personal residence to inspect documents. Madam Justice Gerow granted those orders, concluding that such activity was not authorized under either the Legal Profession Act, SBC 1998, c 9, or Rule 4-43.

[11] In addition, the defendants had sought an order for the same relief as they now seek: judgment dismissing the claim against all the personal defendants (except Mr. Dirk). That was also dismissed as premature. Madam Justice Gerow did, however, dismiss Mr. McLean's claims against the defendants Deborah Armour, Allison Kirby and John Nalleweg for defamation and other misconduct.

[12] The defendants appealed. Mr. McLean did not.

[13] In McLean v Law Society of British Columbia, 2016 BCCA 368 ("McLean CA"), the Court of Appeal made a number of rulings. It set aside the orders of Gerow J. declaring that Mr. McLean is not required to produce his personal phone to the Law Society pursuant to the Rule 4-43 order and restraining the Law Society from entering or attempting to enter his residence pursuant to that order, on the ground that there was no evidence that either action was likely to be taken; it declined, however, to resolve the issues concerning limits on the locations from which the Law Society may properly obtain records and documents of the member:

> [24] However, in my view, we should not resolve these issues in this case. Inherent in the issue is a challenge to the order made by the Disciplinary Committee which, as I earlier observed, is an issue usually challenged by judicial review pursuant to the Judicial Review Procedure Act. There is much to the Law Society's submission that the process used by Mr. McLean has had the effect of end-running the proper procedure in administrative law. However, the Law Society did not raise this point in the Supreme Court and so we do not have the benefit of the judge's conclusions on its procedural objection. Bringing a challenge to an exercise of a statutory power by the correct procedure is not purely cosmetic or simply a matter of form. The questions asked by a court reviewing a decision of an administrative body are different than the questions asked by a court interpreting legislation ab initio. Most frequently the decision of a decision maker subject to judicial review, including as to the meaning of its home statute, will be assessed on a standard of reasonableness whereas a court interpreting legislation must be correct. Further, judicial review allows a court to factor into its conclusion the concept of the decision maker's expertise.
> [25] In my view given my earlier conclusion that the injunction and declaration must be set aside in any event, this is not a case in which this court should wade into the interpretation of the Legal Profession Act and the Law Society Rules, absent the issue being first considered by judicial review.
>
> [26] Further, I am not satisfied that the necessary factual underpinnings are before us to admit of a definitive answer to the administrative law challenges to the May 27, 2014 order and Rule 4-43. It seems to me that there may have been a failure by all parties to distinguish, in their submissions, the difference between a right to investigate, which includes the right to demand all documents or records related to the law practice wherever they be, and the right to enter and search particular premises. If so, that question must be dealt with in the right case brought in the procedurally correct manner. Accordingly, I would not endorse the reasons of the judge on the issue of the scope of the Law Society's powers of investigation under Rule 4-43, and leave those questions to a different case.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

[14] The Court of Appeal also set aside Gerow J.'s dismissal of the Law Society's summary judgment application and remitted it to the trial court for reconsideration. I am about to undertake that reconsideration, together with consideration of Mr. McLean's renewed summary judgment application.

[15] In so doing, I note the following passage from McLean CA:

> [35] The appellants contend that the judge misdirected herself in her application of Rule 9-6 by reasoning that the factual dispute in the pleadings precluded summary judgment in favour of the appellants. They say, rather, that although the judge was not allowed to weigh the evidence (that being a matter for a trial, summary or otherwise), she was required to consider "whether the plaintiff's contradictory allegations had sufficient support in the evidence he relied upon to found … a genuine triable issue", and relying upon Skybridge Investments Ltd. v. Metro Motors Ltd., 2006 BCCA 500, and Canada v. Lameman, 2008 SCC 14, they say the pleadings should carry no weight in this assessment.
> [36] In my respectful view, the judge erred in principle in saying the rule was not available when there are disputed facts in the pleadings and in declining to consider the evidence on the Rule 9-6 application. In Lameman, the Supreme Court of Canada explained the importance of the summary judgment rule. This Rule has advantages to the administration of justice that are different from those provided by a summary trial such as we have long had in British Columbia. The court said:
>
>> 10 This appeal is from an application for summary judgment. The summary judgment rule serves an important purpose in the civil litigation system. It prevents claims or defences that have no chance of success from proceeding to trial. Trying unmeritorious claims imposes a heavy price in terms of time and cost on the parties to the litigation and on the justice system. It is essential to the proper operation of the justice system and beneficial to the parties that claims that have no chance of success be weeded out at an early stage. Conversely, it is essential to justice that claims disclosing real issues that may be successful proceed to trial.
>>
>> 11 For this reason, the bar on a motion for summary judgment is high. The defendant who seeks summary dismissal bears the evidentiary burden of showing that there is "no genuine issue of material fact requiring trial": Guarantee Co. of North America v. Gordon Capital Corp., [1999] 3 S.C.R. 423, at para. 27. The defendant must prove this; it cannot rely on mere allegations or the pleadings: 1061590 Ontario Ltd. v. Ontario Jockey Club (1995), 21 O.R. (3d) 547 (C.A.); Tucson Properties Ltd. v. Sentry Resources Ltd. (1982), 22 Alta. L.R. (2d) 44 (Q.B. (Master)), at pp. 46-47. If the defendant does prove this, the plaintiff must either refute or counter the defendant's evidence, or risk summary dismissal: Murphy Oil Co. v. Predator Corp., (2004), 365 A.R. 326, 2004 ABQB 688, at p. 331, > aff'd (2006), 55 Alta. L.R. (4th) 1, 2006 ABCA 69. Each side must "put its best foot forward" with respect to the existence or non-existence of material issues to be tried: Transamerica Life Insurance Co. of Canada v. Canada Life Assurance Co. (1996), 28 O.R. (3d) 423 (Gen. Div.), at p. 434; Goudie v. Ottawa (City), [2003] 1 S.C.R. 141, 2003 SCC 14, at para. 32. The chambers judge may make inferences of fact based on the undisputed facts before the court, as long as the inferences are strongly supported by the facts: Guarantee Co. of North America, at para. 30.

[37] In Century Services Inc. v. LeRoy, 2015 BCCA 120, we said concerning the differences between Rule 9-5 and 9-6:

> [32] Century Services sought summary judgment pursuant to Rule 9-6, ... In making this submission it relies upon Skybridge … I do not consider, as a general approach, that it is helpful to conflate the various rules. Rule 9-6 is a rule distinct from Rule 9-5; a challenge to pleadings is effected by Rule 9-5, whereas Rule 9-6 allows for the summary determination of a claim in a procedure that engages evidence but does not assume the character of a summary trial.
>
> [33] The different character of the rules for summary judgment and striking pleadings was described well by Mr. Justice Low in International Taoist Church of Canada v. Ching Chung Taoist Association of Hong Kong Limited, 2011 BCCA 149:
>
>> [9] Rules 9-5 and 9-6 are quite different. The former is an attack on the pleadings on the basis that the action or the defence, as pleaded, cannot succeed as a matter of law. It raises a matter of law only. The latter is an assertion that the claim or the defence is factually without merit. It raises an issue of fact only or, at most, an issue of mixed fact and law, unless under subrule (5)(c) the court determines that "the only genuine issue is an issue of law", in which case it "may determine the question [of law] and pronounce judgment accordingly."
>>
>> [10] Rule 9-5 is concerned only with the sufficiency of pleadings. ... An order striking a pleading could not be the basis for a res judicata defence in subsequent proceedings.
>> [11] Rule 9-6 permits an application for summary judgment, either allowing a claim in whole or in part or dismissing a claim in whole or in part. It is clear that the result sought by the application would support a future pleading of res judicata.

[38] With these passages in mind, I conclude that the judge applied the wrong test in her paragraphs 36, 55 and 71 in speaking of Rule 9-6. She did > not ask whether Mr. McLean, in the words of Lameman and consistent with Rule 9-6, "put [his] best foot forward" with respect to the existence of material facts. It is clear from Lameman that he cannot rely upon mere allegations in his notice of civil claim to answer the evidence of the other side.

3.0 BACKGROUND

3.1 How the investigation order was made

[16] By the time the investigation order was made in May 2014, Mr. McLean had, as I mentioned, been subject to a period of administrative suspension, and administrative conditions had been placed on his practice. A compliance audit was scheduled to begin on May 21, 2013, but was delayed at Mr. McLean's request to June 18, 2013. The compliance audit could not be completed at that time, and delays in following it up occurred as a result of Mr. McLean's lack of responses to requests for further information. Further difficulties resulted in a temporary suspension of Mr. McLean effective November 20, 2013. This suspension was lifted on January 29, 2014 when Mr. McLean provided most of the requested information.

[17] On April 22, 2014, the defendant Eva Milz (misnamed in the style of cause as "Erin Milz"), a chartered professional accountant employed by the Law Society in its Trust Assurance Department, attended at Mr. McLean's office to continue the compliance audit follow-up. She contemporaneously received an email from Mr. McLean requesting the audit to be rescheduled as his accountant was ill. By return email, Ms. Milz advised that she would proceed with whatever books and records were available, but Mr. McLean replied that no books and records were available because they were with the accountant.

[18] Ms. Milz returned the following day to commence the follow-up visit, and was provided a workstation with Mr. McLean's records strewn across it. Most of the records required for the compliance audit were not provided. It therefore could not be completed.

[19] On May 13, 2014, this Milz prepared a memorandum setting out a history of what had occurred, the concerns arising from the audit that had been undertaken to date, and a reference to the missing records.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

[20] The Trust Assurance Department then referred Mr. McLean to the Professional Conduct Department because of concerns that he was not maintaining accounting records as required, and because the records he did provide revealed numerous accounting deficiencies and concerns. In these circumstances, on May 23, 2014, the defendant Mark Bussanich, a staff lawyer employed by the Law Society in its Professional Conduct Department, prepared a memorandum to the defendant Phil Riddell, Chair of the Law Society's Discipline Committee, pursuant to Rule 4-43 of the Law Society Rules.

[21] That rule has since been renumbered as Rule 4-55, but I will refer to it as Rule 4-43. It provided:

> 4-43(1) If the chair of the Discipline Committee reasonably believes that a lawyer or former lawyer may have committed a discipline violation, the chair may order that an investigation be made of the books, records and accounts of the lawyer or former lawyer, including, if considered desirable in the opinion of the chair, all electronic records of the lawyer or former lawyer.
>
> (1.1) When electronic records have been produced or copied pursuant to an order under this rule, the lawyer concerned may request that a specific record be excluded from the investigation on the basis that it contains personal information that is not relevant to the investigation.
>
> (1.2) The lawyer must make a request under subrule (1.1) in writing to a person designated under subrule (2) within 7 days of receiving a copy of the order under this rule.
>
> (1.3) An order under this rule that permits the production or copying of electronic records must provide for a method of evaluating and adjudicating exclusion requests made under subrule (1.1).
>
> (1.4) A request under subrule (1.1) must be refused unless the records in question are retained in a system of storage of electronic records that permits the segregation of personal information in a practical manner in order to comply with the request.
>
> (2) When an order is made under subrule (1),
>
> (a) the Executive Director must designate one or more persons to conduct the investigation, and
>
> (b) the lawyer or former lawyer concerned must
>
> (i) immediately produce and permit the copying of all files, vouchers, records, accounts, books and any other evidence regardless of the form in which they are kept,
>
> (ii) provide any explanations that the persons designated under paragraph (a) require for the purpose of the investigation,

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

> (iii) assist the persons designated under paragraph (a) to access, in a comprehensible form, records in the lawyer's possession or control that may contain information related to the lawyer's practice by providing all information necessary for that purpose, including but not limited to
>
> (A) passwords, and
>
> (B) encryption keys, and
>
> (iv) not alter, delete, destroy, remove or otherwise interfere with any book, record or account within the scope of the investigation without the written consent of the Executive Director.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

[22] As we have seen, in para 26 of its reasons in McLean CA, the Court of Appeal commented upon what it conceived had been:

> …a failure by all parties to distinguish, in their submissions, the difference between a right to investigate, which includes the right to demand all documents or records related to the law practice wherever they be, and the right to enter and search particular premises.

[23] I observe that Rule 4-43 authorizes the Chair of the Discipline Committee to order an investigation of a lawyer's books, records and accounts, and obliges the lawyer to cooperate. It does not authorize search and seizure in the absence of the lawyer's consent or a court order obtained under section 37 of the Legal Profession Act. Hence the importance of the question of consent in this case.

[24] In his memorandum, Mr. Bussanich set out a summary of the complaint (potential discipline violations included: failing to maintain accounting records in compliance with the rules; withdrawing funds from trust without proper authorizations; withdrawing funds from trust via mechanisms not allowed by the rules; and failing to report and correct trust shortages). This was followed by a history of Mr. McLean's professional conduct record.

[25] Mr. Bussanich then recommended the making of an investigation order under Rule 4-43 for the investigation of books, records and accounts of Mr. McLean and his Law Corporation, including all electronic records.

[26] This recommendation was followed by Mr. Bussanich's review of the facts and evidence concerning what had occurred in relation to the compliance audit that began in June 2013 and was as yet incomplete, and a recitation of the deficiencies and concerns found by Ms. Milz.

[27] Mr. Bussanich followed this with his analysis concerning the application of the rule:

> Before making an Order under Rule 4-43(1) of the Law Society Rules, the Chair of the Discipline Committee must reasonably believe that Mr. McLean may have committed a discipline violation (the "Threshold"). If the Threshold is met, the Chair must consider whether it is desirable for the Order to include all electronic records.
>
> The Threshold Question
> Based on the information available from the [Trust Assurance Department's] Referral, there is evidence of multiple possible breaches of 16 Rules, many of which are serious. In addition, if substantiated, the breaches of the BC Code provisions may constitute professional misconduct. The state of Mr. McLean's books and records has left many unanswered questions. Collectively, the deficiencies and concerns identified through the compliance audit signify a pattern of non-compliance with trust accounting rules. The rules are in place to protect clients and the public generally. Without a detailed forensic examination of Mr. McLean's books and records, the Law Society is unable to determine the extent to which his clients, and other members of the public, are at risk.

[28] Mr. Bussanich next discussed whether the order should extend to all electronic records, noting among other things that many of the bank transactions were performed electronically, the scant paper files did not explain the flow of funds, and Mr. McLean had indicated to Ms. Milz that his practice was primarily paperless.

[29] Finally, Mr. Bussanich discussed prior instances in which a Rule 4-43 order was granted, and attached his proposed draft form of order. The terms of the order, set out below, tracked the language of the rule.

[30] Mr. Riddell reviewed Mr. Bussanich's materials and granted the investigation order in the form requested on May 27, 2014.

[31] The memorandum from Mr. Bussanich to Mr. Riddell was not made under oath or affirmation, while Mr. Riddell made the order without first hearing from

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

Mr. McLean, and gave no reasons for his decision to grant the order. Mr. McLean asserts that these are serious defects that, in accordance with the principles of administrative law, rendered the process unfair and unlawful.

[32] Attached to and forming part of the investigation order were lengthy explanatory notes that, among other things, advised the member to retain and instruct counsel, provided information concerning forensic copying including the copying of electronic records, set out the process for the making of exclusion requests, and detailed the member's obligations. For present purposes, I set out only the order itself:

THE LAW SOCIETY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

ORDER (RULE 4-43)

TO: Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation

AND TO: Executive Director and designate

FROM: Phil Riddell, Chair of the Discipline Committee

DATE: May 27, 2014

RE: Investigation of Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation; Member No. 508317

1. Pursuant to Law Society Rule 4-43, I order that an investigation be made of the books, records and accounts of Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation, including all electronic records of Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation.

2. I direct Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation to:

a. immediately produce and permit the copying of all files, vouchers, records, accounts, books and any other evidence regardless of the form in which they are kept,

b. provide any explanations that the Executive Director or designate requires for the purpose of the investigation,

c. assist the Executive Director or designate to access, in comprehensible form, records in the possession or control of the Kevin A. McLean and Kevin A. McLean Law Corporation that may contain information related to the practice of the Kevin A. McLean by providing all information necessary for that purpose, including but not limited to

i. passwords, and
ii. encryption keys.

3.2 How the investigation order was executed

[33] The investigation order and notes were to be delivered to Mr. McLean by letter dated May 29, 2014, which listed the persons designated to carry out the investigation. Those persons included Mr. Bussanich, David McCartney, an investigator employed by the Law Society, and Andrea Chan and Wendy Ho, forensic accountants employed by the Law Society.

[34] Mr. Bussanich directed Mr. McCartney, Ms. Chan and Ms. Ho to attend at Mr. McLean's office on June 3, 2014, to serve him with the investigation order and the letter of May 29, 2014, and to commence the investigation authorized by the order.

[35] Mr. McCartney, Ms. Chan and Ms. Ho arrived at about 10:00 a.m. on June 3, 2014. They were told by the office manager, Peggy Chapman, that Mr. McLean was not in the office. Mr. McCartney advised Mr. Bussanich that Mr. McLean was not there, and at 10:01 a.m., Mr. Bussanich emailed Mr. McLean to advise him of the order. He attached a copy of the letter of May 29, 2014, and the investigation order itself. Mr. Bussanich also advised that the designated representatives of the Law Society were at Mr. McLean's office, and that Mr. McLean was required to attend immediately to comply with these obligations; failure to cooperate could result significant in consequences, including a referral to the Discipline Committee.

[36] In the meantime, Mr. McCartney, Ms. Chan and Ms. Ho sat in the waiting area by reception. While they waited, Mr. McLean and his practice supervisor, Robert King (whose identities were not then known to the Law Society representatives but were confirmed by Mr. McLean), entered the office and spoke to the receptionist. One, whom the receptionist later indicated to Mr. McCartney had been Mr. McLean, then walked quickly down the hall.

[37] Very shortly thereafter, Ms. Chapman told Mr. McCartney that Mr. McLean was back, and was in his office. She led them to Mr. McLean's office, but it was empty. Ms. Chapman told them that they could wait for Mr. McLean in his office. They did so. During the time that they waited in the office, they depose that they did not open any drawers or attempt to access the computer.

[38] At about 1:15 p.m., an event occurred that is subject to a dispute in the evidence.

[39] According to Mr. McCartney and Ms. Chan, Ms. Chapman came into the office with a woman who said her name was Amy Diaz. Ms. Diaz said that she wanted to pick up Mr. McLean's keys and one or two cheques from his trust chequebook. Ms. Chapman opened the drawers in Mr. McLean's desk to look for his trust cheque book, and found it. Ms. Chan said that Ms. Chapman could give Ms. Diaz one sheet from the cheque book (two cheques and their stubs) but not the entire book. Mr. McCartney gave Ms. Diaz two cheques and recorded the numbers. Ms. Diaz then left. She did not take Mr. McLean's keys, which were on the desk.

[40] In a typed affidavit amended in handwriting, affirmed May 26, 2015, Ms. Diaz deposes that she has been an assistant to various lawyers including Mr. McLean, and that Mr. McLean came to the office where she was employed to meet with herself and one Mr. Yehia. Mr. McLean was quite agitated as he explained to Ms. Diaz that:

> …the LSBC was in his office without his consent, he needed his keys but he wished to avoid confrontation. He asked if I could do it and I agreed to do so.

The question of whether Mr. McLean consented to the investigation is, of course, very much an issue. The existence of that factual dispute was the basis upon which Gerow J. ruled that Mr. McLean's previous applications for summary judgment could not be resolved.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

[41] Ms. Diaz then states [handwritten portions in italics]:

> When I arrived at Mr. McLean's office, I remember that there were two or three people in the office and ~~a woman~~ someone in Mr. McLean's chair at his computer, and I asked words to the effect, "I am Kevin's ~~legal assistant~~ more friend. May I please have his keys?" She replied with words to this effect, "No, nothing leaves this office. What is your name?" I gave my name and left.

[42] Ms. Diaz said nothing about trust cheques. Mr. McLean argues that this demonstrates that the Law Society, through Mr. McCartney, Ms. Chan and Ms. Ho, had seized control of his office without his consent.

[43] Mr. McLean did not return, and Mr. McCartney, Ms. Chan and Ms. Ho left later in the afternoon without having reviewed or seized any records or information.

[44] Mr. McLean does not deny that Ms. Chapman showed the Law Society representatives into his office and told them they could wait there, but deposes that he did not consent to the Law Society entering his private office. He states that when he came into the office that morning of June 3, 2014, and learned that the Law Society was there and demanding to meet with him immediately, he told his receptionist that he was occupied with other meetings and did not have time. The receptionist mentioned something about them having an order, and Mr. McLean replied that they could send it to him for review. He went into his office and left his keys on his desk, expecting that no one would enter his office while he was away. He then left to attend a scheduled meeting with Mr. Yehia. While he was at that meeting, he learned from Mr. King that there were individuals sitting in his office, which he was shocked to learn. That is why he sent Ms. Diaz over to get his keys.

[45] At 9:27 p.m. on the evening of June 3, Mr. McLean emailed Mr. Bussanich:

> Hello Mr. Bussanich:
>
> I was in scheduled meetings throughout the day.
>
> I understand that the investigators had access to my office all day so I trust you had my full cooperation.
>
> I was assaulted and battered by Mr. Dirk yesterday so I do not feel comfortable being in the process [sic] of any investigators of the LS BC.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

> The matter is now one of civil litigation and the police process.
>
> I have provided all of my books and records to the LS BC during the audit process.
>
> My office is kept in paperless form and I understand that they had access to all of that information today.
>
> I am very perplexed why you did not contact me to simply set up a time. Please explain.
>

[46] At 10:07 a.m. the following morning, June 4, Mr. McLean emailed Mr. Bussanich again:

> Dear Mr. Bussanich:
>
> I am away from the office but I am not sure the nature of the complaint.
>
> The office is wide open for the staff to investigate. I have left it open for them to investigate at their discretion.
>
> The password to the computer is revenge99.
>
> I am informed that the investigators did NOT come this morning and have not entered the office.
>
> I have made certain that the office is available for the rest of the week and I have cancelled my meetings in the office.
>
> They are entitled to make copies of any documents that they wish to and use my printer.
>
> I am cooperating fully with the investigation.
>
> I was informed that they were in the office for the balance of the day yesterday.
>
> If there are any accounting documents or explanations, the investigators can contact [my accountant].
>
> I have my hard copy files at the office.
>
> They can copy any and all documents from my hard drive and Dropbox, with all of the files, as they are available to them.
>
> I object to any complaint that you have lodged as they have had full access.
>
> I will be making an exclusion request to certain contents which will be delivered to them at the end of the day.
>
> If the investigators choose not to attend the office, then I reserve the right to bring this correspondence to the attention of any panel or court with respect to this alleged complaint.
>

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

[47] At 10:12 a.m. Mr. McLean re-sent that email stating:

> Further to the below, I checked my hard drive and CPU's this morning and it is clear that they have gone through files so any complaint is vigorously denied.
>
> Further, I did not receive any requests from you and there was full access to all of my files.
>
> I would be happy to discuss via phone but I would prefer that you email in the interim so that this is a matter of documentary record.

I observe at this point that the Law Society denies that it had gone through any files, hard drive or CPUs before that morning. There is no sworn evidence to the contrary.

[48] Mr. McLean followed this up with another email at 10:15 a.m.:

> I am away from the office in a settlement meeting that I have instructed the reception to allow the LSBC full access to the office.
>
> I will check periodically to see if they have arrived in the office.
>
> If they chose [sic] not to do so, I will seek your confirmation and/or an affidavit from a member of the office that they chose not to do so.
>
> Once again, if you need anything, please email and will provide any document that is requested.

[49] Mr. Bussanich instructed his team that they now had consent, and so Mr. McCartney, Ms. Chan and Ms. Ho proceeded with their investigation. They were joined by Colin Cree of eForensic Services Ltd. Mr. McCartney arranged for Mr. Cree to make a forensic copy of Mr. McLean's hard drive, which took some time.

[50] As we have seen, the investigation order, through its explanatory notes, provided for an exclusion process by which Mr. McLean could request that the certain documents captured by the investigation, including documents contained in the forensic copy of his computer hard drive, be excluded from the Law Society's review. Mr. McLean invoked that process in relation to his Dropbox and cell phone, and other communications, on the ground that they were personal or privileged. The Law Society did not agree with this claim, noting that Mr. McLean had not provided access to his mobile device in any event, and that a claim of privilege covered only communications between Mr. McLean and his own counsel. Ultimately, Mr. McLean exercised his right to appoint a lawyer to adjudicate his exclusion request, and selected Robert Deane of the law firm Borden Ladner Gervais for this purpose.

[51] Mr. Deane received no submissions from Mr. McLean and observed that he could deal only with records that had been obtained by the Law Society and of which copy images had been created. Information or records could be excluded only if they were personal in nature, clearly not relevant to the Law Society's investigation, and clearly not relevant to the Law Society's broader mandate to regulate the legal profession in the public interest.

[52] While able to conclude that Mr. McLean had not discharged the evidentiary burden on him, Mr. Deane went on to say this:

> 68. While the foregoing analysis is sufficient to dispose of the Exclusion Request, the unusual circumstances of this proceeding have caused me significant concern. Privacy interests are to be protected, together with, of course, the legitimate privilege interests, if any, of the member. The member's personal circumstances, as disclosed in the record before me and assuming the facts related in the correspondence from the member to be true, are concerning.
>
> 69. For this reason, and with some misgivings, I elected to review the records contained in the Office Forensic Copies or the Bookkeeper Forensic Copies. I did so in order to attempt to determine whether there were any records which appeared, on their face, to be indisputably (a) personal in nature (as opposed to law practice-related); (b) clearly not relevant to the Law Society's investigation; and (c) clearly not relevant to the Law Society's broader mandate to regulate the legal profession in the public interest. I also attempted to identify records that were privileged in favour of the member. I was, of course, significantly hampered because I had no submissions or evidence from the member to assist me.
>
>
> 74. Doing the best I could with the limited assistance made available to me, I did not identify any records that would properly be excluded from the scope of the Rule 4-43 Order.

[53] Accordingly, Mr. Deane dismissed Mr. McLean's exclusion request.

[54] In Mr. McLean's submission, by taking the step of reviewing the records, Mr. Deane effectively committed an unlawful search and seizure of those records on behalf of the Law Society without Mr. McLean's consent, and in breach of his privacy rights. As I find that submission to be utterly devoid of merit, I propose to deal with it right away.

[55] On the evidence before me, it is clear that Mr. Deane was acting as an independent adjudicator selected by Mr. McLean. As such, his actions are protected by absolute privilege and in any event cannot be attributed to the Law Society. Moreover, his review of the record was a reasonable course of action taken in Mr. McLean's interest and necessitated by Mr. McLean's failure to assist him with any submissions or guidance. It represented the only chance Mr. McLean had of obtaining an exclusion order. I need say no more about it.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

4.0 DISCUSSION

[56] Mr. McLean combined his submissions in response to the defendants' application for summary judgment with his submissions in support of his own application for summary judgment. I will therefore consider those two applications before proceeding to deal with Mr. McLean's documents and information applications.

4.1 The summary judgment applications

4.1.1 Overview

[57] There is no dispute as to the law governing summary judgment applications brought under Rule 9-6 of the Supreme Court Civil Rules. I am not confined to the pleadings as I would be under Rule 9-5(1)(a), but I may not weigh evidence as I could in a summary trial application under Rule 9-7. As the Court of Appeal noted in the passage quoted above from McLean CA, each side must "put its best foot forward" with respect to the existence or non-existence of material issues to be tried, and bears the evidentiary burden accordingly. The chambers judge may make inferences of fact based on the undisputed facts before the court, as long as the inferences are strongly supported by the facts.

[58] On its application to dismiss the conspiracy claim against the personal defendants other than Mr. Dirk, the Law Society has led evidence from each of those defendants denying any conspiracy, any intention to injure the plaintiff, any concerted action, and any malice or bad faith. The Law Society contends that in response, Mr. McLean has failed to put "his best foot forward" and has led no evidence to refute this evidence. The Law Society then relies on the following statutory provisions:

[59] In the Legal Profession Act:

> 86(1) No action for damages lies against a person, for anything done or not done in good faith while acting or purporting to act on behalf of the Society or the foundation under this Act.

[60] In the Disciplinary Authority Protection Act, RSBC 1996, c 98:

> 1. If,
>
> (a) by an Act a corporation is established as having one of its purposes the regulation of the profession or occupation practised or carried on by members of the corporation, and
>
> (b) disciplinary powers over the members of the corporation in respect of their conduct in the profession or occupation regulated are conferred by the Act on the corporation, or on any body of its members, or on any official or member of the corporation,
>
> no liability is incurred by the corporation, or by any body of the members, or by any official or member of the corporation, or by any person retained his counsel, solicitor or agent by the corporation for any act or thing done in the exercise of the disciplinary powers conferred or in doing any act or thing in preparation for the exercise of those powers, unless the act or thing is done maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause.

[61] In the Administrative Tribunals Act, SBC 2004, c 45:

> 56(1) In this section, "decision-maker" includes a tribunal member, adjudicator, or registrar or other officer who makes a decision in an application or an interim or preliminary matter, or a person who conducts a facilitated settlement process.
>
> (2) Subject to subsection (3), no legal proceeding for damages lies or may be commenced or maintained against a decision maker, the tribunal or the government because of anything done or omitted
>
> (a) in the performance or intended performance of any duty under an enactment governing an application, or
>
> (b) in the exercise or intended exercise of any power under an enactment governing an application.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

> (3) Subsection (2) does not apply to a person referred to in that subsection in relation to anything done or omitted by that person in bad faith.

[62] In response, and in support of his own application for judgment, Mr. McLean relies upon the "unlawful means" branch of the tort of conspiracy, although he has pleaded both branches. He points to evidence he has obtained on discovery and in documents that, he asserts, establish that the investigation order was unlawful, from which it follows that he was subjected to unlawful search and seizure given his denial of consent. From the undisputed evidence of acts directed towards the plaintiff that involved unlawful conduct, he argues, it can be inferred that the personal defendants, all of whom were involved in the process in one way or another, acted in concert. Since they knowingly breached the common law, Mr. McLean asserts, there can be no immunity under the legislation upon which the Law Society relies. Therefore, he submits, the court can give judgment in his favour with damages to be assessed, and can make the declarations he seeks.

[63] The Law Society defendants respond to Mr. McLean's application on several levels. First and foremost, they maintain that he has invoked the wrong procedure. As suggested by the Court of Appeal, he should be seeking judicial review of the investigation order, not advancing (at least at this stage) an action for damages, including a claim for declaratory relief that is properly the subject of administrative law.

[64] In these circumstances, I turn first to consider Mr. McLean's application. I will then discuss the Law Society's application before turning to the interlocutory matters.

4.1.2 Mr. McLean's application for summary judgment

[65] As I see it, and as the Court of Appeal intimated, it is important to distinguish between the different questions that arise from Mr. McLean's claim.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

[66] The first question is whether the Law Society exceeded its statutory jurisdiction when it granted the investigation order; in other words, was the order ultra vires the Law Society? If so, it must be set aside.

[67] The second question is whether, assuming that it had jurisdiction to grant the order, the Law Society nevertheless acted improperly in the manner in which it granted the order, giving rise to procedural unfairness, so that the order must be set aside and, presumably, remitted to the Chair of the Discipline Committee. On this aspect, Mr. McLean relies upon: the failure of Mr. Riddell to give reasons for his decision to grant the order; the absence of information under oath to support the decision; the fact that the order was granted without notice to Mr. McLean; the absence of procedural safeguards (such as would, for instance, be available in an application for an Anton Pillar order, to which Mr. McLean likens the investigation order); and the conflict of interest that arises from what Mr. McLean terms a solicitor-client relationship that existed between Mr. Bussanich and Mr. Riddell.

[68] If either of those two questions were resolved in favour of Mr. McLean, then it would follow that the steps taken by the Law Society in carrying out the order were unlawful. The question of consent becomes immaterial.

[69] The third question is whether, assuming that the Law Society had jurisdiction to grant the order and did not act improperly in doing so, the Law Society nevertheless carried out the order in a manner that constitutes an unreasonable search and seizure. This turns primarily on the question of consent.

[70] The third question is one that could indeed be the subject of a civil action for damages, but I am satisfied that it is not one that can be decided on this application. This is because I would be obliged to weigh the evidence concerning whether and to what extent Mr. McLean consented to the investigation of his records and the copying of his computer contents.

[71] Mr. McLean submits that the evidence has evolved since the hearings before Gerow J. It is now clear, he argues, that any consent he gave on June 4, 2014, could not have been informed consent and that in any event he did not consent to the effective seizure of his office on June 3, 2014, whatever Ms. Chapman might have said to Mr. McCartney, Ms. Chan and Ms. Ho.

[72] As to informed consent, he points out, for instance, that he was never informed that if he consented, information over which he wished to assert privilege or irrelevance would nevertheless be reviewed by the Law Society, as it was when Mr. Deane looked at it in the course of considering his exception application. I see no merit in that position, for reasons previously discussed. As another example, he complains that he was not informed that he could and should consult counsel, and was not given time to do so. He also maintains that he was coerced into consenting because of the threat of disciplinary action if he failed to cooperate.

[73] The fact remains that there is a conflict in the evidence given what Mr. McLean now says in relation to consent, what he said in his emails on June 3 and 4, 2014, what Ms. Diaz says, and what Mr. McCartney, Ms. Chan and Ms. Ho say about the events that transpired on those two days. As well, the explanatory notes that accompanied the order did include the recommendation to obtain independent legal advice. To what extent Mr. McLean paid any attention to that is not clear. In my view, resolution of these conflicts would require at least the ability to weigh the evidence contained in the affidavits, and very possibly cross examination on those affidavits. That is not possible on an application for summary judgment.

[74] Turning to the first two questions, I agree with counsel for the Law Society that these must properly be resolved on an application for judicial review brought by petition under the Judicial Review Procedure Act. This is because these questions focus on the validity of the investigation order and the lawfulness of the Law Society's exercise of its regulatory powers.

[75] It is tempting to resolve them here. The authority of the Law Society to grant an investigation order under Rule 4-43, pursuant to section 36 of the Legal Profession Act, seems clear. The defects of which Mr. McLean complains appear to me to be misconceived. He seeks to treat the process as though Mr. Riddell were adjudicating a dispute between two parties, which is not the case. But I conclude that this is not the proceeding in which these issues should properly be decided.

[76] It will be recalled that in McLean CA at paras 23-26, the Court of Appeal declined to resolve issues of the scope of the Law Society Discipline Committee's authority under Rule 4-43 and the meaning of its order on the ground that this was an issue usually challenged by judicial review, but which had not been raised in the court below. The court concluded that the question must be dealt with in the right case brought in the procedurally correct manner. This is because "the questions asked by a court reviewing a decision of an administrative body are different from the questions asked by a court interpreting legislation ab initio". It is not a matter of mere form. It is a matter of substance.

[77] Thus in Cimaco International Sales Inc. v British Columbia, 2010 BCCA 342 at para 58, the Court of Appeal held that a claim that an authority acted contrary to the duty of fairness is properly a matter for judicial review, not a tort claim: "a civil claim is not the appropriate forum for a court to consider the process of an administrative decision maker". The claim was therefore considered to be an abuse of process.

[78] Similarly, in Willow v Chong, 2013 BCSC 1083 at para 40, Madam Justice Fisher held that it was improper to pursue in an action for damages a claim related to the fairness of the process and the basis for the decisions and actions taken by the administrative body. This was so even though the plaintiff claimed damages, which are not available in applications for judicial review. Madam Justice Fisher noted that the essential complaint stemmed from dissatisfaction with the conduct and the decisions of an administrative agency, just as in Cimaco, when the claims were reduced to their essence, they fundamentally rested on the assertion that the authority was wrong in its conclusion.

[79] In my view, the same can be said of this case. Even though Mr. McLean claims damages for breach of his Charter rights and his privacy rights, and in tort, his claim fundamentally rests on the assertions that the investigation order was ultra vires the Law Society and was made in a manner that breached the decision-maker's duty of fairness. Indeed his claim for damages for the tort of conspiracy, as he framed it before me, rests entirely on the asserted unlawfulness of the investigation order. Hence the relief Mr. McLean seeks in the form of a declaration that the investigation order is void and an order setting it aside. These would constitute an order for certiorari, which the Judicial Review Procedure Act, RSBC 1996, c 241, requires be brought by petition.

[80] Mr. McLean submits that the court has the power to deal with issues concerning the exercise or purported exercise of a statutory power summarily within the context of an action, relying on section 13 of the Judicial Review Procedure Act:

> 13(1) On the application of a party to a proceeding for a declaration or injunction, the court may direct that any issue about the exercise, refusal to exercise or proposed or purported exercise of a statutory power be disposed of summarily, as if it were an application for judicial review.
> (2) Subsection (1) applies whether or not the proceeding for a declaration or injunction includes a claim for other relief.

[81] This section undoubtedly gives the court some procedural leeway in certain contexts. In my view, it does not apply to this context where the essential claim is for prerogative relief in the nature of certiorari because of administrative law defects. To hold otherwise would make nonsense of the comments of the Court of Appeal in McLean CA, and in Cimaco. What section 13 contemplates is a properly constituted civil action in which a declaration or injunction is sought that could raise an issue about the exercise of a statutory power. It does not contemplate an improperly constituted civil action that turns on the issues of the validity and exercise of a statutory power.

[82] Mr. McLean then argues that he could not pursue judicial review of the investigation order because (1) Mr. Riddell gave no reasons for his decision, and (2) Mr. McLean was provided with no record that would allow him to consider whether review was justified until after he commenced the action.

[83] With respect to the first point, Mr. McLean cites Newfoundland and Labrador Nurses' Union v Newfoundland and Labrador (Treasury Board), 2011 SCC 62 for the proposition that "where there are no reasons, there is nothing to review". That is not, however, quite what the Supreme Court of Canada said. What Justice Abella, for the Court, said was this:

> [22] It is true that the breach of the duty of procedural fairness is an error in law. Where there are no reasons in circumstances where they are required, there is nothing to review. But where, as here, there are reasons, there is no such breach. Any challenge to the reasoning/result of the decision should therefore be made within the reasonable analysis.
> [Underlining added; italics original.]

[84] It is important to understand that the context for that comment was a discussion about the standard of review, not whether a decision was properly the subject of judicial review. In this case, whether the circumstances required reasons is one of the bases upon which Mr. McLean challenges the decision. It is not a basis for side-stepping the process of judicial review.

[85] As to the second point, I see no merit to it. If Mr. McLean was able to start an action challenging the validity of the order without having seen the record, there was nothing to stop him from commencing a petition for judicial review in the same circumstances.

[86] I note further in this regard that Mr. McLean was cited for failing to comply with the investigation order, having not provided all of the records the investigators requested. A hearing panel found him guilty of professional misconduct, levelled a fine and ordered Mr. McLean to pay costs. Mr. McLean did not exercise his statutory right of appeal from this decision, which of course depended upon the validity of the investigation order. One would have expected a direct challenge to that validity in the context of that proceeding, rather than a collateral attack in this action.

[87] Mr. McLean then asserts that the Law Society is in essence estopped from raising this procedural argument because it "attorned" to the procedure he followed in this case by pleading in response to his notice of civil claim, and consenting to amendments, rather than filing a jurisdictional objection. Indeed, as the Court of Appeal observed in McLean CA, the Law Society had not raised this issue in the applications before Gerow J.

[88] I agree with the Law Society that this submission misses the point. The Law Society does not argue that the court lacks jurisdiction over the parties and their dispute. Some of Mr. McLean's claims, such as his claim for damages for conspiracy, could only be advanced in a civil action. But the court's jurisdiction to grant relief in the nature of judicial review ought property to be exercised in accordance with the requirements of the Judicial Review Procedure Act. The claim for damages will have to await that proceeding. The procedure to be followed has substantive legal implications as the Court of Appeal observed. Moreover, any failure by the Law Society to raise this point earlier cannot saddle the court with having to determine an issue by an improper procedure.

[89] It follows that Mr. McLean's application for summary judgment must be dismissed.

4.1.3 The Law Society's application for summary judgment

[90] For the reasons just discussed, this is not the appropriate procedure for determining whether, as Mr. McLean contends, the Law Society's actions were unlawful. The question here is whether I can conclude that on the record before me, the Law Society has satisfied the burden upon it of demonstrating in relation to the claim against the personal defendants other than Mr. Dirk that as to a material fact, there is no genuine issue requiring trial (see McLean CA at para 36).

[91] In this regard, it is open to me to draw inferences from the evidence so long as those inferences are strongly supported by undisputed facts.

[92] The personal defendants other than Mr. Dirk have denied any concerted action, any intent to injure the plaintiff, any malice, and any bad faith. How has Mr. McLean countered this? He argues that I should infer malice or bad faith because of the alleged unlawfulness of the conduct. I do not find any such inference to be supported, strongly or otherwise, by the undisputed facts. For instance, I can find no possible basis for inferring that any of the personal defendants acted maliciously or in bad faith because Phil Riddell wrongly failed to give reasons for his decision, which is one of the bases of unlawfulness alleged, or because Mr. Bussanich did not give his memorandum to Mr. Riddell under oath. Acting in error or in excess of jurisdiction, if that be assumed, does not give rise to an inference of malice or bad faith.

[93] Similarly, there is no evidence of concerted action. Mr. McLean relies on Shaw v Lewis, 1948 CarswellBC 23, [1948] 1 WWR 627 (BCCA), for the proposition that no more need be shown than two or more people involved in an unlawful act. In my view, it does not support that position. As O'Halloran JA noted at para 13 (CarswellBC), "in civil law the conspiracy agreement must be carried into execution". Different defendants played different roles, but I can find no basis upon which I could infer that they agreed to act together in a manner that was unlawful and which was carried to execution, or that there is even a question that they might have done so. Mr. McLean offers, for instance, no evidence or history from which I could infer a motive that might lead professionals of otherwise blameless reputation to take such steps, or which would lead me to conclude that their conduct required closer examination. The evidence does not give any air of reality to his allegations.

[94] It might be possible to infer that those persons who attended Mr. McLean's office on June 3 and 4 acted in concert in a manner that may prove to have been unlawful, but those persons are not defendants and had nothing to do with the granting of the order; in any event, there is no basis upon which malice or bad faith could be inferred against them.

[95] In these circumstances, I conclude that all of the personal defendants (other than Mr. Dirk) are entitled to the protection of section 86 of the Legal Profession Act and section 1 of the Disciplinary Authority Protection Act. Mr. Riddell is also entitled to the protection of section 56 of the Administrative Tribunals Act.

[96] It follows that Mr. McLean's claims against those defendants must be dismissed. This leaves standing, of course, his claim in battery against Mr. Dirk, and his claim against the Law Society for damages for breach of his Charter and privacy rights. If those claims are to be resolved summarily, it must be by way of summary trial, not summary judgment, and the questions of administrative law must first be determined by the proper procedure.

4.2 The interlocutory applications

[97] Mr. McLean's first application for an order requiring the Law Society to provide information and documents relating to an alleged "fraud investigation" he believes it is conducting into him. This investigation purportedly led investigators to attend two times in the fall of 2016 upon a beauty shop in North Vancouver where Mr. McLean had had his address for service. According to the business operator, these persons, who were otherwise unidentified, purported to be from the Law Society and said they needed to speak with Mr. McLean immediately because they were investigating him for fraud.

[98] The Law Society had only recently received details of this evidence, and had denied in a letter to Mr. McLean that it was carrying on any such investigation. For completeness, I directed the Law Society to file an affidavit to that effect. The Law Society has now done so, filing an affidavit from Deborah Armour sworn June 7, 2017. Ms. Armour, who is the Law Society's Chief Legal Officer, deposes that the Law Society did not undertake any fraud investigation concerning the plaintiff in the fall of 2016, and did not retain investigators to investigate Mr. McLean for fraud in 2016 or any other time.

[99] Quite apart from Ms. Armour's affidavit, the evidence filed in support of the application is less than compelling, and I do not accept it as establishing any such investigation by the Law Society. Moreover, although the applications seeks information, it is akin to an injunction, and it is difficult to see how it fits into the parameters of this proceeding, which concerns the actions of the Law Society in June 2014 in relation to the granting and execution of a Rule 4-43 order.

[100] The application is dismissed.

[101] The second application is for a better description of a group of documents listed under Part IV of the Law Society's very extensive list of documents over which the Law Society claims privilege. The Law Society's list of privileged documents alone is more than 600 pages long and includes much detail. The documents in question, however, are not fully described. One group, from Schedule "C" ("Solicitor- Client Privilege"), consists of a considerable number of documents described as attachments to a privileged opinion from Mr. Bussanich to the Chair of the Discipline Committee. Apart from the word "attachment", they are described only by document number and date. I am assured by counsel for the Law Society that, to the extent any of these attachments is not independently privileged, that is, by reason other than its inclusion as an attachment to Mr. Bussanich's opinion, it has been separately listed and disclosed. I accept that assurance.

[102] The second group, on Schedule "F", consists of a large number of documents under the heading "Tribunal Privilege". Once again, their description is limited to document number and date. The List of Documents defines "Tribunal Privilege" as:

> …documents prepared by or for the purposes of the Law Society's hearing panels and a panel of benchers convened in connection with applications concerning the plaintiff pursuant to Law Society Rule 3-7.1, including correspondence among the hearing panels and their counsel and staff, draft decisions, working papers, notes, draft communications to the parties, draft orders, and draft notices.

[103] The Law Society submits that further description of these documents would, by their nature, compromise the claim of privilege.

[104] With respect to the group of "attachments", the Law Society asserts that disclosing the subject matter of those documents would reveal what had been provided in support of the opinion, and therefore disclose information from which the nature of complaints could be discerned.

[105] With respect to the "Tribunal Privilege" documents, the Law Society again submits that the Tribunal privilege would be compromised by further description.

[106] In assessing the listing of privileged documents, it is always necessary to balance the appropriate protection of the privilege with sufficient disclosure to allow the opposing party to consider whether a challenge to the claim of privilege is warranted.

[107] In the particular circumstances of this case, I conclude that a proper balancing of those interests does not require the Law Society to provide more detailed descriptions. I come to this conclusion because of the nature of the privilege asserted and the type of documents covered by that assertion.

[108] In relation to the opinion attachments, it is of course open to Mr. McLean to challenge the assertion of privilege over the opinion, and that document is appropriately described. The assertion of privilege over the attachments must stand or fall with the status of the opinion. If the opinion is privileged, then the attachments, qua attachments, are clearly privileged as well no matter what they are. It follows in my view that further disclosure that would threaten to vitiate the privilege is not warranted.

[109] Similarly, the description of the documents covered by the claim of Tribunal Privilege is clear, as quoted above. Further assignment of those categories to the particular documents listed would add nothing. If Mr. McLean seeks to challenge, for instance, the claim of privilege over “correspondence among the hearing panels and their counsel and staff”, or “draft communications to the parties”, he can do so without needing to know which specific documents of which date come under each heading, at the risk of compromising the claim of privilege.

[110] Accordingly, this application, too, is dismissed.

5.0 CONCLUSION

[111] Mr. McLean’s application for summary judgment against the defendants, with damages to be assessed, is dismissed.

2017 BCSC 987 (CanLII)

[112] The defendants' application for summary judgment dismissing the claim as against the personal defendant's other than Mr. Dirk is allowed. The claim is accordingly dismissed as against the defendants Alison Kirby, John Nalleweg, Kieron Grady, Eva Milz, Mark Bussanich, Deborah Armour, Howie Caldwell and Philip Riddell.

[113] Mr. McLean's two interlocutory applications are also dismissed.

[114] Two claims remain standing: Mr. McLean's claim against Mr. Dirk for damages for battery and assault, and his claim against the Law Society challenging the lawfulness of the investigation order, and claiming damages for unreasonable search and seizure and breach of privacy rights.

[115] As I indicated in dismissing Mr. McLean's application for summary judgment, his challenge to the lawfulness of the making and execution of the investigation order must be decided under the Judicial Review Procedure Act through a petition for judicial review. Until that has taken place, or until further order of the court, this action is stayed.

[116] The defendants are entitled to their costs.

Place and Date of Hearing:	Vancouver, B.C. September 6, 2017
Place and Date of Judgment:	Vancouver, B.C. September 11, 2017

[1] THE COURT: Mr. McLean, who is disbarred as a lawyer, has brought a petition against the Law Society. The petition was preceded by four actions Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society. Mr. McLean discontinued the first two actions, Justice Grauer stayed the third, and Justices Pearlman and Bowden stayed the fourth.

[2] Justice Grauer provided the following background in McLean v. Law Society of British Columbia, 2017 BCSC 987, at para. 1:

> The plaintiff, Mr. McLean, is a former lawyer who was called to the bar in August 2010. His practice did not go smoothly. By October 2012 he had attracted the attention of the Discipline Committee of the Law Society of British Columbia, which authorized a conduct review. In 2013 he was subject to a period of administrative suspension for failing to provide accounting reports, and a panel of three benchers placed administrative conditions on his practice in January 2014. Ultimately, at the end of 2014, Mr. McLean allowed his membership in the Law Society to lapse, and on June 29, 2015, a hearing panel formally ordered him disbarred as ungovernable.

[3] Costs have been ordered against Mr. McLean in favour of the Law Society and fines have been levied against Mr. McLean by the Law Society. All of those obligations are the subject of entered orders in this Court. Mr. McLean has paid none of them. The total he owes is $65,371. Of that, the fines comprise $16,500 and the costs $48,871. Some of the costs are court costs; others are Law Society hearing costs. The following is a list of the eight costs orders and fines:

(a) $5,155.92 stated in a costs certificate dated June 2, 2017 arising from first action (S145607) Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society and its employees, which he discontinued;

(b) $3,618.27 stated in a costs certificate dated June 2, 2017 arising from second action (S148231) Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society and its employees, which he discontinued;

(c) $11,969.76 stated in a costs certificate dated May 23, 2017 arising from the Law Society's successful appeal (CA43059) of various summary judgment applications in the third action Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society and its employees;

2017 BCSC 1713 (CanLII)

(d) $10,130 (including a fine of $6,500) arising from the Law Society's discipline process in 2015 LSBC 06, registered as a judgment in S167374 on August 12, 2016;

(e) $6,785 arising from the Law Society's discipline process in 2015 LSBC 30, registered as a judgment in L170081 on March 8, 2017;

(f) $25,912.50 (including a $10,000 fine) arising from the Law Society's discipline process in 2015 LSBC 47, registered as a judgment in L-170082 on March 8, 2017;

(g) $1,300 arising from the Law Society's discipline process in 2016 LSBC 04, registered as a judgment in L170080 on March 8, 2017; and

(h) $500 stated in an order dated July 5, 2017 representing costs payable on application brought by the Law Society in the fourth action (S173987) Mr. McLean brought against the Law Society and its employees.

[4] Mr. McLean scheduled his petition to be heard September 22, 2017. As he has done in the past in his litigation with the Law Society, Mr. McLean set the hearing date without conferring with counsel for the Law Society. He estimated that his petition could be argued in 50 minutes. It is 73 pages long. Law Society counsel estimates the petition will occupy two hearing days. The latter estimate is the more reliable.

[5] In its application, filed August 17, 2017, the Law Society seeks the following three orders plus costs:

1. An order that the petitioner pay certificates of judgment and cost orders totaling $65,371.45 to the respondent and post $8,100 as security for the respondent's costs in this proceeding;
2. Until the petitioner satisfies the outstanding certificates of judgment and cost orders and posts the security described in the preceding paragraph, an order that the petition be stayed;
3. In the alternative to orders 1 and 2, an order adjourning the hearing of the petition set for September 22, 2017 to a date convenient to counsel for the respondent based on a time estimate of two days . . .

[Emphasis added.]

2017 BCSC 1713 (CanLII)

[6] There is no defence against Mr. McLean's obligation to pay $65,371. Impecuniosity would not negate those obligations. In any event Mr. McLean has not given any evidence about whatever may be his impecuniosity.

[7] There is no need for a further order to enforce Mr. McLean's payment obligations listed above. Those obligations remain outstanding ongoing.

[8] Before addressing the other relief the Law Society seeks, I set out some of the relevant case authority. The following passage is often cited when security for costs is sought against an individual rather than a company. It is at para. 27 in Han v. Cho, 2008 BCSC 1229:

> The onus is on the applicant to establish that he or she will be unable to recover costs (Bronson #1 at para. 45). The fact that the plaintiff resides outside the jurisdiction, has no assets within the jurisdiction, or is impecunious, is not sufficient in itself. The power to order security for costs against an individual is to be exercised cautiously, sparingly, and only under special circumstances, sometimes described as egregious circumstances. Such special circumstances could arise if an impecunious plaintiff also has a weak claim, or has failed to pay costs before, or refused to follow a court order for payment of maintenance.

[9] The court exercises its inherent jurisdiction in deciding whether to order security for costs against an individual. See Gichuru v. Pallai, 2014 BCSC 2330.

[10] I noted earlier that Mr. McLean has not said whether he is impecunious. All that is certain is that he has paid none of the costs or fines he owes to the Law Society. He has taken no steps toward doing so.

[11] In Wang v. British Columbia Medical Association, 2011 BCSC 1659, Justice Dickson, as she then was, granted a stay order against Dr. Wang until she paid an outstanding costs order so as to prevent an abuse of the court's process. On the facts before her, Justice Dickson did not also order security for costs.

[12] Finally, I refer again to Gichuru v. Pallai, cited above, which was decided by Justice Fenlon, as she then was. Her Ladyship ordered security for costs, with a stay pending the posting of security, because the individual plaintiff had failed to pay costs previously ordered against him. Leave to appeal Justice Fenlon's order was denied and the denial of leave was sustained by a three member division of the Court of Appeal. See 2015 BCCA 81 and 2015 BCCA 189.

[13] The authorities cited above, and the other cases to which I was referred, demonstrate the Court's broad discretion associated with the relief the Law Society seeks.

[14] In my view, Mr. McLean, who elects to keep his capacity to pay costs to himself, and who has incurred a substantial list of unpaid court costs, should be ordered to post security before taking the Law Society into court yet again. That is particularly so where, as here, the plaintiff has demonstrated no willingness or attempt to make any of the payments which have been ordered. The Law Society's requested order for security for costs is granted.

[15] The hearing of the petition is stayed until Mr. McLean posts security in a form satisfactory to the registrar and until he pays the court costs owing, which are those listed in subparagraphs (a), (b), (c) and (h), quoted above at para. 3 of these reasons. I will not stop Mr. McLean from working with counsel for the Law Society in the meantime to schedule two days for the hearing of the petition. The resulting hearing date will be one for which both sides are available. However, the posting of the security for costs in satisfactory form, and the payment of the costs listed in the four subparagraphs I have listed above in this paragraph of my reasons, need to be completed 30 days before the scheduled hearing date for the petition. If they are not, the hearing will be adjourned and not reset until they are.

[16] I turn now to an application Mr. McLean brought before me. He sought a declaration that Law Society Rule 3-5.01 is ultra vires the Law Society as being unauthorized by the parent statute. Rule 3-5.01 reads as follows:

> Failure to produce records on complaint investigation
>
> 3-5.01(1) Subject to subrules (2) and (3), a lawyer who is required under Rule 3-5 or 4-43 to produce and permit the copying of files, documents and other records, provide information or attend an interview and answer > questions and who fails or refuses to do so is suspended until he or she has complied with the requirement to the satisfaction of the Executive Director.

2017 BCSC 1713 (CanLII)

>
> (2) When there are special circumstances, the Discipline Committee may, in its discretion, order that
>
> (a) a lawyer not be suspended under subrule (1), or
>
> (b) a suspension under this Rule be delayed for a specified period of time.
>
> (3) At least 7 days before a suspension under this Rule can take effect, the Executive Director must deliver to the lawyer notice of the following:
>
> (a) the date on which the suspension will take effect;
>
> (b) the reasons for the suspension;
> (c) the means by which the lawyer may apply to the Discipline Committee for an order under subrule (2) and the deadline for making such an application before the suspension is to take effect.

[17] Mr. McLean argues that Rule 3-5.01 is not authorized by s. 26.01 of the Legal Profession Act. He may be right, but the Law Society does not defend the authority for Rule 3-5.01 as coming from s. 26.01. The Law Society instead relies on ss. 3, 11, 26, 36, and 37.1, and particularly I believe s. 26, as the authorizing sections. From my review of those sections, the Law Society appears to be right, particularly when the sections are read with the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Green v. Law Society of Manitoba, 2017 SCC 20 at paras. 9, 20–22, 27–33, and 41. If I were to decide the question of vires in these reasons, my decision would probably be against Mr. McLean.

[18] If it was not for a procedural problem preventing the statutory analysis at this stage, I would quote here and proceed to analyze the sections from the statute both sides have referred to me. The procedural problem is this. The declaratory relief Mr. McLean seeks here is a part of the relief he seeks, and a part of the full argument to be developed, in the petition itself. The petition was not scheduled before me on its merits, and the request for the declaration could not be argued in this interlocutory hearing except, if at all, by consent, which was not given. I therefore do not grant or deny the declaratory relief Mr. McLean seeks. (These reasons should not be construed as containing a substantive ruling on the question of vires for Rule 3-5.01. That issue remains outstanding.)

[19] Finally, before me, Mr. McLean asked for an order that the Law Society either destroy or give to him the forensically made copy it has of Mr. McLean's computer hard drive containing his documents relevant to the disputes he has or has had with the Law Society. Mr. McLean has the original hard drive in his possession. He alleges that the order pursuant to which the Law Society obtained the original hard drive and made the copy is an unauthorized order. Time did not permit that point to be developed in argument before me. Had there been enough time, the Petitioner would have run into the same procedural problem seen above regarding Rule 3-5.01.

[20] The Law Society replies, therefore, that the seizure order is presumptively sound at this stage, and that two of the four actions Mr. McLean commenced against the Law Society are only stayed and not dismissed. It adds that Mr. McLean is hopeful that the stay will be lifted at least for the third action. The Law Society, I note, is not investigating Mr. McLean at present, due no doubt in part to his current status as a disbarred former member.

[21] I order as follows. The Law Society will continue to hold the copy of the hard drive. It will not use documents from the hard drive in any ongoing proceeding with Mr. McLean without Mr. McLean's permission or a further order of this Court. If there comes a stage when Mr. McLean states in writing that all present or further claims by him against the Law Society are at an end, and that he will not apply for readmission, the Law Society will destroy the copy of the hard drive, or return it to Mr. McLean, as he elects.

[22] Costs of the applications before me are to the Law Society in any event of the cause, but are not payable forthwith.

Summary:

Application by the respondent to dismiss appeal on the basis that it was not brought within the time period stipulated by s. 14 of the Court of Appeal Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 77, and applications by the appellant for various forms of relief. Held: the respondent's application is dismissed. The notice of appeal was not served within the appeal period and, in addition, the faxing of the notice of appeal to the fax number included in the respondent's address for service in the response to petition did not constitute proper service. The respondent's notice of motion was not a nullity because it was filed in the Victoria Registry when the application was scheduled to be heard in Vancouver. However, it was not in the interests of justice to dismiss the appeal at this stage. With respect to the appellant's applications, the Registrar did not act without jurisdiction in declining to set a date for the hearing of the appeal pending the outcome of the respondent's application. It was either unnecessary or inappropriate to deal with the remainder of the appellant's applications.

2019 BCCA 133 (CanLII)

[1] TYSOE J.A.: The parties have filed competing applications in this appeal. The Attorney General has filed an application for an order that the appeal be dismissed on the basis that the notice of appeal was not served within the 30-day time period stipulated in s. 14 of the Court of Appeal Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 77 and that, therefore, the appeal has not been properly brought. Mr. McLean has filed an application seeking various forms of relief, including a declaration that the Attorney General's notice of motion is a nullity and declarations regarding the setting of the appeal for hearing. Mr. McLean has filed a second application for an order that the appeal be heard by way of written submissions.

[2] Mr. McLean did not appear in person at today's hearing, but he did file written submissions. He did not advise the registry that he wanted to appear but was unable to attend. In the circumstances, I concluded that it was appropriate to deal with the applications, and I heard oral submissions by counsel for the Attorney General and took into account the written submissions filed by Mr. McLean.

[3] The order which Mr. McLean wishes to appeal was made by Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten on November 22, 2018, dismissing his petition to have various provisions of the Legal Profession Act, S.B.C. 1998, c. 9, declared unconstitutional.

[4] The 30-day period under s. 14 of the Court of Appeal Act, with a two-day extension pursuant to s. 25.5 of the Interpretation Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 238, ran from November 23 to December 24. Mr. McLean filed the notice of appeal on December 14. There is no evidence that the notice of appeal was served on the Attorney General by December 24, and the evidence indicates that Mr. McLean faxed a copy of the notice of appeal on Christmas morning to the fax number which the Attorney General had included as an address for service in the response to petition filed in the Supreme Court.

[5] A notice of appearance was filed on behalf of the Attorney General on January 4, 2019. The Attorney General's counsel wrote to Mr. McLean on January 29, 2019 taking the position that the appeal had not been properly brought and advising that Mr. McLean needed to obtain an extension of time if he wished to pursue the appeal. In the meantime, Mr. McLean had faxed and delivered to the Ministry of Attorney General the appeal record, appeal book and his factum.

[6] On February 5, Mr. McLean filed a certificate of readiness with the Court. On February 6, counsel for the Attorney General filed his notice of motion in the Victoria Registry of the Court returnable February 20 at the Vancouver Law Courts.

[7] On or about February 8, Mr. McLean faxed a notice of hearing to the Associate Registrar requesting a hearing date of February 20. After consulting with the Registrar, the Associate Registrar declined to set a date for the hearing of the appeal until the Attorney General's application was dealt with.

[8] On February 14, Mr. McLean filed the first of his notices of motion returnable April 3.

[9] The Attorney General's application came on for hearing in chambers on February 20 before Justice Stromberg-Stein. As Mr. McLean had written on February 19 that he was not available on February 20, Stromberg-Stein J.A. adjourned the application to April 3 and suspended the time for the filing of the Attorney General's factum until further order of the Court.

[10] One of the forms of relief sought by Mr. McLean is that his first motion be heard prior to the Attorney General's motion. In my view, it is not necessary or in the interests of judicial economy to deal with all of the orders and declarations requested in his first motion, but there are two aspects of the motion that I do consider it appropriate to address before dealing with the Attorney General's motion.

[11] The first aspect is the request for a declaration that the Registrar did not have the authority to refuse Mr. McLean's notice of hearing. Mr. McLean relies in this regard on the decision in R. v. Verma, 2016 BCCA 307. In that case, the Court held that the Registrar had erred in refusing to accept an application for leave to appeal on the basis that the appellant was seeking to bring an interlocutory appeal in a criminal matter and the Court does not have jurisdiction to entertain such an appeal. The Court ruled that the Registrar does not have authority to decide whether a matter is within the Court's jurisdiction.

[12] In my opinion, Verma is distinguishable from the present circumstances and is of no assistance to Mr. McLean. Here, the Registrar exercised his discretion to decline to accept a notice of hearing because a legitimate question had been raised as to whether the appeal had been properly brought. In my view, the Registrar did not err in his exercise of discretion because, if the appeal was not properly brought, it would be inappropriate to have the appeal set down for hearing. The Registrar did not make a determination that the Court lacked jurisdiction to entertain the appeal, and he simply directed that the appeal should not be set down for hearing until the Court decided whether the appeal had been properly brought.

[13] The second aspect of Mr. McLean's notice of motion I will address before dealing with the Attorney General's motion is his request for a declaration that the Attorney General's motion is a nullity because it was filed in the Victoria Registry when the notice of appeal was filed in the Vancouver Registry and the application was to be heard in Vancouver. He relies in this regard on the British Columbia Court of Appeal Practice Note, Preferred Filing Registry (Civil & Criminal Practice Note, 19 September 2011), which states that all relevant matters for chamber applications set to be heard in Vancouver are to be filed in Vancouver in order to avoid delays in the materials being transferred from other registries. In my view, this Practice Note does not have the same force as the Court of Appeal Rules, which defines the word "file" to mean "file with the registrar in a registry of the court". The Victoria Registry is "a registry of the court", and the filing of the Attorney General's notice of motion complied with the Court of Appeal Rules. Non-compliance with the Practice Note does not render the notice of motion a nullity.

[14] I now turn to the Attorney General's application for an order for the dismissal of the appeal on the basis that this appeal has not been properly brought because the notice of appeal was not served on the Attorney General within the period set out in s. 14 of the Court of Appeal Act as extended by the operation of the Interpretation Act. Mr. McLean disputes the fact that the notice of appeal was not properly served.

[15] There are two aspects to the issue of service. The first is whether the fax transmitting the notice of appeal was received within the appeal period. The order of DeWitt-Van Oosten J. was made on November 22 and, with the two-day extension pursuant to the Interpretation Act, the appeal period expired on December 24. The cover sheet for the fax sent by Mr. McLean, as attached to an affidavit of a legal assistant in the Legal Services Branch of the Ministry of Attorney General, states that it was sent at 9:35 a.m. Eastern Standard Time on December 25 and the header shows the time of 6:34 a.m. (presumably Pacific Standard Time) on December 25. Mr. McLean has not filed an affidavit to contradict this evidence and, as a result, there is no basis to accede to his request to cross-examine the legal assistant who swore the affidavit. I conclude that the notice of appeal was not served prior to the expiry of the appeal period.

[16] The second aspect in relation to service is the fact that the notice of appeal was faxed to the Legal Services Branch. Rule 39(1) of the Court of Appeal Rules requires that a notice of appeal be served personally on the respondent or on the solicitor of record in the court appealed from. Rule 39(4)(c), which permits service by fax to the fax number included in the party's address for service, does not apply to Mr. McLean's faxing of the notice of appeal because the Rule only becomes operative after the respondent has filed in the registry of this Court a document containing an address for service which includes a fax number. Contrary to Mr. McLean's assertions, R. 39(4) does not permit service of a notice of appeal by faxing it to the fax number included in the address for service in a document filed in the Supreme Court. As a result, even if the notice of appeal had been faxed within the appeal period, it would not have constituted proper service. Indeed, the notice of appeal has still not been served on the Attorney General.

[17] As the notice of appeal was not served within the appeal period and no extension has been obtained, it is necessary to consider whether the appeal should be dismissed. The leading authority with respect to an application to dismiss an appeal for failure to file and serve the notice of appeal in a timely fashion is Davies v. C.I.B.C. (1987), 15 B.C.L.R. (2d) 256 (C.A.). At 259-260, Justice Seaton stated that the Court should consider the following five questions, which are the same as the questions to be considered on an extension of time application:

1) Was there a bona fide intention to appeal?
2) When were the respondents informed of the intention?
3) Would the respondents be unduly prejudiced by an extension?
4) Is there merit in the appeal?; and
5) Is it in the interest of justice that an extension be granted?

[18] As Justice Lambert clarified at 261, the fifth question is the overriding question and embraces the first four questions. In the context of an application to dismiss an appeal, the overriding question is whether it is in the interests of justice to dismiss the appeal.

[19] Justice Seaton endorsed the view that extensions of time are generally granted when the delay is short and the delay was due to an error by the solicitor. He also observed that there is a greater willingness to grant an extension of time for service than the time for filing.

[20] Considering the above factors in these circumstances, it is my conclusion that it would not be in the interests of justice to dismiss the appeal at this stage. Accordingly, I dismiss the Attorney General's application with costs in the cause of the appeal.

[21] Although I have dismissed the Attorney General's application, it does not follow that the appeal may now be set for hearing. In the absence of an order extending the time to bring the appeal, the appeal has not been properly brought and it would not be appropriate to set such an appeal for hearing. Similarly, as the appeal has not yet been properly brought, it is not appropriate to deal with Mr. McLean's second application for an order that the appeal be heard by way of written submissions or to deal with any of the remaining aspects of Mr. McLean's first application that did not need to be decided in connection with the Attorney General's application.

[22] Although I believe I have jurisdiction to extend the time to bring the appeal in conjunction with the Attorney General's application without a formal extension application (which appears to have been done in Davies), I decline to do so in the present circumstances, including the facts that the Attorney General gave Mr. McLean notice that he should apply for an extension and that Mr. McLean is not present to address ancillary matters.

[23] Counsel for the Attorney General suggested that I give Mr. McLean a deadline of May 10 to obtain an extension of time. I do not think it would be appropriate for me to make a conditional type of order, but I will observe that it would be in the interests of Mr. McLean to act with all due dispatch because any further delay will undoubtedly be taken into account when a justice considers his application for the extension of time. The Attorney General may file another application for the dismissal of the appeal if he is of the view that Mr. McLean has not acted with suitable dispatch.

[24] Finally, nothing I have said should be construed as an order ending the suspension of the time for the filing of the Attorney General's factum ordered by Stromberg-Stein J.A. on February 20.

2023 BCCA 231 (CanLII)

Summary:

The underlying appeal concerns a judicial review of an arbitrator's decision holding that the exemption from the Residential Tenancy Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 78 [RTA] for transitional housing applies to a social housing facility operated by the respondent. Two applicants (the British Columbia Civil Liberties Association and a coalition of Pivot Legal Society and Our Homes Can't Wait) sought intervener status. Held: Both applicants are granted leave to intervene and make submissions to the extent indicated in these reasons. The underlying appeal concerns a public law issue with broader implications for low-income tenants in similar circumstances to the appellant. The applicants' proposed submissions on s. 7 Charter values, and Canada's domestic and international housing commitments raise new issues and would impermissibly expand the scope of the appeal. However, the BCCLA's submissions on legal uncertainty in RTB decisions on the definition of transitional housing would assist the Court. The applicants both made similar submissions on interpreting the RTA in light of its purpose of protecting tenants, and the impacts of weakened tenancy protection on precariously housed people given the current housing crisis. These will also assist the Court, provided the interveners do not duplicate each other's submissions.

FISHER J.A.:

[1] The British Columbia Civil Liberties Association (BCCLA), Pivot Legal Society (Pivot) and Our Homes Can't Wait (OHCW) apply for leave to intervene in this appeal, which concerns the applicability of the Residential Tenancy Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 78 [RTA] to a social housing facility operated by the respondent, the Elizabeth Fry Society. The appellant, Nicole McNeil, resides in the facility. An arbitrator in the Residential Tenancy Branch (RTB) dismissed a complaint made by the appellant on the basis that the facility is exempt from the requirements of the RTA as transitional housing. This appeal is from the order of Justice Gomery dismissing the appellant's petition for judicial review of the arbitrator's decision.

[2] The appellant consents to both applications. The respondent opposes the applications, submitting that none of the proposed interveners meet the criteria for public interest participation.

Background

[3] The Elizabeth Fry Society operates Mazarine Lodge under a contract with the B.C. Housing Management Commission (BC Housing). I will refer to this contract as the Operating Agreement. The operations are subsidised by the provincial government as part of a program to provide “rapid, safe and affordable housing” as well as support services for those facing homelessness.

[4] The appellant occupies a room at Mazarine Lodge and receives two meals a day in a cafeteria. She is a member of the population the Lodge is intended to serve. She is signatory to a program agreement which states the accommodation is not covered by the RTA and the purpose of her participation in the program is to provide her with supportive housing services to enable her “to move onto independent living as soon as possible” (the Program Agreement).

[5] This matter went before the RTB on a complaint by the appellant and others about some of the rules established at the Lodge.

[6] An arbitrator, as a delegate of the Director of the RTB, concluded that the appellant’s accommodation at Mazarine Lodge was “transitional housing” under s. 4(f) of the RTA, as defined in s. 1(2) of the Residential Tenancy Regulation, B.C. Reg. 477/2003, and therefore exempt from the RTA. Section 1(2) of the Regulation provides:

> For the purposes of section 4(f) of the Act [what the Act does not apply to], “transitional housing” means living accommodation that is provided
> (a) on a temporary basis,
>
> (b) by a person or organization that receives funding from a local government or the government of British Columbia or of Canada for the purpose of providing that accommodation, and
> (c) together with programs intended to assist tenants to become better able to live independently.

[7] The arbitrator rejected submissions that the accommodation was “supportive housing” as defined in the Residential Tenancy Policy Guideline 46, which is subject to the RTA. She found the Program Agreement signed by the appellant demonstrated that the Mazarine Lodge was provided to her on a temporary basis, the respondent received funding from the BC government for the purpose of providing the accommodation, and the purpose of the Lodge as described in the Operating Agreement was consistent with the Regulation.

[8] The arbitrator rejected an abuse of process argument by the appellant that the respondent could not take the position that the RTA did not apply when it had previously invoked eviction procedures administered by the RTB. The arbitrator found the Society had done this only for a limited number of occupants for the purpose of seeking a "peaceful, compromised resolution" in those matters.

[9] Justice Gomery, applying the standard of patent unreasonableness under s. 58(2)(a) of the Administrative Tribunals Act, S.B.C. 2004, c. 45, concluded it was open to the arbitrator to find that the requirements of the definition of transitional housing in s. 1(2) of the Regulation were satisfied in the circumstances. He also concluded the arbitrator's rejection of the abuse of process argument was not patently unreasonable, and dismissed the appellant's petition.

Issues on appeal

[10] The appellant will submit in this appeal that Justice Gomery erred by concluding that the RTB decision was not patently unreasonable and did not amount to an abuse of process. More particularly, she says the judge erred in:

a) finding that the Program Agreement demonstrated the mutual intentions of the parties and established the basis on which the Elizabeth Fry Society provided living accommodation to her;

b) finding that her intentions to eventually vacate Mazarine Lodge were relevant to whether her accommodation was provided on a temporary basis;

c) finding that Mazarine Lodge was provided on a temporary basis despite the absence of a fixed end date;

d) failing to properly grapple with her argument regarding the arbitrator's failure to apply the principles of contractual interpretation;

2023 BCCA 231 (CanLII)

e) finding the arbitrator was not required to give weight to relevant evidence that she was not provided with a transition plan; and

f) finding that the arbitrator's decision did not amount to an abuse of process.

2023 BCCA 231 (CanLII)

The proposed interveners

[11] Both proposed interveners seek to intervene in the public interest.

[12] The BCCLA is a well-known non-profit society that advocates to defend, sustain and promote civil liberties and human rights throughout British Columbia and Canada. It regularly engages in advocacy with governments about eradicating homelessness and emphasizing the importance of stable housing. It has acted as intervener in numerous cases dealing with housing and Charter rights.

[13] Pivot is a non-profit legal advocacy organization located in Vancouver's Downtown Eastside. Its work focuses on systemic legal issues faced by marginalized people, including those who are unhoused or precariously unhoused. It currently runs five different but interrelated campaigns, one of which concerns homelessness.

[14] OHCW is a community-based advocacy coalition governed by allied organizations (including Pivot) and individuals directly impacted by housing precarity and homelessness. OHCW advocates for the improvement of housing conditions and tenancy rights for unhoused and precariously housed people, including low-income tenants.

The test for granting intervention

[15] Section 30(f) of the Court of Appeal Act, S.B.C 2021, c. 6 provides that a justice may grant leave to intervene in an appeal. Pursuant to Rule 61 of the Court of Appeal Rules, B.C. Reg. 120/2022 "[a] person, other than a party, interested in an appeal may apply to a justice for leave to intervene".

[16] As confirmed by Justice Newbury in Linkletter v. Proctorio, Incorporated, 2022 BCCA 313 (Chambers), the substantive considerations applicable to intervener applications under the new Court of Appeal Rules remain the same as under the previous R. 36 of the Court of Appeal Rules, B.C. Reg. 297/2001.

[17] A justice's discretion to grant intervener status is governed by the following principles, set out in Halalt First Nation v. British Columbia (Environment), 2012 BCCA 191 at para. 5 (Chambers):

> a) the applicant must have a direct interest in the matter; or
>
> b) the applicant must have a public interest in a public law issue in question; and
> c) the applicant can make a valuable contribution or bring a different perspective to a consideration of the issues on appeal that differs from that advanced by the parties.

[18] The factors to consider for applications to intervene in the public interest are set out in numerous cases, including British Columbia Civil Liberties Association v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 BCCA 282 at para. 14 (Chambers):

> a) Does the proposed intervener have a broad representative base?
>
> b) Does the case legitimately engage the proposed intervener's interests in the public law issue raised on appeal?
>
> c) Does the proposed intervener have a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court in the resolution of the issues?
> d) Does the proposed intervener seek to expand the scope of the appeal by raising issues not raised by the parties?

[19] While an intervener's submission may support one party's position, the intervener's role is not to support the position of a party. Rather, its role is to make principled submissions on pertinent points of law. It is not to expand the scope of the litigation between the parties. Repetition is to be avoided and the appeal must remain focused on the issues raised by the parties: see Snaw-Naw-As First Nation v. Canada (Attorney General), 2021 BCCA 89 at para. 22 (Chambers) and the cases cited therein; Friedmann v. MacGarvie, 2012 BCCA 109 (Chambers) at para. 28; J.P. v. British Columbia (Children and Family Development), 2016 BCCA 124 (Chambers) at paras. 5–6.

2023 BCCA 231 (CanLII)

[20] In allowing persons to intervene on appeals on a public interest basis, the Court is attempting to ensure that important points of view are not overlooked: Equustek Solutions Inc. v. Google Inc., 2014 BCCA 448 at para. 8 (Chambers).

Submissions

BCCLA

[21] The BCCLA submits it has a broad representative base, expertise in statutory interpretation and civil liberties, and a legitimate interest in "ensuring the RTA is interpreted in a way that advances civil liberties interests and protects the rights of vulnerable communities". It has intervened in important cases involving the constitutionality and interpretation of legislation affecting the rights of people experiencing homelessness.

[22] The BCCLA intends to take no position on the outcome of the appeal and proposes to make four submissions that focus on the interpretation of s. 4(f) of the RTA and s. 1(2) of the Regulation:

1) There is significant uncertainty in the law over the RTB's interpretation and application of the criteria in s. 1(2) of the Regulation. The BCCLA will summarize this and emphasize the need for certainty in a law that affects a vulnerable group of people who rely on affordable housing spaces;

2) The onus of establishing an exemption from the RTA should be on the housing provider seeking to opt out of that regulatory framework and the court should have particular regard for the need to interpret "transitional housing" in a manner consistent with the RTA's purpose to remedy power imbalances and protect tenants;

3) The precarity of rental housing and the current housing crisis support a narrow interpretation of the term "temporary" in s. 1(2)(a) of the Regulation and of the funding criterion in s. 1(2)(b); and

4) To the extent there is any ambiguity in the criteria in s. 1(2), s. 7 Charter values support a narrow interpretation of the term “transitional housing”.

Pivot and OHCW

[23] Pivot and OHCW submit they have a shared public interest in the issues raised on this appeal and apply for leave to jointly intervene. Together, they say they have a broad representative base, an indirect but significant interest in the public law issues raised in this appeal and in the development and application of tenancy law, and will provide a unique and different perspective that will not expand the scope of the appeal.

[24] They say the question of whether the RTA applies to the kind of housing at issue in this appeal will have a broad impact on marginalized people, including their own clients and members, many who have been displaced as a result of restrictive housing policies, substandard housing, and evictions.

[25] If they are granted leave to appeal, Pivot and OHCW propose to make three submissions:

1) The term “temporary” in s. 1(2)(a) of the Regulation must be interpreted in a contextual manner consistent with Canada’s national and international housing policies and commitments regarding the right to adequate housing;

2) The interpretation of the RTA should account for the relevant social context of chronic homelessness and the imbalance of power inherent in landlord-tenant relationships, which make a strict contractual interpretation inappropriate for the agreement at issue; and

3) The Court’s analysis should account for the impact of weakened tenancy protections on low-income tenants and the accessibility of such housing for people at risk of eviction from tent cities and other public spaces.

Respondent

[26] The respondent submits that the issues in this appeal do not raise a public law issue in which the BCCLA, Pivot or OHCW have a genuine interest, as it involves the narrow question of an arbitrator's application of the definition of "transitional housing" in s. 1(2) of the Regulation on the facts before her, which attracts a patently unreasonable standard of review on judicial review. In this respect, the respondent emphasizes that the Court's role is not to interpret the legislation but rather to review the reasons of the arbitrator.

[27] The respondent submits that the BCCLA has largely acted as an intervener in cases in which the Charter was at issue and does not have a genuine interest in this matter just because it has an interest in the rights of vulnerable communities and alleges a Charter issue. It further submits that the points raised by all applicants have either been addressed by the parties, can be addressed by the parties or impermissibly widen the scope of the appeal.

[28] The respondent also says that both interveners take a position on whether the arbitrator's reasons are patently unreasonable, and this is not the proper role of an intervener.

Application

[29] It is not disputed that the BCCLA, Pivot and OHCW each have a broad representative base. At issue is whether (1) this appeal raises a public law issue in which the applicants have a legitimate interest, (2) the applicants have a unique perspective that will assist the Court, and (3) the applicants seek to expand the scope of the appeal.

1. Public law issue

[30] This appeal stems from an arbitrator's interpretation of an exemption provision in the RTA that impacts people who receive transitional housing. While the scope of this appeal is governed largely by the fact that it arises from a judicial review of an administrative decision that is subject to a patently unreasonable standard of review, it does in my view raise public law issues. The scope of these issues is relevant to the question of whether the applicants have a legitimate interest in them, and whether their submissions will assist the Court or expand the lis between the parties.

[31] As instructed in Canada (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration) v. Vavilov, 2019 SCC 65 on a reasonableness review, it is not the role of the reviewing judge, or of this Court, to undertake a de novo analysis of a statutory provision or measure the decision maker's interpretation against the one the court would have reached: Vavilov at para. 116. Rather a reviewing court is to take a "reasons first" approach that starts with how the decision maker arrived at their interpretation, in order to determine whether it was defensible in light of the interpretive constraints imposed by law: Canada Post Corp. v. Canadian Union of Postal Workers, 2019 SCC 67 at para. 41. As Justice Rowe, for the majority in Canada Post Corp. stated:

> [42] Where the meaning of a statutory provision is in dispute, the administrative decision maker must demonstrate in their reasons that they were alive to the "essential elements" of statutory interpretation: "the merits of an administrative decision maker's interpretation of a statutory provision must be consistent with the text, context and purpose of the provision" (Vavilov, at para. 120). Because those who draft statutes expect that the statute's meaning will be discerned by looking to the text, context and purpose, a reasonable interpretation must have regard to these elements — whether it is the court or an administrative decision maker tasked with the interpretative exercise (Vavilov, at para. 118). In addition to being harmonious with the text, context and purpose, a reasonable interpretation should conform to any interpretative constraints in the governing statutory scheme, as well as interpretative rules arising from other sources of law.

[32] In her interpretation of s. 1(2) of the Regulation, the arbitrator referred to a Residential Tenancy Policy Guideline regarding "transitional housing" and "supportive housing", the Program Agreement, the Operating Agreement, and a considerable amount of evidence, both documentary and testamentary. Her conclusion that the accommodation constituted transitional housing was based on numerous findings of fact, including the terms of the Program Agreement and Operating Agreement and the nature of the programs offered by the respondent.

[33] The chambers judge, applying the “reasons first” approach discussed above, found the arbitrator’s reasoning leading to her conclusion that the accommodation was provided on a temporary basis to be “rational and defensible in light of the constraints imposed by the evidence and governing legislation”: at para. 33. He also found the arbitrator’s conclusions that the second and third criteria for transitional housing under the Regulation had been established were not patently unreasonable.

[34] The issues in this appeal, as articulated by the appellant in her factum, stem primarily from the arbitrator’s findings of fact. However, embedded in the grounds of appeal are questions related to “the interpretive constraints imposed by law”. These questions include whether s. 5 of the RTA, which prohibits parties from contracting out of the legislation, as well as provisions in the Policy Guideline that incorporate s. 5, were properly considered by the arbitrator, and whether the Program Agreement could properly determine the intentions of the parties where there is unequal bargaining power between them or properly establish the basis on which the respondent provided accommodation to the appellant. The appellant also asserts errors by the arbitrator in failing to consider the harsh consequences of exclusion from the RTA and failing to apply the principles of contractual interpretation in interpreting the Operating Agreement.

[35] In my view, the public law issue here concerns the impact of the arbitrator’s interpretation of s. 1(2) of the Regulation and the RTA and the scope of the RTB’s jurisdiction on a vulnerable population that accesses housing similar to the Mazarine Lodge. While the appellant’s complaints stem from rules imposed by the respondent regarding guests, others may be vulnerable to more severe consequences of exclusion from the RTA, such as eviction without notice. I therefore accept, for the purpose of these applications, that the question of what constitutes transitional housing under the legislation impacts a vulnerable population of individuals in various ways.

2. Unique perspective that will assist the Court and the scope of the appeal

[36] I will first address the respondent's argument that both applicants have taken a position in this appeal that supports the appellant. I agree that their positions align with that of the appellant but I am satisfied that they both understand the distinction between supporting one party's position and making principled submissions on matters relevant to the issue on appeal.

BCCLA

[37] In my view, the BCCLA is an experienced intervener with a legitimate interest in the public law issue as I have defined it. I am satisfied that it is able to bring a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court but only with respect to the following submissions, which I have refined: (1) there is a need for clarity of a law that affects a vulnerable population, and uncertainty has resulted from the RTB's inconsistent interpretation and application of the criteria in s. 1(2) of the Regulation; and (2) "transitional housing" should be interpreted in a manner consistent with the RTA's remedial purpose of protecting tenants, and considered in the broader context of the housing crisis which has been recognized by this Court.

[38] With respect to the first submission, the BCCLA's proposal to summarize the uncertainty in the law arising from decisions of the RTB may be useful. While the parties have addressed some of these decisions in their factums, neither do so for the purpose of demonstrating legal uncertainty. I have narrowed the second submission to exclude the onus of establishing an exemption, as the arbitrator's reasons indicate that she placed the onus on the respondent to provide sufficient evidence to establish the criteria in s. 1(2) of the Regulation, and neither party has raised this as an issue. And again, I understand that the appellant has made arguments in her factum about unequal bargaining power, but in a context specific to her circumstances and unconscionability in relation to the Program Agreement. The BCCLA's approach is on a broader basis and grounded in the principles of statutory interpretation.

[39] I have limited the BCCLA's third submission by subsuming its essential aspect in the second submission and on the basis that it relies only on judicial precedent rather than evidence. The appellant has argued that the consequences of being excluded from the RTA are significant for her but I am satisfied that the BCCLA will provide a broader perspective of the consequences for other vulnerable individuals in the context of the housing crisis.

[40] I am not satisfied that the submission about Charter values will assist the Court. Although this is arguably an interpretative rule arising from another source of law, it was not raised before the arbitrator or the chambers judge. As this Court stated in Gorenshtein v. British Columbia (Employment Standards Tribunal), 2016 BCCA 457 at para. 47, "it is generally considered that a judge should not find a decision to be patently unreasonable based on a submission the Tribunal never heard. It is even less desirable that an appellate court should consider, for the first time, a submission neither made to the judge nor made to the tribunal." While there may be exceptions to this approach, this argument expands the scope beyond what I consider appropriate in the context of this appeal.

Pivot/OHCW

[41] Pivot and OHCW also have legitimate interests in the public law issues raised in this appeal as a result of their advocacy for unhoused and precariously housed individuals. However, in my view, their proposed submissions either raise new issues that are beyond the scope of this appeal, are duplicative of the submissions of the BCCLA or are adequately addressed by the parties.

[42] The first proposed submission that the interpretation of "temporary" in s. 1(2)(a) of the Regulation must be consistent with Canada's national and international housing policies and commitments was again not raised below and is an expansion of the issues in this appeal. It also raises the question of evidence that is not in the record. This is not a case like Garcia v. Tahoe Resources Inc., 2016 BCCA 320 or Araya v. Nevsun Resources Ltd., 2017 BCCA 402, where the issues on appeal concerned aspects of international law.

[43] The second and third submissions advocating an interpretation that accounts for the relevant social context of chronic homelessness, the imbalance of power inherent in landlord-tenant relationships, and the impact of weakened tenancy protections and access to housing on low-income tenants are duplicative of the second submission of the BCCLA as I have articulated it. I recognize, however, that there are aspects to this argument, such as the disproportionate impact on certain marginalized groups within the broader vulnerable population, on which Pivot and OHCW have a perspective unique from that of the BCCLA.

[44] Therefore, I am prepared to grant leave for Pivot and OHCW to intervene to make a submission that "transitional housing" as defined in s. 1(2) of the Regulation should be interpreted in a manner that accounts for the imbalance of power inherent in landlord-tenant relationships, the impact of weakened tenancy protections and access to housing on low-income tenants, and the broader context of the housing crisis which has been recognized by this Court.

[45] I have narrowed this submission to exclude an argument that the Court must consider the policy rationale that has informed the constitutional right to shelter in public spaces overnight as I consider this to expand the scope of this appeal beyond permissible limits.

Summary and conclusion

[46] The public law issue raised in this appeal concerns the impact on a vulnerable population that accesses housing similar to the Mazarine Lodge, arising from the arbitrator's interpretation of s. 1(2) of the Regulation and the RTA and the scope of the RTB's jurisdiction

[47] The application of the BCCLA for leave to intervene is granted, limited to the following submissions:

> (1) there is a need for clarity of a law that affects a vulnerable population, and uncertainty has resulted from the RTB's inconsistent interpretation and application of the criteria in s. 1(2) of the Regulation; and

(2) "transitional housing" should be interpreted in a manner consistent with the RTA's remedial purpose of protecting tenants, and considered in the broader context of the housing crisis which has been recognized by this Court.

[48] The application of Pivot and OHCW jointly for leave to intervene is granted, but limited to the submission that "transitional housing" as defined in s. 1(2) of the Regulation should be interpreted in a manner that accounts for the imbalance of power inherent in landlord-tenant relationships, the impact of weakened tenancy protections and access to housing on low-income tenants, and the broader context of the housing crisis which has been recognized by this Court.

[49] As I have indicated, there is duplication in the submissions of each applicant and provisions must be made to avoid repetitive arguments. I consider the applicants to be in the best position to decide how to do this and I therefore direct that they do so.

[50] Leave is therefore granted on the following terms, given that I have narrowed the issues:

1. The BCCLA may file a factum of not more than 6 pages;

2. Pivot and OHCW may file a factum of not more than 3 pages;

2. The respondent may file a reply factum to that of the BCCLA of not more than 3 pages and to that of Pivot/OHCW of not more than 2 pages; and

4. No costs will be awarded for or against BCCLA or Pivot/OHCW in respect of this application or the appeal itself.

[51] It will be for the division hearing this appeal to determine if oral submissions will be permitted and, if so, for what duration.

Prerogative writs — Habeas corpus — Jurisdiction — Superior courts — Inmate confined in a special handling unit — Application for habeas corpus and certiorari in aid in a superior court — Whether a provincial superior court has jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus to determine the validity of an inmate's confinement in a special handling unit of a federal penitentiary — Federal Court Act, R.S.C. 1970 (2nd Supp.), c. 10, s. 18.

Prerogative writs — Habeas corpus — Availability of remedy — Inmate confined in a special handling unit following a disturbance in a federal penitentiary — Whether habeas corpus lies to challenge the validity of a particular form of confinement in a penitentiary.

Prerogative writs — Habeas corpus — Procedure — Affidavit evidence — Whether affidavit evidence admissible on habeas corpus application to show jurisdictional error.

Following a disturbance in the penitentiary, respondent inmate was transferred to another institution and placed in administrative segregation in a "Special Handling Unit". This unit was reserved for particularly dangerous inmates and was characterized by a more restrictive confinement and the loss of several privileges or amenities enjoyed by the general inmate population. Respondent was advised that he had been placed there because of his participation in the disturbance, but was never given any opportunity to confront the evidence, if any, of his involvement in the incident. Respondent's application for habeas corpus with certiorari in aid was dismissed by the Ontario Supreme Court. The Court of Appeal allowed respondent's appeal and returned the matter to the High Court to determine the issue on the merits. This appeal is to determine (1) whether a provincial superior court has jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus against a federal board, commission or other tribunal despite the exclusive jurisdiction in respect of certiorari of the Federal Court of Canada under s. 18 of the Federal Court Act; (2) whether, on an application for habeas corpus alone, a court may consider affidavit evidence to determine whether a detention is unlawful by reason of an absence or excess of jurisdiction; and (3) whether habeas corpus will lie to determine the validity of confinement in a special handling unit, and if such confinement is found to be unlawful, to secure the release of the inmate into the general population of the institution.

À la suite d'un incident dans un pénitencier, le détenu intimé a été transféré à un autre établissement où on l'a mis en ségrégation administrative dans une «unité spéciale de détention». Cette unité est réservée aux détenus particulièrement dangereux. La détention y est plus sévère et entraîne la privation de plusieurs privilèges ou agréments dont jouit la population carcérale générale. On a fait savoir à l'intimé qu'il y avait été placé en raison de sa participation à l'incident en question, mais il n'a jamais eu la possibilité de réfuter la preuve, si preuve il y avait, de cette participation. La demande de l'habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire présentée par l'intimé a été rejetée par la Cour suprême de l'Ontario. La Cour d'appel a accueilli son appel et renvoyé l'affaire à la Haute Cour pour qu'elle tranche le litige sur le fond. Le présent pourvoi vise à déterminer (1) si, nonobstant la compétence exclusive en matière de certiorari que l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale confère à la Cour fédérale du Canada, une cour supérieure provin-

Held: The appeal should be dismissed.

(1) A provincial superior court has jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus notwithstanding s. 18 of the Federal Court Act. The provisions of the Federal Court Act indicate a clear intention on the part of Parliament to leave the jurisdiction by way of habeas corpus to review the validity of a detention imposed by federal authority with the provincial superior courts. While s. 18 confers an exclusive and very general review jurisdiction over federal authorities by the prerogative and extraordinary remedies, to which specific reference is made, it deliberately omits reference to habeas corpus. This omission was not an oversight but a well considered decision. Considering the importance of certiorari in aid to the effectiveness of habeas corpus, a remedy included as a guaranteed right in s. 2(c)(ii) of the Canadian Bill of Rights and s. 10(c) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, it cannot have been intended that the reference to certiorari in s. 18 should have the effect of undermining or weakening the habeas corpus jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts by the exclusion or denial of certiorari in aid. To avoid such a construction, it is possible to conclude that, because of the association in that section of certiorari with the other prerogative and extraordinary remedies, the reference to certiorari in s. 18 is to the independent remedy of certiorari to quash the decision of an inferior tribunal and not to certiorari as an ancillary procedure used to serve an essentially evidentiary purpose. Indeed, it is unlikely that Parliament intended to confer an exclusive jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid when it had clearly withheld the jurisdiction to issue habeas corpus.

(2) It is well established that affidavit evidence is admissible on certiorari to show jurisdictional error. Subject to the limitation arising from the conclusive character of the records of courts of superior or general common law jurisdiction, a court may also on an ciale peut délivrer contre un office, une commission ou un autre tribunal fédéral un habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire; (2) si un tribunal saisi d'une demande d'habeas corpus simple peut tenir compte d'une preuve par affidavit pour déterminer si une détention est illégale pour défaut ou excès de compétence; et (3) si l'on peut recourir à l'habeas corpus pour déterminer la validité d'une incarcération dans une unité spéciale de détention et, dans l'hypothèse où cette incarcération serait jugée illégale, pour obtenir la réintégration du détenu dans la population générale de l'établissement.

Arrêt: Le pourvoi est rejeté.

(1) Une cour supérieure provinciale a compétence pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus nonobstant l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale. Les dispositions de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale traduisent une intention claire chez le législateur de laisser aux cours supérieures provinciales la compétence pour vérifier par voie d'habeas corpus la validité d'une détention imposée par les autorités fédérales. Bien que l'art. 18 confère une compétence exclusive et très générale pour contrôler les décisions d'autorités fédérales par le moyen des recours de prérogative et des recours extraordinaires, lesquels sont expressément mentionnés, toute mention de l'habeas corpus a été délibérément omise. Or, cette omission n'est pas un oubli mais le résultat d'une décision bien pesée. Compte tenu de l'importance du certiorari auxiliaire pour l'efficacité de l'habeas corpus, recours auquel le sous-al. 2*c*)(ii) de la Déclaration canadienne des droits et l'al. 10*c*) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés reconnaissent le statut de droit garanti, on n'a pas pu vouloir que la mention du certiorari à l'art. 18 ait pour effet de miner ou d'affaiblir la compétence des cours supérieures provinciales en matière d'habeas corpus en excluant ou en refusant le certiorari auxiliaire. Pour éviter une telle interprétation, il est possible de conclure, étant donné qu'à l'art. 18 le certiorari fait partie d'une énumération des recours de prérogative et des recours extraordinaires, qu'il est alors question du recours indépendant en certiorari pour l'annulation d'une décision d'un tribunal d'instance inférieure et non pas du certiorari en tant que procédure auxiliaire servant essentiellement à établir la preuve. En fait, puisqu'il n'a manifestement pas donné compétence pour délivrer un bref d'habeas corpus, il est peu probable que le législateur ait voulu conférer une compétence exclusive pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire.

(2) Il est bien établi que, dans le cas d'une demande de certiorari, une preuve par affidavit est admissible pour établir une erreur de compétence. Sous réserve de la restriction qui résulte du caractère concluant des dossiers de cours de juridiction supérieure ou de juridicapplication for habeas corpus without certiorari in aid consider affidavit or other extrinsic evidence to determine whether there has been an absence or excess of jurisdiction. The proposition that this Court was limited on habeas corpus to an examination of the warrant of committal in determining whether there had been a jurisdictional error goes beyond the true basis of the Court's jurisprudence on this question.

(3) Habeas corpus lies to determine the validity of a particular form of confinement in a penitentiary notwithstanding that the same issue may be determined upon certiorari in the Federal Court. The proper scope of the availability of habeas corpus must be considered first on its own merits, apart from possible problems arising from concurrent or overlapping jurisdiction. The general importance of this remedy as the traditional means of challenging deprivations of liberty is such that its proper development and adaptation to the modern realities of confinement in a prison setting should not be compromised by concerns about conflicting jurisdiction. Confinement in a special handling unit or in administrative segregation is a form of detention that is distinct and separate from that imposed on the general inmate population. It is in fact a new detention of the inmate, purporting to rest on its own foundation of legal authority. There is no reason in principle, in view of the nature and role of habeas corpus, why that remedy should not be available to challenge the validity of such a distinct form of detention in which the actual physical constraint, as distinct from the mere loss of certain privileges, is more restrictive or severe than the normal one in an institution.

tion générale en common law, une cour saisie d'une demande d'habeas corpus sans certiorari auxiliaire peut aussi examiner une preuve par affidavit ou toute autre preuve extrinsèque pour déterminer s'il y a eu défaut ou excès de compétence. La proposition selon laquelle cette Cour en matière d'habeas corpus doit se limiter à un examen du mandat de dépôt pour déterminer s'il y a eu défaut ou excès de compétence, s'éloigne du fondement véritable de la jurisprudence de la Cour sur cette question.

(3) On peut recourir à l'habeas corpus pour déterminer la validité d'une forme particulière de détention dans un pénitencier quoique la même question puisse être déterminée par voie de certiorari en Cour fédérale. La portée du recours à l'habeas corpus doit d'abord être examinée en fonction de son propre fondement, indépendamment des problèmes que peuvent poser le partage ou le chevauchement des compétences. L'importance générale de ce recours comme moyen traditionnel pour contester les privations de liberté est telle que son développement et son adaptation rationnels aux réalités modernes de la détention en milieu carcéral ne doivent pas être compromis par des craintes de conflit de compétence. L'incarcération dans une unité spéciale de détention ou en ségrégation administrative constitue une forme de détention qui est tout à fait distincte de celle imposée à la population carcérale générale. Il s'agit en fait d'une nouvelle détention qui est censée avoir son propre fondement juridique. Aucune raison valable fondée sur la nature et le rôle de l'habeas corpus ne s'oppose à ce qu'on y ait recours pour contester la validité de cette forme distincte de détention dans laquelle la contrainte physique réelle, par opposition à la simple perte de certains privilèges, est plus restrictive ou sévère que cela est normalement le cas dans un établissement carcéral.

R. W. Hubbard, for the appellant.

Fergus J. O'Connor, for the respondent.

The judgment of the Court was delivered by

LE DAIN J.—This appeal raises the question whether, having regard to the role of habeas corpus and the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Court of Canada under s. 18 of the Federal Court Act, R.S.C. 1970 (2nd Supp.), c. 10, in respect of certiorari against any federal board, commission or other tribunal, a provincial superior court has jurisdiction by way of habeas corpus with certiorari in aid to determine the validity of the confinement of an inmate of a federal penitentiary in a "special handling unit", a particularly restrictive form of segregated detention, and if such confinement be found unlawful, to order his release into association with the general inmate population of the penitentiary.

The appeal is by leave of this Court from the judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal on August 25, 1982 allowing an appeal from the judgment of Steele J. of the Supreme Court of Ontario on March 5, 1982, which dismissed the respondent's application for habeas corpus with certiorari in aid to determine the validity of his confinement in the Special Handling Unit of Millhaven Institution, a federal penitentiary, on the ground that the Court lacked jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus because of the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Court in respect of certiorari against a federal board, commission or other tribunal and on the further ground that on habeas corpus alone the Court was precluded by the jurisdiction of the Federal Court from considering anything but the warrants of committal, which were regular on their face and had not been challenged.

Version française du jugement de la Cour rendu par

LE JUGE LE DAIN—Ce pourvoi soulève la question de savoir si, compte tenu du rôle de l'habeas corpus et de la compétence exclusive pour délivrer un certiorari contre tout office, toute commission ou tout autre tribunal fédéral conférée à la Cour fédérale du Canada par l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale, S.R.C. 1970 (2e Supp.), chap. 10, une cour supérieure provinciale peut, par voie d'habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire, statuer sur la validité de l'incarcération d'un détenu dans une «unité spéciale de détention» d'un pénitencier fédéral, une forme particulièrement sévère de ségrégation et, dans l'hypothèse où elle juge illégal ce type d'incarcération, si cette cour supérieure provinciale peut ordonner la réintégration du détenu dans la population carcérale générale du pénitencier.

Ce pourvoi, autorisé par cette Cour, attaque l'arrêt en date du 25 août 1982 de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario, qui a accueilli un appel d'une décision datée du 5 mars 1982 dans laquelle le juge Steele de la Cour suprême de l'Ontario a rejeté la demande d'habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire présentée par l'intimé pour que soit déterminée la validité de son incarcération dans l'unité spéciale de détention de l'établissement de Millhaven, un pénitencier fédéral. La demande a été rejetée d'abord pour le motif que la cour n'avait pas compétence pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus parce qu'il appartenait exclusivement à la Cour fédérale d'accorder un certiorari contre un office, une commission ou un autre tribunal fédéral et, ensuite, parce que, en ce qui concerne l'habeas corpus simple, la compétence de la Cour fédérale empêchait la cour d'examiner autre chose que les mandats de dépôt, lesquels étaient réguliers en apparence et n'avaient fait l'objet d'aucune contestation.

D'après l'affidavit produit par l'intimé à l'appui de sa demande d'habeas corpus avec certiorari

1985 CanLII 22 (SCC)

certiorari in aid, he was an inmate in Matsqui Penitentiary on June 2, 1981 when a "disturbance" occurred in the dining area where he was employed. He claimed that he was not in the dining area at the time and that he was not responsible in any way for the disturbance. He was, nevertheless, placed in administrative segregation in Matsqui on June 5th and in segregation in Kent Institution and Millhaven, to which he was subsequently transferred, on July 11th and July 23rd respectively. On July 29, 1981 he was placed in the Special Handling Unit at Millhaven.

Confinement in a special handling unit is reserved for particularly dangerous inmates, as indicated by s. 5 of Commissioner's Directive 274 of December 1, 1980, which defines "Special Handling Unit" as follows: " 'Special Handling Unit' (SHU) is a facility established to deal exclusively with inmates who, in addition to requiring maximum security, have been identified as being particularly dangerous." According to the Directive, a special handling unit program of confinement consists of four phases, the first of which is a period of assessment in administrative segregation. According to the respondent's affidavit, which describes the nature of the confinement in the various phases in considerable detail, in the first phase consisting of administrative segregation the inmate is cut off from all association with other inmates and is confined to his cell for all but one hour of the day. In subsequent phases of the program limited association with other inmates and somewhat longer periods outside the cell are permitted, but speaking generally, it may be said that confinement in a special handling unit is a significantly more restrictive form of detention than the normal one in a penitentiary, involving the loss or denial of several privileges or amenities enjoyed by the general inmate population.

According to the respondent's affidavit, he was advised by letter about two weeks after he was placed in the Special Handling Unit that he had been put there because of his involvement in the disturbance at Matsqui and specifically because he had broken windows in the kitchen and had manufactured an explosive device. The respondent states auxiliaire, il était détenu au pénitencier de Matsqui. Le 2 juin 1981 il s'est produit un «incident» dans la cantine où il travaillait. Il a déclaré qu'il ne s'y trouvait pas au moment en question et qu'il n'avait en aucune façon provoqué l'incident. Quoi qu'il en soit, il a été mis en ségrégation administrative à Matsqui le 5 juin et en ségrégation d'abord à l'établissement Kent puis à Millhaven, où il a été transféré dans le premier cas le 11 juillet et dans le second cas le 23 juillet. Le 29 juillet 1981, on l'a placé dans l'unité spéciale de détention de Millhaven.

L'incarcération dans une unité spéciale de détention est réservée aux détenus particulièrement dangereux; c'est ce qui ressort de l'art. 5 de la directive du commissaire n° 274 du 1er décembre 1980, qui donne à l'expression «Unité spéciale de détention» la définition suivante: « «Unité spéciale de détention» (USD) désigne une installation destinée exclusivement aux détenus qui, tout en répondant aux critères de sécurité maximale, sont reconnus comme particulièrement dangereux». Suivant la directive, le programme d'incarcération dans une unité spéciale comporte quatre phases. La première consiste en une période de ségrégation administrative au cours de laquelle on procède à une évaluation. D'après l'affidavit de l'intimé, qui contient une description très détaillée de la nature de l'incarcération à chacune des différentes étapes, à cette première phase le détenu est isolé de tous les autres détenus et doit garder sa cellule vingt-trois heures par jour. Les phases subséquentes du programme permettent des contacts limités avec d'autres détenus et des périodes un peu plus longues à l'extérieur de la cellule mais, en règle générale, l'incarcération dans une unité spéciale est nettement plus sévère que la normale dans un pénitencier en ce sens qu'il y a privation de plusieurs privilèges ou agréments dont jouit la population carcérale générale.

Il ressort de l'affidavit de l'intimé qu'environ deux semaines après sa mise en unité spéciale de détention il a reçu une lettre portant qu'il y avait été placé en raison de sa participation à l'incident de Matsqui et, en particulier, parce qu'il avait cassé des fenêtres de la cuisine et qu'il avait fabriqué un engin explosif. L'intimé affirme qu'il n'a that he was never given an opportunity to confront the evidence, if any, of his involvement in the incident at Matsqui on which the decision to confine him in the Special Handling Unit was based. He was never charged with a disciplinary offence arising out of that incident nor was any criminal charge laid against him. He was not given a psychological examination, and there was nothing in his background or in the nature of the offences of which he was convicted to suggest that he was a particularly dangerous inmate. In October 1981 he attended a hearing of the National Special Handling Unit Review Committee, but he was not informed of the evidence against him nor given any opportunity to meet it. He was told that he could only secure his release from the Special Handling Unit into normal association with the general population of the penitentiary by good behaviour. In the respondent's submission there was no basis nor justification whatever for placing him in the Special Handling Unit.

In his application for habeas corpus with certiorari in aid the respondent contended that confinement in the Special Handling Unit at Millhaven is not authorized by statute or regulation and is therefore unlawful, and further or alternatively, that his confinement in the Special Handling Unit was carried out in a manner that denied him procedural fairness. The respondent conceded that he was lawfully required to be detained in a penitentiary. His mandatory supervision release date was July 3, 1983, and we were informed at the hearing of the appeal that he had been released.

The unanimous judgment of the Court of Appeal (1982), 141 D.L.R. (3d) 330, 39 O.R. (2d) 41, 70 C.C.C. (2d) 129, 29 C.R. (3d) 153, 29 C.P.C. 159, allowing the appeal from the judgment of Steele J. and referring the matter back to the High Court for determination of the merits was delivered by Cory J.A., with whom Martin and Goodman JJ.A. concurred. In his reasons for judgment Cory J.A. addressed three issues in the following order: (a) whether habeas corpus will lie to determine the validity of confinement in a spe-jamais eu la possibilité de réfuter la preuve, si preuve il y avait, de sa participation à l'incident en question, preuve sur laquelle a été fondée la décision de l'incarcérer dans l'unité spéciale de détention. Il n'a jamais par suite de l'incident été accusé d'une infraction à la discipline et aucune accusation criminelle n'a été portée contre lui. On ne lui a pas fait subir d'examen psychologique et ni ses antécédents ni la nature des infractions dont il a été reconnu coupable ne portent à croire qu'il était particulièrement dangereux. En octobre 1981 il a comparu devant le Comité national chargé de l'examen des cas d'unité spéciale de détention, mais on ne l'a pas informé de la preuve produite contre lui pas plus qu'on ne lui a donné la possibilité d'y répondre. On lui a dit que ce n'était que par une bonne conduite qu'il pouvait obtenir sa libération de l'unité spéciale de détention et sa réintégration dans la population générale du pénitencier. L'intimé soutient que la décision de le placer dans l'unité spéciale de détention était complètement injustifiée.

Dans sa demande d'habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire, l'intimé fait valoir que ni la loi ni son règlement d'application n'autorisent l'incarcération dans l'unité spéciale de détention de Millhaven et qu'il s'agit donc d'une détention illégale. Il allègue en outre ou subsidiairement que son incarcération dans l'unité spéciale a été effectuée d'une façon non conforme à l'équité dans la procédure. L'intimé reconnaît toutefois qu'il devait, aux termes de la loi, être détenu dans un pénitencier. Sa libération sous surveillance obligatoire était fixée au 3 juillet 1983 et on nous a appris au cours de l'audience en cette Cour qu'elle a eu lieu comme prévu.

L'arrêt unanime de la Cour d'appel (1982), 141 D.L.R. (3d) 330, 39 O.R. (2d) 41, 70 C.C.C. (2d) 129, 29 C.R. (3d) 153, 29 C.P.C. 159, accueillant l'appel de la décision du juge Steele et renvoyant l'affaire à la Haute Cour pour qu'elle statue sur le fond, a été rendu par le juge Cory, à l'avis duquel les juges Martin et Goodman ont souscrit. Dans ses motifs de jugement, le juge Cory a examiné dans l'ordre les trois questions suivantes: a) celle de savoir si l'on peut recourir à l'habeas corpus pour déterminer la validité d'une incarcération cial handling unit, and if such confinement is found to be unlawful, to secure the release of the inmate into the general population of the institution; (b) whether, on an application for habeas corpus alone, a court may consider affidavit evidence to determine whether a detention is unlawful by reason of an absence or excess of jurisdiction; and (c) whether a provincial superior court has jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus against a federal board, commission or other tribunal despite the exclusive jurisdiction in respect of certiorari of the Federal Court of Canada under s. 18 of the Federal Court Act. The Court of Appeal gave an affirmative answer to each of these questions. The appellant directs its attack chiefly against the Court's conclusions on the first and third questions, which are the principal issues in the appeal. The Court of Appeal appears to have treated the second question as an alternative issue, which it may or may not be necessary to deal with in this appeal.

There are two other appeals involving some or all of these issues which were heard at the same time as this appeal: Cardinal v. Director of Kent Institution, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 643; and Morin v. National Special Handling Unit Review Committee, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 662. The judgment of the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Cardinal, which is reported at (1982), 67 C.C.C. (2d) 252 (sub nom. Re Cardinal and Oswald and The Queen), and the judgment of the Quebec Court of Appeal in Morin, which is reported at [1982] C.A. 464 (sub nom. Morin c. Comité national de l'examen des cas d'U.S.D. (Unité spéciale de détention)) and (1982), 1 C.C.C. (3d) 438 (sub nom. Re Morin and Yeomans), were both rendered before the judgment of the Ontario Court of Appeal in the case at bar. In Cardinal the British Columbia Court of Appeal came to the same conclusions as the Ontario Court of Appeal on the three questions of jurisdiction considered by it. Indeed, Cory J.A. relied particularly on the reasoning of Anderson J.A. in the British Columbia Court of Appeal on these issues. In addition, however, the Court of Appeal in Cardinal dealt with the merits of the contention that there had been a breach of the duty to act fairly in the manner in which the dans une unité spéciale de détention et, dans l'hypothèse où cette incarcération serait jugée illégale, pour obtenir la réintégration du détenu dans la population générale de l'établissement; b) celle de savoir si un tribunal saisi d'une demande d'habeas corpus simple peut examiner une preuve par affidavit pour décider si une détention est illégale pour défaut ou excès de compétence; et c) celle de savoir si, nonobstant la compétence exclusive en matière de certiorari que l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale confère à la Cour fédérale du Canada, une cour supérieure provinciale peut délivrer contre un office, une commission ou un autre tribunal fédéral un certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus. La Cour d'appel a répondu à chacune de ces questions par l'affirmative. L'appelante attaque surtout les conclusions de la Cour d'appel sur la première et la troisième questions, qui sont les questions principales devant nous. La Cour d'appel paraît avoir considéré la deuxième question comme une question subsidiaire et il n'est pas clair s'il sera nécessaire de l'aborder ici.

Deux autres pourvois portant sur l'ensemble ou une partie de ces questions ont été entendus en même temps que celui-ci; il s'agit de Cardinal c. Directeur de l'établissement Kent, [1985] 2 R.C.S. 643, et Morin c. Comité national chargé de l'examen des cas d'unité spéciale de détention, [1985] 2 R.C.S. 662. L'arrêt Cardinal de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique, publié à (1982), 67 C.C.C. (2d) 252 (sub nom. Re Cardinal and Oswald and The Queen), et l'arrêt Morin de la Cour d'appel du Québec, publié à [1982] C.A. 464 (sub nom. Morin c. Comité national de l'examen des cas d'U.S.D. (Unité spéciale de détention)) et (1982), 1 C.C.C. (3d) 438 (sub nom. Re Morin and Yeomans), ont tous les deux été rendus antérieurement à l'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario dans la présente affaire. Dans l'arrêt Cardinal, la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique est arrivée aux mêmes conclusions que la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario sur les trois questions relatives à la compétence qu'elle a examinées. De fait, sur ces questions-là, le juge Cory s'est appuyé particulièrement sur le raisonnement du juge Anderson de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique. Toutefois, dans l'arrêt Cardinal, la Cour d'appel a examiné aussi le bien-fondé de l'argument selon lequel administrative dissociation or segregation of the appellant had been imposed or continued, and it was from the disposition of the appeal on this issue, rather than on the issues of the court's jurisdiction, as in the case at bar, that the appeal was brought to this Court. For this reason the issues of jurisdiction on which both Courts of Appeal came to the same conclusions will be dealt with first in this appeal. In Morin, where the appellant sought by an application for habeas corpus without certiorari in aid to challenge his confinement in a special handling unit, the main issue appears to be the one that is common to the three appeals—whether, having regard to the judicial review jurisdiction of the Federal Court, habeas corpus should lie to review the validity of such confinement.

II

The question whether a provincial superior court has jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus to review the validity of a detention imposed by federal authority arises, as has been indicated, because of the terms of s. 18 of the Federal Court Act, which confers on the Trial Division of the Federal Court of Canada an exclusive original jurisdiction to issue certiorari against any federal board, commission or other tribunal. Section 18 reads as follows:

18. The Trial Division has exclusive original jurisdiction

(a) to issue an injunction, writ of certiorari, writ of prohibition, writ of mandamus or writ of quo warranto, or grant declaratory relief, against any federal board, commission or other tribunal; and

(b) to hear and determine any application or other proceeding for relief in the nature of relief contemplated by paragraph (a), including any proceeding brought against the Attorney General of Canada, to obtain relief against a federal board, commission or other tribunal.

Section 2 of the Federal Court Act defines "federal board, commission or other tribunal" as follows:

la manière dont on avait imposé ou maintenu la ségrégation ou l'isolement administratifs de l'appelant constituait une violation de l'obligation d'agir équitablement, et le pourvoi devant cette Cour attaquait la conclusion de la Cour d'appel sur cette question plutôt que, comme c'est le cas en l'espèce, ses conclusions sur les questions de compétence. Pour cette raison, les questions de compétence, sur lesquelles les deux cours d'appel sont arrivées aux mêmes conclusions, seront examinées d'abord dans le présent pourvoi. Dans l'arrêt Morin, où l'appelant a tenté par voie de demande d'habeas corpus sans certiorari auxiliaire de contester son incarcération dans une unité spéciale de détention, la question principale qui paraît être commune à chacun des trois appels, était de savoir si, compte tenu de la compétence de la Cour fédérale en matière de contrôle judiciaire, l'habeas corpus permet d'examiner la validité d'une telle incarcération.

II

Comme nous l'avons déjà vu, la question de savoir si une cour supérieure provinciale peut délivrer un habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire pour examiner la validité d'une détention imposée par les autorités fédérales se pose en raison de l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale, qui investit la Division de première instance de la Cour fédérale du Canada d'une compétence exclusive en première instance pour délivrer un certiorari contre tout office, toute commission ou tout autre tribunal fédéral. L'article 18 est ainsi rédigé:

18. La Division de première instance a compétence exclusive en première instance

a) pour émettre une injonction, un bref de certiorari, un bref de mandamus, un bref de prohibition ou un bref de quo warranto, ou pour rendre un jugement déclaratoire contre tout office, toute commission ou tout autre tribunal fédéral; et

b) pour entendre et juger toute demande de redressement de la nature de celui qu'envisage l'alinéa a), et notamment toute procédure engagée contre le procureur général du Canada aux fins d'obtenir le redressement contre un office, une commission ou à un autre tribunal fédéral.

L'article 2 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale définit ainsi l'expression «office, commission ou autre tribunal fédéral»:

1985 CanLII 22 (SCC)

"federal board, commission or other tribunal" means any body or any person or persons having, exercising or purporting to exercise jurisdiction or powers conferred by or under an Act of the Parliament of Canada, other than any such body constituted or established by or under a law of a province or any such person or persons appointed under or in accordance with a law of a province or under section 96 of the Constitution Act, 1867.

It is not disputed that the decision to place the respondent in the Special Handling Unit at Millhaven was the decision of a federal board, commission or tribunal within the meaning of s. 2 of the Act.

Courts which have had to consider this issue of jurisdiction have been confronted by the conflicting opinions on it of members of this Court in Mitchell v. The Queen, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 570. Steele J. based his conclusion on this issue on the opinion of Ritchie J. in Mitchell. The Ontario Court of Appeal, as did the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Cardinal, followed the contrary opinion of Laskin C.J. in that case.

In Mitchell, the appellant sought, by an application for habeas corpus with certiorari in aid, to challenge the validity of his detention following the suspension and revocation of his parole by the National Parole Board. He raised several grounds of alleged jurisdictional error related to the proceedings and decisions of the Board which he supported by affidavit evidence. A majority of this Court dismissed his appeal, finding that his detention was not invalid by reason of absence or excess of jurisdiction. The issue of the availability of certiorari in aid arose because the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench had issued a writ of habeas corpus to determine the validity of the detention, but the order had not included relief in the nature of certiorari in aid. Although, as Ritchie J. observed, the sufficiency of the order of the Manitoba Court of Queen's Bench had not been challenged below, opinion were nevertheless expressed in this Court on the jurisdiction of a provincial superior court to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus to review the validity of a detention imposed by federal authority. Ritchie J. was «office, commission ou autre tribunal fédéral» désigne un organisme ou une ou plusieurs personnes ayant, exerçant ou prétendant exercer une compétence ou des pouvoirs conférés par une loi du Parlement du Canada ou sous le régime d'une telle loi, à l'exclusion des organismes de ce genre constitués ou établis par une loi d'une province ou sous le régime d'une telle loi ainsi que des personnes nommées en vertu ou en conformité du droit d'une province ou en vertu de l'article 96 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867.

Il n'est pas contesté que la décision de placer l'intimé dans l'unité spéciale de détention de Millhaven a été prise par un office, une commission ou un tribunal fédéral au sens de l'art. 2 de la Loi.

Les cours qui ont eu à se pencher sur cette question de compétence ont buté contre les opinions contradictoires exprimées par les juges de cette Cour dans l'arrêt Mitchell c. La Reine, [1976] 2 R.C.S. 570. La conclusion du juge Steele sur cette question se fonde sur l'opinion du juge Ritchie dans l'arrêt Mitchell. Cependant, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario, tout comme la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique dans l'arrêt Cardinal, a suivi l'opinion opposée du juge en chef Laskin.

Dans l'affaire Mitchell, l'appelant a essayé, par une demande d'habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire, de contester la validité de sa détention à la suite de la suspension et de la révocation de sa libération conditionnelle par la Commission nationale des libérations conditionnelles. Il a soulevé, affidavits à l'appui, plusieurs erreurs de compétence dont les procédures et les décisions de la Commission auraient été entachées. Cette Cour à la majorité a rejeté son pourvoi, concluant que sa détention n'était pas invalide pour défaut ou excès de compétence. La question de la possibilité d'obtenir un certiorari auxiliaire s'est posée parce que la Cour du Banc de la Reine du Manitoba avait délivré un bref d'habeas corpus pour qu'il soit statué sur la validité de la détention, mais l'ordonnance n'avait pas été assortie d'un redressement de la nature d'un certiorari auxiliaire. Quoique, comme l'a fait remarquer le juge Ritchie, on n'ait pas contesté en Cour d'appel le caractère adéquat de l'ordonnance de la Cour du Banc de la Reine du Manitoba, des opinions ont été exprimées en cette Cour sur la compétence d'une cour supérieure first of all of the view, which may be assumed to have been that of a majority of the Court, that certiorari would not lie in any event because the decisions of the National Parole Board suspending and revoking the appellant's parole were not decisions of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature amenable to certiorari. In support of this conclusion he cited the decisions of this Court in Ex parte McCaud, [1965] 1 C.C.C. 168, and Howarth v. National Parole Board, [1976] 1 S.C.R. 453. Speaking for himself and three other members of the full Court (Judson, Pigeon and Beetz JJ.), he was also of the opinion, however, that the jurisdiction of a provincial superior court to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus against a federal board had been removed by s. 18 of the Federal Court Act. The other members of the Court (Martland and de Grandpré JJ.) who agreed that the appeal should be dismissed did not express an opinion on this issue. Laskin C.J., who would have allowed the appeal, held that certiorari was not confined in its application to decisions of a judicial or quasi-judicial nature, citing R. v. London Borough of Hillingdon, ex parte Royco Homes Ltd., [1974] 2 All E.R. 643, as indicating the wider application of the remedy, and that s. 18 of the Federal Court Act had not removed the jurisdiction of a provincial superior court to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus against a federal board, commission or tribunal. The opinion of Laskin C.J. on this question of jurisdiction was concurred in by Dickson J., as he then was. Spence J., who agreed in separate reasons that the appeal should be allowed, does not appear to have addressed this issue.

It is, of course, clear since the decision of this Court in Martineau v. Matsqui Institution Disciplinary Board, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 602, that certiorari is not confined to decisions required to be provinciale pour délivrer un habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire aux fins d'examiner la validité d'une détention imposée par les autorités fédérales. Le juge Ritchie a estimé tout d'abord, et on peut supposer que c'était là l'opinion de la majorité en cette Cour, qu'en tout état de cause on ne pouvait recourir au certiorari parce que les décisions de la Commission nationale des libérations conditionnelles qui suspendaient et révoquaient la libération conditionnelle de l'appelant n'étaient pas des décisions judiciaires ou quasi judiciaires qui pouvaient en conséquence faire l'objet d'un certiorari. À l'appui de cette conclusion le juge Ritchie a cité les arrêts de cette Cour Ex parte McCaud, [1965] 1 C.C.C. 168, et Howarth c. Commission nationale des libérations conditionnelles, [1976] 1 R.C.S. 453. Parlant pour lui-même et au nom de trois juges (les juges Judson, Pigeon et Beetz) de la Cour siégeant au complet, le juge Ritchie a cependant estimé que l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale avait aboli la compétence d'une cour supérieure provinciale pour délivrer contre un office fédéral un habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire. Quant aux juges Martland et de Grandpré, qui étaient également d'avis que le pourvoi devait être rejeté, ils n'ont pas exprimé d'opinion sur ce point. Le juge en chef Laskin, qui aurait accueilli le pourvoi, a conclu que le recours au certiorari ne se limite pas à des décisions de caractère judiciaire ou quasi judiciaire et il a invoqué l'arrêt R. v. London Borough of Hillingdon, ex parte Royco Homes Ltd., [1974] 2 All E.R. 643, à l'appui de la portée plus large du recours. Il a conclu en outre que l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale n'avait pas retiré aux cours supérieures provinciales la compétence pour délivrer contre un office, une commission ou un autre tribunal fédéral un certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus. Le juge Dickson, maintenant Juge en chef, a partagé l'avis du juge en chef Laskin sur la question de la compétence. Dans ses motifs distincts, le juge Spence conclut qu'il y aurait lieu d'accueillir le pourvoi, mais il ne paraît pas s'être penché sur cette question.

Certes, il est bien établi depuis l'arrêt de cette Cour Martineau c. Comité de discipline de l'Institution de Matsqui, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 602, que le recours au certiorari ne se limite pas aux décisions made on a judicial or quasi-judicial basis, but that it applies, in the words of Dickson J., as he then was, at pp. 622-23, "wherever a public body has power to decide any matter affecting the rights, interests, property, privileges, or liberties of any person".

On the question of jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus I am in respectful agreement with the conclusion of Laskin C.J. in Mitchell, essentially for the reasons given by him, which I understand to be the importance of making the habeas corpus jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts an effective one and the distinction between certiorari to quash and certiorari in aid, regarded as a procedural or evidentiary device to make habeas corpus more effective. With reference to this distinction Laskin C.J. said at p. 578:

> It is quite clear to me that there is a marked difference between certiorari, used to quash a conviction or an order by its own strength, and certiorari in aid of habeas corpus to make the latter remedy more effective by requiring production of the record of proceedings for that purpose.

One must approach this issue, I think, from the same point of departure as was adopted by Laskin C.J.—that the provisions of the Federal Court Act indicate a clear intention on the part of Parliament to leave the jurisdiction by way of habeas corpus to review the validity of a detention imposed by federal authority with the provincial superior courts. While s. 18 of the Federal Court Act confers an exclusive and very general review jurisdiction over federal authorities by the prerogative and extraordinary remedies, to which specific reference is made, it deliberately omits reference to habeas corpus. That this was not an oversight but a well considered decision is indicated by s. 17(5) of the Act, which expressly confers exclusive jurisdiction on the Federal Court with respect to an application for habeas corpus by a member of the Canadian Forces serving outside Canada. I agree with Laskin C.J. that because of its importance as a safeguard of the liberty of the subject habeas corpus jurisdiction can only be affected by express soumises à un processus judiciaire ou quasi judiciaire, mais que, comme l'a dit le juge Dickson, maintenant Juge en chef, aux pp. 622 et 623, il y a lieu à certiorari «chaque fois qu'un organisme public a le pouvoir de trancher une question touchant aux droits, intérêts, biens, privilèges ou libertés d'une personne».

Sur la question de la compétence pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus, je souscris respectueusement à la conclusion du juge en chef Laskin dans l'arrêt Mitchell et ce, essentiellement pour les raisons données par celui-ci qui, si je comprends bien, s'est fondé sur l'importance de rendre efficace la compétence en matière d'habeas corpus des cours supérieures provinciales et sur la distinction qui existe entre le certiorari aux fins d'annulation et le certiorari auxiliaire, ce dernier étant un outil de procédure ou de preuve conçu pour accroître l'efficacité de l'habeas corpus. Voici ce que le juge en chef Laskin dit au sujet de cette distinction à la p. 578:

> Il me paraît très clair qu'il y a une différence marquée entre le certiorari auquel on a recours comme procédure permettant directement l'annulation d'une condamnation ou d'une ordonnance et le certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus visant à rendre ce dernier plus efficace en exigeant, à cette fin, la communication du dossier.

À mon avis, il faut aborder cette question de la même manière que l'a fait le juge en chef Laskin, c'est-à-dire prendre pour point de départ que les dispositions de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale traduisent l'intention manifeste du législateur de laisser aux cours supérieures provinciales la compétence en matière d'habeas corpus pour vérifier la validité d'une détention imposée par les autorités fédérales. Bien que l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale confère une compétence exclusive et très générale pour contrôler les décisions des autorités fédérales au moyen des brefs de prérogative et des recours extraordinaires, lesquels sont expressément mentionnés, toute mention de l'habeas corpus a été délibérément omise. Qu'il s'agisse là non pas d'un oubli mais d'une décision bien pesée ressort du par. 17(5) de la Loi, qui investit expressément la Cour fédérale d'une compétence exclusive relativement à une demande d'habeas corpus présentée par un membre des Forces canadiennes en service à l'étranger. D'accord avec le juge en chef Laskin, words. One may think of reasons why it was thought advisable to leave the habeas corpus jurisdiction with respect to federal authorities with the provincial superior courts, including the importance of the local accessibility of this remedy. The important thing, as I see it, is that the decision to create this exception to the exclusive review jurisdiction of the Federal Court, with whatever problems arising from concurrent or overlapping jurisdiction it might cause, is really determinative of the question of jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid. There can be no doubt that certiorari in aid is important, if not essential, to the effectiveness of habeas corpus. This was emphasized by both Anderson J.A., with whom the other members of the British Columbia Court of Appeal agreed on this issue in Cardinal, and by Cory J.A. in the case at bar. In many cases it may not be possible for a court to determine whether there has been an absence or excess of jurisdiction if the record of the tribunal which imposed or authorized the detention is not brought before it. The importance of habeas corpus itself, and by implication the importance of maintaining it as a fully effective remedy is, as Laskin C.J. observed, given particular emphasis by its inclusion as a guaranteed right in s. 2(c)(iii) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. To this recognition may now be added the constitutional guarantee of the right to habeas corpus in s. 10(c) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Because of the clear intention to leave the habeas corpus jurisdiction over federal authorities with the provincial superior courts and the importance of certiorari in aid to the effectiveness of habeas corpus, it cannot, in my opinion, have been intended that the reference to certiorari in s. 18 of the Federal Court Act should have the effect of undermining or weakening the habeas corpus jurisdiction of the provincial superior courts by the exclusion or denial of certiorari in aid. Certainly such a construction is to be avoided if at all possible. It can be avoided by application of the distinction emphasized by Laskin C.J. between certiorari as an independent and separate mode of review having as its object to quash the decision of an inferior tribunal and certiorari as an ancillary procedure used to serve an essentially evidentiary purpose. A very full discussion of this j'estime qu'en raison de son importance à titre de protection de la liberté individuelle, la compétence en matière d'habeas corpus ne saurait être modifiée que par des termes explicites. On peut penser à plusieurs raisons, y compris l'importance de voir à ce qu'il soit possible d'obtenir ce recours à l'échelon local, pour lesquelles on a jugé bon de laisser aux cours supérieures provinciales la compétence pour délivrer un habeas corpus contre des autorités fédérales. L'élément capital, à mon sens, est ceci: ce qui tranche en réalité la question de la compétence pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire est la décision de créer, avec tout ce que cela risque d'engendrer comme problèmes de partage ou de chevauchement de compétences, cette exception à la compétence exclusive de la Cour fédérale en matière de contrôle judiciaire. Il ne fait pas de doute que le certiorari auxiliaire est important, sinon essentiel, pour rendre l'habeas corpus efficace. C'est ce qu'ont souligné à la fois le juge Anderson, à l'avis duquel les autres membres de la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique se sont rangés sur cette question dans l'arrêt Cardinal, et le juge Cory dans la présente affaire. Dans bien des cas il peut être impossible à une cour de se prononcer sur l'absence ou l'excès de compétence si l'on ne produit pas le dossier du tribunal qui a ordonné ou autorisé la détention. Comme l'a fait remarquer le juge en chef Laskin, l'importance de l'habeas corpus lui-même et, par suite, l'importance de son maintien à titre de recours complètement efficace, ressortent particulièrement du fait que c'est un droit garanti inclus dans le sous-al. 2*c*)(iii) de la Déclaration canadienne des droits. À cette reconnaissance s'ajoute maintenant la garantie constitutionnelle du droit à l'habeas corpus énoncée à l'al. 10*c*) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. En raison de l'intention manifeste de laisser aux cours supérieures provinciales la compétence en matière d'habeas corpus à l'égard des autorités fédérales et en raison de l'importance du certiorari auxiliaire pour rendre l'habeas corpus efficace, on n'a pas pu, selon moi, vouloir que la mention du certiorari à l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale ait pour effet de miner ou d'affaiblir, par l'exclusion ou le refus du certiorari auxiliaire, la compétence des cours supérieures provinciales en matière d'habeas corpus. Indudistinction, with reference to many of the decisions in which it has been noted and applied, is to be found in Cromwell, "Habeas Corpus and Correctional Law" (1977), 3 Queen's L.J. 295 at pp. 320-23. Applying the distinction to the reference to certiorari in s. 18 of the Federal Court Act, it is reasonable to conclude, because of the association in that section of certiorari with the other prerogative and extraordinary remedies, that the reference is to the independent remedy of certiorari to quash. It is unlikely that Parliament intended to confer an exclusive jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid when it had clearly withheld the jurisdiction to issue habeas corpus. For these reasons I conclude that a provincial superior court has jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus to review the validity of a detention authorized or imposed by a federal board, commission or other tribunal as defined by s. 2 of the Federal Court Act, and that accordingly the Ontario Court of Appeal did not err in concluding as it did on this issue.

III

In view of this conclusion on the question of jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus it may not be strictly necessary to deal with the question which was treated as an alternative issue by the British Columbia Court of Appeal in Cardinal and by the Ontario Court of Appeal in the case at bar—whether on habeas corpus without certiorari in aid a court may consider affidavit or other extrinsic evidence to determine whether there has been an absence or excess of jurisdiction. It is well established that affidavit evidence is admissible on certiorari to show jurisdictional error. Both courts of appeal were led, however, by bitablement, une telle interprétation est autant que possible à éviter. On peut l'éviter en appliquant la distinction, sur laquelle a insisté le juge en chef Laskin, entre le certiorari en tant que méthode de contrôle indépendante et distincte dont l'objet est l'annulation d'une décision d'un tribunal inférieur, et le certiorari en tant que procédure auxiliaire servant essentiellement à établir une preuve. On trouve dans Cromwell, «Habeas Corpus and Correctional Law» (1977), 3 Queen's L.J. 295, aux pp. 320 à 323, une analyse très détaillée de cette distinction, où l'on se réfère à un bon nombre de décisions où la distinction a été mentionnée et appliquée. Si on l'applique au certiorari visé à l'art. 18 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale, il est raisonnable de conclure, étant donné que dans cet article le certiorari fait partie d'une énumération des brefs de prérogative et des recours extraordinaires, qu'il s'agit du recours indépendant en certiorari pour l'annulation d'une décision. Il est peu probable que le législateur ait voulu conférer une compétence exclusive pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire puisqu'il n'a manifestement pas donné compétence pour délivrer un bref d'habeas corpus. Pour ces raisons j'estime qu'une cour supérieure provinciale a compétence pour délivrer un habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire aux fins d'examiner la validité d'une détention autorisée ou ordonnée par un office, une commission ou un autre tribunal fédéral au sens de l'art. 2 de la Loi sur la Cour fédérale et que, par conséquent, la conclusion de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario sur ce point n'est pas entachée d'erreur.

III

Vu cette conclusion sur la question de la compétence pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus, il peut ne pas être strictement nécessaire d'étudier la question, qui a été traitée comme une question subsidiaire par la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique dans l'affaire Cardinal et par la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario dans la présente affaire; il s'agit de la question de savoir si, dans le cas d'une demande d'habeas corpus sans certiorari auxiliaire, une cour peut prendre en considération un affidavit ou d'autre preuve extrinsèque afin de déterminer s'il y a eu défaut ou excès de compétence. Il est bien établi que, dans le cas their analysis of this question to reach a conclusion on it at variance with that of Ritchie J. in Mitchell, without much explicit consideration of the jurisprudence of this Court on which the opinion of Ritchie J. purported to be based. Moreover, this question may well be an issue in the Morin appeal. For these reasons it is probably desirable that it be dealt with here in order to remove the uncertainty which now necessarily exists concerning it.

d'une demande de certiorari, une preuve par affidavit est admissible pour établir une erreur de compétence. Toutefois, l'analyse de cette question qu'ont entreprise les deux cours d'appel les a amenées à une conclusion différente de celle du juge Ritchie dans l'arrêt Mitchell, sans qu'elles aient examiné très explicitement la jurisprudence de cette Cour sur laquelle devait reposer l'opinion du juge Ritchie. D'autre part, il se peut bien que la même question soit soulevée par le pourvoi formé dans l'affaire Morin. C'est pourquoi il est probablement souhaitable de la traiter ici pour écarter l'incertitude qui, nécessairement, règne maintenant à son égard.

In Mitchell, affidavit evidence was introduced in support of the appellant's contention that he was arrested without the previous issue of a warrant of suspension by the National Parole Board, as required by s. 16(1) of the Parole Act, R.S.C. 1970, c. P-2; that he was not informed of the reason for his arrest, as required by s. 2(c)(i) of the Canadian Bill of Rights; and that he was not afforded an opportunity to be heard on the suspension or revocation of his parole, as required by s. 2(e) of the Canadian Bill of Rights. These were clearly jurisdictional issues. Ritchie J. held that on the application for habeas corpus the Court was confined to the consideration of what appeared on the face of the following documents: the warrant of committal purporting to be based on the suspension of the appellant's parole; the warrant of apprehension issued by the Board upon revocation of the appellant's parole; and the warrant of committal based on the revocation and the warrant of apprehension. He said, with reference to these documents, at p. 590:

Dans l'affaire Mitchell, on a produit un affidavit à l'appui de l'argument de l'appelant qu'on l'avait arrêté sans que la Commission nationale des libérations conditionnelles ait au préalable lancé un mandat de suspension conformément au par. 16(1) de la Loi sur la libération conditionnelle de détenus, S.R.C. 1970, chap. P-2; qu'on ne l'avait pas informé des motifs de son arrestation comme l'exige le sous-al. 2*c*)(i) de la Déclaration canadienne des droits; et que, contrairement à l'al. 2*e*) de la Déclaration canadienne des droits, on ne lui avait pas donné la possibilité d'être entendu relativement à la suspension ou à la révocation de sa libération conditionnelle. Visiblement, ces questions se rapportaient à la compétence. Le juge Ritchie a conclu que la cour saisie de la demande d'habeas corpus devait s'en tenir à l'examen de ce qui se dégageait de la lecture des documents suivants: le mandat de dépôt, censément fondé sur la suspension de la libération conditionnelle de l'appelant; le mandat d'arrestation lancé par la Commission à la suite de la révocation de la libération conditionnelle de l'appelant; et le mandat de dépôt fondé sur la révocation et sur le mandat d'arrestation. À la page 590, le juge Ritchie dit relativement à ces documents:

> On the return of the writ before him, Chief Justice Dewar was confined to a consideration of the facts disclosed on the face of the documents relating to the cause of the taking and detaining of the said Fred Mitchell.

> Au rapport du bref, le juge en chef Dewar devait se limiter à l'examen des faits apparaissant à la lecture des documents concernant la cause de l'arrestation et de la détention dudit Fred Mitchell.

and further with reference to this question, he said at p. 594:

Puis, sur le même sujet, il ajoute, à la p. 594:

1985 CanLII 22 (SCC)

As I have pointed out, Chief Justice Dewar in the hearing before him on the return of the writ of habeas corpus, was confined to a consideration of the facts contained on the face of the warrants then produced, and in my view the statements made in the appellant's affidavits were not properly before him and it is apparent from his reasons for judgment that he did not take them into consideration. The law in this regard is set out in the judgment of Judson J. in Re Shumiatcher, [1962] S.C.R. 38, an application for habeas corpus in which, after having reviewed the relevant cases and having observed that the jurisdiction of this Court was concurrent with that of the judges of the superior Courts of the Provinces in matters of habeas corpus, he went on to say:

> My jurisdiction is limited to a consideration of the warrant of committal and the other material that I have referred to—the recognizances and the order of Judge Hogarth. I cannot look at evidence, whether a transcript of the evidence at the preliminary hearing or evidence sought to be introduced by way of affidavit identifying a portion of such evidence.

In Re Shumiatcher, [1962] S.C.R. 38, the relevant issue was whether the Court could look at certain solemn declarations which the applicant for habeas corpus was charged with having induced a person to make, knowing them to be false, and thereby being a party, by virtue of s. 22(1) of the Criminal Code, to the offence defined by s. 114 (now s. 122). The application for habeas corpus challenged the validity of the committal for trial on the ground that the person making the solemn declarations was not a person permitted, authorized or required by law to make them, within the meaning of s. 114. The solemn declarations made reference to a statement of claim. Judson J. framed the issue as follows at p. 45:

> This brings me to the question of what use may be made of this material on a motion for habeas corpus before a judge of this Court.
> The Crown's submission is that I am limited to looking at the warrant of committal and that I cannot look at these declarations and the statement of claim any more than I can look at the evidence—seven or eight volumes of it—given on the preliminary hearing.

Comme je l'ai signalé, le juge en chef Dewar, lors de l'audition sur le rapport du bref d'habeas corpus, devait s'en tenir à l'examen des faits apparaissant à la lecture des mandats alors produits, et, à mon avis, les affirmations de l'appelant contenues dans les déclarations sous serment ne lui étaient pas présentées de façon régulière et il appert de ses motifs de jugement qu'il ne les a pas prises en considération. Le juge Judson a indiqué dans l'arrêt In re Shumiatcher, [1962] R.C.S. 38, le principe juridique en cette matière. Il s'agissait d'une requête en habeas corpus et, après avoir examiné les arrêts pertinents et fait remarquer que la juridiction de cette Cour était concurrente avec celle des juges de la Cour supérieure des provinces en matière d'habeas corpus, le juge Judson continuait en disant:

Dans l'arrêt Re Shumiatcher, [1962] R.C.S. 38, la question pertinente était de savoir si la Cour pouvait examiner certaines déclarations solennelles qu'on accusait le demandeur de l'habeas corpus d'avoir incité une personne à faire, sachant qu'elles étaient fausses et devenant ainsi, aux termes du par. 22(1) du Code criminel, une partie à l'infraction définie par l'art. 114 (maintenant l'art. 122). La demande d'habeas corpus contestait la validité du renvoi à procès au motif que l'auteur des déclarations solennelles n'était pas, au sens de l'art. 114, une personne ayant la permission, l'autorisation ou l'obligation d'après la loi de les faire. Ces déclarations solennelles faisaient mention d'une déclaration introductive d'instance. À la page 45, le juge Judson formule la question en litige de la manière suivante:

> [TRADUCTION] Voilà qui m'amène à la question de l'usage qu'on peut faire de ces documents dans le cadre d'une requête en habeas corpus devant un juge de cette Cour.
>
> La poursuite soutient que je dois me limiter à un examen du mandat de dépôt et que je ne puis tenir compte de ces déclarations ni de la déclaration introductive d'instance pas plus que je ne puis étudier les témoignages, qui remplissent sept ou huit volumes, donnés à l'enquête préliminaire.

1985 CanLII 22 (SCC)

After quoting from the judgments of this Court in Re Trepanier (1885), 12 S.C.R. 111, Ex parte Macdonald (1896), 27 S.C.R. 683, and Goldhar v. The Queen, [1960] S.C.R. 431, with reference to habeas corpus against a warrant of committal after conviction, and observing that this Court did not have jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus, Judson J. concluded on this issue as follows at p. 47:

In my opinion the jurisdiction of this Court is similarly limited in an inquiry into a committal for trial. In the absence of power to issue a writ of certiorari in aid of habeas corpus, a judge of this Court has no power to look at the evidence at the preliminary hearing or to receive affidavit evidence relating to it.

My jurisdiction is limited to a consideration of the warrant of committal and the other material that I have referred to—the recognizances and the order of Judge Hogarth. I cannot look at evidence, whether a transcript of the evidence at the preliminary hearing or evidence sought to be introduced by way of affidavit identifying a portion of such evidence.

I am founding my reasons on this branch of the case entirely on that principle and I am expressing no opinion on the point on which I heard full argument—whether there does exist, by virtue of provincial legislation, permission to take a declaration of this kind.

In Goldhar, the issues raised on the application for habeas corpus were the regularity on its face of a Calendar of Sentences as a certificate of the appellant's conviction and the applicable maximum penalty, having regard to a change that had taken place in the law. Fauteux J. (as he then was), with whom Taschereau, Abbott and Judson JJ. concurred, expressed the rationale for the exclusion of extrinsic evidence on an application for habeas corpus as follows at p. 439:

The question, which counsel for the appellant admittedly sought to be determined by way of habeas corpus proceedings, is stated in the reasons for judgment of other members of the Court. In my view, it is one which would require the consideration of the evidence at trial and which, in this particular case, extends beyond the

Ayant cité des extraits tirés des arrêts de cette Cour Re Trepanier (1885), 12 R.C.S. 111, Ex parte Macdonald (1896), 27 R.C.S. 683, et Goldhar v. The Queen, [1960] R.C.S. 431, relatifs au recours à l'habeas corpus pour attaquer un mandat de dépôt lancé à la suite d'une déclaration de culpabilité, et ayant fait remarquer que cette Cour n'avait pas compétence pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus, le juge Judson, à la p. 47, est arrivé aux conclusions suivantes sur cette question:

[TRADUCTION] À mon avis, la compétence de cette Cour souffre une restriction semblable dans le cas d'une enquête sur un renvoi au procès. À défaut de compétence pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus, un juge de cette Cour n'est pas autorisé à examiner les témoignages donnés à l'enquête préliminaire ni à recevoir une preuve par affidavit à son égard.

Ma compétence se limite à un examen du mandat de dépôt et des autres documents dont j'ai fait mention, savoir les engagements souscrits et l'ordonnance du juge Hogarth. Je ne puis étudier aucune preuve, qu'il s'agisse d'une transcription des témoignages donnés à l'enquête préliminaire ou d'une preuve qu'on cherche à introduire par voie d'affidavit identifiant une partie de ces témoignages.

Sur cet aspect de l'affaire, je m'appuie entièrement sur ce principe-là et je n'exprime pas d'opinion sur la question, débattue à fond devant moi, de savoir si la loi provinciale autorise à recevoir ce genre de déclaration.

Dans l'affaire Goldhar, la demande d'habeas corpus soulevait la question de savoir si une liste de condamnations constituait un certificat en bonne et due forme du verdict de culpabilité rendu contre l'appelant et la question de la peine maximale applicable compte tenu d'une modification qui avait été apportée à la loi. Le juge Fauteux (alors juge puîné), à l'avis duquel les juges Taschereau, Abbott et Judson ont souscrit, a exprimé, à la p. 439, la raison fondamentale de l'exclusion de toute preuve extrinsèque dans le cadre d'une demande d'habeas corpus:

[TRADUCTION] La question, que l'avocat de l'appelant reconnaît avoir essayé de faire trancher par voie d'habeas corpus, est formulée dans les motifs de jugement des autres membres de la Cour. À mon avis, cette question nécessiterait l'examen de la preuve produite en première instance, ce qui, en l'espèce, dépasse les limites

scope of matters to be inquired under a similar process. To hold otherwise would be tantamount to convert the writ of habeas corpus into a writ of error or an appeal and to confer, upon every one having authority to issue the writ of habeas corpus, an appellate jurisdiction over the orders and judgments of even the highest Courts. It is well settled that the functions of such a writ do not extend beyond an inquiry into the jurisdiction of the Court by which process the subject is held in custody and into the validity of the process upon its face.

I agree with the view that the appellant has been convicted and sentenced by a Court of competent jurisdiction, that the Calendar is a certificate regular on its face that the appellant has been so convicted and sentenced and that, with the material before him, Martland J. rightly dismissed the application for a writ of habeas corpus.

The above passage, in my respectful opinion, reflects the true distinction or criterion respecting the consideration of extrinsic evidence on an application for habeas corpus—the distinction between issues going to the merits and issues going to jurisdiction. The issues in both Shumiatcher and Goldhar were clearly issues going to the merits. The same is true of Re Trepanier, where the applicant alleged that the convicting magistrate erred on the facts in convicting him. He sought a writ of habeas corpus with certiorari in aid to bring up the record of the proceedings to ascertain whether there was sufficient evidence to convict. This was clearly an attempt to employ habeas corpus to review the merits of a conviction. Ritchie C.J. said at p. 113:

The jurisdiction of the magistrate being unquestionable over the subject-matter of complaint and the person of the prisoner, and there being no ground for alleging that the magistrate acted irregularly or beyond his jurisdiction, and the conviction and warrant being admitted to be regular, the only objection being that the magistrate erred on the facts and that the evidence did not justify the conclusion as to the guilt of the prisoner arrived at by the magistrate, I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that we cannot go behind the conviction and inquire into the merits of the case by the use of the writ of habeas corpus.

des questions pouvant être étudiées dans une telle procédure. Toute autre conclusion reviendrait à transformer le bref d'habeas corpus en un bref d'erreur ou en appel et à conférer à toute personne autorisée à délivrer un bref d'habeas corpus une compétence d'appel à l'égard des ordonnances et des jugements même des plus hautes instances. Or, il est bien établi qu'un tel bref ne permet pas d'entreprendre davantage qu'une enquête sur la compétence de la cour qui a ordonné la détention et sur la validité apparente de l'ordonnance en question.

Je suis d'accord pour dire que l'appelant a été reconnu coupable et condamné par une cour compétente, que la liste est un certificat en bonne et due forme de la déclaration de culpabilité et de la condamnation de l'appelant et que, compte tenu des documents dont il disposait, c'est à bon droit que le juge Martland a rejeté la demande de bref d'habeas corpus.

Le passage que je viens de citer exprime, à mon respectueux avis, la véritable distinction ou le véritable critère en ce qui concerne l'examen d'une preuve extrinsèque dans le cadre d'une demande d'habeas corpus; il s'agit de la distinction entre les questions de fond et les questions de compétence. Aussi bien dans l'arrêt Shumiatcher que dans l'arrêt Goldhar on était manifestement en présence de questions de fond. Il en va de même de l'affaire Re Trepanier, où le requérant a allégué que le magistrat qui l'avait déclaré coupable avait commis une erreur quant aux faits. Le requérant a donc demandé un bref d'habeas corpus avec certiorari auxiliaire qui aurait exigé la production du dossier des procédures afin de déterminer si la preuve était suffisante pour justifier une déclaration de culpabilité. C'était clairement une tentative d'utiliser l'habeas corpus pour examiner le bien-fondé d'une déclaration de culpabilité. Le juge en chef Ritchie a dit, à la p. 113:

[TRADUCTION] Le magistrat a incontestablement compétence sur le sujet de la plainte et sur la personne du détenu; l'allégation que le magistrat a agi de façon irrégulière ou qu'il a excédé sa compétence est sans fondement; de plus, on reconnaît la régularité de la déclaration de culpabilité et du mandat, les seuls motifs de contestation étant que le magistrat a commis une erreur quant aux faits et que la preuve ne lui permettait pas de conclure à la culpabilité du détenu. Je n'ai donc aucune hésitation à dire que nous ne pouvons, au moyen d'un bref d'habeas corpus, examiner le bien-fondé de la déclaration de culpabilité ni mener une enquête sur le fond de l'affaire.

1985 CanLII 22 (SCC)

In the subsequent case of Re Sproule (1886), 12 S.C.R. 140, the issues were jurisdictional but the Court held that extrinsic evidence could not be considered on habeas corpus to contradict the record of a superior court that is regular on its face. The conviction and sentence by the court of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery had been confirmed by the Supreme Court of British Columbia and Ritchie C.J. spoke in terms of the conclusive character of the record of a superior court as follows at p. 191:

> I venture to propound without fear of successful contradiction, that by the law of England and of this Dominion, where the principles of the common law prevail, that if the record of a superior court contains the recital of facts requisite to confer jurisdiction, which the records in this case did, it is conclusive and cannot be contradicted by extrinsic evidence; and if the superior courts have jurisdiction over the subject-matter and the person, as the court of oyer and terminer and general gaol delivery and the Supreme Court of British Columbia had in this case, the records of their judgments and sentences are final and conclusive, unerring verity, and the law will not, in such a case, allow the record to be contradicted.

and he emphasized the distinction in this respect between the records of inferior courts and those of superior courts as follows at p. 193:

> And I venture humbly, and with all respect, to suggest that the difficulty in this case has arisen from a misapprehension of what can, and what cannot, be done under a writ of habeas corpus, but more especially from not duly appreciating the distinction between the validity and force of records of courts of inferior, and of courts of superior, jurisdiction, but treating records of superior and inferior courts as being of the same force and effect.

Re Sproule was applied by this Court in Ex parte Macdonald, supra, and Re Henderson, [1930] S.C.R. 45, where there were jurisdictional issues involved, in support of the more general or unqualified proposition that the Court was limited on habeas corpus to an examination of the warrant of committal in determining whether there had been an absence or excess of jurisdiction.

L'arrêt subséquent Re Sproule (1886), 12 R.C.S. 140, soulevait des questions de compétence, mais la Cour a conclu qu'on ne saurait, dans le cadre d'une demande d'habeas corpus, se fonder sur des preuves extrinsèques pour contredire le dossier apparemment régulier d'une cour supérieure. La Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique avait confirmé la déclaration de culpabilité et la peine prononcées par la cour d'oyer et terminer et d'évacuation des prisons, et, à la p. 191, le juge en chef Ritchie a parlé du caractère concluant du dossier d'une cour supérieure en ces termes:

> [TRADUCTION] Je suis prêt à soutenir sans crainte de contradiction que, selon le droit d'Angleterre et du Canada, lorsque les principes de common law s'appliquent, si le dossier d'une cour supérieure contient l'exposé de faits nécessaire pour qu'il y ait attribution de compétence, ce qui est le cas en l'espèce, ce dossier est concluant et ne saurait être contredit par une preuve extrinsèque; et si les cours supérieures ont compétence sur le sujet et sur la personne, comme l'avaient dans la présente affaire la cour d'oyer et terminer et d'évacuation des prisons et la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique, les dossiers contenant leurs jugements et condamnations sont définitifs et concluants, la vérité absolue, et, cela étant, le dossier ne peut en droit être contredit.

Puis, il a souligné la distinction à cet égard entre les dossiers de cours inférieures et ceux de cours supérieures, disant à ce propos, à la p. 193:

> [TRADUCTION] Et je me permets de suggérer humblement et en toute déférence que la difficulté en l'espèce vient d'une conception erronée de ce qu'on peut et de ce qu'on ne peut pas faire en vertu d'un bref d'habeas corpus; mais, plus particulièrement, la difficulté résulte de ce qu'on saisit imparfaitement la différence de validité et d'effet entre les dossiers de cours de juridiction inférieure et ceux de cours de juridiction supérieure, de sorte qu'on considère les deux types de dossiers comme ayant la même validité et le même effet.

Dans les arrêts Ex parte Macdonald, précité, et Re Henderson, [1930] R.C.S. 45, portant sur des questions de compétence, cette Cour a appliqué l'arrêt Re Sproule pour appuyer la proposition plus générale ou absolue selon laquelle la Cour, saisie d'une demande d'habeas corpus, doit s'en tenir à un examen du mandat de dépôt en déterminant s'il y a eu défaut ou excès de compétence.

1985 CanLII 22 (SCC)

Thus the true basis of this Court's jurisprudence with respect to the admission or consideration of extrinsic evidence on an application for habeas corpus consists of two principles: the principle that extrinsic evidence must not be permitted to convert an application for habeas corpus into an appeal on the merits, and the principle that the record of a superior court is conclusive as to the facts on which the court's jurisdiction depends and cannot be contradicted by extrinsic evidence. It has been suggested that the Court was particularly concerned about the first principle when it was exercising an original jurisdiction in respect of habeas corpus, and that this may have led to the broad and unqualified expression of the rule respecting the consideration of extrinsic evidence on habeas corpus that is to be found in some of its decisions. See Sharpe, The Law of Habeas Corpus (1976), p. 51, note 2. With respect to the second principle, I agree with the suggestion in Sharpe, "Habeas Corpus in Canada" (1975), 2 Dalhousie L.J. 241 at p. 261, that it should apply only to the records of superior courts or courts of general common law jurisdiction. In Mitchell, neither of these principles was applicable. As I have indicated, the grounds of attack were clearly jurisdictional, and the record, dependent as it was on the proceedings and decisions of an inferior tribunal, was not of the character entitled to be treated as conclusive of the facts of jurisdiction. In my respectful opinion, the view expressed in Mitchell that the affidavit evidence could not be considered went beyond the true basis of the Court's jurisprudence on this question. In fact, two members of the majority in the result (Martland and de Grandpré JJ.), as well as the minority (Laskin C.J., Spence and Dickson JJ.) did consider the affidavit evidence in deciding whether there had been an absence or excess of jurisdiction in ordering the detention.

As the British Columbia and Ontario Courts of Appeal pointed out in Cardinal and in the case at bar, it may only be possible to establish jurisdictional error on habeas corpus by affidavit evidence, even where the record is brought up by certiorari in aid. This is particularly true of a violation of natural justice or a denial of procedural fairness. This is a compelling reason, in my opinion, for confining the rule against consideration of extrinsic evidence of an application for habeas corpus within its proper boundaries.

Il s'ensuit que la jurisprudence de cette Cour concernant l'admission ou l'examen d'une preuve extrinsèque dans le cadre d'une demande d'habeas corpus a pour fondement véritable deux principes, savoir: le principe selon lequel il ne faut pas permettre qu'une preuve extrinsèque ait pour effet de transformer une demande d'habeas corpus en un appel sur le fond, et le principe selon lequel le dossier d'une cour supérieure est concluant quant aux faits dont dépend sa compétence et ne peut être contredit par une preuve extrinsèque. Il a été dit que le premier principe constituait une préoccupation particulière de la Cour quand elle avait à exercer une compétence de première instance en matière d'habeas corpus et que cela explique peut-être pourquoi certains de ses arrêts contiennent une expression de portée large et absolue de la règle relative à l'examen de preuves extrinsèques dans le cas d'une demande d'habeas corpus. Voir Sharpe, The Law of Habeas Corpus (1976), p. 51, note 2. Pour ce qui est du second principe, je suis d'accord avec Sharpe qui dit dans «Habeas Corpus in Canada» (1975), 2 Dalhousie L.J. 241, à la p. 261, qu'il ne doit s'appliquer qu'aux dossiers des cours supérieures ou des cours de juridiction générale en common law. Dans l'arrêt Mitchell, ni l'un ni l'autre principe ne trouvait application. Comme je l'ai déjà souligné, les moyens invoqués dans cette affaire-là concernaient manifestement la compétence de la cour, et le dossier, puisqu'il dépendait des procédures et des décisions d'un tribunal inférieur, ne pouvait être considéré comme concluant relativement aux faits établissant la compétence. À mon respectueux avis, quand on dit dans l'arrêt Mitchell qu'il n'est pas permis d'examiner la preuve par affidavit, on s'éloigne du fondement véritable de la jurisprudence de la Cour sur cette question. En fait, deux des juges majoritaires (les juges Martland et de Grandpré) ainsi que les juges minoritaires (le juge en chef Laskin, les juges Spence et Dickson) ont tenu compte de la preuve par affidavit en décidant s'il y avait eu défaut ou excès de compétence lorsque l'ordonnance de détention avait été rendue.

Comme l'ont souligné la Cour d'appel de la Colombie-Britannique dans l'arrêt Cardinal et la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario dans la présente affaire, il est des cas où l'erreur de compétence ne peut

Support for a broader approach to the admission or consideration of extrinsic evidence on habeas corpus to determine issues of jurisdiction may be found in the decision of the House of Lords in Schtraks v. Government of Israel, [1964] A.C. 556, which was relied on by the Courts of Appeal in Cardinal and the case at bar. There it was held that fresh evidence was admissible on an application for habeas corpus to show that the magistrate lacked jurisdiction to make the committal order in an extradition case because the offence was of a political character. Lord Hodson appears to have held in effect that the rule concerning the admission of affidavit evidence on habeas corpus is the same as it is on certiorari, as suggested by the following passage at pp. 605-06:

> Proceeding by habeas corpus is analogous to that by certiorari to remove a conviction, see Short and Mellor's Crown Practice (1908), p. 319. Affidavits are not admissible to controvert facts found by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, though they may be received to show some extrinsic collateral matter essential to jurisdiction or to show total want or excess of jurisdiction.

I am therefore of the opinion that, subject to the limitation arising from the conclusive character of the records of courts of superior or general common law jurisdiction, a court may on an application for habeas corpus without certiorari in aid consider affidavit or other extrinsic evidence to determine whether there has been an absence or excess of jurisdiction.

être établie au cours d'une demande d'habeas corpus que par la preuve par affidavit même lorsque le dossier a pu être produit grâce à un certiorari auxiliaire. Cela est particulièrement vrai s'il y a eu violation des principes de justice naturelle ou négation de l'équité dans la procédure. Il s'agit là, selon moi, d'un motif irrésistible de circonscrire dans les limites qui lui sont propres la règle qui s'oppose à l'examen d'une preuve extrinsèque dans une demande d'habeas corpus.

L'arrêt de la Chambre des lords Schtraks v. Government of Israel, [1964] A.C. 556, sur lequel se sont fondées les cours d'appel dans l'arrêt Cardinal et dans la présente affaire, appuie un point de vue plus libéral à l'égard de l'admission ou de l'examen de preuves extrinsèques dans une demande d'habeas corpus pour trancher des questions de compétence. Dans cet arrêt on a conclu qu'une nouvelle preuve pouvait être admise relativement à une demande d'habeas corpus afin de démontrer que le magistrat n'avait pas compétence pour rendre l'ordonnance d'incarcération dans une affaire d'extradition en raison du caractère politique de l'infraction. Lord Hodson semble avoir conclu en fait que la règle relative à l'admission d'une preuve par affidavit dans le cas d'un habeas corpus est la même que celle qui s'applique à une demande de certiorari; c'est ce qui ressort de l'extrait suivant aux pp. 605 et 606:

> [TRADUCTION] La procédure par voie d'habeas corpus est comparable à celle par voie de certiorari pour l'annulation d'une déclaration de culpabilité, voir Short and Mellor's Crown Practice (1908), à la p. 319. Les affidavits ne sont pas admissibles pour mettre en doute des conclusions de fait d'un tribunal compétent, bien qu'ils puissent être reçus pour établir un point accessoire extrinsèque qui est essentiel à la compétence ou pour prouver soit un défaut total de compétence soit un excès de compétence.

Je suis donc d'avis que, sous réserve de la restriction qui résulte du caractère concluant des dossiers de cours de juridiction supérieure ou de juridiction générale en common law, une cour saisie d'une demande d'habeas corpus sans certiorari auxiliaire peut examiner une preuve par affidavit ou d'autres preuves extrinsèques pour déterminer s'il y a eu défaut ou excès de compétence.

I turn to the question whether habeas corpus will lie to determine the validity of the confinement of an inmate of a penitentiary in a special handling unit and to obtain his release from such confinement, if it is found to be unlawful, into normal association with the general population of the penitentiary.

This issue turns on the view that one takes of the proper role of habeas corpus and the extent to which it should be adapted to the reality of the various forms of confinement or detention within penal institutions. An important policy consideration, in the context of the exclusive review jurisdiction of the Federal Court, is the extent to which the use of habeas corpus to determine the validity of a particular form of detention amounts to an indirect assumption of the Federal Court's review jurisdiction with respect to the administrative decisions of federal correctional authorities.

Those who oppose the resort to habeas corpus to challenge the validity of a particular form of confinement or detention in a penal institution contend that it fails to meet two essential conditions of the traditional availability of this remedy: (a) that there be a deprivation of liberty; and (b) that what is sought is the complete liberty of the applicant and not merely his or her transfer to another form of detention or restraint of liberty. This view of the traditional role of habeas corpus is reflected in the decisions in Ex parte Rogers (1843), 7 Jur. 992, and R. v. Governor of Wandsworth Prison; ex parte Silverman (1952), 96 Sol. J. 853. In Rogers a prisoner applied for habeas corpus to obtain his release from a part of a prison "where the confinement was stricter and the food more scanty" to the place in the prison where he had been confined before the transfer. In dismissing the application Denman C.J., with whom Williams, Coleridge and Wightman JJ. concurred, said: "It is quite clear that we cannot entertain this application. The object of the writ of habeas corpus is, generally, to restore a person to his liberty, not to pronounce a judgment as to the room or part of a prison in Voilà qui m'amène à la question de savoir si l'on peut recourir à l'habeas corpus pour décider de la validité de l'incarcération d'un détenu dans une unité spéciale de détention d'un pénitencier et, si cette détention est jugée illégale, pour obtenir sa réintégration dans la population générale du pénitencier.

Au cœur de cette question est l'opinion qu'on peut avoir du rôle véritable de l'habeas corpus et de la mesure dans laquelle ce recours doit être adapté à la réalité des différents types d'incarcération et de détention qui existent dans les établissements pénitentiaires. Une considération importante de politique générale, dans le contexte de la compétence exclusive de la Cour fédérale en matière de contrôle judiciaire, est la mesure dans laquelle le recours à l'habeas corpus pour déterminer la validité d'une forme particulière de détention constitue une appropriation indirecte du pouvoir de contrôle judiciaire de la Cour fédérale à l'égard des décisions administratives des autorités correctionnelles fédérales.

Ceux qui s'opposent au recours à l'habeas corpus pour contester la validité d'une forme particulière d'incarcération ou de détention dans un établissement pénitentiaire soutiennent qu'on ne satisfait pas à deux conditions essentielles auxquelles a été traditionnellement soumise l'obtention de ce recours: a) il faut une privation de liberté et b) il faut viser la liberté totale du requérant et non pas simplement son transfert à un autre type de détention ou de privation de liberté. Cette conception du rôle traditionnel de l'habeas corpus se manifeste dans les affaires Ex parte Rogers (1843), 7 Jur. 992, et R. v. Governor of Wandsworth Prison; ex parte Silverman (1952), 96 Sol. J. 853. Dans l'affaire Rogers, un détenu a tenté d'obtenir par voie d'habeas corpus son transfert d'une partie d'une prison [TRADUCTION] «où l'incarcération était plus stricte et les repas plus maigres» à l'endroit, dans la même prison, où il avait été détenu auparavant. En rejetant la demande, le juge en chef Denman, à l'avis duquel les juges Williams, Coleridge et Wightman se sont rangés, a dit: [TRADUCTION] «Il est bien évident que nous ne pouvons faire droit à cette demande.

which a prisoner ought to be confined." In Silverman, a prisoner in preventive detention complained that he was not receiving the special treatment which the applicable statute required to be provided, and he sought by an application for habeas corpus to be transferred to a place where such treatment was provided. In dismissing the application for habeas corpus Hilbery J. is reported to have held that if a writ of habeas corpus were issued, "the only question would be whether the applicant should be released or not; and the prison governor's return would state that he was being detained under a sentence of preventive detention, which would be a perfectly good answer".

These cases were relied on by Hugessen A.C.J. (as he then was) in Berrouard v. The Queen, an unreported judgment of November 30, 1981, and related unreported decisions (referred to by the Quebec Court of Appeal in Morin) in dismissing applications for habeas corpus to challenge the validity of confinement in what appears from the expressions used to have been a special handling unit. I quote from an English version of what he said, as reported in Re Morin and Yeomans (1982), 1 C.C.C. (3d) 438 at p. 441:

[TRANSLATION] These six motions for habeas corpus each raise the same point of law. In each case, the applicant alleges that he is at present serving a sentence and that he has been unjustifiably transferred into a special detention unit, or a special segregation unit.

An essential pre-condition to the granting of the remedy of habeas corpus is the privation of the subject's liberty: Masella v. Langlais (1955), 112 C.C.C. 1, [1955] 4 D.L.R. 346, [1955] S.C.R. 263. Similarly, in a motion for habeas corpus, the principal object of this remedy is the obtaining of liberty for the subject; R. v. Governor of Wandsworth Prison; Ex p. Silverman (1952), 96 Sol. Jo. 853 (Queen's Bench Div. Ct., Hilbery, Streatfeild and McNair JJ.); Ex parte Rogers (1843), 7 Jur. 992 (Court of Queen's Bench, Denman C.J., Williams, Coleridge and Wightman JJ.). I have read with much interest the judgment of my colleague

Un bref d'habeas corpus a généralement pour objet de rendre à une personne sa liberté et non pas de décider de la pièce ou de la partie d'une prison où un détenu devrait être incarcéré.» Dans l'affaire Silverman, un détenu en détention préventive, alléguant qu'il ne recevait pas le traitement spécial exigé par la loi applicable, a cherché au moyen d'une demande d'habeas corpus à obtenir son transfert à un endroit où ce traitement était offert. Le juge Hilbery a rejeté la demande d'habeas corpus, concluant que, si un bref d'habeas corpus était délivré, [TRADUCTION] «la seule question en litige serait celle de l'opportunité de libérer le requérant; et le rapport du directeur de prison préciserait qu'il s'agissait d'une détention préventive, ce qui constituerait une réponse parfaitement valable».

Dans la décision inédite Berrouard c. La Reine en date du 30 novembre 1981 et dans des décisions connexes, également inédites, (auxquelles la Cour d'appel du Québec s'est référée dans l'arrêt Morin), le juge en chef adjoint Hugessen (maintenant juge de la Cour d'appel fédérale) s'est fondé sur cette jurisprudence pour rejeter des demandes d'habeas corpus qui contestaient la validité de l'incarcération dans ce qui paraît, d'après les expressions employées, avoir été une unité spéciale de détention. Je cite ci-après les motifs du juge en chef adjoint Hugessen reproduits dans l'arrêt Morin c. Comité national chargé de l'examen des cas d'U.S.D. (Unité Spéciale de détention), [1982] C.A. 464, à la p. 466:

Ces six requêtes en habeas corpus soulèvent toutes et chacune le même point de droit. Dans chaque cas, le requérant allègue qu'il purge actuellement une sentence et qu'il a été injustement transféré dans une unité spéciale de détention ou dans une ségrégation spéciale.

Autant la privation de la liberté du sujet est une pré-condition essentielle au remède d'habeas corpus (Masella c. Langlois, [1955] R.C.S. 263), autant l'obtention éventuelle de cette même liberté doit être le principal objet du remède d'habeas corpus (R. c. Governor of Wandsworth Prison, (1952) 96 Sol. Jo. 853; Rogers (Ex parte), (1843) 7 jur. 992). J'ai lu avec grand intérêt le jugement de mon collègue le juge en chef McEachern, de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique, dans l'affaire Oswald v. Attorney-general et Cardinal v. Attorney-general, jugement inédit en date du 30 décembre 1980. Avec tout le respect que je

1985 CanLII 22 (SCC)

Chief Justice McEachern, of the Supreme Court of British Columbia, in Cardinal and Oswald v. Attorney-General, an unreported judgment delivered on December 30, 1980. With all respect which I have for my colleague, I am not in agreement with his position that the writ of habeas corpus can be used to modify the conditions of a detention since, even if the writ is granted, the prisoner's detention will continue after the final judgment is delivered. This is also our case.

It accordingly follows that I am in agreement with the decision of my colleague Mr. Justice Jean-Paul Bergeron in the Morin v. Yeomans case, an unreported judgment delivered on November 18, 1981.

In Morin, which, as I have said, was a case of habeas corpus without certiorari in aid, Bergeron J. referred to the conclusion of McEachern C.J.S.C. in Cardinal that habeas corpus would lie to determine the validity of a particular form of detention in a penitentiary and said he could not agree with it. He held that judicial review of the administrative decisions of the federal correctional authorities fell within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Court by way of certiorari. In his view, the conditions of detention of a person who was otherwise lawfully imprisoned under a valid warrant of committal could not give rise to habeas corpus. In dismissing the appeal from the judgment of Bergeron J., the Quebec Court of Appeal noted that the appellant had taken proceedings by way of certiorari in the Federal Court to challenge the validity of his confinement in the Special Handling Unit and that there would therefore be the danger of conflicting judgments if it were held that the superior court had jurisdiction to issue habeas corpus to determine the same issue. The Court of Appeal concluded that proceedings to challenge administrative action within federal penitentiaries was within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Court. Thus it would appear that the Superior Court and the Court of Appeal in Morin were influenced in the view which they took of the proper application of habeas corpus by the implications of a concurrent or overlapping review jurisdiction with respect to the administrative decisions of the federal correctional authorities.

dois à mon collègue, je ne suis pas d'accord avec la prétention que le bref d'habeas corpus peut être utilisé pour modifier les conditions d'une détention qui, même si le bref est maintenu, va subsister après le jugement final. C'est notre cas.

Il va sans dire que je suis, en conséquence, d'accord avec la décision de mon collègue l'honorable juge Jean-Paul Bergeron dans l'affaire Morin v. Yeomans, jugement inédit en date du 18 novembre 1981.

Dans l'arrêt Morin, où, je le répète, il s'agissait d'un habeas corpus sans certiorari auxiliaire, le juge Bergeron fait mention de la conclusion du juge en chef McEachern de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique dans l'arrêt Cardinal selon laquelle on peut recourir à l'habeas corpus pour déterminer la validité d'une forme particulière de détention dans un pénitencier et déclare ne pas pouvoir l'accepter. En effet, il a conclu que le contrôle judiciaire des décisions administratives des autorités correctionnelles fédérales doit se faire par voie de certiorari, ce qui relève de la compétence exclusive de la Cour fédérale. À son avis, les conditions de détention d'une personne par ailleurs légalement détenue en vertu d'un mandat de dépôt valide ne donnent pas ouverture à habeas corpus. En rejetant l'appel de la décision du juge Bergeron, la Cour d'appel du Québec a souligné que l'appelant avait engagé des procédures de certiorari devant la Cour fédérale pour contester la validité de son incarcération dans l'unité spéciale de détention et qu'il y avait donc un risque de jugements contradictoires si l'on concluait que la Cour supérieure avait compétence pour délivrer un bref d'habeas corpus relativement à la même question. La Cour d'appel a conclu que des procédures visant à contester un acte administratif accompli au sein des pénitenciers fédéraux sont du ressort exclusif de la Cour fédérale. Il paraît donc que, dans l'affaire Morin, l'opinion de la Cour supérieure et de la Cour d'appel quant à l'applicabilité de l'habeas corpus a été influencée par les conséquences éventuelles d'un partage ou d'un chevauchement de la compétence de contrôle des décisions administratives prises par des autorités correctionnelles fédérales.

1985 CanLII 22 (SCC)

The British Columbia courts in Cardinal and the Ontario Court of Appeal in the case at bar applied the notion of a "prison within a prison" in holding that habeas corpus would lie to determine the validity of confinement in administrative segregation or a special handling unit, and if such confinement be found unlawful, to order the release of the inmate into the general population of the penitentiary. The concept of a "prison within a prison" is referred to by Sharpe, The Law of Habeas Corpus (1976), p. 149, where he speaks in favour of such an application of habeas corpus, and by Dickson J., as he then was, in Martineau, supra, where, with reference to the decision of the disciplinary board which sentenced the inmate for a disciplinary offence to 15 days in the penitentiary's special corrections unit, he said at p. 622:

> Moreover, the board's decision had the effect of depriving an individual of his liberty by committing him to a 'prison within a prison'. In these circumstances elementary justice requires some procedural protection. The rule of law must run within penitentiary walls.

This statement reflects the perception that a prisoner is not without some rights or residual liberty (see also Solosky v. The Queen, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 821 at p. 839) and that there may be significant degrees of deprivation of liberty within a penal institution. The same perception is reflected in the reasons for judgment of McEachern C.J.S.C. and Anderson J.A. in Cardinal and Cory J.A. in the case at bar on this issue. In effect, a prisoner has the right not to be deprived unlawfully of the relative or residual liberty permitted to the general inmate population of an institution. Any significant deprivation of that liberty, such as that effected by confinement in a special handling unit meets the first of the traditional requirements for habeas corpus, that it must be directed against a deprivation of liberty.

Moreover, the principle that habeas corpus will lie only to secure the complete liberty of the Appliquant la notion d'une «prison au sein d'une prison», les cours de la Colombie-Britannique dans l'affaire Cardinal ainsi que la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario en l'espèce, ont conclu que l'on peut recourir à l'habeas corpus pour déterminer la validité d'une incarcération en ségrégation administrative ou dans une unité spéciale de détention et, si cette incarcération est jugée illégale, pour ordonner la réintégration du détenu dans la population générale du pénitencier. Le concept d'une «prison au sein d'une prison» est mentionné par Sharpe dans The Law of Habeas Corpus (1976), à la p. 149, où il préconise l'application de l'habeas corpus dans ces situations, et par le juge Dickson (maintenant Juge en chef) dans l'arrêt Martineau, précité, à la p. 622, où, relativement à la décision du comité de discipline qui, pour une infraction à la discipline, a condamné le détenu à passer 15 jours à l'unité spéciale de correction du pénitencier, il dit:

> De plus, la décision du comité avait pour effet de priver une personne de sa liberté en l'incarcérant dans une «prison au sein d'une prison». Dans ces circonstances, la justice élémentaire exige une certaine protection dans la procédure. Le principe de la légalité doit régner à l'intérieur des murs d'un pénitencier.

Il ressort de ce passage qu'un détenu continue à jouir de certains droits ou d'une liberté résiduelle (voir aussi l'arrêt Solosky c. La Reine, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 821, à la p. 839) et que dans un établissement pénitentiaire il peut y avoir des gradations importantes de privation de liberté. Cette même idée se dégage des motifs de jugement du juge en chef McEachern de la Cour suprême de la Colombie-Britannique et du juge Anderson de la Cour d'appel dans l'affaire Cardinal et dans les motifs rédigés par le juge Cory en Cour d'appel dans la présente affaire. De fait, un prisonnier a le droit de ne pas être privé illégalement de la liberté relative ou résiduelle accordée à la population carcérale générale d'un établissement. Toute privation appréciable de cette liberté, comme celle qui résulte du transfert à une unité spéciale de détention, satisfait à la première des exigences traditionnelles pour la délivrance d'un bref d'habeas corpus, savoir qu'il y ait eu privation de liberté.

D'autre part, le principe selon lequel on ne peut recourir à l'habeas corpus que pour obtenir la subject is not invariably reflected in its application. There are applications of habeas corpus in Canadian case law which illustrate its use to release a person from a particular form of detention although the person will lawfully remain under some other restraint of liberty. Examples are the use of habeas corpus to recover the custody of children (Stevenson v. Florant, [1927] A.C. 211, aff'g [1925] S.C.R. 532; Dugal v. Lefebvre, [1934] S.C.R. 501); to release a person on parole where the parole has been unlawfully revoked (Re Cadeddu (1982), 4 C.C.C. (3d) 97; Swan v. Attorney General of British Columbia (1983), 35 C.R. (3d) 135); and to transfer an inmate from an institution in which he has been unlawfully confined to another institution (Re Bell and Director of Springhill Medium Security Institution (1977), 34 C.C.C. (2d) 303; Re Frejd (1910), 22 O.L.R. 566). In all of these cases the effect of habeas corpus is to release a person from an unlawful detention, which is the object of the remedy. The use of habeas corpus to release a prisoner from an unlawful form of detention within a penitentiary into normal association with the general inmate population of the penitentiary is consistent with these applications of the remedy.

An enlarged approach to the concept of custody for purposes of habeas corpus is reflected in American case law. Formerly American courts took the view that habeas corpus would only lie where a favourable judgment would result in immediate release from all forms of detention: McNally v. Hill, 293 U.S. 131 (1934). Since then the concept of custody has been greatly expanded to permit a wider use of habeas corpus for the protection of prisoners' rights. In Jones v. Cunningham, 371 U.S. 236 (1963), where habeas corpus was held to be available to an applicant who was not in physical custody but on parole, the Court said at p. 243 that habeas corpus is "not now and never has been a static, narrow, formalistic remedy; its scope has grown to achieve its grand purpose—the protection of individuals against erosion of their right to be free from liberté totale du détenu n'est pas toujours respecté dans la pratique. En effet, on trouve dans la jurisprudence canadienne des cas où l'habeas corpus a été utilisé pour obtenir la libération d'une personne d'une forme particulière de détention bien que cette personne demeurât légalement sous le coup d'un autre type de privation de liberté. Mentionnons à titre d'exemples, le recours à l'habeas corpus pour recouvrer la garde d'enfants (Stevenson v. Florant, [1927] A.C. 211, confirmant [1925] R.C.S. 532; Dugal v. Lefebvre, [1934] R.C.S. 501); pour obtenir la libération conditionnelle d'une personne dont la libération conditionnelle a été illégalement révoquée (Re Cadeddu (1982), 4 C.C.C. (3d) 97; Swan v. Attorney General of British Columbia (1983), 35 C.R. (3d) 135); et pour obtenir le transfert à un autre établissement d'une personne illégalement détenue dans un premier établissement (Re Bell and Director of Springhill Medium Security Institution (1977), 34 C.C.C. (2d) 303; Re Frejd (1910), 22 O.L.R. 566). Dans chacun de ces cas l'habeas corpus opère la libération d'une personne en détention illégale, ce qui est précisément l'objet du recours. Or, l'utilisation de l'habeas corpus pour effectuer la réintégration dans la population carcérale générale du pénitencier d'un détenu soumis à une forme illégale de détention est compatible avec les applications susmentionnées de ce recours.

Un élargissement du concept de la détention aux fins du recours en habeas corpus se reflète dans la jurisprudence américaine. Autrefois, les tribunaux américains estimaient que l'on pouvait recourir à l'habeas corpus seulement lorsqu'un jugement favorable entraînerait la libération immédiate de toutes les formes de détention: McNally v. Hill, 293 U.S. 131 (1934). Depuis lors la portée du concept de la détention a connu un élargissement considérable pour permettre un recours plus large à l'habeas corpus pour la protection des droits des détenus. Dans l'affaire Jones v. Cunningham, 371 U.S. 236 (1963), où il a été jugé qu'un habeas corpus peut être accordé à un requérant qui n'est pas physiquement détenu mais qui est en libération conditionnelle, la cour a dit, à la p. 243, que l'habeas corpus n'est pas [TRADUCTION] «maintenant ni n'a jamais été un recours statique, étroit et wrongful restraints upon their liberty". In Peyton v. Rowe, 391 U.S. 54 (1968), habeas corpus was allowed to challenge the validity of a sentence yet to be served. In Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483 (1969), habeas corpus was allowed to challenge the validity of a condition of confinement in the form of a prison regulation which limited the access of illiterate inmates to the courts by forbidding their fellow prisoners from serving as jailhouse lawyers. It was held that the unlawful regulations made the custody unlawful. In Wilwording v. Swenson, 404 U.S. 249 (1971), the United States Supreme Court reversed the Missouri courts which had held that habeas corpus would not lie where the object was not to secure the release of the petitioners from the penitentiary altogether but to challenge their living conditions and disciplinary measures. The Supreme Court affirmed the approach it had adopted in Johnson v. Avery. It should be noted, however, that in Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475 (1973), Stewart J., speaking for the majority, expressed himself in terms which might suggest that the question was regarded as still being open. He said at p. 499: "This is not to say that habeas corpus may not also be available to challenge such prison conditions. See Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483, (1969); Wilwording v. Swenson, supra, at 251. When a prisoner is put under additional and unconstitutional restraints during his lawful custody, it is arguable that habeas corpus will lie to remove the restraints making the custody illegal. See Note, Developments in the Law—Habeas Corpus, 83 Harv. L. Rev. 1038, 1084 (1970)". The note to which Stewart J. referred approved the approach adopted in the leading case of Coffin v. Reichard, 143 F.2d 443 (6th Cir. 1944), where it was said at p. 445: "A prisoner is entitled to the writ of habeas corpus when, though lawfully in custody, he is deprived of some right to which he is lawfully entitled even in his confinement, the deprivation of which serves to make his imprisonment more burdensome than the law allows or curtails his liberty to a greater extent than the law per-formaliste; sa portée s'est élargie afin qu'il puisse remplir son objet premier—la protection des individus contre l'érosion de leur droit de ne pas voir imposer de restrictions abusives à leur liberté». Dans l'affaire Peyton v. Rowe, 391 U.S. 54 (1968), il a été permis de contester par voie d'habeas corpus la validité d'une peine qu'on n'avait pas encore commencé à purger. Dans l'affaire Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483 (1969), on a fait droit à une demande d'habeas corpus aux fins de contester la légitimité d'une condition d'incarcération, savoir un règlement carcéral qui limitait l'accès des détenus analphabètes aux tribunaux en défendant aux autres détenus de faire office d'avocats. Il a été jugé que le caractère illégal du règlement emportait l'illégalité de la détention. Dans l'arrêt Wilwording v. Swenson, 404 U.S. 249 (1971), la Cour suprême des États-Unis a infirmé les décisions des cours du Missouri qui avaient conclu que l'on ne pouvait recourir à l'habeas corpus lorsque le but n'était pas d'obtenir la libération totale des requérants du pénitencier, mais de contester leurs conditions de vie et les mesures disciplinaires. La Cour suprême a ainsi confirmé ce qu'elle avait dit dans l'arrêt Johnson v. Avery. Il est toutefois à noter que, dans l'arrêt Preiser v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 475 (1973), le juge Stewart, parlant au nom de la majorité, s'est exprimé en des termes qui pourraient porter à croire que la question était considérée comme encore entière. À la page 499, il dit ce qui suit: [TRADUCTION] «Cela n'écarte pas la possibilité du recours à l'habeas corpus pour contester de telles conditions carcérales. Voir les arrêts Johnson v. Avery, 393 U.S. 483 (1969), et Wilwording v. Swenson, précité, à la p. 251. Lorsqu'un détenu est soumis à des mesures coercitives additionnelles et inconstitutionnelles au cours de sa détention légale, il est défendable de recourir à l'habeas corpus pour mettre fin aux mesures qui rendent la détention illégale. Voir Note, Developments in the Law—Habeas Corpus, 83 Harv. L. Rev. 1038, à la p. 1084 (1970).» La note mentionnée par le juge Stewart approuve la solution retenue dans l'arrêt de principe Coffin v. Reichard, 143 F.2d 443 (6th Cir. 1944), où l'on peut lire à la p. 445: [TRADUCTION] «Un détenu, quoique légalement incarcéré, a droit à un bref d'habeas corpus lorsqu'on porte atteinte à quelque mits." After referring to Coffin the note states at pp. 1085-86:

No other circuit purports to follow Coffin. Most courts instead believe that habeas jurisdiction is lacking when the petitioner is not asking for the invalidation of a custody imposed by sentence, on the theory that the petitioner is not seeking a present or future release. But this fails to recognize that the lawfulness of a custody depends, not merely upon the legal basis for some kind of custody, but upon the lawfulness of the specific type and manner of confinement in question. Where the specific detention abridges federally protected interests—by placing petitioner in the wrong prison, denying him treatment, imposing cruel and unusual punishment, impeding his access to the courts, and so on—it is an unlawful detention and habeas lies to release the petitioner therefrom. It is immaterial that the petitioner might then be placed in a different, lawful custody or that his being sentenced to a term of confinement might itself be lawful. The custody requirement, and the corresponding insistence on discharge from custody, do not prevent habeas corpus from being an appropriate remedy for the review of unlawful prison administration.

Since that note was written the point of view expressed in it has been adopted by federal courts of appeal. See, for example, the following cases recognizing the availability of habeas corpus to challenge the validity of various forms of segregated confinement in a prison on the ground of a violation of due process: McCollum v. Miller, 695 F.2d 1044 (7th Cir. 1982); Krist v. Ricketts, 504 F.2d 887 (5th Cir. 1974); Bryant v. Harris, 465 F.2d 365 (7th Cir. 1972); Dawson v. Smith, 719 F.2d 896 (7th Cir. 1983); and Streeter v. Hopper, 618 F.2d 1178 (5th Cir. 1980).

After giving consideration to the two approaches to this issue, I am of the opinion that the better view is that habeas corpus should lie to determine the validity of a particular form of confinement in droit dont il peut jouir même pendant son incarcération et que cette atteinte rend son emprisonnement plus pénible que cela n'est légalement permis ou qu'elle restreint sa liberté au-delà de ce qui est juridiquement autorisé.» Ayant fait mention de l'arrêt Coffin, la note continue aux pp. 1085 et 1086:

[TRADUCTION] Aucun autre circuit ne prétend suivre l'arrêt Coffin. Au contraire, la majorité des cours estiment que l'on ne peut recourir à l'habeas corpus lorsque le requérant ne demande pas l'annulation d'une détention imposée par suite d'une condamnation. Cette opinion repose sur ce que le requérant ne demande à être libéré ni immédiatement ni dans l'avenir. Toutefois, en cela on perd de vue que la légalité d'une détention n'est pas fonction uniquement de l'existence d'un fondement juridique pour une détention quelconque, mais tient à la légalité du type et du mode précis de détention. Lorsque la détention en question porte atteinte à des droits protégés par des lois fédérales, en ce sens que le requérant est placé dans la mauvaise prison, qu'on lui refuse des soins, qu'on lui impose des peines cruelles et inusitées, qu'on l'empêche d'avoir accès aux tribunaux, etc., il s'agit d'une détention illégale et on peut recourir à l'habeas corpus pour en libérer le requérant. À cet égard, peu importe que le requérant puisse alors être placé dans un type différent de détention qui est légal ou que sa condamnation à une peine d'emprisonnement puisse en soi être légale. L'exigence qu'il y ait détention et la demande de libération formulée en conséquence ne changent rien à l'applicabilité de l'habeas corpus pour contrôler une administration carcérale illégale.

Depuis la rédaction de cette note, le point de vue qu'elle exprime a été adopté par les cours d'appel de circuit fédérales. Voir par exemple les arrêts énumérés ci-après qui reconnaissent la possibilité du recours à l'habeas corpus pour contester la validité de différentes formes de détention ségrégative dans une prison pour non-application régulière de la loi: McCollum v. Miller, 695 F.2d 1044 (7th Cir. 1982); Krist v. Ricketts, 504 F.2d 887 (5th Cir. 1974); Bryant v. Harris, 465 F.2d 365 (7th Cir. 1972); Dawson v. Smith, 719 F.2d 896 (7th Cir. 1983); et Streeter v. Hopper, 618 F.2d 1178 (5th Cir. 1980).

Examen fait des deux façons d'aborder cette question, je suis d'avis que le point de vue à retenir est celui selon lequel il y a lieu à habeas corpus pour déterminer la validité d'une forme particu-

a penitentiary notwithstanding that the same issue may be determined upon certiorari in the Federal Court. The proper scope of the availability of habeas corpus must be considered first on its own merits, apart from possible problems arising from concurrent or overlapping jurisdiction. The general importance of this remedy as the traditional means of challenging deprivations of liberty is such that its proper development and adaptation to the modern realities of confinement in a prison setting should not be compromised by concerns about conflicting jurisdiction. As I have said in connection with the question of jurisdiction to issue certiorari in aid of habeas corpus, these concerns have their origin in the legislative judgment to leave the habeas corpus jurisdiction against federal authorities with the provincial superior courts. There cannot be one definition of the reach of habeas corpus in relation to federal authorities and a different one for other authorities. Confinement in a special handling unit, or in administrative segregation as in Cardinal, is a form of detention that is distinct and separate from that imposed on the general inmate population. It involves a significant reduction in the residual liberty of the inmate. It is in fact a new detention of the inmate, purporting to rest on its own foundation of legal authority. It is that particular form of detention or deprivation of liberty which is the object of the challenge by habeas corpus. It is release from that form of detention that is sought. For the reasons indicated above, I can see no sound reason in principle, having to do with the nature and role of habeas corpus, why habeas corpus should not be available for that purpose. I do not say that habeas corpus should lie to challenge any and all conditions of confinement in a penitentiary or prison, including the loss of any privilege enjoyed by the general inmate population. But it should lie in my opinion to challenge the validity of a distinct form of confinement or detention in which the actual physical constraint or deprivation of liberty, as distinct from the mere loss of certain privileges, is more restrictive or severe than the normal one in an institution.

lière de détention dans un pénitencier quoique la même question puisse être tranchée par voie de certiorari en Cour fédérale. La portée du recours à l'habeas corpus doit d'abord être examinée en fonction de son propre fondement, indépendamment des problèmes que peuvent poser le partage ou le chevauchement des compétences. L'importance générale de ce recours comme moyen traditionnel de contester les privations de liberté est telle que son développement et son adaptation rationnels aux réalités modernes de la détention en milieu carcéral ne doivent pas être compromis par des craintes de conflits de compétence. Comme je l'ai déjà souligné à propos de la compétence pour délivrer un certiorari auxiliaire d'un habeas corpus, ces préoccupations sont nées de la décision du législateur de laisser aux cours supérieures provinciales la compétence pour délivrer des brefs d'habeas corpus contre des autorités fédérales. Or, la portée de l'habeas corpus ne peut être définie d'une manière pour le cas des autorités fédérales et d'une autre pour les autres autorités. L'incarcération dans une unité spéciale de détention, ou en ségrégation administrative comme c'était le cas dans l'affaire Cardinal, constitue une forme de détention qui est tout à fait distincte de celle imposée à la population carcérale générale. Elle entraîne une diminution importante de la liberté résiduelle du détenu. Il s'agit en fait d'une nouvelle détention qui est censée avoir son propre fondement juridique. C'est cette forme précise de détention ou de privation de liberté qui est contestée par l'habeas corpus. C'est la libération de cette forme de détention qu'on demande. Voilà pourquoi je ne vois aucune raison valable fondée sur la nature et le rôle de l'habeas corpus pour laquelle il ne devrait pas servir à cette fin. Je ne dis pas qu'on devrait recourir à l'habeas corpus pour contester toutes et chacune des conditions d'incarcération dans un pénitencier ou une prison, y compris la perte d'un privilège dont jouit la population carcérale générale. Mais, selon moi, il y a lieu d'y recourir pour contester la validité d'une forme distincte de détention dans laquelle la contrainte physique réelle ou la privation de liberté, par opposition à la simple perte de certains privilèges, est plus restrictive ou sévère que cela est normalement le cas dans un établissement carcéral.

Summary:

This appeal involves two applications: (a) an application to vary an order declining to remove an appeal from the inactive list; and (b) an application to quash a separate but related appeal. HELD: the application to vary is dismissed; the application to quash is allowed. The appeals underlying both applications involve a residential tenancy dispute. The appellant no longer resides in the rental unit. There is no live controversy between the parties and in the particular context of this case, the appeals are moot.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten:

Introduction

[1] There are two applications before us: (a) an application to vary an order dismissing an application by the appellant, Wayne Moore, to remove an appeal from the inactive list; and (b) an application by the respondent, Kevin Cheung, to quash a separate (but related) appeal filed by Mr. Moore.

[2] Mr. Moore appeared personally at the application hearing. He said he did not consent to Mr. Cheung's application being heard, he wants to have a lawyer represent him, and the applications require two days of hearing time. He was told the applications would proceed.

[3] Mr. Moore also said Justice Abrioux had a conflict of interest and could not hear the applications, based on a notice of civil claim that Mr. Moore recently filed in the Supreme Court. Effectively, this was a recusal application. He was told we would proceed with the applications and consider that issue in our deliberations. Mr. Moore was not satisfied with these answers and elected to leave the courtroom. Consequently, his position in the applications has been considered based on his written material. We heard brief oral submissions from counsel for Mr. Cheung.

[4] Justice Abrioux has declined to recuse himself. His explanatory reasons have been published separately. A copy of those reasons is attached as an appendix to this judgment.

Background

[5] The parties have been involved in a tenancy dispute for several years. I do not consider it necessary to set out the entire history. Instead, I will refer only to those matters most germane to issues properly before us.

[6] Mr. Cheung was Mr. Moore's landlord. In May 2023, he gave Mr. Moore notice ending the tenancy. Mr. Moore disputed the notice under the Residential Tenancy Act, S.B.C. 2002, c. 78. In August 2023, an arbitrator dismissed the dispute and granted an order of possession in Mr. Cheung's favour. Mr. Moore applied for reconsideration of the arbitrator's decision; however, the application failed and the possession order was affirmed.

[7] Mr. Moore subsequently sought judicial review in the British Columbia Supreme Court. In December 2024, his petition was dismissed. Consequently, the notice to end tenancy and the possession order remained intact. At this time, Mr. Moore was still living in the rental unit. He had obtained stays of the possession order which allowed him to occupy the unit until completion of the judicial review process.

[8] Mr. Moore appealed the dismissal of the petition (CA50328). In February 2025, a judge of this Court stayed the possession order pending appeal. However, she attached conditions to the stay, including an obligation that Mr. Moore pay rent to Mr. Cheung.

[9] Mr. Moore did not do what was required of him. In April 2025, the stay of the possession order was lifted, and Mr. Cheung enforced the order. Consequently, Mr. Moore has not lived in the rental unit since April 12, 2025.

[10] The appeal from the order dismissing the petition ended up on this Court's inactive list. Mr. Moore applied to remove the appeal from the list. The application was dismissed by Justice Francis on April 7, 2026. That order forms the subject matter of the first application before us.

2026 BCCA 259 (CanLII)

[11] After the petition concluded in the British Columbia Supreme Court and while the appeal in CA50328 was outstanding, Mr. Moore filed an application in the Supreme Court seeking, among other things, leave to amend the petition. The application was dismissed in December 2025. Mr. Moore appealed the dismissal to this Court (CA51220). Mr. Cheung applies to quash the appeal for lack of merit. This is the second application before us.

2026 BCCA 259 (CanLII)

Issues on Appeal

[12] There are two questions to resolve:

a) Did Justice Francis err in dismissing Mr. Moore's application to remove appeal CA50328 from the inactive list?

b) Should appeal CA51220 be quashed for lack of merit?

Discussion

[13] I will address the applications in turn.

Review of the refusal to reinstate (CA50328)

[14] The application to vary the order made by Justice Francis is brought pursuant to s. 29 of the Court of Appeal Act, S.B.C. 2021, c. 6. As recently explained in Bryzzhev v. University of British Columbia, 2026 BCCA 213:

> [13] The standard of review on an application under s. 29 … is highly deferential. The review is not to be treated as a re-hearing. For a review division to interfere with the order of a justice in chambers, an applicant must demonstrate that the justice was wrong in law, wrong in principle, or misconceived the facts: Seattle Environmental Consulting Ltd. v. Workers' Compensation Board of British Columbia, 2017 BCCA 386 at paras. 5–7.

[15] Mr. Moore says the order denying reinstatement reflects several errors. In his written material, Mr. Moore claims: (a) Justice Francis wrongly relied on unproven allegations and misrepresentations advanced by Mr. Cheung's lawyer; (b) she did not give Mr. Moore sufficient opportunity to state his case; (c) she was misled by the "sharp practi[c]e" of the law firm representing Mr. Cheung and "hoodwinked" by counsel; (d) her decision is the “antithesis of the rule of law and fair treatment”; (e) she ignored the evidence Mr. Moore adduced in support of reinstatement; and (f) she failed to consider collusion between the law firm representing Mr. Cheung and an individual who formerly represented Mr. Moore as an agent in the tenancy proceedings.

[16] Mr. Cheung opposes the application to vary. He says both the appeal from judicial review and the application to vary are moot. Mr. Moore has not lived in the rental unit for more than one year and there is no longer a live controversy between the parties. In addition, Mr. Cheung submits Mr. Moore has not identified an actual error in law, error in principle, or misconception of the facts by Justice Francis that would allow us to interfere with her decision. She conducted a fair and comprehensive review of the application to reinstate, and she made findings that were open to her on the record.

[17] I have read Justice Francis’ reasons, in the context of the record, and I agree with Mr. Cheung that there is no principled basis for varying her order.

[18] After reviewing the history of the underlying proceedings, Justice Francis correctly instructed herself on the legal principles that govern a reinstatement application: at paras. 15–18. Indeed, Mr. Moore does not allege she erred in this regard.

[19] Justice Francis then analyzed the application and made specific findings, including: (a) although Mr. Moore caused the delay which led to the appeal being placed on the inactive list, the delay was not inordinate; (b) however, Mr. Moore did not provide a reasonable explanation for the delay; (c) his factum in the appeal impliedly raises an issue that has some merit (whether the arbitrator held him to a higher evidentiary standard than Mr. Cheung) but there is no longer a live controversy between the parties because the order for possession has been enforced; and (d) there are “no special circumstances that would make it worthwhile to apply scarce judicial resources to these matters”: at para. 30.

[20] The application for reinstatement was dismissed primarily because of mootness. With Mr. Moore out of the unit, Justice Francis did not consider reinstatement to be in the interests of justice.

[21] In my view, this was a reasonable conclusion and open to her.

[22] In Raju v. Red Door Housing Society, 2025 BCCA 212, this Court dismissed applications to vary three chambers orders that involved a residential tenancy dispute for essentially the same reason. Each of the orders declined to stay a possession order that had been upheld following judicial review in the Supreme Court. By the time the variation applications were heard, the applicant, Ms. Raju, was no longer living in the rental unit. Her applications to vary were dismissed as moot:

> [29] All three of Ms. Raju's applications to vary are moot. The substantive relief she seeks in all three applications is a stay of the Order of Possession, which has already been enforced. In addition, the applications to vary the Abrioux Order and the Grauer Order have been rendered moot by the passage of time. The relief sought in each of those is a stay pending the hearing of the variation applications which, of course, have now been heard. There is no longer a "live controversy" between the parties with respect to the enforcement of the Order of Possession or stays pending review: Borowski v. Canada (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 342 at 354, 1989 CanLII 123, citing The King ex rel. Tolfree v. Clark, [1944] S.C.R. 69, 1943 CanLII 3; Tran v. Abbott, 2018 BCCA 365 at para. 13.
> [30] There is a general rule against hearing and deciding moot disputes. One of the rationales for that general rule is judicial economy: given the scarcity of judicial resources and the many live controversies that demand the courts' attention, there must be an element of "social cost in leaving the matter undecided": Borowski at 362. Concerns about judicial economy will be addressed where "the special circumstances of the case make it worthwhile to apply scarce judicial resources to resolve it": Vancouver Shipyards Co. Ltd. v. Canadian Merchant Services Guild, 2023 BCCA 77 at para. 24 (Chambers), citing Mapara v. Ferndale Institution, 2014 BCCA 49 at para. 34. This may be the case where the court's decision will have some practical effect on the rights of the parties even without determining the controversy that gave rise to the action; the matter raises an issue of a brief and recurring nature that might otherwise evade review; or the matter raises an issue of public importance the resolution of which would be in the public interest: Vancouver Shipyards at para. 24.

>
> [31] Ms. Raju believes the RTB decision was incorrect and that her perspective and evidence have not been given appropriate consideration throughout the process. While Ms. Raju's situation is no doubt difficult, her applications for review must be dismissed as moot.
> [32] There is no longer a "live controversy" between the parties with respect to the enforcement of the Order of Possession or the necessity of stays pending a hearing of the applications because the Order of Possession has already been enforced. There are no special circumstances that would make it worthwhile to apply scarce judicial resources to these matters.

[23] As with Raju, there is no longer a live controversy between Mr. Moore and Mr. Cheung specific to the rental unit. Setting aside Justice Francis' order, reinstating Mr. Moore's appeal, and allowing him to pursue his challenge to the dismissal of his petition would have no practical effect on the rights of these parties. Mr. Moore cannot go back into the unit. The tenancy relationship between the parties is over and there is no likelihood of reoccurring issues between them relevant to that issue.

[24] Finally, I agree with Justice Francis that this case does not involve special circumstances justifying reinstatement and the use of scarce judicial resources.

[25] Mr. Moore has not identified an unsettled or novel legal issue in his appeal, one that requires appellate clarification or direction for future cases, or an issue that carries broad implications in the residential tenancy context. He has filed a factum in the appeal, alleging the petition judge: (a) "more than likely" ignored his evidence; (b) failed to appreciate that the arbitrator and the reconsideration panel were "incompetent" in finding that he damaged the unit; (c) erred in fact by not concluding there was no evidence in support of the alleged damage; (d) failed to appreciate that Mr. Cheung's allegations were fraudulent; and (e) wrongly reached a legal conclusion without a credible evidentiary foundation. These are case-specific complaints, grounded in Mr. Moore's interpretation of the evidence adduced before the arbitrator and his assessment of its probative value. On the face of it, there is nothing about the case that transcends its four corners. A ruling from this Court is unlikely to carry precedential importance; rather, it will reflect a highly individualized inquiry, unique to the context and the circumstances of the case.

[26] Consistent with the approach taken in Raju, I would not vary Justice Francis' order. In my view, Mr. Moore's appeal from the dismissal of his application for judicial review is moot.

[27] I note Justice Francis also dismissed a no fee application by Mr. Moore specific to CA51220. She did so after finding that the second appeal has no prospect of success. Given the conclusion I reach below, it is not necessary to address this aspect of her judgment.

Application to dismiss appeal (CA51220)

[28] The application to quash Mr. Moore's second appeal is brought pursuant to s. 20(1) of the Court of Appeal Act and R. 60(1)(c) of the Court of Appeal Rules, B.C. Reg. 120/2022. This Court's Registrar directed that the application to quash and the s. 29 review be heard together.

[29] Appeal CA51220 was filed on December 16, 2025. It challenges the dismissal of an application filed by Mr. Moore in the petition proceeding on December 2, 2025. In that application, Mr. Moore sought: (a) an order that his "former agent" return stolen court files; (b) an order that counsel for Mr. Cheung file an order dismissing the petition (it had already been sent to this Court's Registry); (c) costs; (d) punitive damages; (e) leave to add third parties to the petition; (f) leave to file or amend a notice of civil claim and counterclaim (no drafts of these claims were before the court); (g) a waiver of filing fees; (h) an order that a plumbers union and the Lawyers' Insurance Fund pay for a lawyer to represent him in the petition; (i) leave to amend the petition; and (j) a stay of proceedings.

[30] The presiding judge did not issue reasons for his dismissal of the application. However, it is apparent from a transcript of the related proceeding that the judge concluded Mr. Moore was not entitled to revisit issues related to the petition because that matter had ended and was under appeal and his other requests required independent proceedings and notice to third parties.

[31] Before us, Mr. Cheung applies to quash the appeal from the post-petition application because Mr. Moore has not identified any legal error by the judge and the appeal is devoid of merit. Mr. Moore has filed a factum in CA51220, but it is effectively the same factum filed in the appeal from judicial review and alleges error specific to the petition judge, not the judge who dismissed the post-petition application.

[32] Mr. Moore sent two letters to this Court's Registrar, parts of which respond to the application to quash. These letters were filed May 6 and May 25, 2026.

[33] In the May 6 letter, Mr. Moore accuses Mr. Cheung's lawyer of acting in bad faith and unilaterally arranging for a quash application with the specific objective of depriving Mr. Moore of his right to be heard. He says matters arising from the tenancy dispute are "tainted with bias and racism". Specific to the second appeal, he says the only reason he returned to the Supreme Court in search of a post-petition remedy was because counsel for Mr. Cheung obstructed his ability to file the order dismissing the petition and doing so was necessary for him to pursue his appeal. He seeks "due process" in the letter and says that if his second appeal fails, it should be because of the merits, not based on a preliminary application to quash. From Mr. Moore's perspective, his second appeal "has a strong leg to stand on".

[34] The May 25 letter repeats some of these accusations. Mr. Moore asks that counsel for Mr. Cheung and his law firm "identify and name the leverage" they have that allows them to "intimidate" Mr. Moore and "expedite … hearing dates without [his] consent". The letter seeks directions on: (a) an emergency stay; (b) orders preserving "assets protection and constitutional and equity rights"; (c) orders preventing "irreparable harm and undue hardship"; and (d) orders granting contractual rights and “enforcement procedures”. Mr. Moore says the application to quash represents an attempt to obstruct justice by pre-empting a hearing of the merits of the appeal based on “scurrilous” allegations.

[35] Justice Francis briefly addressed appeal CA51220 when dismissing Mr. Moore’s application for a no fee order. She concluded the appeal has no prospect of success, stating there was no basis for any of the relief he sought.

[36] I agree with that assessment.

[37] In Grewal v. Grewal, 2017 BCCA 261, this Court confirmed we have jurisdiction to quash an appeal that is so devoid of merit or substance that to allow it to continue through the appeal process would amount to an abuse of process: at paras. 15–16.

[38] I appreciate Mr. Moore believes he has not received a fair opportunity to advance either of his appeals, that Mr. Cheung and his counsel are trying to thwart his attempts to obtain a remedy, and that the judges who have decided the tenancy-related issues have either been misled or ignored his evidence. However, I am of the view Mr. Moore’s second appeal should be quashed for substantially the same reason as the first one.

[39] To the extent this appeal seeks to revisit issues raised in the petition proceeding or asks for relief (such as funding) to assist in advancing petition-related issues, there is no longer a live controversy between the parties and the tenancy matter is moot. To the extent this appeal challenges the judge’s decision to not engage on new matters that require independent proceedings, specific to named third parties, I agree with Justice Francis the judge did not have jurisdiction to consider those issues in the context of the petition. Accordingly, he correctly declined to hear them, without prejudice to Mr. Moore to bring a separate action for the return of files that he says are unlawfully held by someone else.

Disposition

[40] For the reasons provided, I would dismiss the application to vary the order dismissing Mr. Moore's application to reinstate appeal CA50328 and dismiss that appeal for mootness.

[41] I would also quash appeal CA51220 for mootness and lack of merit.

Summary:

The appellant applied to have the justice recuse himself from the hearing of two applications before the Court, which are described in reasons for judgment indexed as Moore v. Cheung, 2026 BCCA 259. The application is denied.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice Abrioux:

[42] The background to the applications which are before this Court are set out in the reasons for judgment of Justice DeWitt-Van Oosten, indexed at 2026 BCCA 259. At the commencement of the proceedings on June 4, 2026, the appellant, Mr. Moore, submitted that I was in a conflict of interest and could not participate in the hearing of the applications because he had named me as a defendant in a notice of civil claim that had recently been filed in the Supreme Court of British Columbia. I viewed Mr. Moore's submission as an application for me to recuse myself. Judgment was reserved on the applications, in part so that I could consider whether I should do so.

[43] It is well established that a recusal application is to be decided by the judge to whom the application is directed.

[44] The notice of civil claim bears a Supreme Court of British Columbia Vancouver docket number S263765 and a filing date of May 20, 2026 (the "NOCC"). I had no knowledge of the NOCC until Mr. Moore brought it to this Court's attention at the appeal hearing on June 4, 2026.

[45] I have now reviewed the NOCC. It names over 50 defendants, including "Quinlan Abrioux Grant Richley Harvey Grewal and the Firm". The allegations relate in part to:

- Mr. Moore allegedly attempting to attend the Union Pension Health and Welfare Meeting in Delta, B.C. on May 4, 2024, and alleging that the actions of those who denied him entry, "constituted criminal mischief, criminal obstruction of justice, defamation, slander, election and pension fraud" and a number of other alleged acts;

[49] I have no knowledge of any of the matters referred to in the NOCC, with the exception of those relating to these applications, and that knowledge is limited to the record on appeal.

[50] I left QA approximately 14 and a half years ago upon my appointment to the Supreme Court of British Columbia. There is nothing in the NOCC that raises either an actual or a reasonable apprehension of bias on my part. When I consider the NOCC in the context of the legal framework to which I have referred, I conclude that Mr. Moore has not met the burden of establishing that a reasonably informed person would be of the view that I am unable to decide the applications fairly and objectively.

[51] Accordingly, I decline to recuse myself. The application is dismissed.

Between:

Mystar Holdings Ltd. and 106 Alberta Ltd.

Applicants/Defendants

- and -

247037 Alberta Ltd.

Respondent/Plaintiff

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Mr. Justice C.S. Brooker

I. Introduction

[1] The Applicants, Mystar Holdings Ltd. ("Mystar") and 106 Alberta Ltd. ("106"), have applied under Rule 129(1)(d) of the Alberta Rules of Court for an order dismissing the claim of the Respondent Plaintiff, 247037 Alberta Ltd ("247" or "the Respondent"). In the alternative, the Applicants seek an order pursuant to Rule 159 for summary dismissal of 247's claim. For the reasons given below, except for the Northwood Inn claim, the application is dismissed.

II. History

[2] The parties to this action have an interesting history. The corporate shareholdings of 247 are controlled by Ron Plucer and his brother, Samuel Plucer. In 1984 the Plucers became aware of an opportunity to purchase a hotel which was then held by the Edmonton Savings and Credit Union (the "ESCU"). This hotel would later become the Pointe Inn Hotel (the "Pointe Inn"), which is the property in issue in the underlying action. Subsequently, litigation between the Plucers and ESCU over the purchase of the Pointe Inn ensued and the Plucers sought out Martin Chambers ("Chambers") to act as a consultant to assist with the legalities of the dispute.

[3] Chambers assisted in negotiating a settlement of the ESCU litigation. However, shortly before the settlement was to be finalized, a property owned by Plucer Holdings Ltd., known as the 17th Avenue Inn, was completely destroyed by fire. The 17th Avenue Inn was an integral part of the settlement deal reached in the ESCU litigation. Ultimately, arson was found to be the cause of the fire and the Plucers were examined as suspects in the arson. Samuel Plucer was eventually charged with arson and manslaughter. At trial, he was found not guilty.

[4] Given the circumstances surrounding the fire, the insurer of the 17th Avenue Inn denied coverage. Litigation then ensued. In July 1992, Plucer Holdings Ltd. and 381916 Alberta Ltd. ("381") sued the Royal Insurance Company of Canada and other insurers claiming coverage for property damage and business losses resulting from the destruction of the 17th Avenue Inn (the "Coverage Action").

[5] In July 1994, Samuel Plucer, 247, 381 and others sued the Royal Insurance Company of Canada and other insurers, claiming bad faith for denying insurance coverage for the property damage and business losses caused by the fire (the "Bad Faith Action").

[6] The Coverage Action was settled in 1998 for $2.1 million dollars and the Bad Faith Action was discontinued without costs at the same time.

[7] The Respondent alleges that following the fire, Chambers advised the Plucers that without the 17th Avenue Inn, the settlement with the ESCU would not be finalized. The Respondent further alleges that Chambers advised the Plucers that no bank would lend funds for a property purchase to a person under suspicion of arson and that the Plucers would therefore have to devise another way to settle with ESCU and obtain the Pointe Inn property.

[8] Whatever conversations took place, it is clear that following the fire 247 and Mystar entered into some form of arrangement pertaining to the financing of the Pointe Inn. Mystar is a British Columbia corporation extra provincially registered in Alberta and at the time was owned 50% by Chambers' common law spouse. The nature of this arrangement is in dispute, but I will refer to it loosely as the "Joint Venture" arrangement. According to both parties, following this arrangement Chambers assisted 247 to obtain financing for the acquisition of the Pointe Inn. Chambers arranged a loan from Scott Apartments Ltd. (a company which Chambers controlled) and a mortgage from DWA Holdings Ltd. In 1998 a mortgage was obtained from a third party lender, Montreal Trust Company of Canada ("Montreal Trust"). At this point in time, title to the Pointe Inn was amended, showing Mystar as having a one-half interest in the property.

[9] Following the purchase of the Pointe Inn, a number of payments were made from 247 to Mystar (and apparently certain other entities). The nature of these payments is in dispute and will be discussed in greater detail, below. In any event, the Respondent alleges that in approximately November of 2002, it was informed that Mystar would remove its name from the title to the Pointe Inn. The Respondent further alleges that despite such assurances, in October 2003, Mystar transferred its half interest in the Pointe Inn to the Defendant/Applicant 106, a company owned by the sister of Chambers' common-law wife. While Mystar acknowledges that the transfer was a non-arms length transaction, it maintains that the transfer was made for proper consideration.

[10] The Respondent subsequently filed a Statement of Claim, claiming a 100% interest in the Pointe Inn. It asserts that Mystar no longer had any property interest to convey to 106, given that Mystar had been fully paid and had agreed to remove itself from title. Conversely, the Applicants argue that at the time of transfer, Mystar was the true owner of a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn, by virtue of the Joint Venture agreement.

[11] Consequently, the Applicants bring the current motion seeking an order dismissing the Respondent's claim pursuant to Rule 129(1)(d), or alternatively, an order directing summary dismissal of the Respondent's claim pursuant to Rule 159.

III. Issues

[12] There are two main issues to be determined in deciding the within application, namely:

a. whether the Plaintiff's claim is an abuse of process of this Court; and

b. whether there is no genuine issue for trial.

IV. Analysis

a. Is the Plaintiff’s claim an abuse of process of this Court?

i. The Applicants’ position

[13] The Applicants rely on Rule 129(1)(d) in arguing that the Respondent's action should be dismissed as an abuse of process. Rule 129 provides:

> 129(1) The court may at any stage of the proceedings order to be struck out or amended any pleading in the action, on the ground that... (d) it is otherwise an abuse of the process of the court, and may order the action to be stayed or dismissed or judgment to be entered accordingly.

[14] The Applicants argue that the current claim constitutes an abuse of process on two different grounds. First, they argue that the Respondent has abused the legal process by adopting a position that is inconsistent with a prior position taken before this Court. Second, they argue that it is an abuse of process for the Respondent to commence an action for the purpose of enforcing the Joint Venture agreement, because the agreement is fraudulent. I shall deal with each of these arguments in turn.

[15] The Applicants' chief claim is that the Amended Statement of Claim is an abuse of process because it adopts a position inconsistent with a position taken during previous legal proceedings. In the current Amended Statement of Claim, 247 claims a full interest in the Pointe Inn. Specifically, para. 23 of the Amended Statement of Claim reads: "247 claims a 100% ownership interest in the Property".

[16] The Applicants argue that this claim is diametrically inconsistent with a claim advanced by 247 in prior proceedings and that it is therefore an abuse of process. A review of prior litigation shows that in the Bad Faith Action, the Statement of Claim read, in part:

> 26. As a result of the foregoing conduct of all or any of the [insurance] Defendants, the Plaintiffs have suffered damages as follows:
>
> > [...]
> > (h) the loss of a one-half interest in the Pointe Inn Hotel which occurred as a direct result of the non-payment of insurance proceeds, the delays and other wrongdoings of the Defendants.

[17] The Applicants argue that the Respondent cannot make an inconsistent claim. That is, the Respondent cannot claim to have lost a one half interest in the Pointe Inn in the Bad Faith Action and later claim to have a 100% interest in the same property in the action against Mystar and 106. The Applicants submit that consistency in the factual and legal position adopted by a party to litigation is a precondition to the proper operation of the legal system and that the adoption of inconsistent positions is an abuse of process under Rule 129. In so arguing they rely, in particular, on Chevron v. Canada (Executive Director of Indian oil and Gas Canada), 2005 ABQB 2, 378 A.R. 306; Halagan v. Reifel (25 November 1997), Vancouver C945038 (B.C.S.C); United Australia Ltd. v. Barclays Bank Ltd., [1941] A.C. 1 (H.L.); and Vanmills Establishment v. Coles (1992), 8 C.P.C. (3d) 178 (B.C.S.C).

[18] In Chevron, the plaintiff (Chevron) commenced an action against the Crown and a number of Native Bands (including the Samson, Louis Bull, Ermineskin and Montana Bands) to recover gas royalties allegedly paid in error. The Crown applied to strike or stay all or part of the counterclaims and third party notices against the Crown filed by the Bands. The Bands had filed Statements of Defence, and Samson, Louis Bull and Montana filed counter-claims and third party notices on the basis that the leases pursuant to which the royalty payments were made were invalid.

[19] Prior to the plaintiff's action, the Samson and Ermineskin Bands had instituted proceedings against the Crown and certain Federal Ministries in the Federal Court of Canada, in an action known as the "Buffalo trial". During the Buffalo trial, Samson's position was predicated on the existence of a valid surrender. The Crown submitted that the Bands' current counterclaims and third party notices constituted an abuse of process in that they were contrary to or inconsistent with the admissions, submissions and evidence that were presented in the course of the Buffalo trial. The issues before the Federal Court were still ongoing when the current application was made.

[20] In staying the duplicative and contrary allegations brought against the Crown, the Court noted, at paras. 39 - 40, that:

> The Crown submits that Samson's attempts to use this action to resile from one of the most fundamental propositions it has adopted in the Buffalo trial - that the Surrender is valid and gives rise to trust duties imposed on the Crown - is an abuse of process. In this court, Chevron will be required to prove a valid lease in order to succeed in its claim. This brings into issue the question of the validity of the Surrender, and the Bands have defended, in part, on the basis that the Surrender is invalid. In the Federal Court action, Samson has requested and obtained admissions from the Crown that in essence establish the validity of the Surrender.
> I agree that these are contrary positions on the same issue. In the Buffalo trial, the Crown is exposed to liability in part because of the Surrender. In this case, it is exposed because it is alleged that there is no valid Surrender.

[21] While the Court could not conclude that a decision in the Federal Court action on the issues before it would give rise to issue estoppel relating to the validity of the Surrender, it found that there was a substantial possibility that it may. In ordering a stay of proceedings, the Court concluded, at para. 60, onwards, that:

> 60. What constitutes an abuse of process may vary with the circumstances of each case. I agree with another justice of this court that abuse of process is not a closed category. Adrion v. Canada (Minister of Health) (2003) 12 Alta. L.R. 4th 154 at para. 36. The discretion given to the court under Rule 129 to determine if proceedings are vexatious is broader than a mere determination if a matter is res judicata. While this case involves simultaneous rather than sequential litigation, the comments of the Federal Court in Musqueam Indian Band v. Canada (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development), [1990] 2 F.C. 351 (T.D.) at page 380, adopting the principles expressed in Henderson v. Henderson 67 E.R. 313 at 319 on the law of res judicata, are helpful:
>
>> ... parties are expected to bring forward their whole case and should not be allowed, except in special circumstances, to perpetuate the dispute by discovering new grounds for action. As Lord Shaw stated, if this were permitted, litigation would have no end except where legal ingenuity is exhausted.

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

> I should also subscribe to later views expressed by Lord Denning in the Hunter case, by Lyon J.A. in the Solomon case and by Chief Justice McEachern in the Saskatoon Credit Union case, to the effect that whether or not a case falls into the complex issue of res judicata or issue estoppel with all of its historical refinements, it should not be allowed to proceed, if to do so, it would constitute an abuse of process. (emphasis in original)

61. In a more recent case, the British Columbia Court of Appeal considered an appeal of the decision of a chambers judge to strike certain litigation as being an abuse of process under a rule substantially similar to Rule 129: Chapman v. Canada; Westwick v. Canada [2003] B.C.J. No. 2742. This litigation involved facts similar to the facts at hand. Lengthy litigation relating to leases of land on the Musqueam Reserve had been concluded in Federal Court and was pending before the Supreme Court of Canada. This litigation was predicated on the validity of such leases. Prior to the release of a decision by the Supreme Court of Canada, new litigation was commenced in the British Columbia Superior Court that challenged the validity of the leases. The chambers judge concluded, [2001] B.C.J. No. 775, that the claims of invalidity of the leases in the new litigation were an abuse of process, stating:

> In my view, to allow these claims to stand would be an affront to the Federal Court, Trial Division, the Federal Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court of Canada. It would be tantamount to the leaseholders saying, "Well, we put you to a lot of time and effort in settling the rent issues from our leases but, even through we proceeded on the basis of the leases being valid, because no specific declaration was made as to their validity, it is now open for us to argue that all the work you did was for nothing because the leases aren't valid anyway." The issues touching on the validity of the leases were issues which could have been raised in the context of the rental litigation. They were not and now they cannot be raised. To do so would be an abuse of process.
> [...]

63. In this case, the Federal Court has not yet made a decision that may give rise to questions of res judicata or issue estoppel. However, it is clear to me from the pleadings in both courts and the evidence and position of the Bands put forward in the Buffalo trial that these questions are likely to arise when a decision is rendered. Given this and the prejudice that would be suffered by the Crown in having to pursue expensive and complicated litigation that may well be moot when a decision in the Federal Court action has been rendered, I find that it would be vexatious and an abuse of the court's process to require the duplicative and contrary allegations against the Crown to continue at this time. [emphasis added]

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

> 64. It is more appropriate to stay, rather than to strike these allegations, and I do so, with leave to the applicants to reinstate their application to strike once a decision of the Federal Court is available.

[22] In Halagan the plaintiff applied to amend his statement of defence and counterclaim. The defendant opposed the application on the grounds that, inter alia, one of the amendments was contrary to the position taken by the plaintiff in opposing the defendant's earlier application for an interlocutory injunction. In dismissing the application, the Court commented that the proposed amendments "smack of inconsistency in more ways than one. They are not merely pleading in the alternative."

[23] During the earlier interlocutory injunction hearing, the plaintiff argued that it was open for the defendant to persuade the Vancouver Stock Exchange not to release certain shares that were the subject of the dispute. However, the plaintiff subsequently attempted to plead (in the proposed amendments) that the defendant's attempts to prevent the shares from being released constituted a breach of a settlement agreement, thus entitling the plaintiff to damages.

[24] The Court commented on the nature of the proposed amendments, at para. 8:

> ...neither pleadings nor any other of the court process are a game to be played according to what appears to be a strategic advantage at the time. The court expects a party to take a position which is consistent with its evidence and to maintain that position in its dealings with the court. In other words, saying something to one judge and saying the opposite to another will not be countenanced.

[25] The Court continued, at para. 16 to state:

> However, Bullen and Leake states at page 42 that a party must not in a subsequent pleading make any allegation of fact, raise any new ground, or claim inconsistent with the previous pleading of his.

[26] In United Australia, a cheque payable to the appellants was converted in favour of a company called M.F.G. Trust Ltd. and later presented at the respondent bank. The appellants originally claimed against M.F.G. for breach of contract and later against the respondent bank for damages in conversion and in negligence. In the negligence claim the appellants asserted that the dealings of both M.F.G. and the bank, amongst others, had also been negligent. The bank argued that the appellants were unable to waive a claim in tort as against M.F.G. in earlier litigation and then later sue in tort. The original action against M.F.G. had been stayed.

[27] The House of Lords found that the appellant was able to pursue the bank. Of note, Lord Atkin declared, at p. 30 that:

> ...if a man is entitled to one of two inconsistent rights it is fitting that when with full knowledge he has done an unequivocal act showing that he has chosen the one he cannot afterwards pursue the other, which after the first choice is by reason of the inconsistency no longer his to chose...To those cases the statement of Lord Blackburn in Scarf v. Jardine applies "where a man has an option to choose one or other of two inconsistent things when once he has made his election it cannot be retracted." In a later passage Lord Blackburn speaks of a man choosing between two remedies: but it is plain that he is speaking of remedies in respect of the inconsistent things as stated above...[footnotes omitted]

[28] In Vanmills, the defendant brought an application for an order striking the plaintiffs' statement of claim on the grounds that the claim amounted to an abuse of process. The defendant argued that the plaintiffs were barred from bringing the current action based upon a prior election to pursue an inconsistent right in another action. In an earlier action, one of the plaintiffs had initially sued another defendant (Sigurdson) alleging in part that due to Sigurdson's negligence, he was forced to dispose of both the legal and beneficial interest of certain shares. In the current action against Coles, the plaintiffs plead that the beneficial interest in the shares were never disposed of.

[29] The Court reviewed the distinction between an election between inconsistent rights and an election between alternative remedies. In granting the defendant's application, it held that the Plaintiff was unable to claim in one instance that it had lost the beneficial interest in the shares, and in a second interest that the beneficial interest had been maintained. The plaintiff's election was held to be binding.

[30] Based upon the above authorities, the Applicants submit that once a party files an action or proceeding where a given factual or legal position is made, this constitutes an irrevocable election. The Applicants argue that taking an inconsistent factual or legal position in separate proceedings constitutes an abuse of process of the court. They argue that it is therefore not open for the Respondent to claim to have lost a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn in one action and subsequently claim a 100% interest in the same property in the current action.

[31] In particular, the Applicants argue that in claiming a loss of a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn in the Bad Faith Action, the Respondent explicitly admitted that the Joint Venture was created. Thus, the Respondent is precluded from now arguing that the Joint Venture was merely created "on paper" and that it has a full interest in the Pointe Inn. The Applicants claim that the Respondent is abusing the process of this Court by willfully and dishonestly adopting intrinsically inconsistent factual positions on a subject matter on which it knows the truth.

[32] The Applicants also argue that because the Joint Venture was, in fact, a fraud on the part of the Respondent, commencing an action for the purpose of enforcing a fraud is, in itself, an abuse of process of this Court.

ii. The Respondent's position

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

[33] The Respondent opposes the application for an order dismissing its statement of claim under Rule 129(d) on two grounds. The Respondent claims that the pleadings in question are not in irreconcilable conflict. It also claims that, in any event, inconsistent pleadings of fact do not constitute an abuse of process. Rather, it submits that prior pleadings of fact are evidence to be weighed at trial.

[34] The Respondent's first argument is that it unclear as to whether the pleadings in the current action necessarily conflict with pleadings in the Bad Faith Action. The Respondent submits that when the Bad Faith pleading was made, the Respondent had in fact lost a one-half interest in the Pointe Inn. Thus, the pleadings may not be inconsistent given the alleged change in circumstances whereby the Respondent now claims to hold a full interest in the property.

[35] Second, the Respondent argues that the Applicants misinterpreted the law respecting inconsistent pleadings. It relies, in particular, on Scarf v. Jardine (1882), 7 App. Cas. 345 (H.L.) and National Bank Financial Ltd. v. Potter, 2005 NSSC 8, 231 N.S.R. (2d) 14, appeal dismissed: 2005 NSCA 139, 238 N.S.R. (2d) 237 (Mahoney v. National Bank Financial Ltd.).

[36] In Scarf the House of Lords held that a litigant had a cause of action against either a former or a current partnership for an unpaid account, but not against both. The Respondent stresses the fact that the House of Lords spoke of a litigant's election of rights, as opposed to an election of facts.

[37] In Potter, three plaintiffs brought actions against the bank in three separate actions. In defence of one of the claims, the bank denied any knowledge of an alleged market manipulation scheme. In subsequent pleadings in another action the bank alleged that there was in fact a market manipulation scheme. The plaintiffs brought a motion to strike portions of the bank's defence on the ground that the bank had filed inconsistent pleadings under Rule 14.25(1) of the Nova Scotia Civil Procedure Rules (similar to our Rule 129). In dismissing the motion to strike, the Court drew a distinction between inconsistent rights versus inconsistent allegations, holding, at paras. 23 - 24:

> ... I understand Lord Aiken (sic) in United Australia v. Barclays Bank Ltd. to reasonably envisage a situation where a party may not know what the facts are so as to make a choice as to the rights it may pursue. He said at page 30:
> > ... if a man is entitled to one of two inconsistent rights, it is fitting that, when, with full knowledge, he has done an unequivocal act showing he has chosen the one, he cannot afterwards pursue the other, which, after the first choice, is by reason of the inconsistency no longer his to choose.
>
> 24 In the present case [the bank] is not choosing as between two inconsistent rights but rather is asserting that one of two possible factual situations exist. [The bank] says at this point, and perhaps not until the Court decides what occurred,

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

> does [the bank] have full knowledge of the factual situation so as to enable it to assert its rights with certainty.

[38] The Court concluded that on the facts, the bank was simply pleading facts in the alternative. The Nova Scotia Court of Appeal agreed, confirming at para. 18 that the various positions put forth by the bank amounted to nothing more than a pleading in the alternative: 2005 NSCA 139, 238 N.S.R. (2d) 327.

[39] The Respondent submits that the Applicants' misinterpreted and overstated the court's finding in Vanmills. The Respondent argues that the relevant principle in this case concerns the election of inconsistent rights, as opposed to the pleading of inconsistent facts, as put forth by the Applicants. The Respondent makes a similar argument with respect to the decision in United Australia, stressing that Lord Atkin highlighted the distinction between inconsistent rights and inconsistent allegations. The Respondent argues that it at no time made any inconsistent allegation of rights as between the Bad Faith Action and the current proceedings. As such, it takes the position that it is not precluded from claiming a 100% interest in the Pointe Inn in its' Amended Statement of Claim.

[40] Rather, the Respondent argues that prior pleadings of fact simply constitute evidence to be weighed at trial: Caviglia v. Tenorio (1992), 71 B.C.L.R. (2d) 255 (B.C.S.C.); and Gerling Global General Insurance Co. v. Canadian Occidental Petroleum Ltd., 1998 ABQB 714, 230 A.R. 39.

[41] In addition, the Respondent points out that the Bad Faith Action was never pursued beyond serving of the Notices to Produce and that prior to any document production or examinations for discovery, it was informally stayed pending the determination of the Coverage Action. As noted above, the Coverage Action was settled in 1998 for $ 2.1 million dollars. The Bad Faith Action was discontinued without costs at the same time. The Respondent asserts that no monies were paid in respect of its claim for a loss of one-half of the interest in the Pointe Inn under the Bad Faith Claim.

iii. Findings

[42] The Applicants submit that the correct test on a Rule 129(1)(d) application is whether it is "plain and obvious" that the underlying action is an abuse of process: see Brewers Distributors Ltd. v. 1145127 Alberta Ltd., 2007 ABQB 493. Brewers Distributors dealt with whether the plaintiff's claim was an abuse of process due to issue estoppel or because it otherwise amounted to a collateral attack.

[43] The Respondent submits that a party moving to have pleadings stuck under Rule 129 bears a heavy burden, and that the claim advanced must "be hopeless to be struck out"; see Roasting v. Lee (1998), 222 A.R. 234 (M.C.). Roasting dealt with an application to strike a statement of claim as disclosing no cause of action under Rule 129(1)(a).

[44] I agree that an applicant who alleges that certain pleadings constitute an abuse of process bears a heavy burden. I also agree with the Court's comments in Brewers Distributors that it must be plain and obvious that the claim amounts to an abuse of process of the court before it can be struck. Our Court of Appeal has confirmed that the onus on a party seeking to strike a claim under Rule 129(d) is "high": Manson v. Canada (Department of Justice), 2006 ABCA 212, 401 A.R. 26, at para. 8.

[45] The Ontario Court of Appeal recently commented on the test for abuse of process in Niagara North Condominium Corp. No. 125 v. Waddington, 2007 ONCA 184, which dealt with re-litigation of an identical claim that had been previously dismissed. In discussing the abuse of process doctrine, the Court commented as follows, at para. 21:

> The application judge did not articulate a test for abuse of process. Abuse of process is a doctrine designed to provide a remedy in a variety of situations including a remedy for the unfairness of relitigating the same issue against the same party in circumstances where issue estoppel does not apply. Abuse of process is essentially a fairness doctrine.

[46] I agree with the Ontario Court of Appeal that "abuse of process is essentially a fairness doctrine". The Court must also ask itself whether, in the circumstances, it would be fair to allow the action in question to proceed.

[47] In Toronto (City) v. Canadian Union of Public Employees (C.U.P.E.), Local 79, [2003] 3 S.C.R. 77, the Supreme Court addressed relitigation of a criminal conviction in a civil forum. In discussing abuse of process, Arbour J., for the majority, stated at para. 37 that the doctrine engages, "the inherent power of the court to prevent the misuse of its procedure, in a way that would ... bring the administration of justice into disrepute". She went on to state that the courts have applied the doctrine of abuse of process where allowing the litigation to proceed would "violate such principles as judicial economy, consistency, finality and the integrity of the administration of justice."

[48] Keeping the burden of proof faced by the Applicants in mind, I turn now to the merits of the parties' arguments.

[49] In general, I am persuaded that a party is not free to deliberately argue diametrically inconsistent facts in various actions, thus knowingly advancing irreconcilable positions which are not articulated as alternative claims. Whether this pronouncement has any application to the facts of this case remains to be determined.

[50] I draw a particular parallel between this application and the application made in the Vanmills case. The Respondent argues quite forcefully that the relevant principle in Vanmills pertains to the election of inconsistent rights as opposed to the pleading of inconsistent facts. It submits that only once a party has chosen to invoke one right over an alternative inconsistent right, is it bound by any election. The Respondent asserts that it has merely put forward inconsistent facts, as opposed to rights and that inconsistent facts are a matter of evidence.

[51] While it is true that the Court in Vanmills spoke of the limitations surrounding an election of rights, it did so in a very broad sense, stating, at para. 10:

> This is not a matter of a litigant pursuing inconsistent remedies, where no election is necessary until judgment. There can be no doubt that in the instant action Crux is attempting to pursue inconsistent rights. Crux elected in his action against Sigurdson to claim that he had disposed of his legal and beneficial interest in the C.I.S. shares to Coles. Having elected to sue Sigurdson on that basis, I find that Crux cannot now sue Coles in the instant action on the basis that he retained a beneficial interest in the C.I.S. shares. In my opinion, his election in his action against Sigurdson is binding upon him. The principle that, in the case of inconsistent rights, a plaintiff's irrevocable and unequivocal election is deemed to be made by the commencement of an initial action is established in Scarf v. Jardine (1882), 7 H.L. (E.) 345 and Ashmore v. Bank of B.N.A. (1913), 13 D.L.R. 73 (B.C.C.A.).

[52] Using this broad concept of rights, can it not be said that 247 elected in its action against its insurers (the Bad Faith Action) to claim that it was forced to dispose of a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn, and, having elected to sue on this basis, cannot now sue the Applicants on the basis that it actually retained a 100% interest in the subject property? Such an analysis is consistent with the concept of election of rights, as articulated in Vanmills. Clearly 247 is not merely electing between inconsistent remedies, as discussed in United Australia.

[53] I am in agreement with the Court's finding in Chevron that in certain circumstances, taking contrary positions on the same issue in separate proceedings may constitute an abuse of process and that "what constitutes an abuse of process may vary with the circumstances of each case": para. 60.

[54] Notwithstanding the Respondent's submission that the above cases do not deal with inconsistent allegations of fact, I find the dicta therein to be of general relevance to the issue before me. Moreover, although the Respondent provided this Court with authorities where inconsistent factual pleadings were allowed, these authorities can be distinguished on the facts.

[55] In Potter, the Court allowed a party's inconsistent pleadings to stand. However, the Court went on to state that although the defendant bank had plead inconsistent facts in separate statements of defence, it appeared as though the bank had merely plead such inconsistent facts in the alternative. More importantly, in allowing the inconsistent pleadings, the Court specifically held, at para. 28, that:

> I am not convinced that this point that [the defendant bank] has "full knowledge" so as to know what the true situation was in relation to KHI shares and the alleged > stock manipulation. If a party does not have full knowledge of the circumstances they should not be barred from setting up alternative pleadings.

[56] Indeed, on appeal the Court of Appeal confirmed, at para. 21:

> ... It seemed to be [counsel's] submission that where a party has strong evidence of one position, that party may not plead another position in the alternative. We do not agree. The authorities cited by him do not support his contention and we are aware of no authority that does. There is, of course, ample authority for the proposition that a party may not plead that which it knows to be false, or a sham or wholly fictitious: W.B. Williston, Q.C. and R.J. Rolls, The Law of Civil Procedure, supra at p. 665; Brailsford v. Tobie, [1888] 10 ALT 194 ; J.C. Decaux Pty. Ltd. v. Adshed Street Furniture Pty Ltd. 178 A.L.R. 339 (F.C.A.).

[57] Given the nature of the underlying action, there is nothing to suggest that in the pleadings before me, 247 had anything other than "full knowledge" as to whether it was forced to part with a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn. Clearly 247 would know if it transferred a half interest in the property to Mystar or if it did not. This is not a case where a party should be allowed to plead inconsistent facts based upon imperfect knowledge. The Respondent cannot rely on Potter to avoid a claim of abuse of process.

[58] Nor can it rely on Caviglia or Gerling Global. In Caviglia, two causes of action were brought against the defendant driver. The defendant's insurer assumed conduct of both actions. The defendant denied liability in the first action but admitted liability in the second action. The plaintiff in the first action brought an application for summary judgment. The Court held that the admission of liability made in a pleading in one action was admissible against that defendant in the other action.

[59] In Gerling Global, an action was commenced in both Alberta and in the United States. The issue was whether certain admissions made in the American action in a statement of uncontested material facts were admissible in evidence in the current application for summary judgment as to the proper law for the policy of insurance. The Alberta Court found that the prior admissions were admissible and granted summary judgment on the issue of forum. The question of issue estoppel pertained directly to the findings of the American Judge, and not to inconsistencies contained in the statement of uncontested material facts.

[60] Although both Caviglia and Gerling Global confirm that prior pleadings may be evidence to be weighed at trial, neither deals with the consequences of inconsistent pleadings in an application to strike the same as an abuse of process. I do not read either case as stating that when faced with an inconsistent pleading, a party does not have the option of bringing an application to strike the pleading, but is instead limited to entering the pleading as evidence to be used in the subsequent hearing.

[61] Finally, I not agree with the Respondent's assertion that the effect of an inconsistent pleading must be somehow "discounted" if the action in which it is plead is not pursued to judgment. The Respondent submits that the loss of the 50% interest claimed in the Bad Faith Claim was not pursued past service of the Notice to Produce and that the claim was subsequently discontinued. The Respondent submits that it therefore made no use of the Court's process to recover this amount. As such, the Respondent submits that it did not obtain any "benefit" on account of these pleadings. In so claiming, it also asserts that it did not use the allegations in the Bad Faith Action to obtain a more favourable settlement in the Coverage Action.

[62] The doctrine of abuse of process assists in promoting the "integrity of the administration of justice". On the facts before me, 247, with full knowledge of the facts, should not be able to advance a claim that is diametrically opposed to its earlier position. In these circumstances, the integrity of the justice system would be no less compromised simply because the initial claim was not followed though to judgment.

[63] This does not mean, as the Respondent suggests, that a factual pleading will forever and irrevocably bind a party in all subsequent pleadings. Rather, it means that, if a party, with full knowledge of the facts (thus distinguishing itself from a Potter scenario) chooses to argue irreconcilable facts in its pleadings, and where such pleadings are clearly not made in the alternative, allowing such a party to continue pursuing an incompatible claim may constitute an abuse of process.

[64] Of course, my above conclusion obviously presupposes that the pleadings are, in fact, inconsistent. A review of the Amended Statement of Claim in the present action and the Statement of Claim in the Bad Faith Action does not necessarily show that the positions taken in each are "diametrically inconsistent".

[65] It is clear that in the Bad Faith Action, the Respondent asserted that it had lost a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn. However, in the current action it is unclear as to whether 247 is asserting that is somehow lost and yet retained a 50% interest in the property or if it is stating that it was initially forced to transfer a half interest to Mystar because of its financial circumstances and it is now claiming this interest back, having paid the agreed fee. The former would be an inconsistent position whereas the latter would not. Of note, the Joint Venture agreement was an oral agreement and its terms have never been reduced to writing.

[66] The Applicants submit the Joint Venture agreement was not a "true" joint venture. During his examination for discovery Samuel Plucer supported this submission, advising that the arrangement between Mystar and 247 was not a joint venture in the "true sense of a joint venture". Rather, he stated that the arrangement was portrayed as a joint venture for the purposes of facilitating financing for the purchase of the Pointe Inn. However, he went on to state that as a part of the arrangement, title to the property would be held in both names.

[67] At paragraph 18 of its written submissions, the Applicants argue that:

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

> In the [Bad Faith] Action, 247 sought damages for the loss of a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn Hotel and therefore explicitly recognized and admitted, for the purposes of seeking damages, that a joint venture was created as a result of the conduct of the defendants in the [Bad Faith] Action and that it therefore lost a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn. Having formally taken that factual position, 247 should not be permitted in this action to assert that it never lost that interest or that, instead, it merely obligated itself to pay a $1,000,000 fee to Mr. Chambers.

[68] A review of the Bad Faith Action reveals that 247 makes no allegation in its Statement of Claim that it ever entered into a joint venture ("true" or otherwise). Rather, the Statement of Claim merely pleads that because of the insurers' conduct, 247 lost "a one-half interest in the Pointe Inn Hotel". Consequently, I find that there is no clear inconsistency between the pleadings in the Bad Faith Action and the current pleadings as they pertain to the Joint Venture agreement.

[69] The Applicants argue that because the Joint Venture arrangement was, in essence, a "sham", the positions advanced by the Respondent must therefore be inconsistent. As stated above, this is not necessarily so. While it may be that 247 has asserted the existence of the Joint Venture agreement under which it transferred a 50% interested in the Pointe Inn and then later acknowledged that the Joint Venture agreement was not "true" and that it has always therefore been the owner of an undivided interest in the property, it may also be that 247 is asserting that notwithstanding the actual nature of the Joint Venture agreement, at the end of the day it transferred a 50% interest in the property to Mystar, and now, having repaid Chambers, it wants that interest back. Again, the former would be inconsistent whereas the latter would not.

[70] There is some evidence as to the latter position. I note that in his Affidavit of June 6, 2007, Samuel Plucer deposes as follows, at paras. 3- 4:

> The Defendant/Plaintiff by Counterclaim Mystar Holdings Ltd. ("Mystar") was previously on the title of the Property with 247. Mystar was on title following an agreement (the "Agreement) that I made on or about January 28, 1993 on behalf of 247 with Martin Chambers...
>
> The Agreement provided that in consideration for Martin Chambers' assistance in helping to restructure and secure financing for 247, 247 would pay Martin Chambers the sum of one million dollars, which payments would be made through Mystar. I further agreed to transfer a one-half interest in the Property to Mystar, in order to assist in the securing of financing for the Property; and to provide security for the unpaid fee of one million dollars. A "Joint Venture" was set up on the instructions of martin Chambers, and the one million dollars was to be paid to Martin Chambers through draws by Mystar. Martin Chambers agreed on behalf of Mystar to convey Mystar's registered interest in the property back to 247 following payment of the one million dollar fee. [emphasis added]

[71] As discussed, the Applicants must show that it is "plain and obvious" that the underlying action is an abuse of process. They bear a heavy burden, or a "high" onus in doing so. While I have found that in the circumstances an inconsistent factual pleading may amount to an abuse of process, I do not find that it is "plain and obvious" that the Respondent's pleadings are clearly diametrically opposed. I do not read the current Amended Statement of Claim as asserting that 247 never lost a 50% interest in the property. Thus, I cannot grant the Applicants an order under Rule 129(d) to dismiss the Respondents's claim as an abuse of process based upon irreconcilable pleadings.

[72] The Applicants have also claimed that it would be an abuse process for the Respondent to commence an action for the purpose of enforcing the Joint Venture agreement, as the agreement is fraudulent. I shall deal with the allegations of fraud below, in addressing the Applicants' submissions under Rule 159. For the reasons given below, I cannot grant the Applicants an order under Rule 129(d) to dismiss the Respondents's claim as an abuse of process based upon a fraudulent agreement.

b. Is there a genuine issue for trial?

[73] The Applicants have requested, in the alternative, that this Court order summary dismissal of the Respondent's claims on the grounds that there is no genuine issue for trial and the Respondent's claims are therefore bound to fail. They rely on Rule 159 which states in part:

> (2) A defendant may, after delivering a statement of defence, on the ground that there is no merit to a claim or part of a claim or that the only genuine issue is as to amount, apply to the court for a judgment on an affidavit sworn by him or some other person who can swear positively to the facts, stating that there is no merit to the whole or part of the claim or that the only genuine issue is as to amount and that the deponent knows of no facts that would substantiate the claim or any part of it.
> (3) On hearing the motion, if the court is satisfied that there is no genuine issue for trial with respect to any claim, the court may give summary judgment against the plaintiff or a defendant.

i. The Applicants' position

[74] The Applicants argue that the Joint Venture agreement is a "sham" and a "fraud". They submit that because the courts will not enforce an agreement that has been tainted with illegality or immorality the Respondents' claim is bound to fail. Thus, they submit that the claim should be struck under Rule 159.

[75] The Applicants claim that 247 structured the arrangement with Mystar to appear as a joint venture agreement for the purpose of defrauding third party lenders. They allege that 247 engaged in a course of conduct intended to give the false impression that it had a 50% partner (Mystar) in order to obtain replacement financing following the fire at the 17th Avenue Inn. In support of this claim they point to the fact that 247 has consistently represented on its tax returns that it had a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn as a joint venture.

[76] The Applicants submit that the Respondent is attempting to have this Court enforce an alleged agreement to commit fraud upon third party lenders in that it intended to give such lenders a false impression that it had a joint venture partner when it in fact had none, and had merely obligated itself to pay a fee to Chambers through Mystar. They claim that because 247 agreed to transfer a 50% interest for a fraudulent purpose, it cannot seek the assistance of this Court to enforce any obligation on the part of Mystar to return this interest.

[77] The Applicants rely on the principle of ex turpi causa, or, out of fraud no action arises. In arguing this principle they rely, inter alia, on Singh v. Ali, [1960] A.C. 167 (P.C.) and McDonald v. Fellows (1979), 105 D.L.R. (3d) 434 (A.B.C.A.).

[78] The Court in McDonald, in addressing whether a contract offended the Lord's Day Act and was therefore illegal, expressed this principle as follows, starting at para. 20:

> The first result which flows from this illegality is that neither party has any obligation to perform the purported agreement. The contract, void at its inception, is considered in law never to have been made at all. The principle is stated in Cheshire & Fifoot's Law of Contract (8th Ed.) at page 339:
>
> > "The general principle, founded on public policy, is that any transaction that is tainted by illegality in which both parties are equally involved is beyond the pale of the law. No person can claim any right or remedy whatsoever under an illegal transaction in which he has participated. Ex turpi causa nonoritur actio. The court is bound to veto the enforcement of a contract once it knows that it is illegal, whether the knowledge comes from the statement of the guilty party or from outside sources. Even the defendant can successfully plead the turpis causa ..."
>
> Subject to some exceptions, to which I shall make reference, neither party may recover from the other anything paid or transferred if in order to succeed he must base his claim upon the illegality or necessarily be bound to disclose the illegality in proving it.[emphasis added]

[79] While the Applicants acknowledged that a number of exceptions to this principle exist, they submit that no such exceptions are applicable in this case. They submit that any gains or losses resulting from an illegal contract must remain where they have fallen, which in this case, is with Mystar/106.

[80] The Applicants claim that only the Respondent committed fraud in that it was the Respondent who represented the existence of the Joint Venture to lenders, mortgage brokers, accountants and the government though various financial statements and documents. For their part, the Applicants take the position, both in their Statement of Defence and more concisely, at para. 28 of their reply brief that:

> It is necessary to note that Mysar/106 denies the existence of any fraud. In particular, Mystar/106 deny that the Pointe Inn Joint Venture is a fraud or a sham designed to give 247's prospective lenders the false impression that 247 had a partner in the ownership of the Pointe Inn Hotel.

ii. The Respondent's position

[81] The Respondent admits that it has represented to the world at large that it operated a joint venture in respect of the Pointe Inn. Samuel Plucer, for the Respondent, has also stated during his examination for discovery that the agreement between 247 and Mystar was not a joint venture "in the true sense of a joint venture". The Respondent admits that the arrangement between the parties was set up to look like a joint venture in order to "disguise the ability to raise long term financing". I note that 247 further submits that one half of the legal title was transferred to Mystar in order to secure a $1 million dollar fee payable to Mystar for its role in arranging financing.

[82] The Respondent's primary argument is that the Joint Venture agreement is neither illegal or fraudulent. It submits that there is nothing illegal in an agreement to transfer a half interest in real property until such time as a consulting fee is paid. Moreover, it submits that none of its lenders have claimed to have been defrauded and that there is no evidence whatsoever that any fraudulent intent with respect to third party lenders was carried through nor that any lender was defrauded or misled.

[83] In the alternative, the Respondent submits that even if the agreement with Mystar is fraudulent, the Court is not required to dismiss its claim. It asserts that there is no absolute rule against the enforcement of any contract touched by illegality. Rather, it submits that in cases involving the enforcement of an illegal contract the closeness of the connection between the illegality and the contract in question must be considered.

[84] In support of the above proposition, the Respondent relies in part on Furmston, Cheshire and Fifoot's Law of Contract, 14th ed. (London: Butterworths, 2001) at 429:

> Neither party can recover what he has given to the other under an illegal contract if in order to substantiate his claim he is driven to disclose the illegality.
> ...
> The result is that gains and losses remain where they have accrued or fallen. If, for instance, a scheme to defraud X, concocted by A and B, succeeds, and the money is obtained by B, no action for an account or recovery lies at the suit of A...[emphasis added]

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

And at 430:

> A Plaintiff may, however, recover money, chattels or land transferred under an illegal contract to the defendant, if he can frame a cause of action entirely independent of the contract, for in these circumstances he is not compelled to disclose the illegality.

[85] The Respondent also relies upon Tinsley v. Milligan, [1994] 1 A.C. 340 (H.L.). In Tinsley the plaintiff and defendant purchased a lodging house together and registered it under the plaintiff's name alone so that the defendant could perpetuate social security insurance fraud. They ran the lodging house together as a joint venture until such time as they split up. The plaintiff then made a claim for the whole of the property as it was registered in her name alone, arguing that the defendant was unable to claim any interest as the agreement between the parties to place the property in one name alone was made in order to defraud the social security department. The defendant claimed that the plaintiff held the property in equal shares, in trust.

[86] The majority of the House of Lords held that the defendants' equitable claim did not depend upon the fraud practised on the social secuity department. Rather, it depended only on the presumption of a resulting trust arising from the relationship between the parties and the fact that the defendant contributed to the purchase price. There was no presumption of advancement. The minority view of the House was to "let the estate fall where it lies."

[87] In discussing the effect of illegality of contract on the defendant's claim, Lord Jauncey enunciated three propositions, at 366:

> First, it is trite law that the court will not give its assistance to the enforcement of executory provisions of an unlawful contract whether the illegality is apparent ex facie the document or whether the illegality of purpose of what would otherwise be a lawful contract emerges during the course of the trial...
>
> Second, it is well established that a party is not entitled to rely on his own fraud or illegality in order to assist a claim or rebut a presumption. Thus when money or property has been transferred by a man to his wife or children for the purpose of defrauding creditors and the transferee resists his claim for recovery he cannot be heard to rely on his illegal purpose in order to rebut the presumption of advancement...
>
> Third, it has, however, for some years been recognised that a completely executed transfer of property or of an interest in property made in pursuance of an unlawful agreement is valid and the court will assist the transferee in the protection of his interest provided that he does not require to found on the unlawful agreement...

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

[88] Lord Browne-Wilkinson confirmed the above, holding, at 376 that a claimant "is entitled to recover if he is not forced to plead or rely on the illegality, even if it emerges that the title on which he relied was acquired in the course of carrying through an illegal transaction."

[89] The Respondent argues that as per Tinsley, it is able to assert its right to the Pointe Inn as it does not have to rely on any illegality in order to substantiate its claim against the Applicants. It submits that proof of the agreement as alleged in no way depends on leading evidence concerning any illegal or fraudulent intention regarding its ability to obtain financing.

[90] In addition, the Respondent asserts that there must be a weighing of both the nature of the wrongful act and the nature of the right asserted: Oldfield v. Transamerica Life Insurance Co. of Canada, 2002 SCC 22, [2002] 1 S.C.R. 742. It also asserts that there is an insufficient causal link between the participation in a fraudulent act vis-a-vis potential third party lenders and the breach of contract it has alleged: Canada Cement LaFarge Ltd. v. B.C. Lightweight Aggregate Ltd., [1983] 1 S.C.R. 452.

[91] Alternatively, the Respondent argues that even if the agreement between itself and Mystar is sufficiently tainted by illegality or fraud, it would be improper for the Applicants to benefit from the transaction, as they were fully aware of the true nature of the Joint Venture. The Respondent submits that the facts in this case should make it an exception to the ex turpi cause rule. In so arguing it relies on Lapointe v. Messier (1914), 49 S.C.R. 271.

iii. Findings

[92] Before ruling on the Rule 159 application, I wish to address an evidentiary issue raised by the parties. The parties appeared before me in November of 2008 to argue whether I should admit additional evidence on behalf of the Applicants. The evidence in question is contained in the affidavit of Qing Zhang, a director of 106 and a shareholder of Mystar. It contains a series of letters (most notably the letter of July 14, 2008) addressing the loan agreement between Montreal Trust, 247 and Mystar.

[93] The Applicants submit that the letter in question rebuts the Respondent's argument that there is no evidence of any harm done to a third party lender as a result of any alleged fraudulent conduct.

[94] The test for adducing additional evidence after a hearing was recently set out by this Court in Stone Sapphire Ltd. v. Transglobal Communications Group Inc., 2008 ABQB 142, 431 A.R. 240, which dealt with an application to introduce new evidence following an order on a summary judgment motion. There the Court described the test as follows, at paras. 37-38:

> The test in Alberta on an application such as this requires the original trier of fact to review the evidence tendered and the circumstances, and to exercise his or her discretion as to its admissibility on the motion.

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

> Only he or she can fairly judge whether the evidence should be considered, and whether it may have an effect or impact on the previously-rendered decision.

The Court went on to state, at para. 40, that:

> The jurisdiction for a chambers judge or a trial judge to hear further submissions or receive further evidence after the hearing, and even after the issuance of the decision, but before the entry of the formal Order of Judgment, is very broad. It is accurately described as being "unfettered", although cautions are placed on that width to avoid an abuse of the Court's processes but in any event to avoid a miscarriage of justice.

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

[95] I have reviewed Zhang's affidavit and I do not find that the letters contained therein will have any effect or impact on my decision. The letters were authored after the May 2008 hearing and thus constitute evidence that was unavailable to the parties when the matter was heard. However, this is not an instance where refusing to accept the new evidence would result in a miscarriage of justice.

[96] A review of the letters simply reveals that from the Lender's point of view, the question of whether 247 misrepresented its interest in the Pointe Inn remains in dispute. Nor does the correspondence allege any fraud or injury. Rather, the letter states that "the Sub-Servicer and the Lender are unable to come to any conclusions with respect to the allegations contained in the pleadings and the truth and accuracy of the representations and warranties".

[97] In the letter, the Lender states that:

> Should the relationship between 247 and Mystar be materially different than as represented to the Lender at the time the Loan Documents and Loan were put in place, the Lender reserves the right to characterize the misrepresentations as a separate "Event of Default". [emphasis added]

[98] The above confirms that the Lender is taking no position as to the nature of the Joint Venture agreement and is merely reserving its right to take any necessary steps under the loan agreement to protect its position. Thus, the letters contained in Zhang's affidavit do not assist the Applicants in proving that there is no genuine issue for trial.

[99] I now address whether or not the Applicants have met the burden for summary judgment. As mentioned, the test to be applied in a summary judgement application is whether or not there is a genuine issue for trial. The court must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that no such issue or point of law exists in order to grant judgement: Allied Signal Inc. v. Dome Petroleum Ltd. (1991), 122 A.R. 321 (Q.B.) reversed on other grounds (1992), 131 A.R. 134 (C.A.). Similar wording was used by the Supreme Court of Canada in Papachase Indian Band No. 136 v. Canada (Attorney General), 2008 SCC 14, 292 D.L.R. (4th) 49, where it held that an applicant must demonstrate that there is "no genuine issue of material fact requiring trial". There is no onus on the Respondent to prove a genuine issue for trial: Murphy Oil. Co. v. Predator Corp., 2004 ABQB 688, 365 A.R. 326.

[100] The bar for an applicant seeking summary judgment is high. As our Court of Appeal in Diegel v. Diegel, 2008 ABCA 389 recently confirmed, at para. 2: "a motion for summary judgment has a rigorous test to justify for excluding a trial of issues of fact". The Court continued, at para. 18 to state:

> ...summary judgment has a high standard of proof because to succeed an applicant must show that it is "plain and obvious" or "beyond doubt" that the action will succeed or not succeed as the case may be.

[101] Similar wording was used by the Court of Appeal in Steele (Next Friend of) v. Burgos, 2008 ABCA 321, 437 A.R. 295, at para. 11:

> The test on a r. 159(2) application for summary judgment is a high standard as an applicant to succeed must show it is "plain and obvious" or "beyond doubt" that the action will not succeed. If a chambers judge must assess and weigh the evidence to arrive at summary judgment, the test has not been met...

[102] See also Strategy Summit Ltd. v. Remington Development Corp, 2009 ABCA 30, where the Court of Appeal reiterated the test that there must be "no genuine issue for trial".

[103] In the current application the Applicants have argued that there is no genuine issue for trial due to the fact that the Joint Venture agreement was entered into for the purpose of defrauding lenders. They state that given the nature of the agreement this Court is unable to grant the Respondent the relief it seeks based on the principle of ex turpi causa.

[104] As such, in order for the Applicants' to be successful, they must show that the Joint Venture agreement is indeed illegal or fraudulent and that the Respondent is therefore precluded from relying upon the same to support its claim.

[105] In Noethe v. Noethe, [2002] O.J. No. 1513, the Ontario Superior Court of Justice held, at para. 23 that: "a party has a high onus to meet to prove fraud. For a court to grant summary judgment based on allegations of fraud, the evidence of fraud would need to be unequivocal."

[106] I do not find that the Applicants have led unequivocal evidence of fraud. It is difficult to find unequivocal evidence of fraud when the Applicants themselves take the position that the Joint Venture is a genuine legitimate agreement and is in no way a fraud or a sham. The Applicants are not free to argue that the Joint Venture is a fraud and is therefore unenforceable by the courts and in the same breath assert that they deny the existence of any fraud and are therefore properly in possession of a 50% interest in the Pointe Inn. This inconsistency begs the question as to whether the Applicants are alleging illegality so as to avoid their obligations under what they say is a valid contract. The very fact that the Applicants assert an inconsistent position indicates that there may be a genuine issue for trial.

[107] The Applicants submit, at para. 50 of their brief, that in seeking the relief requested in its Amended Statement of Claim, the Respondent plead that the Joint Venture is a fraud. While the Respondent clearly agrees that the Joint Venture was not a "true" joint venture as that term is generally understood, I cannot read its Amended Statement of Claim as pleading fraud. Rather, at para. 9 of the Amended Statement of Claim 247 alleges that:

> ...at Chambers' suggestion, Mystar would be part of a Joint Venture on paper, and would hold half of the title to the Property. Mystar would receive the payments for Chamber's consulting services which would be structured as draws on the Joint Venture....when Chambers was completely paid for his consulting services, he was to sign title to the Property back to 247, and the "Joint Venture" would be at an end.

[108] While this wording signifies an understanding that the agreement between Mystar and 247 was something other than a joint venture, it does not state, nor clearly imply, that the agreement was fraudulent. Therefore the Applicants are unable to rely on an admission of fraud in claiming that "no genuine issue for trial exists". The Applicants have failed to show that it is "plain and obvious" or "beyond doubt" that the action will not succeed based on allegations that the Joint Venture is fraudulent, illegal or somehow tainted with immorality.

[109] Even if there was unequivocal evidence of fraud, it may be that the Respondent can establish its interest in the property without founding the same on the unlawful agreement. The Respondent asserts that one half of the legal title to the Pointe Inn was transferred to Mystar in order to secure a $1 million dollar fee payable to Mystar for its role in arranging financing. If the Respondent is able to successfully argue that it is entitled to a 100% interest in the property based solely on the assertion that Mystar was not only placed on title to "disguise the ability to raise long term financing" but also to provide security for the fee payable to Chambers, it may be able to bring itself under the Tinsley exception. If the Respondent can argue its case without relying on any underlying illegality (example, Mystar was put on title in order to secure Chamber's fee, as opposed to Mystar was put on title in order to deceive lenders) it may have an opportunity to advance its claim.

[110] Given my above findings, it is unnecessary to deal with the Respondent's argument that public or "foundational" interests should prevent the half interest in the property from laying with the Applicants.

[111] As it stands, the Applicants have failed to discharge their burden of showing that no genuine trial exists. The motion for summary judgment based upon the illegality of the Joint Venture is dismissed.

2009 ABQB 480 (CanLII)

[112] The Applicants have also argued that the Respondent's claim for set-off is bound to fail and that they are therefore entitled to summary judgment for this portion of the claim. Specifically, the Applicants claim that the "services agreements" which form the basis of the set-off claim were either never entered into or are barred under the Limitations Act, R.S.A. 2000, c. L-12.

[113] The Respondent admitted that a number of its set-off claims were 'hopeless' and brought an application to amend its Amended Statement of Claim in this regard by removing paragraph 15 and amending paragraph 17. Thus, I need not deal with any aspects of the set-off claim contained in these paragraphs. The only remaining amount relates to a claim made for the provision of a manager at the Northwoods Inn. The manager in question was provided between 1988 - 1989. The Respondent submits that it is not caught under the Limitations Act as it had no reason to believe that payment for Samuel Plucer's services was not forthcoming and that, furthermore, Mystar (through Chambers) continued to acknowledge the debt. The Statement of Claim alleging the provision of such services was filed on July 7, 2005.

[114] The Respondent's evidence of this acknowledgment seemingly consists of Samuel Plucers' recollection that Chambers indicated that Plucer would get his "fair share of the action" from the Northwoods Inn deal. During examinations, Plucer was unable to recall the date on which Chambers most recently promised to given him his "fair share". I do not find that this alleged conversation alone constitutes an acknowledgment of a debt.

[115] Based upon the evidence before me, this claim has been brought outside of the time permitted and must fail by virtue of the Limitations Act. The Applicants have shown that there is no genuine issue for trial respecting the claim for services provided in relation to the Northwood Inn. Therefore I am satisfied that summary judgment on this issue should be granted in favour of the Applicants.

[116] Lastly, the Applicants argued that in the event that the Amended Statement of Claim is dismissed, this Court should render a decision on an interlocutory application made in October of 2007 requesting that the Court direct the sale of the Pointe Inn. Given the fact that the Applicants were unsuccessful in having the claim dismissed I need not address this final argument.

V. Conclusion

[117] The Applicants have failed to show that the Respondent's action amounts to an abuse of process of this Court or that that there is no genuine issue for trial in respect of the claim, other than the claim for services provided in relation to the Northwood Inn. With the exception of the Northwood Inn claim, the application is dismissed.

Summary:

The Criminal Defence Advocacy Society ("CDAS") applies for an order permitting it to intervene on a public interest basis in this appeal, in which the appellants seek to overturn certification of a class action alleging harm to Canadians arising from an international price-fixing conspiracy contrary to s. 45 of the Competition Act, to make submissions on the proper interpretation of s. 6(2) of the Criminal Code.
Held: Application allowed. CDAS has a broad representative base, will not expand the scope of the appeal, and may bring a valuable perspective to the Court. Further, the appeal legitimately engages CDAS's interests in the extraterritorial application of the criminal law because the appellants seek to argue that the certification judge erred in finding there is an arguable breach of s. 45 by failing to engage in a "straightforward interpretative exercise" about the extraterritorial application of the criminal law.

WILLCOCK J.A.:

Introduction

[1] The Criminal Defence Advocacy Society ("CDAS") applies for an order permitting it to intervene on a public interest basis in this appeal. The appellants seek to overturn the certification of a class action alleging harm to Canadians arising from an international price-fixing conspiracy contrary to s. 45 of the Competition Act, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-34.

Background

[2] On October 6, 2022, in reasons indexed at 2022 BCSC 1738, Justice Coval certified class proceedings for alleged price-fixing of computer hard-drive components known as "suspension assemblies". He identified the following, among others, as common questions:

a) Did the defendants, or any of them, breach s. 45 the Competition Act, giving rise to liability pursuant to s. 36 of the Act?

b) Did the defendants, or any of them, breach s. 46 the Competition Act, giving rise to liability pursuant to s. 36 of the Act?

c) Are the defendants, or any of them, liable in tort for conspiracy to fix prices for the suspension assemblies?

d) During the class period, did the defendants and/or any unnamed co-conspirator engage in unlawful conduct (by breaching ss. 45 or 46 of the Competition Act)?

[3] In support of the motion for certification, the respondents relied upon principles identified in certified class actions alleging price-fixing of electronic components, including Pro-Sys Consultants Ltd. v. Infineon Technologies AG, 2009 BCCA 503, and Pioneer Corp. v. Godfrey, 2019 SCC 42.

[4] The appellants opposed the certification on a number of grounds, including an argument that the alleged price-fixing agreements were made and implemented entirely outside Canada, and the key provisions of the Competition Act relied on in Pro-Sys and Godfrey do not apply.

[5] The certification judge held that the requirements for certification under the Class Proceedings Act, R.S.B.C. 1996, c. 50, s. 4(1) were met. He held, following Pro-Sys and Godfrey, that s. 36(1) of the Competition Act creates a private right of action for conduct contrary to Part VI (where ss. 45 and 46 are found) and permits any person who has suffered loss or damage as a result of that conduct to sue for their loss. The allegation that the defendants' price-fixing agreement breached Part VI satisfied the illegality requirement for civil conspiracy, and supported the claim for restitution in unjust enrichment.

[6] He dismissed a challenge to the court's jurisdiction over the appellants for reasons set out at paras. 76–92 of his reasons. In short, following Ewert v. Höegh Autoliners AS, 2020 BCCA 181, he considered the "strong presumption of a real and substantial connection to British Columbia for a foreign price-fixing conspiracy resulting in higher prices paid by British Columbians" to be determinative.

[7] The certification judge's ruling on jurisdiction is appealed. It is addressed in the appellants' joint factum (re: jurisdiction). The intervener is not primarily concerned with the court's jurisdiction under the Court Jurisdiction and Proceedings Transfer Act, S.B.C. 2003, c. 28.

[8] The argument that the price-fixing claim is founded upon inappropriate extraterritorial application of the provisions of the Competition Act was considered when addressing the question of whether the pleadings disclose a cause of action. The certification judge's dismissal of the appellants' extraterritoriality argument is addressed in the appellants' joint factum (re: certification).

[9] In considering whether the pleadings disclose a cause of action, the chambers judge held the respondents need only to show that, assuming the facts pleaded are true, it is not plain and obvious that the claim will fail (at para. 96): Hollick v. Toronto (City), 2001 SCC 68 at para. 25.

[10] He described the task facing him as follows:

> [99] The case law recognizes the tension between a generous approach, erring on the side of allowing novel or questionable claims to proceed, and the gatekeeping function of resolving unmeritorious claims at an early stage. The Court of Appeal provided guidance for navigating this tension in Trotman v. WestJet Airlines Ltd., 2022 BCCA 22, where Chief Justice Bauman wrote:
>
>> [46] This Court has been clear that the ultimate question when assessing whether there is a cause of action is the Hunt v. Carey test: "assuming that the facts as stated in the statement of claim can be proved, is it 'plain and obvious' that the plaintiff's statement of claim discloses no reasonable cause of action?" While the burden is on the plaintiff, the bar is not high. Where the question turns on statutory interpretation, "if it is arguable," the certification judge should not engage in a merits-based analysis. The gate-keeping role of the certification judge at this stage is to avoid squandering judicial resources when it is clear that the correct statutory interpretation would leave the pleadings bound to fail. This could be the case where there is previous binding case law squarely on point or where the interpretive exercise is so straightforward the answer is plain and obvious even without previous case authority.
> [Emphasis added.]

[11] There was no dispute before the certification judge that the appellants manufacture virtually all of the suspension assemblies in Asia; no manufacturing occurred in Canada; and all direct sales of the assemblies occurred in Asia. The appellants argued that all activities constituting the alleged s. 45 offence took place outside Canada, and the alleged harm to downstream Canadian purchasers is not an essential element of the s. 45 offence. They relied on the description of the territoriality principle (now enshrined in s. 6(2) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46), in Libman v. The Queen, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 178.

[12] For the following reasons, the certification judge held the appellants had not shown that the respondents were bound to lose:

a) the same "real and substantial connection test" applies to both the jurisdiction of criminal laws, and the territorial jurisdiction of our courts;

b) numerous statements in Libman arguably support a finding of territoriality based solely on harm occurring in Canada;

c) Libman arguably endorses a flexible approach accounting for all relevant facts that take place in Canada, as opposed to a strict test tied to the elements of the offence;

d) the governing case law interpreting s. 45 arguably favours the plaintiffs: Pro-Sys; Fairhurst v. De Beers Canada Inc., 2012 BCCA 257; R. v. Rowbotham; and R. v. Roblin (1992), 76 C.C.C. (3d) 542; and

e) the cases relied on by the appellants, including R. v. O.(B.) (1997), 116 C.C.C. (3d) 189, and R. v. Drakes, 2005 CanLII 23683 (Ont. Sup. Ct.), were distinguishable on the ground that, in those cases, every aspect of the offence occurred outside Canada.

[13] CDAS seeks to intervene on the appeal of the certification judgment, to make submissions on the proper interpretation of s. 6(2) of the Criminal Code. Its proposed submissions support the defendants' preferred interpretations of Libman and s. 45 of the Competition Act.

[14] Section 30(f) of the Court of Appeal Act, S.B.C. 2021, c. 6 authorizes a justice of this Court to grant leave to intervene in an appeal. Rule 61 of the Court of Appeal Rules, B.C. Reg. 120/2022 governs applications to intervene.

2023 BCCA 243 (CanLII)

[15] The substantive considerations applicable to such applications are unchanged under the new Court of Appeal Rules: Linkletter v. Proctorio, Incorporated, 2022 BCCA 313 at para. 14.

[16] An applicant may seek intervener status on the basis that it has a public interest in a public law issue. The following criteria are relevant for determining whether a prospective intervener has a public interest in a public law issue:

a) Does the proposed intervener have a broad representative base?

b) Does the case legitimately engage the proposed intervener's interests in the public law issue raised on appeal?

c) Does the proposed intervener have a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court in the resolution of the issues?

d) Does the proposed intervener seek to expand the scope of the appeal by raising issues not raised by the parties?

(British Columbia Civil Liberties Association v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 BCCA 282 at para. 14 (Chambers)).

[17] As Justice Fitch explained in British Columbia v. Friends of Beacon Hill Park, 2022 BCCA 383 (Chambers):

> [47] In deciding whether to grant public interest intervener status, the Court is concerned with ensuring that important perspectives are not overlooked. Prospective interveners must therefore demonstrate that it is in the Court's interest or, more broadly, the public interest to grant leave to intervene: Beaudoin v. British Columbia (Attorney General), 2022 BCCA 66 at para. 12 (Chambers); Equustek Solutions Inc. v. Google Inc., 2014 BCCA 448 at para. 8 (Chambers) ….

[18] The applicant easily meets the first criteria for intervention. It has a relatively broad representative base; a membership of approximately 300 lawyers, a significant portion of the criminal defence bar in this Province. While arguably its perspective is, as the respondents submit, duplicative of the appellants', it is in a position to make a valuable contribution to the Court's consideration of the extraterritorial application of the criminal law that may assist the Court in the resolution of that issue. It may assist in ensuring that important perspectives are not overlooked when the question of concern to CDAS is addressed.

[19] Further, I am satisfied that CDAS, given its experience as an intervener, can be relied upon to respect its role as an intervener and not expand the scope of the appeal.

[20] The more difficult question with which I have wrestled is whether CDAS's interests in the scope of the extraterritorial application of the criminal law are legitimately engaged by the case on appeal, as opposed to the case that may go to trial.

[21] The certification judge considered the question before him in relation to extraterritorial application of the Competition Act to be whether the respondents' position with respect to the ambit of s. 45 (and by extension s. 6(2) of the Criminal Code) was arguable, not whether it was correct. In doing so, he was guided by the views we expressed in Trotman v. WestJet Airlines Ltd., 2022 BCCA 22. In that case, as noted above, we noted that at certification, in order to find that it is plain and obvious that there is no cause of action on the facts as pleaded, there should either be a decided case directly on point demonstrating that the issue has been squarely dealt with and rejected, or a straightforward interpretative exercise. We cited with approval (at para. 45) the following passage from Sherry v. CIBC Mortgage Inc., 2020 BCCA 139:

> [25] … The only issue for resolution at the certification stage is whether the test for striking-out pleadings articulated in Hunt v. Carey has been satisfied. However novel or weak a claim may seem, if it is arguable the certification judge should not engage in a merits-based analysis of the claim.

[22] In their factum on certification, the appellants do not address Trotman. They do not suggest Trotman was wrongly decided or seek its reconsideration. They say:

> 20. Section 4(1)(a) of the Class Proceedings Act requires that the plaintiffs' claim disclose a cause of action. The chambers judge correctly stated that to satisfy s. 4(1)(a) of the Class Proceedings Act, the claim must not be bound to fail assuming the facts pleaded are true. [Footnote omitted.]

2023 BCCA 243 (CanLII)

[23] They say the definition of "committing" an offence in Canada cannot be stretched "so far beyond its natural meaning as to establish a cause of action under section 45" on the facts pleaded, in essence that it is not arguable that the conduct alleged constitutes an offence under the Competition Act. They say:

> 38. Under section 45 of the Competition Act, loss is not a constituent element of the alleged criminal offence. The only constituent elements are the acts of conspiring, agreeing or arranging for one of the specified unlawful purposes. Whether those acts cause losses is irrelevant.
>
> 39. Here, it is undisputed that the alleged conduct contrary to section 45 occurred entirely outside Canada. No aspect of the alleged conspiracy or sale of Assemblies happened in Canada. Because there were no direct sales of Assemblies to anyone in Canada, the chambers judge correctly did not certify the direct purchaser claims. The only possible link to Canada is the alleged effect of the conduct in the form of an indirect pass-through of an alleged overcharge of mere pennies.
>
> 40. As such, the question for the chambers judge and for this Court is whether potential harm of that nature is enough to establish that a section 45 offence was "committed" in Canada for the purposes of section 6(2) of the Criminal Code.
>
> 41. It is not; the chambers judge erred in finding that it was. Under Libman, the chambers judge was required to focus on where the constituent elements of the alleged section 45 offence took place.
> [Footnotes omitted.]

[24] This argument has not yet been joined because the respondents' factum has not been filed, but in response to the proposed intervener's argument, the respondents say the statutory interpretation arguments the applicant seeks to advance are inappropriate at the certification stage of this class proceeding because the case management judge properly left open the question raised by the proposed intervention to be determined at trial.

[25] They say the applicant's statutory interpretation and policy arguments will not make a valuable contribution to this Court's consideration of whether the case management judge wrongly exercised his discretion in leaving the statutory interpretation question unresolved. The same criticism, however, may be levelled against the whole of the appellants' argument on appeal. As counsel for the proposed intervener notes, the position of the respondents presupposes the approach the division will take. In order to accept the respondents' submission on the intervener application, I would have to find that there is no prospect of the appellants establishing that the certification judge erred by failing to engage in what the appellants appear to consider a “straightforward interpretative exercise”. In my view, despite the substantial hurdle posed by our decision in Trotman, I should not foreclose that possibility.

[26] I am somewhat troubled by the fact that the intervener’s argument may undermine the argument made by the appellants. While the appellants appear to argue that the law is so clear that the respondents cannot make out an arguable case, the proposed intervener emphasises the need for appellate clarification of the law with respect to extraterritorial application of the Criminal Code.

[27] CDAS appears to acknowledge (at para. 18(6) of its memorandum of argument) that the certification judge’s interpretation of s. 45 of the Competition Act (and by extension s. 6(2) of the Criminal Code) is arguable, when it says the trend in recent jurisprudence is the opposite of what Libman stands for when properly construed: if you can stretch to identify one particular element of the offence that had “effects” in Canada, then you can assert territorial jurisdiction under s. 6(2).

[28] As an intervener, CDAS will not take a position on the question of whether the judge erred in certifying the class action. It will not take a position on the question of whether the certification judge erred in exercising his discretion not to engage in the interpretive exercise arising in this case. It will not be taking the position that the interpretative exercise is capable of only one result. It will simply be advancing an argument that if the Court engages in the interpretative exercise, the question should be resolved against an expanded view of the extraterritorial application of the criminal law.

[29] A concession that there is uncertainty in the jurisprudence may assist the respondents in establishing that extraterritorial application of the Competition Act should not and cannot be resolved at the certification stage. Having said that, I note that the appellants in both appeals support the application for intervener status. My concerns that the intervener’s arguments weigh to some extent in the respondents’ favour are clearly not shared.

[30] In my view, there is some prospect that the focused submissions of CDAS may assist the Court on appeal. I grant leave to the intervener to file a factum, not exceeding 10 pages in length, that does not duplicate the submissions of the appellants, and is restricted in the manner described in these reasons.

[31] In accordance with the general practice, I will leave the question of whether leave will be granted to counsel to make oral submissions to the division.

[32] The respondents will have leave to file a factum not to exceed 10 pages in length in response to the intervener.

[Discussion with parties re: reply factums]

[33] WILLCOCK J.A.: The respondents will have leave to file a factum in response to the intervener's factum, but I am not going to grant leave to the appellants to file any additional material.

2024 BCCA 206 (CanLII)

ABRIOUX J.A.:

Overview

[1] The Northern Gitxsan Hereditary Chiefs representing seven Gitxsan huwilp (houses) (the "Northern Gitxsan") seek an extension of time and leave to intervene on this appeal.

[2] In the appeal, the appellant, the Nisga'a Nation ("Nisga'a"), seeks to set aside the January 17, 2024 order of Justice Stephens dismissing the Nisga'a's motion to be added as a defendant to the Gitanyow Aboriginal title claim against the Governments of Canada and British Columbia. The reasons are indexed as Malii v. British Columbia, 2024 BCSC 85.

Background

[3] The plaintiffs in the underlying action (collectively, the "Gitanyow") seek Aboriginal rights and title to an area in the mid-Nass River and Kitwanga River watershed in northwestern British Columbia (the "Gitanyow action"). The Gitanyow action is scheduled for an 84-day trial in October 2024.

[4] On May 31, 2023, the Nisga'a Nation applied to be added as a defendant to the Gitanyow action. The Nisga'a argued that the lands and waters subject to the action are within the Nisga'a traditional territory. They placed significant reliance on the Nisga'a treaty which granted the Nisga'a rights over specified geographic areas, including the Nass Wildlife Area and the Nass Area.

[5] The Nisga'a brought their application under Rules 6-2(7)(b) and (c) of the Supreme Court Civil Rules. Under Rule 6-2(7)(b)(i), the court may order that a person be added as a party if that "person ought to have been joined as a party".

Under Rule 6-2(7)(b)(ii), the court may order that a person be added as a party if "that person's participation in the proceeding is necessary to ensure that all matters in the proceeding may be effectually adjudicated on". Under Rule 6-2(7)(c), a party may be added based on "an interest in the object and an interest in the subject of the litigation".

[6] The Nisga'a argued that it had an express treaty and statutory right to participate in these proceedings as a party. They also maintained they had relevant evidence to provide at the upcoming trial regarding the historical occupation of their traditional territory.

[7] The Gitanyow opposed the Nisga'a's participation, contending that its addition was unnecessary and would expand the length, complexity, and cost of the trial. The Gitanyow narrowed their claim, removing relief previously sought that would have entitled them to ratify, or refuse to ratify, previously granted rights and interests, including those of other Aboriginal nations.

[8] On January 17, 2024, Justice Stephens, dismissed the Nisga'a's application, finding that it was not necessary, just, or convenient to add the Nisga'a as a defendant.

[9] He rejected the Nisga'a's argument that it ought to be added as a defendant on the basis that it had evidence relevant to the Gitanyow action. The judge found that this was insufficient to fulfill Rule 6-2(7)(b) "since the [Nisga'a] could simply serve as a witness": at para. 53.

[10] The judge was not satisfied that the Nisga'a had a direct interest in the outcome of the proceedings sufficient to invoke Rule 6-2(7). He judge found that the evidence indicated only a "relatively modest geographic overlap between the Claim Area and the Nisga'a Treaty lands where the Nisga'a hold fee simple title … and a more considerable overlap with the 'Nass Wildlife Area' and 'Nass Area' under the Nisga'a Treaty where the Nisga'a have harvesting and other rights": at para. 23.

According to the judge, that constituted a "general but not a direct and precise interest": at para. 61.

[11] Nor was he satisfied that the Nisga'a had a statutory or treaty right to be added as a party. Section 8(1) of the Nisga'a Final Agreement Act, S.B.C. 1999, c. 2, c. 8(1) and section 20(1) of the Nisga'a Final Agreement Act, S.C. 2000, c. 7, s. 20(1) provided the Nisga'a with the right to participate as a party in litigation in relation to specific issues, but not to participate at large. These provisions provided that the Nisga'a may only participate in proceedings in the event certain discrete issues arose, including the "interpretation or validity of the Nisga'a Final Agreement," and the "validity or applicability of any settlement legislation or any Nisga'a law": at para. 74.

[12] On the current pleadings, the Gitanyow did not raise any issue as to the validity of the Nisga'a treaty, or the validity or applicability of settlement legislation or Nisga'a law, or the interpretation of the Nisga'a treaty. While Canada and British Columbia's responses to the notice of civil claim could potentially raise an issue as to the interpretation of the Nisga'a treaty, the judge held that it would be premature at this stage in the litigation to make a finding that the Nisga'a's statutory party-conferring rights were engaged.

Legal Framework – Intervener

Overview

[13] Rule 61 of the Court of Appeal Rules, B.C. Reg. 120/2022 [Rules] allows any person interested in an appeal to apply to a justice for leave to intervene on any terms and conditions that the justice may determine.

[14] To be granted intervener status, the applicant must show it has some direct interest in the outcome of the proceeding ("direct interest basis") or, alternatively, if the appeal raises public law issues, must demonstrate it can bring a perspective that is different and useful to the court in resolving those issues ("public interest basis"): Ahousaht Indian Band and Nation v. Canada (Attorney General), 2018 BCCA 413 at paras. 15–16 (Chambers).

Position of the Parties

[15] The Northern Gitxsan were plaintiffs in the Aboriginal title case known as Delgamuukw v. British Columbia, [1997] 3 S.C.R. 1010 [Delgamuukw]. They submit that allowing the appeal will have a material negative effect on their legal rights in the ongoing Delgamuukw dispute. They also argue that granting the appeal will greatly increase the length and complexity of any litigation involving claims for recognition of Aboriginal title or rights, thus frustrating the goal of reconciliation and reducing access to justice, for the Northern Gitxsan and any other claims advanced for recognition of s. 35 rights. If granted leave to intervene, the Northern Gitxsan will make submissions to advance, on the point of intervention, the proposition that Aboriginal title represents an exclusive interest in land such that it cannot be reconciled with other interests or treaty rights.

[16] The Attorney General of Canada consents to the intervener order sought by the applicants.

[17] The Attorney General of BC takes no position on the application for leave to intervene. It submits in its memorandum that should the application be granted, the affidavit filed in support of the application for leave to intervene — with certain redactions — would not be admissible at the hearing of the appeal itself with respect to the issues of any adjudicative fact that might arise on the appeal; it may be used solely for explaining to the Court the basis for the applicant's intervention. I am advised that wording has now being agreed to as between the applicant and the Province on this issue.

[18] The other parties who appeared today either consent or take no position to the application.

Analysis

[19] As Justice Fisher explained in Ahousaht:

> [18] I recognize that in cases such as this, which involve constitutionally protected Aboriginal rights, it is important for the court to have everything before it that could reasonably assist in its ultimate determination: Stoney Creek Indian Band v. Alcan Aluminum Ltd., 1999 BCCA 293 at para. 8; Maple Trust Company v. A.G. (Canada), 2007 BCCA 195 at para. 5. However, repetition is to be avoided and the appeal must remain focused on the issues raised by the parties: Ahousaht Indian Band and Nation v. Canada (Attorney General), 2012 BCCA 330 at para. 32; British Columbia Civil Liberties Association at para. 14. Given the number of applications before me, I must consider the orderly and efficient administration of justice. The number of intervenors should not overwhelm the appeal in a way that is a burden for the parties or the court: British Columbia Civil Liberties Association at para. 15.
> [19] It is important to note that the role of an intervenor is not to support the position of a party. While an intervenor's submission may support one party's position, its purpose is to make principled submissions on pertinent points of law: see Araya at para. 12, citing Friedmann v. MacGarvie, 2012 BCCA 109 at para. 28.

[20] The application was originally framed on the basis that the Northern Gitxsan had both a direct and a public interest to seek intervention. At the hearing of this application, I was advised that they are no longer pursuing the direct interest basis. I will therefore turn to the public interest argument.

Public interest basis

[21] The Northern Gitxsan submit the appeal engages the public interest as many First Nations are in a similar position to the Northern Gitxsan. If the appeal were to be granted, any claim for Aboriginal title or rights could be complicated by other First Nations seeking to be added as full parties — including in cases where, as here, the litigation does not prejudice the claims of the First Nations seeking to be added.

[22] The Northern Gitxsan submit that as a First Nation with experience litigating one of the highest profile, longest running, and most expensive Aboriginal title claims in Canadian history, they undoubtedly have a unique and different perspective that will assist the Court in deciding the appeal. The Gitanyow, having not been part of Delgamuukw, cannot address these issues without the intervention of the Northern Gitxsan. Further, the Gitanyow operate independently from the Northern Gitxsan in all material respects, and pursue their land claims and negotiations on their own.

[23] The Northern Gitxsan say that the issues raised in the proposed intervention will not expand the scope of the appeal. At first instance, Justice Stephens was already well alive to the access to justice concerns that would ensue if the court were to accede to the Nisga'a's request to be added as a party.

[24] In light of the proposed scope of the intervention, I am of the view that the Northern Gitxsan have established a proper basis to intervene on a public interest basis. Accordingly, I would grant the extension of time to seek leave to intervene on the basis that any submissions avoid repetition and overlap with the parties. I would direct that their factum not exceed 20 pages.

[25] Finally, by consent, the affidavit of Mr. Muldoe filed in support of the application for leave to intervene and which contains redactions which have been agreed to, is not admissible on the appeal itself with respect to issues of adjudicative fact that might arise on the appeal, but may be used solely for explaining to the Court the basis for the applicants' intervention.

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

In 1980, the plaintiff owned 18 leasehold mining claims on a property near the Village of Beardmore. In 1981, the defendant C, the president of the defendant M Ltd., asked whether the plaintiff would be interested in a joint venture. This contact led to the 1981 agreement between the plaintiff and M Ltd. The 1981 agreement provided that if M Ltd. expended $1.0 million on the property, set out a detailed drilling program and agreed to spend a further $5.0 million, then the plaintiff had a choice of (a) transferring the property to M Ltd. in return for a 30 per cent net royalty interest, or (b) granting M Ltd. a 60 per cent interest and retaining a 40 per cent ownership and entering a joint venture agreement. Under this agreement, M Ltd. became the operator and had exclusive possession of the property for mining operations.

Under the 1981 agreement, the plaintiff was entitled to information on demand and M Ltd. was also obliged to provide a report by July 1 of each year. For 1982, M Ltd. provided a report of a geologist S. Unknown to the plaintiff, M Ltd. had hired a much more experienced geologist W to analyze the data prepared by S. W prepared a report dated February 15, 1982. The W Report was positive and indicated substantial potential for a gold mine and the primary target areas for exploration. The W Report was never disclosed to the plaintiff.

M Ltd. was aware of the practice in the mineral exploration industry that when seeking to purchase another party's interest, the party in control of the property must make full disclosure of all the information it possesses about the property. On June 15, 1982, C wrote the plaintiff that the "overall results did not live up to expectations". On October 30, 1982, C wrote and offered to increase M Ltd.'s interest in the property and noted that "the assays of the fourth deep hole were very disappointing". In a letter dated March 29, 1983 to the plaintiff, C briefly outlined the work completed on the property between December 1982 and February 1983.

In a letter dated March 28, 1983, in reply to M Ltd.'s offer to increase its interest, a director of the plaintiff set out terms to modify the 1981 agreement. This led to the 1983 agreement that although dated as of May 16, 1983 was not made until June 9, 1983. The 1983 agreement provided that in return for a payment of $40,000 and a 10 per cent net royalty interest and 39 additional staked claims surrounding the property, the plaintiff would assign its 100 per cent interest in the property. The 1983 agreement did not contain a mandatory disclosure requirement but provided for information on demand. It was a term of the 1983 agreement that the agreement had to be registered before it superseded the 1981 agreement. The 1983 agreement was not registered until June 6, 1986.

Before signing the 1983 agreement, in addition to not disclosing the W Report, M Ltd. misled the plaintiff about its drilling plans, created the impression that the focus would be on the staked claims and not the 18 leasehold claims, purposely concealed its positive and optimistic plans for the property, and deliberately refrained from drilling in the target area.

On February 3, 1984, C was advised about the assay results for drill hole 84-B31 -- "the discovery hole" which had been drilled in January 1984. The assay results were extraordinarily good (0.35 oz. gold/ton). On or about March 26, 1984 M Ltd. delivered drill maps to the plaintiff. Since the maps showed the "discovery hole" B-31 without an assay result, a reader would assume assay of less than 0.1 oz. gold/ton. C did not disclose the positive information and secretly purchased stock in both M Ltd. and the plaintiff. M Ltd. immediately began a staking and acquisition program that resulted in 232 claims being acquired by July 1, 1985.

On January 14, 1986 the plaintiff demanded under the 1981 agreement reports for 1983, 1984 and 1985. C replied that the 1981 agreement had been superseded but promised to deliver information. On March 14, 1986, a box containing information was delivered to the plaintiff. The information provided was confusing, incomplete and inaccurate.

On March 24, 1986, M Ltd. announced its discovery. By this time, it had acquired an additional 227 claims. After the announcement, the plaintiff sued C and M Ltd. and claimed breach of contract, fraud, misuse of confidential information, breach of fiduciary duty and ownership of the mining claims.

Held, judgment should be given for the plaintiff.

The conduct of the defendants constituted both fraud and breaches of the 1981 and 1983 agreements going to the very root of the agreements. C's conduct fractured any ability for the parties to work together. Trust, confidence and good faith were destroyed by the conduct of one party. M Ltd. breached its obligations in three fundamental aspects: it intentionally provided misleading facts; it intentionally failed to provide the W Report; and it withheld other vital information. Pursuant to the terms of the 1981 agreement and under the common law, the plaintiff was entitled to treat the breach as repudiatory and to rescind the contract. The 1983 agreement did not come into force until registration. That did not occur until 1986 by which time C had perpetrated further falsehoods and deception. The misinformation, the missing information and the failure to present the information breached both agreements. The validity of the 1983 agreement depended on proper disclosure having been made under the 1983 agreement. Given M Ltd.'s intentional failure to make disclosure, the 1983 agreement could not stand.

In the course of M Ltd.'s business relationship as operator on the plaintiff's lands, M Ltd. acquired valuable geological information which led to the discovery hole. This was confidential information to be shared with the plaintiff. M Ltd. used this valuable information to acquire hundreds of adjacent mining claims. C used this information for personal gain. Breach of confidence was established. Although M Ltd. "developed" the information, it was placed in a position to do so by being the plaintiff's operator. The only appropriate remedy was one in rem with the result that M Ltd. holds all the staked claims under a constructive trust for the plaintiff.

M Ltd. was conducting exploration work on the plaintiff's property for their mutual benefit and was in control of information. The power of M Ltd. to conceal information was almost total. M Ltd. was in the position to exercise power or discretion in a way that affected the plaintiff and the plaintiff was vulnerable and at the mercy of M Ltd. and dependent upon the good faith of M Ltd. Specifically when requested, M Ltd. was obliged to provide accurate information and to give full, fair and frank disclosure and it failed to do so. M Ltd. was in a fiduciary relationship with the plaintiff. It was C's abuse of power that created the breaches of fiduciary duty. In the result, the 1981 and 1983 agreements should be rescinded and title to the 18 leased claims should revert to the plaintiff. C's conduct must be condemned by punitive damages in the sum of $80,000. The 459 claims by M Ltd. and 12 other claims acquired after M Ltd. acquired confidential information are held in a constructive trust for the plaintiff. The 39 staked claims in the 1983 agreement must revert to M Ltd.

MONTGOMERY J.:--

OVERVIEW

In 1980, Brookbank-Sturgeon Mines Limited (Brookbank) owned 100 per cent of a property composed of 18 leasehold claims in the Township of Irwin, in the Thunder Bay Mining Division, near the Village of Beardmore. This property is known as the Brookbank property. The Brookbank property lies on what is known as the Paint Lake Fault.

In June 1983, Brookbank amalgamated with Ontex Resources Limited (Ontex) and Brookbank became a part of Ontex. It is necessary therefore for me to refer to the plaintiff company as Brookbank when I am dealing with it prior to the June 1983 amalgamation and as Ontex when I am dealing with it subsequent to the June 1983 amalgamation.

Noranda became involved in the property in 1944. During its exploration, it sunk 40 drill holes. After Noranda abandoned the property, little work was done on it for 30 years. In 1974, Brookbank-Sturgeon, the owner of the leasehold, entered into an option agreement with Lynx-Canada Explorations Limited. After drilling six holes, Lynx abandoned its option. Metalore became involved on the property in 1981.

Metalore's main operation consisted of 75 small producing gas wells. Between 1965-1980, it did little mineral exploration. In 1980, for income tax purposes, it sought a mining property to explore, George Chilian, the president of and driving force behind Metalore, had worked on several gold properties in the Beardmore area in the late 1950s. He felt the geology of the Brookbank was good by looking at the Noranda data file with the Department of Mines.

On January 27, 1981 Chilian wrote to Arthur White to see if Brookbank would be interested in an option or a joint venture. On March 31, 1981 Chilian wrote to Vance White the following:

> In the interest of expediency, I went over to the dept of mines assessment work library after leaving your office and found that Lynx had filed their work. They had done a mag survey (which wasn't even contoured) and eight shallow holes, east of the previous drilling, that yielded some scattered low values, similar to previous drillings.
>
> For whatever its (sic) worth, my appraisal is that you have a series of lenses, with relatively low values, within an alteration zone in basic volcanics, close to the sediments. The lenses have not even been correlated from hole to hole, to the shallow depths drilled, so you have to look for something a whole lot better either at depth or on-strike. Ten thousand feet of serious drilling will give you a better indication of what you have but it will require much more (probably twenty or thirty thousand) to start delineating any meaningful tonnage -- if it exists. Consequently, I don't feel the property is in any state of development to warrant a gross royalty with a large work commitment.
>
> We are prepared to offer the following:
>
> 1. $10,000 upon signing and $10,000 per year thereafter.
>
> 2. Firm commitment of $250,000, including minimum 10,000 feet of BQ drilling and minimum four holes below 500 feet vertical (700 to 800 foot holes). Three years.

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

3. $100,000 per year to continue, being cumulative.

4. We would earn a 60% interest when $1,000,000 is spent, whereat (sic) both interests become participating and diminishing progressively if participation is not maintained.

As an alternative to 4. we would consider paying up to a 30% net royalty, depending upon the total required to attain production.

If this is of any further interest to you, I would appreciate hearing from you shortly, as I am also considering alternative projects.

This letter led to the 1981 agreement between Metalore and Brookbank. The 1981 agreement was later re-negotiated and the 1983 agreement was born. This new agreement increased Metalore's interest in the property.

Between 1981 and 1986 Metalore acquired hundreds of additional claims in the area.

This action, based in breach of contract, fraud, misuse of confidential information and breach of fiduciary duty, is to determine ownership in certain mining claims.

THE PARTIES AND THEIR EMPLOYEES

Ontex is a public company whose shares are listed for trading on the Alberta Stock Exchange. Ontex resulted from the amalgamation on June 29, 1983 of Brookbank-Sturgeon Mines Limited and Ontex Resources Limited, both public companies incorporated pursuant to the laws of the Province of Ontario.

Arthur White had been in mining since the 1940s and raised risk capital. His management company had incorporated Campbell Red Lake which went on to become one of the country's major gold producers.

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

Vance White graduated from the University of Toronto in Physical and Health Education. He became involved in his father's company, Mid North, which provided management services to mining operations. In 1972, he became associated with Brookbank as secretary and a director.

W.P. Dickie was a senior executive at Ontex whose involvement in this matter began subsequent to the 1983 re-negotiation of the 1981 agreement.

Peter Vamos is a geologist who did some work for Ontex.

Metalore Resources Limited (Metalore) is a public corporation whose shares are traded on the Toronto Stock Exchange.

George Chilian is a 58-year-old mining executive and geological exploration specialist. He has been the president and directing force of Metalore since 1955. He has a B.A. in economics with a minor in journalism. He also took some courses in geology.

Metalore employed a series of geologists to work on the property. Gordon Skrecky conducted the 1981-82 drill campaign and was the author of the Skrecky Report, the importance of which will become clear below. Peter Lassila was involved in the 1982-83 campaign and was author of the Lassila Report. Barbara Kowalski was the on-site geologist from 1983 onwards, for all subsequent years relevant to this matter.

Stewart Winter is a senior geologist who was employed by Metalore and the author of the February 15, 1982 Winter Report. Again, the importance of this report will become clear below.

ISSUES

1. Did Metalore fundamentally breach either the 1981 agreement or the 1983 agreement or both?

2. Did Metalore's conduct amount to fraud?

3. Did Metalore misuse confidential information?

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

4. Did a fiduciary relationship exist between Metalore and Ontex and, if so, was that relationship breached?

CONTRACTS

The first analysis will be on the 1981 and 1983 agreements, focusing on the documents themselves without considering extrinsic evidence of industry practice.

The 1981 agreement gives Metalore the exclusive right to acquire leasehold interest in the property for a period of ten years (renewable). In return Metalore must spend $250,000 on the development of the property within the first three years (including minimum drilling requirements) and must pay Brookbank $10,000 per year. Metalore must spend $100,000 a year and pay Brookbank $5,000 a year in the years subsequent to the third year. If Metalore expends $1,000,000 on the property, sets out a detailed drilling program and agrees to spend further sums totalling $5,000,000 or more, then Brookbank has a choice of (a) transferring the property to Metalore in return for a 30 per cent net royalty interest, or (b) granting Metalore a 60 per cent ownership and retaining a 40 per cent ownership, and entering a joint venture agreement.

In a June 15, 1982 letter to Brookbank, Chilian made his first attempt to increase Metalore's interest in the property. He proposed that Metalore purchase the property for $50,000 and that Brookbank retain a 5 per cent net profit interest. Chilian renewed this offer in a letter of October 30, 1982. In a letter of March 28, 1983 Vance White wrote to Chilian and set out terms to modify the 1981 agreement. Chilian signed the letter indicating agreement to the terms but said his approval was subject to some clarification outlined in an April 5 letter to White. The terms of the 1983 agreement parallel the March 28 letter.

On April 13, 1983, $10,000 of the $40,000 payment was received by Brookbank and the balance of $30,000 was received on May 16. Although the agreement indicates it was made as of the 16th day of May, 1983, it was not made until June 9.

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

The 1983 agreement provides in return for a payment of $40,000 and a 10 per cent net royalty interest in the property and 39 additional staked claims surrounding the property, Brookbank shall assign 100 per cent interest in the leased property to Metalore.

The 1983 agreement specifically stipulates, when the 1981 agreement is superseded:

> 2. Metalore shall register this Agreement, or alternatively shall register the 10% net profit interest of Brookbank and shall provide Brookbank with abstracts to this effect.
>
> . . . . .
> 5. When Clauses 2, 3 and 4, foregoing, have been executed then both parties mutually agree that the agreement of 1 July, 1981 shall be superseded by this present agreement.

Pursuant to these express terms, the 1981 agreement has never been superseded by the 1983 agreement. The 1983 agreement was not registered in the Land Registry Office until June 6, 1986.

Disclosure provisions [under the] 1981 agreement

Clause 6 states:

> During the term of this Agreement and any renewal hereof, Metalore shall be entitled to exclusive possession of the Property for purposes of conducting mining operations thereon but Brookbank, through its agents and representatives, shall be entitled at reasonable times and with the consent of Metalore (which shall not be unreasonably withheld) to enter upon the Property to examine the mining operations. At the request of Brookbank, Metalore shall supply Brookbank with particulars of the results of any diamond driling, sampling and assaying and shall permit Brookbank to examine all relevant geological and geophysical data and other maps, reports, diamond drill cores and other records.

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

> Metalore shall provide Brookbank by July 1 in each year during the term of this Agreement and any renewal hereof with a progress report regarding the mining operations conducted by it upon the Property and a certificate of Metalore's Treasurer as to the amount of expenditures incurred on the Property in the preceding work year.

In the first paragraph, Brookbank is given the right to enter upon the property to examine the mining operations. Metalore is obligated upon the request of Brookbank to supply particulars of the results of any diamond drilling, sampling and assaying and Metalore must allow Brookbank to examine all relevant geological and geophysical data and other maps, reports, diamond drill cores and other records. I will refer to these disclosure obligations as the on demand information.

The second paragraph of clause 6 sets out a reporting requirement. Metalore shall provide Brookbank by July 1 in each year of the term of the agreement and any renewal thereof a progress report regarding the mining operations conducted by Metalore on the property and a certificate from Metalore's treasurer as to the expenditure on the property in the preceding year. This annual reporting requirement may conveniently be described as the mandatory information.

The 1981 agreement, then, has a two-part disclosure obligation, the mandatory information in the form of a yearly report, and the on demand information upon Brookbank's request.

The on demand information is very broadly defined in clause 6 (above). The mandatory information is equally broadly defined in light of its reference to "mining operations" with the expansive definition of that term. "Mining operations" includes "every kind of work done on or in respect of the Property". The definition goes on to list the types of work contemplated and includes:

> assessment, geophysical, geochemical and geological surveys, studies and mapping, investigating ... all other work usually considered to be prospecting exploration, development and mining work; in paying wages and salaries of men engaged in such work ... in the management of any work ... for the due carrying out of the said prospecting, exploration and development work.

The wording of the mandatory disclosure provision is so broad that it is difficult to contemplate any work or report connected with the property that could escape the definition of mining operation.

The intent of both the mandatory and on demand provisions of the contract is full and fair disclosure.

Disclosure under the 1983 agreement

Clause 7 gives Brookbank the right "to enter upon the Property to examine the mining operations". It further provides that upon request Metalore shall supply Brookbank with particulars of the results of any diamond drilling, sampling and assaying and shall permit Brookbank to examine all relevant geological and geophysical data and other maps, reports, diamond drill cores and other records. This clause is virtually identical to the first paragraph in clause 6 of the 1981 agreement. Also "mining operations" is defined as in the 1981 agreement. The mandatory disclosure provision is absent in this agreement. There remains the same on demand reporting as in the 1981 agreement.

An examination of disclosures made by Metalore

Metalore says it met its mandatory July 1, 1982 reporting requirement by furnishing Brookbank with the Skrecky Report. Gordon Skrecky was the then project geologist for Metalore. Metalore contends that White accepted the Skrecky Report as satisfaction of the mandatory requirement. Brookbank's position was that it trusted Chilian at this stage.

A further obligation to report would arise on July 1, 1983, pursuant to the 1981 agreement; however, the 1983 agreement was to supersede the 1981 agreement and the 1983 agreement had no mandatory reporting provision. Further, there had to be compliance with certain provisions before the coming into force of the 1983 agreement. One such requirement was the registration of the 1983 agreement. Ontex contends that as a result of Metalore's failure to register, the 1983 agreement did not come into force until 1986. If that is so, it is critical to the mandatory reporting provision.

It is not disputed that Brookbank received in August 1983, the report from geologist Peter Lassila (the Lassila Report) which covered the drilling from October 1982 to March 1983. Included in that report were copies of the diamond drilling logs for 1982 and 1983. It is not clear if this report was to be in answer to the reporting requirements in the 1981 agreement (despite the fact that Metalore appears to have considered the 1981 agreement superseded), in answer to a disclosure request under the 1983 agreement, or merely information Metalore felt obliged to pass along to Brookbank.

In a March 9, 1983 memo from Vance White to H. Miller, then treasurer of Brookbank, involving preparation for the Brookbank-Ontex merger, White indicated he had requested Chilian "to update his report" and Miller was asked to ensure that the report was under way. Minutes of a meeting of directors of Ontex, dated March 21, 1983, indicate Miller had called Chilian and asked for an update on the Metalore exploration and Chilian indicated it could be expected. Chilian describes the request as a perfunctory one for an update of the Skrecky Report.

In a letter of March 29, 1983, Chilian outlined very briefly the work completed on the property between December 1982 and February 1983. Metalore contends this was a full answer to Brookbank's request for a report which was made for merger purposes. This was the only request for information under the 1981 agreement, according to Metalore. They say, therefore, they have met all the reporting requirements, both mandatory and on demand, of the 1981 agreement.

The February 15, 1982 Stewart Winter Report was never produced. This is a pivotal report.

Gordon Skrecky was fresh out of school. He was a good and competent geologist but according to his own assessment, he lacked experience. Chilian asked Stewart Winter, a highly experienced senior geologist, to analyze the Skrecky report. While the Winter Report is based upon the Skrecky data, it affords opinions and interpretation that go far beyond Skrecky and, taken with the covering letter, disclose a property with a potential close to economic value. This fact was never communicated to Ontex. All other reports are in Metalore's files but not this one. The report was never mentioned in Metalore's affidavit of documents. Schedule C of an affidavit requires mention of documents once held but no longer in a party's possession. There is no mention of Winter's Report here either. The only place it appeared was in a government file where Metalore had used it in support of a grant application. Ontex found the report after commencement of this lawsuit.

Ontex contends that the Winter Report was a vital piece of information that was required to be disclosed pursuant to the reporting requirements in the 1981 agreement. Ontex stresses Winter's experience and Skrecky's inexperience and likens the Stewart Winter Report to the opinion of a senior counsel based upon a junior counsel's report.

With the 1983 agreement, the mandatory reporting requirement falls. It becomes important to focus on Ontex's requests for information and to visit the property.

Metalore asserts that Ontex made no formal request for specific drill hole results until a letter of January 14, 1986. This request was answered by delivery of a "box" of information received by Ontex on March 14, 1986. Metalore attributes the fact that Ontex was not well informed prior to March 1986 to Ontex's complacency.

The following is a listing of all requests for information and the information that was given without any apparent request:

(1) It is clear from the Kowalski diary of March 5, 1984 that Peter Vamos looked over the logs, presumably from the 1983-84 drilling season. It is not clear whether this information was given pursuant to a request by Ontex. Barbara Kowalski is the geologist for Metalore who took over from Gordon Skrecky. Peter Vamos is a geologist sometimes employed by Ontex.

(2) On or about March 26, 1984, diamond drill hole maps were delivered to Ontex by Metalore. Again, it is not clear whether they were delivered pursuant to Ontex's request or were something Metalore felt obliged to produce. Ontex says these maps show Hole B-31 but assigned no result to the hole. A hole shown without a result would be assumed by a reader to be a hole with an assay of less than .1 of gold per ton. This was what became known as the discovery hole. Ontex contends that this map intentionally misled it.

(3) In the spring and summer of 1984, Ontex wanted information for its annual meeting. In July 1984, Vamos visited the property but was denied access to certain information by Chilian citing negotiations on neighbouring property as his reason for denying the information. Ontex accepted the explanation at the time.

(4) The Kowalski diary entry of February 12, 1985 indicates Dickie called Chilian to discuss sale of Ontex's 10 per cent royalty interest. The entry indicates "he also wanted information".

(5) On February 18, 1985, Chilian wrote Ontex to summarize the 1983-84 exploration program in response to Dickie's request. In his letter of February 18, 1985, Chilian promises to prepare a composite geological summary of the work which will "be available to Ontex at the conclusion of this season". Ontex contends this summary should have been available to them in March 1985 as that is when the 1984-85 season ended. I agree. I reject Chilian's assertion that he meant the 1986 season.

(6) A May 7, 1985 entry in Kowalski's diary indicates that Dickie called and requested information and Chilian "stalled" citing ongoing negotiations on a ground lease as the reason.

(7) On January 14, 1986, in what Metalore says is the only instance of a formal request for information, Dickie wrote Metalore and give it notice that if the 1983, 1984 and 1985 reports as required by the 1981 agreement were not delivered within 15 days, then Metalore would be in breach of the 1981 agreement.

Chilian wrote in reply on January 28, 1986 and said the 1981 agreement had been superseded by the 1983 agreement. Chilian cited his letter of February 18, 1985 in which he gave a summary of all the work completed since 1982. Chilian proposed in his letter that he would deliver the information in the second week in March at the prospectors convention. On March 14, 1986 a "box" containing information dealing with the property between 1983 and 1985 was delivered to Ontex.

John A. Macdonald (an expert on contracts at an exploration stage and in carrying out and implementing programs) said he did not believe Metalore had met its reporting requirements under the 1981 agreement. He indicated that the Skrecky Report reported on part and only part of the work and that Stewart Winter's work was "an integral part" of the work program.

In response to a question from Ontex's counsel as to whether Metalore's March 29, 1983 letter to Ontex constituted an appropriate progress report, Macdonald replied with an "unequivocal no". He indicated he believed the 1981 agreement specifically called for a progress report and that such a document should state what was done, giving results and telling of future plans and recommendations.

Macdonald stated that upon making the "very significant discovery" involving Holes B31, B36, B38, and their wedges, industry practice would be to notify the plaintiff and then make a news release for the purpose of complying with Ontario Securities Commission rules. Macdonald indicated that the significant discovery was made as of the end of April 1984 at the latest; he pointed out that all of the results but those for wedge B31-A were available by the end of March 1984. He also said that the results for Hole B31, which indicated a "significant intersection", were available as of February 3, 1984.

Macdonald stated that for Metalore to have "the assay results (for B31, B36, B38, and their wedges) in hand and then turn around and make an offer (for Ontex's 10 per cent interest) would be totally unethical". Metalore's offer for the Ontex 10 per cent was made in a letter dated February 23, 1984. This may not be relevant as the Ontex 10 per cent was never sold, but it shows the mark of the man.

Regarding the disclosure obligations of Metalore when re-negotiating the 1981 agreement, Macdonald said Ontex was entitled to know of, and rely upon, the impressions and interpretation of Metalore at the time of the re-negotiation.

The disclosure provisions in the two agreements are clear and unambiguous.

THE EXPERTS

H.D. Hume was an expert called by Ontex. He is a non-geologist but the principal of a junior mining company with extensive experience. Mr. Hume's evidence was not contradicted. His credentials were first-rate and I found him to be an unshakeable witness.

Dr. David S. Robertson was called by Ontex as an expert in geology, including the evaluation and development of resource properties. I found Dr. Robertson to be a highly qualified geologist with an excellent understanding not only of the geology of the property but also of the facts of the case.

John A. Macdonald, whose opinions are discussed in part above, was called by Ontex. He impressed me with his grasp of the facts as well as the geology. He is engaged in providing consulting services to the mining industry. He has a Master's degree in geology and a Ph.D. in graduate studies. He was a highly credible witness with a calm, thoughtful and detailed delivery.

Ross D. Lawrence was called by Metalore as an expert in economic geology and mineral exploration practice. I have three serious reservations about Mr. Lawrence's testimony: first, I do not feel he was as well qualified as Dr. Robertson or Mr. Macdonald to give testimony about geological exploration; second, I found Mr. Lawrence to be ill-prepared; and finally, I lost confidence in Mr. Lawrence's objectivity when he assumed the tone of an advocate.

Dr. N.C. Carter was also called by Metalore. Like Mr. Lawrence, Dr. Carter's field of expertise is economic geology and practice in the mineral exploration industry. I was impressed both by Dr. Carter's knowledge of the subject-matter and his knowledge of the facts in this case; however, I was disappointed to see Dr. Carter let himself fall into the role of advocate when cross-examined. At one point in his testimony, Dr. Carter seemed to contradict a portion of his own report and only when pressed did he agree with the position expressed in his report.

Hugh Snyder testified for Metalore as an expert in economic geology and business practice in the mining industry. Though well qualified, Mr. Snyder was not a persuasive witness. He was defensive, evasive, and he too became an advocate.

Where conflict occurs among the experts, I prefer the opinions of Robertson and Macdonald on behalf of Ontex to Metalore's experts.

THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN THE PARTIES

Before embarking on an analysis of the relationship between the parties, it is important to understand something about the nature and work habits of George Chilian. This is so because the correspondence in the action is crucial to factual determinations. I conclude that Chilian is meticulous about detail and nuances in his correspondence and reports. A read-in from the Kowalski discovery shows the extent of detail and care taken by Chilian in drafting:

1073. Q. Would these reports go through a number of drafts? What was the process? A. Sometimes there would be a number of drafts.

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

1074. Q. You would prepare them here, in southern Ontario? A. Yes.

1075. Q. Would you type them up, or hand write them? A. I'd type them up.

1076. Q. And you'd then sent (sic) them to Mr. Chilian? A. Yes.

1077. Q. And he would review them? A. Yes.

1078. Q. And he would then return them to you? A. Yes.

1079. Q. And he would incorporate some changes, or changes he had requested? A. Right.

1080. Q. And then you'd type them up again? A. Right.

1081. Q. And then send it to him, for his review? A. Right, and they would come back again with more changes.

1082. Q. More changes? A. Yes. Sometimes it could go through more than ten versions.

1083. Q. He's fairly meticulous, is he? A. He is very meticulous about everything.

Another example is to be found in the careful redrafting of the January 27, 1986 letter from Chilian to Dickie. Under ordinary circumstances, one should not be hypercritical of differences in colour or flavour in correspondence addressed to different people. This is no ordinary circumstance. In my view, Chilian considered who the reader was and knew exactly the message he wished to impart. A consistent pattern developed of downplaying the value of the property to the owner and painting an optimistic picture to government and major mining companies.

The 1981 agreement between Brookbank and Metalore created a common enterprise: Brookbank, the owner, contributed the land, and Metalore its money and work. Their goal was to find and develop a mine in which each would share in the profit. In Chilian's letter of January 27, 1981 to Arthur White that led to the agreement, he said: "I would like to know if you would be interested in optioning or joint venturing this property with a production objective" (Emphasis added).

Metalore was the operator under the 1981 agreement and, while Brookbank had rights to an annual progress report and access to and information from the property, Metalore was in complete control of the release of the information from the property. Consequently, its power to conceal information was complete. As Peter Vamos stated with respect to his site visit in July 1984 you have to rely on the willingness of the operator to provide you with information because antagonizing the operator does not work.

Chilian admitted that Metalore would understand more about the property than anyone else, including Ontex, as work on the property continued. Chilian directed the exploration program with a hands-on approach and he personally spotted all the drill holes.

As operator Metalore had exclusive jurisdiction over the property, was in effective control of the property and controlled what information was released from the property.

Brookbank had to expect Metalore would release information on a timely basis. Dickie said in cross-examination that the owner has to trust and depend on the operator for timely information. Vance White said Ontex believed and trusted what Chilian was telling them. I conclude that Ontex trusted and relied upon Chilian, the operator. I reject the contention of Chilian that Ontex was lackadaisical in its approach to the project.

H.D. Hume, an expert called by Ontex, testified that because the common adversary is mother nature and the odds of success are very low, there exists in the industry a high degree of co-operation between the owner and the operator. He stated that there has to be a high degree of communication and that each party helps the other.

It is the practice in the mineral exploration industry that where agreements exist such as we have here (the 1981 and 1983 agreements), the party in control of the property must make full disclosure of all the information it possesses regarding the property when seeking to purchase the other party's interest. This was the evidence of Chilian, V. White and Dickie as well as that of D. Robertson, an expert called by Ontex and R. Lawrence, an expert called by Metalore.

Brookbank was entitled under the 1981 agreement to receive an annual report by July 1 each year from Metalore regarding the "mining operations" conducted by it on the 18 leased claims. That term is defined in the 1981 agreement, in part, as follows:

> ... "mining operations" shall include every kind of work done on or in respect of the Property or the products therefrom by or under the direction of Metalore and, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, shall include the work of assessment, geophysical, geochemical and geological surveys, studies and mapping, investigating, drilling, designing, examining, equipping, improving, surveying, shaft sinking, raising, cross-cutting and drifting, searching for, digging, trucking, sampling, working and producing minerals, ores and metals, in surveying and bringing any mining claims to lease or patent, in doing all other work usually considered to be prospecting, exploration, development and mining work ... .

Metalore argues that the Skrecky Report was sufficient to constitute a report to satisfy the mandatory reporting requirement. Metalore, according to Chilian, complied with this obligation by purporting to provide to Ontex copies of all the documentation it received from the work it had done on or in respect of the property. This documentation included:

(a) Skrecky Report;

(b) June 15, 1982 letter from Metalore to Brookbank-Sturgeon;

(c) November 10, 1981 Winterbourne Survey accompanied by two

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

maps;

(d) October 30, 1982 letter from Metalore to Brookbank-Sturgeon;

(e) March 29, 1983 letter from Metalore to Brookbank; and

(f) April 1983 Lassila Report delivered to Brookbank-Sturgeon on August 12, 1983.

Chilian said that in May 1982 Metalore, pursuant to its obligation to Brookbank, purported to deliver all the material it had to Brookbank.

In the documentation delivered, Metalore purported to provide not only the specific results of the physical work done but also its opinion, its feelings about, and its plans for the property. This is confirmed in Metalore's letters of June 15 and October 30, 1982 and March 29, 1983.

In so doing, Metalore was attempting to comply with its obligation to provide a progress report.

Geophysical data was communicated by Stewart Winter to Chilian in a handwritten letter of November 10, 1981 and that was provided to Ontex. However, the critical report of Winter, dated February 15, 1982, was never given to Ontex. Chilian made the crucial admission in cross-examination that this report should have been delivered to Ontex.

METALORE'S TRUE OPINION

It is important to analyze the letter that led up to the re-negotiated 1983 agreement. The June 15, 1982 letter of Chilian to Vance White says, in part: "overall results certainly did not live up to our expectations"; "we contemplate doing a second work program, about one-half the size of the initial one". Then follows a buy-out offer: "we are prepared to make you an offer for the outright purchase of the property for $50,000 cash plus 5% of net profits".

The October 30, 1982 letter says: "the assays of the fourth deep hole were very disappointing and I did not receive those assays ... until John Mason, the govt geologist, went into the property after I wrote to you on June 15. We are still prepared to give you $50,000, plus 5% of net profits".

The letter of March 29, 1983 is short and is reproduced in its entirety:

> This is to give you a brief resume of the work completed on the Brookbank property between December, 1982 and February, 1983.
>
> Three holes were drilled and VLF and Mag surveys (Proton) were completed on grids covering the areas drilled where geophysics had not previously been completed.
>
> 83M2, Line 36W, 462 feet, one assay above 0.10 Au 83M1,Line 18W,272 feet, only very low values 83-4, Line 6E,349 " " " " "
> 84M1 was a "fill-in" hole, recommended in the Skrecky report; however, it did not contribute a more positive result to the overall picture.
> 83M2 was a step-out, some 1400 feet west of our most westerly previous hole on Line 22W. It indicates there is still good exploratory potential for the 1400 feet between these holes and we will be drilling this out at maximum 200 foot centers this summer.

In my view in providing to Brookbank its opinion, its feelings and its plans for the property as set forth in the letters of June 15, October 30, 1982 and March 29, 1983, Metalore was doing so to comply with its obligation to provide a progress report. I find that Metalore knew of its obligation to make full disclosure of all the information it had on the property when making an offer to purchase the interest of the owner.

With respect to Metalore's wish in 1982 to buy out Brookbank, its motive was clearly articulated by its president. In his examination-in-chief, Chilian stated that from the outset he had not been content with the 1981 agreement because Brookbank had in his view retained too large an interest. He stated that Metalore knew that it was going to be spending a lot of money on the 18 leased claims and wanted to reduce Ontex's equity.

As summarized by Vance White, the disclosure made to Brookbank by Metalore at the time of negotiation indicated a lack of encouragement, that the results obtained were not living up to expectations and that the Skrecky program was generally discouraging.

In making these representations, Metalore purposely misled Brookbank and concealed its true feelings, opinions and plans for the property. Chilian admitted that he had ideas concerning the property in 1982 and 1983 that he did not share with Ontex.

I conclude that certain material facts were intentionally withheld by Metalore from Brookbank at the time of the re-negotiation.

Metalore's true opinion of the potential of the 18 leased claims was positive and optimistic and included the belief that there was a good probability that there existed on the 18 claims a large tonnage deposit of economic grade. In a letter of May 31, 1983 (before execution of the 1983 agreement), Chilian wrote to Dr. Gerald Riverin of Falconbridge Copper. The letter stated in part:

> We intend to fill-in both tiers, along the presently indicated length, at 100 foot intervals this season and possibly run a ramp or decline next year, since there is a new GOMILL right in Beardmore, presently idle and the zone is wide enough for an open cut, at least for bulk samples.
> ... and (Metalore) will probably need some production financing somewhere along the way ... .

A letter of July 11, 1983 from Chilian to the Department of Natural Resources says, in part:

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

Concerning our own property, we are involved in the third consecutive year of drilling, scheduled for 20,000 feet plus, this season, to delineate and define tonnage and grade of an indicated large tonnage deposit that was already recommended for shaft sinking by Noranda personnel in 1944.

Dr. Carter, a defence expert, said this meant an indicated large tonnage of economic value. While this letter postdates the execution of the 1983 agreement, the facts did not change from the date the agreement was signed and the date of this letter.

A further indication of Metalore's true opinion is expressed in its annual report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1983. This reads in part:

> Milestones of Progress have been achieved by your Company during its Fortieth Anniversary year of Resource Exploration and Development.
>
> Precious Metals (Milestone #4) ... Results thus far indicate that there is a good probability that an economic ore body can be developed at Windigokan and preparations are under way for extensive drilling to delineate the tonnage and grade of this deposit.
>
> For forty years the "Pioneers" of your company have wandered and searched the exploration wilderness -- in quest of that elusive ore body. We are now confident that we have reached our "promised land" at Windigoken.

Contrast the enthusiastic, optimistic and positive tone regarding the potential of the 18 leased claims reflected in this material to the letters of June 15 and October 30, 1982 and March 29, 1983, all written by the meticulous Mr. Chilian. I can conclude nothing short of artful deception.

THE FEBRUARY 15, 1982 WINTER REPORT

Metalore sought the opinion of L.D.S. Winter, a senior geologist whose opinion it respected. Metalore had specifically requested his opinion on the results obtained by G. Skrecky and the latter's report including the potential those results indicated and the prospects for future work. This opinion was provided to Metalore by letter dated February 15, 1982.

From the covering letter:

The drilling to date does not allow one to put numbers on tonnage and grade, but it is suggested that more detailed drilling could quite possibly indicate between 500,000 and 1,000,000 tons in the hanging wall and foliated zones combined, with an average grade of about 0.2 oz. Au per ton.

From the Winter Report:

1.1 FOLIATED OR CONTACT ZONE ADJACENT TO THE VOLCANIC-SEDIMENT CONTACT

This zone was intersected in the 4 deep holes drilled on lines 10W, 12W, 20W and 22W as well as the shallower holes. The foliated zone is consistent and appears to become stronger in depth and to the west but due to the wide spacing of the drill holes there is no indication that ore grade gold mineralization over mineable widths is as consistent as the altered foliated zone. The shallow drill holes indicate a lack of continuity to the mineralization within an altered zone. The intersections in the deeper holes suggest some continuity but their spacing is too wide to confirm it. One assessment is that the foliated zone consists of some ore grade shoots or lenses close to surface and to the east which become more connected and continuous in depth and to the west. This zone is considered to have the best potential to develop a significant tonnage with a grade between 0.2 and 0.1 Au per ton. As such, it is suggested that considerable drilling be done on this structure to determine its economic potential.

. . . . .

3. PROPOSED FUTURE WORK

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

On the assumption that the objective is to outline an economic gold deposit that could be brought into production, the following work is proposed as a means of attaining that objective.

3.1 Detailed drilling of the foliated zone, particularly between lines 10W and 22W. This would consist of both shallow and deep holes.

. . . . .

4. OTHER CONSIDERATIONS

It is understood that Pancontinental Mining Ltd. is refurbishing the old Empire mine at Beardmore and as part of this process is constructing a 400 tpd (tons per day) gold mill.

This letter and the enclosed report were not produced by Metalore and only came to the knowledge of Ontex through its own investigative efforts. But for those efforts this action would have proceeded without the existence of this letter coming to the attention of the court.

Chilian says he had no recollection of the Winter Report, nor does he recall receiving the report. He says he forgot all about it until it was found by Ontex in the summer of 1990.

I do not accept Chilian's evidence. This is the only report that has gone missing from Metalore's files. The report was specifically requested by Metalore from a geologist whose opinion it respected. In fact Metalore had first asked L.D.S. Winter to conduct the 1981 drill program but he was too expensive and G. Skrecky was engaged.

Metalore gave the report to the Ontario Mineral Exploration Program (OMEP) of the Ministry of Natural Resources on May 28, 1982, within the same month that it purported to deliver all its material on the property to Brookbank. The report itself is the most important analysis done, to aid a non-geologist owner, on the property at that time, identifying both a substantial potential and the primary target in language clearly understandable to the non-professional.

Vance White said he was "shocked" when he saw the report on June 18, 1990. There would have been no re-negotiation, he said, if he had seen this report earlier.

The expert H.D. Hume said this report would cause "a flare to go up'', that one would not forget about this report and that it was ''getting awfully close to a mine".

J.A. Macdonald said, "you'd be excited about (the report), you're in the ball park". He also testified that the difference between the Winter Report and the Skrecky Report is "the difference between night and day".

Dr. Robertson testified that many clients would not understand the detailed Skrecky Report and said his practice is to write a three to four page covering letter explaining a report. He stated that in the Winter Report, "Stewart Winter is telling Chilian that this is a darn good bet". Dr. Robertson felt it "inconceivable" that an explorationist would forget about the Winter Report, the only report of authority at the time.

R. Lawrence, a geologist called by Metalore, agreed in cross-examination that he could not point out how the Skrecky Report could be read to disclose the potential for 500,000 to 1,000,000 tons grading .2 oz/ton of gold. He admitted that for someone reading the report the difference between .1 and .2 is significant. He agreed that the experienced geologist can articulate in concise form what the client can look for as a target and that was what Winter had done in his report. He had identified a useful target to go after which would justify a $500,000 program to pursue.

Dr. Carter, a defence expert, stated that nowhere in the Skrecky Report could you really come up with the tonnage and grade identified in the Winter Report. He further stated that 500,000 to 1,000,000 tons of .1 is not economic. However, he testified that that same tonnage at a grade of .2 is the threshold of a commercial deposit. He also testified that the owner upon receipt of the Winter Report would be interested in Winter's further thoughts and views on the property.

Mr. Snyder, another defence expert, stated that 1 million tons grading .1 was worthless. He further stated that Winter in giving the figures of 500,000 to 1,000,000 tons grading .2 was providing his professional opinion as to what could happen. Although initially he stated that .2 was not economic he later admitted that 1 million tons of .2 in this area is approaching the threshold of a commercial mine. Since all exploration information is of interest to an owner, the Winter Report would be of interest to the owner.

Herbert Douglas Hume was not contradicted. He described the Winter Report as a different animal than the Skrecky Report and as an analysis of the field report of Skrecky. He said he would very seldom receive a report like the Winter Report. He said no junior resource company would forget about the Winter Report. When asked if he would expect as an owner to receive the Winter Report, he said: "Absolutely!".

Dr. David Robertson said Winter saw what Skrecky saw, but Winter was telling Chilian from the point of view of his experience that the property is a good bet. He said it is the sort of report Brookbank should get from its operator.

Robertson said the Winter Report was fundamental and something the operator was obliged to give to the owner. He described the October 30, 1982 letter of Chilian to White as absolute misinformation. In the March 29, 1983 letter, Chilian said to White that Hole 83M 1 did not contribute a more positive result to the overall picture. Robertson described 83M 1 as a darn good hole and could not understand how Chilian could write such contradictory letters.

John A. Macdonald described the four deep holes of Skrecky as indicating downdip continuity of the foliated zone improving at depth. This is a positive finding. He said the Metalore deep holes were better than the Noranda shallow holes and that a strike length of 800 feet of .1 oz. of gold was very significant. He also said Chilian's letter of June 15, 1982 was not a fair representation of the 1981 drill program. He said comparing the Chilian letters to White with the Chilian letter to Dr. Riverin of Falconbridge, you would not recognize that it was the same property under discussion.

He said the significance of the Winter Report was the potential for significant tonnage and that was very positive news on the property that any junior mining company would be delighted to get.

Winter's primary target zone was stated in 3.1 of his report to be the foliated zone, particularly between lines 10W and 22W. The so-called discovery hole, B31, was within that area. Macdonald interpreted it as saying "stay in the centre, don't flank out". Yet Chilian flanked out and did not touch that target area until he obtained execution of the 1983 agreement.

Macdonald said Chilian's March 29, 1983 letter to White did not meet reporting requirements. It should have outlined what was planned, what was done and what results were achieved. He said paragraph 4 of the letter to Dr. Riverin of May 31, 1983 contained information not in the report to White: e.g., "probably need some production financing somewhere along the way." He described the difference in the letters as the difference between black and white.

Barbara Kowalski was the most knowledgeable person about the Brookbank other than Chilian. She was aware of his stalling tactics and they were commented upon in her diary. She might have given further insight into the disappearance of the Winter Report. She was never called by the defence. I can come to no other conclusion than to find that Chilian deliberately and knowingly secreted and withheld the Winter Report.

Drilling the gap

Metalore had not yet drilled the area with the greatest known potential. Metalore intentionally refrained in its 1981 drill program and again in its 1982-83 drill program from drilling the "gap" being the known area of greatest potential on the 18 leased claims.

Metalore viewed N-8 as an important hole in its analysis of the property. It was the best hole Noranda had drilled. Metalore in the Skrecky Drill Program (1981) correlated two shallow holes (M-21 and M-22) with N-8. Metalore, however, refrained from N-8 by drilling at depth. Metalore left that area alone. Instead, Metalore drilled the required four deep holes at the reasonable extremities of the Brookbank zone leaving the "gap" in between untouched (lines 12 west and 20 west). Metalore did not intend to drill the "gap" until later. The 1982-83 program did not touch the "gap". It was only after the re-negotiation of the 1981 agreement that Metalore returned to drill the "gap'' at depth where it found below Noranda's N-8 the Discovery Hole B31 in the very next drill program.

Production of the Winter Report would have shown this to be Winter's first target zone. What might Barbara Kowalski have said about why the gap was not drilled before execution of the 1983 contract? In light of Chilian's desire to reduce Ontex's equity, I conclude that he deliberately refrained from drilling the gap until he had the 1983 agreement signed.

The location of the 20,000 feet of drilling

Metalore's drill program for the 1983-84 season was to drill 20,000 feet all on the 18 leased claims. However, Brookbank was led to believe that a substantial amount of this drilling would take place on the 39 staked claims.

Vance White was led to believe by Metalore that the bulk of the proposed 20,000 feet of drilling the next season was going to be carried out on the 39 staked claims. Metalore's March 29, 1983 letter to Brookbank describes a drill program on the west end of the 18 leased claims of only about 3,000 feet.

Metalore admitted that it was reasonable for Brookbank to believe from Metalore's statements that an extensive amount of the work was going to be done on the 39 staked claims. Metalore planned to do all 20,000 feet of drilling on the 18 leased claims and their plans for drilling in the 1983-84 program did not change between March 1983 and August 1983 when the program commenced, according to Chilian's evidence.

Metalore described their proposed program in far different terms when communicating with persons other than Brookbank. In his May 31, 1983 letter to Falconbridge Copper, Chilian described a program of 10,000 to 11,700 feet in the central part of the Brookbank zone where the discovery was actually made. In his July 11, 1983 letter to the Department of Natural Resources, Chilian advised that the 20,000 feet of drilling was being directed on the 18 leased claims to "delineate and define tonnage and grade of an indicated large tonnage deposit".

The defence experts all agreed that the program described to Brookbank and the program Metalore in truth planned to undertake in 1983-84 were substantially different. They also agreed that this would be of significance to someone in the position of Brookbank.

If Brookbank had been told that 20,000 feet of drilling was to be done on its property, would it as a reasonable enterprise have reduced its own equity in the property? Indeed, Chilian told Dr. Riverin of Falconbridge that drilling would probably go on forever on the leased property. This is another opinion he failed to pass on to Brookbank.

THE VALUE OF THE 39 STAKED CLAIMS

It was Metalore's proposal to contribute the 39 staked claims to the property package in March 1983. Brookbank trusted Chilian's judgment and was relying on his geological expertise. Chilian knew this. Chilian was not saying anything negative about the 39 staked claims to White in the course of the negotiations. Chilian told White that Metalore had completed "the geology" on some of the 39 staked claims, but with respect to drilling he did not advise White of the results of the drilling.

Chilian admitted that by that stage, nothing he had drilled on the 39 staked claims showed anything as promising as had been shown on the Brookbank zone on the 18 leased claims. He also admitted that he did not tell White this fact.

In a letter to the Toronto Stock Exchange, Chilian described the result of the drilling on the 39 staked claims as disclosing little or no encouragement.

While Chilian's conduct with his co-venturer lacked candour here, I am not prepared to conclude that with respect to the 39 staked claims I can infer any fraudulent deception.

The status of the four lapsed claims

Four of the 39 staked claims that Metalore was introducing into the property package had lapsed at the time of signing the 1983 agreement but Metalore represented to Brookbank that at that time all 39 were in good standing.

In the course of the re-negotiation of the 1981 agreement, Chilian made certain representations regarding the status of the 39 staked claims.

In cross-examination, Chilian admitted that he was keeping track of the status of the 39 staked claims with the use of claim maps and abstracts. He conceded that his representation in the April 5, 1983 letter was that the 39 staked claims would all have sufficient assessment work on them to remain in good standing for at least eight months. Chilian admitted that on May 29, 1983 four of the 39 claims lapsed.

Notwithstanding that the third recital in the 1983 agreement was false in stating that Metalore was the holder of 39 staked claims I must conclude that error to be negligent misstatement. I do not ascribe any animus to this conduct.

I conclude that the intentional withholding of material facts outlined under the headings, "Metalore's True Opinion", "The February 15, 1982 Winter Report", "Drilling the Gap" and "The Location of the 20,000 Feet of Drilling", constitute a breach of the 1981 agreement, which goes to the very root of that agreement. Similarly, the intentional withholding of the same material goes to the root of the 1983 agreement and constitutes fraud.

THE LAW OF FRAUD

There is no exhaustive definition of fraud. Some references from cases follow:

Parna v. G. & S. Properties Ltd., [1971] S.C.R. 306, 15 D.L.R. (3d) 336 at p. 316 S.C.R.:

> Fraud is a false representation of fact, made with a knowledge of its falsehood, or recklessly, without belief in its truth, with the intention that it should be acted upon by the complaining party, and actually inducing him to act upon it.

Re London and Globe Finance Corp., [1903] 1 Ch. 728, [1900-3] All E.R. Rep. 891, 88 L.T. 194, 10 Mans. 198 at pp. 732-33 Ch.:

> To defraud is to deprive by deceit: it is by deceit to induce a man to act to his injury. More tersely it may be put, that to deceive is by falsehood to induce a state of mind; to defraud is by deceit to induce a course of action.

Scott v. Commissioner of Police for the Metropolis, [1974] 3 All E.R. 1032, [1975] A.C. 819, 60 Cr. App. Rep. 124, 181 Sol. Jo. 863 (H.L.), at p. 1038 All E.R.: The definition of "defraud" in the London and Globe Finance case is not exhaustive and the word ordinarily means:

> ... to deprive a person dishonestly of something which is his or of something to which he is or would or might but for the perpetration of the fraud, be entitled.

Silence and half-truths that mislead or imply something other than the truth may amount to a fraudulent misrepresentation:

Curtis v. Chemical Cleaning & Dyeing Co., [1951] 1 K.B. 805, [1951] 1 All E.R. 631, 95 Sol. Jo. 253 (C.A.), Denning L.J. (as he then was), at p. 809 K.B., adopted in Panzer v. Zeifman (1978), 20 O.R. (2d) 502, 88 D.L.R. (3d) 131 (C.A.), at

p. 509 O.R.:

> ... a representation may be literally true but practically false, not because of what is said, but because of what is left unsaid; in short, because of what is implied. This is as true of an innocent misrepresentation as it is of a fraudulent misrepresentation.

> The law with respect to deceit by half-truth has its foundation in the colourful dictum of Chambre J. in Tapp v. Lee (1803), 3 Bos. & P. 367, 127 E.R. 200 at 203:
> "An action on the case for deceit is an action well known to the law, and I cannot agree in the argument which has been used for the Defendant, that such actions ought to be confined to representations which are literally false. Fraud may consist as well in the suppression of what is true, as in the representation of what is false. If a man, professing to answer a question, select those facts only which are likely to give a credit to the person of whom he speaks, and keep back the rest, he is a more artful knave than he who tells a direct falsehood."

In Peek v. Gurney (1873), L.R. 6 H.L. 377, Lord Chelmsford observes (at pp. 391-92) that while mere concealment will not suffice to give rise to a right of action in deceit, so that there must be "something actively done to deceive (the other party) and draw him in to deal with the person withholding the truth from him", this may well be accomplished by a half-truth. He observes that half a truth will sometimes amount to a "real falsehood", and may contain "a positive misrepresentation". The law is summarized in Spencer-Bower and Turner on Actionable Misrepresentation (3rd ed., 1974), at p. 94 in this passage:

"To state a thing which is true only with qualifications or additions known to, but studiously with-held by, the representor is to say the thing which is not. Such a statement is a lie, and one of the most dangerous and insidious forms of lie."

In defence of a claim for fraud, it is no answer for the defendant to say that the falsehood would have been discovered had the plaintiff made his own investigations. This was set out by Jessel M.R. in Redgrave v. Hurd (1881), 20 Ch. D. 1, [1881-5] All E.R. Rep. 77, 45 L.T. 485 (C.A.), at p. 13 Ch. D.:

If a man is induced to enter into a contract by a false representation it is not a sufficient answer to him to say, "If you had used due diligence you would have found out that the statement was untrue. You had the means afforded you of discovering its falsity, and did not choose to avail yourself of them."

The breaches of the 1981 and 1983 agreements previously outlined require rescission of the contracts. The 1981 agreement constituted a common enterprise between the parties. The conduct of Chilian has fractured any ability of these parties to continue to work together. The trust, the confidence, the good faith has been blasted away by the conduct of one party. The 1983 contract did not come into force until registration. That did not occur until 1986 -- by then there were further falsehoods and deception perpetrated by Chilian. There has been a total failure to make full and complete disclosure both under the mandatory and request aspects of the contracts.

For the reasons given I concluded both agreements to be fundamentally breached. If the 1983 agreement survived its birth it died very soon after because of further vital breaches.

SECURITIES ACT

The assay results for Hole B31 (0.35 oz./ton of gold over 54

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

feet) were extraordinarily good. Chilian admitted in cross-examination that if the results of B31 had been released, the price of Metalore stock would have increased significantly.

The results for Hole B31 constituted a "material change" in the affairs of Metalore. Section 1(1), para. 21 of the Securities Act, R.S.O. 1980, c. 466 defines "material change" as follows:

> 1(1)21. "material change" where used in relation to the affairs of an issuer means a change in the business, operations or capital of the issuer that would reasonably be expected to have a significant effect on the market price or value of any of the securities of the issuer and includes a decision to implement such a change made by the board of directors of the issuer or by senior management of the issuer who believe that confirmation of the decision by the board of directors is probable.

Both D. Robertson and J.A. Macdonald, experts in the field of exploration geology called on behalf of Ontex, stated that by no later than the end of March 1984 Metalore knew that it had a significant discovery and was obliged, given general industry practice and their understanding of the regulations of the Ontario Securities Commission, to make public disclosure. While I agree with the experts that Chilian was obligated to make public disclosure under Ontario security law, I have formed this opinion based on my own reading of the Securities Act.

Notwithstanding his lack of familiarity, R. Lawrence (for the defence) described Hole 84-B31 in his evidence as a "significant milestone" and labelled it as the "Discovery Hole" on Exhibit 107 although he removed this label for the longitudinal section which was entered as Exhibit 102 in his evidence-in-chief. I found this to be improper conduct for an expert who is supposed to be unbiased. N. Carter (for the defence) admitted in cross-examination that he had not reviewed the relevant logs in detail. He then advised that his view that some confusion could have arisen from the results of 84-B31, 84-B36 and 84-B38 perhaps came from his looking at the core, but he was unable to identify which core and stated that maybe he had looked at the core for subsequent holes. This evidence reflected a disregard and lack of proper analysis of the existing data.

Chilian got the assay results of the Discovery Hole 84-B31 by telephone on February 3, 1984. Instead of promptly notifying his co-venturer of the discovery, Chilian wrote to Ontex on February 24, 1984, offering to buy Ontex's 10 per cent net royalty interest. Chilian admitted in cross-examination that Metalore could not buy Ontex out without making disclosure. Chilian said he really didn't intend to go through with this without making disclosure. I find these answers to be utter fabrication. What did he do then? He furnished map Exhibit 7 which showed 84-B31 and 84-B36 with no assay results. As .1 is the cut-off point, below which assays are not expected to be posted, this left a reader of the map with the impression that there was less than .1 gold per ton on these assays. That was another example of an attempt to deceive Ontex. It was totally false disclosure.

Chilian and Kowalski met with representatives of Ontex at the March 1984 Prospector's Convention. Chilian had no recollection of what went on at the Prospector's Convention. However, the Kowalski diary entry for March 5, 1984 states "Hopefully they (Ontex) will take our offer and sell their interest in the Brookbank". Kowalski's diary describes the results for B31 as "Discovery!".

Did Chilian rush off to tell his co-venturer the wonderful news of Metalore's discovery on February 3, 1984 and then promptly make a press release as required? No! He secreted the discovery for two years during which time he went to the market personally as an insider and bought stock and set off on a course of land acquisition to the detriment of his business associate.

Insider trading

On the same day that Chilian obtained the results for Hole 84-B31, he went into the market and purchased Metalore shares. He purchased these shares without disclosing the results to the public.

In the ensuing months, Chilian continued to purchase Metalore stock without making public disclosure of the important drill results for B31 and other deep holes. This included purchases of stock on the open market, purchases of stock from his 91-year-old father and acquisition of stock from Metalore itself pursuant to an option agreement.

Chilian admitted on cross-examination that he should not have been buying Metalore stock in the circumstances.

Barbara Kowalski also participated in the purchase of Metalore stock while in possession of inside information regarding drill results that had not been released to the public.

Chilian admitted that disclosure of the Hole B-31 results would have had the effect of increasing the value of Metalore stock. This is a material change in the affairs of Metalore and required public disclosure pursuant to s. 74(1), (2) and (3) of the Securities Act:

> 74.(1) Subject to subsection (3), where a material change occurs in the affairs of a reporting issuer, it shall forthwith issue and file a press release authorized by a senior officer disclosing the nature and substance of the change.
>
> (2) Subject to subsection (3), the reporting issuer shall file a report of such material change in accordance with the regulations as soon as practicable and in any event within ten days of the date on which the change occurs.
>
> (3) Where,
>
> (a) in the opinion of the reporting issuer, the disclosure required by subsections (1) and (2) would be unduly detrimental to the interests of the reporting issuer; or
>
> (b) the material change consists of a decision to implement

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

a change made by senior management of the issuer who believe that confirmation of the decision by the board of directors is probable and senior management of the issuer has no reason to believe that persons with knowledge of the material change have made use of such knowledge in purchasing or selling securities of the issuer, the reporting issuer may, in lieu of compliance with subsection (1), forthwith file with the Commission the report required under subsection (2) marked "confidential" together with written reasons for non-disclosure.

Metalore was required on making the disclosure to forthwith "issue and file a press release". Instead of complying "forthwith" Chilian waited two years. Chilian's excuse was that he was acquiring more land. Another reason he gave was he questioned the results of B31 and wondered if his son had salted the assay. I reject this suggestion. The wedge of B31 displayed high assays too.

In any event, Chilian failed to take advantage of the provisions of s. 74(3) and file a confidential report together with written reasons for non-disclosure. There was therefore no lawful excuse for not making public disclosure.

In January, February and March 1984, there were rumours and, in Chilian's opinion, a leak of the results of the discovery hole from the assay laboratory which resulted in a surge of trading in Metalore stock. Both of these events required public disclosure of the results obtained pursuant to T.S.E. guidelines. No such disclosure was made. Metalore was at the time a member of the T.S.E.

At this time the 1983 agreement was still executory since no registration of the agreement had occurred and did not occur until 1986. There was no basis for Metalore's failure to disclose the discovery to Ontex. Ontex was entitled to expect Metalore to at least observe the law relating to public disclosure.

Armed with the assay result of B31, not only did Chilian trade as an insider in Metalore prior to making public disclosure, he embarked on a staking program to the exclusion of Ontex and he traded as an insider in Ontex shares.

Immediately after obtaining the results for Hole 84-B31 on February 3, 1984, Metalore engaged in a claim staking and acquisition program. This program ultimately resulted in its acquisition of 232 claims along with the volcanic/ sedimentary contact which runs through the Brookbank property. These claims were acquired before July 1, 1985. Metalore also staked or acquired an additional 227 claims before it made the public announcement of the discovery in March 1986, including claims running along a second volcanic/ sedimentary contact to the south.

Ontex says that if the discovery had been disclosed to it Ontex would have shared in the staking. Ontex had $300,000 in its treasury at the time. Announcement of a discovery would have increased Ontex borrowing powers and provided funds for land acquisition. It is clear, therefore, that Ontex could have financed a staking campaign.

Let us look at Chilian's acquisition of Ontex stock prior to public disclosure.

By December 1985 Chilian knew that he was soon going to have to make a public announcement of the discovery. Commencing in December 1985, and continuing through until January 27, 1986, Chilian purchased approximately 90,000 shares of Ontex. He effected these purchases through a numbered company and the facilities of the Bank of Montreal, both vehicles being intentionally used by him to conceal his identity as the purchaser from the public. These shares were purchased for a total cash consideration of $14,150.

The discovery was publicly announced by Metalore in March 1986. In April 1986 Chilian sold the 90,000 Ontex shares for a total cash consideration of $94,150 thereby obtaining a profit of approximately $80,000. In order to effect the sale transactions, Chilian continued to use the numbered company but on this occasion he used the facilities of the Royal Bank of Canada. His purpose in using these vehicles was to conceal his identity as vendor from the public.

In cross-examination, Chilian admitted that he engaged in this share trading activity in Ontex stock so that he might "get ahead". His purpose was solely to make a personal profit. Chilian saw his purchase of Ontex stock before the announcement as a way of making some money from the public announcement.

In the circumstances, Chilian breached s. 75 of the Securities Act:

> 75.(1) No person or company in a special relationship with a reporting issuer shall,
>
> (a) purchase or sell securities of the reporting issuer with the knowledge of a material fact or material change in the affairs of the reporting issuer that he or it knew or ought reasonably to have known had not been generally disclosed; or
>
> (b) inform, other than in the necessary course of business, another person or company about a fact or change which he knows is a material fact or material change before the material fact or material change has been generally disclosed.
>
> . . . . .
>
> (3) For the purposes of this section, a person or company is in a special relationship with a reporting issuer where,
>
> (a) the person or company is an insider or an affiliate of the reporting issuer;
>
> (b) the person is a director, officer or employee of the reporting issuer or of a company that is an insider or an affiliate of the reporting issuer;
>
> (c) the person or company has engaged, is engaging in or

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

proposes to engage in any business or professional activities with or on behalf of the reporting issuer and thereby has acquired knowledge of the material fact or material change; or

(d) the person or company is an associate of the reporting issuer or of any person or company referred to in clause (a), (b) or (c). [s. 75 since rep. & sub. 1987, c. 7, s. 7; proclaimed in force February 15, 1988]

In addition to the failure to disclose the discovery to Ontex, Chilian invited Ontex geologist Peter Vamos to have a site visit at the property in July of 1984. At that time Vamos was refused information except for vague generalities. It is clear to me that Chilian again rebuffed Ontex's attempts to get information. Up to the time of delivery of the "box" of material Ontex trusted Chilian. These two events of non-disclosure go to the root of the 1983 agreement as well as constituting vital breaches of contract.

By the end of August 1984 Metalore had in its possession sufficient values for the deep holes that even absent all the breaches set forth above, there existed absolutely no justification for withholding such information from the public beyond August 1984. In fact, Metalore was in possession of all the results which it subsequently published in the March 24, 1986 Northern Miner article by August of 1984.

Ontex, trusting its operator, was prepared to wait. Ontex believed that if Metalore had been possessed of material information it would have been provided on a timely basis. Throughout this period and up to the delivery of "the box" in March 1986 W.P. Dickie understood that there was no significant or material information apart from the two maps (Exhibits 7 and 17) which had been delivered to Ontex at the end of March 1984.

Notwithstanding the trust of Ontex, Metalore and its president possessed material information which Metalore purposely withheld from Ontex and the public while the president and geologist of Metalore to Metalore's knowledge continued to trade, admittedly improperly, in the shares of the company. Metalore also continued to misuse confidential information in staking and acquiring adjacent mining claims to the east and west.

"THE BOX"

Metalore delivered a box of materials to the plaintiff in March 1986. The box contained drill logs and reports. Peter Vamos testified as to the condition of the data contained in the box. In many instances, there were no assays posted to logs. In other cases, the poorer assays were posted to logs with the better assays having been deleted. With respect to cross-sections, poorer assays were posted to some holes whereas the more significant assays were omitted. The practical effect of presenting the data in this manner was to create confusion and frustration. It is clear from the testimony of the experts called by the plaintiff that this is not the customary manner in which to present such information. No working papers were provided.

DECEPTION OF OMEP

The deception continued. The Ontario government was deceived. J. Bruce Gordon testified that under the OMEP program an explorationist was required to post assays on the logs if assaying had been carried out. This is because public funds were being spent for the assaying and the public was entitled to the information. When asked whether it was proper to file logs with only the poor assays posted and while leaving off the good assays he responded "Pick and choose? -- Certainly not!"

Assays, according to OMEP, are to be posted to the logs. Metalore deleted significant assays from logs it submitted to OMEP. It only supplied the assays on a separate piece of paper after public disclosure was made.

Metalore deleted significant assays from the logs submitted to OMEP.

Mr. Gordon also said that one could not claim a cost incurred in the course of one OMEP program in the subsequent year's OMEP program. An expenditure in excess of an OMEP program budget could not be recovered.

In cross-examination, Chilian admitted that he knew you could not carry over expenditures from one year to another under the OMEP program. However, an invoice from Bradley Brothers Limited dated March 25, 1984 in the amount of $43,528.89 for drilling conducted in March 31, 1983 to April 1, 1984 program was characterized as an April 1984 invoice.

Thus the $43,528.89 was claimed in a subsequent year. Chilian did this knowingly and obtained a 25 per cent rebate on the $43,528.89 committing fraud to the public purse.

PUBLIC DECEPTION -- THE NORTHERN MINER ARTICLES

To comply belatedly with the need for public disclosure two articles appeared in the Northern Miner.

The falsification of information in the two Northern Miner articles (March 24 and 31, 1986) described by J.A. Macdonald can be clearly seen from Exhibit 46 and the diagram, Exhibit 47.

The March 24, 1986 Northern Miner article stated in part:

Hole 34, drilled in late 1985, intersected 54.4 feet grading 0.47 ounces gold per ton from a depth of approximately 1,250 feet, George Chilian, President, says.

Nick Tintor, a geologist, the author of the Northern Miner article of March 24, 1986, said he specifically recalled Mr. Chilian telling him that "Hole 34" was drilled in late 1985. He also recalled the intersection given. Chilian's statements to Tintor were false and misleading.

Northern Miner "Hole 34" was actually Metalore Hole 84-B31. Further, the results for the hole given in the Northern Miner actually came from the wedge hole, 84-B31A. Hole 84-B31 was drilled in January 1984 and the assay results were received on February 3, 1984. Thus, the impression given by Chilian's statement to Mr. Tintor was that the discovery hole was drilled almost two years later than when in truth it had been drilled.

The actual hole numbers were changed for purposes of publication in the Northern Miner because Chilian "wanted the numbers to appear as if they were drilled in a particular sequence", according to Kowalski's discovery evidence, which was read in. I conclude this was done to deceive Ontex.

R. Lawrence, defence expert, said that it could be very important to know when a discovery is made. He testified that he saw a misstatement of fact in Chilian's representation as to when the discovery hole was drilled. Lawrence characterized this as "dishonest". He also said that the difference between the actual value for the main hole and the value that was reported in the Northern Miner was "significant".

Other examples of false or misleading information contained in the Northern Miner articles include the fact that only 8 of 24 pierce points in the zone were reported, only the better intercepts were reported with the poor intercepts being omitted, and the zone was said to be open to the west when this was not true.

Not only did Chilian mislead Ontex, he flagrantly and knowingly misled the public. I reject Chilian's evidence where it conflicts with other witnesses. He is a totally incredible witness.

Assay dates are often not listed. That is consistent with the dishonest disclosure in the Northern Miner of when the discovery was made. Some other matters reported in the Northern Miner were not in the box at all.

The contents of the box, the misinformation, the missing information and the failure to fairly present the information as well go to breach of the two agreements.

INTEREST BY FALCONBRIDGE

By letter dated May 18, 1983 Corporation Falconbridge Copper wrote to Metalore expressing interest in the property. After receiving Metalore's response by letter dated May 31, 1983, Falconbridge wrote by letter dated June 3, 1983 to Metalore. The letter concluded:

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

> If we are still interested in your property after our visit, I hope that you will consider Corporation Falconbridge Copper as a possible partner for either exploration or development work.

Gerald Riverin said that Falconbridge had looked at 400 to 600 gold properties, identified 20 to 25 of the most interesting prospects and determined that, of those prospects, the Brookbank property was the first priority. Falconbridge wished to acquire an interest in the Brookbank property.

In a memorandum dated September 1, 1983, recording a telephone conversation which Riverin had with Chilian, Riverin states that "G. Chilian mentioned that Metalore will drill an initial 20,000 feet but that 'drilling is likely to go on forever'."

Representatives from Falconbridge, including Riverin, visited the Brookbank property in September 1983. After visiting the property, Riverin recorded in a memo the following: "After the visit we clearly told G. Chilian that CFC (Falconbridge) is interested in acquiring an interest in the prospect."

By letter dated October 27, 1983 Falconbridge advised Metalore of the following:

> I also wish to confirm that our company would definitely be interested in participating in the development of your Beardmore property if you ever need a partner for the project.

In a memorandum dated October 28, 1983, Riverin stated the following:

> After compilation of available data and after our visit, the Metalore prospect still appears as an outstanding target and every effort should be made to acquire it. Our interest in the property was made clear to Metalore.

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

In a memorandum dated November 14, 1983, Riverin identified the Metalore property as the number one priority for acquisition by Falconbridge.

By letter dated May 3, 1984 to Metalore, Falconbridge again expressed interest in the Brookbank property. The letter stated, in part:

> Your project is still very much of interest to us and before we pursue further any of the numerous proposals that we receive from various prospectors and companies, we need to know what the possibilities are (if any) for getting involved in exploring and/or developing your property.

By letter dated May 12, 1984 to Falconbridge, Chilian responded to Falconbridge:

> I will keep in touch with you when and if a participant is needed.

An expression of interest by a major such as Falconbridge is of importance to a junior company such as Ontex. A major mining company has production experience, expertise and funding ability. A junior whose property has attracted the interest of a major achieves a level of credibility.

An expression of interest by a major mining company in the Brookbank property is something about which Metalore would be expected to advise Ontex, according to Dr. Robertson.

THE LAW

Breach of contract

Stephen M. Waddams, The Law of Contracts, 2nd ed. (Aurora, Ont.: Canada Law Book, 1984), at pp. 440-442:

> A variety of expressions has been used to define the sort of term that, if broken by one party, will excuse the other. "Dependent covenant", covenant which goes to the whole of the consideration", "condition", "condition precedent", "breach going to the root of the contract", "concurrent condition", breach that "terminates" or "frustrates the object" of the contract, "non-severable breach", "repudiation", "renunciation", "breach of an entire contract", are among the expressions used. Behind them all, it is suggested, lies a single notion -- that of substantial failure of performance. Diplock, L.J., said in Hongkong Fir Shipping Co. Ltd. v. Kawasaki Kisen Kaisha Ltd.:

"... in what event will a party be relieved of his undertaking to do that which he has agreed to do but has not yet done? ...

The test whether an event has this effect or not has been stated in a number of metaphors all of which I think amount to the same thing; does the occurrence of the event deprive the party who has further undertakings still to perform of substantially the whole benefit which it was the intention of the parties as expressed in the contract that he should obtain as the consideration for performing those undertakings?"

Fundamental breach is a phrase sometimes employed for this purpose but its meaning has been distorted by its use for a different purpose altogether, namely, to control unfair exclusions of liability. An exclusion of liability is said not to apply if there is a "fundamental breach"; the effect of this doctrine has been, of course, that courts tend to employ the phrase "fundamental breach" as a technique for relieving parties from exclusions of liability that are seen as unfair. But the inquiry into the unfairness of an exclusion clause is very different from the inquiry into whether one party should be excused on the ground of the other's non-performance. Clarity of thought demands that they be kept separate. In Keefe v. Fort, Pace, J.A., said that:

"In recent history, the term 'fundamental breach' appears to have taken on a meaning all of its own, which in its application tends to mystify rather than clarify the true meaning of the concept. In my opinion, it means nothing more or nothing less than the type of breach which entitles the innocent party to treat it as a repudiatory and to rescind the contract."

In California Prune & Apricot Growers Inc. v. Baird, [1926] S.C.R. 208, [1926] 1 D.L.R. 314, at p. 217 S.C.R., Mr. Justice Rinfret said:

> In that view, the mode of shipment is a material and indeed an essential term of the contract. The consequence is that its non-performance is not "an unimportant variation" which may, under the present contract, be excluded as constituting a "basis for a claim"; but, on the contrary, "may fairly be considered by the other party as a substantial failure to perform the contract at all" [Wallis v. Pratt, [1911] A.C. 394].

Here, the fact that the freight car was routed CPR rather than CNR from Chicago went to the root of the contract.

Metalore breached its obligations under the 1981 agreement in three fundamental aspects: it intentionally provided misleading facts; it intentionally failed to provide the Winter Report, dated February 15, 1982; and it withheld other vital information from Ontex. The 1981 agreement, therefore, falls and the 18 leased mining claims must be returned to Ontex.

A breach by one party to a contract that goes to the core, heart, root or essence of the contract allows the other party to treat the breach as repudiatory and to rescind the contract.

In addition to the common law remedy, failure to perform obligations was addressed in paragraph 10 of the agreement:

> 10. If Metalore shall fail to perform any of its obligations hereunder (other than an obligation to make a joint venture contribution pursuant to clause 7(b) or 8) within the time or times respectively herein provided and shall not have rectified same within 90 days of notice in writing of such default from Brookbank, this Agreement shall terminate and Metalore shall have the right within 6 months thereafter to remove all machinery, plant and equipment placed by it on the property and Metalore shall have no further rights of any kind whatsoever in the Property or under the Agreement.

The 1983 agreement rests for its validity on proper disclosure having been made under the 1981 agreement. Given Metalore's intentional failure to make proper disclosure, the 1983 agreement cannot stand.

Misuse of confidential information

In the course of Metalore's business relationship as operator on Ontex lands, Metalore acquired valuable geological information which led to the Discovery Hole B-31. This was confidential information to be shared by Metalore and Ontex prior to public disclosure. Metalore used this valuable information to the exclusion of Ontex to acquire hundreds of adjacent mining claims.

Chilian, as well, used the confidential information for personal gain.

Mr. Justice La Forest, speaking for the majority on the issue of remedy in Lac, held the constructive trust to be appropriate. In my view, the three-part test of breach of confidence (disclosure of confidential information, an awareness on the part of the recipient of the confidential nature of the information and the use of the information to the detriment of the disclosing party) has been met. Although Metalore "developed" the information it was placed in a position to do so by virtue of being Ontex's operator on its lands. I, therefore, conclude that Ontex has established a breach of confidence by Metalore. In my view, the only appropriate remedy is one in rem. I conclude that Metalore holds all the staked claims, as described more specifically in my conclusions below, under a constructive trust for Ontex. Mr. Justice La Forest concluded that no major player in the market would be deterred if he knew the alternative was the equal sharing joint venture that would come about had that party not breached its confidence.

Further, as in Lac, the mining property is unique, its potential virtually unknown, and of incalculable value.

A similar issue was considered much earlier by the court in Pre-Cam Exploration & Development Ltd. v. McTavish, [1966] S.C.R. 551, 50 C.P.R. 299, 57 D.L.R. (2d) 557, 56 W.W.R. 697. Mr. Justice Judson, speaking for the court at p. 555 S.C.R., said:

> Without the information acquired during the course of his employment. McTavish would not have staked the adjoining claims. This was highly confidential information and the purpose for which it was being sought was obvious -- the acquisition of other connected claims which would be of advantage to the existing claims. Neither Pre-Cam nor McTavish, its servant, could acquire these connected claims against the interest of Murtack. Contrary to the majority opinion in the Court of Appeal, I think that it was a term of his employment, which McTavish on the facts of this case understood, that he could not use this information for his own advantage. The use of the term "fraud" by the learned Chief Justice at trial was fully warranted. The severance of his employment on December 27 was an empty formality which could not improve his position. I do not mean by this that a simple-minded person with his own ideas of common honesty could do this sort of thing without having to answer. The constructive trust is imposed in a case of this kind because of the mere use of confidential information for private advantage against the interest of the person who made the acquisition of the information possible.

The doctrine of breach of confidence has equal application to the 1981 and 1983 agreements.

Breach of fiduciary duty

While I have disposed of the issues before me on other grounds, it is important to consider the question of fiduciary duty.

While the court in Lac split 3-2 against the imposition of a fiduciary duty, it did agree unanimously on what the appropriate test ought to be. They concluded that the test was as set out by Wilson J. in Frame v. Smith, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 99, 42 C.C.L.T. 1, [1988] 1 C.N.L.R. 152, 42 D.L.R. (4th) 81, 78 N.R. 40, 23 O.A.C. 84, 9 R.F.L. (3d) 225.

Sopinka J. said at pp. 598-600 S.C.R., pp. 62-63 D.L.R. of Lac, supra:

While no ironclad formula supplies the answer to this question, certain common characteristics are so frequently present in relationships that have been held to be fiduciary that they serve as a rough and ready guide. I agree with enumeration of these features made by Wilson J. in dissent in Frame v. Smith, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 99. The majority, although disagreeing in the result, did not disapprove of the following statement, at pp. 135-36:

"A few commentators have attempted to discern an underlying fiduciary principle but, given the widely divergent contexts emerging from the case law, it is understandable that they have differed in their analyses: see, for example, E. Vinter, A Treatise on the History and Law of Fiduciary Relationships and Resulting Trusts, (3rd ed. 1955); Ernest J. Weinrib, "The Fiduciary Obligation" (1975), 25 U.T.L.J. 1; Gareth Jones, "Unjust Enrichment and the Fiduciary's Duty of Loyalty"

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

(1968), 84 L.Q.R. 472; George W. Keeton and L.A. Sheridan, Equity (1969), at pp. 336-52; Shepherd, [The Law of Fiduciaries], at p. 94. Yet there are common features discernible in the contexts in which fiduciary duties have been found to exist and these common features do provide a rough and ready guide to whether or not the imposition of a fiduciary obligation on a new relationship would be appropriate and consistent.

Relationships in which a fiduciary obligation have been imposed seem to possess three general characteristics:

(1) The fiduciary has scope for the exercise of some discretion or power.

(2) The fiduciary can unilaterally exercise that power or discretion so as to affect the beneficiary's legal or practical interests.

(3) The beneficiary is peculiarly vulnerable to or at the mercy of the fiduciary holding the discretion or power."

It is possible for a fiduciary relationship to be found although not all of these characteristics are present, nor will the presence of these ingredients invariably identify the existence of a fiduciary relationship.

The one feature, however, which is considered to be indispensable to the existence of the relationship, and which is most relevant in this case, is that of dependency or vulnerability. In this regard, I agree with the statement of Dawson J. in Hospital Products Ltd. v. United States Surgical Corp., supra, at p. 488, that:

"There is, however, the notion underlying all the cases of fiduciary obligation that inherent in the nature of the relationship itself is a position of disadvantage or vulnerability on the part of one of the parties which causes him to place reliance upon the other and requires the protection of equity acting upon the conscience of that other."

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

The necessity for this basic ingredient in a fiduciary relationship is underscored in Professor Weinrib's statement, quoted in Guerin, supra, p. 384 that:

"... the hallmark of a fiduciary relation is that the relative legal positions are such that one party is at the mercy of the other's discretion."

Cromarty J. found a fiduciary duty in Hogar Estates Ltd. v. Shebron Holdings Ltd. (1979), 25 O.R. (2d) 543, 101 D.L.R. (3d) 509 (H.C.J.).

The headnote reads:

H and S were parties to a joint land development venture. S proposed to H that the venture should be terminated on terms whereby S was to purchase H's interest, S informing H that the land was dormant, development having been blocked by planning authorities. This statement was true when made, but subsequently S learned that an important obstacle to the authorities' approval was likely to be overcome. S did not reveal this information to H, and S and H later entered into an agreement to terminate the joint venture. In an action by H to set aside the termination agreement, held, the agreement would be set aside. S owed a fiduciary duty to disclose all material facts. Further, S, having learned that his earlier statement was no longer accurate, had a duty to disclose to H the true state of affairs.

Applying Wilson J.'s three characteristics of a fiduciary duty, as discussed above, I find as follows:

1. Metalore was conducting exploration work on Ontex property for their mutual benefit and was in total control of information from the property. The power of Metalore to conceal information was almost total. There was, therefore, scope in the fiduciary for exercise of power or discretion.

2. Metalore was able to unilaterally exercise that power in a way that affected Ontex.

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

3. Ontex was peculiarly vulnerable and at the mercy of Metalore as Metalore was in complete control of the explorations and of the information released by it.

Because Metalore was conducting the exploration work, it had the exclusive right to explore the property. Ontex was dependent upon the good faith of its co-venturer. Ontex trusted Metalore and reposed its trust in its co-venturer to provide information on the property. Specifically when requested Metalore was obliged to provide accurate information and give full, fair, frank disclosure and it failed to do so. Ontex was vulnerable to Metalore's total control over information. If Metalore chose to be dishonest, as it did, no contractual provision could protect Ontex.

In United Dominions v. Brian (1985), 60 A.L.R. 741, the Supreme Court of Australia held where joint ventures were associated in a relationship for their advantage based on mutual confidence, their relationship was a fiduciary one.

Where a fiduciary relationship exists, the fiduciary has a paramount duty of loyalty. A fiduciary cannot permit a conflict between the interest of his beneficiary and any other interest, especially his own. A fiduciary may not obtain a profit, benefit, or advantage as a result of his position. (See generally, J.C. Shepherd, The Law of Fiduciaries (Agincourt, Ont.: Carswell Co., 1981), at pp. 41, 47-48.)

In Volume 69 of the Canadian Bar Review, 1990, Professor Donovan Waters at p. 455 made a thoughtful analysis of Lac. At pp. 469-71, he said in considering fiduciary duties:

> It was while the commercial world and its legal advisers sought to digest the Court of Appeal decision in Lac Minerals that Professor Finn underlined how from the Australian perspective Canadian courts appear to be moving in the direction of turning the fiduciary relationship and its duty of loyalty into a medium for securing good faith in contract. He also drew attention to Lambert J.A.'s summing up in Harry v. Kreutziger of the issue in an unconscionable transaction case as "whether the transaction seen as a whole, is sufficiently divergent from community standards of commercial morality that it should be rescinded".

In the present writer's opinion it is the same notion of "community standards of commercial morality" in bargaining towards contract, in interpreting contracts (implied terms), and in performing them, that is now generally felt by the courts to be the desirable and essential criterion. All forms of equity's constructive fraud concept, the product of the system's sense of conscience, and in particular equity's fiduciary relationship, are increasingly being seen in Canada as the instrument through which to achieve that general criterion. Seen from this standpoint, of course, the fiduciary relationship has the potential to embrace all types of conduct, from the procurement of unconscionable bargains to profit-making by the fraudulent express trustee.

On the other hand there is resistance to this all-enveloping fiduciary relationship, with its range of available remedies and its rule that the defendant's gain and not the plaintiff's loss, should be the measure of the defendant's obligation. As Lambert J.A. himself pointed out in his dissenting judgment in Burns v. Kelly Peters & Associates, litigation where investors sued their financial consultants when losses were experienced through investment in foreign real estate, and there was an accompanying non-disclosure by the consulting firm of a personal interest through commissions received, the fiduciary relationship must not be too readily applied to commercial dealings. The investors in that case were professional people at arm's length from the consultants, and that the consultants were receiving a financial return for disposing of the real estate was in his view an extraneous element to the investment advice. The investors, as Lambert J.A. saw it, had simply suffered losses, and were seeking to pass on the investors' market risk to their consultants. To impose fiduciary standards in this instance, he said, would be to impose upon financial advisers and dealers in financial instruments a higher standard of behaviour than is applied to the rest of the financial and commercial community.

. . . . .

These then were the two views of how the law of fiduciary relationships, especially in the commercial setting, should develop, when the Supreme Court of Canada came to hear the Lac Minerals case in October 1988. The question was whether relationships of an ever wider range are to be designated fiduciary so that fiduciary obligations and the associated equitable remedies have a generalized application, or the fiduciary obligation is to be imposed on that defendant only whose relationship involved trust-like trust and confidence. It was also a question as to whether that trust-like role could only be relevant in a setting where the fiduciary dedicates himself to acting solely for the benefit of another, or of the joint venture or partnership to which he and another are party.

And at p. 472:

La Forest J. ... considers at length the nature of a fiduciary relationship, and the categories of origin of such relationships, delivers a point-by-point response on the facts to the majority judgment, and concludes with a discussion on the essential object of this concept. The judgment starts with the published literature on the subject, and reviews the entire gamut of the subject, in response it would seem to argument in each of the factums and before the court. Though it is the voice of only one member of the court, one senses that it is the theoretical thinking of this judgment that is going to ring down through the years, rather as Laskin J.'s dissent in Murdoch v. Murdoch was to catch the imagination of the second half of the 1970s.

I leave Water's article and return to Lac where at pp. 648-49 S.C.R., p. 29 D.L.R., La Forest J. said:

This brings me to the second usage of fiduciary, one I think more apt to the present case. The imposition of fiduciary obligations is not limited to those relationships in which a presumption of such an obligation arises. Rather, a fiduciary obligation can arise as a matter of fact out of the specific circumstances of a relationship. As such it can arise between parties in a relationship in which fiduciary obligations would not normally be expected. I agree with this comment of Professor Finn in "The Fiduciary Principle", supra, at p. 64:

"What must be shown, in the writer's view, is that the actual circumstances of a relationship are such that one party is entitled to expect that the other will act in his interests in and for the purposes of the relationship. Ascendancy, influence, vulnerability, trust, confidence or dependence doubtless will be of importance in making this out. But they will be important only to the extent that they evidence a relationship suggesting that entitlement. The critical matter in the end is the role that the alleged fiduciary has, or should be taken to have, in the relationship. It must so implicate that party in the other's affairs or so align him with the protection or advancement of that other's interests that foundation exists for the 'fiduciary expectation'. Such a role may generate an actual expectation that that other's interests are being served. This is commonly so with lawyers and investment advisers. But equally the expectation may be a judicially prescribed one because the law itself ordains it to be that other's entitlement. And this may be so either because that party should, given the actual circumstances of the relationship, be accorded that entitlement irrespective of whether he has adverted to the matter, or because the purpose of the relationship itself is perceived to be such that to allow disloyalty in it would be to jeopardise its perceived social utility."

It is in this sense, then, that the existence of a fiduciary obligation can be said to be a question of fact to be determined by examining the specific facts and circumstances surrounding each relationship: see Waters, The Law of Trusts in Canada (2nd ed. 1984), at p. 405. If the facts give rise to a fiduciary obligation, a breach of the duties thereby imposed will give rise to a claim for equitable relief.

I turn then to a consideration of the factors which in this case support the imposition of that duty. These can conveniently be grouped under three headings, (1) trust and confidence, (2) industry practice and (3) vulnerability. As will be seen these factors overlap to some extent, but considered as a whole they support the proposition that Corona could reasonably expect Lac to not act to Corona's detriment by acquiring the Williams land, and that Corona's expectation should be legally protected.

Trust and Confidence

The relationship of trust and confidence that developed between Corona and Lac is a factor worthy of significant weight in determining if a fiduciary obligation existed between the parties. The existence of such a bond plays an important role in determining whether one party could reasonably expect the other to act or refrain from acting against the interests of the former. That said, the law of confidence and the law relating to fiduciary obligations are not co-extensive. They are not, however, completely distinct. Indeed, while there may be some dispute as to the jurisdictional basis of the law of confidence, it is clear that equity is one source of jurisdiction: see Saltman Engineering Co. v. Campbell Engineering Co. (1948), 65 R.P.C. 203 (C.A.). In Guerin v. The Queen, supra, Dickson J. noted that the law of fiduciary obligations had its origin in the law of confidence. Professor Finn thought it was settled that confidential information, whether classified as property or not, will attract fiduciary law's protection provided the circumstances are such as to attract a duty of confidence: "The Fiduciary Principle", supra, at p. 50. I agree with the view of both courts below that the law of confidence and the law of fiduciary obligations, while distinct, are intertwined.

In a claim for breach of confidence, Gurry tells us (Breach of Confidence, at pp. 161-62):

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

"... the court's concern is for the protection of a confidence which has been created by the disclosure of confidential information by the confider to the confidant. The court's attention is thus focused on the protection of the confidential information because it has been the medium for the creation of a relationship of confidence; its attention is not focused on the information as a medium by which a pre-existing duty is breached."

However, the facts giving rise to an obligation of confidence are also of considerable importance in the creation of a fiduciary obligation. If information is imparted in circumstances of confidence, and if the information is known to be confidential, it cannot be denied that the expectations of the parties may be affected so that one party reasonably anticipates that the other will act or refrain from acting in a certain way. A claim for breach of confidence will only be made out, however, when it is shown that the confidee has misused the information to the detriment of the confidor. Fiduciary law, being concerned with the exaction of a duty of loyalty, does not require that harm in the particular case be shown to have resulted.

The essence of the imposition of fiduciary obligations is its utility in the promotion and preservation of desired social behaviour and institutions. Likewise with the protection of confidences. In the modern world the exchange of confidential information is both necessary and expected. Evidence of an accepted business morality in the mining industry was given by the defendant, and the Court of Appeal found that the practice was not only reasonable, but that it would foster the exploration and development of our natural resources. The institution of bargaining in good faith is one that is worthy of legal protection in those circumstances where the protection accords with the expectations of the parties.

Bargaining in good faith was within the contemplation of the parties. The experts as well, in this case, addressed the accepted business morality in the mining industry.

It was Chilian's abuse of power that created the breaches of fiduciary duty. The gravity of his conduct in taking advantage of Metalore's superior position is the sum total of the findings of deceit, misinformation and fraud made against him.

In my view, the facts of this case meet the test in Lac defined by Wilson J. in Frame v. Smith.

I agree with La Forest J. that no uncertainty is imported into business relationships because courts apply fiduciary duties.

For these reasons I find that a fiduciary relationship existed between Metalore and Ontex. I apply the doctrine of constructive trust and conclude that the claims, as described specifically in my conclusions below, are held by Metalore in a constructive trust for Ontex.

Damages are not an appropriate remedy when dealing with an exploration property.

Punitive damages

Only in rare cases are punitive damages awarded. Metalore, in this case, breached its contracts with Ontex, perpetrated fraud on Ontex and breached its fiduciary duty to Ontex. Chilian was the instrument of all the deceitful conduct. In addition, he profited as an insider before making public disclosure contrary to the Securities Act in buying and selling Ontex stock in the clandestine manner previously outlined. His ill-gotten gain amounted to some $80,000. He also traded improperly in Metalore stock as an insider prior to disclosure to the public.

Conduct of this sort must be condemned. I assess punitive damages against George Chilian in the sum of $80,000 together with pre-judgment interest at 12 per cent per annum from the date of his sale of the Ontex stock.

CONCLUSIONS

1990 CanLII 6952 (ON CTGD)

1. The 1981 agreement and the 1983 agreement are rescinded and title to the 18 leased claims reverts to Ontex.

2. The 459 claims staked by Metalore after the discovery of B31 and prior to Metalore's public announcement are held by Metalore in a constructive trust for Ontex.

3. The 39 claims that were included in the 1983 agreement were, according to Exhibit 90, acquired in 1981. Chilian's letter to the Department of Natural Resources indicates the time of staking to pre-date the execution of the 1981 agreement.

Here, unlike Lac, no confidential information had been made available to Metalore by Ontex at this juncture. There was therefore no breach of duty of confidentiality nor was there any breach of fiduciary duty in the acquisition of the 39 claims. On the basis of the rescission of the 1983 agreement those 39 claims must revert to Metalore. The additional consideration in the 1983 agreement was $40,000 paid to Ontex by means of two cheques. The second cheque was cashed on May 16, 1983. Metalore is therefore entitled to the return of the $40,000 together with pre-judgment interest at a rate of 12 per cent per annum from May 16, 1983.

4. Twelve claims coloured green on Exhibit 16 were acquired after confidential information came into the hands of Metalore and on the basis of confidentiality, these claims are subject to a constructive trust and are held by Metalore in trust for Ontex.

COSTS

Ontex will have costs on a solicitor-and-client basis against Metalore and Chilian. Metalore will have indemnity against Chilian for any costs it is compelled to pay.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Reasons for Judgment of the Honourable Madam Justice Levine:

Introduction

[1] The appellant, Pepper's Produce Ltd., appeals from an order dismissing its application to add the respondents, Wei Gao and James Guang Wei Tan, as defendants to its Supreme Court action. The action concerns a failed contract for the purchase and sale of a business known as the Terra Nova Market. The proceedings in the litigation so far arise from confusion in the agreement of purchase and sale about the identity of the owner and seller of the business.

[2] For the reasons that follow, I would dismiss the appeal.

Background

[3] The appellant entered into an agreement of purchase and sale of the business on April 29, 2008 (the "Contract"). The seller of the business was shown on the Contract as "Gao Tam Enterprise Ltd." The Contract was signed by the respondents, Wei Gao and James Guang Wei Tan. (I will refer to each of them respectively as "Gao" and "Tan".)

[4] It is common ground that the business was owned by a corporation named "Gaotam Enterprises Ltd." (the "Corporation"). The directors and officers of the Corporation were Gao and Kwong Hung Tam ("Tam"). Tan was an employee, but not a director or officer, of the Corporation.

[5] The other defendants, Medallion Realty Ltd., Anna Cheng and Geoffrey Ng, were the realtors involved in the transaction. They are not involved in this appeal.

[6] The purchase price for the business was $54,000. The appellant paid a deposit of $15,000 to the realtors.

[7] The appellant did not complete the purchase on the completion date, June 6, 2008. It gave written notice of non-completion on that date.

[8] On July 30, 2008, Gao and Tan filed a claim in Small Claims Court, describing themselves as "Wei Gao and Guang Wei Tan doing business as Gao Tam Enterprise Ltd." They claimed the appellant had wrongfully repudiated the Contract and sought to retain the deposit and damages for loss of the difference between the contract price and the current market price of the business.

[9] The appellant responded with an affidavit dated January 2, 2009 sworn by its President, Stephen Wong, stating that he, on behalf of Pepper's, had entered into a contract to purchase the business of "an incorporated business entity, namely Gaotam Enterprises Ltd. ("Gaotam") with a trade name as Terra Nova Market". He swore further:

> 6. The Claimants Wei Gao and Guang Wei Tan were not the parties in the Contract.
>
> 7. The Claimaints Wei Gao and Guang Wei Tan, in their personal capacity, do not have legal standing to commence legal action or to claim any alleged damages on behalf of a corporation, namely Gaotam Enterprises Ltd. Attached and marked as Exhibit "C" is a true copy of the Corporate Search of Gaotam Enterprises Ltd., which was incorporated on June 13, 2005.
>
> 8. The Claimant Guan Wei Tan has no legal interest of any kind in the purchasing of all business assets and business of Gaotam.
>
> 9. At all material times, I have never met the Claimants Wei Gao or Guang Wei Tan.
> 10. I have never entered into any Contract of any kind with the Claimants Wei Gao or Guang Wei Tan.

[10] The appellant also commenced an action in Supreme Court on January 2, 2009, naming as defendants the Corporation (described as "Gaotam"), Tam, and the realtors. The appellant claimed the Corporation had agreed to sell to the appellant all "Business Assets and Business", described in paragraph 7 of the statement of claim as "the Business Assets and Business of Gaotam, doing business in a trade name as Terra Nova Market".

[11] On February 2, 2009, the Small Claims Action was dismissed at a Pre-Trial Settlement Conference, apparently because the wrong parties were named as claimants.

2012 BCCA 247 (CanLII)

[12] On September 29, 2009, the appellant, the Corporation and Tam settled the Supreme Court action. The appellant's $15,000 deposit was returned, and the Corporation paid $10,000 to the appellant. The appellant's claims against the Corporation were dismissed by consent order dated January 21, 2010.

[13] On January 25, 2010, the appellant filed an amended statement of claim, deleting the Corporation and Tam as defendants, and describing "Gao Tam Ent. Ltd." as "the Seller doing business in a trade name as Terra Nova Market".

[14] On January 6, 2011, the appellant applied to add Gao and Tan as respondents and to file an Amended Notice of Civil Claim in which it alleged:

> 7. The defendants, Tan and Gao, were operating a business in a non-incorporated entity, namely Gao Tam Enterprise Ltd. ("non-incorporated Gao Tam").
>
> 8. On March 18, 2008, the Defendants, Tan and Gao, in their personal capacity, engaged their non-incorporated business name - Gao Tam Enterprise Ltd. entered into a Multiple Listing Contract with Sutton Group for the sale of a business and business assets, namely Terra Nova market, located at 6011 No. 1 Road, Richmond, B.C. to the general public.
>
> 9. On April 29, 2008, the Defendants, Tan and Gao, in their personal capacity, engaged their non-incorporated business name - Gao Tam Enterprise Ltd., through their agents, the Defendants, Ng, Cheng and Sutton Group, entered into a Contract for Purchase and Sale dated April 29, 2008 for purchase and sale of Business and Business Assets of Terra Nova Market located at 6011 No. 1. Road, Richmond, B.C. with the Plaintiff ("Contract").
>
>
> 13. Subsequent to the entering into the Contract, the Plaintiff discovered that the Seller, namely Gao Tam Ent. Ltd., as stated in the Contract was a non-incorporated entity and did not own any Business or Business Assets of Terra Nova market located at 6011 No. 1 Road, Richmond, B.C.
>
> 14. Subsequent to the commencement of this action, the Plaintiff discovered that the Business Assets and Business of Terra Nova Market located at 6011 No. 1 Road, Richmond, B.C. was owned by a corporate entity, namely Gaotam Enterprises Ltd.

[15] In the proposed Amended Notice of Civil Claim, the appellant claimed damages from Gao and Tan, "who were doing business as non-incorporated Gao Tam", for "their negligence and breach of their duty of care owed the [appellant]". It claimed in particular that Gao and Tan had "improperly and negligently executed the Contract as seller/owner of Terra Nova Market"; "failed to inform the [appellant] they were not the owners of Terra Nova Market"; "negligently made false representations and promises to the [appellant] that they would fulfill the terms and conditions of the Contract, while they had no legal capacity to do so"; and "negligently created and provided improper financial statement of the business".

[16] The appellant's application to add Gao and Tan as defendants was heard and the chambers judge dismissed the application on May 4, 2011.

Chambers Judge's Reasons for Judgment

[17] In the course of describing the background, the chambers judge commented: "It is evident from the material before me that the vendor was misnamed" (at para. 3).

[18] He summarized the legal test for adding a defendant and amending pleadings, noting that it is "not high", citing McNaughton v. Baker (1988), 25 B.C.L.R. (2d) 17 at 25 (C.A.) (at para. 17). He said "the discretion to add parties should be exercised generously to allow effective determination of the issues without delay, inconvenience, or separate trials", citing Ipsos S.A. v. Reid, 2005 BCSC 1114 (at para. 18). He acknowledged that he could not weigh evidence on the application, but from the original writ and statement of claim and the record of the proceedings he concluded the amended claim disclosed no cause of action (at paras. 20-21).

[19] He reasoned that all of the claims against the Corporation had been settled, and if Gao and Tan were acting on behalf of the Corporation as they claimed, the settlement included all claims against them. If they were not acting on behalf of the Corporation, the claims against them were for fraudulent misrepresentation, deceit, bad faith, or fraud, none of which were claimed in the amended claim. There was no legal claim in negligence on the facts pleaded (at paras. 22-24).

[20] He therefore dismissed the applications to add defendants and to amend the pleadings.

2012 BCCA 247 (CanLII)

2012 BCCA 247 (CanLII)

The Appeal

[21] The appellant's stated ground of appeal is that the chambers judge erred in stating "it is evident" that the vendor in the agreement of purchase and sale was "misnamed". He argues the chambers judge misconceived the affidavit evidence and the effect of the Small Claims action.

[22] This ground of appeal has no merit. The judge's observation played no part in his decision to dismiss the applications. He concluded that on the facts alleged in the Amended Notice of Civil Claim there was no reasonable claim in negligence against Gao and Tan. The appellant has not provided any basis for this Court to conclude otherwise. The chambers judge expressly stated that he could not consider the affidavit evidence, he considered the applicable legal tests, and based on the original and proposed pleadings, he dismissed the applications.

[23] I would not accede to the appellant's stated ground of appeal. That is sufficient to dispose of the appeal.

[24] In their factum, the respondents raised the issue of abuse of process. They suggest:

> In light of the resolution of the Small Claims Action, and the fact that the Appellant is bringing very similar allegations against the Respondents Wei Gao and James Tan, after settling the same against the Corporation, the Appellant's application is tantamount to an abuse of process, in that the process of the court is not being fairly or honestly used.

[25] The characterization of inconsistent pleadings amounting to an abuse of process was discussed recently by this Court in First Majestic Silver Corp. v. Davila Santos, 2012 BCCA 5. In that case, the defendants argued (at para. 23):

> ... the doctrine of abuse of process should be used to prevent the plaintiffs from bringing a subsequent action based upon allegations that are inconsistent with allegations made in support of a previous action.

[26] In his reasons for judgment for the Court, Mr. Justice Tysoe referred (at para. 24) to Vanmills Establishment v. Coles (1992), 8 C.P.C. (3d) 178 at para. 10 (Cohen J. in Chambers) for the discussion of the effect of pursuing inconsistent rights:

> [10] This is not a matter of a litigant pursuing inconsistent remedies, where no election is necessary until judgment. There can be no doubt that in the instant action Crux is attempting to pursue inconsistent rights. Crux elected in his action against Sigurdson to claim that he had disposed of his legal and beneficial interest in the C.I.S. shares to Coles. Having elected to sue Sigurdson on that basis, I find that Crux cannot now sue Coles in the instant action on the basis that he retained a beneficial interest in the C.I.S. shares. In my opinion, his election in his action against Sigurdson is binding upon him. The principle that, in the case of inconsistent rights, a plaintiff's irrevocable and unequivocal election is deemed to be made by the commencement of an initial action is established in Scarf v. Jardine (1882), 7 App. Cas. 345, 30 W.R. 893 (H.L.) and Ashmore v. Bank of British North America (1913), 4 W.W.R. 1014, 18 B.C.R. 257, 13 D.L.R. 73 (C.A.).

[27] Mr. Justice Tysoe noted (at para. 25):

> In Mystar Holdings Ltd. v. 247037 Alberta Ltd., 2009 ABQB 480, 10 Alta. L.R. (5th) 260, Mr. Justice Brooker considered the existence of inconsistent allegations within the context of the court's inherent jurisdiction to prevent abuses of the court's process. He expressed the principle in the following terms:
> > [49] In general, I am persuaded that a party is not free to deliberately argue diametrically inconsistent facts in various actions, thus knowingly advancing irreconcilable positions which are not articulated as alternative claims.

[28] In this case, the appellant commenced and settled an action against the Corporation, claiming it entered into the Contract with the Corporation as the seller of the Terra Nova Market and suffered losses in connection with that transaction. It then amended the statement of claim to allege that "Gao Tam Ent. Ltd." was the Seller of the business. In the application to add Gao and Tan as defendants and to further amend its claim, the appellant claims that they represented they were the owners of the business and thereby caused the appellant to suffer losses in the same transaction. These positions are diametrically inconsistent within the same action, and the claims against Gao and Tan are diametrically inconsistent with the appellant's response to the Small Claims action. These proceedings cannot, as a matter of protecting the integrity of the court's process, stand together.

[29] I would dismiss the appeal.

ON APPEAL FROM THE APPELLATE DIVISION OF THE SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO

Trust—Procuring of new lease by former partner—Assignment thereof to those continuing the business on the premises—Covenants in assignment—Rights between the parties as to acquisition of further lease—Implied trust—Question of estoppel by res judicata—Effect of judgment in overholding tenants proceedings—Jurisdiction of judge in such proceedings—The Landlord and Tenant Act, R.S.O., 1914, c. 155.

P. and others had, as partners, conducted a laundry business on leased premises. The partnership was dissolved, the others continuing the business on the premises. P. procured from the landlord a new lease dating from the expiry of the existing one. As a result of litigation, P., for a certain sum, assigned to the others the new lease, covenanting that the assignees might "hold and enjoy the said premises for the residue of the term granted by the said lease and every renewal thereof (if any) for their own use and benefit, without any interruption of the assignor." The lease had no provision for renewal. Before its expiry P. procured from the landlord a further lease dated from the expiry of the existing one. Plaintiffs, the aforesaid assignees or their successors in interest, sued for a declaration that P., the defendant, was a trustee of the lease for them, and for other relief.

Held, affirming judgment of the Appellate Division, Ont. (56 Ont. L.R. 616) that P. held the lease as trustee for plaintiffs; his obtaining it was a breach of good faith and contravened an implied obligation with regard to renewals; the allusion to renewal in the assignment must be taken to refer to the reasonable expectation of the tenants in possession to obtain a renewal; Griffith v. Owen ([1907] 1 Ch. 195) applied.

Held further, that plaintiffs were not estopped by res judicata by reason of certain overholding tenants proceedings (under The Landlord and Tenant Act, R.S.O., 1914, c. 155) and judgment therein; in such proceedings the judge had no jurisdiction to adjudicate as to the relations between Pong and plaintiffs.

PONG
v.
QUONG.

defendant was trustee for the plaintiffs of a certain lease, and ordered that he assign it to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiff Quong and the defendant Pong were members of a firm carrying on a laundry business on premises leased from the defendant Mrs. Thomson. Mrs. Thomson had leased the premises to Pong in his own name for a term of three years from 1st March, 1916. Before the expiry of this lease, the partnership was dissolved (in November, 1917). Pong, in June, 1918, acquired a lease of the property in his own name for a period of five years, commencing on 1st March, 1919 (at the expiry of the first term). Litigation followed. A judgment of Winchester Co. C.J. contained an alternative direction that Pong should assign the lease to Quong and his co-partner in consideration of $600 to be paid to him. The lease was accordingly assigned, and in the assignment it was provided that the assignees might > hold and enjoy the said premises for the residue of the term granted by the said lease and every renewal thereof (if any) for their own use and benefit, without any interruption of the assignor.

The lease did not contain any provision for renewal. Before the expiry of the lease, Pong procured from Mrs. Thomson a further lease of the premises for six years from 1st March, 1924 (the date of expiry of the existing lease). The plaintiffs, Quong and his co-partner Chong (who was the successor in interest of Quong's former co-partner Lum Lin), remained in possession after 1st March, 1924, being willing to assume the burden of the new lease (which was at an increased rental), and claiming the right to the benefit of it. They continued to pay rent which was taken by Mrs. Thomson without prejudice. The latter took proceedings under the overholding tenants provisions of The Landlord and Tenant Act, R.S.O., 1914, c. 155. The proceedings came on before His Honour, Judge Denton, of the County Court of the County of York. It was apparently agreed that the hearing should proceed on the basis of the assumption that rent from the plaintiffs had not been accepted by Mrs. Thomson; in other words, that, if Quong and Chong were not entitled to the benefit of the lease made to Pong, she should not be prejudiced in the proceedings by having taken rent from Quong and Chong. It appeared that the real dispute was between Pong on the one hand, and Quong and Chong on the other, as to the right to the lease. There was some discussion, and, apparently, misunderstanding, as to the question of jurisdiction, and consent in regard thereto, which is referred to in the judgment now reported.

His Honour, Judge Denton, held that the lease acquired by Pong was not a renewal, in any sense, of the former lease, and made an order for possession against the present plaintiffs. The latter appealed to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario, which dismissed the appeal without written reasons. See the reference to this appeal in the judgment now reported.

The plaintiffs then brought the present action in the Supreme Court of Ontario, claiming a declaration that the defendant Pong was a trustee for the plaintiffs of the lease, and that it should be assigned to them, and for an injunction restraining him from assigning the lease to any person other than the plaintiffs, and for an injunction restraining the defendant Mrs. Thomson from evicting them.

The plaintiffs' motion for an interlocutory injunction was dismissed by Mowat J. The plaintiffs appealed to the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court of Ontario. By consent of counsel, the motion was turned into a motion for judgment and the case was heard upon the merits. The Appellate Division allowed the appeal, holding that the defendant Pong was a trustee of the lease for the plaintiffs, and that the lease should be assigned by Pong to the plaintiffs, who should covenant to indemnify him against the lessee's covenants contained therein (1).

The defendant Pong appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. His two main grounds of appeal were: (1) That plaintiffs were estopped by res judicata by reason of the overholding tenants proceedings above mentioned and the judgment of Denton Co. C.J. therein, sustained by the Appellate Division; and (2) That, on the merits, the Appellate Division was wrong in holding that Pong should be deemed a trustee of the lease for the plaintiffs.

v.
QUONG.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellant, the Chief Justice orally delivered the judgment of the court as follows:

"It is not necessary to call on you, Mr. Raney.

"We have all had an opportunity of considering this case over night, and the position seems to us quite clear.

"The first ground of appeal is that the respondent is estopped from bringing this action by reason of the judgment given in the overholding tenancy proceedings by His Honour, Judge Denton, nominally affirmed on appeal. I say "nominally" for reasons presently to appear.

"Judge Denton's only jurisdiction under the overholding tenants provisions was to determine the right of the landlord to possession. He himself states that in order that he should proceed it was necessary that there must be an admission before him that the rent had not been paid. His jurisdiction was to determine whether or not the landlord was entitled to possession. It was apparently desired that he should deal with issues as to the relationship of Pong and Quong, and determine the rights between them. Mr. Raney consented in some sort of form to that being done, but it would appear that his consent was given on the understanding and basis that the judge should deal with the matter as one within his jurisdiction under the overholding tenants provisions. It is perfectly manifest that he had no jurisdiction to do so—no jurisdiction subject to appeal; that he could entertain such collateral matter only either as persona designata or as arbitrator. That being so, the Appellate Division, when the case came before it on appeal from Judge Denton, must have taken the view, as Mr. Raney states, and as the subsequent proceedings bear out, that the judge had assumed a jurisdiction he did not possess under the overholding tenants provisions, and that as to the relations between Pong and Quong the matter was coram non judice. Mr. Raney's consent had been given subject to a condition which could not be fulfilled; in other words, he consented upon the condition that he would retain an effective right of appeal. On the appeal in the present action, the Appellate Division must have taken the view that the former proceeding was not binding as to the obligations of Pong; that the only thing judici-ally determined by it was the landlord's right to possession, the order in this respect, assuming non-payment of rent, being within the jurisdiction of the judge who made it. Taking that view,—and they of course knew what had been their appreciation of the former proceeding—it was open to the Appellate Division to deal with the appeal from the judgment of Mowat J. in this action, as they did.

"The other branch of the appeal is directed to the merits. It is claimed by the plaintiffs that the lease obtained by Pong is held by him as trustee for them. The Appellate Division gave effect to that contention, and, in our opinion, upon the whole case, rightly gave effect to it. It is manifest to us that the transaction carried out by Pong was in breach of good faith and contravened his obligation with regard to renewals, which was implied in the whole arrangement between him and Quong. While there is no express right of renewal in the lease, the assignment of it does deal with renewal, and the allusion must be taken to refer to the reasonable expectation of the tenant in possession to obtain a renewal. The case is fairly within the principle stated by Mr. Justice Parker in Griffith v. Owen (1). That principle was properly applied in the judgment now appealed from. That judgment is affirmed, and the appeal is dismissed with costs."

Appeal dismissed with costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

Criminal law — Mens rea — Specific and general intent — Drunkenness — Sexual assault causing bodily harm — Whether or not evidence of self-induced intoxication should be considered in determining whether mens rea proved beyond a reasonable doubt — Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, s. 246.2(c) — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 7, 11(d).

Evidence — Criminal offences — Drunkenness — Mens rea — Whether or not evidence of drunkenness should not be considered in proof of mens rea.

Appellant was charged with sexual assault causing bodily harm contrary to s. 246.2(c) of the Criminal Code, tried by judge and jury, and found guilty. He admitted forcing the complainant to have sexual intercourse with him and stated that his drunkenness caused the attack on her. The Ontario Court of Appeal dismissed an appeal from conviction. At issue here is whether evidence of self-induced intoxication should be considered by the trier of fact, along with all other relevant evidence, in determining whether the prosecution has proved beyond a reasonable doubt the mens rea required to constitute the offence.

Held (Dickson C.J. and Lamer J. dissenting): The appeal should be dismissed.

Per Beetz and McIntyre JJ.: The general intent offence is one in which the only intent involved relates solely to the performance of the act in question with no further ulterior intent or purpose. A specific intent offence is one which involves the performance of the actus reus coupled with an intent or purpose going beyond the mere performance of the questioned act. The

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE L'ONTARIO

Droit criminel — Mens rea — Intention générale et spécifique — Ivresse — Agression sexuelle causant des lésions corporelles — La preuve de l'intoxication volontaire doit-elle être prise en considération pour déterminer si la mens rea a été prouvée hors de tout doute raisonnable? — Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, chap. C-34, art. 246.2c) — Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 1, 7, 11d).

Preuve — Infractions criminelles — Ivresse — Mens rea — La preuve de l'ivresse doit-elle être prise en considération relativement à la preuve de la mens rea?

L'appelant a été accusé d'agression sexuelle causant des blessures corporelles en infraction à l'al. 246.2*c*) du Code criminel; il a été jugé par juge et jury et a été reconnu coupable. Il a admis avoir forcé la plaignante à avoir des relations sexuelles avec lui et a déclaré qu'il l'avait attaquée parce qu'il était ivre. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a rejeté l'appel interjeté à l'encontre de la déclaration de culpabilité. Le pourvoi vise à déterminer si le juge des faits doit prendre en considération la preuve de l'intoxication volontaire avec tous les autres éléments de preuve pertinents pour déterminer si le ministère public a prouvé hors de tout doute raisonnable la mens rea requise pour constituer l'infraction.

Arrêt (le juge en chef Dickson et le juge Lamer sont dissidents): Le pourvoi est rejeté.

Les juges Beetz et McIntyre: L'infraction d'intention générale est celle pour laquelle l'intention se rapporte uniquement à l'accomplissement de l'acte en question, sans qu'il y ait d'autre intention ou dessein. Une infraction d'intention spécifique se caractérise par la perpétration de l'actus reus assortie d'une intention ou d'un dessein qui ne se limite pas à l'accomplissement de l'acte distinction, which is neither artificial nor based on a legal fiction, is not divorced from logical underpinnings.

Drunkenness in a general sense is not a true defence to a criminal act. The defence, however, may apply in a specific intent offence when the accused is so intoxicated that he lacks the capacity to form the specific intent required to commit the crime. The defence does not apply in offences of general intent.

The elements of a charge under s. 246.2(c) are an assault which, objectively viewed, is of a sexual nature as a consequence of which the complainant has suffered bodily injury. The requisite mental element is only the intention to commit the assault. The surrounding circumstances are to be considered for evidence of its sexual nature and of the resulting bodily harm. The resulting interference with the physical integrity of the complainant aggravates the seriousness of a sexual assault but the mental element remains the same.

The Crown must still prove the mens rea in a general intent offence, notwithstanding the absence of a defence of voluntary intoxication. This can be proved in two ways. Firstly, the mens rea in most cases can be inferred from the actus reus itself: a person is presumed to have intended the natural and probable consequences of his actions. Secondly, where the accused was so intoxicated as to raise doubt as to the voluntary nature of his conduct, the Crown may establish the necessary blameworthy mental state of the accused by proving voluntary self-induced intoxication. As a result, persons accused of these crimes cannot hold up voluntary drunkenness as a defence.

The rule in Leary does not convert the offence in s. 246.2(c) into an absolute liability offence by removing the Crown's onus of proving the requisite intention and, accordingly, does not violate ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The rule upholds the principle that the morally innocent should not be convicted for it recognizes that accused persons who have voluntarily consumed drugs or alcohol, thereby depriving themselves of self-control leading to the commission of a crime, are not morally innocent and are, indeed, criminally blameworthy.

If the trial judge wrongly excluded the evidence of drunkenness, s. 613(1)(b)(iii) of the Criminal Code en question. Cette distinction, qui n'est ni artificielle ni ne repose sur une fiction juridique, n'est pas privée de fondement logique.

L'ivresse au sens général ne constitue pas véritablement une défense opposable à une accusation d'avoir commis un acte criminel. La défense peut toutefois s'appliquer à un crime d'intention spécifique lorsque l'état d'ébriété de l'accusé est de nature à le rendre incapable de former l'intention spécifique requise pour commettre le crime. Elle ne s'applique cependant pas aux infractions d'intention générale.

Les éléments d'une accusation portée en vertu de l'al. 246.2*c*) sont une agression qui, considérée objectivement, a un caractère sexuel et qui a pour conséquence des lésions corporelles subies par le plaignant. Le seul élément moral requis est l'intention de commettre l'agression. Les circonstances dans lesquelles elle a eu lieu doivent être examinées pour dégager la preuve du caractère sexuel de l'agression et des lésions corporelles qu'elle a causées. L'atteinte à l'intégrité physique du plaignant qui en est la conséquence aggrave l'agression sexuelle, mais l'élément moral demeure le même.

Le ministère public doit toujours prouver la mens rea pour les infractions d'intention générale, indépendamment de l'absence d'une défense d'intoxication volontaire. Il peut la prouver de deux façons. Premièrement, la mens rea peut dans la plupart des cas se déduire de l'actus reus lui-même: une personne est présumée avoir voulu les conséquences naturelles et probables de ses actes. Deuxièmement, dans les cas où l'accusé était ivre au point de faire naître des doutes quant au caractère volontaire de sa conduite, le ministère public peut établir que l'accusé avait l'état mental coupable nécessaire en prouvant l'intoxication volontaire. En conséquence, les personnes accusées de ces crimes ne peuvent invoquer l'ivresse volontaire en défense.

La règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary ne transforme pas l'infraction prévue à l'al. 246.2*c*) en crime de responsabilité absolue, en dispensant le ministère public de prouver l'intention requise et, par conséquent, il n'enfreint pas l'art. 7 et l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. La règle confirme le principe que ceux qui sont moralement innocents ne devraient pas se voir déclarer coupables, car elle reconnaît que les accusés qui ont volontairement consommé des stupéfiants ou de l'alcool, se privant ainsi de la maîtrise de soi, ce qui mène à la perpétration d'un crime, loin d'être moralement innocents, sont en fait coupables en droit criminel.

Si le juge du procès a exclu à tort la preuve de l'ivresse, il faut appliquer le sous-al. 613(1)b)(iii) du should be applied because no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice occurred here.

Per Wilson and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ.: Sexual assault causing bodily harm is an offence of general intent requiring only the minimal intent to apply force. Here, as in most cases involving general intent offences and intoxication, the Crown can establish the accused's blameworthy mental state by inference from his or her acts. The evidence of intoxication withheld from the trier of fact could not possibly have raised a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the minimal intent to apply force.

The Leary rule is perfectly consistent with an onus resting on the Crown to prove the minimal intent which should accompany the doing of the prohibited act in general intent offences. The rule, as applied in its more flexible form, should be preserved so that evidence of intoxication can go to the trier of fact in general intent offences only if it is evidence of extreme intoxication involving an absence of awareness akin to a state of insanity or automatism. Only in such a case is the evidence capable of raising a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the minimal intent required for the offence. Evidence of intoxication should not go to the trier of fact in every case regardless of its possible relevance to the issue of the existence of the minimal intent required for the offence. The rule in Leary should not be overruled.

Leary does not operate so as to relieve the Crown from proving the existence of the required minimal intent and so turn the offence into one of absolute liability. The Crown must still prove beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of the required mental element of the intentional application of force.

Per La Forest J.: The requirement of mens rea in truly criminal offences is so fundamental that it cannot, since the Charter, be removed on the basis of judicially-developed policy. If incursions are to be made upon fundamental legal values, Parliament, not the courts, must do so. Although established common law rules should not lightly be assumed to violate the Charter, when a common law rule is found to violate a Charter right, that violation must be justified in the same way as legislative rules. No adequate justification was made here. However, s. 613(1)(b)(iii) of the Criminal Code could properly be applied as no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice occurred here.

Code criminel car cela n'a pas entraîné de tort important ni d'erreur judiciaire grave en l'espèce.

Les juges Wilson et L'Heureux-Dubé: L'agression sexuelle causant des lésions corporelles est une infraction d'intention générale exigeant seulement l'intention minimale d'utiliser la force. En l'espèce comme dans la plupart des cas mettant en cause des infractions d'intention générale et l'intoxication, le ministère public peut prouver l'état mental blâmable de l'accusé en le déduisant de ses actes. Il est impossible que la preuve de l'intoxication, qui n'a pas été soumise au juge des faits, ait pu soulever un doute raisonnable quant à l'existence de l'intention minimale d'utiliser la force.

La règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary est tout à fait compatible avec la charge imposée au ministère public de prouver l'intention minimale qui doit accompagner l'exécution de l'acte prohibé dans les infractions d'intention générale. La règle, appliquée dans la forme plus souple, doit être préservée pour permettre que la preuve de l'intoxication soit soumise au juge des faits pour les infractions d'intention générale seulement s'il s'agit d'une preuve d'intoxication extrême entraînant l'absence de conscience voisine de l'aliénation ou de l'automatisme. C'est seulement dans ce cas que la preuve peut soulever un doute raisonnable sur l'existence de l'intention minimale requise par l'infraction. La preuve de l'intoxication ne doit pas être soumise au juge des faits dans tous les cas, indépendamment de sa pertinence possible à l'égard de la question de l'existence de l'intention minimale requise pour l'infraction. La règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary ne doit pas être renversée.

L'arrêt Leary n'a pas pour effet de dégager le ministère public de l'obligation de prouver l'existence de l'intention minimale requise pour l'infraction ni d'en faire une infraction de responsabilité absolue. Le ministère public doit toujours prouver hors de tout doute raisonnable l'existence de l'élément mental requis, soit le recours intentionnel à la force.

Le juge La Forest: L'exigence de la mens rea dans les infractions véritablement criminelles est tellement fondamentale qu'on ne peut la supprimer depuis l'avènement de la Charte, sur la base d'une politique de droit prétorien. Si on doit porter atteinte aux valeurs juridiques fondamentales, il appartient au législateur de le faire et non aux tribunaux. Même si on ne doit pas présumer à la légère que des règles de common law violent un droit garanti par la Charte, toute violation éventuelle doit être justifiée de la même façon que dans le cas des règles législatives. Aucune justification valable n'a été présentée en l'espèce. Toutefois, le sous-al. 613(1)b)(iii) du Code criminel peut à bon droit s'appliquer car il n'y a pas eu de tort important ni d'erreur judiciaire grave.

Per Dickson C.J. and Lamer J. (dissenting): Evidence of self-induced intoxication should be considered by the trier of fact, along with all other relevant evidence, in determining whether the mens rea required to constitute the offence has been proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Intoxication is relevant in principle to the mental element required in crime.

The unrestrained application of basic mens rea doctrine would not open a gaping hole in the criminal law inimical to social protection. Intoxication, to the extent that it merely lowers inhibitions, removes self-restraint or induces unusual self-confidence or aggressiveness, does not relate to the mens rea requirement for volitional and intentional or reckless conduct. Similarly, intoxication would be of no avail to an accused who got drunk in order to gain the courage to commit a crime or to aid in his defence. Juries are quite able to weigh all the evidence in a fair and responsible manner and are unlikely to acquit too readily those who have committed offences while intoxicated.

The distinction between "general" and "specific" intent, which is used to exclude otherwise relevant evidence from the jury, is artificial and two fundamental problems stem from it. Firstly, Parliament, not the courts, should alter the law if it is to be done in the name of policy over principle. Secondly, even if it were appropriate for the courts to do so, there is no evidence that the artificiality of the specific intent requirement is actually required for social protection.

Leary, which gave rise to the distinction between general and specific intent, should be overruled. This pre-Charter decision imposes a form of absolute liability on intoxicated offenders: an essential element is presumed on proof of intoxication. The Charter right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty and the presumption of innocence are accordingly infringed. The rule in Leary cannot be upheld under s. 1 of the Charter, because the objective of protecting the public, while important, is not achieved within the scope of the Oakes proportionality test. Leary has also been undermined independently of the Charter. An honest but unreasonable mistaken belief in consent negates the mens rea required for some crimes. The jury's task in determining whether or not the belief was honestly held is unnecessarily complicated by the Leary qualification concerning mistake of fact. The uncertainty caused by Leary also Le juge en chef Dickson et le juge Lamer (dissidents): Le juge des faits doit prendre en considération avec tous les autres éléments de preuve pertinents la preuve de l'intoxication volontaire pour déterminer si la mens rea requise pour qu'il y ait infraction a été prouvée hors de tout doute raisonnable. L'intoxication est pertinente en principe à l'égard de l'élément moral requis pour un crime.

L'application sans restriction du principe fondamental de la mens rea ne créerait pas en droit criminel une immense lacune qui compromettrait la protection de la société. Dans la mesure où l'intoxication ne fait que diminuer les inhibitions, supprimer la retenue ou provoquer une confiance en soi ou une agressivité inhabituelles, elle n'a rien à voir avec l'exigence d'une mens rea en matière de conduite volontaire et intentionnelle ou insouciante. De même, un accusé ne pourrait invoquer l'intoxication s'il s'était enivré afin de se donner le courage de commettre un crime ou pour faciliter sa défense. Les jurys sont tout à fait capables de peser l'ensemble de la preuve d'une manière équitable et impartiale et il est peu probable qu'ils acquittent trop facilement ceux qui commettent des infractions en état d'ébriété.

La distinction entre l'intention «générale» et «spécifique» qu'on utilise pour ne pas soumettre au jury des éléments de preuve par ailleurs pertinents, est artificielle et soulève deux problèmes fondamentaux. Premièrement, c'est le législateur et non les tribunaux qui doivent modifier la loi si la politique générale doit l'emporter sur les principes. Deuxièmement, même si les tribunaux pouvaient le faire à bon droit, il n'y a aucune preuve démontrant que l'exigence artificielle d'une intention spécifique est vraiment nécessaire pour protéger la société.

L'arrêt Leary, qui a donné naissance à la distinction entre l'intention générale et l'intention spécifique doit être renversé. Cette décision antérieure à la Charte impose une forme de responsabilité absolue aux délinquants intoxiqués: un élément essentiel est présumé quand on prouve l'intoxication. Il porte donc atteinte au droit garanti par la Charte d'être présumé innocent tant qu'on n'est pas déclarée coupable et à la présomption d'innocence. La règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary ne saurait être maintenue aux termes de l'article premier de la Charte car l'objectif de la protection du public, quoique important, n'y est pas atteint d'une manière conforme au critère de proportionnalité formulé dans l'arrêt Oakes. L'autorité de l'arrêt Leary a également été ébranlée tout à fait indépendamment de la Charte. Une croyance sincère mais déraisonnable et erronée au consentement réduit à néant la mens rea requise pour undermines the clarity and certainty in law which underpin the principle of stare decisis. The classification of offences as to specific intent category is an ad hoc, unpredictable exercise. Finally, the courts should not create new offences or broaden the net of liability. The Leary rule expands the scope of criminal liability beyond normal limits. It is acceptable, however, to overrule a prior decision to establish a rule favourable to the accused.

The absence in the charge to the jury of any reference to the Crown's duty to prove that the accused acted with the requisite intent was fatal to the conviction. The Crown made no request that this Court apply s. 613(1)(b)(iii) of the Criminal Code and it was not for this Court to speculate as to the likely result had the jury been properly instructed.

certains crimes. La tâche du jury pour déterminer si la croyance est sincère est inutilement compliquée par les restrictions de l'arrêt Leary concernant l'erreur de fait. L'incertitude causée par l'arrêt Leary porte aussi atteinte à la clarté et à la certitude du droit sous-jacent au principe du stare decisis. La classification des infractions relativement à la catégorie de l'intention spécifique est nécessairement un exercice ad hoc au résultat imprévisible. Enfin, il n'appartient pas aux tribunaux de créer de nouvelles infractions ni de donner plus d'extension à la responsabilité. La règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary étend la portée de la responsabilité criminelle au-delà des limites normales. Il est toutefois acceptable de renverser un arrêt antérieur pour créer une règle favorable à l'accusé.

Le fait que, dans l'exposé au jury, on n'ait pas parlé de l'obligation du ministère public de prouver que l'accusé avait agi avec l'intention requise est fatal à la déclaration de culpabilité. Le ministère public n'a pas demandé à cette Cour d'appliquer le sous-al. 613(1)b)(iii) du Code criminel et il n'appartient pas à cette Cour de faire des conjectures sur le résultat probable si le jury avait reçu des instructions appropriées.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE (dissenting)—Counsel for the appellant submits that there are two issues raised in this appeal: (i) whether sexual assault causing bodily harm contrary to s. 246.2(c) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1970, c. C-34, is an offence of "specific" intent; (ii) whether drunkenness can ever be a "defence" to a charge of sexual assault causing bodily harm.

LE JUGE EN CHEF (dissident)—L'avocat de l'appelant plaide que le présent pourvoi soulève deux questions: (i) celle de savoir si la perpétration d'une agression sexuelle qui entraîne des lésions corporelles, au sens de l'al. 246.2*c*) du Code criminel, S.R.C. 1970, chap. C-34, est une infraction nécessitant une intention «spécifique» et (ii) celle de savoir si l'ivresse peut jamais constituer un «moyen de défense» opposable à une accusation d'agression sexuelle entraînant des lésions corporelles.

Facts

The appellant, Nelson Pierre Bernard, was charged with sexual assault causing bodily harm to the complainant contrary to s. 246.2(c) of the Criminal Code. That subsection provides that everyone who, in committing a sexual assault, causes bodily harm to the complainant is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for fourteen years.

The facts may be briefly stated.

The complainant, eighteen years of age at the relevant time, visited the appellant, twenty-four years old. The appellant went out to dinner and to a bar with some friends while the complainant stayed behind in his apartment. Later that night the group returned to the flat. The friends departed, leaving the appellant and the complainant alone together.

The complainant testified that she had complied with the appellant's request to remain in the apartment after the friends' departure, both because she was not feeling well and because it was the first Christmas since the death of her father. She and the appellant, who had been a good friend of her late father, were going to talk about him.

The two lay down on the couch together and began talking. The complainant testified that she was then forced to have sexual intercourse without her consent and was subjected to serious bodily injury at the hands of the appellant. There was evidence that the appellant had punched the complainant twice with a closed fist, once above the eye, causing the eyelid to bleed profusely, and that he had threatened to kill her. There was evidence of a blood-stained towel and pillow case concealed in the toilet tank of the appellant's apartment. Counsel for the appellant admitted that intercourse had taken place.

The complainant testified that the appellant had been drinking but was able to walk, to see everything, to talk clearly, and to put albums on the record player. One of the friends of the appellant testified that the appellant had been drinking on L'appelant, Nelson Pierre Bernard, a été accusé d'avoir commis une agression sexuelle qui a causé des lésions corporelles à la plaignante, en infraction à l'al. 246.2*c*) du Code criminel. Aux termes de cet alinéa, est coupable d'un acte criminel et passible d'un emprisonnement de quatorze ans, quiconque, en commettant une agression sexuelle, inflige des lésions corporelles au plaignant.

Les faits

Les faits peuvent être exposés brièvement.

La plaignante, âgée de dix-huit ans à l'époque en cause, était en visite chez l'appelant, qui avait vingt-quatre ans. L'appelant est sorti dîner et est allé à un bar avec des amis tandis que la plaignante est restée dans l'appartement de l'appelant. Plus tard la même nuit, le groupe est revenu à l'appartement. Les amis sont partis, laissant l'appelant et la plaignante tout seuls.

La plaignante a dit dans son témoignage que si elle a accédé à la demande de l'appelant de rester chez lui après le départ des amis, c'est parce qu'elle ne se sentait pas bien et parce que c'était le premier Noël depuis la mort de son père. L'appelant avait été un bon ami du père de la plaignante et ils allaient parler de lui.

Les deux se sont étendus sur le canapé et se sont mis à causer. La plaignante a témoigné que l'appelant l'a alors forcée d'avoir des rapports sexuels avec lui sans son consentement et qu'il lui a infligé des lésions corporelles graves. D'après la preuve, l'appelant a frappé la plaignante de deux coups de poing, dont un au-dessus d'un œil qui a fait saigner abondamment la paupière, et il a menacé de la tuer. Il ressort également de la preuve qu'une serviette et une taie d'oreiller tachées de sang avaient été cachées dans le réservoir de chasse des cabinets de l'appartement de l'appelant. L'avocat de ce dernier a reconnu qu'il y avait eu rapports sexuels.

La déposition de la plaignante révèle que l'appelant avait bu, mais qu'il était capable de marcher, de voir clair, de parler intelligiblement et de poser des disques sur le phonographe. Une des amis de l'appelant a témoigné que celui-ci avait bu la nuit the night in question and, though he became rowdy, he was walking straight and talking.

When the police arrived at the appellant's apartment, he was awakened from a deep sleep and seemed to be suffering somewhat from his drinking. The appellant stated that his drunkenness caused the attack on the complainant.

The appellant was tried before a judge and jury. He did not testify at the trial, but the Crown led evidence of a statement he had made to the police. In the statement he admitted that he had forced the complainant to have sexual intercourse with him. He stated that he did not know why he had done it because he was drunk and that, "when I realized what I was doing, I got off." In charging the jury, the trial judge made no reference to the intent requirement, beyond reading the jury the definition of assault. The jury was told that the sole issue was whether the Crown had proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the complainant had not consented to the intercourse because of the assault and threats made by the accused. With respect to drunkenness, the trial judge said as follows: "Only the accused in his statement says, 'I was all drunked up too.' There was no evidence of drunkenness except that statement and it is open to you to accept it and find that he was drunk but even if he was drunk, drunkenness is no defence to the charge alleged against this accused."

The appellant was convicted and sentenced to four years imprisonment. An appeal to the Court of Appeal of Ontario was dismissed (now reported at (1985), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 574). Dubin J.A., delivering the oral judgment of the Court, said at p. 574:

> On the merits, the Crown's case was overwhelming. The complainant's testimony that she was forced to have sexual intercourse without her consent and the serious bodily injury which she suffered during the course of the assault was confirmed in every respect by other evidence.

With respect, I agree.

Dubin J.A. concluded at p. 576:

en question et que, bien qu'il soit devenu batailleur, il marchait droit et pouvait s'exprimer.

La police, en arrivant à l'appartement de l'appelant, l'a tiré d'un sommeil profond et il semblait souffrir quelque peu des effets de l'alcool. L'appelant a dit que c'est son ivresse qui l'a fait agresser la plaignante.

L'appelant a été jugé devant un juge et jury. Il n'a pas témoigné au procès, mais le ministère public a produit en preuve une déclaration qu'il avait faite à la police et dans laquelle il a avoué avoir forcé la plaignante d'avoir des rapports sexuels avec lui. Il affirmait ignorer pourquoi il l'avait fait parce qu'il était ivre et a ajouté: [TRADUCTION] «Quand je me suis rendu compte de ce que je faisais, j'ai arrêté.» Dans son exposé au jury, le juge du procès n'a pas fait mention de l'intention, si ce n'est en lisant au jury la définition de voies de fait. Il a dit au jury que l'unique question était de savoir si le ministère public avait prouvé hors de tout doute raisonnable qu'en raison de l'agression commise par l'accusé et en raison des menaces proférées par lui, la plaignante n'avait pas consenti aux rapports sexuels. En ce qui concerne l'ivresse, le juge du procès a dit: [TRADUCTION] «L'accusé a été le seul à parler d'ivresse dans sa déclaration: «J'étais bien soûl aussi.» Exception faite de cette déclaration, il n'y a aucune preuve qu'il était ivre. Or, vous pouvez l'accepter et conclure qu'il était en état d'ébriété, mais même s'il l'était, l'ivresse ne peut être opposée comme défense à l'accusation portée contre lui.»

L'appelant a été reconnu coupable et condamné à quatre ans d'emprisonnement. Un appel devant la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a été rejeté (arrêt maintenant publié à (1985), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 574). Le juge Dubin, qui a prononcé les motifs oraux de la Cour, a dit à la p. 574:

> [TRADUCTION] Sur le fond, la preuve à charge a été accablante. Le témoignage de la plaignante selon lequel elle a été forcée d'avoir des rapports sexuels sans y consentir et selon lequel elle a subi des lésions corporelles graves au cours de l'agression a été confirmé en tous points par d'autres témoignages.

Avec égards, je suis d'accord.

En conclusion, le juge Dubin a affirmé, à la p. 576:

1988 CanLII 22 (SCC)

Mr. Ruby also took objection to passages in the judge's charge. We are all satisfied that the charge, when read as a whole, is more favourable to the appellant than the evidence warranted. In any event, we are satisfied that even if objection could be taken to some of the expressions used by the trial judge, there was no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice in this case.

[TRADUCTION] Me Ruby a en outre contesté certains passages de l'exposé du juge au jury. Or, nous sommes tous convaincus que dans l'ensemble l'exposé est plus favorable à l'appelant que la preuve ne le justifie. Quoi qu'il en soit, nous sommes convaincus que, même si on pouvait trouver à redire à certaines expressions employées par le juge du procès, il n'y a eu en l'espèce aucun préjudice appréciable ni aucun déni de justice.

Drunkenness and Mens Rea

In my view, the only issue the Court needs to address may be put as follows: should evidence of self-induced intoxication be considered by the trier of fact, along with all other relevant evidence, in determining whether the prosecution has proved beyond a reasonable doubt the mens rea required to constitute the offence? I am of the opinion that the Court should answer that question in the affirmative.

I wish to make clear at the outset, however, that nothing in these reasons is intended to apply with respect to the quite distinct issues raised by offences, such as driving while impaired, where intoxication or the consumption of alcohol is itself an ingredient of the offence. The mens rea of such offences can be left for consideration another day.

In Leary v. The Queen, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 29, Pigeon J. for the majority of the Court, held that rape was an offence requiring proof of only "basic" or "general" intent rather than "specific" intent. Under that categorization, the Court held, the jury should be instructed that evidence that drunkenness may have deprived the accused of the capacity to form the requisite intent should not be taken into account when considering whether the Crown had satisfied the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused had acted with the requisite intent. (See also Swietlinski v. The Queen, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 956, dealing with the offence of indecent assault). The offence of rape has now been removed from the Criminal Code and in its place are the sexual assault provisions. More recently, in R. v. Chase, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 293, the Court held that sexual assault was a

L'ivresse et la mens rea

À mon avis, l'unique question sur laquelle la Cour doit se pencher peut être ainsi formulée: pour déterminer si la poursuite a établi hors de tout doute raisonnable la mens rea requise pour constituer l'infraction en cause, le juge des faits doit-il prendre en considération avec tous les autres éléments de preuve pertinents la preuve de l'intoxication volontaire? Pour ma part, j'estime que la Cour doit donner à cette question une réponse affirmative.

Je tiens toutefois à préciser dès l'abord que rien dans les présents motifs ne doit s'appliquer aux questions tout à fait distinctes qui se posent dans le cas d'infractions comme la conduite avec facultés affaiblies, où l'ébriété ou la consommation d'alcool sont elles-mêmes des éléments de l'infraction. La mens rea requise par ces infractions-là pourra être examinée dans un autre contexte.

Dans l'arrêt Leary c. La Reine, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 29, le juge Pigeon, parlant au nom de la majorité de cette Cour, a conclu que le viol était une infraction exigeant seulement la preuve d'une intention «fondamentale» ou «générale» plutôt que d'une intention «spécifique». Selon cette catégorisation, a statué la Cour, il faut dire au jury qu'une preuve selon laquelle l'accusé a pu pour cause d'ivresse se trouver dans l'incapacité de former l'intention requise ne doit pas être prise en considération relativement à la question de savoir si le ministère public s'est acquitté de son obligation de prouver hors de tout doute raisonnable que l'accusé avait agi avec l'intention requise. (Voir aussi l'arrêt Swietlinski c. La Reine, [1980] 2 R.C.S. 956, portant sur l'infraction d'attentat à la pudeur). L'infraction de viol a depuis été supprimée du Code criminel pour être remplacée par des crime of "basic" or "general" intent. In Chase, however, drunkenness was not in issue and the propriety of maintaining the distinction between general and specific intent for purposes of evidence regarding intoxication was not considered. The present case raises that much more basic issue which, in my view, the Court should reconsider.

In my dissent in Leary, I sought to advance the view that respect for basic criminal law principles required that the legal fiction, the artificial "specific" intent threshold requirement, be abandoned. I do not intend in these reasons to repeat what I said in Leary. With due regard for stare decisis, as to which I will have more to say in a moment, and with the greatest of respect for those of a contrary view, I would only add that nothing I have heard or read since the judgment in Leary has caused me to abandon or modify in the slightest degree the views of dissent which I there expressed. Analysis of the Leary dissent may be summarized as follows.

First of all, one must recognize the fundamental nature of the mens rea requirement. To warrant the condemnation of a conviction and the infliction of punishment, one who has caused harm must have done so with a blameworthy state of mind. It is always for the Crown to prove the existence of a guilty mind beyond a reasonable doubt. Intoxication affects one's mental state, one's ability to perceive the circumstances in which one acts, and to appreciate possible consequences. In principle, therefore, intoxication is relevant to the mental element in crime, and should be considered, together with all other evidence, in determining whether the Crown has proved the requisite mental state beyond a reasonable doubt.

dispositions relatives à l'agression sexuelle. Plus récemment, dans l'arrêt R. c. Chase, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 293, la Cour a conclu que l'agression sexuelle était un crime d'intention «fondamentale» ou «générale». Dans l'affaire Chase, cependant, l'ivresse n'était pas en cause et on ne s'est pas demandé s'il convenait de conserver la distinction entre l'intention générale et l'intention spécifique en ce qui concerne la preuve d'intoxication. La présente espèce par contre soulève cette question tout à fait fondamentale et, selon moi, la Cour doit la réexaminer.

Dans la dissidence que j'ai rédigée dans l'affaire Leary, j'ai tenté d'avancer que le respect des principes fondamentaux du droit criminel commandait l'abandon de la fiction juridique qu'était l'exigence artificielle d'une intention «spécifique». Je ne me propose pas de répéter ici ce que j'ai déjà dit dans l'affaire Leary. Nonobstant la question du stare decisis, sur laquelle je reviendrai plus loin, et avec les plus grands égards pour les tenants du point de vue contraire, j'ajoute simplement que je n'ai rien lu ni entendu depuis l'arrêt Leary qui m'ait amené à renoncer à l'opinion que j'ai exprimée en dissidence ou à la modifier le moindrement. Ce qui suit est une brève analyse des motifs dissidents dans l'affaire Leary.

Tout d'abord, il faut reconnaître la nature fondamentale de l'exigence d'une mens rea. La personne qui a causé un préjudice doit l'avoir fait dans un état d'esprit blâmable, sans quoi on ne saurait justifier une déclaration de culpabilité et l'imposition d'une peine avec tout ce que cela peut avoir d'infamant. C'est toujours au ministère public qu'il incombe de prouver hors de tout doute raisonnable l'existence d'un état d'esprit coupable. L'intoxication a un effet sur l'état mental d'une personne, sur sa capacité de prendre conscience des circonstances dans lesquelles elle agit et de se rendre compte des conséquences possibles. En principe, donc, l'intoxication est pertinente relativement à l'élément moral d'un crime et on doit en tenir compte avec tous les autres éléments de preuve en déterminant si le ministère public a prouvé hors de tout doute raisonnable l'existence de l'état mental requis.

It is quite wrong, I think, to characterize the issue as whether the "defence of drunkenness" should apply to this or that offence. While this expression is commonly used, it is misleading and perhaps even unduly emotive. It suggests that those who would otherwise be liable for their criminal conduct will escape because they were drunk at the time the offence was committed. But, of course, no one suggests that special concessions should be made to drunken offenders. The issue is really whether the Crown should be relieved of the usual burden of proving the requisite mental element for the offence because the accused was intoxicated. Should the jury be entitled to assess all of the evidence relevant to intent and be entitled to decide on the basis of all of the evidence whether the Crown has satisfied that burden?

Il est tout à fait erroné, à mon avis, de dire que la question est de savoir si la «défense d'ivresse» doit s'appliquer à telle ou telle infraction. Bien que cette expression s'emploie couramment, elle est trompeuse et peut-être même trop chargée de connotations. Elle sous-entend en effet que ceux qui seraient par ailleurs responsables de leur conduite criminelle y échapperont parce qu'ils étaient ivres au moment de la perpétration de l'infraction. Mais personne n'allègue évidemment que des concessions spéciales devraient être faites aux délinquants en état d'ébriété. La question qui se pose en réalité est celle de savoir si le ministère public doit, du fait que l'accusé était ivre, être déchargé de l'obligation habituelle de prouver l'élément moral requis pour qu'il y ait infraction. Le jury devrait-il avoir le droit d'examiner la totalité de la preuve se rapportant à l'intention et de décider en fonction de cette preuve-là si le ministère public s'est acquitté de l'obligation qui lui incombe?

The categories of "specific" intent on the one hand and "basic" or "general" intent on the other have evolved as an artificial device whereby evidence, otherwise relevant, is excluded from the jury's consideration. This Court, in Swietlinski, has recognized that intoxication may as a matter of fact deprive an accused of "basic" or "general" intent. It is said, however, by those who support the classification that as a matter of policy, consideration of evidence of intoxication must be excluded. Indeed, a notable feature to be found in the analysis of many of those who support restricting the jury's use of evidence relating to drunkenness is the concession that while principle and logic lead in an opposite direction, the policy of protection of the public requires that principle and logic should yield: see, e.g., Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, [1976] 2 All E.R. 142, at pp. 167-68, per Lord Edmund-Davies, quoted by Pigeon J. in Leary, supra, at pp. 52-53.

Les catégories de l'intention «spécifique» d'une part et de l'intention «fondamentale» ou «générale» d'autre part ont évolué en tant que moyen artificiel d'exclure de l'examen du jury une preuve par ailleurs pertinente. Dans l'arrêt Swietlinski, cette Cour a en fait reconnu que l'ivresse peut, en tant que fait, jouer de manière à priver l'accusé de l'intention «fondamentale» ou «générale». Les partisans de cette classification prétendent toutefois que, pour des raisons de politique générale, la considération de la preuve d'ivresse doit être exclue. De fait, une caractéristique notable de l'analyse d'un bon nombre de ceux qui se prononcent en faveur de la restriction de l'usage qu'un jury peut faire d'une preuve relative à l'ivresse est la concession que, bien que les principes et la logique aillent dans l'autre sens, ceux-ci doivent céder le pas devant la nécessité de protéger le public: voir p. ex. Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, [1976] 2 All E.R. 142, aux pp. 167 et 168, motifs de lord Edmund-Davies, cités par le juge Pigeon dans l'arrêt Leary, précité, aux pp. 52 et 53.

In my view, there are two fundamental problems with this approach. First, if the law is to be altered in the name of policy over principle, that is surely a task for Parliament rather than the courts. As

D'après moi, ce point de vue pose deux problèmes fondamentaux. Premièrement, si la loi doit être modifiée de manière que la politique générale l'emporte sur les principes, c'est certainement là

Barwick C.J. of the High Court of Australia concluded in O'Connor (1980), 4 A. Crim. R. 348, at pp. 363-64:

> It seems to me to be completely inconsistent with the principles of the common law that a man should be conclusively presumed to have an intent which, in fact, he does not have, or to have done an act which, in truth, he did not do.
> I can readily understand that a person who has taken alcohol or another drug to such an extent that he is intoxicated thereby to the point where he has no will to act or no capacity to form an intent to do an act is blameworthy and that his act of having ingested or administered the alcohol or other drug ought to be visited with severe consequences. The offence of being drunk and disorderly is not maintained these days in all systems of the common law. In any case it has not carried a sufficient penalty properly to express the public opprobrium which should attach to one who, by the taking of alcohol or the use of drugs, has become intoxicated to the point where he is the vehicle for unsocial or violent behaviour. But, though blameworthy for becoming intoxicated, I can see no ground for presuming his acts to be voluntary and relevantly intentional. For what is blameworthy there should be an appropriate criminal offence. But it is not for the judges to create an offence appropriate in the circumstances: cf. Knuller (Publishing, Printing & Promotions) Ltd. v. D.P.P., [1973] A.C. 435, at pp. 457-458, 464-465 and 490). It must be for the Parliament.

Secondly, even if it were appropriate for the courts to bend principle in the name of policy, so far as I am aware, there is no evidence that the artificiality of the specific intent requirement is actually required for social protection.

An unrestrained application of basic mens rea doctrine would not, in my opinion, open a gaping hole in the criminal law inimical to social protection. There are several reasons for this. To the extent that intoxication merely lowers inhibitions, removes self-restraint or induces unusual self-confidence or aggressiveness, it would be of no avail to an accused, as such effects do not relate to the mens rea requirement for volitional and intentional or reckless conduct. Similarly, intoxication would une tâche qui revient au législateur plutôt qu'aux tribunaux. Comme l'a conclu le juge en chef Barwick de la Haute Cour d'Australie dans l'arrêt O'Connor (1980), 4 A. Crim. R. 348, aux pp. 363 et 364:

> [TRADUCTION] Il me semble tout à fait incompatible avec les principes de la common law qu'un homme soit définitivement présumé avoir une intention qu'en réalité il n'a pas ou avoir accompli un acte qu'à la vérité il n'a pas accompli.
> Je conçois bien qu'une personne qui, à force de consommer de l'alcool ou de prendre une autre drogue se met dans un état d'ébriété à tel point qu'il n'a pas la volonté d'agir ni la capacité de former l'intention d'accomplir un acte, mérite le blâme et que son acte d'avoir ingéré de l'alcool ou de s'être administré une autre drogue devrait entraîner des conséquences sérieuses. L'infraction d'ivresse publique a disparu maintenant de tous les ressorts de common law. De toute façon, elle n'a jamais entraîné une peine suffisante pour refléter adéquatement l'opprobre que devrait s'attirer quelqu'un qui, par la consommation d'alcool ou l'usage de la drogue, s'enivre tellement que son comportement devient antisocial ou violent. Mais, bien qu'on puisse lui reprocher de s'être enivré, je ne vois aucune raison de présumer que ses actes étaient volontaires et qu'ils étaient intentionnels au sens pertinent. À toute conduite répréhensible devrait correspondre une infraction criminelle. Il n'appartient toutefois pas aux juges de créer une infraction qui est appropriée dans les circonstances: cf. Knuller (Publishing, Printing & Promotions) Ltd. v. D.P.P., [1973] A.C. 435, aux pp. 457, 458, 464, 465 et 490). C'est au législateur de le faire.

Deuxièmement, même si les tribunaux pouvaient à bon droit faire une entorse aux principes au nom de la politique générale, il n'y a, autant que je sache, aucune preuve démontrant que l'exigence artificielle d'une intention spécifique est vraiment nécessaire pour protéger la société.

Selon moi, l'application sans restriction du principe fondamental de la mens rea ne créerait pas en droit criminel une immense lacune qui compromettrait la protection de la société. Cela s'explique de plusieurs façons. Dans la mesure où l'intoxication ne fait que diminuer les inhibitions, supprimer la retenue ou provoquer une confiance en soi ou une agressivité inhabituelles, un accusé ne saurait s'en prévaloir, car de tels effets n'ont rien à voir avec l'exigence d'une mens rea en matière de conduite be of no avail to an accused who got drunk in order to gain the courage to commit a crime or to aid in his defence. Thirdly, one can trust in the good sense of the jury and that of our trial judges to weigh all the evidence in a fair and responsible manner, and they are unlikely to acquit too readily those who have committed offences while intoxicated.

The High Court of Australia held in O'Connor, supra, that the distinction between specific and general intent should not be followed and that in all cases, evidence of drunkenness should be left with the jury along with all other evidence relative to the issue of intent. The New Zealand Court of Appeal also rejected the artificial specific intent distinction: R. v. Kamipeli, [1975] 2 N.Z.L.R. 610. In that case, McCarthy P. gave the judgment of the Court and stated at p. 614 in relation to the correct interpretation of Director of Public Prosecutions v. Beard, [1920] A.C. 479:

(1) The quotations from Lord Birkenhead set out above refer to "specific" intents. The use of this adjective has of recent years been often criticised as suggesting the existence of a distinction between the Crown's burden in those cases when the general intent involved in proof of mens rea is necessary, on the one hand, and in those when the statute prescribes a particular intent on the other. But we cannot accept that Lord Birkenhead intended any such distinction. He also said:

"I do not think that the proposition of law deduced from these earlier cases is an exceptional rule applicable only to cases in which it is necessary to prove a specific intent in order to constitute the graver crime—eg wounding with intent to do grievous bodily harm or with intent to kill. It is true that in such cases the specific intent must be proved to constitute the particular crime, but this is, on ultimate analysis, only in accordance with the ordinary law applicable to crime, for, speaking generally (and apart from certain special offences), a person cannot be convicted of a crime unless the mens was rea. Drunkenness, rendering a person incapable of the intent, would be an volontaire et intentionnelle ou insouciante. De même, un accusé ne pourrait invoquer l'intoxication s'il s'était enivré afin de se donner le courage de commettre un crime ou pour faciliter sa défense. Troisièmement, on peut compter sur le bon sens du jury et de nos juges du procès pour peser la totalité de la preuve d'une manière équitable et impartiale et il est peu probable qu'ils acquittent trop facilement ceux qui commettent des infractions en état d'ébriété.

La Haute Cour d'Australie a conclu dans l'arrêt O'Connor, précité, qu'il ne fallait pas continuer à faire une distinction entre l'intention spécifique et l'intention générale et que, dans tous les cas, la preuve d'ivresse devrait être soumise au jury avec tous les autres éléments de preuve se rapportant à la question de l'intention. La Cour d'appel de la Nouvelle-Zélande a également rejeté cette distinction artificielle: R. v. Kamipeli, [1975] 2 N.Z.L.R. 610. Dans cette affaire-là, le président McCarthy a prononcé le jugement de la Cour et a dit, à la p. 614, relativement à l'interprétation à donner à l'arrêt Director of Public Prosecutions v. Beard, [1920] A.C. 479:

«Je ne crois pas que le principe de droit déduit de cette jurisprudence plus ancienne constitue une exception qui s'applique uniquement aux cas où il faut prouver une intention spécifique pour qu'il y ait perpétration de l'infraction plus grave, p. ex. blesser avec l'intention d'infliger des lésions corporelles graves ou de tuer. Certes, l'intention spécifique doit être démontrée dans ces cas-là afin d'établir la perpétration du crime en question, mais, en dernière analyse, cela n'est que conforme aux règles de droit ordinaires applicables aux actes criminels car, d'une manière générale (et mis à part certaines infractions spéciales), nul ne peut être déclaré coupable d'un crime à moins d'avoir eu la mens rea. L'ivresse rendant une personne incapable de former l'intention serait un moyen de défense, comme answer, as it is for example in a charge of attempted suicide" (ibid., 504).

So whether it be a general or a particular intent the burden is the same; the Crown must prove the intent required by the crime alleged.

(Compare R. v. Roulston, [1976] 2 N.Z.L.R. 644 (N.Z.C.A.), at pp. 653-54, holding the issue to be open in the light of Majewski, supra.)

As counsel for the appellant submits:

There has been no empirical evidence to indicate that during the brief period of ten to fifteen years, that the Canadian and English Courts have experimented with the rule in Majewski and Leary, that there has been a reduction in the incidence of intoxicated offenders. Nor is there empirical evidence that the incidence of intoxicated offenders is greater in Australia, and particularly in the State of Victoria, where the rule has long been eschewed (see the comments of Mr. Justice Stephen in Regina v. O'Connor, supra, at pp. 99-100 and of Mr. Justice Wilson at p. 139). More importantly, there was no evidence before the House of Lords in 1976 in Majewski or before this Honourable Court in 1970 in Perrault and in 1977 in Leary to the effect that the pre-existing common law was not functioning properly in this area.

The experience in New Zealand and Australia, where the specific intent has been abandoned, suggests that the public will be adequately protected if the issue is left to the good sense of the jury. O'Connor was preceded in the State of Victoria by R. v. Keogh, [1964] V.R. 400. In O'Connor, Stephen J. explained as follows, at p. 358:

A distrust of jurors and an anxiety that they may too readily be persuaded to an acquittal if evidence of the result of self-induced intoxication, particularly by drugs other than alcohol, were allowed, may have formed some part of the public policy on which the decision rests. I may say at once that I have, of course, no experience of English juries: but I have of juries in New South Wales. Starke J., a most experienced judge in the hearing of criminal charges in Victoria, having had as well a long and distinguished career as an advocate, expressed him-il l'est par exemple dans le cas d'une accusation de tentative de suicide» (ibid., à la p. 504).

Qu'il s'agisse donc d'une intention générale ou d'une intention particulière, la charge de la preuve demeure la même: le ministère public doit prouver l'intention requise comme élément du crime reproché.

(Comparer R. v. Roulston, [1976] 2 N.Z.L.R. 644 (N.Z.C.A.), aux pp. 653 et 654, où il a été décidé que, compte tenu de la décision Majewski, précitée, la question demeurait entière.)

Comme le fait valoir l'avocat de l'appelant:

[TRADUCTION] Il n'y a aucune preuve empirique indiquant que, pendant la brève période d'une dizaine ou d'une quinzaine d'années où les tribunaux canadiens et anglais ont fait des expériences fondées sur la règle établie dans les arrêts Majewski et Leary, on a assisté à une diminution du nombre d'infractions commises en état d'ébriété, pas plus qu'il n'existe une preuve empirique que ces infractions sont plus nombreuses en Australie, et particulièrement dans l'État de Victoria, où la règle n'est plus suivie depuis longtemps (voir les observations du juge Stephen dans l'arrêt Regina v. O'Connor, précité, aux pp. 99 et 100, et celles du juge Wilson, à la p. 139). Plus important encore, on n'avait produit ni devant la Chambre des lords en 1976 dans l'affaire Majewski ni devant la Cour suprême du Canada en 1970 dans l'affaire Perrault et en 1977 dans l'affaire Leary aucune preuve établissant que la common law préexistante fonctionnait mal dans ce domaine.

D'après ce qui a été constaté en Nouvelle-Zélande et en Australie, pays dans lesquels l'intention spécifique a été abandonnée, le public sera adéquatement protégé si l'on s'en remet au bon sens du jury. L'arrêt O'Connor a été précédé dans l'État de Victoria par la décision R. v. Keogh, [1964] V.R. 400. Dans l'arrêt O'Connor, le juge Stephen a expliqué, à la p. 358:

[TRADUCTION] Une méfiance envers les jurés et la crainte qu'ils ne se laissent trop facilement persuader de rendre un verdict d'acquittement si on admettait la preuve du résultat de l'intoxication volontaire, notamment au moyen de drogues autre que l'alcool, ont pu motiver en partie la politique générale sur laquelle repose la décision. Je m'empresse de signaler que je n'ai bien entendu aucune expérience des jurys anglais; je connais cependant ceux de Nouvelle-Galles du Sud. Le juge Starke, un juge de très grande expérience en matière pénale dans l'État de Victoria et en outre un avocat ayant eu une longue carrière distinguée, s'est self in the present case in relation to the impact of evidence of intoxication upon Victorian jurors. He said:

> "I, of course, have no knowledge of how English juries react. But over nearly forty years' experience in this State I have found juries to be very slow to accept a defence based on intoxication. I do not share the fear held by many in England that if intoxication is accepted as a defence as far as general intent is concerned the floodgates will open and hordes of guilty men will descend on the community."

I share his views, as if they had been expressed about jurors in New South Wales. In my opinion, properly instructed jurors would be scrupulous and not indulgent in deciding an issue of voluntariness or of intention. Indeed, I am inclined to think that they may tend to think that an accused who had taken alcohol and particularly other drugs to the point of extreme intoxication had brought on himself what flowed from that state of intoxication.

The empirical evidence is to the same effect: see George Smith J., "Footnote to O'Connor's Case" (1981), 5 Crim. L.J. 270, reviewing the effects of the O'Connor decision in Australia, and concluding, after review of over 500 trials held in the District Court of New South Wales, that the actual impact on the acquittal rate was minimal (at p. 277):

> Certainly my inquiries would indicate that the decision in O'Connor's case, far from opening any floodgates has at most permitted an occasional drip to escape from the tap.

My comment in R. v. Hill, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 313, at p. 334, although made in a different context, bears repeating here: "I have the greatest of confidence in the level of intelligence and plain common sense of the average Canadian jury sitting on a criminal case. Juries are perfectly capable of sizing the matter up." In R. v. Bulmer, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 782, at p. 792, which dealt with the requirement in s. 244(4) of the Criminal Code that the jury be instructed on the issue of the honesty of the accused's mistaken belief in consent to consider the presence or absence of a reasonable grounds of that belief, McIntyre J. stated as follows:

prononcé en l'espèce sur l'effet d'une preuve d'intoxication sur les jurés de l'État de Victoria. Il a dit:

Je partage le point de vue du juge Starke comme s'il l'avait exprimé au sujet des jurés de Nouvelle-Galles du Sud. À mon avis, des jurés ayant reçu des directives appropriées, plutôt que de faire preuve d'indulgence, se montreraient scrupuleux en décidant si un acte a été commis volontairement ou intentionnellement. De fait, j'incline à penser qu'ils peuvent tendre à croire qu'un accusé qui, à force de consommer de l'alcool et, particulièrement, d'autres drogues, avait atteint un état d'extrême intoxication s'était infligé à lui-même les conséquences de cette intoxication.

La preuve empirique va dans le même sens: voir les observations du juge George Smith qui, dans «Footnote to O'Connor's Case» (1981), 5 Crim. L.J. 270, fait une revue des effets de l'arrêt O'Connor en Australie puis, après avoir examiné plus de 500 procès tenus devant la Cour de district de la Nouvelle-Galles du Sud, conclut que son incidence réelle sur le taux d'acquittement était minime, à la p. 277:

> [TRADUCTION] Certes, mes enquêtes tendent à indiquer que l'arrêt O'Connor, loin d'ouvrir les vannes, a permis tout au plus qu'une goutte occasionnelle s'échappe du robinet.

Ce que j'ai dit dans l'arrêt R. c. Hill, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 313, à la p. 334, bien que le contexte fût différent, vaut la peine d'être répété ici: «J'ai la plus grande confiance dans le niveau d'intelligence et de simple bon sens du jury canadien moyen qui siège dans une affaire criminelle. Les jurys sont parfaitement capables d'évaluer la question.» Dans l'arrêt R. c. Bulmer, [1987] 1 R.C.S. 782, à la p. 792, qui porte sur l'exigence du par. 244(4) du Code criminel, savoir qu'on doit dire au jury que, lorsqu'il examine si l'accusé croyait sincèrement mais de façon erronée au consentement, il doit examiner si cette croyance est justifiée par des motifs raisonnables, le juge McIntyre écrit:

1988 CanLII 22 (SCC)

This section, in my view, does not change the law as applied in Pappajohn. It does not require that the mistaken belief be reasonable or reasonably held. It simply makes it clear that in determining the issue of the honesty of the asserted belief, the presence or absence of reasonable grounds for the belief are relevant factors for the jury's consideration. This approach was, I suggest, foreshadowed in Pappajohn by Dickson J., at pp. 155-56, where he said:

> Perpetuation of fictions does little for the jury system or the integrity of criminal justice. The ongoing debate in the courts and learned journals as to whether mistake must be reasonable is conceptually important in the orderly development of the criminal law, but in my view, practically unimportant because the accused's statement that he was mistaken is not likely to be believed unless the mistake is, to the jury, reasonable. The jury will be concerned to consider the reasonableness of any grounds found, or asserted to be available, to support the defence of mistake. Although "reasonable grounds" is not a precondition to the availability of a plea of honest belief in consent, those grounds determine the weight to be given the defence. The reasonableness, or otherwise, of the accused's belief is only evidence for, or against, the view that the belief was actually held and the intent was, therefore, lacking.

Cet article, à mon avis, ne modifie pas le droit appliqué dans l'arrêt Pappajohn. Il n'exige pas que la croyance erronée soit raisonnable ou jugée raisonnable. Il établit simplement de manière précise que, dans l'examen de la question de la sincérité de la croyance, la présence ou l'absence de motifs raisonnables à l'appui de cette croyance sont des facteurs pertinents que le jury doit prendre en considération. Je suis d'avis que cette position avait été annoncée dans l'arrêt Pappajohn par le juge Dickson aux pp. 155 et 156, lorsqu'il a dit:

> Ni le système du jury ni l'intégrité de la justice criminelle ne sont bien servis par la perpétuation de fictions. Le débat actuel dans les tribunaux et les journaux spécialisés sur la question de savoir si l'erreur doit être fondée, est important sur le plan conceptuel pour l'évolution harmonieuse du droit criminel, mais, à mon avis, c'est sans importance pratique, parce qu'il est peu probable que le jury croie l'accusé qui déclare être dans l'erreur à moins que celle-ci ne soit, aux yeux du jury, fondée sur des motifs raisonnables. Le jury devra examiner le caractère raisonnable de tous les motifs qui appuient le moyen de défense d'erreur ou que l'on affirme tel. Bien que des «motifs raisonnables» ne constituent pas une condition préalable au moyen de défense de croyance sincère au consentement, ils déterminent le poids qui doit lui être accordé. Le caractère raisonnable ou non de la croyance de l'accusé n'est qu'un élément qui appuie ou non l'opinion que la croyance existait en réalité et que, par conséquent, l'intention était absente.

Stare Decisis

The real issue in this appeal, it seems to me, is whether the Court should now overrule Leary. Let me say immediately that, even if a case were wrongly decided, certainty in the law remains an important consideration. There must be compelling circumstances to justify departure from a prior decision. On the other hand, it is clear that this Court may overrule its own decisions and indeed, it has exercised that discretion on a number of occasions. See Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development v. Ranville, [1982] 2 S.C.R. 518, at p. 527, citing the following cases for the proposition that the Court may overturn a prior decision: Reference Re The Farm Products Marketing Act, [1957] S.C.R. 198, at p. 212; Binus v. The Queen, [1967] S.C.R. 594, at p. 601; Peda v. The Queen, [1969] S.C.R. 905, at

Stare decisis

La véritable question en litige, à ce qu'il me semble, est de savoir si la Cour devrait maintenant renverser l'arrêt Leary. Je souligne immédiatement que, même si une affaire a été décidée de façon erronée, le principe de la certitude en droit demeure une considération importante. Il doit en effet y avoir des circonstances impérieuses pour justifier qu'on s'écarte d'un précédent. D'un autre côté, il est évident que cette Cour peut renverser ses propres arrêts, pouvoir discrétionnaire qu'elle a d'ailleurs exercé à plusieurs reprises. Voir Ministre des Affaires indiennes et du Nord canadien c. Ranville, [1982] 2 R.C.S. 518, à la p. 527, où l'on cite la jurisprudence suivante qui confirme que la Cour peut renverser un de ses propres arrêts: Reference Re The Farm Products Marketing Act, [1957] R.C.S. 198, à la p. 212; Binus v. The

p. 911; Barnett v. Harrison, [1976] 2 S.C.R. 531, at p. 559; Capital Cities Communications Inc. v. Canadian Radio-Television Commission, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 141, at p. 161; A.V.G. Management Science Ltd. v. Barwell Developments Ltd., [1979] 2 S.C.R. 43, at p. 57; Bell v. The Queen, [1979] 2 S.C.R. 212, at pp. 219-20.

Cases in which the Court has actually exercised its discretion and acted to overrule, in addition to Ranville, supra, include the following: Paquette v. The Queen, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 189, at p. 197, overruling Dunbar v. The King (1936), 67 C.C.C. 20 (S.C.C.); McNamara Construction (Western) Ltd. v. The Queen, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 654, at p. 661, overruling Farwell v. The Queen (1894), 22 S.C.R. 553; Vetrovec v. The Queen, [1982] 1 S.C.R. 811, at p. 830.

There are at least four separate factors which find support in the jurisprudence of the Court which in my submission lead to the conclusion that Leary should be overruled.

A. Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

Since Leary was decided, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms has come into force. This Court has held that legislation which imposes the sanction of imprisonment without proof of a blameworthy state of mind violates the guarantee of fundamental justice contained in s. 7 of the Charter and must be struck down unless it can meet the exacting test of s. 1 (see Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486; R. v. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 636).

The appellant submits that Leary runs counter to s. 7 by providing that intoxication is no defence to a crime of general intent. In circumstances where the requisite mental intent is lacking due to an intoxicated condition, a general intent offence is converted into one of absolute liability in which proof of the commission of the actus reus by itself mandates conviction. It is also submitted that Leary runs counter to the presumption of innocence and the right to a fair hearing as guaranteed

Queen, [1967] R.C.S. 594, à la p. 601; Peda v. The Queen, [1969] R.C.S. 905, à la p. 911; Barnett c. Harrison, [1976] 2 R.C.S. 531, à la p. 559; Capital Cities Communications Inc. c. Conseil de la Radio-Télévision canadienne, [1978] 2 R.C.S. 141, à la p. 161; A.V.G. Management Science Ltd. c. Barwell Developments Ltd., [1979] 2 R.C.S. 43, à la p. 57; Bell c. La Reine, [1979] 2 R.C.S. 212, aux pp. 219 et 220.

Parmi les cas dans lesquels la Cour a en fait exercé son pouvoir discrétionnaire de manière à renverser certains de ses arrêts antérieurs, figurent, outre l'arrêt Ranville, précité, les arrêts suivants: Paquette c. La Reine, [1977] 2 R.C.S. 189, à la p. 197, renversant l'arrêt Dunbar v. The King (1936), 67 C.C.C. 20 (C.S.C.); McNamara Construction (Western) Ltd. c. La Reine, [1977] 2 R.C.S. 654, à la p. 661, renversant Farwell v. The Queen (1894), 22 R.C.S. 553; Vetrovec c. La Reine, [1982] 1 R.C.S. 811, à la p. 830.

Il y a au moins quatre facteurs distincts qui se dégagent de la jurisprudence de cette Cour qui, selon moi, mène à la conclusion que l'arrêt Leary doit être renversé.

A. La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés

Depuis que l'arrêt Leary a été rendu, la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés est entrée en vigueur. Cette Cour a jugé qu'une loi qui prévoit une peine d'emprisonnement sans exiger une preuve d'un état d'esprit blâmable viole la garantie de justice fondamentale énoncée à l'art. 7 de la Charte et doit en conséquence être invalidée, à moins qu'elle ne puisse satisfaire au critère sévère de l'article premier (voir Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486, R. c. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 636).

L'appelant prétend que l'arrêt Leary va à l'encontre de l'art. 7 en disposant que l'ivresse ne constitue pas une défense dans le cas d'un crime d'intention générale. Donc, lorsque l'intention requise est manquante pour cause d'ébriété, une infraction d'intention générale se transforme en infraction de responsabilité absolue, de sorte que la preuve de la perpétration de l'actus reus suffit pour qu'une déclaration de culpabilité s'impose. On allègue en outre que, dans la mesure où la by s. 11(d) of the Charter, in so far as wrongful intent is irrebuttably presumed upon the showing of intoxication.

preuve d'intoxication fait naître une présomption irréfragable d'intention coupable, l'arrêt Leary est incompatible avec la présomption d'innocence et avec le droit à un procès équitable énoncés à l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte.

In RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573, McIntyre J. held, at p. 603, that "the judiciary ought to apply and develop the principles of the common law in a manner consistent with the fundamental values enshrined in the Constitution." This principle supports the proposition that Leary ought to be reconsidered in light of the Charter.

Dans l'arrêt SDGMR c. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 R.C.S. 573, le juge McIntyre a conclu à la p. 603 que «le judiciaire devrait expliquer et développer des principes de common law d'une façon compatible avec les valeurs fondamentales enchâssées dans la Constitution». Ce principe appuie la proposition selon laquelle il y a lieu de réexaminer l'arrêt Leary à la lumière de la Charte.

The special mandate of the Charter has been found by the Court to require reconsideration of its own past decisions, and, where necessary, to overrule those authorities which fail to reflect the Charter's values: see, e.g., R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at pp. 333-34, overruling Robertson and Rosetanni v. The Queen, [1963] S.C.R. 651, on the meaning of "freedom of religion"; R. v. Therens, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 613, at pp. 639-40 overruling Chromiak v. The Queen, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 471, on the meaning of "detention"; Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, departing from Duke v. The Queen, [1972] S.C.R. 917, on the meaning of "fundamental justice"; R. v. Smith (Edward Dewey), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1045, adopting the minority opinion in Miller and Cockriell v. The Queen, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 680, in preference to that of the majority.

La Cour a conclu que la Charte, de par son mandat spécial, l'oblige à réexaminer ses propres arrêts antérieurs et, au besoin, à renverser ceux qui se révèlent non conformes aux valeurs consacrées dans la Charte: voir p. ex. R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 R.C.S. 295, aux pp. 333 et 334, renversant l'arrêt Robertson and Rosetanni v. The Queen, [1963] R.C.S. 651 quant au sens de l'expression «liberté de religion»; R. c. Therens, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 613, aux pp. 639 et 640, renversant l'arrêt Chromiak c. La Reine, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 471 quant au sens du mot «détention»; Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., précité, s'écartant de l'arrêt Duke c. La Reine, [1972] R.C.S. 917, quant au sens de «justice fondamentale»; R. c. Smith (Edward Dewey), [1987] 1 R.C.S. 1045, adoptant l'opinion de la minorité dans Miller et Cockriell c. La Reine, [1977] 2 R.C.S. 680, de préférence à celle de la majorité.

In Leary, I expressed the opinion that the fundamental rationale for the mens rea presumption could be framed in the following terms, at p. 34:

> The notion that a court should not find a person guilty of an offence against the criminal law unless he has a blameworthy state of mind is common to all civilized penal systems. It is founded upon respect for the person and for the freedom of human will. A person is accountable for what he wills. When, in the exercise of the power of free choice, a member of society chooses to engage in harmful or otherwise undesirable conduct proscribed by the criminal law, he must accept the sanctions which that law has provided for the purpose of discouraging such conduct. Justice demands no less. But, to be criminal, the wrongdoing must have been consciously committed. To subject the offender to pun-

Dans l'arrêt Leary, j'ai déclaré que la raison d'être fondamentale de la présomption de mens rea pouvait être ainsi formulée, à la p. 34:

> Le principe selon lequel un tribunal ne devrait conclure à la culpabilité d'une personne en droit criminel que si elle était mal intentionnée existe dans tous les systèmes de droit pénal civilisés. Il repose sur le respect de la personne et la notion de libre arbitre. Toute personne est responsable de sa volonté. Lorsqu'en exerçant son libre choix, un membre de la société adopte une conduite nuisible ou socialement inacceptable, contraire au droit criminel, il doit accepter les peines qu'impose la loi pour décourager de tels comportements. La justice n'exige rien de moins. Cependant, pour être qualifié de criminel, l'acte reproché doit avoir été accompli consciemment. Pour qu'un délinquant soit passible d'une peine, le crime ishment, a mental element as well as a physical element is an essential concomitant of the crime. The mental state basic to criminal liability consists in most crimes in either (a) an intention to cause the actus reus of the crime, i.e. an intention to do the act which constitutes the crime in question, or (b) foresight or realization on the part of the person that his conduct will probably cause or may cause the actus reus, together with assumption of or indifference to a risk, which in all of the circumstances is substantial or unjustifiable. This latter mental element is sometimes characterized as recklessness.

In my view, that same principle is now given constitutional force in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra and Vaillancourt, supra. In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, the Court held, at p. 514, that "absolute liability in penal law offends the principles of fundamental justice." In Vaillancourt, Lamer J. stated that Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act "elevated mens rea from a presumed element in Sault Ste. Marie, supra, to a constitutionally required element" (p. 652). While the Court has not yet dealt directly with the extent to which objective foreseeability may suffice for the imposition of criminal liability (Vaillancourt, at pp. 653-54), that issue is not raised in the present context.

The effect of the majority holding in Leary is to impose a form of absolute liability on intoxicated offenders, which is entirely inconsistent with the basic requirement for a blameworthy state of mind as a prerequisite to the imposition of the penalty of imprisonment mandated by the above-cited authorities. I agree with the observation of Professor Stuart in Canadian Criminal Law (2nd ed. 1987) that s. 7 of the Charter mandates the reversal of Leary and the assertion of "the fundamental principles of voluntariness and fault" in relation to intoxication and the criminal law (at p. 378). If the constitutional guarantee empowers the court to strike down legislation as in the two cases cited above, surely it provides a sufficient basis for doit nécessairement comporter un élément mental et un élément matériel. L'état mental requis pour qu'il y ait responsabilité pénale consiste dans la plupart des cas dans a) l'intention d'accomplir l'actus reus du crime, c'est-à-dire l'intention d'accomplir l'acte qui constitue le crime en question, ou dans b) le fait que la personne prévoit ou sait que son comportement entraînera probablement ou pourra entraîner l'actus reus, tout en acceptant le risque ou en y étant indifférente alors que, dans les circonstances, le risque est considérable ou injustifiable. Cet état d'esprit est parfois qualifié d'indifférence à l'égard des conséquences de l'acte.

À mon avis, ce même principe est maintenant constitutionnalisé dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., précité, et l'arrêt Vaillancourt, précité. Dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., la Cour a dit, à la p. 514, que «la responsabilité absolue en droit pénal contrevient aux principes de justice fondamentale». Dans l'arrêt Vaillancourt, le juge Lamer a affirmé que «de l'élément présumé qu'elle était dans l'arrêt Sault Ste-Marie, précité, la mens rea est ainsi devenue un élément requis par la Constitution» (à la p. 652) dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B. Bien que la Cour ne se soit pas encore prononcée directement sur la mesure dans laquelle la prévisibilité objective peut suffire pour fonder une conclusion à la responsabilité criminelle (Vaillancourt, aux pp. 653 et 654), cette question-là ne se pose pas dans le présent contexte.

La décision de la majorité dans l'affaire Leary a pour effet d'imposer à ceux qui commettent une infraction en état d'ébriété une sorte de responsabilité absolue, ce qui est tout à fait inconciliable avec l'exigence fondamentale, posée par la jurisprudence susmentionnée, de l'existence d'un état d'esprit blâmable comme condition pour que soit infligée une peine d'emprisonnement. J'abonde dans le sens du professeur Stuart qui dit dans Canadian Criminal Law (2nd ed. 1987) que l'art. 7 de la Charte commande le renversement de l'arrêt Leary et l'application des [TRADUCTION] «principes fondamentaux de l'intention et de la faute» relativement à l'intoxication en droit criminel (à la p. 378). Si la garantie constitutionnelle investit la Cour du pouvoir d'invalider des lois comme elle l'a fait dans les deux arrêts précités, elle lui permet certainement de renverser un de ses overruling a prior decision of the Court which fails to respect constitutionally entrenched values.

The majority holding in Leary also runs counter to the s. 11(d) right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty. With respect to crimes of general intent, guilty intent is in effect presumed upon proof of the fact of intoxication. Moreover, the presumption of guilt created by the Leary rule is irrebuttable. In R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103, the Court stated, at p. 132:

> . . . a provision which requires an accused to disprove on a balance of probabilities the existence of a presumed fact, which is an important element of the offence in question, violates the presumption of innocence in s. 11(d).

In Vaillancourt, Lamer J. stated the following, at pp. 654-55:

> . . . before an accused can be convicted of an offence, the trier of fact must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the existence of all of the essential elements of the offence. These essential elements include not only those set out by the legislature in the provision creating the offence but also those required by s. 7 of the Charter. Any provision creating an offence which allows for the conviction of an accused notwithstanding the existence of a reasonable doubt on any essential element infringes ss. 7 and 11(d). [Emphasis added.]

The same argument made in the context of s. 7 can be made in relation to s. 11(d). By providing that intoxication is no defence to a crime of general intent, Leary renders the offence one of absolute liability and runs counter to the presumption of innocence by presuming an essential element required by s. 7 upon the proof of the fact of intoxication.

In my view, the Leary rule cannot be upheld by reference to s. 1, as it cannot survive the "proportionality" inquiry. While the protection of the public, said to underlie the Leary rule, could serve as an important objective, in my view the Leary rule does not achieve that objective in a manner consistent with the proportionality test of Oakes, supra. Oakes requires that "the measures adopted arrêts antérieurs qui ne respecte pas des valeurs enchâssées dans la Constitution.

De plus, la décision de la majorité dans l'affaire Leary va à l'encontre du droit garanti par l'al. 11*d*) d'être présumé innocent tant qu'on n'est pas déclaré coupable. En ce qui concerne les crimes d'intention générale, l'intention coupable se présume en effet du moment que l'ivresse est prouvée. Au surplus, la présomption de culpabilité créée par la règle posée dans l'arrêt Leary est irréfragable. Dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103, la Cour a dit, à la p. 132:

> . . . une disposition qui oblige un accusé à démontrer selon la prépondérance des probabilités l'inexistence d'un fait présumé qui constitue un élément important de l'infraction en question, porte atteinte à la présomption d'innocence de l'al. 11*d*).

Dans l'arrêt Vaillancourt, le juge Lamer a dit, aux pp. 654 et 655:

> . . . pour qu'un accusé soit déclaré coupable d'une infraction, le juge des faits doit être convaincu hors de tout doute raisonnable de l'existence de tous les éléments essentiels de l'infraction. Ces éléments essentiels comprennent non seulement ceux énoncés par le législateur dans la disposition qui crée l'infraction, mais également ceux requis par l'art. 7 de la Charte. Toute disposition créant une infraction qui permet de déclarer un accusé coupable malgré l'existence d'un doute raisonnable quant à un élément essentiel porte atteinte à l'art. 7 et à l'al. 11*d*). [Je souligne.]

L'argument invoqué dans le contexte de l'art. 7 peut également être soulevé relativement à l'al. 11*d*). En établissant que l'ivresse ne constitue pas une défense dans le cas d'un crime d'intention générale, l'arrêt Leary fait de ce crime une infraction de responsabilité absolue et détruit la présomption d'innocence en présumant, dès lors qu'on apporte une preuve d'intoxication, l'existence d'un élément essentiel requis par l'art. 7.

À mon avis, la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary ne saurait être maintenue aux termes de l'article premier, car elle ne satisfait pas au critère de «proportionnalité». Quoique la protection du public, but qui sous-tendait cette règle, puisse constituer un objectif important, j'estime que ladite règle n'atteint pas cet objectif d'une manière conforme au critère de proportionnalité formulé must be carefully designed to achieve the objective in question." As I have noted, there is no agreement in the case law as to how to distinguish between crimes of "general intent" and crimes of "specific intent". This distinction was plainly not in the minds of the Code drafters, and the mental elements of many crimes are not readily classified into one category or the other. There is no rational reason for protecting the public against some drunken offenders but not against others, particularly where the distinction is not based upon the gravity of the offence or the availability of included offences. If the public protection does require special measures, that should be accomplished through comprehensive legislation rather than ad hoc judicial re-casting of some offences. For a recent review of possible legislative schemes, see Quigley, "Reform of the Intoxication Defence" (1987), 33 McGill L.J. 1.

The Leary rule in effect treats the deliberate act of becoming intoxicated as culpable in itself, but inflicts punishment measured by the unintended consequences of becoming intoxicated. Punishment acts as a deterrent where the conduct is intended or foreseen. There is no evidence to support the assertion that the Leary rule deters the commission of unintended crimes. Hence, there is no warrant for violating fundamental principles and convicting those who would otherwise escape criminal liability.

The Leary rule fails to satisfy the second branch of the proportionality test as well, namely, that the means chosen should impair as little as possible the right or freedom in question. In general intent offences, the jury is to be instructed to excise from their minds any evidence of drunkenness with the result that the Crown, because the accused is intoxicated, is relieved of proving mens rea, thereby placing the intoxicated person in a worse posidans l'arrêt Oakes, précité. Suivant cet arrêt, «les mesures adoptées doivent être soigneusement conçues pour atteindre l'objectif en question». Or, comme je l'ai déjà fait remarquer, on ne peut dégager de la jurisprudence aucun consensus permettant de distinguer les crimes «d'intention générale» des crimes «d'intention spécifique». Il s'agit là, de toute évidence, d'une distinction qui n'a pas été envisagée par les rédacteurs du Code et l'élément moral d'un bon nombre de crimes ne peut pas être facilement rangé dans une catégorie ou dans l'autre. Il n'y a aucune raison logique de protéger le public contre certains délinquants en état d'ébriété mais non contre d'autres, particulièrement lorsque la distinction ne repose ni sur la gravité de l'infraction ni sur l'existence d'infractions comprises. Si des mesures spéciales s'imposent pour la protection du public, elles doivent être prises au moyen d'un texte législatif détaillé plutôt que par une reformulation de certaines infractions par les tribunaux pour faire face à des situations précises. Pour une étude récente des régimes législatifs possibles, voir Quigley, «Reform of the Intoxication Defence» (1987), 33 McGill L.J. 1.

La règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary a en réalité pour effet de traiter comme coupable en soi l'acte qui consiste à s'enivrer délibérément mais, en même temps, elle inflige une peine en fonction des conséquences non intentionnelles de l'ivresse. La peine joue un rôle dissuasif lorsqu'il s'agit d'une conduite intentionnelle ou prévue. Il n'existe aucune preuve toutefois pour appuyer l'assertion que la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary sert à prévenir les crimes commis non intentionnellement. Pourtant rien ne justifie qu'on porte atteinte à des principes fondamentaux et qu'on déclare coupable ceux qui échapperaient normalement à la responsabilité criminelle.

La règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary ne satisfait pas non plus au second volet du critère de proportionnalité, savoir que le moyen choisi doit porter le moins possible atteinte au droit ou à la liberté en question. Dans le cas d'infractions d'intention générale, on doit dire aux jurés de faire abstraction de toute preuve d'ivresse, ce qui a pour conséquence que le ministère public, du fait de l'ivresse de l'accusé, est dispensé d'avoir à prouver la mens tion than a sober person. Alternatively, the jury is required to examine the mental state of the accused, without reference to the alcohol ingested, and consequently find a fictional intent. In my view, imposition of this form of absolute liability goes well beyond what is required to protect the public from drunken offenders. As I have already indicated, striking down the artificial rule which precludes the trier of fact from considering evidence of intoxication in relation to mens rea has not produced an increase in the threat to public safety from drunken offenders in Australia, and there is no evidence to suggest that it would do so in Canada.

Finally, it is my view that there is a disproportionality between the effects of Leary on rights protected by the Charter and the objective of public safety. To paraphrase Lamer J. in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, at p. 521, it has not been demonstrated that risk of imprisonment of a few innocent persons is required to attain the goal of protecting the public from drunken offenders.

As stated in R. v. Holmes, [1988] 1 S.C.R. 914, at p. 940: "This effect, given the range of alternative legislative devices available to Parliament, is too deleterious to be justified as a reasonable limit under s. 1 of the Charter. Simply put, the provision exacts too high a price to be justified in a free and democratic society."

B. Leary Attenuated by Subsequent Cases

Since Leary there have been developments in the jurisprudence of the Court which, in my submission, seriously undermine the view taken by the majority in Leary. The Court has held that where the holding of a case has been "attenuated" by subsequent decisions, it may be appropriate to overrule that earlier decision: Reference re the rea, ce qui désavantage la personne en état d'ébriété par rapport à celle qui ne l'est pas; ou bien encore, on exige du jury qu'il examine l'état mental de l'accusé, sans tenir compte de l'alcool qu'il a pu consommer, ce qui l'oblige à conclure à l'existence d'une intention fictive. À mon avis, en retenant cette forme de responsabilité absolue, on dépasse de loin ce qui est nécessaire pour protéger le public contre les délinquants en état d'ébriété. L'invalidation de la règle artificielle qui vient empêcher le juge des faits de prendre en considération une preuve d'intoxication relativement à la question de la mens rea, je le répète, n'a pas entraîné en Australie une augmentation du danger que présentent les délinquants ivres pour la sécurité du public, et rien ne porte à croire qu'il en serait autrement au Canada.

Finalement, j'estime qu'il y a disproportion entre les effets qu'a l'arrêt Leary sur les droits protégés par la Charte et l'objectif de la sécurité publique. Pour paraphraser ce qu'a dit le juge Lamer dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., précité, à la p. 521, on n'a pas démontré qu'il est nécessaire pour atteindre le but de protéger le public contre les délinquants en état d'ébriété de courir le risque d'emprisonner quelques personnes innocentes.

Comme le dit l'arrêt R. c. Holmes, [1988] 1 R.C.S. 914, à la p. 940: «Compte tenu de la gamme de mécanismes législatifs auxquels le législateur peut recourir, cet effet est trop néfaste pour être justifié comme limite raisonnable aux termes de l'article premier de la Charte. En somme, la disposition exige que l'on paie un prix trop élevé pour qu'elle soit justifiée dans une société libre et démocratique».

B. L'atténuation des effets de l'arrêt Leary par la jurisprudence subséquente

Depuis l'arrêt Leary, la jurisprudence de cette Cour a évolué d'une manière qui, à mon humble avis, ébranle sérieusement le point de vue adopté par la majorité dans cet arrêt-là. En effet, la Cour a jugé que dans un cas où un arrêt a été «atténué» par des décisions ultérieures, il peut convenir de renverser l'arrêt antérieur: Renvoi relativement à

Agricultural Products Marketing Act, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1198.

In my view, Leary has also been undermined quite independently of the Charter. The Court has consistently held that an honest but unreasonable mistaken belief in consent will negate the mens rea required for rape, indecent assault or sexual assault: see Pappajohn v. The Queen, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 120; Sansregret v. The Queen, [1985] 1 S.C.R. 570; R. v. Bulmer, supra, and R. v. Robertson, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 918, at pp. 939-40. While the reasonableness of the accused's belief is a factor for the jury to consider in determining whether or not the belief was honestly held, a mistaken belief in consent need not be reasonable.

The Leary rule fits most awkwardly with that enunciated in Pappajohn. Lower courts have held that in the light of Leary, where intoxication is a factor in inducing a mistaken belief in consent, the jury must be instructed that while an honest but unreasonable belief will negate mens rea (Pappajohn) they are to disregard the affect that intoxication might have had in inducing that mistake (Leary). In R. v. Moreau (1986), 26 C.C.C. (3d) 359 (Ont. C.A.), at pp. 386-87, Martin J.A. described the task of the jury as follows:

> It does not follow that the defence of honest belief in consent is unavailable on a charge of sexual assault to an accused who is voluntarily intoxicated. Where an issue arises on the evidence as to the accused's honest belief in consent, the defence of honest belief in consent must be put to the jury, notwithstanding the accused's self-induced intoxication. There may be a basis in the evidence for the accused's honest belief in consent apart altogether from his intoxication; there may even be reasonable grounds for that belief even though he was intoxicated. The intoxication may not be the cause of the mistaken belief. However, the accused cannot rely on his self-induced intoxication as the basis for his belief that the complainant consented. As Mayrand J.A. said in R. v. Bresse, Vallières and Theberge (1978), 48 C.C.C. (2d) 78 at p. 87, 7 C.R. (3d) 50 (Que. C.A.): la Loi sur l'organisation du marché des produits agricoles, [1978] 2 R.C.S. 1198.

Selon moi, l'autorité de l'arrêt Leary a également été ébranlée tout à fait indépendamment de la Charte. Cette Cour a systématiquement conclu qu'une croyance sincère mais déraisonnable et erronée au consentement réduit à néant la mens rea requise pour le viol, l'attentat à la pudeur ou l'agression sexuelle: voir Pappajohn c. La Reine, [1980] 2 R.C.S. 120, Sansregret c. La Reine, [1985] 1 R.C.S. 570, R. c. Bulmer, précité, et R. c. Robertson, [1987] 1 R.C.S. 918, aux pp. 939 et 940. Quoique le caractère raisonnable de la croyance de l'accusé soit un facteur que le jury doit prendre en considération en déterminant s'il s'agissait d'une croyance sincère, il n'est pas nécessaire qu'une croyance erronée au consentement soit raisonnable.

Or, la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary cadre très mal avec celle énoncée dans l'arrêt Pappajohn. Certains tribunaux d'instance inférieure, se fondant sur l'arrêt Leary, ont conclu que dans un cas où l'ivresse est la cause d'une croyance erronée au consentement, il faut dire au jury qu'une croyance sincère mais déraisonnable réduit à néant la mens rea (l'arrêt Pappajohn), mais qu'on doit faire abstraction du rôle que l'ivresse a pu jouer dans cette erreur (l'arrêt Leary). Dans l'arrêt R. v. Moreau (1986), 26 C.C.C. (3d) 359 (C.A. Ont.), aux pp. 386 et 387, le juge Martin a ainsi décrit la tâche du jury:

> [TRADUCTION] Il ne s'ensuit pas qu'un accusé qui s'est enivré volontairement ne saurait opposer en défense à une accusation d'agression sexuelle la croyance sincère au consentement. Lorsque la preuve soulève une question quant à la croyance sincère de l'accusé au consentement, cette défense doit être présentée au jury, bien que l'accusé soit responsable de son intoxication. Il se peut en fait que, tout à fait indépendamment de l'ivresse, la preuve permette de conclure que l'accusé croyait sincèrement qu'il y avait eu consentement; il se peut même que l'accusé ait eu des motifs raisonnables d'y croire, en dépit de son intoxication. Celle-ci peut ne pas être la cause de la croyance erronée. L'accusé ne saurait toutefois invoquer son intoxication volontaire pour fonder sa croyance au consentement de la plaignante. Comme l'a dit le juge Mayrand dans l'arrêt Pierre Bresse et autres c. R., [1978] C.A. 443, à la p. 452, 48 C.C.C. (2d) 78, 7 C.R. (3d) 50 (C.A. Qué.):

1988 CanLII 22 (SCC)

One must distinguish the case in which, because of one's voluntary inebriation, a man takes no account of the refusal manifested by a woman from the case in which a man, because of the ambiguous conduct of the woman, believes sincerely that she consented to sexual relations. This error of fact committed for reasons other than one's voluntary inebriation is, in my opinion, a valid ground of defence.

(Emphasis added.)

In those circumstances the jury is required to engage in the difficult, and perhaps somewhat artificial task, of putting out of their minds the evidence of intoxication on the issue whether the accused honestly believed that the complainant consented. The test is not whether a reasonable and sober person would have made the same mistake but whether the accused would have made the same mistake if he had been sober; see Glanville Williams, Textbook on Criminal Law, 2nd ed. (1983) at pp. 481-2. However, to hold that evidence of self-induced intoxication is relevant to the honesty of the accused's belief in consent where his belief is founded on his mistaken appreciation, due to intoxication, of the facts relating to the complainant's consent is, in my view, incompatible with the rule laid down in Leary, and would completely negate the policy rule that self-induced intoxication is not a defence in crimes of general intent.

In my view, the Leary qualification on the criminal law principle of general application with respect to mistake of fact unnecessarily and unduly complicates the jury's task. Indeed, I find it difficult to imagine how it is humanly possible to follow the jury instruction apparently mandated by the combination of Leary and Pappajohn. This confusing and anomalous result is entirely the product of the deviation from basic criminal law principles which occurred in Leary and accordingly there is much to support the view that it should be overruled.

The inconsistency between Leary and Pappajohn has not gone unnoticed in the literature. In Canadian Criminal Law, supra, at p. 378, Professor Stuart describes the collision between Leary and Pappajohn as a "glaring inconsistency". In "Regina v. O'Connor: Mens Rea Survives in Aus-

Mais il faut distinguer le cas où, à cause de son ébriété volontaire, un homme ne tient aucun compte du refus manifesté par une femme et le cas où un homme, à cause du comportement équivoque de la femme, croit sincèrement qu'elle consent à des rapports sexuels. Cette erreur de fait commise pour des raisons autres que son ébriété volontaire est à mon avis un moyen de défense valable.

(Les italiques sont à moi.)

Dans ces circonstances, les jurés sont obligés, si difficile et peut-être artificiel que cela puisse être, de chasser de leur esprit la preuve d'intoxication quand ils examinent la question de savoir si l'accusé croyait sincèrement au consentement de la plaignante. Le test consiste non pas à se demander si une personne raisonnable qui n'était pas en état d'ébriété aurait commis la même erreur, mais bien si l'accusé aurait commis la même erreur s'il n'avait pas été ivre; voir Glanville Williams, Textbook on Criminal Law, 2nd ed. (1983), aux pp. 481 et 482. Conclure toutefois que la preuve de l'intoxication volontaire est pertinente relativement à la question de savoir si l'accusé a sincèrement cru au consentement lorsque cette croyance se fonde sur son interprétation erronée, causée par son intoxication, des faits reliés au consentement de la plaignante, va selon moi à l'encontre de la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary et réduirait à néant le principe de politique générale voulant que l'intoxication volontaire ne constitue pas un moyen de défense dans le cas de crimes d'intention générale.

À mon avis, la restriction apportée par l'arrêt Leary au principe de droit criminel généralement applicable en matière d'erreur de fait complique inutilement et indûment la tâche du jury. De fait, je conçois mal comment il soit humainement possible de suivre les directives aux jurys apparemment commandées par la combinaison des arrêts Leary et Pappajohn. Ce résultat à la fois déroutant et anormal est entièrement attribuable au fait que dans l'arrêt Leary on s'est écarté des principes fondamentaux du droit criminel. Il existe donc de sérieuses raisons de conclure que cet arrêt doit être renversé.

L'incompatibilité des arrêts Leary et Pappajohn n'est pas passée inaperçue dans la doctrine. Dans Canadian Criminal Law, précité, à la p. 378, le professeur Stuart la qualifie de «criante». Dans «Regina v. O'Connor: Mens Rea Survives in Australia" (1981), 19 U.W.O. L. Rev. 281, at pp. 300-301, David H. Doherty observes:

The two judgments are clearly inconsistent. Pappajohn confirms the essential requirement of a subjective mental culpability as a prerequisite to criminal liability. Leary creates a fundamental exception to that requirement. The facts of Pappajohn show that the judgments will inevitably come into conflict. The Supreme Court of Canada chose to avoid dealing with the conflict in Pappajohn by ignoring the evidence of drinking by the accused. It is to be hoped that in a later case the Court will seek a more positive resolution to the problem. In seeking that resolution the majority position in O'Connor deserves emulation. After reading the opinions expressed in O'Connor, one concludes, as did the minority in Leary, that the position taken in Majewski and adopted by the majority in Leary constitutes an illogical, unwarranted, and detrimental departure from the contemporary trend in criminal law which recognizes subjective mental blameworthiness at the time of the doing of the prohibited act as the sine qua non of criminal liability. The creation of exceptions to the principle compelled by considerations of public policy must be left to Parliament.

C. Leary Creates Uncertainty

The third general consideration justifying the Court in overruling Leary is the principle established in Ranville, supra, where the Court overruled its previous decision in Commonwealth of Puerto Rico v. Hernandez, [1975] 1 S.C.R. 228, on the ground that continued recognition of the persona designata category could only have the effect of creating doubt as to which procedure a party should follow. The prior decision itself was a cause of uncertainty, and therefore following the prior decision because of stare decisis would be contrary to the underlying value behind that doctrine, namely, clarity and certainty in the law. Similarly, in Vetrovec, supra, the Court overruled previous decisions relating to corroboration and tralia» (1981), 19 U.W.O. L. Rev. 281, aux pp. 300 et 301, David H. Doherty fait observer:

[TRADUCTION] Visiblement, les deux arrêts sont contradictoires. L'arrêt Pappajohn confirme l'exigence essentielle d'une culpabilité mentale subjective comme condition de la responsabilité criminelle. L'arrêt Leary crée une exception fondamentale à cette exigence. Il se dégage des faits de l'affaire Pappajohn que ces deux arrêts entreront inévitablement en conflit. Dans l'affaire Pappajohn, la Cour suprême du Canada a choisi d'éluder le problème du conflit en ne tenant pas compte de la preuve que l'accusé avait bu. Or, il est à espérer que dans un arrêt ultérieur la Cour cherchera plutôt à résoudre ce problème et il serait bon qu'en le résolvant elle s'inspire de la position de la majorité dans l'affaire O'Connor. En effet, lecture faite des opinions exprimées dans l'affaire O'Connor, on est amené à conclure, à l'instar de la minorité dans l'affaire Leary, que la position prise dans l'arrêt Majewski et adoptée par la majorité dans l'affaire Leary constitue une entorse illogique, injustifiée et nuisible à la tendance actuelle en droit criminel qui reconnaît la culpabilité mentale subjective au moment de la perpétration de l'acte prohibé comme condition sine qua non de la responsabilité criminelle. C'est au législateur que doit revenir la tâche de créer des exceptions au principe lorsque cela s'impose pour des raisons de politique générale.

C. L'arrêt Leary: cause d'incertitude

La troisième considération d'ordre général justifiant que cette Cour renverse l'arrêt Leary est le principe établi dans l'arrêt Ranville, précité, où cette Cour a renversé son arrêt antérieur Commonwealth de Puerto Rico c. Hernandez, [1975] 1 R.C.S. 228, pour le motif que si on continuait à reconnaître l'existence de la catégorie de persona designata, cela ne pourrait que faire naître des doutes quant à la procédure à suivre par une partie. L'arrêt antérieur était lui-même une cause d'incertitude, de sorte que, en le suivant simplement par respect pour le principe du stare decisis, on se serait trouvé aller à l'encontre de la valeur fondamentale sous-tendant ce principe, c'est-à-dire celle de la clarté et de la certitude du droit. De stated, "The law of corroboration is unduly and unnecessarily complex and technical".

I have already indicated the confusion created by the combination of Leary and Pappajohn. I suggest that the distinction between "general" and "specific" intent which Leary mandates and the notorious difficulty in articulating a clear and workable definition of specific intent falls squarely within the principle enunciated in Ranville and Vetrovec. Because that category is based on policy rather than principle, classification of offences as falling within or without the specific intent category is necessarily an ad hoc, unpredictable exercise.

The situation with respect to the offence of break and enter, raised by the companion case, R. v. Quin, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 825, provides an example. In R. v. Campbell (1974), 17 C.C.C. (2d) 320 (Ont. C.A.), the accused was charged with breaking and entering with intent pursuant to s. 306(1)(a). The Ontario Court of Appeal held that offence to be a crime of specific intent and hence drunkenness was relevant to the issue of intention. In Quin, the accused was charged with breaking and entering and committing an indictable offence pursuant to s. 306(1)(b). The same court held that under that subsection, the break and enter offence was one requiring only proof of general intent and hence evidence of intoxication could not be considered. A legal category which creates distinctions of this kind, in my view, complicates and confuses the law to an unacceptable degree and, absent some compelling need for its retention, should be abandoned.

Another example of the complexity and uncertainty caused by the specific/general intent dichotomy is provided by Swietlinski, supra. In that case, the accused was charged with murder pursuant to s. 213(d) of the Criminal Code. The même, dans l'arrêt Vetrovec, précité, la Cour a renversé des arrêts antérieurs en matière de corroboration et a affirmé que «le droit relatif à la corroboration est inutilement et indûment complexe et formaliste».

J'ai déjà mentionné la confusion engendrée par la combinaison des arrêts Leary et Pappajohn. Selon moi, la distinction entre une intention «générale» et une intention «spécifique» que l'arrêt Leary impose et la difficulté notoire qu'il y a à formuler une définition claire et pratique de l'intention spécifique relèvent directement du principe énoncé dans les arrêts Ranville et Vetrovec. Parce qu'il s'agit d'une catégorie fondée sur la politique générale plutôt que sur les principes, la classification des infractions selon qu'elles tombent dans la catégorie de l'intention spécifique ou non est nécessairement un exercice ad hoc au résultat imprévisible.

La situation en ce qui concerne l'infraction d'introduction par effraction, dont il est question dans l'arrêt R. c. Quin, [1988] 2 R.C.S. 825, en est un exemple. Dans l'affaire R. v. Campbell (1974), 17 C.C.C. (2d) 320 (C.A. Ont.), l'accusé a été inculpé aux termes de l'al. 306(1)a) de s'être introduit dans un endroit par effraction avec l'intention d'y commettre un acte criminel. La Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a conclu qu'il s'agissait d'un crime d'intention spécifique de sorte que l'ivresse était pertinente relativement à la question de l'intention. Dans l'affaire Quin, l'accusé se trouvait inculpé d'avoir enfreint l'al. 306(1)b) en s'introduisant dans un endroit par effraction et en y commettant un acte criminel. La même cour a jugé qu'en vertu de cet alinéa cette dernière infraction ne nécessitait que la preuve d'une intention générale et qu'on ne pouvait donc pas tenir compte de la preuve d'intoxication. Or, à mon avis, une catégorie juridique qui crée des distinctions de ce genre complique et embrouille le droit d'une manière intolérable et, en l'absence d'une nécessité impérieuse de la conserver, elle doit être abandonnée.

L'arrêt Swietlinski, précité, fournit une autre illustration de la complexité et de l'incertitude résultant de la dichotomie entre l'intention spécifique et l'intention générale. Dans cette affaire-là, l'accusé avait été inculpé de meurtre aux termes de enumerated offence the accused was alleged to have committed was indecent assault. Leary had held that rape was an offence of general intent and in Swietlinski, the Court applied Leary to the offence of indecent assault. However, because of the constructive murder provision, this would have led to a situation where the accused would be convicted of murder without any criminal intent. To avoid that result, the Court held that where indecent assault formed the ingredient of constructive murder pursuant to s. 213, evidence of drunkenness could be taken into account in determining whether in fact the accused had the requisite intent for the offence of indecent assault. In other words, the Court held quite explicitly that intoxication did logically bear upon the issue of intent to commit indecent assault, and that the only issue was whether, as a matter of policy, the jury should be told to put that evidence out of mind. In the light of Vaillancourt, Swietlinski is no longer significant for its result. Indeed, Vaillancourt and Swietlinski have this in common: both cases demonstrate the Court's aversion to the imposition of liability without mens rea. In my view, to hold that evidence of intoxication can be taken into account with reference to an offence for certain purposes but not for other purposes is further reflection of the confusion, uncertainty, and lack of principle which motivates the specific/general intent dichotomy.

D. Leary Unfavourable to Accused

The fourth factor which bears directly upon whether or not the Court should overrule Leary in my view, is that the Leary rule is one which operates against the accused by expanding the scope of criminal liability beyond normal limits. Respect for the principle of certainty and the institutional limits imposed upon the law-making function of the courts should constrain the Court from overruling a prior decision where the effect would be to expand criminal liability. It is not for the courts to create new offences, or to broaden l'al. 213*d*) du Code criminel. Parmi les infractions énumérées, celle qu'on reprochait à l'accusé était l'attentat à la pudeur. On avait décidé dans l'arrêt Leary que le viol était une infraction d'intention générale et, dans l'affaire Swietlinski, la Cour a appliqué l'arrêt Leary à l'infraction d'attentat à la pudeur. Toutefois, la disposition relative au meurtre par imputation aurait fait que l'accusé se serait trouvé déclaré coupable de meurtre sans qu'il ait eu d'intention criminelle. Pour parer à un tel résultat, la Cour a jugé que, dans un cas où l'attentat à la pudeur constituait l'élément permettant de conclure au meurtre par imputation aux fins de l'art. 213, on pouvait prendre en considération la preuve d'ivresse pour déterminer si l'accusé avait réellement l'intention requise pour l'infraction d'attentat à la pudeur. En d'autres termes, la Cour a dit très explicitement que l'ivresse avait bel et bien un rapport logique avec la question de l'intention de commettre un attentat à la pudeur et que l'unique point à décider était de savoir si la politique générale exigeait qu'on dise au jury de ne pas prendre cette preuve en considération. Compte tenu de l'arrêt Vaillancourt, l'arrêt Swietlinski ne tire plus à conséquence. De fait, les arrêts Vaillancourt et Swietlinski ont ceci de commun qu'ils révèlent tous les deux la répugnance qu'a cette Cour à conclure à la responsabilité lorsqu'il n'y a pas de mens rea. À mon avis, la conclusion que la preuve d'intoxication peut être prise en considération relativement à une infraction à certaines fins mais non à d'autres constitue une manifestation de plus de la confusion, de l'incertitude et de l'absence de principes qui est à l'origine de la dichotomie entre l'intention spécifique et l'intention générale.

D. L'arrêt Leary est défavorable à l'accusé

Selon moi, le quatrième facteur qui se rapporte directement à la question de savoir si la Cour doit renverser l'arrêt Leary est que la règle énoncée dans cet arrêt joue contre l'accusé en élargissant la portée de la responsabilité criminelle au-delà des limites normales. Le respect du principe de la certitude et les restrictions institutionnelles imposées aux tribunaux en ce qui concerne l'élaboration du droit prétorien devraient inciter la Cour à refuser de renverser un arrêt antérieur quand cela aurait pour effet d'élargir la responsabilité crimi-

the net of liability, particularly as changes in the law through judicial decision operate retrospectively. The same argument does not apply, however, where the result of overruling a prior decision is to establish a rule favourable to the accused. In my submission, this principle underlies the decision of the Court in Paquette v. The Queen, supra, at p. 197, where the Court overruled its previous decision in Dunbar v. The King, supra, which had held that an accused who was a party to murder, but who had not himself committed the act, could not rely upon the defence of duress. (See also R. v. Santeramo (1976), 32 C.C.C. (2d) 35 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 46, per Brooke J.A.: "I do not feel bound by a judgment of this Court where the liberty of the subject is in issue if I am convinced that that judgment is wrong.")

IV

Disposition

The trial judge made no reference in his charge to the jury to the requirement that the Crown prove that the accused acted with the requisite intent. In my view, this is fatal to the conviction. Although the Crown presented a strong case against the accused at trial, no request was made by the respondent that this Court apply the provision of s. 613(1)(b)(iii) of the Criminal Code, and in any event, it is not for this Court to speculate as to the likely result had the jury been properly instructed.

It follows that the appeal should be allowed, the conviction set aside, and a new trial ordered.

The judgment of Beetz and McIntyre JJ. was delivered by McINTYRE J.—I have had the advantage of reading the reasons for judgment of the Chief Justice. With the greatest deference, I find that I am unable to agree with his reasons and his dispo-nelle. Il n'appartient pas aux tribunaux de créer de nouvelles infractions ni de donner plus d'extension à la responsabilité, d'autant plus que les changements apportés au droit par des décisions judiciaires ont un effet rétroactif. Le même argument ne peut toutefois pas être invoqué lorsque le fait de renverser un arrêt antérieur a pour conséquence la création d'une règle favorable à l'accusé. À mon humble avis, c'est là le principe qui sous-tend l'arrêt Paquette c. La Reine, précité, à la p. 197, où cette Cour a renversé son arrêt antérieur Dunbar v. The King, précité, dans lequel on avait conclu qu'un accusé ayant participé à un meurtre, mais sans l'avoir commis lui-même, ne pouvait se prévaloir du moyen de défense de la contrainte. (Voir en outre l'arrêt R. v. Santeramo (1976), 32 C.C.C. (2d) 35 (C.A. Ont.), à la p. 46, motifs du juge Brooke, qui a dit: [TRADUCTION] «Je ne me sens pas lié par un arrêt de cette Cour dans un cas où la liberté d'un individu est en jeu, si je suis convaincu que l'arrêt en question est erroné.»)

Dispositif

Le juge du procès n'a pas indiqué dans ses instructions au jury que le ministère public devait prouver que l'accusé avait agi avec l'intention requise. À mon avis, cela porte un coup fatal à la déclaration de culpabilité. Bien que le ministère public ait présenté une preuve solide contre l'accusé au procès, l'intimée n'a pas demandé à cette Cour d'appliquer la disposition du sous-al. 613(1)b)(iii) du Code criminel et, de toute façon, il n'appartient pas à cette Cour de faire des conjectures sur le résultat probable si le jury avait reçu des instructions appropriées.

Il s'ensuit que le pourvoi doit être accueilli, la déclaration de culpabilité infirmée et un nouveau procès ordonné.

sition of the appeal. I would dismiss the appeal for the reasons I will endeavour to set out.

The appellant was charged with sexual assault causing bodily harm, contrary to s. 246.2(c) of the Criminal Code. The facts giving rise to the charge have been set out by the Chief Justice and I need not make extensive reference to them. It will suffice to say that the twenty-four-year-old appellant committed the sexual assault upon the eighteen-year-old complainant in his apartment. It was conceded that intercourse had taken place without the consent of the complainant. During the course of the assault, the appellant punched her, caused an injury to her eye, and threatened to kill her. He was convicted at trial before judge and jury. He gave no evidence but his statement to the police, admitting that he had forced the complainant to have intercourse, was put in evidence. The trial judge told the jury that the sole issue before them was that of consent. On the question of drunkenness, he said:

> Only the accused in his statement says, "I was all drunked up too". There was no evidence of drunkenness except that statement and it is open to you to accept it and find that he was drunk but even if he was drunk drunkenness is no defence to the charge alleged against this accused.

The appellant's appeal was dismissed. It is now reported at (1985), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 574. The Court of Appeal held that the offence of causing bodily harm was an offence of general intent to which the defence of drunkenness did not apply. In this, they followed Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, [1977] A.C. 443 (H.L.), and their disposition of the case is consistent with Leary v. The Queen, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 29.

There are two issues which arise in this appeal. The first is whether sexual assault causing bodily harm (Criminal Code, s. 246.2(c)) is an offence requiring proof of specific or of general intent, and the second is whether evidence of self-induced drunkenness is relevant to the issue of guilt or décision en l'espèce. Pour les raisons que je vais exposer ci-après, je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

L'appelant a été accusé d'agression sexuelle causant des lésions corporelles, en infraction à l'al. 246.2*c*) du Code criminel. Les faits qui ont donné lieu à l'accusation sont relatés par le Juge en chef, de sorte que je n'ai pas à en parler très longuement. Il suffit de signaler que l'appelant, âgé de vingt-quatre ans, a commis une agression sexuelle contre la plaignante, âgée de dix-huit ans, dans son appartement à lui. Il est admis qu'il y a eu des rapports sexuels sans le consentement de la plaignante. Au cours de l'agression, l'appelant a donné des coups de poing à la plaignante, la blessant à l'œil, et a menacé de la tuer. Il a été déclaré coupable à l'issue d'un procès devant un juge et un jury. Quoique l'appelant n'ait pas témoigné, la déclaration qu'il avait faite à la police, dans laquelle il avoue avoir forcé la plaignante à avoir des rapports sexuels, a été produite en preuve. Le juge du procès a dit aux jurés que la seule question qu'ils avaient à décider était celle du consentement. Sur la question de l'ivresse, il a dit:

> [TRADUCTION] L'accusé a été le seul à parler d'ivresse dans sa déclaration: «J'étais bien soûl aussi.» Exception faite de cette déclaration, il n'y a aucune preuve qu'il était ivre. Or, vous pouvez l'accepter et conclure qu'il était en état d'ébriété, mais même s'il l'était, l'ivresse ne peut être opposée comme défense à l'accusation portée contre lui.»

L'appel interjeté par l'appelant a été rejeté dans un arrêt qui est maintenant publié à (1985), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 574. La Cour d'appel a conclu que l'infraction qui consiste à infliger des lésions corporelles est une infraction d'intention générale à laquelle le moyen de défense d'ivresse ne s'applique pas. En cela la Cour d'appel a suivi l'arrêt Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, [1977] A.C. 443 (H.L.), et a tranché l'appel d'une manière conforme à l'arrêt Leary c. La Reine, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 29.

Ce pourvoi soulève deux questions. La première est de savoir si l'agression sexuelle entraînant des lésions corporelles (Code criminel, al. 246.2*c*)) est une infraction nécessitant la preuve d'une intention spécifique ou bien d'une intention générale et la seconde est de savoir si la preuve d'ivresse volon-innocence in an offence of general intent. Before dealing in detail with these questions, it will be helpful to make certain observations.

A distinction has long been recognized in the criminal law between offences which require the proof of a specific intent and those which require only the proof of a general intent. This distinction forms the basis of the defence of drunkenness and it must be understood and kept in mind in approaching this case. In R. v. George, [1960] S.C.R. 871, Fauteux J. said, at p. 877:

> In considering the question of mens rea, a distinction is to be made between (i) intention as applied to acts considered in relation to their purposes and (ii) intention as applied to acts considered apart from their purposes. A general intent attending the commission of an act is, in some cases, the only intent required to constitute the crime while, in others, there must be, in addition to that general intent, a specific intent attending the purpose for the commission of the act.

This statement makes the distinction clear. The general intent offence is one in which the only intent involved relates solely to the performance of the act in question with no further ulterior intent or purpose. The minimal intent to apply force in the offence of common assault affords an example. A specific intent offence is one which involves the performance of the actus reus, coupled with an intent or purpose going beyond the mere performance of the questioned act. Striking a blow or administering poison with the intent to kill, or assault with intent to maim or wound, are examples of such offences.

This distinction is not an artificial one nor does it rest upon any legal fiction. There is a world of difference between the man who in frustration or anger strikes out at his neighbour in a public house with no particular purpose or intent in mind, other than to perform the act of striking, and the man who strikes a similar blow with intent to cause death or injury. This difference is best illustrated taire est pertinente relativement à la question de la culpabilité ou de l'innocence dans le cas d'une infraction d'intention générale. Avant d'entreprendre une étude détaillée de ces questions, il est utile de faire quelques observations.

Voilà longtemps que le droit criminel reconnaît l'existence d'une distinction entre les infractions requérant la preuve d'une intention spécifique et celles qui n'exigent que la preuve d'une intention générale. En abordant la présente affaire, il faut comprendre et garder à l'esprit cette distinction, qui constitue le fondement de la défense d'ivresse. Dans l'arrêt R. v. George, [1960] R.C.S. 871, le juge Fauteux dit, à la p. 877:

> [TRADUCTION] En étudiant la question de la mens rea, il y a lieu d'établir une distinction entre (i) l'intention qui s'applique aux actes en fonction des buts visés et (ii) l'intention qui s'applique aux actes indépendamment des buts visés. Dans certains cas, l'intention générale de perpétrer l'acte suffit pour qu'il y ait crime alors que dans d'autres cas il doit y avoir, outre l'intention générale, une intention spécifique de commettre l'acte.

Ce passage rend la distinction claire. L'infraction d'intention générale est celle pour laquelle l'intention se rapporte uniquement à l'accomplissement de l'acte en question, sans qu'il y ait d'autre intention ou dessein. L'intention minimale d'avoir recours à la force qui doit exister dans le cas de l'infraction de voies de fait en est un exemple. Une infraction d'intention spécifique se caractérise par la perpétration de l'actus reus assortie d'une intention ou d'un dessein qui ne se limite pas à l'accomplissement de l'acte en question. Frapper une personne ou lui administrer du poison avec l'intention de la tuer, ou encore commettre des voies de fait avec l'intention de mutiler une personne ou de lui infliger des blessures, voilà des exemples de telles infractions.

Cette distinction n'est ni artificielle ni ne repose sur une fiction juridique. Il y a un monde entre l'homme qui dans un accès de frustration ou de colère porte un coup à quelqu'un dans un débit de boissons sans avoir d'autre dessein ou intention que de frapper et l'homme qui assène le même coup avec l'intention de causer la mort ou des lésions corporelles. Cette différence se dégage le plus net-by a consideration of the relationship between murder and manslaughter. He who kills intending to kill or cause bodily harm is guilty of murder, whereas he who has killed by the same act without such intent is convicted of manslaughter. The proof of the specific intent, that is, to kill or to cause bodily harm, is necessary in murder because the crime of murder is incomplete without it. No such intent is required, however, for the offence of manslaughter because it forms no part of the offence, manslaughter simply being an unlawful killing without the intent required for murder. The relevance of intoxication which could deprive an accused of the capacity to form the necessary specific intent in murder and its irrelevance in the crime of manslaughter can readily be seen.

tement d'un examen du rapport entre le meurtre et l'homicide involontaire coupable. Quiconque tue quelqu'un avec l'intention de le tuer ou de lui infliger des lésions corporelles se rend coupable de meurtre, tandis qu'une personne qui commet l'acte identique sans cette intention se voit déclarer coupable d'homicide involontaire coupable. La preuve de l'intention spécifique, c'est-à-dire celle de tuer ou de causer des lésions corporelles, est nécessaire pour établir le meurtre parce que le crime de meurtre est incomplet sans cet élément. Aucune intention de ce genre n'est toutefois requise pour l'infraction d'homicide involontaire coupable parce qu'elle ne fait pas partie de l'infraction, l'homicide involontaire coupable étant simplement un homicide illégal qui ne comporte pas l'intention nécessaire pour qu'il y ait meurtre. On voit donc facilement que l'intoxication pouvant mettre l'accusé dans l'incapacité de former l'intention spécifique requise est pertinente dans le cas du meurtre, mais qu'elle ne l'est pas relativement au crime d'homicide involontaire coupable.

The present law relating to the drunkenness defence has developed in this Court from the application of principles set out in Director of Public Prosecutions v. Beard, [1920] A.C. 479 (H.L.), discussed and adapted in other United Kingdom cases, including Attorney-General for Northern Ireland v. Gallagher, [1961] 3 All E.R. 299 (H.L.); Bratty v. Attorney-General for Northern Ireland, [1961] 3 All E.R. 523 (H.L.), and Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, supra. In this Court, the matter has been dealt with in R. v. George, supra, and other cases, but particularly in Leary v. The Queen, supra, where Pigeon J., speaking for the majority of the Court, said, at p. 57, that rape is a crime of general intention as distinguished from specific intention, a crime therefore "in which the defence of drunkenness can have no application". This may be said to have confirmed the law as it stands in Canada on this question and the appellant's principal attack in this Court is upon that decision. It is not necessary for the purposes of this judgment to review in detail the authorities in this Court on the question. It will be sufficient to summarize their effect in the following terms. Drunkenness in a general sense is not a true defence to a criminal

La règle de droit actuelle en ce qui concerne la défense d'ivresse a été élaborée par cette Cour en application des principes posés dans l'arrêt Director of Public Prosecutions v. Beard, [1920] A.C. 479 (H.L.), puis analysés et adaptés dans d'autres arrêts britanniques, notamment Attorney-General for Northern Ireland v. Gallagher, [1961] 3 All E.R. 299 (H.L.), Bratty v. Attorney-General for Northern Ireland, [1961] 3 All E.R. 523 (H.L.) et Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, précité. En cette Cour, la question a été abordée dans l'arrêt R. v. George, précité, et dans plusieurs autres, mais surtout dans l'arrêt Leary c. La Reine, précité, où, parlant au nom de la majorité, le juge Pigeon affirme, à la p. 57, que le viol est un crime d'intention générale par opposition à un crime d'intention spécifique, un crime donc «pour lequel la défense d'ivresse n'est pas recevable». On peut dire que cela a confirmé le droit au Canada à cet égard et, en cette Cour, l'appelant a principalement attaqué l'arrêt Leary. Il n'est pas nécessaire aux fins de la présente discussion d'entreprendre un examen minutieux des arrêts de cette Cour à ce sujet. Il suffira de résumer leur effet dans les termes suivants. L'ivresse au sens général ne constitue pas véritablement une défense opposable à act. Where, however, in a case which involves a crime of specific intent, the accused is so affected by intoxication that he lacks the capacity to form the specific intent required to commit the crime charged it may apply. The defence, however, has no application in offences of general intent.

The criticism of the law with respect to the defence of drunkenness is based on two propositions. It is said, firstly, that the distinction between the general intent and specific intent offences is artificial and is little more than a legal fiction. Secondly, it is said that it is illogical, because it envisages a defence of drunkenness in certain situations and not in others; it is merely a policy decision made by judges and not based on principle or logic. It will be evident from what I have said that I reject the first ground of criticism. As to the second criticism that it is based upon grounds of policy, I would say that there can be no doubt that considerations of policy are involved in this distinction. Indeed, in some cases, principally Majewski, supra, the distinction has been defended on the basis that it is sound social policy. The fact, however, that considerations of policy have influenced the development of the law in this field cannot, in my view, be condemned. In the final analysis all law should be based upon and consistent with sound social policy. No good law can be inconsistent with or depart from sound policy.

If the policy behind the present law is that society condemns those who, by the voluntary consumption of alcohol, render themselves incapable of self-control so that they will commit acts of violence causing injury to their neighbours, then in my view no apology for such policy is needed, and the resulting law affords no affront to the well established principles of the law or to the freedom of the individual. Furthermore, the existing law is not divorced from logical underpinnings as suggested in some academic writings. Not all the une accusation d'avoir commis un acte criminel. Toutefois, dans le cas d'un crime d'intention spécifique, lorsque l'intoxication de l'accusé est de nature à le rendre incapable de former l'intention spécifique requise pour commettre le crime qu'on lui impute, il se peut que cette défense puisse s'appliquer. Elle ne s'applique cependant pas aux infractions d'intention générale.

Le droit relatif à la défense d'ivresse est critiqué à deux titres. On prétend d'abord que la distinction entre les infractions d'intention générale et les infractions d'intention spécifique est artificielle et qu'elle n'est rien d'autre qu'une fiction juridique. En deuxième lieu, on dit qu'elle est illogique puisqu'elle envisage une défense d'ivresse dans certaines situations, mais non dans d'autres; il s'agit simplement d'une décision de politique générale prise par des juges, qui ne repose ni sur les principes ni sur la logique. Il sera évident à la lecture de ce qui précède que je rejette la première critique. Quant à la seconde, celle selon laquelle la distinction est fondée sur des motifs de politique générale, je dirais qu'il ne fait aucun doute que des considérations de politique générale jouent dans cette distinction. De fait, dans certaines décisions, principalement dans l'arrêt Majewski, précité, la distinction a été défendue parce qu'elle traduit une saine politique sociale. Toutefois, on ne saurait, selon moi, trouver à redire au fait que des considérations de politique générale ont influencé l'évolution du droit dans ce domaine. En dernière analyse, toutes les règles de droit devraient avoir à leur base une saine politique sociale et être compatibles avec celle-ci. Aucune règle de droit valable ne peut être incompatible avec une telle politique ni s'en écarter.

Si la règle de droit actuelle repose sur une politique suivant laquelle la société condamne ceux qui, par la consommation volontaire d'alcool, se rendent incapables de se maîtriser, de sorte qu'ils commettent des actes violents qui occasionnent des blessures à leurs semblables, alors j'estime qu'une telle politique se passe de justification et la règle de droit qui en résulte ne se heurte d'aucune manière aux principes de droit bien établis ni ne porte atteinte à la liberté de l'individu. De plus, contrairement à ce que prétendent certains auteurs academic literature has been critical. A strong statement in support of the law on utilitarian or policy grounds made shortly after Majewski is by Sir Rupert Cross in "Blackstone v. Bentham" (1976), 92 L.Q.R. 516, where he said, at pp. 525-26:

In reply to Bentham and the academics I would ask why it is "hard and unthinking" to refuse to allow people to exempt themselves from criminal responsibility for harm done by their bodies by incapacitating their minds from controlling them. Why should the requirement that intention or recklessness must be proved in order to establish liability for an assault not be subject to what appears to be the wholly reasonable retributive principle that it is unjust to those who remain sober to allow those who become drunk to allege that they were unaware of consequences of their bodily movements of which all sober people would have been aware? This is what Blackstone meant when he said that the law would not suffer any man "to privilege one crime by another."

Punishment is an evil and the less of it the better. But the evil of inflicting punishment is justified if the harm which is thus avoided is greater than that caused by the punishment. It may be asceticism to blame people for simply getting drunk, but it is sound utilitarianism to seek to prevent people from doing certain kinds of harm while they are drunk. In so far as this object can be achieved by punishment, it is achieved most economically by singling out for punishment those who commit the kind of harm which the law seeks to prevent while they are drunk.

A. J. Ashworth in "Reason, Logic and Criminal Liability" (1975), 91 L.Q.R. 102 says, at p. 130:

Moreover, it is hardly appropriate to regard a defence of acute intoxication as a simple denial of mens rea; it has been suggested that defences should not be classified solely according to the effect of the accused's condition, without reference to their cause. The criminal law permits reason to override the logical application of the traditional doctrines in cases of deliberately self-induced incapacities; to do otherwise would be tantamount to allowing a fraud on the law. It is submitted that, if the law provides no other means of imposing criminal liabili-de doctrine, la règle de droit existante n'est pas dénuée de tout fondement logique. La doctrine d'ailleurs n'a pas été unanime à la critiquer. L'apologie de la règle pour des raisons utilitaires ou de politique générale a été faite peu après l'arrêt Majewski par sir Rupert Cross dans «Blackstone v. Bentham» (1976), 92 L.Q.R. 516, où il dit, aux pp. 525 et 526:

[TRADUCTION] En réponse à Bentham et aux auteurs, je leur demanderais en quoi on se montre «dur et irréfléchi» si l'on refuse de permettre aux gens de se dégager de toute responsabilité criminelle pour le préjudice qu'ils causent du fait d'avoir mis leur esprit dans un état où il ne pouvait dominer leur corps. Pourquoi l'exigence que l'intention ou l'insouciance soient prouvées pour établir la responsabilité d'une voie de fait ne devrait-elle pas être soumise au principe distributif tout à fait raisonnable selon lequel c'est une injustice envers ceux qui ne s'enivrent pas de permettre à ceux qui le font d'alléguer qu'ils étaient inconscients des conséquences de leurs mouvements, alors que toute personne qui n'a pas bu s'en serait rendue compte? C'est ce qu'a entendu Blackstone quand il a dit que le droit ne souffre pas qu'un homme «privilégie un crime par la perpétration d'un autre».

La sanction est un mal qu'on souhaiterait voir le moins répandu possible. Toutefois, ce mal qui consiste à infliger des sanctions se justifie lorsque le préjudice ainsi évité est plus grand que le mal résultant de la sanction. Il se peut qu'on fasse preuve de rigorisme en blâmant les gens du simple fait de s'être enivrés, mais c'est un sain utilitarisme que de chercher à les empêcher de causer certains types de préjudice lorsqu'ils sont en état d'ébriété. Dans la mesure où cet objectif peut être atteint au moyen d'une sanction, la façon la plus rationnelle d'y arriver est de punir ceux qui, lorsqu'ils sont en état d'ébriété, causent le genre de préjudice que le droit vise à prévenir.

A. J. Ashworth, dans «Reason, Logic and Criminal Liability» (1975), 91 L.Q.R. 102, dit, à la p. 130:

[TRADUCTION] D'autre part, il ne convient guère de considérer la défense d'extrême intoxication comme une simple négation de la mens rea. On a dit que les moyens de défense ne devraient pas être classifiés uniquement en fonction des conséquences de l'état de l'accusé, sans tenir compte de leur cause. Le droit criminel permet que la raison prenne le pas sur l'application logique des principes traditionnels dans le cas d'incapacités provoquées délibérément. S'il en était autrement, cela équivaudrait à autoriser de frustrer le droit. On soutient que, ty in the cases of "voluntarily-induced" incapacities discussed in this article, then there are sufficient reasons for restricting the scope of the defences as the English judges have done.

Further, Mark T. Thornton in "Making Sense of Majewski" (1981), 23 Crim. L.Q. 465, justifies the distinction made between specific and general intent offences in this way, at pp. 482-83:

> I believe that the foregoing discussion shows that there are "legally adequate criteria" for distinguishing crimes of specific intent from other crimes. As regards consequences, the agent must actually intend (and not merely be reckless in regard to) some consequences which amounts to an actus reus. As regards circumstances, the agent must intend his action to take place in those circumstances, or he must intend to disregard those circumstances, or he must have some further intention in respect of those circumstances, depending on the nature of the particular offence. Simple recklessness (excluding the possible complexity of "malice aforethought") does not suffice for specific intent. Where such actual intentions as we have mentioned are required for a crime to have been committed, voluntary intoxication is a defence by the Majewski rule.

and, as well, Eric Colvin ("A Theory of the Intoxication Defence" (1981), 59 Can. Bar Rev. 750) argues against the illogicality of the present rules, as follows (at p. 779):

> If the only choice is between liability or immunity where a requisite mental element is absent due to culpable intoxication, there must at least be some sympathy for the approach which the courts have taken. Even the most stringent critics of the intoxication rules have been wary of suggesting that no penal consequences should follow. Their preference has generally been the creation of a special offence of dangerous intoxication which would require legislative initiative. Would it be proper for the courts to encourage the legislatures to action by abandoning the present intoxication rules and insisting upon the contemporaneity of the culpable state of mind and the prohibited conduct? At stake here are theories of the judicial role which lie beyond the scope of this article. It is, however, concluded that one good reason si le droit ne prévoit pas d'autre moyen d'imposer la responsabilité criminelle dans le cas des incapacités «provoquées volontairement» dont traite le présent article, alors il existe des motifs suffisants de limiter la portée des défenses, comme l'ont fait les juges anglais.

De plus, Mark T. Thornton, dans «Making Sense of Majewski» (1981), 23 Crim. L.Q. 465, justifie de la manière suivante la distinction faite entre les infractions d'intention spécifique et les infractions d'intention générale, aux pp. 482 et 483:

> [TRADUCTION] Je crois que l'analyse qui précède démontre l'existence de «critères juridiquement adéquats» pour distinguer les crimes d'intention spécifique des autres crimes. Pour ce qui est des conséquences, l'auteur doit réellement vouloir (et non pas simplement faire preuve d'insouciance concernant) certaines conséquences, ce qui constitue un actus reus. Quant aux circonstances, l'auteur doit, selon la nature de l'infraction dont il s'agit, soit vouloir que son acte ait lieu dans ces circonstances-là, soit avoir l'intention de ne pas tenir compte des circonstances, soit avoir quelque autre intention reliée à celles-ci. La simple insouciance (si l'on fait abstraction des complications que peut apporter la «préméditation») ne suffit pas pour qu'il y ait une intention spécifique. Lorsque des intentions réelles comme celles qui viennent d'être mentionnées sont nécessaires pour qu'un crime ait été perpétré, l'intoxication volontaire constitue un moyen de défense d'après la règle établie dans l'arrêt Majewski.

Eric Colvin («A Theory of the Intoxication Defence» (1981), 59 R. du B. can. 750) élève sa voix contre l'illogisme des règles actuelles. Il dit, à la p. 779:

> [TRADUCTION] S'il n'y a qu'un choix entre la responsabilité et l'immunité lorsque, par suite d'intoxication coupable, il manque un élément moral requis, on doit à tout le moins voir d'un œil plutôt favorable l'approche qu'ont adoptée les tribunaux. Même les critiques les plus sévères des règles en matière d'intoxication se sont montrés réticents à affirmer qu'il ne devrait pas y avoir de conséquences pénales. D'une manière générale, ils ont préféré la création d'une infraction spéciale d'intoxication dangereuse, ce qui nécessiterait une initiative du législateur. Dans cette optique, siérait-il que les tribunaux encouragent les législateurs à passer à l'action en abandonnant les règles actuelles relatives à l'intoxication et en exigeant la concomitance de l'état d'esprit coupable et de la conduite prohibée? Ceci met en cause des théories du rôle des tribunaux qui dépassent le cadre du présent article. On peut cependant conclure qu'une for judicial activism—the irrationality of present law—does not apply to the intoxication defence.

In my view, the common law rules on the defence of drunkenness, though frequently the subject of criticism, have a rationality which not only accords with criminal law theory, but has also served society well. It is not questioned in this case that the defence of drunkenness, as it applies to specific intent offences, is supportable. It is submitted, however, that it should be extended to include all criminal charges. It is my view that this proposition is not sustainable.

Turning now to the issues raised, the first one is to consider whether the offence of sexual assault causing bodily harm is an offence requiring a general or specific intent. In Swietlinski v. The Queen, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 956, this Court held that indecent assault, then an offence under the Criminal Code, was an offence of general intent. The indecent character of the assault was to be judged upon an objective view of the facts and not upon the mental state of the accused. It was said, at p. 968:

> What acts are indecent and what circumstances will have that character are questions of fact that will have to be decided in each case, but the determination of those questions will depend upon an objective view of the facts and circumstances in relation to the actual assault, and not upon the mental state of the accused.

and later at pp. 970-71:

> Because indecent assault is an offence of general or basic intent, the defence of drunkenness cannot apply where a person is charged with that offence.

This Court dealt with the question of sexual assault simpliciter under s. 246.1(1)(a) in R. v. Chase, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 293, where the offence was defined in these terms, at p. 302:

> Applying these principles and the authorities cited, I would make the following observations. Sexual assault is an assault within any one of the definitions of that concept in s. 244(1) of the Criminal Code which is bonne raison militant en faveur de l'activisme judiciaire, savoir l'irrationalité de la règle de droit actuelle, ne s'applique pas au moyen de défense d'intoxication.

À mon avis, les règles de common law concernant la défense d'ivresse, quoique souvent critiquées, possèdent une rationalité qui non seulement concorde avec la théorie du droit criminel, mais qui s'est révélée fort utile pour la société. Qu'il soit permis de se prévaloir de la défense d'ivresse dans le cas d'infractions d'intention spécifique n'est pas contesté en l'espèce. On prétend cependant qu'elle devrait s'appliquer à toutes les infractions criminelles. À mon avis, cette proposition est injustifiable.

Passons maintenant aux questions soulevées en l'espèce. Il s'agit d'abord d'examiner si l'agression sexuelle entraînant des lésions corporelles est une infraction qui nécessite une intention générale ou bien une intention spécifique. Dans l'arrêt Swietlinski c. La Reine, [1980] 2 R.C.S. 956, cette Cour a statué que l'attentat à la pudeur, alors une infraction prévue au Code criminel, était une infraction d'intention générale. Le caractère indécent de l'attentat devait être apprécié selon une interprétation objective des faits et non pas en fonction de l'état mental de l'accusé. À la page 968, on dit:

> Quels actes sont indécents et quelles circonstances présentent cette caractéristique sont des questions de fait qu'il faut décider dans chaque cas, mais leur détermination repose sur une appréciation objective des faits et des circonstances par rapport à l'attentat lui-même et non sur l'état mental du prévenu.

Aux pages 970 et 971, on ajoute:

> Parce que l'attentat à la pudeur est une infraction d'intention générale ou fondamentale, la défense d'ivresse n'est pas recevable lorsqu'un prévenu en est accusé.

Cette Cour a traité de la question de l'infraction d'agression sexuelle simple prévue à l'al. 246.1(1)a) dans l'arrêt R. c. Chase, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 293, où l'infraction est ainsi définie à la p. 302:

> Appliquant ces principes et la jurisprudence citée, je fais les observations suivantes. L'agression sexuelle est une agression, au sens de l'une ou l'autre des définitions de ce concept au par. 244(1) du Code criminel, qui est committed in circumstances of a sexual nature, such that the sexual integrity of the victim is violated. The test to be applied in determining whether the impugned conduct has the requisite sexual nature is an objective one: "Viewed in the light of all the circumstances, is the sexual or carnal context of the assault visible to a reasonable observer". . . .

commise dans des circonstances de nature sexuelle, de manière à porter atteinte à l'intégrité sexuelle de la victime. Le critère qui doit être appliqué pour déterminer si la conduite reprochée comporte la nature sexuelle requise est objectif: «Compte tenu de toutes les circonstances, une personne raisonnable peut-elle percevoir le contexte sexuel ou charnel de l'agression?» . . .

and later, on the issue of intent, the following was said:

Plus loin, on dit concernant l'intention:

The intent or purpose of the person committing the act, to the extent that this may appear from the evidence, may also be a factor in considering whether the conduct is sexual. If the motive of the accused is sexual gratification, to the extent that this may appear from the evidence, it may be a factor in determining whether the conduct is sexual. It must be emphasized, however, that the existence of such a motive is simply one of many factors to be considered, the importance of which will vary depending on the circumstances.

L'intention ou le dessein de la personne qui commet l'acte, dans la mesure où cela peut ressortir des éléments de preuve, peut également être un facteur à considérer pour déterminer si la conduite est sexuelle. Si le mobile de l'accusé était de tirer un plaisir sexuel, dans la mesure où cela peut ressortir de la preuve, il peut s'agir d'un facteur à considérer pour déterminer si la conduite est sexuelle. Toutefois, il faut souligner que l'existence d'un tel mobile constitue simplement un des nombreux facteurs dont on doit tenir compte et dont l'importance variera selon les circonstances.

It was further said, at pp. 302-3:

On affirme en outre, aux pp. 302 et 303:

Implicit in this view of sexual assault is the notion that the offence is one requiring a general intent only. This is consistent with the approach adopted by this Court in cases such as Leary v. The Queen, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 29, and Swietlinski v. The Queen, [1980] 2 S.C.R. 956, where it was held that rape and indecent assault were offences of general intent. I am unable to see any reason why the same approach should not be taken with respect to sexual assault. The factors which could motivate sexual assault are said to be many and varied (see C. Boyle, Sexual Assault (1984), at p. 74). To put upon the Crown the burden of proving a specific intent would go a long way toward defeating the obvious purpose of the enactment. Moreover, there are strong reasons in social policy which would support this view. To import an added element of specific intent in such offences, would be to hamper unreasonably the enforcement process. It would open the question of the defence of drunkenness, one which has always been related to the capacity to form a specific intent and which has generally been excluded by law and policy from offences requiring only the minimal intent to apply force (see R. v. Bernard (1985), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 574 (Ont. C.A., per Dubin J.A.)) For these reasons, I would say that the offence will be one of general rather than specific intent.

La notion que l'infraction n'exige qu'une intention générale se dégage implicitement de cette conception de l'agression sexuelle. Cela est conforme au point de vue que cette Cour a adopté dans les arrêts Leary c. La Reine, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 29, et Swietlinski c. La Reine, [1980] 2 R.C.S. 956, où on a jugé que le viol et l'attentat à la pudeur étaient des infractions exigeant une intention générale. Il m'est impossible de voir pourquoi on ne pourrait adopter le même point de vue en matière d'agression sexuelle. On dit que les facteurs qui pourraient motiver l'agression sexuelle sont nombreux et variés (voir C. Boyle, Sexual Assault (1984), à la p. 74). Imposer au ministère public le fardeau de démontrer une intention spécifique contribuerait largement à faire échouer l'objet évident de la disposition. En outre, il y a de solides motifs en matière de politique sociale qui appuieraient ce point de vue. Le processus d'application serait entravé de manière déraisonnable par l'ajout d'un élément d'intention spécifique dans ces infractions. Cela contribuerait à soulever la question de la défense d'ivresse qui a toujours été reliée à la capacité de former une intention spécifique et qui a généralement été exclue par le droit et les principes des infractions n'exigeant qu'une intention minimale de faire usage de la force (voir R. v. Bernard (1985), 18 C.C.C. (3d) 574 (C.A. Ont., le juge Dubin)). Pour ces motifs, je suis d'avis de dire que l'infraction exige une intention générale plutôt que spécifique.

1988 CanLII 22 (SCC)

The elements of the new offence under s. 246.2(c) with which the accused was charged are assault, as defined in s. 244 of the Criminal Code, which objectively viewed must be of a sexual nature, as a consequence of which the complainant has suffered bodily injury as defined in s. 245.1(2) of the Code, which provides:

245.1 ...

(2) For the purposes of this section and sections 245.3 and 246.2, "bodily harm" means any hurt or injury to the complainant that interferes with his or her health or comfort and that is more than merely transient or trifling in nature.

It would therefore be my view that the mental element of the offence in s. 246.2(c) is only the intention to commit the assault. The surrounding circumstances must be considered for evidence of its sexual nature and of the resulting bodily harm. The Crown need not show any further mental element (see J. D. Watt, The New Offences Against the Person (1984), at p. 113).

In my view, the comments in Chase, supra, are equally applicable to an offence under s. 246.2(c) which merely adds to the sexual assault simpliciter the requirement of bodily harm to the complainant. The resulting interference with the physical integrity of the complainant aggravates the seriousness of a sexual assault but the mental element remains the same. I would conclude that s. 246.2(c) creates an offence of general rather than specific intent.

The second issue, whether the defence of drunkenness applies to an offence of general intent includes the question of whether the Court should overrule its earlier decision in Leary. The attack on Leary was based on its rejection of the defence for crimes of general intent. As already mentioned, nobody has suggested that it should not apply in cases of specific intent. The Chief Justice has expressed the view that evidence of self-induced intoxication should be a relevant consideration in determining whether the mens rea of any particular offence has been proved by the Crown. As I

Les éléments de la nouvelle infraction prévue à l'al. 246.2*c*), dont l'accusé a été inculpé en l'espèce, sont les suivants: il doit y avoir des voies de fait au sens de l'art. 244 du Code criminel, lesquelles, considérées objectivement, doivent revêtir un caractère sexuel et, par suite de ces voies de fait, le plaignant doit avoir subi des lésions corporelles selon la définition que donne à cette expression le par. 245.1(2) du Code, qui dispose:

245.1 ...

(2) Pour l'application du présent article et des articles 245.3 et 246.2, «lésions corporelles» désigne une blessure qui nuit à la santé ou au bien-être du plaignant et qui n'est pas de nature passagère ou sans importance.

J'estime en conséquence que le seul élément moral requis pour l'infraction prévue à l'al. 246.2*c*) est l'intention de commettre l'agression. Les circonstances dans lesquelles elle a eu lieu doivent être examinées pour dégager la preuve du caractère sexuel de l'agression et des lésions corporelles qu'elle a causées. Le ministère public n'a à prouver l'existence d'aucun autre élément moral (voir J. D. Watt, The New Offences Against the Person (1984), à la p. 113).

À mon avis, les observations faites dans l'arrêt Chase, précité, s'appliquent tout autant à une infraction à l'al. 246.2*c*), car celui-ci ne fait qu'ajouter à l'agression sexuelle simple l'exigence que le plaignant ait subi des lésions corporelles. L'atteinte à l'intégrité physique du plaignant qui en est la conséquence aggrave l'agression sexuelle, mais l'élément moral demeure le même. Je conclus donc que l'al. 246.2*c*) crée une infraction d'intention générale plutôt que spécifique.

La seconde question, celle de savoir si la défense d'ivresse s'applique à une infraction d'intention générale, englobe la question de savoir si la Cour devrait renverser son propre arrêt rendu dans l'affaire Leary. Ce qu'on reproche à l'arrêt Leary est son rejet de ce moyen de défense pour les crimes d'intention générale. Comme je l'ai déjà dit, personne ne prétend qu'il ne devrait pas s'appliquer lorsqu'il y a une intention spécifique. Le Juge en chef s'est dit d'avis que la preuve d'intoxication volontaire doit être un élément pertinent à retenir pour déterminer si le ministère public a établi la have indicated, I am unable to agree with this conclusion. The effect of such a conclusion would be that the more drunk a person becomes by his own voluntary consumption of alcohol or drugs, the more extended will be his opportunity for a successful defence against conviction for the offences caused by such drinking, regardless of the nature of the intent required for those offences.

mens rea d'une infraction donnée. Je le répète, je ne puis souscrire à cette conclusion, car il en découlerait que plus une personne s'enivre par la consommation volontaire d'alcool ou de stupéfiants, plus elle sera en mesure d'invoquer avec succès un moyen de défense qui lui permettra d'échapper à une déclaration de culpabilité pour les infractions résultant de cette consommation, indépendamment de la nature de l'intention requise pour ces infractions.

The appellant made two principal arguments in seeking the reversal of the Leary rule. He contended that it relieves the Crown from the burden of proving mens rea in cases of general intent and, in effect, imposes strict liability upon proof of the actus reus. He also contended that the Leary rule violates ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

L'appelant a avancé deux arguments principaux en demandant que la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary soit écartée. Cette règle, a-t-il soutenu, dégage le ministère public de l'obligation de prouver la mens rea dans le cas des infractions d'intention générale et elle a pour effet d'imposer une responsabilité stricte du moment que l'actus reus est prouvé. Il a fait valoir en outre que la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary enfreint l'art. 7 et l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés.

In my opinion, both of these submissions must be rejected. I would say at the outset that in crimes of general intent the Crown is not relieved from proving any element of the offence. The effect of excluding the drunkenness defence from such offences is merely to prevent the accused from relying on his self-imposed drunkenness as a factor showing an absence of any necessary intent. While this Court has consistently recognized the basic proposition that an accused person should not be subject to criminal sanction unless the Crown shows the existence of a blameworthy or criminal mental state associated with the actus reus of the crime, it does not follow that a person who so deprives himself by the voluntary consumption of alcohol or a drug of the normal power of self-restraint that a crime results, should be entitled to an acquittal. Compelling reasons grounded in logic, common sense, and sound social policy dictate otherwise.

Selon moi, ces arguments doivent tous les deux être rejetés. Je précise dès le départ que, dans le cas de crimes d'intention générale, le ministère public n'est dispensé de faire la preuve d'aucun élément de l'infraction. L'exclusion de la défense d'ivresse pour ces infractions n'a pas d'autre effet que d'empêcher l'accusé d'invoquer l'ivresse qu'il s'est infligée à lui-même comme facteur démontrant l'absence de l'intention requise. Bien que cette Cour ait toujours admis le principe fondamental selon lequel un accusé ne devrait être exposé à une sanction pénale que si le ministère public établit l'existence d'un état mental coupable ou criminel qui accompagne l'actus reus du crime, il ne s'ensuit pas qu'une personne qui, par la consommation volontaire d'alcool ou d'un stupéfiant, se prive à ce point du pouvoir normal de se dominer qu'un crime en résulte, devrait avoir droit à l'acquittement. Des raisons impérieuses fondées sur la logique, le bon sens et une saine politique sociale commandent qu'il en soit autrement.

As I indicated earlier, it is not necessary to review all of the authorities which have dealt with this issue. It is clear from a review of the cases, however, that until the early years of the nineteenth century drunkenness was considered "rath-

Ainsi que je l'ai déjà signalé, point n'est besoin de passer en revue toutes les décisions traitant de cette question. Il est toutefois évident à l'examen de la jurisprudence que, jusqu'au début du dix-neuvième siècle, l'ivresse était considérée er an aggravation than a defence": see Lord Birkenhead in Director of Public Prosecutions v. Beard, supra, at p. 494. The early principle of the common law was that a voluntary destruction of will power would entitle a person to no more favourable treatment with regard to criminal conduct than a sober person. By the latter part of the nineteenth century this earlier rule was "mercifully relaxed" (see Lawton L.J. in Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, [1975] 3 All E.R. 296 (C.A.), at p. 305) in respect of crimes of specific intent where the capacity to form the required specific intent was not present because of intoxication: see the early cases such as R. v. Doherty (1887), 16 Cox. C.C. 306, per Stephen J., at p. 308. This new approach was given approval in Beard's case and the more modern authorities have been based upon it. This relaxation stems no doubt from a recognition of the severity of the penal consequence of most of the specific intent offences, as compared with the generally lesser penalties associated with the general intent offences. Therefore, the exclusion of the defence from general intent offences was not an exception to the general rule. The exception was the allowance of the defence in specific intent cases adopted to recognize the more complicated mental processes required for the crimes of special intent and the greater penalties involved. Some measure of relief for such cases was therefore provided. Otherwise, the common law preserved the general rule that a person may not by voluntary intoxication render himself immune from the consequences of his conduct.

In R. v. George, this Court considered the question of the relevance of drunkenness in a case of common assault. The accused had been acquitted of a charge of robbery with violence on the ground that, because of drunkenness, he was incapable of forming the specific intent to commit robbery. The trial judge did not consider the question of common assault. After stating that no specific [TRADUCTION] «plutôt comme une circonstance aggravante que comme un moyen de défense»: voir lord Birkenhead dans l'arrêt Director of Public Prosecutions v. Beard, précité, à la p. 494. Suivant le principe initialement appliqué en common law, une personne qui de son propre gré se privait de toute volonté n'avait pas droit, dans le cas d'une conduite criminelle, à un traitement plus favorable que celui réservé à une personne qui n'avait pas bu. Dès la fin du dix-neuvième siècle, cette règle avait été, [TRADUCTION] «fort heureusement, assouplie» (voir le lord juge Lawton dans l'arrêt Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, [1975] 3 All E.R. 296 (C.A.), à la p. 305) à l'égard des crimes d'intention spécifique lorsque la capacité de former l'intention spécifique requise était absente pour cause d'intoxication: voir les décisions anciennes telles R. v. Doherty (1887), 16 Cox C.C. 306, le juge Stephen, à la p. 308. Cette nouvelle approche a été approuvée dans l'arrêt Beard et les décisions plus modernes sont fondées sur elle. L'assouplissement procède sans doute d'une reconnaissance de la sévérité des conséquences pénales de la plupart des infractions d'intention spécifique par opposition aux peines généralement moins sévères qu'entraînent les infractions d'intention générale. Il s'ensuit donc que l'exclusion de la défense d'ivresse dans le cas des infractions d'intention générale ne constituait pas une exception à la règle générale. L'exception consistait en réalité à admettre ce moyen de défense pour les infractions d'intention spécifique, ce qui a été fait pour tenir compte de la plus grande complexité de la démarche mentale nécessaire pour les crimes d'intention spécifique et des peines plus sévères qu'ils entraînent. C'est pourquoi une certaine atténuation a été prévue pour ces cas. Du reste, la common law a conservé la règle générale suivant laquelle on ne saurait, en s'enivrant volontairement, échapper aux conséquences de sa conduite.

Dans l'arrêt R. v. George, cette Cour s'est penchée sur la question de la pertinence de l'ivresse dans un cas de voies de fait simples. L'accusé avait été acquitté relativement à une inculpation de vol qualifié avec violence, parce que l'ivresse l'avait rendu incapable de former l'intention spécifique de commettre le vol qualifié. Le juge du procès n'a pas examiné la question des voies de fait simples.

intent is necessary to constitute the offence of common assault, Fauteux J. (with whom Taschereau J. concurred) said, at p. 878:

> There can be no pretence, in this case, that the manner in which force was applied by respondent to his victim was accidental—excluding at the moment, from the consideration, the defence of drunkenness—unintentional.
>
> On this finding of fact, the accused was guilty of common assault unless there was evidence indicating a degree of drunkenness affording, under the law, a valid defence.

He went on to say at p. 879:

> Hence, the question is whether, owing to drunkenness, respondent's condition was such that he was incapable of applying force intentionally. I do not know that, short of a degree of drunkenness creating a condition tantamount to insanity, such a situation could be metaphysically conceived in an assault of the kind here involved. It is certain that, on the facts found by the trial Judge, this situation did not exist in this case.

Ritchie J., with Martland J. concurring, saw the issue as the degree of drunkenness "necessary to negative" such intent, as is an ingredient of common assault, and he said, at p. 890:

> In considering the question of mens rea, a distinction is to be drawn between "intention" as applied to acts done to achieve an immediate end on the one hand and acts done with the specific and ulterior motive and intention of furthering or achieving an illegal object on the other hand. Illegal acts of the former kind are done "intentionally" in the sense that they are not done by accident or through honest mistake, but acts of the latter kind are the product of preconception and are deliberate steps taken towards an illegal goal. The former acts may be the purely physical products of momentary passion, whereas the latter involve the mental process of formulating a specific intent. A man, far advanced in drink, may intentionally strike his fellow in the former sense at a time when his mind is so befogged with liquor as to be unable to formulate a specific intent in the latter sense. The offence of robbery, as defined by the Criminal Code, requires the presence of the kind of intent and purpose specified in ss. 269 and 288, but the use of the word "intentionally"

Ayant affirmé qu'aucune intention spécifique n'est nécessaire pour l'infraction de voies de fait simples, le juge Fauteux (à l'avis duquel le juge Taschereau s'est rangé) dit, à la p. 878:

> [TRADUCTION] Il est impossible de soutenir en l'espèce que c'est accidentellement ou, abstraction faite pour l'instant de la défense d'ivresse, involontairement que l'intimé a eu recours à la force contre sa victime.
>
> D'après cette conclusion de fait, l'accusé est coupable de voies de fait simples, à moins que la preuve n'indique un degré d'ivresse suffisant pour constituer en droit un moyen de défense valable.

Le juge Fauteux poursuit, à la p. 879:

> [TRADUCTION] La question est donc de savoir si, pour cause d'ivresse, l'état de l'intimé a été tel qu'il était incapable d'avoir intentionnellement recours à la force. Or, je ne crois pas qu'en l'absence d'un degré d'ivresse créant un état équivalant à l'aliénation, il soit métaphysiquement possible de concevoir une telle situation dans le cas de voies de fait comme celles présentement en cause. Il est certain que, compte tenu des conclusions de fait du juge du procès, cette situation ne s'est pas présentée en l'espèce.

Le juge Ritchie, à l'avis duquel le juge Martland a souscrit, a estimé que la question qui se posait était celle du degré d'ivresse [TRADUCTION] «nécessaire pour établir l'absence» de l'intention qui forme un élément de l'infraction de voies de fait simples. Il dit, à la p. 890:

> [TRADUCTION] En étudiant la question de la mens rea, on doit faire une distinction entre «l'intention» dans le cas d'actes accomplis pour atteindre un but immédiat d'une part et dans le cas d'actes accomplis dans le dessein et avec l'intention spécifique d'atteindre ou de contribuer à atteindre un but illégal d'autre part. Les actes illégaux du premier type sont «intentionnels» en ce sens qu'on ne les fait pas par accident ou par simple erreur. Les actes qui relèvent de la seconde catégorie, toutefois, résultent de la préméditation et représentent des mesures prises délibérément en vue d'atteindre un but illégal. Ceux-là peuvent être les conséquences purement physiques d'une passion momentanée, tandis que ceux-ci comportent la démarche mentale qui consiste à former une intention spécifique. Un homme en état d'ivresse très avancé peut frapper un autre intentionnellement au premier sens à un moment où son esprit est à ce point obscurci par la boisson qu'il est incapable de former une intention spécifique au deuxième sens. L'infraction de vol qualifié, telle qu'elle est définie au Code in defining "common assault" in s. 230(a) of the Criminal Code is exclusively referable to the physical act of applying force to the person of another.

and at p. 891:

The decision of the learned trial judge, in my opinion, constitutes a finding that the respondent violently manhandled a man and knew that he was hitting him. Under these circumstances, evidence that the accused was in a state of voluntary drunkenness cannot be treated as a defence to a charge of common assault because there is no suggestion that the drink which had been consumed had produced permanent or temporary insanity and the respondent's own statement indicates that he knew that he was applying force to the person of another.

It is evident that the majority in R. v. George considered that the mental element required for a conviction of common assault involved no more than the intentional—as opposed to the accidental—performance of the actus reus and that they concluded that self-induced intoxication, "falling short of a degree of drunkenness creating a condition tantamount to insanity," would afford no defence to a charge of common assault, an offence of general intention.

In Leary, this Court followed the approach taken in the House of Lords in Majewski, where the House of Lords unanimously approved the distinction between general and specific intent on the basis that the rule had evolved to protect the community and that voluntary intoxication was a sufficient substitute for the fault element in crimes of general intent. Lord Elwyn Jones L.C. (Diplock, Simon, Kilbrandon LI.J. concurring) cited a speech by Lord Simon in R. v. Morgan, [1976] A.C. 182, at pp. 216-17, where he defined assault as a crime of basic intent and concluded, at pp. 474-75, with the following comment:

If a man of his own volition takes a substance which causes him to cast off the restraints of reason and conscience, no wrong is done to him by holding him criminel, nécessite le genre d'intention et de dessein spécifiés aux art. 269 et 288, mais l'emploi du mot «intentionnelle» dans la définition des «voies de fait simples» à l'al. 230*a*) du Code criminel se rapporte uniquement à l'acte physique d'avoir recours à la force contre une autre personne.

À la page 891, il fait les observations suivantes:

[TRADUCTION] La décision du savant juge du procès constitue, selon moi, une conclusion que l'intimé a violemment agressé un homme et savait qu'il le frappait. Dans ces circonstances, une preuve établissant que l'accusé se trouvait en état d'ivresse volontaire ne saurait être considérée comme une défense opposable à une accusation de voies de fait simples parce que rien n'indique que l'alcool qu'il avait consommé avait provoqué une aliénation permanente ou temporaire et qu'il ressort de la déclaration faite par l'intimé lui-même qu'il savait qu'il employait la force contre une autre personne.

Il est évident que les juges formant la majorité dans l'affaire R. v. George ont estimé que l'élément moral requis pour qu'il y ait une déclaration de culpabilité de voies de fait simples n'était rien d'autre que l'accomplissement intentionnel, par opposition à accidentel, de l'actus reus et qu'ils ont conclu que l'intoxication volontaire, [TRADUCTION] «lorsqu'il ne s'agit pas d'un degré d'ivresse créant un état équivalant à l'aliénation», ne pourrait pas être invoquée comme défense dans le cas d'une accusation de voies de fait simples, une infraction d'intention générale.

Dans l'arrêt Leary, cette Cour a suivi l'analyse adoptée dans l'arrêt Majewski, où la Chambre des lords a approuvé à l'unanimité la distinction faite entre l'intention générale et l'intention spécifique, étant donné que la règle avait évolué de manière à protéger la société et que l'intoxication volontaire suffisait à titre de substitut pour l'élément de faute dans les crimes d'intention générale. Le lord chancelier Elwyn Jones (les lords juges Diplock, Simon et Kilbrandon souscrivant à son avis) a cité l'opinion exprimée par lord Simon dans l'affaire R. v. Morgan, [1976] A.C. 182, aux pp. 216 et 217, où il définit les voies de fait comme un crime d'intention fondamentale. Lord Elwyn Jones conclut en disant, aux pp. 474 et 475:

[TRADUCTION] Si un homme prend de son gré une substance qui lui fait rejeter les contraintes de la raison et de la conscience, on ne lui fait aucun tort en lui answerable criminally for any injury he may do while in that condition. His course of conduct in reducing himself by drugs and drink to that condition in my view supplies the evidence of mens rea, of guilty mind certainly sufficient for crimes of basic intent. It is a reckless course of conduct and recklessness is enough to constitute the necessary mens rea in assault cases: see Reg. v. Venna, [1976] Q.B. 421, per James L.J. at p. 429. The drunkenness is itself an intrinsic, an integral part of the crime, the other part being the evidence of the unlawful use of force against the victim. Together they add up to criminal recklessness. On this I adopt the conclusion of Stroud in 1920, 36 L.Q.R. 273 that:

> "... it would be contrary to all principle and authority to suppose that drunkenness" (and what is true of drunkenness is equally true of intoxication by drugs) "can be a defence for crime in general on the ground that 'a person cannot be convicted of a crime unless the mens was rea.' By allowing himself to get drunk, and thereby putting himself in such a condition as to be no longer amenable to the law's commands, a man shows such regardlessness as amounts to mens rea for the purpose of all ordinary crimes."

He continued in reference to the American view, at p. 475:

This approach is in line with the American Model Penal Code (S. 2.08 (2)):

> "When recklessness establishes an element of the offence, if the actor, due to self-induced intoxication, is unaware of a risk of which he would have been aware had he been sober, such unawareness is immaterial."

and then added:

Acceptance generally of intoxication as a defence (as distinct from the exceptional cases where some additional mental element above that of ordinary mens rea has to be proved) would in my view undermine the criminal law and I do not think that it is enough to say, as did Mr. Tucker, that we can rely on the good sense of the jury or of magistrates to ensure that the guilty are convicted. It may well be that Parliament will at some future time consider, as I think it should, the recommendation in the Butler Committee Report on Mentally Abnormal Offenders (Cmnd. 6244, 1975) that a new offence of "dangerous intoxication" should be created. But in the meantime it would be irresponsible to abanimposant la responsabilité criminelle pour tout préjudice qu'il peut occasionner lorsqu'il est dans cet état. Le fait qu'il s'est mis dans cet état par la consommation de stupéfiants et de la boisson constitue, à mon avis, la preuve d'une mens rea, de l'intention coupable qui est certainement suffisante pour les crimes d'intention fondamentale. Il s'agit d'une conduite qui témoigne d'insouciance et l'insouciance suffit pour constituer la mens rea requise pour des voies de fait: voir Reg. v. Venna [1976] Q.B. 421, le lord juge James, à la p. 429. L'ivresse représente en soi un élément intrinsèque du crime et en fait partie intégrante; l'autre élément est la preuve du recours illégal à la force contre la victime. Pris ensemble, ces éléments constituent de l'insouciance criminelle. Sur ce point j'adopte la conclusion qu'a tirée Stroud à 1920, 36 L.Q.R. 273:

> «... il serait contraire aux principes et à la jurisprudence de supposer que l'ivresse» (et ce qui s'applique à l'ivresse provoquée par l'alcool vaut également pour l'intoxication causée par des stupéfiants) «peut servir de défense pour les crimes en général parce que «nul ne peut être reconnu coupable d'un crime s'il n'y a pas eu de mens rea». En se permettant de s'enivrer et en se mettant ainsi dans un état où on ne tient plus compte des prescriptions de la loi, on fait preuve d'une insouciance qui équivaut à la mens rea requise pour tous les crimes ordinaires.»

À la page 475, il poursuit en parlant du point de vue retenu aux États-Unis:

[TRADUCTION] Cette position concorde avec le Model Penal Code des États-Unis (par. 2.08(2)):

> «Lorsque l'insouciance établit un élément de l'infraction, si l'auteur de l'acte, en raison de son intoxication volontaire, est inconscient d'un risque dont il aurait été conscient n'eût été son intoxication, cette inconscience ne doit pas être prise en considération.»

Lord Elwyn Jones ajoute:

[TRADUCTION] Si, d'une manière générale (par opposition aux cas exceptionnels où doit être prouvé un élément moral en plus de la mens rea ordinaire), l'intoxication était acceptée comme moyen de défense, cela minerait, à mon avis, le droit criminel et je ne crois pas qu'on puisse se contenter d'affirmer, comme l'a fait Me Tucker, que nous pouvons nous en remettre au bon sens des jurés ou des magistrats pour assurer que les coupables seront condamnés. Il se peut bien qu'un jour le législateur examine, comme à mon avis il le devrait, la recommandation concernant la création d'une infraction d'«intoxication dangereuse», que formule le comité Butler dans son Report on Mentally Abnormal Offen-don the common law rule, as "mercifully relaxed," which the courts have followed for a century and a half.

Lord Simon, after noting that a person is not criminally responsible for unlawful conduct unless that conduct is accompanied by a wrongful state of mind—the mens rea—, said, at p. 478:

Mens rea is therefore on ultimate analysis the state of mind stigmatised as wrongful by the criminal law which, when compounded with the relevant prohibited conduct, constitutes a particular offence. There is no juristic reason why mental incapacity (short of M'Naghten insanity), brought about by self-induced intoxication, to realise what one is doing or its probable consequences should not be such a state of mind stigmatised as wrongful by the criminal law; and there is every practical reason why it should be.

And, at pp. 479-80, he said:

As I have ventured to suggest, there is nothing unreasonable or illogical in the law holding that a mind rendered self-inducedly insensible (short of M'Naghten insanity), through drink or drugs, to the nature of a prohibited act or to its probable consequences is as wrongful a mind as one which consciously contemplates the prohibited act and foresees its probable consequences (or is reckless as to whether they ensue). The latter is all that is required by way of mens rea in a crime of basic intent. But a crime of specific intent requires something more than contemplation of the prohibited act and foresight of its probable consequences. The mens rea in a crime of specific intent requires proof of a purposive element. This purposive element either exists or not; it cannot be supplied by saying that the impairment of mental powers by self-induced intoxication is its equivalent, for it is not. So that the 19th century development of the law as to the effect of self-induced intoxication on criminal responsibility is juristically entirely acceptable; and it need be a matter of no surprise that Stephen stated it without demur or question.

ders (Cmnd. 6244, 1975). Mais, entre-temps, je crois qu'il serait irresponsable d'abandonner la règle de common law, «fort heureusement, assouplie», que les tribunaux suivent depuis un siècle et demi.

Lord Simon, ayant fait remarquer qu'une personne n'est responsable en droit criminel pour une conduite illégale que si cette conduite est accompagnée d'un état d'esprit coupable, savoir la mens rea, dit, à la p. 478:

[TRADUCTION] La mens rea est donc en dernière analyse l'état d'esprit que le droit criminel considère comme répréhensible et qu'il stigmatise en conséquence. Cet état d'esprit, lorsqu'il vient s'ajouter à la conduite prohibée en question, constitue une infraction particulière. Il n'existe aucune raison juridique pour laquelle l'incapacité mentale (lorsqu'elle n'équivaut pas à l'aliénation au sens de l'arrêt M'Naghten), résultant de l'intoxication volontaire, de se rendre compte de ses actes ou de leurs conséquences probables ne devrait pas constituer précisément ce genre d'état d'esprit que le droit criminel considère comme répréhensible et qu'il stigmatise en conséquence; de fait, sur le plan pratique, il y a de très bonnes raisons de la ranger dans cette catégorie.

Aux pages 479 et 480, il dit:

[TRADUCTION] Je me suis déjà hasardé à affirmer qu'il n'y a rien de déraisonnable ni d'illogique à ce que le droit dise qu'un esprit rendu, par la consommation volontaire d'alcool ou de stupéfiants, inconscient (lorsque cette inconscience n'équivaut pas à l'aliénation au sens de l'arrêt M'Naghten) de la nature d'un acte prohibé ou de ses conséquences probables, est un esprit aussi coupable que celui qui envisage consciemment l'acte prohibé et en prévoit les conséquences probables (ou qui ne se soucie pas que ces conséquences en résultent). C'est là tout ce qui est requis comme mens rea dans le cas d'un crime d'intention fondamentale. Un crime d'intention spécifique, par contre, exige davantage que le fait d'avoir envisagé l'acte prohibé et d'avoir prévu ses conséquences probables. La mens rea dans le cas d'un crime d'intention spécifique exige la preuve d'un dessein. Cet élément existe ou n'existe pas; on ne saurait suppléer à son absence en disant que l'affaiblissement des facultés mentales provoqué par l'intoxication volontaire en est l'équivalent, car ce n'est pas le cas. Par conséquent, la règle de droit relative à l'effet de l'intoxication volontaire sur la responsabilité criminelle, telle que cette règle s'est développée au XIXe siècle, est entièrement acceptable sur le plan juridique; il n'est donc pas surprenant du tout que Stephen l'ait énoncée sans aucune hésitation ni aucune réserve.

Lord Salmon and Lord Edmund-Davies admitted that the current state of the law could not be entirely justified in logic but rather must be founded in common sense and experience. Lord Salmon said, at pp. 483-84:

As I have already indicated, I accept that there is a degree of illogicality in the rule that intoxication may excuse or expunge one type of intention and not another. This illogicality is, however, acceptable to me because the benevolent part of the rule removes undue harshness without imperilling safety and the stricter part of the rule works without imperilling justice. It would be just as ridiculous to remove the benevolent part of the rule (which no one suggests) as it would be to adopt the alternative of removing the stricter part of the rule for the sake of preserving absolute logic. Absolute logic in human affairs is an uncertain guide and a very dangerous master. The law is primarily concerned with human affairs. I believe that the main object of our legal system is to preserve individual liberty. One important aspect of individual liberty is protection against physical violence.

If there were to be no penal sanction for any injury unlawfully inflicted under the complete mastery of drink or drugs, voluntarily taken, the social consequence could be appalling.

And Lord Edmund-Davies said, at p. 494:

Are the claims of logic, then, so compelling that a man behaving as the Crown witnesses testified the appellant did must be cleared of criminal responsibility? As to this, Lawton L.J. rightly said ante, p. 456B-C:

"Although there was much reforming zeal and activity in the 19th century, Parliament never once considered whether self-induced intoxication should be a defence generally to a criminal charge. It would have been a strange result if the merciful relaxation of a strict rule of law had ended, without any Parliamentary intervention, by whittling it away to such an extent that the more drunk a man became, provided he stopped short of making himself insane, the better chance he had of an acquittal."

If such be the inescapable result of the strict application of logic in this branch of the law, it is indeed not surprising that illogicality has long reigned, and the Lord Salmon et lord Edmund-Davies ont reconnu que la règle de droit actuellement en vigueur ne peut pas se justifier entièrement par la logique et qu'elle doit plutôt être fondée sur le bon sens et l'expérience. Lord Salmon dit, aux pp. 483 et 484:

[TRADUCTION] Comme je l'ai déjà indiqué, je conviens de l'existence d'un certain illogisme dans la règle selon laquelle l'intoxication peut excuser ou effacer un type d'intention, mais non un autre. J'accepte cependant cet illogisme, je l'accepte parce que la règle, dans son aspect indulgent, évite toute sévérité excessive sans pour autant nuire à la sécurité tandis que, dans son aspect rigoureux, elle s'applique de manière à ne pas nuire à la justice. Il serait tout aussi ridicule de supprimer l'aspect indulgent de la règle (ce que personne ne propose d'ailleurs) que d'adopter l'autre possibilité qui consiste à lui enlever son aspect rigoureux dans l'intérêt d'une logique absolue. Dans les affaires humaines, la logique absolue est un guide peu sûr et un maître très dangereux. Le droit s'occupe surtout d'affaires humaines. Je crois que la principale raison d'être de notre système de droit est de préserver la liberté individuelle. Or, la protection contre la violence physique représente un élément important de la liberté individuelle.

S'il n'y avait aucune sanction pénale pour des lésions illégalement infligées alors qu'on est complètement sous l'empire de la boisson ou de la drogue qu'on a prise volontairement, les conséquences sociales risqueraient d'être épouvantables.

Et, à la p. 494, lord Edmund-Davies tient ces propos:

[TRADUCTION] Peut-on pousser la logique jusqu'à dire qu'un homme qui s'est conduit comme les témoins à charge ont dit que l'appelant l'avait fait, doit être dégagé de toute responsabilité criminelle? À ce sujet, le lord juge Lawton déclarait à juste titre, ci-dessus à la p. 456B-C:

«Malgré le grand zèle réformateur du XIXe siècle, le Parlement n'a jamais examiné la question de savoir si l'intoxication volontaire devait constituer un moyen de défense général à une accusation criminelle. Il serait pour le moins étrange que l'adoucissement d'une règle de droit rigoureuse la dénature à tel point, sans l'intervention du Parlement, qu'elle vienne à signifier que plus un homme s'enivre, sans aller jusqu'à l'aliénation mentale, plus il a de chances d'être acquitté.»

Si tel est le résultat inéluctable de l'application rigoureuse de la logique à cette branche du droit, il n'est pas prospect of its dethronement must be regarded as alarming.

Lord Russell added these words, at p. 498:

> . . . but logic in criminal law must not be allowed to run away with common sense, particularly when the preservation of the Queen's Peace is in question. The ordinary citizen who is badly beaten up would rightly think little of the criminal law as an effective protection if, because his attacker had deprived himself of ability to know what he was doing by getting himself drunk or going on a trip with drugs, the attacker is to be held innocent of any crime in the assault. Mens rea has many aspects. If asked to define it in such a case as the present I would say that the element of guilt or moral turpitude is supplied by the act of self-intoxication reckless of possible consequences.

From the judgments in Majewski, it may be concluded that the law in England on this question is that in offences of general intent the defence of drunkenness shall not apply; that the requirement of mens rea in such offences is met by proof of voluntary intoxication; and that any logical weakness in this position is justified on the basis of sound social policy.

This Court in Leary approved the Majewski approach which has long been accepted in the law of Canada and, for the reasons which I have set out, it is my opinion that this Court's judgment in Leary ought not to be overruled. I must re-emphasise that the Leary rule does not relieve the Crown from its obligation to prove the mens rea in a general intent offence. The fact that an accused may not rely on voluntary intoxication in such offences does not have that effect because of the nature of the offence and the mental elements which must be shown. The requisite state of mind may be proved in two ways. Firstly, there is the general proposition that triers of fact may infer mens rea from the actus reus itself: a person is presumed to have intended the natural and probable consequences of his actions. For example, in an offence involving the mere application of force, the minimal intent to apply that force will suffice surprenant que l'illogisme règne depuis longtemps, et il serait dangereux de le détrôner.

> [TRADUCTION] . . . mais il ne faut pas permettre que la logique en droit criminel l'emporte sur le bon sens, surtout quand il est question du maintien de l'ordre public. Le citoyen ordinaire qui a été gravement brutalisé aurait, à juste titre d'ailleurs, une mauvaise opinion du droit criminel en tant que moyen de protection efficace si son agresseur, du fait de s'être enivré ou de s'être drogué au point de se mettre dans l'incapacité de se rendre compte de ses actes, était jugé innocent de tout crime relié à l'agression. La mens rea comporte de multiples aspects. Si on me demandait d'en donner une définition dans le présent contexte, je dirais que l'élément de culpabilité ou de turpitude morale existe du fait qu'on s'est enivré sans se soucier des conséquences possibles.

On peut déduire des opinions exprimées dans l'arrêt Majewski que la règle de droit anglaise dans ce domaine veut que la défense d'ivresse ne s'applique pas aux infractions d'intention générale; que, dans le cas de ces infractions, il suffit pour satisfaire à l'exigence de mens rea de produire une preuve d'intoxication volontaire; et que toute faiblesse que peut comporter ce point de vue sur le plan de la logique est justifiée par des raisons qui relèvent d'une saine politique sociale.

Dans l'arrêt Leary, cette Cour a approuvé la position énoncée dans l'arrêt Majewski, qui est acceptée depuis longtemps en droit canadien, et, pour les raisons déjà exposées, j'estime qu'il ne faut pas renverser l'arrêt Leary. Je tiens à souligner encore une fois que la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary ne dégage pas le ministère public de son obligation de prouver la mens rea lorsqu'il s'agit d'une infraction d'intention générale. Le fait qu'un accusé ne peut invoquer l'intoxication volontaire dans le cas de ces infractions n'a pas cet effet vu la nature de l'infraction et les éléments moraux devant être démontrés. L'existence de l'état d'esprit requis peut se prouver de deux manières. Il y a d'abord la proposition générale selon laquelle les juges des faits peuvent déduire la mens rea de l'actus reus lui-même: une personne est présumée avoir voulu les conséquences naturelles et probables de ses actes. Par exemple, dans une infraction to constitute the necessary mens rea and can be reasonably inferred from the act itself and the other evidence. Secondly, in cases where the accused was so intoxicated as to raise doubt as to the voluntary nature of his conduct, the Crown may meet its evidentiary obligation respecting the necessary blameworthy mental state of the accused by proving the fact of voluntary self-induced intoxication by drugs or alcohol. This was the approach suggested in Majewski. In most cases involving intoxication in general intent offences, the trier of fact will be able to apply the first proposition, namely, that the intent is inferable from the actus reus itself. As Fauteux J. observed in R. v. George, supra, at p. 879, it is almost metaphysically inconceivable for a person to be so drunk as to be incapable of forming the minimal intent to apply force. Hence, only in cases of the most extreme self-intoxication does the trier of fact need to use the second proposition, that is, that evidence of self-induced intoxication is evidence of the guilty mind, the blameworthy mental state.

The result of this two-fold approach is that for these crimes accused persons cannot hold up voluntary drunkenness as a defence. They cannot be heard to say: "I was so drunk that I did not know what I was doing". If they managed to get themselves so drunk that they did not know what they were doing, the reckless behaviour in attaining that level of intoxication affords the necessary evidence of the culpable mental condition. Hence, it is logically impossible for an accused person to throw up his voluntary drunkenness as a defence to a charge of general intent. Proof of his voluntary drunkenness can be proof of his guilty mind.

As I have endeavoured to show, the exclusion of the drunkenness defence in general intent cases is not without logical underpinnings but, whatever the logical weaknesses may be, an overwhelming comportant le simple recours à la force, l'intention minimale d'exercer cette force suffira pour constituer la mens rea nécessaire et cette intention peut raisonnablement déduire de l'acte lui-même et des autres éléments de preuve. Deuxièmement, dans les cas où l'accusé était intoxiqué au point de faire naître des doutes quant au caractère volontaire de sa conduite, le ministère public peut s'acquitter de son obligation de prouver que l'accusé avait l'état mental coupable nécessaire en prouvant l'intoxication volontaire que l'accusé a provoquée lui-même par la consommation de stupéfiants ou d'alcool. C'est là la démarche proposée dans l'arrêt Majewski. Dans la plupart des cas d'intoxication lors de la perpétration d'infractions d'intention générale, le juge des faits pourra appliquer la première proposition, savoir que l'intention peut être déduite de l'actus reus lui-même. Comme le fait observer le juge Fauteux dans l'arrêt R. v. George, précité, à la p. 879, il est presque métaphysiquement inconcevable qu'une personne soit ivre au point d'être incapable de former l'intention minimale d'avoir recours à la force. Il s'ensuit que ce n'est que dans le cas de la plus extrême intoxication volontaire que le juge des faits doit recourir à la seconde proposition, c'est-à-dire celle suivant laquelle la preuve d'intoxication volontaire démontre l'existence d'un esprit coupable, d'un état mental condamnable.

Il résulte de ce processus à deux étapes que, pour ces crimes, un accusé ne saurait soulever l'ivresse volontaire comme moyen de défense. Il ne saurait alléguer: «J'étais tellement ivre que je ne savais pas ce que je faisais.» S'il a pu s'enivrer au point d'être inconscient de ses actes, l'insouciance dont il a témoigné en se mettant dans cet état constitue la preuve nécessaire pour établir l'état mental coupable. Par conséquent, il est, du point de vue de la logique, impossible qu'une personne accusée d'une infraction d'intention générale invoque son ivresse volontaire comme moyen de défense. La preuve de son ivresse volontaire peut constituer une preuve de son esprit coupable.

Comme j'ai essayé de le démontrer, l'exclusion de la défense d'ivresse dans le cas des infractions d'intention générale n'est pas dénuée de tout fondement logique, mais, quelles que puissent être ses justification for the exclusion may rest on policy, policy so compelling that it possesses its own logic. Intoxication, whether by alcohol or drugs, lies at the root of many if not most violent assaults: intoxication is clearly a major cause of violent crime. What then is preferable, a recognition of this fact and the adoption of a policy aimed at curbing the problem, or the application of what is said to be logic by providing in law that he who voluntarily partakes of that which is the cause of the crime should for that reason be excused from the consequences of his crime? If that is logic, I prefer policy.

It was argued by the appellant that the Leary rule converts the offence of sexual assault causing bodily harm into a crime of absolute liability in that the Crown need not prove the requisite intention for the completion of the offence. Therefore, it is said that Leary violates ss. 7 and 11(d) of the Charter. In Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486, and in R. v. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 636, it was held that the requirement for a minimum mental state before the attachment of criminal liability is a principle of fundamental justice. Criminal offences, as a general rule, must have as one of their elements the requirement of a blameworthy mental state. The morally innocent ought not to be convicted. It is said that the Leary rule violates this fundamental premise. In my opinion, the Leary rule clearly does not offend this essential principle of criminal law but rather upholds it. The Leary rule recognizes that accused persons who have voluntarily consumed drugs or alcohol, thereby depriving themselves of self-control leading to the commission of a crime, are not morally innocent and are, indeed, criminally blameworthy. While the rule excludes consideration of voluntary intoxication in the approach to general intent offences, it nonetheless recognizes that it may be a relevant factor in those generally more serious offences where the mens rea must involve not only the intentional performance of the actus reus but, as well, the formation of further ulterior motives and purposes. It therefore intrudes upon the security of the person only in accordance faiblesses sur le plan de la logique, cette exclusion peut trouver une justification irrésistible dans la politique générale, une politique si impérieuse qu'elle est dotée de sa propre logique. Qu'elle soit provoquée par l'alcool ou par des stupéfiants, l'intoxication est à l'origine d'un bon nombre, sinon de la plupart, des agressions violentes: sans conteste, l'intoxication est une cause majeure de crimes violents. Quel parti faut-il donc préférer, celui de reconnaître ce fait et d'adopter une politique visant à enrayer le problème, ou celui d'appliquer ce qu'on dit être logique en créant une règle de droit voulant que quiconque participe volontairement à ce qui est la cause du crime doive pour cette raison être excusé des conséquences de son crime? Si c'est là la logique, je préfère la politique générale.

L'appelant a fait valoir que la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary transforme l'infraction d'agression sexuelle causant des lésions corporelles en crime de responsabilité absolue, en ce sens que le ministère public est dispensé d'avoir à prouver l'intention requise pour qu'il y ait perpétration de l'infraction. Il prétend donc que l'arrêt Leary va à l'encontre de l'art. 7 et de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486, et dans l'arrêt R. c. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 636, il a été jugé que l'exigence d'un certain état mental minimal comme condition de la responsabilité criminelle est un principe de justice fondamentale. Un des éléments des infractions criminelles doit en règle générale être l'exigence d'un état mental coupable. Ceux qui sont moralement innocents ne devraient pas se voir déclarer coupables. On dit que la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary viole ce principe fondamental. À mon avis, cette règle ne va manifestement pas à l'encontre de ce principe essentiel du droit criminel; au contraire, elle l'étaye. Il s'agit d'une règle qui reconnaît que les accusés qui ont volontairement consommé des stupéfiants ou de l'alcool, se privant ainsi de la maîtrise de soi, ce qui mène à la perpétration d'un crime, loin d'être moralement innocents, sont en fait coupables en droit criminel. Quoique la règle ne permette pas de tenir compte de l'intoxication volontaire dans le cas d'infractions d'intention générale, elle reconnaît néanmoins que cela peut représenter un facteur pertinent à l'égard des infractions généralewith sound principle and within the established boundaries of the legal process. For these reasons, I would say that the Charter is not violated.

In the High Court of Australia in the case of O'Connor (1980), 4 A. Crim. R. 348, the court reached a different conclusion and its view has found favour in the judgment of the Chief Justice. I have tried to set out my reasons for rejecting the approach in the O'Connor case. I have done so on the basis that the existing law, resting on a recognition of the distinction between the general and specific intent, has not only served our society well but is not divorced from logical support and is based on sound policy. The present law has long been settled and applied in the United Kingdom. It has been accepted as well in Canada and has general support in the United States and up until the O'Connor case, as far as I have been able to ascertain, has been followed in both Australia and New Zealand. It has, in other words, embraced the greater part of the common law world. For this reason and those earlier outlined, I would not overrule the judgment of this Court in Leary and I would confirm the law as it presently stands. Parliament at some time in the future may intervene in the matter with such statutory provisions as it may consider appropriate but failing that occurrence I would not enlarge the defence of drunkenness, and I do not consider that the suggestion that juries may decline to give effect to such an enlarged defence is a factor to be urged in its favour.

I would therefore conclude that the courts below made no error and I would dismiss the appeal.

In any event, should it be considered that I am wrong in my approach to the Leary case, this is nonetheless a case in which the provisions of s. 613(1)(b)(iii) of the Criminal Code should be applied. The Court of Appeal, reaching the conclument plus graves pour lesquelles la mens rea doit comprendre non seulement l'accomplissement intentionnel de l'actus reus, mais aussi l'existence d'autres motifs et desseins. La règle ne nuit donc à la sécurité de la personne qu'en conformité avec des principes solides et d'une manière qui ne dépasse pas les limites établies du processus légal. Pour ces raisons, je suis d'avis qu'il n'y a pas de violation de la Charte.

Dans l'affaire O'Connor (1980), 4 A. Crim. R. 348, la Haute Cour de l'Australie est arrivée à une conclusion différente et son avis a été retenu par le Juge en chef dans les motifs qu'il a rédigés en l'espèce. J'ai tenté d'exposer les raisons qui m'amènent à rejeter le point de vue adopté dans l'arrêt O'Connor. Mon opinion est motivée par le fait que non seulement la règle de droit actuelle, qui repose sur la reconnaissance de l'existence d'une distinction entre l'intention générale et l'intention spécifique, a bien servi notre société, mais aussi elle n'est pas sans soutien logique et elle est fondée sur une politique saine. Voilà longtemps que cette règle bien établie est appliquée au Royaume-Uni. Elle a été acceptée également au Canada et jouit d'un appui général aux États-Unis. De plus, à ce que je peux voir, avant l'arrêt O'Connor elle avait été suivie en Australie et en Nouvelle-Zélande. En d'autres termes, elle a eu cours dans la majeure partie du monde de common law. Pour ce motif et pour ceux exposés précédemment, je suis d'avis de ne pas renverser l'arrêt Leary et de confirmer la règle de droit actuellement en vigueur. Il se peut que dans l'avenir le législateur intervienne en adoptant les dispositions législatives qu'il juge appropriées, mais en attendant je n'élargirais pas la portée de la défense d'ivresse et je ne crois pas que la proposition selon laquelle les jurys pourront refuser de retenir ce moyen de défense élargi soit un facteur qui milite en sa faveur.

Je conclus donc que les tribunaux d'instance inférieure n'ont pas commis d'erreur et je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

Quoi qu'il en soit, à supposer que ma façon de voir l'arrêt Leary soit considérée comme erronée, il y a néanmoins lieu en l'espèce d'appliquer le sous-al. 613(1)b)(iii) du Code criminel. Étant donné la conclusion à laquelle elle est arrivée, la

sion that it did, did not find it necessary to consider this question. The issue, however, was raised by the respondent Crown in its factum. The trial judge found no evidence of drunkenness, except the statement of the appellant made to the police before trial. The appellant himself did not see fit to give evidence at the trial. The trial judge in addressing the jury made the following statement:

> You heard the evidence of the police officers and of the complainant of the condition of the accused with respect to drink. None of them say that he was drunk. Only the accused in his statement says "I was all drunked up too". There was no evidence of drunkenness except that statement and it is open to you to accept it and find that he was drunk but even if he was drunk drunkenness is no defence to the charge alleged against this accused. It is no defence.

It is my view that there is no sufficient evidence of drunkenness to form any basis whatever for the defence of drunkenness. I can only conclude after reviewing the evidence that even if the exclusion of the evidence of drunkenness was an error on the part of the trial judge, no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice has occurred in this case and the verdict of the jury would necessarily have been the same, even if the evidence of drunkenness had not been excluded from the jury's consideration. Acting under the powers given in s. 623(1) of the Code, I would apply the proviso, dismiss the appeal, and confirm the conviction.

The reasons of Wilson and L'Heureux-Dubé JJ. were delivered by

WILSON J.—I have had the benefit of the reasons of the Chief Justice and of my colleagues McIntyre and La Forest JJ. I agree with McIntyre J. for the reasons given by him that sexual assault causing bodily harm is an offence of general intent requiring only the minimal intent to apply force. I agree with him also that in most cases involving general intent offences and intoxication the Crown will be able to establish the accused's blameworthy mental state by inference from his or her acts. I think that is the case here. The evidence of intoxication withheld from the trier of fact in this case could not possibly have raised a reasonable doubt

Cour d'appel n'a pas jugé nécessaire d'aborder cette question. Elle a toutefois été soulevée par l'intimée dans son mémoire. Le juge du procès n'a constaté l'existence d'aucun élément de preuve établissant l'ivresse, si ce n'est la déclaration faite par l'appelant à la police avant le procès. L'appelant lui-même n'a pas cru bon de témoigner au procès. Dans son exposé au jury, le juge du procès a dit:

> [TRADUCTION] Vous avez entendu les témoignages des policiers et de la plaignante concernant l'état de l'accusé en ce qui concerne son ébriété. Aucun ne prétend qu'il était ivre. L'accusé a été le seul à parler d'ivresse dans sa déclaration: «J'étais bien soûl aussi.» Exception faite de cette déclaration, il n'y a aucune preuve qu'il était ivre. Or, vous pouvez l'accepter et conclure qu'il était en état d'ébriété, mais même s'il l'était, l'ivresse ne peut être opposée comme moyen de défense à l'accusation portée contre lui. Ce n'est tout simplement pas une défense.

À mon avis, on n'a pas produit une preuve d'ivresse qui suffit pour fonder la défense d'ivresse. Je ne puis que conclure au vu de la preuve que, même si le juge du procès a eu tort d'exclure l'ivresse, il n'y a eu en l'espèce aucun tort important ni erreur judiciaire grave et le jury aurait nécessairement rendu le même verdict, même si on lui avait permis de tenir compte de la preuve d'ivresse. Exerçant les pouvoirs que confère le par. 623(1) du Code, je suis d'avis d'appliquer l'exception, de rejeter le pourvoi et de confirmer la déclaration de culpabilité.

Version française des motifs des juges Wilson et L'Heureux-Dubé rendus par

LE JUGE WILSON—J'ai eu l'avantage de lire les motifs du Juge en chef et de mes collègues les juges McIntyre et La Forest. Je souscris aux motifs du juge McIntyre portant que l'agression sexuelle causant des lésions corporelles est une infraction d'intention générale exigeant seulement l'intention minimale d'utiliser la force. Je suis aussi d'accord avec lui pour dire que, dans la plupart des cas mettant en cause des infractions d'intention générale et l'intoxication, le ministère public sera à même de prouver l'état mental blâmable de l'accusé en le déduisant de ses actes. Je pense que tel est le cas en l'espèce. Il est impossible as to the existence of the minimal intent to apply force. It is accordingly not necessary in this case to resort to self-induced intoxication as a substituted form of mens rea. And, indeed, I have some real concerns as to whether the imposition of criminal liability on that basis would survive a challenge under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

que la preuve de l'intoxication, qui n'a pas été soumise au juge des faits en l'espèce, ait pu soulever un doute raisonnable quant à l'existence de l'intention minimale d'utiliser la force. Il n'est donc pas nécessaire en l'espèce de recourir à l'intoxication volontaire à titre de substitut de la mens rea. De toute façon, je suis loin d'être sûre que l'imposition de la responsabilité criminelle sur ce fondement survivrait à une contestation en vertu de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés.

The facts are fully set out in the reasons of the Chief Justice and I refer to them only to underline why I agree with my colleague, McIntyre J., that the rule in Leary v. The Queen, [1978] 1 S.C.R. 29, should be preserved and applied in this case.

Le Juge en chef a exposé les faits en détail dans ses motifs et je ne m'y reporterai que pour souligner pourquoi je partage l'avis du juge McIntyre que la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary c. La Reine, [1978] 1 R.C.S. 29 doit être préservée et appliquée en l'espèce.

Sexual assault is a crime of violence. There is no requirement of an intent or purpose beyond the intentional application of force. It is first and foremost an assault. It is sexual in nature only because, objectively viewed, it is related to sex either on account of the area of the body to which the violence is applied or on account of words accompanying the violence. Indeed, the whole purpose, as I understand it, of the replacement of the offence of rape by the offence of sexual assault was to emphasize the aspect of violence and put paid to the benign concept that rape was simply the act of a man who was "carried away" by his emotions.

L'agression sexuelle est un crime violent. Il n'exige pas d'intention ou de dessein autre que l'utilisation intentionnelle de la force. C'est toujours et avant tout une agression. Elle est de nature sexuelle seulement parce que, d'un point de vue objectif, elle est reliée aux activités sexuelles soit en raison de la partie du corps qui subit la violence, soit en raison des paroles qui accompagnent la violence. De fait, à mon avis, on a remplacé l'infraction de viol par l'infraction d'agression sexuelle dans le but de mettre l'accent sur l'aspect violent et d'écarter le concept bénin que le viol était simplement l'acte d'un homme qui se «laisse emporter» par ses émotions.

The appellant in his statement to the police admitted that he had forced the complainant to have sexual intercourse with him but claimed that because of his drunkenness he did not know why he had done this and that when he realized what he was doing he "got off" the complainant. There was evidence that the appellant had punched the complainant twice with his closed fist and had threatened to kill her. The doctor who examined the complainant testified that the complainant's right eye was swollen shut and that three stitches were required to close the wound. It is clear from this that there was intentional and voluntary, as opposed to accidental or involuntary, application of force.

Dans sa déclaration à la police, l'appelant a admis qu'il avait forcé la plaignante à avoir des relations sexuelles avec lui, mais il a allégué qu'à cause de son ivresse, il ne savait pas pourquoi il l'avait fait et que quand il s'est rendu compte de ce qu'il faisait, il «s'est enlevé» de la plaignante. La preuve indique que l'appelant a donné deux coups avec le poing fermé à la plaignante et qu'il l'a menacée de la tuer. Le médecin qui a examiné la plaignante a témoigné que son œil droit était fermé à cause de l'enflure et qu'il avait fallu trois points de suture pour recoudre la blessure. Il est clair que l'utilisation de la force a été intentionnelle et volontaire et non accidentelle et involontaire.

The evidence of the appellant's intoxication consisted of his own statements to the police that he was drunk; the complainant's testimony that, while the appellant was acting out of character in making advances to her, he was able to walk, talk and put albums on the record player; a friend's testimony that prior to the incident the appellant had been drinking at a bar and had become "very rowdy" although still capable of talking and walking straight. By his own admission the appellant had sufficient wits about him after the violent assault to hide a bloodied towel and pillowcase from the police. There is no evidence that we are dealing here with extreme intoxication, verging on insanity or automatism, and as such capable of negating the inference that the minimal intent to apply force was present: see R. v. Swietlinski (1978), 44 C.C.C. (2d) 267 (Ont. C.A.), at p. 294, aff'd [1980] 2 S.C.R. 956. The evidence of intoxication in this case was simply not capable of raising a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the minimal intent required. In this I agree with McIntyre J.

I am less confident about the proposition accepted by my colleague that self-induced intoxication may substitute for the mental element required to be present at the time the offence was committed although I realize that there are statements in judgments of this Court to that effect. I do not believe, however, that the Court has clearly adopted that proposition. The decision of the House of Lords in Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, [1977] A.C. 443, may stand for the rather harsh proposition that even self-induced intoxication producing a state of automatism cannot constitute a defence to an offence of general intent such as assault but I doubt that our Canadian jurisprudence goes that far.

For example in R. v. George, [1960] S.C.R. 871, Fauteux J. in holding the evidence of intoxication in that case not to be relevant in determining the minimal intent required for an assault conviction took care to note at pp. 878-79:

La preuve de l'état d'intoxication de l'appelant découle de ses déclarations à la police à cet effet, du témoignage de la plaignante portant que quoique l'appelant ait agi de façon inhabituelle en lui faisant des avances, il était capable de marcher, de parler et de mettre des disques sur le phonographe, du témoignage d'un ami portant qu'avant l'incident l'appelant avait bu dans un bar et qu'il était devenu «très batailleur» tout en étant encore capable de parler et de marcher droit. De son propre aveu, l'appelant avait encore assez de lucidité après l'agression violente pour cacher à la police une serviette et un oreiller tachés de sang. Aucune preuve n'indique qu'en l'espèce nous avons à faire à une intoxication extrême, au seuil de l'aliénation ou de l'automatisme et apte à ce titre à empêcher la déduction que l'intention minimale d'utiliser la force était présente: voir R. v. Swietlinski (1978), 44 C.C.C. (2d) 267 (C.A. Ont.), à la p. 294, conf. par [1980] 2 R.C.S. 956. La preuve de l'intoxication en l'espèce ne permet simplement pas de soulever un doute raisonnable quant à l'existence de l'intention minimale requise. À cet égard, je suis d'accord avec le juge McIntyre.

Je suis moins sûre de la proposition acceptée par mon collègue selon laquelle l'intoxication volontaire peut se substituer à l'élément mental requis au moment de la perpétration de l'infraction, quoique je sois consciente qu'on trouve des déclarations à cet effet dans des arrêts de cette Cour. Je ne crois cependant pas que la Cour ait clairement adopté cette proposition. L'arrêt de la Chambre des Lords Director of Public Prosecutions v. Majewski, [1977] A.C. 443, vaut peut-être pour la proposition assez sévère que même l'intoxication volontaire qui produit un état d'automatisme ne peut constituer une défense à une infraction nécessitant une intention générale comme les voies de fait, mais je doute que la jurisprudence canadienne aille aussi loin.

Par exemple dans l'arrêt R. v. George, [1960] R.C.S. 871, le juge Fauteux, en décidant que la preuve de l'intoxication dans ce cas n'était pas utile pour déterminer s'il y avait l'intention minimale requise pour une déclaration de culpabilité de voies de fait, a pris soin de noter aux pp. 878 et 879:

1988 CanLII 22 (SCC)

There can be no pretence, in this case, that the manner in which force was applied by respondent to his victim was accidental—or excluding at the moment, from the consideration, the defence of drunkenness—unintentional.

On this finding of fact, the accused was guilty of common assault unless there was evidence indicating a degree of drunkenness affording, under the law, a valid defence.

Hence, the question is whether, owing to drunkenness, respondent's condition was such that he was incapable of applying force intentionally. I do not know that, short of a degree of drunkenness creating a condition tantamount to insanity, such a situation could be metaphysically conceived in an assault of the kind here involved. It is certain that, on the facts found by the trial Judge, this situation did not exist in this case.

Likewise Ritchie J. concluded at pp. 890-91:

The fact that the learned trial judge found, as I think he did, that the respondent had "violently manhandled" an old man but was not guilty of assault because he was drunk at the time raises the question of law posed by the appellant as to whether, under the circumstances as found by the trial judge, drunkenness is a valid defence to common assault.

In considering the question of mens rea, a distinction is to be drawn between "intention" as applied to acts done to achieve an immediate end on the one hand and acts done with the specific and ulterior motive and intention of furthering or achieving an illegal object on the other hand. Illegal acts of the former kind are done "intentionally" in the sense that they are not done by accident or through honest mistake, but acts of the latter kind are the product of preconception and are deliberate steps taken towards an illegal goal. The former acts may be the purely physical products of momentary passion, whereas the latter involve the mental process of formulating a specific intent. A man, far advanced in drink, may intentionally strike his fellow in the former sense at a time when his mind is so befogged with liquor as to be unable to formulate a specific intent in the latter sense.

The decision of the learned trial judge, in my opinion, constitutes a finding that the respondent violently man-

[TRADUCTION] Il est impossible de soutenir en l'espèce que c'est accidentellement ou, abstraction faite pour l'instant de la défense d'ivresse, involontairement que l'intimé a eu recours à la force contre sa victime.

D'après cette conclusion de fait, l'accusé est coupable de voies de fait simples, à moins que la preuve n'indique un degré d'ivresse suffisant pour constituer en droit un moyen de défense valable.

La question est donc de savoir si, pour cause d'ivresse, l'état de l'intimé a été tel qu'il était incapable d'avoir intentionnellement recours à la force. Or, je ne crois pas qu'en l'absence d'un degré d'ivresse créant un état équivalant à l'aliénation, il soit métaphysiquement possible de concevoir une telle situation dans le cas de voies de fait comme celles présentement en cause. Il est certain que, compte tenu des conclusions de fait du juge du procès, cette situation ne s'est pas présentée en l'espèce.

De même le juge Ritchie a conclu aux pp. 890 et 891:

[TRADUCTION] Le fait que le juge du procès ait conclu, comme je crois qu'il l'a fait, que l'intimé avait «violemment maltraité» un vieillard, mais n'était pas coupable de voies de fait parce qu'il était ivre à ce moment là, soulève la question de droit posée par l'appelante, savoir si, vu les circonstances établies par le juge du procès, l'ivresse est une défense valide aux voies de fait simples.

En étudiant la question de la mens rea, on doit faire une distinction entre «l'intention» dans le cas d'actes accomplis pour atteindre un but immédiat d'une part et dans le cas d'actes accomplis dans le dessein et avec l'intention spécifique d'atteindre ou de contribuer à atteindre un but illégal d'autre part. Les actes illégaux du premier type sont «intentionnels» en ce sens qu'on ne les fait pas par accident ou par simple erreur. Les actes qui relèvent de la seconde catégorie, toutefois, résultent de la préméditation et représentent des mesures prises délibérément en vue d'atteindre un but illégal. Ceux-là peuvent être les conséquences purement physiques d'une passion momentanée, tandis que ceux-ci comportent la démarche mentale qui consiste à former une intention spécifique. Un homme en état d'ivresse très avancé peut frapper un autre intentionnellement au premier sens à un moment où son esprit est à ce point obscurci par la boisson qu'il est incapable de former une intention spécifique au deuxième sens.

La décision du savant juge du procès constitue, selon moi, une conclusion que l'intimé a violemment agressé handled a man and knew that he was hitting him. Under these circumstances, evidence that the accused was in a state of voluntary drunkenness cannot be treated as a defence to a charge of common assault because there is no suggestion that the drink which had been consumed had produced permanent or temporary insanity and the respondent's own statement indicates that he knew that he was applying force to the person of another.

In Leary, supra, although Pigeon J. categorically stated at p. 57 that because rape was an offence of general intent it was "therefore a crime in which the defence of drunkenness can have no application", he went on to say that he was obliged to determine whether on the facts of the case the application of the law would result in a miscarriage of justice. In order to do this he addressed the question whether there was evidence that the accused was so intoxicated that he could not form a criminal intent and concluded at pp. 59-60:

Therefore, in the circumstances, although it is not strictly necessary in view of my conclusion on the question of law, I wish to say that, even if I held a different view, I would have to hold that in the instant case there was no evidence that the accused was drunk to such a degree as to be incapable of forming the intent to commit rape. Here is what Bull J.A. said:

> The evidence was clear that the appellant was intoxicated (as was the boy friend Lesley) but there was no suggestion that he was in such a drunken condition either that he did not know what he was doing or that he would not appreciate that his menacing use of the knife, combined with this insistence on sexual intercourse, extorted submission or consent to the act. The appellant's position, as voluntarily made to the police, was merely that he "started petting" with her, removed her tampax for her and had intercourse. The whole statement was clear and concise as to the event and details and negated any such drunken condition.

I do not think that the trial judge's remark indicates that he thought there was some evidence of drunkenness going to the extent of an inability to form a criminal intent. (Assuming this is at all possible in a rape case, see Glanville L. Williams, The Mental Element in Crime (1965), p. 47.) In my opinion, the trial judge merely wanted to guard against the erroneous view that mere drunken condition could be a defence.

un homme et savait qu'il le frappait. Dans ces circonstances, une preuve établissant que l'accusé se trouvait en état d'ivresse volontaire ne saurait être considérée comme une défense opposable à une accusation de voies de fait simples parce que rien n'indique que l'alcool qu'il avait consommé avait provoqué une aliénation permanente ou temporaire et qu'il ressort de la déclaration faite par l'intimé lui-même qu'il savait qu'il employait la force contre une autre personne.

Dans l'arrêt Leary, précité, bien que le juge Pigeon ait dit, à la p. 57, de façon catégorique que, étant donné que le viol est une infraction nécessitant l'intention générale, il est «en conséquence un crime pour lequel la défense d'ivresse n'est pas recevable», il a dit ensuite qu'il était tenu de décider si, vu les faits de l'affaire, l'application de la règle de droit entraînerait un déni de justice. À cette fin, il a décidé d'examiner si la preuve indiquait que l'accusé était tellement ivre qu'il ne pouvait pas former l'intention criminelle et il a conclu aux pp. 59 et 60:

En conséquence, bien que cela ne soit pas strictement nécessaire compte tenu de ma conclusion sur la question de droit, je tiens à préciser que, même si j'étais parvenu à une conclusion différente, j'aurais jugé qu'en l'espèce il n'y a aucune preuve que l'accusé était ivre au point d'être incapable de former l'intention de commettre un viol. Le juge d'appel Bull a déclaré:

> [TRADUCTION] Il est manifeste d'après la preuve que l'appelant était ivre (comme son ami Lesley) mais rien n'indique qu'il était ivre au point de ne pas avoir conscience de ce qu'il faisait ou de ne pas se rendre compte que c'est en menaçant la plaignante de son couteau et en insistant pour avoir des rapports sexuels, qu'il a arraché sa capitulation ou son consentement à l'acte. Selon la déclaration volontaire de l'appelant à la police, il s'est simplement mis à la «caresser», lui a retiré son tampax et a eu des rapports sexuels. Sa déclaration est une relation claire, concise et détaillée de l'incident et écarte la possibilité d'une ivresse aussi avancée.

Je ne pense pas que la remarque du juge de première instance indique qu'il ait cru qu'il y avait preuve d'un état d'ivresse rendant impossible l'intention criminelle. (À supposer que ce soit possible dans le cas d'un viol, voir Glanville L. Williams, The Mental Element in Crime (1965), p. 47.) À mon avis, le juge du procès voulait seulement mettre le jury en garde contre l'opinion erronée que l'ivresse pourrait constituer un moyen de défense.

I believe that the Leary rule is perfectly consistent with an onus resting on the Crown to prove the minimal intent which should accompany the doing of the prohibited act in general intent offences. I view it as preferable to preserve the Leary rule in its more flexible form as Pigeon J. applied it, i.e., so as to allow evidence of intoxication to go to the trier of fact in general intent offences only if it is evidence of extreme intoxication involving an absence of awareness akin to a state of insanity or automatism. Only in such a case is the evidence capable of raising a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the minimal intent required for the offence. I would not overrule Leary, as the Chief Justice would, and allow evidence of intoxication to go to the trier of fact in every case regardless of its possible relevance to the issue of the existence of the minimal intent required for the offence.

Je crois donc que la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary est tout à fait compatible avec la charge imposée au ministère public de prouver l'intention minimale qui doit accompagner l'exécution de l'acte prohibé dans les infractions d'intention générale. Je considère qu'il est préférable de préserver la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary dans la forme plus souple appliquée par le juge Pigeon, c.-à-d. de permettre que la preuve de l'intoxication soit soumise au juge des faits pour les infractions d'intention générale seulement s'il s'agit d'une preuve d'intoxication extrême entraînant l'absence de conscience voisine de l'aliénation ou de l'automatisme. C'est seulement dans ce cas que la preuve peut soulever un doute raisonnable sur l'existence de l'intention minimale requise par l'infraction. Je ne suis pas d'avis de renverser l'arrêt Leary, comme le ferait le Juge en chef, et de permettre que la preuve de l'intoxication soit soumise au juge des faits dans tous les cas, indépendamment de sa pertinence possible à l'égard de la question de l'existence de l'intention minimale requise pour l'infraction.

It was argued by the appellant and indeed accepted by the Chief Justice in his reasons that the Leary rule converts the offence of sexual assault causing bodily harm into a crime of absolute liability in that the Crown need not prove any mental element. This is said to offend s. 7 of the Charter as interpreted in Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, [1985] 2 S.C.R. 486 and in R. v. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 S.C.R. 636. With all due respect to those who think differently I do not believe that the Crown is relieved from proving the existence of the required minimal intent by the operation of Leary. In R. v. Sault Ste. Marie, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 1299, Dickson J., as he then was, stated at p. 1310:

Selon un des arguments de l'appelant que le Juge en chef a d'ailleurs accepté dans ses motifs, la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary transforme l'infraction d'agression sexuelle causant des lésions corporelles en un crime de responsabilité absolue puisque le ministère public n'a plus à prouver l'élément mental. Ce serait contraire à l'art. 7 de la Charte selon l'interprétation donnée dans le Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., [1985] 2 R.C.S. 486 et dans R. c. Vaillancourt, [1987] 2 R.C.S. 636. Avec égards pour les tenants de l'opinion contraire, je ne crois pas que le ministère public soit déchargé de la preuve de l'existence de l'intention minimale requise pour l'infraction du fait de l'arrêt Leary. Dans l'arrêt R. c. Sault Ste-Marie, [1978] 2 R.C.S. 1299, le juge Dickson, alors juge puîné, dit, à la p. 1310:

> In sharp contrast, "absolute liability" entails conviction on proof merely that the defendant committed the prohibited act constituting the actus reus of the offence. There is no relevant mental element. It is no defence that the accused was entirely without fault. He may be morally innocent in every sense, yet be branded as a malefactor and punished as such.

> Par contre la «responsabilité absolue» entraîne condamnation sur la simple preuve que le défendeur a commis l'acte prohibé qui constitue l'actus reus de l'infraction. Aucun élément moral n'est nécessaire. On ne peut plaider que l'accusé n'a commis aucune faute. Il peut être moralement innocent sous tous rapports et malgré cela être traité de criminel et puni comme tel.

When the Leary rule is applied in this case the Crown must still prove beyond a reasonable doubt the existence of the required mental element of the intentional application of force. The offence cannot be said to be one of absolute liability in the sense that no mental element has to be proved in order to obtain a conviction. As Alan Mewett and Morris Manning write in Criminal Law (2nd ed. 1985), at p. 210:

> The courts are not saying that crimes of general or basic intent do not require mens rea. Rather they are saying that those crimes have a mens rea of a type directed solely to the present and that drunkenness is not sufficient to negate that type of thought process.

Similarly, Glanville Williams argues in his Textbook of Criminal Law (2nd ed. 1983), at pp. 475-76, that it is a misunderstanding to read even Majewski, supra, as transforming general intent offences into absolute liability offences because "even on a charge of a crime of basic intent the jury must have regard to all the evidence except the evidence of intoxication in determining the defendant's intention." In short, when evidence of intoxication is withheld from the jury, the Crown still bears the burden of proving a blameworthy state of mind.

It was also argued by the appellant and accepted by the Chief Justice that the application of the Leary rule violates s. 11(d) of the Charter by allowing an accused to be convicted even although the trier of fact might well have a reasonable doubt as to the existence of the essential mental element of the offence or as to the availability of a defence which could raise a reasonable doubt as to the guilt of the accused: see Vaillancourt, supra; R. v. Whyte, [1988] 2 S.C.R. 3. Again I find myself in respectful disagreement with the Chief Justice and the appellant on this issue. To my mind, the operation of the Leary rule in this case does not have that result because the Crown still must prove that the accused applied force intentionally and the evidence of intoxication is withheld from the jury only because it is incapable of L'application de la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary en l'espèce n'évite pas au ministère public d'avoir à prouver hors de tout doute raisonnable l'existence de l'élément mental requis, soit le recours intentionnel à la force. On ne peut pas dire qu'il s'agit d'une infraction de responsabilité absolue en ce sens qu'aucun élément mental n'a à être prouvé pour obtenir une déclaration de culpabilité. Comme Alan Mewett et Morris Manning l'écrivent dans Criminal Law (2nd ed. 1985), à la p. 210:

> [TRADUCTION] Les tribunaux ne disent pas que les crimes nécessitant une intention générale ou une intention fondamentale ne requièrent pas la mens rea. Ils disent plutôt que ces crimes ont une mens rea d'un type visant seulement le présent et que l'ivresse ne suffit pas à nier ce type de processus mental.

De même Glanville Williams fait valoir dans son ouvrage Textbook of Criminal Law (2nd ed. 1983), aux pp. 475 et 476, qu'il est erroné de considérer que même l'arrêt Majewski, précité, transforme les infractions d'intention générale en infractions de responsabilité absolue car [TRADUCTION] «même dans le cas d'une accusation relative à un crime d'intention fondamentale, le jury doit tenir compte de l'ensemble de la preuve, sauf celle d'intoxication, pour déterminer l'intention du défendeur». En bref, quand la preuve de l'intoxication n'est pas soumise au jury, le ministère public a toujours la charge de prouver un état d'esprit blâmable.

Selon un autre argument de l'appelant que le Juge en chef a accepté, l'application de la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary porte atteinte à l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte en permettant la condamnation d'un accusé alors que le juge des faits aurait bien pu avoir un doute raisonnable sur l'existence d'un élément mental essentiel de l'infraction ou sur l'existence d'une défense qui aurait pu soulever un doute raisonnable quant à la culpabilité de l'accusé: voir Vaillancourt, précité, et R. c. Whyte, [1988] 2 R.C.S. 3. Je suis ici aussi en désaccord avec le Juge en chef et l'appelant sur ce point. À mon avis, l'application de la règle énoncée dans l'arrêt Leary en l'espèce n'a pas ce résultat parce que le ministère public doit toujours prouver que l'accusé a utilisé la force intentionnellement, et que la preuve de l'intoxication n'est pas soumise au raising a reasonable doubt as to the accused's guilt. This is not a case in which self-induced intoxication is being resorted to as a substituted mens rea for the intentional application of force.

It is, in my view, not strictly necessary in this case to address the constitutionality of substituting self-induced intoxication as the mens rea for the minimal mens rea requirements of general intent offences. The issue would, in my view, only arise in those rare cases in which the intoxication is extreme enough to raise doubts as to the existence of the minimal intent which characterizes conscious and volitional conduct. However, as both the Chief Justice and McIntyre J. have addressed the issue, I will express my own somewhat tentative views upon it.

This Court has affirmed as fundamental the proposition that a person should not be exposed to a deprivation of liberty unless the Crown proves the existence of a blameworthy or culpable state of mind: see Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, at pp. 513-20. It does not follow from this, however, that those who, through the voluntary consumption of alcohol or drugs incapacitate themselves from knowing what they are doing, fall within the category of the "morally innocent" deserving of such protection. This is not to say that such persons do not have a right under ss. 7 or 12 of the Charter to be protected against punishment that is disproportionate to their crime and degree of culpability: see Re B.C. Motor Vehicle Act, supra, at pp. 532-34; R. v. Smith (Edward Dewey), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1045. They do, especially if the consequences of their becoming intoxicated were not intended or foreseen.

The real concern over the substituted form of mens rea arises, it seems to me, under s. 11(d) of the Charter. While this Court has recognized that in some cases proof of an essential element of a criminal offence can be replaced by proof of a different element, it has placed stringent limitations on when this can happen. In Vaillancourt, supra, Lamer J. said at p. 656:

jury uniquement parce qu'elle ne peut soulever de doute raisonnable quant à la culpabilité de l'accusé. Il ne s'agit pas d'un cas où on a recours à l'intoxication volontaire à titre de substitut de la mens rea relativement à l'utilisation intentionnelle à la force.

J'estime qu'il n'est pas strictement nécessaire en l'espèce d'examiner la constitutionnalité de la substitution de l'intoxication volontaire à titre de mens rea relativement aux exigences minimales en matière de mens rea pour les infractions d'intention générale. Cette question ne se posera, à mon avis, que dans les rares cas où l'intoxication est si extrême que cela soulève des doutes quant à l'existence de l'intention minimale qui caractérise un comportement conscient et volontaire. Toutefois, comme le Juge en chef et le juge McIntyre se sont penchés sur cette question, je vais exposer l'état de ma réflexion actuelle à cet égard.

Cette Cour a affirmé qu'il était fondamental qu'une personne ne puisse pas être privée de sa liberté sans que le ministère public ait prouvé l'existence d'un état d'esprit blâmable ou coupable: voir Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., précité, aux pp. 513 à 520. Toutefois il ne s'ensuit pas que ceux qui se mettent dans l'incapacité de savoir ce qu'ils font à cause de leur consommation volontaire d'alcool ou de drogues, tombent dans la catégorie des gens «moralement innocents» qui méritent une telle protection. Ceci ne veut pas dire que ces personnes n'ont pas le droit en vertu des art. 7 ou 12 de la Charte d'être protégés contre des peines disproportionnées par rapport à leur crime et à leur degré de culpabilité: voir Renvoi: Motor Vehicle Act de la C.-B., précité, aux pp. 532 à 534; R. c. Smith (Edward Dewey), [1987] 1 R.C.S. 1045. Elles le sont en particulier si les conséquences de leur ivresse n'étaient ni voulues ni prévisibles.

La véritable difficulté que pose la substitution d'un autre élément à la mens rea, me semble-t-il, découle de l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Bien que cette Cour ait reconnu que, dans certains cas, la preuve d'un élément essentiel d'une infraction criminelle puisse être remplacée par la preuve d'un élément différent, elle a placé des limites très strictes aux cas où cela peut se produire. Dans l'arrêt Vaillancourt, précité, le juge Lamer dit, à la p. 656:

Finally, the legislature, rather than simply eliminating any need to prove the essential element, may substitute proof of a different element. In my view, this will be constitutionally valid only if upon proof beyond reasonable doubt of the substituted element it would be unreasonable for the trier of fact not to be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt of the existence of the essential element. If the trier of fact may have a reasonable doubt as to the essential element notwithstanding proof beyond a reasonable doubt of the substituted element, then the substitution infringes ss. 7 and 11(d).

Enfin, au lieu d'éliminer simplement la nécessité de faire la preuve d'un élément essentiel, le législateur peut remplacer cela par la preuve d'un élément différent. À mon sens, cela ne sera constitutionnel que si après que l'on a prouvé hors de tout doute raisonnable l'existence de l'élément ainsi substitué, il serait déraisonnable que le juge des faits ne soit pas convaincu hors de tout doute raisonnable de l'existence de l'élément essentiel. Si le juge des faits peut avoir un doute raisonnable quant à l'élément essentiel malgré la preuve hors de tout doute raisonnable qui a été faite de l'existence de l'élément substitué, alors la substitution contrevient à l'art. 7 et à l'al. 11*d*).

In Whyte, supra, the Chief Justice approved the above statement at pp. 18-19 and added:

Dans l'arrêt Whyte, précité, le Juge en chef a approuvé la déclaration susmentionnée aux pp. 18 et 19:

In the passage from Vaillancourt quoted earlier, Lamer J. recognized that in some cases substituting proof of one element for proof of an essential element will not infringe the presumption of innocence if, upon proof of the substituted element, it would be unreasonable for the trier of fact not to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt of the existence of the essential element. This is another way of saying that a statutory presumption infringes the presumption of innocence if it requires the trier of fact to convict in spite of a reasonable doubt. Only if the existence of the substituted fact leads inexorably to the conclusion that the essential element exists, with no other reasonable possibilities, will the statutory presumption be constitutionally valid.

Dans le passage de l'arrêt Vaillancourt cité précédemment, le juge Lamer reconnaît que, dans certains cas, substituer la preuve d'un élément à la preuve d'un élément essentiel ne portera pas atteinte à la présomption d'innocence si, après qu'on a prouvé l'existence de l'élément substitué, il était déraisonnable que le juge des faits ne soit pas convaincu hors de tout doute raisonnable de l'existence de l'élément essentiel. Il s'agit d'une autre façon de dire que la présomption légale porte atteinte à la présomption d'innocence si elle oblige le juge des faits à prononcer une déclaration de culpabilité malgré l'existence d'un doute raisonnable. La présomption légale ne sera constitutionnelle que si l'existence du fait substitué entraîne inexorablement la conclusion que l'élément essentiel existe, sans aucune autre possibilité raisonnable.

In my tentative view, it is unlikely that in those cases in which it is necessary to resort to self-induced intoxication as the substituted element for the minimal intent, proof of the substituted element will "inexorably" lead to the conclusion that the essential element of the minimal intent existed at the time the criminal act was committed. But I prefer to leave this question open as it is unnecessary to decide it in order to dispose of this appeal.

Mon point de vue actuel me porte à dire qu'il est improbable que dans les affaires où il est nécessaire de recourir à l'intoxication volontaire comme élément substitué à l'intention minimale, la preuve de l'élément substitué entraîne «inexorablement» la conclusion que l'élément essentiel, soit l'intention minimale, existait au moment de la perpétration de l'acte criminel. Je préfère donc laisser cette question en suspens puisqu'il n'est pas nécessaire de la trancher afin de statuer sur ce pourvoi.

I agree with my colleagues McIntyre and La Forest JJ. that, had there been error in the court below, no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice resulted from it and that it would accordingly be appropriate to apply s. 613(1)(b)(iii) of the Criminal Code. I would dismiss the appeal.

Je suis d'accord avec mes collègues les juges McIntyre et La Forest pour dire que, si le tribunal d'instance inférieure avait commis une erreur, elle n'aurait entraîné aucun tort important ni erreur judiciaire grave et, par conséquent, il aurait été approprié d'appliquer le sous-al. 613(1)b)(iii) du Code criminel. Je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

The following are the reasons delivered by

LA FOREST J.—I have had the advantage of reading the opinions prepared by the Chief Justice and Justice McIntyre. The requirement of mens rea in truly criminal offences is, as the Chief Justice has demonstrated, so fundamental that it cannot, since the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, be removed on the basis of judicially-developed policy. It would be anomalous if the courts could infringe such a fundamental right on the basis of such policies when not demonstrated to be essential, while any attempt by Parliament to do so would be subjected to searching scrutiny under s. 1 as established by this Court.

In my dissenting reasons in R. v. Landry, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 145, at p. 187, I set forth my views regarding the general issue posed here. I there observed that in the changed constitutional environment brought about by the Charter, if incursions are to be made upon fundamental legal values, it is for Parliament to do so, not the courts. It is the duty of Parliament to respond to the challenge of criminal activities. While the courts must sensitively consider actions taken by Parliament for the protection of the public generally, they must be forever diligent to prevent undue intrusions on our liberty. The courts are the protectors of our rights. It does not sit well for them to make rules intruding on fundamental rights even when this may appear to them to be desirable in a properly balanced system of criminal justice. That is Parliament's work. I added, at p. 189 of Landry:

> If Parliament in its wisdom finds it necessary to adjust the balance, it can do so. It is in a better position to provide for the precise balance and has a far better access to the knowledge required to achieve that balance than the courts. The courts can then perform their duty of scrutinizing Parliament's laws both in their general tenor and in their particular application to safeguard our traditional values.

Established common law rules should not, it is true, lightly be assumed to violate the Charter. As a repository of our traditional values they may, in fact, assist in defining its norms. But when a

Version française des motifs rendus par

LE JUGE LA FOREST—J'ai eu l'avantage de lire les motifs préparés par le Juge en chef et par le juge McIntyre. Comme le Juge en chef l'a établi, l'exigence de la mens rea dans les infractions véritablement criminelles est tellement fondamentale qu'on ne peut la supprimer, depuis l'avènement de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, sur la base d'une politique de droit prétorien. Il serait anormal que les tribunaux puissent porter atteinte à un tel droit fondamental en s'appuyant sur ces politiques dont le caractère essentiel n'a pas été démontré, alors que toute tentative du législateur de le faire serait passée au crible de l'article premier, ainsi que cette Cour l'a établi.

Dans mes motifs de dissidence dans l'arrêt R. c. Landry, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 145, à la p. 187, j'ai exposé mon point de vue sur la question générale soulevée en l'espèce. J'y ai souligné que, dans l'environnement constitutionnel nouveau établi par la Charte, si on doit porter atteinte aux valeurs juridiques fondamentales, il appartient au législateur de le faire et non aux tribunaux. Il incombe au législateur de relever le défi que causent les activités criminelles. Bien que les tribunaux doivent être sensibles à ce que fait le législateur pour protéger le public en général, ils doivent toujours veiller à empêcher les atteintes indues à notre liberté. Les tribunaux sont les protecteurs de nos droits. Il n'est pas de leur ressort d'adopter des règles qui portent atteinte aux droits fondamentaux même si elles leur semblent souhaitables dans un système équilibré de justice criminelle. C'est le travail du législateur. J'ajoute dans l'affaire Landry, à la p. 189:

> Si dans sa sagesse le législateur estime nécessaire de modifier cet équilibre, il peut le faire. Il est plus en mesure que les tribunaux de réaliser cet équilibre précis et il a plus facilement accès aux connaissances nécessaires pour y arriver. Les tribunaux pourront ensuite remplir leur rôle d'examiner les lois du législateur tant dans leur portée générale que dans leur application particulière pour préserver nos valeurs traditionnelles.

Il est vrai qu'on ne doit pas présumer à la légère que des règles de common law établies enfreignent la Charte. En tant que dépositaires de nos valeurs traditionnelles, elles peuvent faciliter la définition common law rule is found to infringe upon a right or freedom guaranteed by the Charter, it must be justified in the same way as legislative rules. No adequate justification was made here.

Accordingly, I am in general agreement with the law as stated by the Chief Justice. However, I agree with McIntyre J. that on the particular facts of this case no substantial wrong or miscarriage of justice has occurred and it is, therefore, a proper case to apply s. 613(1)(b)(iii) of the Criminal Code. For this reason, I would dispose of the case in the manner proposed by McIntyre J.

de ses normes. Mais lorsqu'on conclut qu'une règle de common law enfreint un droit ou une liberté garanti par la Charte, elle doit être justifiée de la même façon qu'une règle législative. Or, il n'existe aucune justification adéquate en l'espèce.

Par conséquent, je suis en accord général avec la façon dont le Juge en chef a énoncé le droit. Toutefois je conclus comme le juge McIntyre que, compte tenu des faits particuliers de l'espèce, il n'y a pas eu de tort important ni d'erreur judiciaire grave et qu'il s'agit donc d'une affaire où l'on peut appliquer le sous-al. 613(1)b)(iii) du Code criminel. Pour ce motif, je suis d'avis de trancher l'affaire comme le propose le juge McIntyre.

D was involved in a motor vehicle incident, following which he was asked to submit to breathalyzer tests. The instrument registered 99 and 97 mg of alcohol per 100 mL of blood. D was charged with impaired driving and driving with a blood alcohol level over the legal limit of 80 mg of alcohol in 100 mL of blood.

D a été impliqué dans un accident automobile après lequel on lui a demandé de se soumettre à des alcootests qui ont révélé des taux de 99 et 97 mg d'alcool par 100 ml de sang. D a été inculpé de conduite avec facultés affaiblies et de conduite avec une alcoolémie supérieure à la limite légale de 80 mg d'alcool par 100 ml de sang.

At the beginning of D's trial, counsel for D advised the judge that he intended to tender a toxicology report in order to challenge the accuracy of the breathalyzer test results — what is known as a Carter defence. Crown counsel wished to cross-examine the toxicologist on his report, but the latter was not present and the trial was accordingly adjourned. Following the adjournment but prior to the resumption of D's trial, amendments to the Criminal Code were enacted, the effect of which is to eliminate the Carter defence as an independent means to raise a doubt about the reliability of breathalyzer test results.

Au début du procès de D, l'avocat de ce dernier a informé le juge qu'il comptait produire le rapport d'un toxicologue pour contester l'exactitude des résultats de l'alcootest — ce qu'on appelle une défense de type Carter. L'avocat du ministère public souhaitait contre-interroger le toxicologue au sujet de son rapport, mais ce dernier était absent. Le procès a donc été ajourné. Après l'ajournement, mais avant la reprise du procès de D, des modifications au Code criminel ont été adoptées, ce qui a eu pour effet d'éliminer la défense de type Carter comme moyen indépendant pour soulever un doute raisonnable quant à la fiabilité des résultats de l'alcootest.

The trial judge accepted the Carter defence adduced by D and entered an acquittal. The summary conviction appeal judge upheld that decision concluding that the new legislative provisions virtually eliminated the Carter defence, that they were substantive in nature and not procedural, and that they therefore applied only prospectively. The Court of Appeal reversed that decision and held that the new legislative provisions were merely evidentiary and that they therefore applied to the case. A new trial was ordered to proceed on the basis of s. 258(1) of the Criminal Code as amended.

Le juge du procès a conclu à la recevabilité de la défense de type Carter présentée par D et a acquitté ce dernier. Le juge de la cour d'appel des poursuites sommaires a maintenu cette décision, concluant que les nouvelles dispositions législatives avaient pratiquement supprimé la défense de type Carter, qu'elles étaient des dispositions substantielles et non procédurales, et qu'elles ne s'appliquaient donc que pour l'avenir. La Cour d'appel a infirmé cette décision et conclu que les nouvelles dispositions législatives portaient simplement sur la preuve et qu'elles s'appliquaient par conséquent au cas à l'étude. La tenue d'un nouveau procès sur le fondement du par. 258(1) du Code criminel tel que modifié a été ordonnée.

Held (McLachlin C.J. and Rothstein and Cromwell JJ. dissenting): The appeal should be allowed and the acquittal restored.

Arrêt (la juge en chef McLachlin et les juges Rothstein et Cromwell sont dissidents) : Le pourvoi est accueilli et l'acquittement est rétabli.

Per LeBel, Deschamps, Fish and Abella JJ.: Courts have long recognized that the cases in which legislation has retrospective effect must be exceptional. More specifically, where new legislative provisions affect either vested or substantive rights, retrospectivity has been found to be undesirable. The key task in determining the temporal application of new legislative provisions lies not in labelling the provisions "procedural"

Les juges LeBel, Deschamps, Fish et Abella : Les tribunaux reconnaissent depuis longtemps le caractère exceptionnel des mesures législatives applicables rétrospectivement. Plus précisément, ils ont jugé indésirable l'application rétrospective de nouvelles dispositions législatives portant atteinte à des droits acquis ou substantiels. La tâche qui s'impose pour statuer sur l'application dans le temps des nouvelles dispositions or "substantive", but in discerning whether they affect substantive rights.

The fact that new legislation has an effect on the content or existence of a defence, as opposed to affecting only the manner in which it is presented, is an indication that substantive rights are affected. As a result of the amendments to the Criminal Code and the decision in R. v. St-Onge Lamoureux, 2012 SCC 57, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 187, the only evidence that can be tendered to raise a reasonable doubt about the reliability of breathalyzer test results is now evidence that the instrument was malfunctioning or was operated improperly. The Carter defence has been eliminated as an independent means to raise a reasonable doubt about the reliability of breathalyzer test results. This illustrates that the amendments to the Criminal Code are not merely procedural; they affect a defence open to an accused and are therefore subject to the presumption against the retrospective application of new legislation.

The broad scheme put in place by Parliament is based on presumptions that the results of the breathalyzer analyses are accurate and that they are identical to the blood alcohol level of the accused at the time of the alleged offence. As discussed in St-Onge Lamoureux, these statutory presumptions infringe the constitutionally protected right to be presumed innocent. The conclusion that the infringement is justified in the context of the new legislation does not alter the fact that constitutional rights are affected. This is a further indication that the new legislation affects substantive rights, since constitutional rights are necessarily substantive. When constitutional rights are affected, the general rule against the retrospective application of legislation should apply.

Finally, where the former legislation does not contemplate the gathering of evidence that is required by the new legislation, the new legislation can only be prospective.

Per McLachlin C.J. and Rothstein and Cromwell JJ. (dissenting): There are three principles of statutory interpretation that are potentially relevant to the issue of when new legislative provisions apply. One principle is that the legislature is presumed not to intend legislation to change the legal character or consequences of législatives consiste non pas à les qualifier de « dispositions procédurales » ou de « dispositions substantielles », mais à déterminer si elles portent atteinte à des droits substantiels.

Le fait qu'une nouvelle mesure législative influe sur le contenu ou sur l'existence d'un moyen de défense, plutôt qu'uniquement sur sa présentation, indique que des droits substantiels sont en jeu. Étant donné les modifications apportées au Code criminel et l'arrêt R. v. St-Onge Lamoureux, 2012 CSC 57, [2012] 3 R.C.S. 187, la seule preuve pouvant être produite pour soulever un doute raisonnable quant à la fiabilité des résultats de l'alcootest se limite désormais à celle du mauvais fonctionnement ou de l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest. La défense de type Carter a été supprimée comme moyen de défense susceptible de soulever, à lui seul, un doute raisonnable quant à la fiabilité des résultats de l'analyse. Cela indique que les modifications au Code criminel ne sont pas simplement de nature procédurale; elles ont une incidence sur un moyen de défense dont dispose l'accusé et sont, par le fait même, assujetties à la présomption de non-rétrospectivité des nouvelles mesures législatives.

Le régime général instauré par le législateur repose sur des présomptions voulant que les résultats des analyses soient exacts et correspondent à l'alcoolémie de l'accusé au moment où l'infraction reprochée aurait été commise. Comme l'illustre l'arrêt St-Onge Lamoureux, ces présomptions légales portent atteinte à la présomption d'innocence garantie par la Constitution. La conclusion selon laquelle l'atteinte est justifiée sous le régime des nouvelles mesures législatives ne change rien au fait qu'il a été porté atteinte à des droits constitutionnels. Il s'agit d'une indication supplémentaire que les nouvelles mesures législatives portent atteinte à des droits substantiels puisque les droits constitutionnels sont forcément de nature substantielle. La règle générale interdisant l'application rétrospective des mesures législatives devrait s'appliquer en cas d'atteinte à des droits constitutionnels.

Finalement, dans les cas où l'ancienne mesure législative n'envisage pas la collecte d'éléments de preuve devenue nécessaire en raison de la nouvelle mesure législative, celle-ci ne peut s'appliquer que pour l'avenir.

La juge en chef McLachlin et les juges Rothstein et Cromwell (dissidents) : Trois principes d'interprétation des lois peuvent être pertinents pour déterminer dans quels cas s'appliquent de nouvelles dispositions législatives. Selon le premier d'entre eux, le législateur est présumé ne pas souhaiter que la loi modifie la nature actions that occurred before its enactment. Another is that the legislature is presumed not to intend to interfere with vested rights. A third is that the legislature intends an enactment dealing with exclusively procedural matters, including matters of evidence, to apply immediately to all proceedings, whether commenced before or after the enactment comes into force. The principal question in this case is whether the new legislative provisions at issue are procedural or substantive.

ou les conséquences juridiques des actes commis avant son adoption. Selon le deuxième principe, le législateur est présumé ne pas avoir l'intention de porter atteinte à des droits acquis. Selon le troisième, le législateur souhaite qu'un texte portant exclusivement sur des questions de procédure, y compris de preuve, s'applique immédiatement à toutes les instances, que celles-ci aient été engagées avant ou après l'entrée en vigueur du texte. La principale question en litige en l'espèce est celle de savoir si les nouvelles dispositions législatives en cause sont de nature procédurale ou substantielle.

The new legislative provisions in issue meet all of the tests enunciated in the Court's jurisprudence for determining whether a provision is procedural and they have none of the characteristics of provisions which are properly characterized as substantive. The provisions deal with factual presumptions and what is required to rebut them, and their operation is dependent on the existence of litigation. Evidentiary provisions like these are ordinarily considered to be procedural. Moreover, the provisions have none of the hallmarks of substantive provisions. They do not attach new consequences to past acts or change the substantive content of a defence, nor do they change the existence or content of a right. The elements of the offence have not changed and it remains open to the accused to point to evidence raising a reasonable doubt about the existence of those elements. The provisions do not make conduct unlawful that was lawful at the time it occurred. In addition, the fact that a provision is found to limit an accused's right to be presumed innocent under s. 11(d) of the Charter does not support the conclusion that the provision is substantive.

Les nouvelles dispositions législatives en cause satisfont à tous les critères énoncés par la Cour dans sa jurisprudence pour établir qu'une disposition est de nature procédurale, et elles n'ont aucune des caractéristiques des dispositions considérées à juste titre comme relevant du fond. Les dispositions traitent de présomptions de fait et des éléments de preuve nécessaires pour les réfuter, et elles ne sont pertinentes que s'il y a bel et bien un litige. Les dispositions relatives à la preuve comme celles en cause en l'espèce sont habituellement considérées de nature procédurale. Qui plus est, ces dispositions n'ont aucune des caractéristiques des dispositions de fond. Elles ne confèrent pas de conséquences nouvelles à des actes antérieurs, ni ne modifient le contenu substantiel d'un moyen de défense. Elles n'influent pas non plus sur l'existence ou sur le contenu d'un droit. Les éléments de l'infraction n'ont pas changé et il demeure loisible à l'accusé de présenter une preuve soulevant un doute raisonnable quant à l'existence de ces éléments. Les dispositions n'interdisent pas une conduite qui était légale au moment où elle est survenue. En outre, le fait que la disposition limite le droit de l'accusé d'être présumé innocent protégé par l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte ne soutient pas la conclusion que la disposition en est une de fond.

The new provisions do not eliminate or neuter a defence. The so-called "Carter defence" in reality is a particular type of evidence adduced in order to raise a reasonable doubt. If these provisions are characterized as taking away a defence, then any evidentiary provision that increases the risk of conviction would have to be so characterized. The jurisprudence of this Court makes clear that this is not the case.

Les nouvelles dispositions n'éliminent pas de moyen de défense, elles n'en neutralisent pas non plus. Ce que l'on appelle la « défense de type Carter » est en fait un type particulier de preuve présentée afin de soulever un doute raisonnable. Si l'on considère que ces dispositions écartent un moyen de défense, il faudrait alors considérer que toute disposition relative à la preuve qui augmente le risque de condamnation a le même effet. La jurisprudence de la Cour indique clairement qu'il n'en est rien.

The new provisions accordingly relate only to the rules of evidence which apply at trial and they are therefore purely procedural. As such, these new provisions are subject to the presumption of immediate application, and there is nothing to rebut this presumption.

Ainsi, les nouvelles dispositions ne concernent que les règles de preuve applicables lors d'un procès et elles sont donc purement procédurales. Cela étant, elles sont présumées s'appliquer immédiatement, et rien ne réfute cette présomption.

[1] LA JUGE DESCHAMPS — Le présent pourvoi soulève la question de savoir si certaines

2012 SCC 58 (CanLII)

Violent Crime Act, S.C. 2008, c. 6 ("Amendments"), which amended the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, operate retrospectively.

[2] As I explain in greater detail in my reasons in R. v. St-Onge Lamoureux, 2012 SCC 57, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 187, a case heard concurrently with the case at bar, the Amendments limit the evidence an accused can adduce to raise doubt about the reliability of breathalyzer test results obtained using an approved instrument. The objective of the Amendments, which form part of a broader scheme implemented by Parliament to reduce the incidence of impaired driving, is to give those results a weight consistent with their scientific value (St-Onge Lamoureux, at paras. 29 and 31). In order to rebut the presumptions of accuracy and identity applicable to breathalyzer test results, which favour the Crown, an accused can no longer simply rely on an expert opinion that the amount of alcohol he or she consumed is inconsistent with the test results — what is known as the "Carter defence" (R. v. Carter (1985), 19 C.C.C. (3d) 174 (Ont. C.A.)).

[3] There are no transitional provisions that provide express guidance as to whether the Amendments apply retrospectively, that is, to conduct which occurred before the Amendments came into force. Resort must be had to general principles and to the effect of the Amendments. For the reasons that follow, I conclude that the Amendments do not apply retrospectively. I would allow the appeal and restore the acquittal entered at trial.

I. Facts and Judicial History

[4] On July 22, 2007, a vehicle driven by the appellant, Samuel Dineley, struck a parked vehicle. He was asked to submit to breathalyzer tests. The instrument registered 99 and 97 mg of alcohol per 100 mL of blood. He was charged with impaired driving and driving with a blood alcohol level over the legal limit of 80 mg of alcohol in 100 mL of blood.

dispositions de la Loi sur la lutte contre les crimes violents, L.C. 2008, ch. 6 (les « modifications »), qui ont modifié le Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-46, s'appliquent rétrospectivement.

[2] Comme je l'explique plus en détail dans R. c. St-Onge Lamoureux, 2012 CSC 57, [2012] 3 R.C.S. 187, une affaire entendue en même temps que la présente espèce, les modifications limitent les éléments de preuve que l'accusé peut produire pour mettre en doute la fiabilité des résultats obtenus par l'utilisation d'un alcootest approuvé. Les modifications, qui s'inscrivent dans un régime plus large mis en place par le législateur pour réduire la fréquence de la conduite avec facultés affaiblies, ont pour objet d'attribuer à ces résultats un poids correspondant à leur valeur scientifique (St-Onge Lamoureux, par. 29 et 31). Pour réfuter les présomptions d'exactitude et d'identité dont jouit le ministère public à l'égard des résultats de l'alcootest, l'accusé ne peut plus se fonder simplement sur l'avis d'un expert selon lequel la quantité d'alcool qu'il a consommé est incompatible avec les résultats de l'analyse, ce que l'on appelle la « défense de type Carter » (R. c. Carter (1985), 19 C.C.C. (3d) 174 (C.A. Ont.)).

[3] Il n'y a aucune disposition transitoire indiquant expressément si les modifications s'appliquent rétrospectivement, c'est-à-dire aux actes commis avant leur entrée en vigueur. Il faut donc s'en remettre aux principes généraux et à l'effet des modifications. Pour les motifs exposés ci-après, je conclus que les modifications ne s'appliquent pas rétrospectivement. Je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi et de rétablir l'acquittement prononcé au procès.

I. Faits et historique judiciaire

[4] Le 22 juillet 2007, le véhicule conduit par l'appelant, Samuel Dineley, est entré en collision avec un véhicule stationné. On lui a demandé de se soumettre à des alcootests. Les résultats de ces alcootests ont révélé des taux de 99 et 97 mg d'alcool par 100 ml de sang. Il a été inculpé de conduite avec facultés affaiblies et de conduite avec une alcoolémie supérieure à la limite légale de 80 mg d'alcool par 100 ml de sang.

2012 SCC 58 (CanLII)

[5] At the beginning of the trial, on June 19, 2008, counsel for Mr. Dineley advised the judge that he would not be able to complete the case for the defence that day. He intended to tender a toxicology report in support of a Carter defence in order to challenge the accuracy of the breathalyzer test results; Crown counsel had asked to cross-examine the toxicologist on his report, but the latter was not present. The hearing started that day on the common understanding that the case for the defence would be continued on July 15, 2008 to enable the Crown to cross-examine the toxicologist. Both Crown and defence counsel were or ought to have been aware that the Amendments would come into force on July 2, 2008. Section 258(1)(c) of the Criminal Code, as amended by the Amendments, establishes a presumption of accuracy of breathalyzer test results and a presumption of identity of those results with the blood alcohol level of the accused at the time of the alleged offence. Under s. 258(1)(c), these presumptions will now be rebutted only if the accused leads evidence tending to show that the instrument malfunctioned or was improperly operated. The effect of that provision, together with s. 258(1)(d.01), is to eliminate the Carter defence as an independent means to raise a reasonable doubt about the reliability of breathalyzer test results.

[6] The trial judge did not allow the Crown to argue that the Amendments applied to preclude a Carter defence. In his opinion, it was improper for the Crown to obtain an adjournment for purposes of cross-examining the toxicologist and then invoke the Amendments which came into force in the interim without having first warned defence counsel that it intended to do so. He accepted the Carter defence and acquitted Mr. Dineley.

[7] The summary conviction appeal judge held that it was not improper for the Crown to raise the issue of the applicability of the Amendments. However, he was of the view that the Amendments virtually eliminated the Carter defence, that they were

[5] Au début du procès, le 19 juin 2008, l'avocat de M. Dineley a informé le juge qu'il ne serait pas en mesure d'achever la présentation de la défense ce jour-là. Il comptait produire le rapport d'un toxicologue à l'appui d'une défense de type Carter pour contester l'exactitude des résultats de l'alcootest; l'avocat du ministère public avait pour sa part demandé de contre-interroger le toxicologue au sujet de son rapport, mais ce dernier était absent. Ce jour-là, toutes les parties ont convenu que la présentation de la défense se poursuivrait le 15 juillet 2008 pour permettre au ministère public de procéder à ce contre-interrogatoire. Tant l'avocat du ministère public que celui de la défense savaient ou auraient dû savoir que les modifications entreraient en vigueur le 2 juillet 2008. L'alinéa 258(1)c) du Code criminel, tel qu'il a été modifié par les modifications, crée une présomption d'exactitude des résultats de l'alcootest et une présomption voulant que ces résultats correspondent à l'alcoolémie de l'accusé au moment où l'infraction reprochée aurait été commise. Selon l'al. 258(1)c), ces présomptions ne peuvent être réfutées que si l'accusé présente des éléments de preuve tendant à démontrer le mauvais fonctionnement ou l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest. Cette disposition, combinée à l'al. 258(1)d.01), élimine la défense de type Carter comme moyen indépendant pour soulever un doute raisonnable quant à la fiabilité des résultats de l'alcootest.

[6] Le juge du procès n'a pas autorisé le ministère public à soutenir que l'application des modifications faisait obstacle à une défense de type Carter. Il lui semblait inapproprié que le ministère public demande un ajournement pour contre-interroger le toxicologue et invoque ensuite les modifications qui sont entrées en vigueur dans l'intervalle sans avoir prévenu au préalable l'avocat de la défense que telle était son intention. Il a jugé recevable la défense de type Carter et acquitté M. Dineley.

[7] Le juge de la cour d'appel des poursuites sommaires a estimé qu'il n'était pas inapproprié que le ministère public ait soulevé la question de l'applicabilité des modifications. Toutefois, il s'est dit d'avis que ces dernières avaient pratiquement supprimé la substantive in nature and not procedural, and that they therefore applied only prospectively.

[8] The Court of Appeal reversed that decision. It held that the Amendments were merely evidentiary and that they therefore applied to the case. According to MacPherson J.A., writing for the court, the Carter defence had not been eliminated: it had been changed, but survived in a different form (2009 ONCA 814, 98 O.R. (3d) 81, at para. 26). The court ordered a new trial to proceed on the basis of s. 258(1) of the Criminal Code as amended.

II. Analysis

[9] Whether the Amendments apply retrospectively has been a hotly contested issue. As MacPherson J.A. mentioned in the instant case, a large number of provincial and superior court judges across the country have expressed conflicting opinions in this regard.

[10] There are a number of rules of interpretation that can be helpful in identifying the situations to which new legislation applies. Because of the need for certainty as to the legal consequences that attach to past facts and conduct, courts have long recognized that the cases in which legislation has retrospective effect must be exceptional. More specifically, where legislative provisions affect either vested or substantive rights, retrospectivity has been found to be undesirable. New legislation that affects substantive rights will be presumed to have only prospective effect unless it is possible to discern a clear legislative intent that it is to apply retrospectively (Angus v. Sun Alliance Insurance Co., [1988] 2 S.C.R. 256, at pp. 266-67; Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code (Re), 2004 SCC 42, [2004] 2 S.C.R. 248, at para. 57; Wildman v. The Queen, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 311, at pp. 331-32). However, new procedural legislation designed to govern only the manner in which rights are asserted or enforced does not affect the défense de type Carter, qu'elles étaient des dispositions substantielles et non procédurales, et qu'elles ne s'appliquaient donc que pour l'avenir.

[8] La Cour d'appel a infirmé cette décision. Elle a jugé que les modifications portaient simplement sur la preuve et qu'elles s'appliquaient par conséquent au cas à l'étude. S'exprimant au nom de la cour, le juge MacPherson a dit être d'avis que la défense de type Carter n'avait pas été supprimée : elle avait été modifiée, mais elle continuait d'exister sous une forme différente (2009 ONCA 814, 98 O.R. (3d) 81, par. 26). La Cour d'appel a ordonné la tenue d'un nouveau procès sur le fondement du par. 258(1) du Code criminel tel que modifié.

II. Analyse

[9] L'application rétrospective des modifications en cause est une question très controversée. Comme le juge MacPherson l'a affirmé en l'espèce, de nombreux juges des cours provinciales et des cours supérieures dans tout le pays ont exprimé des opinions contradictoires à cet égard.

[10] Plusieurs règles d'interprétation peuvent aider à circonscrire les cas où une nouvelle mesure législative trouve application. Vu le besoin d'assurer la certitude des conséquences juridiques découlant des faits et des actes antérieurs, les tribunaux reconnaissent depuis longtemps le caractère exceptionnel des mesures législatives applicables rétrospectivement. Plus précisément, ils ont jugé indésirable l'application rétrospective de dispositions législatives portant atteinte à des droits acquis ou substantiels. Ainsi, une nouvelle mesure législative qui porte atteinte à de tels droits est présumée n'avoir d'effet que pour l'avenir, à moins qu'il soit possible de discerner une intention claire du législateur qu'elle s'applique rétrospectivement (Angus c. Sun Alliance Compagnie d'assurance, [1988] 2 R.C.S. 256, p. 266-267; Demande fondée sur l'art. 83.28 du Code criminel (Re), 2004 CSC 42, [2004] 2 R.C.S. 248, par. 57; Wildman c. La Reine, [1984] 2 R.C.S. 311, p. 331-332). Les nouvelles dispositions procédurales destinées à ne régir que la substance of those rights. Such legislation is presumed to apply immediately to both pending and future cases (Application under s. 83.28 of the Criminal Code (Re), at paras. 57 and 62; Wildman, at p. 331).

manière utilisée pour établir ou faire respecter un droit n'ont pour leur part pas d'incidence sur le fond de ces droits. De telles mesures sont présumées s'appliquer immédiatement, à la fois aux instances en cours et aux instances à venir (Demande fondée sur l'art. 83.28 du Code criminel (Re), par. 57 et 62; Wildman, p. 331).

[11] Not all provisions dealing with procedure will have retrospective effect. Procedural provisions may, in their application, affect substantive rights. If they do, they are not purely procedural and do not apply immediately (P.-A. Côté, in collaboration with S. Beaulac and M. Devinat, The Interpretation of Legislation in Canada (4th ed. 2011), at p. 191). Thus, the key task in determining the temporal application of the Amendments at issue in the instant case lies not in labelling the provisions "procedural" or "substantive", but in discerning whether they affect substantive rights.

[11] Ce ne sont pas toutes les dispositions procédurales qui s'appliquent rétrospectivement. Certaines peuvent, dans leur application, porter atteinte à des droits substantiels. De telles dispositions ne sont pas purement procédurales et ne s'appliquent pas immédiatement (P.-A. Côté, avec la collaboration de S. Beaulac et M. Devinat, Interprétation des lois (4e éd. 2009, p. 208). Par conséquent, la tâche qui s'impose pour statuer sur l'application dans le temps des modifications en cause consiste non pas à qualifier les dispositions de « dispositions procédurales » ou de « dispositions substantielles », mais à déterminer si elles portent atteinte à des droits substantiels.

[12] Moreover, a further factor may be relevant to the determination of whether the Amendments apply retrospectively. It is whether they require evidence that the accused had no reason to gather under the former legislation.

[12] Un autre facteur peut être pertinent pour décider de l'application rétrospective ou non des modifications : il s'agit de la question de savoir si elles commandent la présentation d'éléments de preuve que l'accusé n'avait aucune raison de réunir sous le régime de l'ancienne mesure législative.

[13] It will be helpful to reproduce the relevant portions of the Amendments, which came into force while Mr. Dineley's trial was under way:

258. (1) In any proceedings under subsection 255(1) in respect of an offence committed under section 253 or subsection 254(5) or in any proceedings under any of subsections 255(2) to (3.2),

(c) where samples of the breath of the accused have been taken pursuant to a demand made under subsection 254(3), if [list of conditions to be met], evidence of the results of the analyses so made is conclusive proof that the concentration of alcohol in the accused's blood both at the time when the analyses were made and at the time when the offence

[13] Il convient de reproduire les parties pertinentes des modifications, qui sont entrées en vigueur durant le procès de M. Dineley :

258. (1) Dans des poursuites engagées en vertu du paragraphe 255(1) à l'égard d'une infraction prévue à l'article 253 ou au paragraphe 254(5) ou dans des poursuites engagées en vertu de l'un des paragraphes 255(2) à (3.2) :

c) lorsque des échantillons de l'haleine de l'accusé ont été prélevés conformément à un ordre donné en vertu du paragraphe 254(3), [conditions préalables à remplir]

la preuve des résultats des analyses fait foi de façon concluante, en l'absence de toute preuve tendant à démontrer à la fois que les résultats des analyses montrant une alcoolémie supérieure à quatre-vingts

was alleged to have been committed was, if the results of the analyses are the same, the concentration determined by the analyses and, if the results of the analyses are different, the lowest of the concentrations determined by the analyses, in the absence of evidence tending to show all of the following three things — that the approved instrument was malfunctioning or was operated improperly, that the malfunction or improper operation resulted in the determination that the concentration of alcohol in the accused's blood exceeded 80 mg of alcohol in 100 mL of blood, and that the concentration of alcohol in the accused's blood would not in fact have exceeded 80 mg of alcohol in 100 mL of blood at the time when the offence was alleged to have been committed;

(d.01) for greater certainty, evidence tending to show that an approved instrument was malfunctioning or was operated improperly, or that an analysis of a sample of the accused's blood was performed improperly, does not include evidence of

(i) the amount of alcohol that the accused consumed,

(ii) the rate at which the alcohol that the accused consumed would have been absorbed and eliminated by the accused's body, or

(iii) a calculation based on that evidence of what the concentration of alcohol in the accused's blood would have been at the time when the offence was alleged to have been committed;

(It should be noted that the temporal application of the second presumption of identity provided for in s. 258(1)(d.1) of the Criminal Code is not at issue in this case.)

[14] In St-Onge Lamoureux, I conclude that the first requirement that the approved instrument was malfunctioning or was operated improperly, as set out in s. 258(1)(c) and qualified by s. 258(1)(d.01), infringes the right to be presumed innocent protected by s. 11(d) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but that the infringement is justified under s. 1. I also find in that case that the other two requirements of s. 258(1)(c) — (1) that a causal connection be demonstrated between the malfunctioning or improper operation of the milligrammes d'alcool par cent millilitres de sang découlent du mauvais fonctionnement ou de l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest approuvé et que l'alcoolémie de l'accusé au moment où l'infraction aurait été commise ne dépassait pas quatre-vingts milligrammes d'alcool par cent millilitres de sang, de l'alcoolémie de l'accusé tant au moment des analyses qu'à celui où l'infraction aurait été commise, ce taux correspondant aux résultats de ces analyses, lorsqu'ils sont identiques, ou au plus faible d'entre eux s'ils sont différents, si les conditions suivantes sont réunies :

d.01) il est entendu que ne constituent pas une preuve tendant à démontrer le mauvais fonctionnement ou l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest approuvé ou le fait que les analyses ont été effectuées incorrectement les éléments de preuve portant :

(i) soit sur la quantité d'alcool consommé par l'accusé,

(ii) soit sur le taux d'absorption ou d'élimination de l'alcool par son organisme,

(iii) soit sur le calcul, fondé sur ces éléments de preuve, de ce qu'aurait été son alcoolémie au moment où l'infraction aurait été commise;

(Je note que l'application dans le temps de la deuxième présomption d'identité prévue à l'al. 258(1)d.1) du Code criminel n'est pas en cause dans la présente affaire.)

[14] Dans St-Onge Lamoureux, je conclus que la première exigence énoncée à l'al. 258(1)c) et précisée à l'al. 258(1)d.01) voulant que l'alcootest approuvé ait mal fonctionné ou ait été utilisé incorrectement porte atteinte au droit à la présomption d'innocence garanti par l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, mais que cette atteinte est justifiée au regard de l'article premier. Je conclus également dans cette affaire que les deux autres exigences de l'al. 258(1)c) — (1) la démonstration d'un lien de causalité entre le instrument and the determination that the blood alcohol level of the accused exceeded the legal limit, and (2) that further evidence be submitted to demonstrate that the blood alcohol level of the accused did not exceed the legal limit — unjustifiably infringe s. 11(d) of the Charter. All the other constitutional challenges in that case are rejected. Since only the first requirement of s. 258(1)(c) survives the Court's decision in St-Onge Lamoureux, I will address the Amendments only as they stand following that decision.

[15] Although I will not engage in the impossible task of reconciling all the decisions in which the courts have grappled with whether new legislation affects substantive rights, references to a few cases will be helpful. The following statements of La Forest J. in Angus, at pp. 265-66, are particularly relevant to the issue before us:

> Normally, rules of procedure do not affect the content or existence of an action or defence (or right, obligation, or whatever else is the subject of the legislation), but only the manner of its enforcement or use. . . .
>
> . . .
> Alteration of a "mode" of procedure in the conduct of a defence is a very different thing from the removal of the defence entirely. [Emphasis in original.]

[16] The fact that new legislation has an effect on the content or existence of a defence, as opposed to affecting only the manner in which it is presented, is an indication that substantive rights are affected. I cannot accept the approach adopted by the Court of Appeal in the instant case, according to which legislation that alters the evidentiary content of a defence applies retrospectively (para. 27).

[17] The first question is thus whether, in imposing a new requirement for rebutting the presumptions of accuracy and identity applicable to breathalyzer test results, Parliament has affected mauvais fonctionnement ou l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest et le constat que l'alcoolémie de l'accusé dépasse la limite légale, et (2) la présentation d'éléments de preuve supplémentaires démontrant que l'alcoolémie de l'accusé ne dépassait pas la limite légale — violent de façon injustifiée l'al. 11*d*) de la Charte. Toutes les autres contestations constitutionnelles soulevées dans cette affaire sont rejetées. Puisque seule la première exigence de l'al. 258(1)c) survit à l'arrêt St-Onge Lamoureux de la Cour, je n'examinerai que les modifications telles qu'elles sont à la suite de cet arrêt.

[15] Même si je ne tenterai pas d'accomplir la tâche impossible de faire la synthèse de toute la jurisprudence dans laquelle les tribunaux se sont demandé si une nouvelle mesure législative porte atteinte à des droits substantiels, il est utile de mentionner quelques arrêts. Les propos tenus par le juge La Forest aux p. 265-266 de l'arrêt Angus sont particulièrement pertinents quant à la question dont notre Cour est saisie :

> Normalement, les règles de procédure n'ont pas d'effet sur le contenu ou sur l'existence d'une action ou d'un moyen de défense (ou d'un droit, d'une obligation ou de quelque autre objet de la loi), mais seulement sur la manière de l'appliquer ou de l'utiliser. . .
>
> . . .
> Le changement d'un « mode » de procédure dans la production d'une défense est une chose très différente du retrait complet du moyen de défense. [Souligné dans l'original.]

[16] Le fait qu'une nouvelle mesure législative influe sur le contenu ou sur l'existence d'un moyen de défense, plutôt qu'uniquement sur sa présentation, indique que des droits substantiels sont en jeu. Je ne saurais accepter l'approche adoptée en l'espèce par la Cour d'appel pour qui une mesure législative modifiant le contenu d'un moyen de défense au chapitre de la preuve doit s'appliquer rétrospectivement (par. 27).

[17] La première question est donc de savoir si, en imposant une nouvelle exigence à satisfaire pour réfuter les présomptions d'exactitude et d'identité applicables aux résultats de l'alcootest, le législateur the existence or content of a defence. As a result of the Amendments and the decision in St-Onge Lamoureux, the only evidence that can be tendered to raise a reasonable doubt about the reliability of breathalyzer test results is now evidence that the instrument was malfunctioning or was operated improperly. It is clear from s. 258(1)(d.01) that the Carter defence is no longer sufficient on its own to rebut the presumptions of accuracy and identity. The burden on the accused has thus been increased, as he or she can no longer ask the judge to draw an inference of malfunction or improper operation from indirect evidence by raising a Carter defence. Evidence related directly to the instrument itself is now required.

a influé sur l'existence ou le contenu d'un moyen de défense. Étant donné les modifications et l'arrêt St-Onge Lamoureux, la seule preuve pouvant être produite pour soulever un doute raisonnable quant à la fiabilité des résultats de l'alcootest se limite désormais à celle du mauvais fonctionnement ou de l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest. Il ressort clairement de l'al. 258(1)d.01) que la défense de type Carter ne suffit plus, à elle seule, pour réfuter les présomptions d'exactitude et d'identité. Le fardeau de preuve qui repose sur l'accusé s'en trouve alourdi, celui-ci ne pouvant plus demander au juge, au moyen de la défense de type Carter, de conclure au mauvais fonctionnement ou à l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest à partir d'une preuve indirecte. L'accusé doit dorénavant produire une preuve visant directement l'alcootest.

[18] The fact that the Carter defence is no longer sufficient on its own to rebut the presumptions established in s. 258(1)(c) makes it difficult to accept MacPherson J.A.'s opinion that the defence has not been eliminated, neutered or abolished and that it survives in a different form. In fact, this opinion is in sharp contrast with the very words of s. 258(1)(d.01), according to which "evidence tending to show that an approved instrument was malfunctioning or was operated improperly" does not include the evidence that would be tendered in raising the Carter defence. Unlike MacPherson J.A., I must conclude that the Carter defence has been eliminated as an independent means to raise a reasonable doubt about the reliability of breathalyzer test results. This, in my view, indicates that the provisions are not merely procedural; they affect a defence open to an accused and are therefore subject to the presumption against the retrospective application of new legislation. I agree with Mayrand J.A. in R. v. Gervais (1978), 43 C.C.C. (2d) 533 (Que. C.A.), that the right of an accused to rely on a defence is a substantive right and that new legislation has to be interpreted so as not to deprive the accused of a defence that would have been open to him or her at the time of the impugned act (p. 535).

[18] Comme la défense de type Carter ne suffit plus, à elle seule, pour réfuter les présomptions prévues à l'al. 258(1)c), il est difficile d'accepter l'opinion du juge MacPherson que cette défense n'a pas été supprimée, neutralisée ou abolie, et qu'elle continue d'exister sous une forme différente. En fait, cette opinion contraste nettement avec le texte même de l'al. 258(1)d.01), selon lequel la preuve produite par l'accusé en invoquant la défense de type Carter ne constitue pas une « preuve tendant à démontrer le mauvais fonctionnement ou l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest approuvé ». Contrairement à l'opinion exprimée par le juge MacPherson, je dois conclure que la défense de type Carter a été supprimée comme moyen de défense susceptible de soulever, à lui seul, un doute raisonnable quant à la fiabilité des résultats de l'alcootest. À mon avis, cela indique que les dispositions ne sont pas simplement de nature procédurale; elles ont une incidence sur un moyen de défense dont dispose l'accusé et sont, par le fait même, assujetties à la présomption de non-rétrospectivité des nouvelles mesures législatives. Je partage l'avis du juge Mayrand lorsqu'il dit dans R. c. Gervais, [1978] J.Q. n° 181 (QL) (C.A.), que le droit d'un accusé d'invoquer un moyen de défense est de nature substantielle et qu'une nouvelle mesure législative doit être interprétée de façon à ne pas priver l'accusé d'un moyen de défense dont il disposait au moment où l'acte litigieux aurait été posé (par. 8-9).

[19] In St-Onge Lamoureux, I conclude that precluding the use of the Carter defence to raise on its own a doubt about the accuracy of breathalyzer test results does not violate s. 7 of the Charter. However, the fact that Parliament could exclude evidence of alcohol consumption does not change the fact that a defence which on its own enabled an accused to avert conviction has been eliminated.

[19] Dans St-Onge Lamoureux, je conclus que de priver une personne accusée du droit de recourir à la défense de type Carter comme moyen suffisant à lui seul pour mettre en doute la fiabilité des résultats de l'alcootest ne viole pas l'art. 7 de la Charte. Cependant, la faculté du législateur d'exclure la preuve de consommation d'alcool ne change rien à la suppression d'un moyen de défense qui, à lui seul, permettait à un accusé d'éviter une déclaration de culpabilité.

[20] This brings me to my second reason for finding that the Amendments affect substantive rights of the accused. The broad scheme put in place by Parliament is based on presumptions that the results of the breathalyzer analyses are accurate and that they are identical to the blood alcohol level of the accused at the time of the alleged offence. As discussed in St-Onge Lamoureux, at para. 27, these statutory presumptions infringe the constitutionally protected right to be presumed innocent, as they relieve the Crown of the requirement of proving the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt before he or she need to respond. The legislated means to rebut these presumptions are relevant to the determination of whether the infringement of the right to be presumed innocent is justified under s. 1. This is where the Carter defence comes into play. Under the former legislation, the Carter defence enabled the accused to discharge his or her burden of rebutting the statutory presumptions, which favour the Crown, by relying on an expert opinion that the amount of alcohol he or she consumed is inconsistent with the breathalyzer test results. As a result of the Amendments, this is no longer the case. Instead, the accused must now present direct evidence about the use or operation of the instrument in order to rebut the presumptions.

[20] Cela m'amène à la deuxième raison pour laquelle j'estime que les modifications portent atteinte à des droits substantiels de l'accusé. Le régime général instauré par le législateur repose sur des présomptions voulant que les résultats des analyses soient exacts et correspondent à l'alcoolémie de l'accusé au moment où l'infraction reprochée aurait été commise. Comme l'illustre l'arrêt St-Onge Lamoureux au par. 27, ces présomptions légales portent atteinte à la présomption d'innocence garantie par la Constitution puisqu'elles libèrent le ministère public de l'obligation d'établir hors de tout doute raisonnable la culpabilité de l'accusé avant que celui-ci n'ait besoin de répondre. Les moyens légaux de repousser ces présomptions sont pertinents pour déterminer si l'atteinte au droit à la présomption d'innocence est justifiée au regard de l'article premier. C'est à cette étape qu'entre en jeu la défense de type Carter. Sous le régime des anciennes mesures législatives, la défense de type Carter permettait à l'accusé de s'acquitter de son fardeau de repousser les présomptions légales en faveur du ministère public en s'appuyant sur l'opinion d'un expert selon laquelle la quantité d'alcool qu'il avait bu n'était pas compatible avec les résultats de l'alcootest. Ce n'est plus le cas, par suite de l'adoption des modifications. Pour réfuter ces présomptions, l'accusé doit plutôt dorénavant présenter une preuve directe quant au fonctionnement ou à l'utilisation de l'alcootest.

[21] The possibility for the accused of rebutting the statutory presumptions by means of a Carter defence (under the former legislation) or by adducing evidence related to the instrument (under the Amendments) is determinative of whether the infringement of the right to be presumed innocent is justified. However, the conclusion that the infringement is justified in the context of the new legislation does not alter the fact that constitutional rights are affected. This is a further indication that the new legislation affects substantive rights, since constitutional rights are necessarily substantive. When constitutional rights are affected, the general rule against the retrospective application of legislation should apply.

[21] Le fait que l'accusé puisse réfuter les présomptions légales au moyen d'une défense de type Carter (sous le régime des anciennes mesures législatives) ou d'une preuve ciblant l'alcootest (selon les modifications) est déterminant lorsqu'il s'agit de décider si l'atteinte à la présomption d'innocence est justifiée. Toutefois, la conclusion selon laquelle

l'atteinte est justifiée sous le régime des nouvelles mesures législatives ne change rien au fait qu'il a été porté atteinte à des droits constitutionnels. Il s'agit d'une indication supplémentaire que les nouvelles mesures législatives portent atteinte à des droits substantiels puisque les droits constitutionnels sont forcément de nature substantielle. Ainsi, la règle générale interdisant l'application rétrospective des mesures législatives devrait s'appliquer en cas d'atteinte à des droits constitutionnels.

[22] In addition to the impact on the substantive rights of the accused, there is another reason why the Amendments should not be found to operate retrospectively. As a result of the Amendments, the evidence the accused may present to rebut the presumptions is limited to evidence that the instrument was malfunctioning or was operated improperly. The nature of that evidence is not defined in the Amendments, but it presumably has to relate to the instrument that was used to test the accused and not to the functioning of such instruments generally. This means that the accused may need to have access to information concerning the instrument used in his or her case or to operating records that would enable him or her to determine whether the instrument was functioning properly and was operated correctly. It is difficult to conceive how such an examination could take place months or even years after the tests were conducted. There is no indication that the instruments are isolated after being used in a given case. Parliament has not provided for the preservation of evidence for cases that began before the Amendments came into force.

[22] Outre l'incidence sur les droits substantiels de l'accusé, il existe une autre raison de ne pas conclure à l'application rétrospective des modifications. En raison de celles-ci, la preuve que l'accusé peut produire pour réfuter les présomptions se limite à celle du mauvais fonctionnement ou de l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest. Les modifications ne définissent pas la nature de cette preuve, mais elle doit vraisemblablement se rapporter à l'alcootest utilisé pour tester l'alcoolémie de l'accusé, et non au fonctionnement des alcootests en général. Cela signifie que l'accusé pourrait avoir besoin de renseignements sur l'alcootest utilisé dans son cas ou de comptes rendus d'utilisation qui lui permettraient d'établir si l'appareil a bien fonctionné ou a été utilisé correctement. On voit mal comment cet examen pourrait être effectué des mois, voire des années, après les analyses. Rien n'indique que les alcootests sont conservés isolément après leur utilisation dans un cas donné. Le législateur n'a pas prévu la conservation des éléments de preuve en vue des procès intentés avant l'entrée en vigueur des modifications.

[23] In St-Onge Lamoureux, one of the arguments put to the Court was that the Amendments violated the s. 7 rights of the accused because the defence required by the new legislation was so difficult to present that it was practically illusory. This argument was rejected on the basis that there are no limits on the evidence the accused can reasonably tender, provided that it relates to the malfunctioning or improper operation of the instrument. However, where, as in the case at bar, the parties did not know at the time of the breathalyzer tests that such a defence would be required, and years elapsed between the tests and the trial, it may be impossible to present evidence to rebut the presumptions.

[23] On a notamment soutenu dans St-Onge Lamoureux que les modifications violaient les droits garantis à l'accusé par l'art. 7 parce qu'il était tellement difficile de présenter le moyen de défense nécessaire par suite de l'adoption des nouvelles mesures législatives que cela le rendait pratiquement illusoire. Cet argument a été rejeté au motif que l'accusé peut raisonnablement produire tous les éléments de preuve qu'il veut, pourvu que ceux-ci aient trait au mauvais fonctionnement ou à l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest. Cependant, dans les cas où, comme en l'espèce, les parties n'étaient pas conscientes, au moment des analyses, du besoin

d'invoquer par la suite un tel moyen de défense, et où plusieurs années se sont écoulées entre les analyses et le procès, il pourrait s'avérer impossible de présenter des éléments de preuve pour réfuter les présomptions.

[24] There are similarities between the situation in the instant case and the one before the Court in R. v. Ali, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 221. In that case, amendments to the Criminal Code authorized the police to request more than one breath sample and made the taking of two samples a condition of application of the presumptions attached to breathalyzer test results. Because the former provision had not authorized the police to take two samples, prosecutions commenced before the new provision came into force would be frustrated by the new requirement if the amendments were held to apply retrospectively. The Court held that Parliament could not have intended such a result. Both in Ali and in the present case, Parliament added a requirement related to the evidence a party must adduce. In the case at bar, the new requirement is a condition for the rebuttal of the presumption provided for in s. 258(1)(c), whereas in Ali the new requirement was a condition for the application of the presumption.

[24] La situation dans l'affaire qui nous occupe présente des similitudes avec celle dont la Cour était saisie dans R. c. Ali, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 221. Dans cette affaire, des modifications au Code criminel autorisaient les policiers à demander plus d'un échantillon d'haleine et avaient fait du prélèvement de deux échantillons une condition de l'application des présomptions liées aux résultats de l'alcootest. Puisque l'ancienne disposition n'autorisait pas les policiers à prélever deux échantillons, l'ajout de la nouvelle condition aurait entravé les poursuites engagées avant l'entrée en vigueur de la nouvelle disposition s'il avait été conclu à l'application rétrospective des modifications. La Cour a conclu que le législateur ne pouvait avoir souhaité un tel résultat. Tant dans l'affaire Ali que dans la présente affaire, le législateur a ajouté une exigence relative aux éléments de preuve qu'une partie doit produire. En l'espèce, la nouvelle exigence constitue une condition à remplir pour repousser la présomption établie à l'al. 258(1)c), tandis que, dans Ali, la nouvelle exigence était une condition additionnelle pour que s'applique la présomption.

[25] Ali supports the view that, where the former legislation did not contemplate the gathering of evidence that is required by the new legislation, the new legislation can only be prospective. In the instant case, the accused cannot adduce evidence that he had no reason to gather before the Amendments. This is an additional reason for concluding that the Amendments do not apply to cases that were commenced before the Amendments came into force. I therefore disagree with MacPherson J.A. that the difficulty for an accused of obtaining evidence on the functioning of the instrument used in his or her case after years have gone by is speculative. Rather, I agree with the following comment by Bich J.A. (dissenting) in R. v. Loiseau, 2010 QCCA 1872 (CanLII), at para. 56:

[25] Ali étaye l'avis que, dans les cas où l'ancienne mesure législative n'envisage pas la collecte d'éléments de preuve devenue nécessaire en raison de la nouvelle disposition, celle-ci ne peut s'appliquer que pour l'avenir. En l'espèce, l'accusé ne peut présenter des éléments de preuve qu'il n'avait aucune raison de réunir avant l'entrée en vigueur des modifications. C'est là une raison de plus de conclure que les modifications ne s'appliquent pas aux instances introduites avant leur entrée en vigueur. Je ne partage donc pas l'avis du juge MacPherson selon lequel la difficulté que peut éprouver un accusé pour obtenir des éléments de preuve concernant le fonctionnement de l'alcootest utilisé dans son cas plusieurs années auparavant relève de l'hypothèse. Je suis plutôt d'accord avec le commentaire suivant formulé par la juge Bich (dissidente) dans R. c. Loiseau, 2010 QCCA 1872, [2010] R.J.Q. 2246, par. 56 :

[TRANSLATION] Because the law makes the requirements for the gathering of evidence more stringent and, due to the state of the law at the time, ensures that the accused will not have sought evidence that would now be indispensable to him to mount a defence, the amended provisions should not apply to this situation.

Devant une loi qui alourdit les exigences de la constitution de la preuve et fait en sorte que l'accusé n'aura pas recherché, à cause de l'état du droit à l'époque, des éléments qui lui seraient maintenant indispensables afin de faire valoir sa défense, il ne saurait y avoir application des dispositions modifiées à la présente situation.

[26] For these reasons, I would allow the appeal and restore the acquittal entered by the trial judge.

[26] Pour ces motifs, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi et de rétablir l'acquittement prononcé par le juge du procès.

I. Introduction

[27] Section 253(1)(b) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46, makes it an offence to operate (or to have care and control of) a motor vehicle with a blood alcohol content of more than 80 mg of alcohol in 100 mL of blood. To facilitate proof of this offence, the Crown has for many years had the benefit of certain factual presumptions. These presumptions arise once it is proven that breath samples were taken and analyzed by a breathalyzer device in accordance with detailed statutory requirements. Putting aside some points of detail, one of these presumptions is that the readings obtained under the statutory conditions are accurate (the presumption of accuracy); another presumption is that the readings at the time of testing represent the accused's blood alcohol content at the time of the alleged offence (the presumption of identity).

[28] For many years, an accused could rebut these presumptions by pointing to any sort of evidence that would raise a reasonable doubt in the mind of the trier of fact about the existence of the presumed facts. However, in 2008, Parliament enacted the Tackling Violent Crime Act, S.C. 2008, c. 6, which amends the Criminal Code by imposing some new rules about what sorts of evidence could be used to rebut these presumptions.

I. Introduction

[27] Selon l'alinéa 253(1)b) du Code criminel, L.R.C. 1985, ch. C-46, commet une infraction quiconque conduit (ou a la garde ou le contrôle d') un véhicule à moteur avec une alcoolémie supérieure à 80 mg d'alcool par 100 ml de sang. Pour faciliter la preuve de cette infraction, le ministère public bénéficie depuis de nombreuses années de certaines présomptions de fait. Ces présomptions entrent en jeu une fois qu'il est établi que les échantillons d'haleine ont été prélevés et analysés au moyen d'un alcootest, conformément aux exigences détaillées prescrites par la loi. Mis à part certains détails, l'une de ces présomptions veut que les résultats obtenus en conformité avec les conditions prévues par la loi soient exacts (la présomption d'exactitude); une autre présomption veut que les résultats obtenus au moment de l'analyse correspondent à l'alcoolémie de l'accusé au moment de l'infraction reprochée (la présomption d'identité).

[28] Pendant de nombreuses années, un accusé pouvait renverser ces présomptions en présentant toute espèce d'élément de preuve qui ferait naître un doute raisonnable dans l'esprit du juge des faits quant à l'existence des faits présumés. Or, en 2008, le législateur a adopté la Loi sur la lutte contre les crimes violents, L.C. 2008, ch. 6, qui a modifié le Code criminel en créant de nouvelles règles pour préciser quels types de preuve pouvaient être utilisés pour réfuter ces présomptions.

[29] The issue on the appeal is when these new evidentiary provisions apply. Do they apply, as the Court of Appeal held, to trials that are held on and after the day the new rules came into force, or, as the appellant contends, do they apply only to trials relating to events alleged to have occurred after they came into force?

[30] In my view, the holding of the Court of Appeal is correct and I would dismiss the appeal.

II. Brief Overview of the Issue

[31] Before the 2008 amendments, the presumption of accuracy (and therefore also the presumption of identity) could be rebutted by any evidence that raised a reasonable doubt that the actual blood alcohol level at the time of testing was below 80 mg of alcohol per 100 mL of blood: see, e.g., R. v. Crosthwait, [1980] 1 S.C.R. 1089. The presumption of identity itself could be rebutted by evidence tending to show that the accused's blood alcohol level at the time of the offence and at the time of testing had changed, provided that the effect of normal biological processes of absorption and elimination could not, of itself, constitute rebutting evidence: R. v. St. Pierre, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 791, at paras. 44 and 59-61.

[32] Often evidence to the contrary was offered in the form of "consumption and elimination" evidence — sometimes referred to as "Carter" evidence (R. v. Carter (1985), 19 C.C.C. (3d) 174 (Ont. C.A.)). This typically consisted of evidence from the accused and perhaps other witnesses about how much the accused had to drink and when, as well as evidence from a toxicologist indicating that if the accused had consumed the amount claimed, his or her blood alcohol level at the time of the offence would have been below the legal limit. Sometimes the introduction of this evidence has been referred to as the "Carter defence", but it really is not a defence at all. It is simply the presentation of evidence that could be relied on to raise a doubt about whether the breathalyzer device had accurately determined the accused's blood alcohol content

[29] La question en l'espèce est de savoir dans quels cas s'appliquent ces nouvelles dispositions relatives à la preuve. S'appliquent-elles, comme l'a affirmé la Cour d'appel, aux procès tenus le ou après le jour de l'entrée en vigueur des nouvelles règles ou s'appliquent-elles, comme le prétend l'appelant, uniquement aux procès concernant des événements qui seraient survenus après leur entrée en vigueur?

[30] La décision de la Cour d'appel me semble correcte et je suis d'avis de rejeter le pourvoi.

II. Aperçu de la question en litige

[31] Avant les modifications de 2008, la présomption d'exactitude (et aussi par le fait même la présomption d'identité) pouvait être réfutée par tout type d'éléments de preuve permettant de soulever un doute raisonnable quant au fait que l'alcoolémie réelle au moment de l'analyse était inférieure à 80 mg d'alcool par 100 ml de sang : voir, p. ex., R. c. Crosthwait, [1980] 1 R.C.S. 1089. La présomption d'identité elle-même pouvait être réfutée par une preuve tendant à démontrer que l'alcoolémie de l'accusé avait changé entre le moment de l'infraction et celui de l'alcootest, à la condition que l'effet du processus biologique normal de l'absorption et l'élimination de l'alcool par le métabolisme ne puisse pas, en soi, constituer une contre-preuve : R. c. St. Pierre, [1995] 1 R.C.S. 791, par. 44 et 59-61.

[32] On présentait souvent une preuve contraire sous forme de preuve de la « consommation et de l'élimination » de l'alcool — parfois appelée preuve de type « Carter » (R. c. Carter (1985), 19 C.C.C. (3d) 174 (C.A. Ont.)). Il s'agissait généralement de la déposition de l'accusé et peut-être aussi de celle d'autres témoins concernant la quantité d'alcool que l'accusé avait bu et le moment où il l'avait bu, de même que du témoignage d'un toxicologue selon lequel l'alcoolémie de l'accusé au moment de l'infraction aurait été inférieure à la limite légale si l'accusé avait consommé la quantité alléguée. La production de cette preuve a parfois été qualifiée de « défense de type Carter », mais, en fait, il ne s'agit aucunement d'un moyen de défense. Il s'agit simplement de la présentation d'éléments de preuve sur lesquels on peut se fonder and whether that reading reflected the accused's blood alcohol content at the time of operation, care or control.

[33] The appellant in this case presented this sort of evidence and was acquitted at trial. The driving in question occurred before the 2008 amendments came into force, but his trial continued after they had. His breathalyzer readings were 99 and 97 mg of alcohol per 100 mL of blood and there was nothing to indicate that the device was operating improperly. However, the appellant testified that he had only had three beers over a roughly two-hour period and his toxicologist testified that if that were so, his blood alcohol level would have been between 0 and 40 at the time of testing and between 20 and 52 at the time of driving. The judge believed the appellant and found that he was not satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the appellant's blood alcohol concentration at the time of driving exceeded 80.

[34] The 2008 amendments, if applied at the appellant's trial, would have limited in two respects the type of evidence that he could have relied on to rebut the presumptions of accuracy and identity. First, by virtue of the amended s. 258(1)(c), evidence to rebut the accuracy of the readings at the time of testing must raise a doubt with respect to whether the device malfunctioned or was improperly operated, about whether the malfunction or improper operation resulted in an over 80 reading and, as well, about whether the appellant's blood alcohol concentration at the time of driving was below 80 (these last two requirements have been eliminated in this Court's decision in R. v. St-Onge Lamoureux, 2012 SCC 57, [2012] 3 S.C.R. 187). Second, by virtue of the amended s. 258(1)(d.01), so-called Carter evidence cannot be relied on to raise a doubt about whether the approved instrument was malfunctioning or was operated improperly. These amended provisions are based on the idea that breathalyzer results obtained in accordance with the statutory requirements should be taken to be accurate, absent evidence to think otherwise, and that Carter evidence is too unreliable pour soulever un doute quant à l'exactitude de l'alcoolémie de l'accusé établie par l'alcootest et quant à la fidélité des résultats par rapport à son alcoolémie au moment où il conduisait le véhicule ou en avait la garde ou le contrôle.

[33] L'appelant, en l'espèce, a présenté ce type de preuve et a été acquitté au procès. L'incident en question est survenu avant l'entrée en vigueur des modifications de 2008, mais le procès de l'appelant s'est poursuivi après leur entrée en vigueur. Son alcoolémie avait été établie à 99 et à 97 mg d'alcool par 100 ml de sang et rien n'indiquait que l'appareil fonctionnait mal. L'appelant a toutefois affirmé n'avoir bu que trois bières durant une période d'environ deux heures et son toxicologue a témoigné que, si c'était le cas, son alcoolémie se serait située entre 0 et 40 au moment de l'analyse et entre 20 et 52 au moment de l'incident. Le juge a cru l'appelant et a conclu qu'il n'était pas convaincu hors de tout doute raisonnable que l'alcoolémie de l'appelant au moment de l'incident dépassait 80.

[34] Si on avait appliqué les modifications de 2008 lors du procès de l'appelant, elles auraient limité doublement le type de preuve sur laquelle il aurait pu s'appuyer pour réfuter les présomptions d'exactitude et d'identité. Premièrement, selon l'al. 258(1)c) modifié, la preuve visant à réfuter l'exactitude des résultats au moment de l'analyse doit soulever un doute raisonnable quant à savoir si l'appareil a mal fonctionné ou a été utilisé incorrectement, si son mauvais fonctionnement ou son utilisation incorrecte a entraîné un résultat supérieur à 80, et si l'alcoolémie de l'appelant au moment de l'incident était inférieure à 80 (la Cour supprime ces deux dernières exigences dans son arrêt R. c. St-Onge Lamoureux, 2012 CSC 57, [2012] 3 R.C.S. 187). Deuxièmement, selon l'al. 258(1)d.01) modifié, la preuve dite de type Carter ne peut être invoquée pour soulever un doute quant au mauvais fonctionnement ou à l'utilisation incorrecte de l'alcootest approuvé. Ces dispositions modifiées reposent sur l'idée que les résultats de l'alcootest obtenus conformément aux exigences prévues par la loi doivent être tenus pour exacts, en l'absence de preuve donnant à penser le contraire, et que to be admitted to cast doubt on the accuracy of such readings. These ideas find impressive support in the scientific literature. The amended provisions, in effect, define what types of evidence are not sufficiently probative to be used to undermine the accuracy of the breathalyzer readings.

la preuve de type Carter est trop peu fiable pour être admise en vue de mettre en doute l'exactitude de ces résultats. L'idée en question est largement reconnue dans la documentation scientifique. Les dispositions modifiées indiquent en fait quels types de preuve n'ont pas une force probante suffisante pour qu'on les utilise en vue de mettre en doute l'exactitude des résultats de l'alcootest.

[35] There are three principles of statutory interpretation that are potentially relevant to the issue of when the 2008 amendments apply. The question is which of these principles governs in this case. One principle is that the legislature is presumed not to intend legislation to change the legal character or consequences of actions that occurred before its enactment. Another is that the legislature is presumed not to intend to interfere with vested rights. A third is that the legislature intends an enactment dealing with exclusively procedural matters, including matters of evidence, to apply immediately to all proceedings, whether commenced before or after the enactment comes into force. These are all principles of interpretation and yield to clear statutory language to the contrary.

[35] Trois principes d'interprétation des lois peuvent être pertinents pour déterminer dans quels cas s'appliquent les modifications de 2008. Il faut d'abord décider lequel de ces principes est applicable en l'espèce. Selon le premier d'entre eux, le législateur est présumé ne pas souhaiter que la loi modifie la nature ou les conséquences juridiques des actes commis avant son adoption. Selon le deuxième principe, le législateur est présumé ne pas avoir l'intention de porter atteinte à des droits acquis. Selon le troisième, le législateur souhaite qu'un texte portant exclusivement sur des questions de procédure, y compris de preuve, s'applique immédiatement à toutes les instances, que celles-ci aient été engagées avant ou après l'entrée en vigueur du texte. Ce sont tous des principes d'interprétation subordonnés à des dispositions législatives claires à l'effet contraire.

[36] The appellant's position is that the first principle applies. He submits that the amended provisions are not simply matters of procedure but affect the content of a defence to the charge. Alternatively, the appellant's position is that even if the amended provisions are procedural, Parliament did not intend them to apply to trials arising out of past events and therefore the operation of the third principle of interpretation is ousted by clear parliamentary intent. The Crown on the other hand supports the conclusion of the Court of Appeal that the third principle applies because the amended provisions are procedural in nature.

[36] L'appelant soutient que le premier principe s'applique en l'espèce. Selon lui, les dispositions modifiées ne relèvent pas simplement de la procédure : elles ont une incidence sur le contenu d'un moyen de défense contre l'accusation. L'appelant soutient subsidiairement que, même si les dispositions modifiées sont de nature procédurale, le législateur ne voulait pas qu'elles s'appliquent aux procès résultant d'événements antérieurs. Ainsi, pour l'appelant, l'application du troisième principe d'interprétation est écartée par l'intention claire du législateur. Pour sa part, le ministère public appuie la conclusion de la Cour d'appel que le troisième principe s'applique parce que les dispositions modifiées sont de nature procédurale.

[37] To resolve the appeal, we must answer two questions:

1. Are the amended provisions procedural in nature so that they are presumed to apply to all

[37] Pour trancher l'appel, nous devons répondre à deux questions :

1. Les dispositions modifiées sont-elles de nature procédurale, de sorte qu'elles sont présumées trials occurring or continuing after they came into force?

2. If so, is this presumption rebutted by an indication of legislative intent that they should not so apply?

[38] I will address these two questions in turn, after a brief account of the facts and proceedings.

III. Facts and Proceedings

[39] In the early hours of July 22, 2007, after a night spent with friends at a nightclub, the appellant, Samuel Dineley, drove his parents' car into a parked vehicle. Police administered two breath tests, which revealed blood alcohol concentrations of 99 and 97 mg in 100 mL of blood. The administration of the tests was videotaped. The appellant was charged with impaired driving and driving over 80 mg under s. 253(1)(a) and (b) of the Criminal Code.

[40] His trial before a provincial court judge began on June 19, 2008, and the Crown completed its case on that day. However, the trial was adjourned to July 15 so that the Crown would be able to cross-examine the appellant's toxicologist. On July 2, that is between the trial's adjournment and continuation, the 2008 amendments came into force. These had the effect of rendering the appellant's expert evidence incapable of rebutting the presumptions set up in s. 258(1)(c). The Crown argued that the newly amended s. 258(1) applied immediately to all s. 253 offences, regardless of the timing of their underlying facts. The trial judge did not decide the issue, and instead decided that it was improper for the Crown to attempt to rely on the new amendments when the trial resumed. After the trial's resumption, the trial judge found the appellant not guilty.

[41] On a summary conviction appeal, a judge of the Ontario Superior Court of Justice found the s'appliquer à tous les procès qui ont lieu ou qui se poursuivent après leur entrée en vigueur?

2. Si oui, cette présomption est-elle réfutée par une indication que le législateur ne souhaite pas qu'elles soient appliquées de la sorte?

[38] J'examinerai successivement ces deux questions après avoir donné un aperçu des faits et des procédures.

III. Les faits et les procédures

[39] Le 22 juillet 2007 au petit matin, l'appelant, Samuel Dineley, au volant de la voiture de ses parents, a heurté un véhicule stationné après avoir passé la nuit avec des amis dans une boîte de nuit. Les policiers lui ont fait subir deux alcootests qui ont indiqué respectivement que son alcoolémie atteignait 99 et 97 mg d'alcool par 100 ml de sang. L'administration des alcootests a été enregistrée sur bande vidéo. L'appelant a été inculpé, en vertu des al. 253(1)a) et b) du Code criminel, de conduite avec facultés affaiblies et de conduite avec une alcoolémie dépassant 80.

[40] Son procès devant un juge de la cour provinciale a commencé le 19 juin 2008. Le ministère public a terminé la présentation de sa preuve le jour même. Le procès a cependant été ajourné au 15 juillet pour permettre au ministère public de contre-interroger le toxicologue de l'appelant. Or, les modifications de 2008 sont entrées en vigueur le 2 juillet, c'est-à-dire entre l'ajournement du procès et sa reprise. Elles ont eu pour effet d'empêcher que la preuve d'expert produite par l'appelant puisse réfuter les présomptions établies à l'al. 258(1)c). Le ministère public a fait valoir que le par. 258(1) récemment modifié s'appliquait sur-le-champ à toutes les infractions visées à l'art. 253, peu importe le moment où étaient survenus les faits dont elles découlaient. Le juge du procès n'a pas tranché la question, décidant plutôt, d'une part, qu'il était inapproprié que le ministère public tente d'invoquer les récentes modifications à la reprise du procès et, d'autre part, qu'il reconnaissait l'appelant non coupable.

[41] En appel de la déclaration de culpabilité par procédure sommaire, un juge de la Cour supérieure

2008 amendments to be substantive in nature, and so subject to the presumption against the alteration of the legal character or consequences of past actions. In his view, the amended provisions applied only to offences alleged to have been committed after they came into force, and so did not apply to the charges against the appellant: (2009), 86 M.V.R. (5th) 34. (I should add that the judge concluded that it had not been improper for the Crown to attempt to rely on the new amendments when the trial resumed. The appellant did not contest that conclusion in the Court of Appeal or in this Court.)
